That the facts, which I have advanced, may not be conteſted, I ſhall produce a proof, which tho' founded only upon a witneſs, has all the force of a juſt demonſtration ; ſince this witneſs is no other than Monſieur Jurieu, a man the moſt intractable of all others with regard to the Arminians. Mr. Arnaud imagined, that he had written a Book, which would abſolutely confound the Miniſters, when he publiſhed his Renverſement de la Morale. He founded his proofs upon the doctrines of the Synod of Dort, and ſuppoſed, that an Aſſembly of that importance would not have obliged people to profeſs thoſe doctrines under pain of excommunication, if they had not judged them to be fundamental Mr. Jurieu in his anſwer to him ſays an hundred good things, and throws him into the utmoſt confuſion by maintaining, that this Synod never conſidered the doctrines treated of in the diſputes with the Remonſtrants as neceſſary to ſalvation (7). He ſays in particular with reſpect to the doctrine of the impoſſibity of falling from Grace, one of the principal points of the diſpute, that ſince the deriſion of the Synod, it is free for the Lutherans and all other Communions to defend this doctrine or not to admit it. I ſay, it is free ; not that a perſon does not ſin in rejecting a truth, ſound, important, and eſtabliſh'd by the Word of God, as that is. But it is not a ſin, according to us, which excludes from Grace, and deſtroys the Faith (8). He ſays likewiſe, that thoſe, who live in the Communion of the Contra-Remonſtrants have the liberty of not ſubmitting to the deciſion of the Synod of Dort in that point, and maintaining their own private opinions upon it, provided they do not dogmatize and make diſciples; and that tho' Miniſters are not allowed in the pulpit, who attempt to oppoſe the perſeverance of the true Saints, but are denied Communion, yet it is not pretended, that they are cut off from the Body of Chriſt on that account (9).

(7) I have given the reaſons why the Synod of Dort inſerted this among their deciſions ; it is . . . in the third place to put an end to the differences by determining a controverſy, upon which their minds were divided. But I deny once more that the Synod had a deſign to make a fundamental article of our faith by this new deciſion. Jurieu, Juſtification de la Morale des Reformez. Part. 2. B. 6. cap. 3. pag. 216.

(8) Idem, ibid. B. 6. cap. 2. pag. 207.

(9) Ibid.

If we credit the Engliſh Writer of ſome Letters publiſhed by the Arminians, Gomarus was a man of violent paſſions. See the Letters of the Arminians, p. 548, 565, &c. This makes me the more confident in rejecting the raſh and malignant conjecture of thoſe, who would pretend, that he did not believe that the doctrines of Arminius lead to hell, but that he aſſerted this in order to juſtify his oppoſition to thoſe doctrines ; for he had reaſon to think, that the States would tell him, that the affair did not deſerve ſuch vehement exclamations, if the Arminian opinions were not inconſiſtent with ſalvation. The beſt anſwer, which could be given to this objection, would be to ſay, that it was impoſſible to ſtir too much and to deſire too zealouſly the authority of the Magiſtrate againſt theſe doctrines, ſince they would ſink into hell thoſe who ſhould be infected by them. Grotius remarks, that Gomarus, in a converſation which they had upon the Arminian diſputes, ſtiled Arminius's opinions profane and impious, and fell into a great paſſion againſt him, but without ſaying almoſt any thing concerning Predeſtination. Cum multa acriter in Arminium diceret, impiaſque & profanas vocaret ipſius opiniones, tamen de prædeſtinatione vix quicquam locutus eſt. Sed primum in illam maxime ſententiam invectus eſt, quæ juſtificationis objectum aut materiam ſtatuit fidem, juſtitiam autem Chriſti cauſam meritoriam juſtificationis ejus quæ eſt ex fide (10). i. e. " Tho' he ſaid a great many ſevere " things of Arminius, and called his opinions impi- " ous and profane, yet he ſpake ſcarce any thing con- " cerning Predeſtination. But he firſt inveighed " chiefly againſt the doctrine, that Faith is the object " or foundation of Juſtification, and that the Right- " eouſneſs of Chriſt is the meritorious cauſe of that " Juſtification, which is of Faith." He inſiſted principally upon the doctrine of Juſtification ; and yet the greateſt part of the Members of the States of the Province had judged, that upon this point the diſpute between Gomarus and Arminius was only a diſpute of words (11). If there was any artifice in not inſiſting much upon the point of Predeſtination, it was an artifice alſo to inſiſt upon it; and this latter artifice was Arminius's. He obſerved that the doctrine of abſolute Reprobation was eaſily capable of an odious ſenſe, and which ſhocks the mind ; and that his own doctrine in that point was more plauſible and popular. Upon this account he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on that quarter (12). This is the general cuſtom of pleaders ; they always repreſent their cauſe in the faireſt ſide. Obſerve well what Grotius ſays at the end of this letter. Uyttenbogard had foreſeen in 1608 the event of theſe diſputes, which was that the doctrine of Calvin would triumph in Holland, as it did at Geneva in the time of Caſtalio, a man who was perſecuted in ſuch a manner, and reduc'd to ſuch neceſſity, that he was obliged to maintain himſelf by making faggots. Cum tantis præjudiciis res agatur, & ſingulares Doctorum opiniones in mentes diſcipulorum ſenſim irrepentes, atque auctu temporis, & altius inquirendi negligentia ac ſpecie, tacito Eccleſiarum conſenſu receptæ, liberam magnorum ingeniorum ſedulitatem autoritate ſua jugulent, neque minus in Eccleſiis, quàm in ullis conceſſibus vincat major pars meliorem, non alium ſe eventum rerum Arminii ſperare, quam Caſtellionis fuerit, qui preſſus impotentia adverſariorum eo redactus ſit, ut vir non indoctus & perpetuæ famæ lignando ſibi victum quæreret (12). i. e. " Since the affair " is carried on with ſo much prejudice, and the par- " ticular opinions of Divines inſinuating themſelves by " degrees into the minds of their diſciples, and by " length of time, and neglect of examining further " into points, are admitted with the tacit conſent of " the Churches, and by their authority lay a reſtraint " upon the free enquiry of perſons of great minds ; " and ſince in Churches no leſs than in other Aſſem- " blies the majority has the aſcendant over the better " part ; he has no hopes of any other event of Ar- " minius's cauſe, than that of Caſtalio's, who being " perſecuted by the malice of his adverſaries was re- " duced to ſupport himſelf by making faggots, tho' a " man of learning and laſting reputation."

(10) Grotius, Epiſt. 11. Part. 1. pag. 3.

(11) Plerique ex Senatu judicaverant hoc non multo plus eſſe quam λογομαχίαν (verborum pugnam) . . . . . ille contra rem magnam agi putabat. Grotius, ibid.

(12) At Arminius dicebat, non ita graves eſſe controverſias, ſed maxime circa prædeſtinationem ambigi, quod ideo in Conventu dixiſſe videbatur aut credebatur, quia in iſto argumento, popularis ac plauſibilis eſt novitas. Idem, ibid.

(12) Ibid. pag. 4.

[E] Meurſius has miſled Moreri with regard to ſome facts.] He has fixed (13) the birth of Gomarus in the year 1562 (14), and repreſented him as going to England before he went into Germany. We diſcover theſe errors when we read the account mentioned by me, which is incomparably better than that followed by Moreri, ſince it is extracted from a Book written at Groningen, where Gomarus was Profeſſor two and twenty years ; a Book, I ſay, written after Gomarus's death, and from Memoirs much fuller than thoſe made uſe of by John Meurſius.

(13) Athen. Batav. pag. 176.

(14) Monſ. Baillet, tom. 1. of the Anti, p. 127. having followed Meurſius in this point, ought conſequently to have ſaid, that Gomarus died aged 79 years, ſince he died in 1641. The truth is, he wanted ſome days of 78 when he died.

[F] The Errors, which Moreri has committed of himſelf, are miſerable ones.] He ſays, that Gomarus's father carried him into England. Meurſius does not mention this, and the Author of the Lives of the Profeſſors of Groningen affirms expreſly the contrary. He ſays that Gomarus's father retired into the Palatinate, and ſent his ſon to Straſburg. Moreri pretends that Arminius taught a peculiar doctrine at Leyden, when Gomarus was invited thither. This is an egregious Anachroniſm. Gomarus had been ten years Profeſſor at Leyden, when Arminius began to teach there. But the ſtrangeſt miſtake of our Author, and the moſt inexcuſable in a French Prieſt, who ought to think himſelf obliged to labour the converſion of Huguenots, is his imagining, that the doctrine of irreſiſtible and inamiſſible Grace was an error, into which Gomarus fell by being carried a little too far by his paſſion. What ignorance is this ! Is it not a doctrine, which always

GOMARUS (FRANCIS) Profeſſor of Divinity, was born at Bruges January the 30th 1563. His father and mother who had embraced the Reformed Religion, retired into the Palatinate in 1578, in order to profeſs it without diſturbance, and ſent him to Straſbourg to ſtudy under the celebrated John Sturmius. He was under the diſcipline of this worthy old man about three years, after which he went to proſecute his ſtudies at Neuſtad, whither the Profeſſors of Heidelberg were retired (a). He went over to England about the end of the year 1582, and heard at Oxford the Divinity Lectures of Dr. John Rainolds, and at Cambridge thoſe of Dr. William Whitaker. He took there the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in June 1584. He ſpent the two following years at Heidelberg (b), where the Univerſity had been reſtored. The Flemiſh Church at Francfort deſired him for their Miniſter in 1587, and he performed the functions of his office from that time till the year 1593 when the Church was diſperſed by the perſecution. He was ſent for to Leyden to be Profeſſor of Divinity in 1594. He accepted this poſt, but before he took poſſeſſion of it he went to Heidelberg, where he had the degree of Doctor conferred on him. He diſcharged his place of Profeſſor very peaceably till 1603, when he had for his collegue James Arminius, a man, who ſoon began to ſpread his Pelagian doctrines [A], and to make himſelf the head of a party in the Univerſity. Gomarus appeared againſt him with great zeal, not only in the ſchools of Leyden, but likewiſe in the preſence of the States of the Province. They diſputed twice one againſt the other in the Aſſembly of the States of Holland in 1608, and five againſt five the year following. The ſucceſs of the diſputes was not ſuch as the Churches deſired (c); however it ſerved ſome purpoſe, for it diſcovered the Pelagianiſm of Arminius. This Profeſſor, who was then ſick, made uſe of that excuſe to diſcontinue the Conferences, and died ſome time after. His adverſaries employed all their induſtry to prevent Vorſtius from ſucceeding him; but not being able to ſucceed, it happened that Gomarus, to avoid having ſuch a collegue, left his country, and retired to Middlebourg in 1611. He was Miniſter there, and read public Lectures. This continued till the year 1614, when he was invited by the Univerſity of Saumur to be Profeſſor of Divinity. He diſcharged that poſt for four years; after which he retired to Groningen, to be principal Profeſſor of Divinity and the Hebrew Language. He found here a ſettlement which he conſtantly maintained till his death, which happened January the 11th 1641. If he was abſent twice, it was not for his diverſion, it was only to be one of the Judges of Arminius's cauſe in the Synod of Dort (d), and to reviſe the Tranſlation of the Old Teſtament (e). He was three times married, and had no children but by his ſecond wife [B]. He was a man of great abilities, and eſpecially in the Oriental Languages. His works were printed at Amſterdam in 1645 (f) [C]. If it be true that he gave Barnevelt the anſwer mentioned by Grotius, he cannot be acquitted of a great deal of outrageous zeal [D]. It is eaſy to convince thoſe who are judges of things. Meurſius has miſled Moreri

(a) The Elector Palatine had baniſhed them, becauſe they were not Lutherans.

(b) The Elector Lewis, a perſecutor of thoſe of the Reformed Religion, dying in 1583, Prince Caſimir his brother had the adminiſtration of the Electorate, and reſtored the Reformed.

(c) See Remark [A], quotation (1).

(d) In 1618.

(e) At Leyden in 1633.

(f) Taken from his Life in the Collection of the Lives of the Proteſtants of Groningen.

(1) Dogmata Pelagiana clam, palam, voce, ſcripto ſpargere cœpit, ac familiam in Academia ducere. Vita Gomari, inter Profeſſ. Groningenſ. Vitas, pag. 76.

(2) The 19th of the ſecond part.

(3) Succeſſu quidem non eo quem Eccleſiæ optabant, ut profligatis erroribus ac ſchiſmate orthodoxa veritas & concordia in arce collocaretur: non tamen nullo, cum detracta larva Adverſarii Pelagianiſmus palam evictus fuerit. Vita Gomari, pag. 77.

(4) He had married his firſt wife in the ſame city; and he married his third at Middlebourg; ſo that it ſhould not have been ſaid in the firſt tome of the Anti, p. 128. that he married at Leyden before he went to Middlebourg.

[A] Arminius ſoon began to ſpread his Pelagian Doctrines.] I advance this as a Tranſlator of the Writer of the life of Gomarus (1): but I do not pretend to affirm that he is in the right; for I know that Arminius did not own that his opinions were like thoſe of Pelagius, or even of the Semi-Pelagians. See Grotius's Treatiſe intitled, Diſquiſitio an Pelagiana ſint ea dogmata quæ nunc ſub eo nomine traducuntur? It is in the third volume of his Theological Works. See likewiſe one of his Letters (2). When you read therefore in the Life of Gomarus, that this advantage at leaſt was gained by conferences with the Arminians, that they were plainly convicted of teaching the doctrines of Pelagius (3), do not think, that they were obliged to own this, and that the Judges of the Conference pronounced that they were ſufficiently convicted of it. The expreſſions of that Author ought not to be underſtood in any other ſenſe, than that Gomarus pretended to have produced good proofs of his accuſation againſt Arminius.

[B] He had no children but by his ſecond wife.] Her name was Mary Leremite, and was a Gentlewoman both by her father's and mother's ſide. He married her at Francfort (4). He had one ſon and two daughters. The ſon died before his father, and left children. The younger daughter married David de la Haie, Miniſter of a Walloon Church. This remark and ſeveral others of the ſame kind, which may be found through this Dictionary, are made out of regard to many good people, who are very curious to have an account of the families of Miniſters and learned men. If there are ſome readers, who have no curioſity of this kind, as undoubtedly there are too many, they are deſired to remember, that an Author is not obliged to ſay nothing but what is to their taſte. In a work like this the Author ought to write ſometimes for one ſett of readers, and ſometimes for another. Let this be ſaid once for all.

[C] His Works were printed at Amſterdam in fol. in 1645.] This ſignifies, that many of his Tracts publiſhed at different times were collected into one body. His Anti-Colerus was printed in 1599 and 1600. His Lyra Davidis was publiſhed long before his death. Lewis Capellus wrote againſt this Work. Non ita pridem Vir Clariſſ. & doctiſſ. it is Rivetus who ſays this (5), Franciſcus Gomarus edidit Lyram Davidis, in qua putavit ſe ad metra Horatiana & ſimilia Davidis Pſalmorum verſus ita exegiſſe, ut veram poeſeos Hebraicæ rationem invenerit. Sed Ludovicus Capellus animadverſionum libello totum illud D. Gomari opus obelo transfigere conatus eſt, ut inde lector diſcat vix inter doctos de eo poſſe convenire, neque labore parum utili ſe ultra fatiget. i. e. "Not long ago the very famous and "learned Francis Gomarus publiſhed Lyra Davidis, "in which he thought that he had ſo far reduced the "verſes of David's Pſalms to Horace's Metre and "others of that kind, that he had diſcovered the true "nature of the Hebrew Poetry. But Lewis Capellus "in his Book of Animadverſions has endeavoured to "confute that whole Work of Gomarus, ſo that the "Reader will perceive from thence, that learned men "can ſcarce agree upon the point, and will not trouble himſelf any further with a taſk of little uſe."

(5) Prolegom. in Pſalmos.

[D] If it be true, that he gave Barnevelt the Anſwer mentioned by Grotius, he cannot be acquitted of a great deal of outrageous zeal.] Barnevelt made a ſhort ſpeech to the two antagoniſts before the States of Holland, in which he declared, that he gave thanks to God, that the controverſies did not relate to the fundamental doctrines of the Chriſtian Religion. Upon this Gomarus, having obtained leave to ſpeak, proteſted that he would not appear before the throne of God with the errors of Arminius. This particular is to be found in Grotius's Letters (6). We meet with it likewiſe in the Preface to the Acts of the Synod of Dort. I doubt that

(6) Cum D. Oldenbarneveldius, brevi, quam ad Profeſſores habebat, oratione inter alia gratias ſe habere Deo diceret, quod de Chriſtianæ Religionis capitibus nulla eſſet diſputatio; reſpondit Gomarus, poſtulata dicendi venia, ejuſmodi eſſe Collegæ ſui opiniones in articulis inter ipſos controverſis, ut ipſe, ita ſentiens, nolit coram Deo Judice conſiſtere. Grotius, Epiſt. 11. Part 1. pag. 3.

Moreri with regard to ſome facts [E] ; but the errors which Moreri has committed of himſelf, are miſerable ones [F]. Almoſt all of them have been marked in the Dutch edition that there are ſtill partizans of Gomarus paſſionate enough, to maintain, that he was in the right in ſaying this. The heat of diſputes and the malignant influence of a profeſſorial emulation, made him carry things to exceſs, and diſturbed his judgment; for at preſent the moſt rigid Calviniſts do not ſcruple to own, that the five articles of the Remonſtrants are not fundamental hereſies; and they give us to underſtand, that the ſchiſm would be eaſily removed, if the Sect of Arminius had not fallen into new errors a thouſand times more pernicious than thoſe, which divided Gomarus and Arminius. So that thoſe, who have not an head heated by the perſonal conteſts, which inflamed Gomarus, would not be of his opinion, that a perſon, who believes the five Articles of the Arminians, will be eternally damned. We ought therefore to impute to a perſonal animoſity the cruel opinion of this adverſary of Arminius.

That the facts, which I have advanced, may not be conteſted, I ſhall produce a proof, which tho' founded only upon a witneſs, has all the force of a juſt demonſtration; ſince this witneſs is no other than Monſieur Jurieu, a man the moſt intractable of all others with regard to the Arminians. Mr. Arnaud imagined, that he had written a Book, which would abſolutely confound the Miniſters, when he publiſhed his Renverſement de la Morale. He founded his proofs upon the doctrines of the Synod of Dort, and ſuppoſed, that an Aſſembly of that importance would not have obliged people to profeſs thoſe doctrines under pain of excommunication, if they had not judged them to be fundamental. Mr. Jurieu in his anſwer to him ſays an hundred good things, and throws him into the utmoſt confuſion by maintaining, that this Synod never conſidered the doctrines treated of in the diſputes with the Remonſtrants as neceſſary to ſalvation (7). He ſays in particular with reſpect to the doctrine of the impoſſibity of falling from Grace, one of the principal points of the diſpute, that ſince the deriſion of the Synod, it is free for the Lutherans and all other Communions to defend this doctrine or not to admit it. I ſay, it is free; not that a perſon does not ſin in rejecting a truth, ſound, important, and eſtabliſh'd by the Word of God, as that is. But it is not a ſin, according to us, which excludes from Grace, and deſtroys the Faith (8). He ſays likewiſe, that thoſe, who live in the Communion of the Contra-Remonſtrants have the liberty of not ſubmitting to the deciſion of the Synod of Dort in that point, and maintaining their own private opinions upon it, provided they do not dogmatize and make diſciples; and that tho' Miniſters are not allowed in the pulpit, who attempt to oppoſe the perſeverance of the true Saints, but are denied Communion, yet it is not pretended, that they are cut off from the Body of Chriſt on that account (9).

(7) I have given the reaſons why the Synod of Dort inſerted this among their deciſions; it is ... in the third place to put an end to the differences by determining a controverſy, upon which their minds were divided. But I deny once more that the Synod had a deſign to make a fundamental article of our faith by this new deciſion. Jurieu, Juſtification de la Morale des Reformez. Part. 2. B. 6. cap. 3. pag. 216.

(8) Idem, ibid. B. 6. cap. 2. pag. 207.

(9) Ibid.

If we credit the Engliſh Writer of ſome Letters publiſhed by the Arminians, Gomarus was a man of violent paſſions. See the Letters of the Arminians, p. 548, 565, &c. This makes me the more confident in rejecting the raſh and malignant conjecture of thoſe, who would pretend, that he did not believe that the doctrines of Arminius lead to hell, but that he aſſerted this in order to juſtify his oppoſition to thoſe doctrines; for he had reaſon to think, that the States would tell him, that the affair did not deſerve ſuch vehement exclamations, if the Arminian opinions were not inconſiſtent with ſalvation. The beſt anſwer, which could be given to this objection, would be to ſay, that it was impoſſible to ſtir too much and to deſire too zealouſly the authority of the Magiſtrate againſt theſe doctrines, ſince they would ſink into hell thoſe who ſhould be infected by them. Grotius remarks, that Gomarus, in a converſation which they had upon the Arminian diſputes, ſtiled Arminius's opinions profane and impious, and fell into a great paſſion againſt him, but without ſaying almoſt any thing concerning Predeſtination. Cum multa acriter in Arminium diceret, impiaſque & profanas vocaret ipſius opiniones, tamen de prædeſtinatione vix quicquam locutus eſt. Sed primum in illam maxime ſententiam invectus eſt, quæ juſtificationis objectum aut materiam ſtatuit fidem, juſtitiam autem Chriſti cauſam meritoriam juſtificationis ejus quæ eſt ex fide (10). i. e. "Tho' he ſaid a great many ſevere "things of Arminius, and called his opinions impi- "ous and profane, yet he ſpake ſcarce any thing con- "cerning Predeſtination. But he firſt inveighed "chiefly againſt the doctrine, that Faith is the object "or foundation of Juſtification, and that the Right- "eouſneſs of Chriſt is the meritorious cauſe of that "Juſtification, which is of Faith." He inſiſted principally upon the doctrine of Juſtification; and yet the greateſt part of the Members of the States of the Province had judged, that upon this point the diſpute between Gomarus and Arminius was only a diſpute of words (11). If there was any artifice in not inſiſting much upon the point of Predeſtination, it was an artifice alſo to inſiſt upon it; and this latter artifice was Arminius's. He obſerved that the doctrine of abſolute Reprobation was eaſily capable of an odious ſenſe, and which ſhocks the mind; and that his own doctrine in that point was more plauſible and popular. Upon this account he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on that quarter (12). This is the general cuſtom of pleaders; they always repreſent their cauſe in the faireſt ſide. Obſerve well what Grotius ſays at the end of this letter. Uyttenbogard had foreſeen in 1608 the event of theſe diſputes, which was that the doctrine of Calvin would triumph in Holland, as it did at Geneva in the time of Caſtalio, a man who was perſecuted in ſuch a manner, and reduc'd to ſuch neceſſity, that he was obliged to maintain himſelf by making faggots. Cum tantis præjudiciis res agatur, & ſingulares Doctorum opiniones in mentes diſcipulorum ſenſim irrepentes, atque auctu temporis, & altius inquirendi negligentia ac ſpecie, tacito Eccleſiarum conſenſu receptæ, liberam magnorum ingeniorum ſedulitatem autoritate ſua jugulent, neque minus in Eccleſiis, quàm in ullis conceſſibus vincat major pars meliorem, non alium ſe eventum rerum Arminii ſperare, quam Caſtellionis fuerit, qui preſſus impotentia adverſariorum eo redactus ſit, ut vir non indoctus & perpetuæ famæ lignando ſibi victum quæreret (12). i. e. "Since the affair "is carried on with ſo much prejudice, and the par- "ticular opinions of Divines inſinuating themſelves by "degrees into the minds of their diſciples, and by "length of time, and neglect of examining further "into points, are admitted with the tacit conſent of "the Churches, and by their authority lay a reſtraint "upon the free enquiry of perſons of great minds; "and ſince in Churches no leſs than in other Aſſem- "blies the majority has the aſcendant over the better "part; he has no hopes of any other event of Ar- "minius's cauſe, than that of Caſtalio's, who being "perſecuted by the malice of his adverſaries was re- "duced to ſupport himſelf by making faggots, tho' a "man of learning and laſting reputation."

(10) Grotius, Epiſt. 11. Part. 1. pag. 3.

(11) Plerique ex Senatu judicaverant hoc non multo plus eſſe quam λογομαχίαν (verborum pugnam) ..... ille contra rem magnam agi putabat. Grotius, ibid.

(12) At Arminius dicebat, non ita graves eſſe controverſias, ſed maxime circa prædeſtinationem ambigi, quod ideo in Conventu dixiſſe videbatur aut credebatur, quia in iſto argumento, popularis ac plauſibilis eſt novitas. Idem, ibid.

(12) Ibid. pag. 4.

[E] Meurſius has miſled Moreri with regard to ſome facts.] He has fixed (13) the birth of Gomarus in the year 1562 (14), and repreſented him as going to England before he went into Germany. We diſcover theſe errors when we read the account mentioned by me, which is incomparably better than that followed by Moreri, ſince it is extracted from a Book written at Groningen, where Gomarus was Profeſſor two and twenty years; a Book, I ſay, written after Gomarus's death, and from Memoirs much fuller than thoſe made uſe of by John Meurſius.

(13) Athen. Batav. pag. 176.

(14) Monſ. Baillet, tom. 1. of the Anti, p. 127. having followed Meurſius in this point, ought conſequently to have ſaid, that Gomarus died aged 79 years, ſince he died in 1641. The truth is, he wanted ſome days of 78 when he died.

[F] The Errors, which Moreri has committed of himſelf, are miſerable ones.] He ſays, that Gomarus's father carried him into England. Meurſius does not mention this, and the Author of the Lives of the Profeſſors of Groningen affirms expreſly the contrary. He ſays that Gomarus's father retired into the Palatinate, and ſent his ſon to Straſburg. Moreri pretends that Arminius taught a peculiar doctrine at Leyden, when Gomarus was invited thither. This is an egregious Anachroniſm. Gomarus had been ten years Profeſſor at Leyden, when Arminius began to teach there. But the ſtrangeſt miſtake of our Author, and the moſt inexcuſable in a French Prieſt, who ought to think himſelf obliged to labour the converſion of Huguenots, is his imagining, that the doctrine of irreſiſtible and inamiſſible Grace was an error, into which Gomarus fell by being carried a little too far by his paſſion. What ignorance is this! Is it not a doctrine, which always prevailed

" time of his birth be truly ſet down by his own hand in one of the books of his Li" brary, as he told it ſecretly [C] to a perſon who did not mention it till after Gom-
" bauld's death." He was one of thoſe who were moſt conſtantly at the Aſſemblies formed by Mary of Medicis and Ann of Auſtria during the regencies of theſe two Princeſſes. But it was ſtill with more aſſiduity and pleaſure that he went to Mademoiſelle de Rambouillet's houſe (d) [D]. He died in the year 1666. I ſhall collect in one ſingle Remark what I have to obſerve concerning his Writings, and concerning the opinion which able judges had of them [E].

(d) Taken from the Preface to the Traitez & Lettres de Gombauld.

GONET

ſhe is as ready to ſuppreſs them, and to apply to other uſes the funds on which they were aſſigned. There are continually new comers; and the Court is willing to gratify them without a new expence, by granting them what had before been given to others, who are ſuppoſed to have enjoyed the favour long enough. Old Penſioners are the moſt odious, and are obliged to petition with the moſt extenſive and moſt humble patience, and theſe the Court does not much ſcruple to diſappoint.

[C] His life . . . laſted almoſt an whole Century, . . . as he told it ſecretly.] What is this! A man of good morals, and zealous for his Religion, ſuch a man, I ſay, makes a ſecret of the year of his birth; and though he determined to reveal this great ſecret to a friend, yet he deſires him ſo earneſtly to be diſcreet, that his friend thinks himſelf under an obligation not to mention a word of it till after his confident's death. This would hardly be excuſed in a maiden or in a widow, though for the reſt men be indulgent enough, not to find fault with them, when they would make a ſecret of the true time of their birth (6). But we may ſee here, as on a thouſand other occaſions, that what at firſt ſight ſeems to be nothing but a fantaſtical humour, an impertinent weakneſs, and an old woman's ſillineſs, is yet grounded on ſome plauſible reaſon, which even is ſolid in ſome reſpects. Gombauld was no Poeta-ſter or ſorry Rhymer, he was an excellent Poet, who had gained the eſteem of the polite part of the World (7). He had been conſtantly at the aſſemblies of the Ladies; he had conſequently uſed himſelf to polite and courtly converſations: when he happened to be with Ladies he remembered the manners of his youth; he praiſed and admired them. His part was ſtill that of a polite man and a man of wit. But in order to act it in a becoming manner, it was neceſſary for him that people ſhould not know how old he was. He publiſhed a large Collection of Epigrams in the year 1657; had he not reaſons to fear, that if it were known that he was then fourſcore and ten years old, it would be thought very ſtrange, that at ſuch an age he ſhould aſk a licence for a work of this kind, and make preſents of it himſelf? Had he not reaſons to fear that Monſieur Daillé and the other Miniſters of Paris would ſecretly cenſure him for minding ſuch trifles in ſo advanced an age? After all, he is not the only perſon who laboured under this weakneſs; we ſhall meet with it below (8) in a Grammarian briſtling with Greek, and who ought to have been free from it much more than a Court-Poet.

(6) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre Maimbourg, pag. 762, 763, where the Author quotes a pretty paſſage from the Lettres du Chevalier d'Her **.

(7) See quotation (17), and Monſ. Menage's Obſervations on Malherbe's Poems, in which Gombauld is commended and quoted in ſeveral places.

(8) See the remark [B] of the article GUYET (Francis).

[D] It was with aſſiduity . . . that he went to Mademoiſelle de Rambouillet's houſe.] The Author of the Preface calls it the delicious meeting-place of all the perſons of quality and merit that were then living (9). It was, adds he, like a ſmall but choice Court; leſs numerous indeed, than that of the Louvre, but if I may be allowed to ſay it, more excellent; becauſe nothing came near this Temple of Honour, where Virtue itſelf was worſhipped under the name of the Incomparable Arténice, but what deſerved her approbation and her eſteem.

(9) Preface des Traitez & Lettres de Mr. de Gombauld.

[E] I ſhall collect in one ſingle Remark what I have to obſerve concerning his writings, and concerning the opinion which able judges had of them.] We find in the Hiſtory of the French Academy (10), that in the year 1652 Gombauld had not yet publiſhed either his Tragedy of the Danaides, or the Tragi-Comedy of Cidippe, nor three Books of Epigrams, or ſeveral other Poems, nor ſeveral Letters and Diſcourſes in proſe: but that his Endymion, and his Paſtoral of Amaranthe, and a volume of Poems, and a volume of Letters were printed. The Abbot de Marolles obſerves in a Book, which he publiſhed in the year 1657, that Monſieur Gombauld had juſt publiſhed an excellent Collection of Epigrams (11), and (12) that his Aconce (13) and his immortal Danaïdes which abound with ſuch beautiful lines had not been printed. We are told in the Preface to his poſthumous Treatiſe, that the Tragedy of Danaides has been publiſhed, and that he left behind him not only a Tragi-Comedy of Cidippe, but alſo a number of Poems ſufficient to make a new Collection, eſpecially of Sonnets and Epigrams, which could not yet be publiſhed, becauſe they were in the poſſeſſion of perſons who have but little ſkill in theſe things. Obſerve that the Endymion is in proſe: it was firſt printed in the year 1624, and then reprinted in the year 1626. It is a kind of a romance.

(10) Pag. 339. of the Paris edition, 1672 in 12mo.

(11) Marolles, Suite des Mémoires, pag. 246.

(12) Ibid. pag. 242.

(13) It is the ſame piece which Monſ. Peliſſon calls Cidippe.

Men differ in their opinion concerning the merit of his Poems. Some Authors pretend that he excelled chiefly in writing Sonnets, that this was in a manner his lot, and the portion of the Parnaſſus that fell to his ſhare. Let us always follow our natural genius, ſays Monſieur Guerat (14), let us never go beyond that kind of writing which is proper to us, nor let us envy others the glory which we cannot attain like them. Let Deſportes write Elegies, Theophile Stanzas, Gombauld Sonnets, and Mainard Epigrams. Others extend Gombauld's Dominions farther; they pretend that he not only reigned over the Sonnet, but that he alſo conquered the Empire of Epigrams over Mainard. " GOMBAULD the great Caſuiſt and Legiſlator of the Sounding Iſland or Land of Sonnets, ſent thither for a company of Soldiers very ſpruce and neatly dreſſed; he " alſo took from the Epigrammatic Mountains three " troops of light horſe of a ſmall ſize, but who fought " with a wonderful briſkneſs, and had very dangerous " arrows, which they ſhot with an uncommon dexterity; he had employed them in the conqueſt of " the Principality, which he uſurped over the Preſident Ménard (15)." The Abbé de Marolles does not go ſo far; he only places Monſieur Ménard, Monſieur de Beautru and Monſieur Gombauld amongſt the French Poets, with whom our neighbours cannot diſpute the firſt rank, with regard to Epigrams, and who are but little inferior to the ancients (16). Monſieur Boileau Deſpreaux does not value our Poet's Sonnets.

(14) Guret, Guerre des Auteurs, pag. 138, 139.

(15) Furetiere, Nouvelle Allégorique, pag. 56, 57. of the Paris edition, 1658, 8vo.

(16) L'Abbe de Marolles, Suite des Mémoires, pag. 246.

Un ſonnet ſans defauts vant ſeul un long Poéme.
Mais en vain mille auteurs y penſent arriver;
Et cet heureux Phenix eſt encor à trouver.
A peine dans Gombaut, Maynard, & Malleville,
En peut on admirer deux on trois entre mille:
Le reſte auſſi peu lû que aux de Pelletier,
N'a fait de chez Sercy qu'un ſant chez l'Epicier (17).

(17) Deſpreaux, Art. Poetique, Chant. 2. ver. 94. He ſays in the 4th Canto, ver. 48. that Gombaut tant vanté, garde encore la Boutique. i. e. " Gombauld " much printed, " yet ſtill remained unſold."

The ſenſe is; " A faultleſs Sonnet is alone worth an " whole Poem: but in vain did a thouſand Authors " attempt to arrive at that degree of perfection! That " happy Phœnix is yet no where to be found. Amongſt a thouſand Sonnets of Gombauld, Maynard " and Malleville, you can hardly meet with two or " three that deſerve to be admired: the reſt, which " are as little read as Pelletier's Poems, were carried at " once from the Bookſeller's ſhop to the Grocer's."

Here follows the opinion of another Critick; I give it in Monſieur Baillet's words (18). " Monſ. Roſteau " obſerves, that there are but few Poets who finiſhed their literary labours with writing Epigrams, " which conſiſt in ſome witty conceit, and in ſuch " a metal as becomes a young man much better than " it does an old and decayed Poet. But he adds, that " Monſieur Gombauld may be excuſed, though he applied himſelf to that kind of writing in the latter " part of his life, becauſe moſt of his Epigrams are " rather a cenſure of the corrupt morals and wicked " life of his contemporaries, than Love-Poems, which " are generally compoſed for the Ladies." Monſieur Roſteau ſuppoſes a thing, which is not very certain; namely that Gombauld's Epigrams were the laſt pieces (18) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, tom. 5. pag. 25, 26.

GONET (JOHN BAPTIST) a Dominican Friar born at Beziers, had been a Doctor of the Univerſity of Bourdeaux, and read public Lectures of Divinity there. He cauſed Montalte's (a) famous Provincial Letters to be approved by the Univerſity, which drew upon him the indignation and hatred of the Jeſuits. He publiſhed ſeveral Works [A], by which it appears that he was chiefly ſkilled in School-Divinity, but that he was not very well verſed in what is called Poſitive Theology. Towards the latter end of his life he retired to Beziers, where he died January the 24th 1681 (b). Monſieur de Rocolles, who had commended him in one of his works (c), prefixed to a new edition of it a letter of thanks which he had received from this Monk, who declared to him that he would return the favour the firſt opportunity he ſhould have.

(a) That is to ſay Monſieur Paſcal's.

(b) Taken from ſome Memoirs ſent from Paris.

(c) I think it is in his Introduction à l'Hiſtoire.

(19) I ſpeak thus, becauſe I do not well know when his Danaides were publiſhed.

(20) I mean, that he began very early to write ſome, and continued to add others to them every year, as occaſion offered.

he wrote. This is very doubtful, not to ſay any thing worſe of it. For though they make up the laſt poetical Work which Gombauld publiſhed (19), it does not follow from thence that he did not write them in his youth (20).

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral Works.] His Body of Divinity, intitled Clypeus Doctrinæ Thomiſticæ, that is, "The Shield of the Doctrine of St. Thomas;" was firſt printed at Bourdeaux, in ſixteen volumes in 12mo, in the year 1666; it was afterwards reprinted at Paris in five volumes in folio in the year 1669. To this laſt Edition were added ſeveral Prefaces, and ſeveral Diſſertations; it is alſo much more correct than the former. The Spaniards find this work too ſhort, and call it a very pretty Abridgment of Divinity. In the year 1664 he publiſhed at Bourdeaux a little Book, intitled Diſſertatio Theologica de Probabilitate (1); i. e. "A Theological Diſſertation concerning Probability." His laſt work is intitled Manuale Thomiſtarum; i. e. "The "Manual of the Thomiſts;" printed at Beziers in the year 1680 in ſix volumes in 12mo. He left behind him a Courſe of Philoſophy to be printed; but it is thought to be too prolix, and little ſuited to the taſte of this Age (2).

(1) There is a very good account of it in the Journal des Savans for March 30, 1665.

(2) Taken from ſome Memoirs ſent from Paris.

GONTAUT (ARMAND DE) Baron of Biron (a) was made Marſhal of France in the year 1577. He had been Great Maſter of the Ordnance ever ſince the 5th of November 1569, and before that time he had gone through all the military poſts (a). Of all the glorious actions which gained him ſo great a reputation, there is none that deſerves ſo much to be commended as his loyalty towards Henry III, who did not love him [A], and towards Henry IV, who had openly forſaken the Roman Catholic Religion.

(a) See a particular account of them in Brantomé, Memoires, tom. 3. pag. 326, &c. F. Anſelme, whom Moreri tranſcribes, has only abridged Brantome's account.

(a) Mr. Bayle might have added, that Biron the father went with the Duke of Anjou into the Low-Countries; that he was at Antwerp when that Prince attempted to ſubdue that City; and that the inhabitants ſuſpected him at firſt to be one of the chief authors of the conſpiracy; but that after the Duke of Anjou's retreat, they found amongſt that Prince's clothes a letter from Biron to him, in which he diſſuaded him from that undertaking, and even abhorred it; whereupon the Citizens of Antwerp, who hated Biron before, held him in a very high eſteem, and loved him extremely. This is what Buſbeck relates in the 19th Letter of his Embaſſy into France. CRIT. REM.]

[A] Henry III, who did not love him.] He drew upon him this King's indignation (1), becauſe he had endeavoured to prevent the peace that was concluded before Rochelle in the year 1573. Henry III, who was then but Duke of Anjou, had beſieged that city during ſeveral months, and did not know how to raiſe the ſiege without diſgrace, but by concluding a treaty of peace. For it was dangerous to continue the ſiege any longer, nor could he do it, without diſobliging the Queen Dowager, who very much longed to ſee him; and beſides he himſelf was in haſte to go and take poſſeſſion of the Crown of Poland: ſo that both he and his mother deſired that the beſieged would accept ſome terms. "Biron did all that lay in his "power to diſſuade the King and the Queen from coming to any agreement, and promiſed that if they "would let him go on with the ſiege, he would force "the town to ſurrender within a month, or at the "furtheſt within five weeks, without loſing or expoſing any thing, but only by well blocking up "the town. His advice and his letters proved ineffectual at that time ... Mr. de Biron finding that "he could not in the leaſt prevail with the King, "nor with the Queen, nor with the King of Poland "in that reſpect, attempted to raiſe diſturbances from "another quarter; he wrote to the Cardinal de Lorrain and to ſome of the chief members of the "Council, deſiring them to prevent the raiſing of "the ſiege, and the peace; and promiſed, that if "they would ſuffer him to proſecute his deſign, he "would, after a delay of ſix weeks, render the City "of La Rochelle to the King, more humble and "obedient than it ever had been; as indeed it was "true. The Cardinal, who was a perfect intermeddler, began hereupon to cabal, and to practiſe "upon the members of the Council, in order to diſ-"ſuade the King and the Queen from this capitula-"tion and this peace; they teized their Majeſties, "and eſpecially the Queen to ſuch a degree, that ſhe "knew of no other remedy to get rid of theſe im-"portunities, but by ſending the Abbot de Gadagne, "on whom ſhe confided entirely, with letters to the "King of Poland her beloved ſon, acquainting him "with Monſieur de Biron's underhand dealings and "ſecret practices againſt him, and adviſing him to "reprove him in the moſt ſevere manner; ſhe alſo "adviſed him to write haughty and threatening let-"ters to the Cardinal and to thoſe fine Counſellors "who had managed that affair. This the King of "Poland could perfectly well do; he wrote the let-"ters with his own hand, in ſo proud and ſevere a "ſtyle (as I certainly know) that thoſe Councellors "were quite ſurpriſed and aſtoniſhed, ſo that they "durſt not any longer mention one word of their "former advice. And as for Monſieur de Biron, he "happened one morning to go and wait upon the "King in his wardrobe, where the Council then "met; the place was narrow, and there were but "few perſons preſent; the King of Poland took him "to taſk in a manner that did not fall to the ground, "as we ſay, for he immediately ſpoke to him thus. "Come hither, my pretty fellow, I have heard of "your carriage: you pretend to cabal againſt me "and to write to Court: what hinders me from "ſtriking this dagger into your breaſt, and killing "you upon the ſpot; or rather from appointing "Commiſſioners to inquire into your conduct, and "examine the Treaties you have made againſt me, a-"gainſt the King, and againſt the State, and then to "have you beheaded? Is it your buſineſs to act againſt "my will and pleaſure? Who are you? What would "you be if it were not for the King and me? And "you come to forget yourſelf; you pretend to be a "great man; you will take Rochelle, ſay you, and "even within a month or ſix weeks; you would have "the honour of taking it, and deprive me of it; you "have already but too much expoſed my reputa-"tion, you little villain you .... You made me con-"tinue ſix months before the city, and now when I "can make an honourable retreat, you labour to pre-"vent it, you deſign to continue the ſiege, to carry "the city, and thus to triumph over me. I will teach "you to perſonate a great General at my peril, whilſt "you are none at your own (2)." Biron juſtified himſelf ſoftly as well as he could (3), and ſince that time the King of Poland look'd always cold upon him, even after his

(1) Take notice that Brantome had already obſerved, that this Prince fell into a violent paſſion againſt Biron, and threatened him with his dagger, in the third civil war, and before the battle of Moncontour. See below the remark [D].

(2) Brantôme, Elog. de Marechal de Biron, tom. 3. of his Memoires, pag. 340.

(3) Ibid. pag. 344.

ligion. He was the perſon, who after Henry III's death did chiefly contribute to ſecure the Crown to Henry IV [B]; wherefore the latter of theſe Princes was extremely grieved when this great man was killed at the ſiege of a town in Champagne (b), before the League had been quite ſubdued. He would deſerve the greateſt commendations, though he had only diſſuaded King Henry from following the advice of thoſe that would have him take ſanctuary beyond ſea [C]. He was almoſt a Free-thinker; or, if he had any Religion, he was rather a Proteſtant than a Roman Catholic [D]. The Inquiſitors miſtruſted his return from Poland (4). But he received him with more kindneſs (5) when Biron waited upon him in Auguſt 1575 having been ſent for by the Queen at the Duke of Guiſe's requeſt, who would not have any other Generals with him but Monſieur de Biron and Monſieur de Strozze, in order to beat Monſieur de Thoré (6) and all his Reiſtres ſoundly. Biron behaved very gallantly in this war, and though it had been aſſerted that he would have joined with the Leaguers, had the thirty thouſand crowns, which were offered him, been put into his hands, yet it is more probable that he refuſed all thoſe offers (7). However it be, the King had not a more loyal ſubject as long as that war laſted. . . . On Monſieur de Guiſe's death, Biron went very opportunely to wait upon the King, who wanted him very much, ſo that he rejoiced to ſee him; he ſupported his maſter in the great perplexity he was in; for all France had conſpired againſt him on account of Monſieur de Guiſe's murther (8).

(b) At Epernai, July 26, 1592.

(4) Ibid. pag. 345.

(5) Ibid. pag. 346.

(6) Son of the Conſtable de Monmorency.

(7) Others, and theſe the moſt reaſonable, ſay that he was certainly at that entertainment, and heard their diſcourſes and their deſigns, but that he condemned them, tho' they pretended to act for the good of Religion, and with a view to deſtroy hereſy; at which he laughed. Brantôme, Memoires, tom. 3. pag. 353, 354.

(8) Ibid. p. 354.

[B] He was the perſon who . . . did chiefly contribute to ſecure the Crown to Henry IV.] Let us hear Brantome (9) again. "The King being dead, Biron, "who had a long while before gained a great credit in "the Army, both amongſt the French and amongſt "the Foreigners, who all loved and almoſt adored "him, knew ſo well how to gain and perſuade them, "that he did a bold ſtroke, even the greateſt action "he had ever performed, the moſt uſeful for the State; "I mean, that by his means the King of Navarre "was elected unanimouſly and without the leaſt con"tradiction, in the room of the late King. . . . . So "that the World was perſuaded, and it may eaſily be "imagined, that the Marſhal de Biron made him King; "and indeed he did afterwards reproach him with it "once, as I have been told. For the Roman Catho"licks, ſeeing he was an Huguenot, would have for"ſaken him, and the Huguenots were not powerful "enough to raiſe him to the Throne. But by Mon"ſieur de Biron's prudent conduct even the Ro"man Catholics were prevailed upon to ſubmit to this "new King, notwithſtanding he was an Huguenot, "if not very willingly, at leaſt in order to revenge "the death of the poor deceaſed, who had been un"juſtly murthered, as Biron hinted to them. This "was not all; for there were ſeveral places in which "the new King had but very little authority, or none "at all. Theſe places were either to be kept in awe, "or conquered: The Marſhal de Biron aſſiſted his "King ſo well in this, that before his death he helped "him to recover ſeveral conſiderable and ſtrong cities, "to gain the battle of Yvry, to retire ſafe out of Ar"ques and Dieppe, as I deſign to relate it in our King's "Life; laſtly Biron had his head carried off by a can"non ball, as he was taking a view of the city of "Eſpernay." He failed once in his loyalty for Henry IV, but not for a long while. He thought himſelf more uſeful to the King than any other perſon, and ſo he was indeed after Henry the third's death; and as he imagined that during the confuſion of the civil war the Kingdom would be diſmembred, he was in hopes to get ſome ſhare of it: and entering into the King's cloſet without being called, he heard for ſome time the complaints of ſeveral Courtiers, and took afterwards Sancy aſide, and declared to him that he deſired to have the County of Perigord with a ſovereign power, as a reward for the ſervices he would do to the King. Sancy, who would not diſcourage him, went immediately to his Majeſty, and communicated Biron's propoſal to him: the King ordered him to make the Marſhal the faireſt promiſes; and Sancy worked upon him with ſo much art and eloquence, that he rouſed his noble ſoul, and engaged him not only to give over his claim, but alſo to declare that he would never ſuffer any part of the ſtate to be ever diſmembred from it in behalf of any perſon whatſoever (10).

(9) Ibid.

(10) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 3. pag. 829.

[C] He diſſuaded King Henry from following the advice of thoſe, that would have him take ſanctuary beyond Sea.] The Duke of Mayenne having forced this Prince to raiſe the ſiege of Roan, and to retire towards Dieppe, endeavoured to block him up ſo cloſe, that he could not eſcape, but by Sea. Henry IVth's Officers, even they that were of the Proteſtant Religion (11) . . . did not well know by what means the King could be delivered out of this danger, and were extremely concerned for his ſecurity on which that of the whole State entirely depended. So that in a Council which was held September the 5th (12) moſt of them were of opinion, that the King muſt leave his army aſhore, fortified in ſome ſtrong poſt, and ſecure his ſacred perſon by embarking immediately either for England, or for Rochelle. . . . They ſupported this advice by ſo many arguments, that the King himſelf began to be perſuaded; whereupon the Marſhal de Biron, who had heard theſe diſcourſes with the utmoſt diſdain, and was ſorry that they ſhould make ſo deep an impreſſion on the King's mind, got up, and with an angry voice told the King, &c. I ſhall not tranſcribe his Diſcourſe; you may read it in Mezerai; it is ſo well turned, and abounds with ſuch ſtrong arguments, that we ought not to wonder at the effect it produced. Henry IVth having heard it, reſolved to ſtand his ground, and to defend himſelf in his poſt; he was attacked in it, and glorioufly repulſed the enemy. Biron was in the right to ſay, that conſidering the ſtate of affairs, to leave the Kingdom only for twenty four hours, was to leave it for ever. In ſuch circumſtances the true method to ſucceed was not, to ſay to one's Generals,

(11) Mezerai, ibid. pag. 842.

(12) 1589.

Ayez ſoin de ma Couronne
J'auray ſoin de ma perſonne, &c.
That is,

"Secure my crown, I ſhall take care of my perſon."

[D] He was rather a Proteſtant than a Roman Catholick.] The ſuſpicions that were entertained againſt him in that reſpect, were the reaſon why he was not made a Knight of the Holy Ghoſt in the beginning of the civil wars. Obſerve, ſays Brantôme, that the chief reaſon why he did not receive this honour, and why no great account was made of him, was that he paſſed for an Huguenot, and it was even ſaid at Court, that he had his children baptized after the manner of the Huguenots, which the great Warriors of that time, as the King of Navarre, Meſſieurs de Guiſe, the Lord Conſtable, and the Marſhal de St. André abhorred, as well as the Monks and all the World. And therefore Monſieur de Biron was not well received at Court; ſo that he reſolved to leave it, and to retire upon his own eſtate. He would have executed that deſign, had not Du Perron, who was afterwards the Marſhal de Rets, interceded for him with the Queen. They perſuaded him to ſtay, and he followed the army without any employment. But he ſoon gave ſuch proofs of his great merit, that he was choſen an aſſiſtant to the Major-Generals. Monſieur de Guiſe began to like him, though he always ſaid and did ſome thing like an Huguenot, which he could not forbear; yet he did it ſecretly, and ſhewed that he had a hidden affection for that party. He gained at laſt ſo great a ſkill in the art of war, that the Court was obliged to employ him (14). In the third civil war he was twice unfortunate, and was very much blamed by the King's brother who commanded the army. And we in the Army, ſays Brantôme (15), were of opinion that he had threatened to ſtrike him with his dagger: and Monſieur de Biron was obliged to juſtify himſelf in the moſt humble manner; for if he had in the leaſt talked loud, Monſieur, the King's brother, was ſo exaſperated againſt him, that he would certainly have ſtruck him. He upbraided him with being an Huguenot, and favouring that party; be charged him with taking wrong meaſures on purpoſe to make him receive an affront, and to expoſe him and his whole army to be cut in pieces by the enemy. Monſieur de Tavannes, who was a proud and haughty man, rebuked him alſo very ſeverely; he bid

(13) Brantôme, Mémoires, tom. 3. pag. 328.

(14) Ibid. pag. 330.

(15) Ibid. pag. 332.

truſted him ſo much, that he was one of thoſe who were doomed to be murthered on St. Bartholomew's day [E]. But as he lodged at the Baſtille, being Great Maſter of the Ordnance, he knew how to diſappoint the wicked deſigns of thoſe murtherers. The reaſon why he was ſuſpected of favouring the Proteſtants is very much to his honour [F]. Never was a man of his quality ſo univerſal a ſcholar as he was [G]. He was proper not only for all military employments, but alſo for the management him learn his leſſon better; he told him, that he meddled with every thing, and followed a trade which he did not yet underſtand, but that he would make him learn it; that he was an Huguenot, that he never went to Maſs, or if he went, it was only for form's ſake. All this was told him in a full Council, and Monſieur de Biron had no other part to chooſe, but to ſubmit and hold his tongue. After the maſſacre on St. Bartholomew's Day, the King ſent him into Saintonge (16), to reduce the City of Rochelle either by treaty or by force of arms to ſubmit to the King. He was obliged to beſiege the City. Biron was (17) unfortunate in this ſiege; for he laboured and took all poſſible pains to take the city, and performed all the duties of a great Officer, and a ſkilful Maſter of the Ordnance, and what is worſe, was greatly wounded by the ſhot of an Arquebuſe: and yet moſt of the beſiegers were of opinion, that he held a ſecret intelligence with the beſieged, and that he and his friends gave them notice of all that was done in the King's army: which was the greateſt error in the world; for he was Governor of that City, and if he had taken it, he would have been maſter of one of the ſtrongeſt towns in the Kingdom. I leave you to judge, whether he, who was an ambitious man, would have ſlipt the opportunity of taking it, if it had been in his power. If his advice and Monſieur de Strozze's had been followed, the city would have been taken, by advancing ſucceſſively to it, as we did at laſt (18). We may be perſuaded, that the ſuſpicions of his correſpondence with the inhabitants of la Rochelle, were grounded on the inclination he was ſuppoſed to have for the Huguenots; it is for this reaſon that I have added this paſſage from Brantôme to thoſe quoted above. I ſhall confirm them by the following words of Mezerai, taken from his Elogium of our Biron (19). "With regard to Religion, he inclined a little towards the new Reformation. A Tutor he had in his younger days had given him the firſt hints of it; and his wife, who openly profeſſed the Reformed Religion, confirmed him in his ſentiments (20): ſo that he ſecretly favoured the Proteſtants, except in what concerned the King's ſervice only. And as what the heart thinks the mouth ſpeaks, he often dropt ſome ſtrokes of raillery againſt the ceremonies of the Church of Rome. It was therefore ſuſpected that he delayed the King's converſion; who for that very reaſon, and for the great ſervice he had done him after Henry III's death, when he made the army declare for him, repoſed a great truſt in him, and ſubmitted abſolutely to his advice, not, however, without being often offended at his haughty behaviour."

(16) Biron was Governor of that country, and of the Pais d'Aunix.

(17) Brantôme, Memoires, tom. 3. pag. 338.

(18) Add to his misfortunes in this ſiege, the King of Poland's ſevere reproof. See above remark [A], quotation (2).

(19) Mezerai, Hiſtoire de France, tom. 3. pag. 1026.

(20) I wonder he ſays nothing of Biron's mother, who according to Thuanus gave ſhelter to the Proteſtants. Denique in Aginnenſi agro apud Annam Bonvalliam, Armani Bironi famoſi illius ducis matrem, toto eo tempore tutus fuit. Thuan. lib. 33. pag. 671. ad ann. 1562. i. e. "Laſtly he "was all this "while ſafe in "the territories "of Agen, at "the houſe of "Ann de Bon-"neval, the mo-"ther of that fa-"mous General "Armaud de "Biron."

[E] He was one of thoſe who were doomed to be murthered on St. Bartholomew's Day.] Biron had been employed to conduct the Queen of Navarre to the Court of France, with the Prince her ſon who came to marry Charles IXth's ſiſter. Biron conducted the Prince attended by the flower of the Huguenots, who thinking to defy and to govern all the world, met there with a diſmal fate. They, who eſcaped, condemned Monſieur de Biron and laid the whole blame on him, ſaying, that he went to flatter and coax them, in order to lead them to the ſlaughter-houſe; and thus they began to inveigh bitterly againſt him . . . and notwithſtanding theſe calumnies, ſuſpicions and clamours, he narrowly eſcaped being murthered himſelf in that general maſſacre; it was lucky for him that he was a brave, ſtout, and reſolute man; for he retired immediately into his Arſenal, he levelled a number of cannons before the gate and the other avenues that lead to the Baſtille, and ſhewed ſuch a warlike diſpoſition, that ſome troops of the people of Paris, who were never engaged againſt ſo brave an officer before, coming to the gate, he ſpoke to them with ſo much courage, and threatned to play a good number of guns upon them, if they would not retire, ſo that they marched off immediately, nor durſt they venture any more to come near him, nor to execute their ill deſigns againſt him, as they had been commanded to do: for he was certainly one of thoſe who were doomed to be murthered with the others, as he told me himſelf on his return from Brouage; for he was my very good friend and relation; and often uſed to diſcourſe of this ſlaughter (21). Mezerai tells us that Biron ſhelter'd ſome of his friends in the Baſtille. Let us quote his own words (22). "The Montmorenci's, "Coſſé, and Biron had been put upon the liſt, but the "abſence of the Marſhal de Montmorenci, who was "at Chantilli, ſaved the lives of his three brothers; "the prayers of the fair Lady de Chaſteauneuf, "§ Monſieur's Miſtreſs, ſaved Coſſé, who was her re-"lation. And Biron, Great-Maſter of the Ordnance, "having levelled ſome cannon on the gate of the "Arſenal, put a ſtop to the fury of the murtherers; "he alſo received ſome of his friends, and amongſt "them James, ſecond ſon of the Lord de la Force, "this boy being then but ten years old, having dex-"terouſly hid himſelf between the corps of his father "and of his eldeſt brother, who had been killed in a "bed, in which they all three lay together."

(21) Brantôme, Memoires, tom. 3. pag. 335.

(22) Mezerai, Abrége Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 157, 158.

§ The King's brother.

[F] The reaſon why he was ſuſpected of favouring the Proteſtants is very much to his honour.] I ſhall quote the words of one of our beſt Hiſtorians (23). Biron "ſeems to have always had ſome inclination for "the new opinions, ſince he had been in favour with "the King of Navarre. Yet all the reſt of his life "he behaved like a very good Catholic, and when-"ever there happened to be a war with the Hugue-"not, he acted in it with as much courage and fide-"lity as any other. But what gave room to think "that he did not hate them was, that he would ne-"ver conſent to any perfidious dealings with them, "and that when the laſt edict of pacification was "patched up, he gave the Queen-mother ſeveral times "to underſtand, that it had been much more worthy "the King's Majeſty to cruſh them entirely (24), than "to make a treaty, which could not be kept, as it "was obvious to foreſee. For this reaſon, and be-"cauſe he was a man of honeſty and too free and ſincere, "the Queen-mother and the Guiſes had put him in "the catalogue of thoſe that were to be murthered on "St. Bartholomew's day; he did leaſt imagine it, "and had all his life time a very ſtrong reſentment "of it."

(23) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 2. pag. 267, under the year 1572.

(24) It is a matter of ſurpriſe, that none of Lewis XIVth's Miniſters of State dared to repreſent the ſame thing to him, when he was publiſhing ſo many edicts againſt the Proteſtants of his Kingdom. He was obliged at laſt to attack them with his armies. What ſignified then ſo many Law-proceedings? See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for Nov. 1685, concerning Queen Mary of England's method of perſecuting.

[G] Never was a man of his quality a more univerſal ſcholar than he was.] "When he died there died "a man univerſally ſkilled in all affairs both of the "War and of the State, which he managed and under-"ſtood as well as any Lord in France. Therefore "when the Queen-mother had ſome very conſiderable "buſineſs to tranſact, ſhe ſent for him whether he "was at home or elſewhere, and had her chief re-"courſe to him. He uſed to ſay to himſelf, in a ban-"tering way, that he was a cunning fox, who was "ſet upon all kind of buſineſs; and this was true, "for he underſtood every thing perfectly, and he "was univerſally ſkilled in matters both of peace "and war, capable both to command and to execute. "He had loved reading, and had continued to read "from his younger years. He took a delight to en-"quire after and know every thing; and uſed to "carry a pocket book with him, in which he wrote "down whatever appeared remarkable to him; which "gave riſe to a proverb very much uſed at Court; "when a perſon happened to ſay ſomething uncom-"mon, they told him, you have found that in Biron's "pocket-book; and even King Henry's buffoon ſwore "ſometimes by Biron's divine pocket-book . . . . And "I have ſeen ſeveral people wonder that he, who "never tranſacted public affairs abroad, who never "was an Embaſſador, which might have made him "capable of them, yet underſtood them better than "Monſieur de Lanſac, de Rambouillet, and the Mar-"ſhal de Rets, and was capable of giving them good "inſtructions nagement of public affairs. He loved reading, and liked to converſe with learned men; and he uſed to write down in his pocket-book all that he thought worthy to be obſerved. He was too paſſionate, and a little too much given to drinking [H]. He laboured under another defect, much more conſiderable than theſe two, and which is often exceedingly detrimental to Princes; I mean, that he neglected the opportunities of ſtriking a deciſive blow on the enemies [I]. He was afraid that this would put an end to the war, and that the Court would then ſend him home without any employment. It is reported that he who uſed always to laugh at the predictions of Aſtrologers, in whoſe favour the Court of France was at that time very much prepoſſeſſed, became entirely credulous with regard to the kind of death which theſe people threatened him with [K]. Notwithſtanding the fatigues he underwent, the wounds he received, and his old age, he was yet very vigorous; and they relate a remarkable particular with regard to the ſtrong conſtitution of his ſtomach [L]. He left ſeveral children. I ſhall ſpeak of the eldeſt in the following Article.

" inſtructions with regard both to domeſtic and foreign " affairs (25)." Let us add to this paſſage ſome parts of Mezerai's Elogium of Monſieur de Biron. "He had " a quick and penetrating genius, an eaſy, ſtrong and " perſuading way of ſpeaking, an elevated mind, a " great courage, he was briſk and nimble, laborious " and daring; he loved to learn and was very dili- " gent. He was as well ſkilled in the Court-intrigues, " and in thoſe of the Ladies, as he was brave in the " field..... He took a pride in being an univerſal " man, and in underſtanding the art of negotiating " as well as the art of war. He meddled with every " thing; and found employment himſelf if none were " given him. He pretended to a perfect knowledge " of Hiſtory and Geography; he drew plans and " made maps with his own hands, and uſed to ſay, " that a great warrior muſt be capable to ſhew upon " paper what he could execute in the field (26)."

(25) Brantôme, Mémoires, tom. 3. pag. 356.

(26) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 3. pag. 1026.

[H] He was a little too much given to drinking.] Mezerai obſerves only (27), that he loved witty ſayings, and a good treat; that he lay a very little time in bed, but continued long at table, where he uſed to drink till the wine made him merry. But the thing is carried farther in a repartee, which King Henry IV is ſuppoſed to have made. " The Duke of Savoy " commended once before him the great actions and " ſervices of both the Birons father and ſon: the " King anſwered that they had indeed ſerved him " very well; but that he had much trouble to repreſs " the drunkenneſs of the father, and to keep the ſon's " arrogance within bounds (28)."

(27) Ibid.

(28) Perefixe, Hiſtoire de Henri le Grand, under the year 1600, pag. m. 320.

[I] He neglected the opportunities of ſtriking a deciſive blow on the enemies.] Brantome relates (29), that it was obſerved that if Biron had had a mind to act with the utmoſt vigour, he might have reduced the King of Navarre to much greater extremities. I ſpeak of the time when Biron commanded the army in Guienne under Henry III. On another occaſion, that is to ſay, when the Duke of Parma was at Caudebec, the Marſhal de Biron rebuked his ſon ſeverely, becauſe he repreſented to the King that if his Majeſty would give him four thouſand arquebuſiers, and two thouſand horſe, he would ſtop the enemies in their way. Let us quote Brantôme's words. " Hereupon " the Marſhal cenſured his ſon in the King's pre- " ſence, and told him that he was indeed a great man " to perform ſuch a deſign, and he repreſented it ſo " full of difficulties, that he prevented the undertak- " ing. The next evening he told his ſon, that he " was ſenſible he would have ſucceeded in that de- " ſign, or have died in the undertaking; but he re- " preſented to him, that it was not proper to procure " with one ſtroke the ruin of ſuch an enemy of the " French; for, added he, when ſuch enemies are " once entirely vanquiſhed and deſtroyed, Kings " make no longer any account of their Generals and " Officers, they do not care for them when they want " them no more; we ought therefore conſtantly to " continue and prolong the war, as we would till a " fruitful piece of ground; otherwiſe, they who have " once tilled it, will ſtarve if they ſuffer it afterwards " to lie untilled (30)." Here follows a paſſage written in a ſtronger and more polite ſtyle. The Marſhal de Biron was charged with raiſing ſeveral factions, that he might always have an opportunity to exert his ability and his credit, and with ſpinning out the war, not indeed for the ſake of plunder, but that he might always continue at the head of affairs, and have the managing of them (31). Such an ambition is ſometimes alſo to be obſerved amongſt Divines. See (32) how theſe maxims of the Marſhal de Biron are applied to a certain Doctor, who ſhall be nameleſs.

(29) Mémoires, tom. 3. pag. 350.

(30) Ibid. pag. 368.

(31) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, tom. 3. pag. 1026. See alſo Davila, lib. 13. pag. m. 806.

[K] He became.... credulous with regard to the kind of death, with which the Aſtrologers threatened him.] We meet with the following paſſage in Mezerai's large hiſtory. " I have heard ſome perſons, " who were very well acquainted with this Marſhal, " relate a remarkable particular of him. He had all " his life time laughed at the art of fortune-tellers, " which Queen Catherine de Medicis's curioſity had " brought into faſhion at Court. But as he happened " once to ſee ſome ſurpriſing effects of it, he became " a little before his death as ſuperſtitious in that re- " ſpect as he had been incredulous before, and began " to conſult the fortune-tellers. One of theſe people " foretold him ſix months before this ſiege, that he " would be killed by a canon ball. This made ſo " deep an impreſſion upon his mind, that whenever " he heard a gun go off, he could not forbear ſtarting " out of fear, and ſtooping his head down, as he con- " feſſed to his friends. It happened at this time (33) " that hearing the whiſtling of a ball, he threw him- " ſelf aſide to eſcape the blow, but he was ſo unfor- " tunate that he met the ball directly, and was kil- " led. Thus he procured himſelf the fulfilling of a " prediction, which perhaps would never have proved " true, if he had laughed at it, and not minded " it (34)." This Hiſtorian takes more care to relate ſuch things than I ſhould have thought.

(32) In the Entretiens ſur la Cabale chimerique, pag. 191.

(33) That is to ſay, when he was killed by a canon-ball before Epernai.

(34) Hiſt. de France, tom. 3. pag. 1024.

[L] They relate a remarkable particular with regard to the ſtrong conſtitution of his ſtomach.] Let us hear again Monſieur de Mezerai (35). " He had been at an " infinite number of ſieges of large towns, and in " bloody fights; he had had the chief command in " ſeven battles or conſiderable fights, and had re- " ceived as many wounds. And though he was quite " worn out with labour and blows, and was above " threeſcore and eight years old (36), yet he was of " ſo ſtrong a conſtitution, that when the Surgeons " opened him in order to embalm him, they did not " find the leaſt bit of meat in his ſtomach, though " he had been killed but one hour after his ſupper; " which is a ſign of a great natural heat, that could " complete the digeſtion in ſo ſhort a time (37)."

(35) Ibid.

(36) Davila, lib. 13. pag. 806, ſays, that he entered into his 65th year. D'Aubigné, tom. 3. pag. 368. gives him but 65 years.

(37) Dupleix, Hiſt. de Henri IV, pag. 93 ſays it was an hour after he had dined heartily, and that he was 58 years old.

GONTAUT (CHARLES DE) Duke of Biron, the ſon of the preceding, was one of the greateſt Captains of his time; but he laboured under a conſiderable defect, which was, that he uſed to ſpeak of his own feats with an inſufferable pride. He had learned very young the art of war under his father the Marſhal de Biron, who omitted nothing to advance him, and to make him appear worthy to be advanced [A]. In the year

[A] His father... omitted nothing to advance him and to make him appear worthy to be advanced.] In the year 1380 (1) he fell from his horſe and broke his thigh in two places, ſo that being lame he was obliged

(1) He was leading his army towards St. Iſle-en-Jourdain, four leagues diſtant from Toulouſe. Dupleix, Hiſt. de Henri III, pag. 82.

year 1592 he obtained the poſt of Admiral of France, and having reſigned it in the year 1594, he was made a Marſhal of France and Governor of Burgundy. In the year 1598 the King erected the Barony of Biron into a Duchy and Peerdom, and ſent immediately the new Duke to Bruſſels at the head of a ſtately Embaſſy, to make the Archduke to ſwear to the treaty of the peace concluded at Vervins. He was ſent into Switzerland in January 1602 [B] in order to renew the alliance with the Cantons. The year before he had been in England with a compliment from the French King to Queen Elizabeth. This great Princeſs received him in the moſt ſolemn manner. What ſhe did on this occaſion has been related with ſome fabulous circumſtances [C]. The Marſhal-Duke de Biron's tragical end is known to all the world. He was beheaded July the 31ſt 1602, having obliged to leave to others the command of his army; and as he would not diſoblige any of them that had a right to claim the command, he deſired them that they would themſelves chooſe a commander. They choſe his ſon who was but fifteen years old (2). Other Hiſtorians aſſert (3) that at the age of fourteen this ſame ſon was Colonel of the Swiſs in Flanders, and ſoon after Camp-Marſhal, and then Marſhal-General. But this cannot be reconciled with the account of others, who relate that his father, after the death of his eldeſt ſon, ſtiled our Gontaut Baron of Biron, and brought him to Court, where he had immediately a quarrel with the Sieur de Carenci, the Count de la Vauguion's eldeſt ſon; this quarrel ended in a fight of three againſt three in the year 1585; Biron, Loignac, and Janiſſac on one ſide killed Carenci, d'Eſtiſſac, and la Baſtie. . . . The Duke of Epernon procured young Biron's pardon (4). He had took him to Paris when he went to meet the King of Navarre (5). Young Biron's father was afterwards Lieutenant General of the army in Poitou at the ſiege of Marans; and he gave his ſon the command over all his houſhold, and over his troop of Gendarmes; he even called him, Monſieur le Baron, who from that time began to be exceedingly proud and haughty (6). Obſerve, that according to Victor Cayet he was ſixteen years old when his father the Marſhal de Biron took him from under his tutor (7). Obſerve alſo that this Marſhal loſt a ſon at the ſlaughter committed at Antwerp. This was no doubt his eldeſt ſon, ſince he had already ſome children (8), and ſince the Duke of Biron was not yet forty (9) when he was beheaded in the year 1602. It is very probable that Du Pleix and Peter Matthieu aſcribe to Charles de Gontaut what belongs to his brother.

(2) Dupleix, Hiſt. de Henri III, pag. 82.

(3) Pierre Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, liv. 5. pag. m. 218.

(4) Cayet, Chronologie Septenaire, folio 319 verſo.

(5) Ibid. folio 320 verſo.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. folio 309.

(8) F. Anſelme, pag. 197.

(9) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, liv. 5. pag. m. 218.

The following paſſage will afford us a ſtronger proof ſtill. The Marſhal de Biron having a great authority after Henry IIIs death, thought of nothing but raiſing the Baron of Biron to the higheſt poſts; tho' he was ſtill very young and had no experience, yet his father picked a quarrel with Monſieur de Dampierre Marſhal de Camp, and obliged him to reſign his place, which he procured to the Baron of Biron with the title of Marſhal de Camp General. And becauſe the young man was not acquainted with the functions of his employment, his father laboured for him night and day, and let him have the honour of it; which gained the Baron of Biron ſuch a reputation and credit in the army, that the Marſhal de Biron, his father, having been killed by a canon ball before Epernai, the King made the ſon Admiral; and Monſieur de Villars coming into the King's ſervice Biron reſigned his poſt of Admiral to him, and was made Marſhal of France (10). It would be difficult to write a worſe ſtile in French than the Author does from whom I have borrowed theſe words; for we muſt continually gueſs, either by reaſoning, or by the help of hiſtory, to what perſon his he's relate. Let us cloſe this remark with a paſſage from Mezerai (11). The Catholics did not lament the Marſhal de Biron's death ſo much as the King did, who grieved more for it than he had done for the loſs of any other perſon; and it would have been ſtill much more difficult for him to comfort himſelf, had he not hoped that the Baron of Biron having been inſtructed by his own father, would be capable to ſerve him as well, ſince he had all his father's ſkill and experience, though he was not yet acquainted with his artifice and dangerous maxims.

(10) Diſcours Hiſtorique de la Fortune & diſgrace des Favoris, depuis Francois I juſq' à Louis XIII inſerted in the Additions de le Laboureur aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 2. pag. 134. It has been ſince printed apart, under the title of, Mémoires de M. de Bauvais Nangis.

(11) Hiſt. de France, tom. 3. pag. 1026.

[B] He was ſent into Switzerland in . . . . 1602.] De Vic and Silleri had great trouble to ſettle the conditions on which the alliance was to be renewed; and when they imagined that they had overcome all the difficulties, they found that all their labours were like to prove ineffectual through the practices of the Emiſſaries of Spain and Savoy. But the Marſhal de Biron, who came to Soluthurn with a great retinue and a ſtately equipage, did happily conclude the Treaty. His noble and generous way of living, his martial ſtyle, and the glory of his great actions, of which the Swiſs had ſo often been eye-witneſſes, had a great influence on that war-like Nation; and then the carts loaded with money, which ſoon followed him, completed the buſineſs, ... He crowned the feaſt with a ſumptuous entertainment, in which he wonderfully extolled the King's power, and the ſtrength of France. This was not one of the leaſt ſervices he did his maſter (12).

(12) Mezerai, Abregé Chronologique, tom. 6. pag. 257, under the year 1602.

[C] What Queen Elizabeth did on this occaſion has been related with ſome fabulous circumſtances.] There are a thouſand Hiſtorians who aſſert, that ſhe affected to ſhew him the Earl of Eſſex's head, that ſhe might have an opportunity to acquaint him with the reaſons that obliged her to puniſh ſo ſeverely the rebellion of this ungrateful ſubject. They add that ſhe told him, the King of France would do well thus to puniſh all the traitors (13). Some ſay, that ſhe ſhewed him this rebel's head from the windows of her palace, others, that it was as they paſſed over London Bridge. Nothing of all this can be true, ſince the Queen continued at Vignes † all the time the Marſhal de Biron was in England. Dupleix (14) has refuted by this obſervation what ſo many Hiſtorians had aſſerted. Monſieur Leti refutes them by the ſame obſervation (15): But he is miſtaken when he ſays that Henry IV did not ſend Biron to London but after his return to Paris (16). He ſent him thither from Calais.

(13) Peter Matthieu, Cayet, &c. Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. 246. ſays, that ſhe ſhewed him the Earl of Eſſex's head, perhaps with ſome deſign. Thuanus, lib. 126. p. 943. ſays, that ſhe ſpoke to him thus as he was conſidering the heads fixed on ſtakes in the Tower of London.

† See below quotation (19).

(14) Hiſt. de Henri IV, pag. 300.

(15) Hiſt. d'Elizabeth, tom. 2. pag. 495.

(16) Ibid. pag. 485.

I do not pretend to deny, that Queen Elizabeth ſpoke thus with regard to the Earl of Eſſex; but inſtead of ſaying, that ſhe ſpoke thus, ſhewing the Earl's head to the Duke of Biron, we ſhould ſay, as le Grain does (17), that ſhe ſpoke to him in her cloſet pointing to the Earl's picture. It is a ſhame, that the accounts of the French, even thoſe which the moſt celebrated Hiſtorians of thoſe times publiſhed, ſhould abound with ſo many fabulous ſtories. Camden does juſtly laugh at what they ſay, that the Queen ſhewed the Earl of Eſſex's head to the Marſhal de Biron, that head having been buried with the corps. Quod quidam Gallici Scriptores prodiderunt, eam cranium Eſſexii inter plura damnatorum, in intimo Larario, vel (ut alii ſcribunt) palo affixum Bironio & Gallis oſtentaſſe, ridicule vanum eſt. Illud enim una cum corpore conſepultum (18). That is, "What ſome French Writers relate, that the Queen "ſhewed to Biron and to the French, the Earl of "Eſſex's head in her cloſet, or (as others pretend) "fixed on a ſtake, is an idle and ridiculous ſtory: "for that head was buried with the corps." He obſerves that the Queen was at that time at a country ſeat, which he calls Baſingum. Monſieur de Baſſompierre (19), who accompanied the Marſhal de Biron, calls it Baſing: we muſt therefore correct the word Vignes in Scipio Dupleix. He has committed a great many other blunders, which Monſieur de Baſſompierre does not forgive him. Here follows one of them: The Queen, ſays he, gave our Frenchmen a royal entertainment; ſhe played upon the Spinet before them, and ſung at the ſame time. This is refuted in the following words (20). "She gave no royal entertainment to "the French, ſhe only defrayed the expences of Monſ. "de Biron and his retinue, as long as he continued at "Laning (21). And Monſ. de Biron being one day at "Baſing, My Lord Corbain made him enter with five "or ſix of us through a back-door into her chamber, "to ſurprize her whilſt ſhe was ſinging."

(17) Le Grain, Decade de Henri le Grand, pag. m. 782.

(18) Camden, Hiſt. Elizabeth. Part 4. pag. m. 820. ad ann. 1601.

(19) Baſſompierre, Obſervat. ſur Dupleix, pag. 82.

(20) Ibid. pag. 83.

(21) A houſe near Baſing; it is called Lawing in the foregoing page.

having been engaged with the Duke of Savoy in a terrible conſpiracy againſt the State [D]. He behaved himſelf in the moſt paſſionate manner at the place of execution [E]. He was not yet forty years old (a). He was of an unbounded ambition, and though he had no Religion [F], yet he acted as a bigot in order to revive the Leaguers party [G]. He knew how to make uſe of the inſtruction his father gave him, that a warrior

(a) Matthieu, Hiſtoire de la Paix, liv. 4. pag. 218.

[D] He was beheaded . . . having been engaged with the Duke of Savoy in a . . . conſpiracy againſt the State.] This was not one of thoſe inconſiderable plots, which ſerve only to keep a Prince buſy at home, that he might not be at liberty to raiſe diſturbances in his neighbour's Dominions. It is pretended that the Duke of Savoye and Biron "agreed together to divide the whole "Kingdom of France, to erect as many different So-"vereignties in it as there are Provinces, and to put "all the petty Princes of them under the protection "of Spain. The Duke of Savoy would have taken "for his ſhare, if it had been in his power, the Lyon-"nois, Dauphiné, and Provence; Biron would have "had the Duchy of Burgundy, to which the Spaniards "would have added the Franche-Comté as a Dowry "for a daughter of their King, or for a daughter of "Savoy, one of whom they promiſed the Duke of "Biron in marriage (22)." This gives me an opportunity to obſerve how much the paſſions of Princes differ from thoſe of private perſons. There is no Nobleman but would think it a ſufficient reaſon for a great quarrel, if any of his neighbours ſhould intice his ſervants away from him, and perſuade them to betray their maſter. He would ſoon ſend a challenge, or at leaſt take the firſt opportunity to decide the quarrel ſword in hand. But Princes are content to puniſh the traytors, and continue to live with the ſeducer as they did before. Henry IV did gently put up this act of hoſtility of the Duke of Savoy; it did not occaſion any rupture between them, nor the leaſt miſunderſtanding as to outward appearances. See below (23) a paſſage from Brantome concerning the quarrels of great men (24).

(22) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. 237.

(23) In the Remark [I] of the article POITIERS.

(24) It is taken from pag. 329. of the 2d vol. of his Dames Galantes.

[E] He behaved himſelf in the moſt paſſionate manner at the place of execution.] All the Hiſtorians of that time give a full account of what he did and ſaid during his trial, and till the moment he was executed. I ſhall relate only what we read in a Letter from the Sieur Gillot to Scaliger (25). "You have heard of "the death of the Marſhal, who was ſentenced to be "executed publickly, but the King was pleaſed to "mitigate his ſentence ſo far as to order him to be "executed more privately in the Court of the Baſtille. "He would never confeſs any thing with regard to "his accomplices, nor more than was proved in his "tryal. He died very ill affected to his King and to "his Country; which he teſtified by praying to God "to have mercy on his ſoul and on the King's; then "he ſaid, put on, put on, quick; nor would he ſuffer "himſelf to be bound, ſwearing that with his teeth "he would ſtrangle the Executioner if he offered to "come near him; then he blindfolded himſelf with "his handkerchief, then he took it off again; ſwearing "and curſing all the while, and bidding men take "care not to raiſe his fury, for that he would deſtroy "half of them that were preſent; he deſired the "Muſqueteers, who were drawn up in the Court, to "ſhoot him; ſaying to them, is there not ſome good-"natured fellow amongſt you, who has the heart to "kill the Marſhal Biron, that theſe raſcals may not "put him to death? He complained to the Chancel-"lor himſelf of the ſeverity of his ſentence. In a "word, you may be ſure that it was very neceſſary "for France that he ſhould die, and I can ſafely ſay, "that he died like him of whom the Italian Poet ob-"ſerves,

(25) Epitres Françoiſes à Scaliger, pag. 248.

"Biaſtemando ſe ne fuge l'alma con grand cordoglio,
"Come nel mondo viſſe pieno d'ira & d'orgoglio."

That is,

"His ſoul flew away with great difficulty, blaſphem-"ing all the time, as if he had lived in this world "full of pride and haughtineſs."

(26) Compare this with the following paſſage in Virgil.
Illi ſolvuntur frigore membra,
Vitaque cum gemitu fugit indignata ſub umbras.
Æneid. lib. ultimo, ver. 951.

Theſe Verſes are very much like thoſe we read at the end of the Orlando Furioſo.

Beſtemmiando fuggi l'alma ſdegnoſa
Che fu ſi altera al mondo, e ſi orgoglioſa (26).

That is,

"With blaſphemies did the ſcornful ſoul fly away,
"which had been ſo haughty and proud in this "world."

When he knew that there was no hopes of pardon left, he fell into ſuch a violent paſſion againſt Henry IV, that the Hiſtorians thought it a crime to relate his words. "The Duke of Biron . . . . intirely over-"whelmed with grief and full of anger, took the op-"portunity of ſpeaking the firſt, and ſaid all that a "tongue governed with anguiſh could expreſs; up-"braiding the Chancellor with his ſeverity, and telling "him that he deſired to condemn rather than to clear "him: here he added ſome words, which it is unlaw-"ful to remember, and to relate them is a crime. But "Princes do not mind thoſe arrows, which being "darted againſt their Majeſty, do always ſtrike back "on thoſe who ſhot them (27)."

(27) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, liv. 5. pag. 340.

[F] Though he had no Religion . . .] I ſhall quote upon this the following paſſage from Victor Cayet (28). "He did often ridicule all Religions whatſoever; and "his intimate friend the Baron de Luz telling him "once, that a Capuchin repreſented to his uncle the "Archbiſhop of Lyons, who lay at the point of death, "that when a wicked man could not be reclaimed, and "refuſed the Grace of the Holy Spirit, God uſed to "give him all kind of happineſs, to make him proſ-"per in all his undertakings, and to ſend him all "worldly contentment (29): The Marſhal anſwered, "I wiſh I were thus forſaken. There are a thouſand "ſuch ſtories told concerning his irreligion; but my "deſign is not to blacken his reputation by relating "them here." This Hiſtorian had obſerved in the foregoing page a circumſtance, which deſerves ſo much the more to be mentioned in this place, as it gives us to underſtand that Biron had been brought up in the Proteſtant Religion. Victor Cayet's words are as follow. "He uſed often to turn the Maſs into ridicule "and to laugh at thoſe of the pretended Reformed Re-"ligion, with whom he had been brought up in his "younger days: for when he was but a child of eight "years, Madam de Briſambourg (30), who was his "aunt by his father's ſide, and of the pretended Re-"formed Religion, finding that he was a briſk and "ingenious boy, took ſuch an affection for him, that "ſhe deſired his mother (who was her ſiſter-in-law) to "let him live with her; for they were both of the "ſame Religion. Her requeſt was granted: his mo-"ther ſuffered her to take him in order to bring him "up in that Religion; and from that time his aunt de "Briſambourg declared him her ſole heir. Now, ſhe "was very rich, becauſe ſhe had had three huſbands, "and no children by them; but they had given her "conſiderable dowries, and made her large preſents, "which were made over to young Biron for his own "uſe and diſpoſal." Camden relates that the Marſhal de Biron laughed at the religious ſentiments, with which the Earl of Eſſex died, as though ſuch a reſignation became only a Preacher, but not a ſoldier (31).

(29) There is contentions in Cayet, but it ſhould be contentemens, as Peter Matthieu has it, who relates the ſame fact in his 110th book, pag. m. 271.

(30) Briſambourg is ſituated near St. Jean d'Angeli.

(31) Licet hanc pietatem ut miniſtelle quam viro bellicoſo dignioremBironus & alii prophani ſubſa-narent. Camden. in Annal. Part. 4. pag. 805.

[G] . . . Yet he acted as a bigot (α) in order to revive the Leaguers Party.] Mezerai obſerves (32), That after the loſs of Dourlens and Cambray, the Nobility and the army pitched upon him as the only perſon who could ſave the State: on his return from the ſiege of Amiens he had been intoxicated with the love which the inhabitants of Paris ſhewed for him; and when he went into Flanders to make the Archduke ſwear to the Articles of Peace, the Spaniards who knew how proud and ill-diſpoſed he was, loaded him with ſo many praiſes, that they filled his head with wind, and his heart with very wicked deſigns. From that time, and even before, he courted the favour of the populace, and affected ſuch a zeal for the Roman Catholick Religion, that he even wore a chaplet, and mixed with the Monks at their devout meetings, as tho' he deſigned to reſtore that League, which his own ſword had deſtroyed. He remembered how much the infatuation of the inhabitants of Paris for warrior ought to prolong the war as long as he can, becauſe the Court has no occaſion for him in time of peace, and leaves him to live upon his own eſtate (b). It was from this principle that during the ſiege of Amiens he did not give all the neceſſary orders to prevent the ſupply which the Archduke intended to throw into that City. He would not have been ſorry that it had been relieved, becauſe this would have put off the concluſion of the peace. He could hardly bear that Henry the Great ſhould have any ſhare in the glory of his ſucceſsful undertakings, and he threatened the Hiſtorians who would not humour him in his pride [H]. I can hardly believe what ſome relate of his learning [I]. What is reported of his memory deſerves to be obſerved [K]. He received at firſt a Proteſtant education (c). He was a great gameſter (d), but he was not inclined to lewdneſs nor to other ſenſual pleaſures (e). Henry IV deſigned to make him his ſon-in-law,

(32) Abregé Chronolog. tom. 6. pag. 209. under the year 1599.

(b) See a Diſcours ſur les Favoris, inſerted in the Additions de la Laboureur aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 2. pag. 135.

(c) See the Remark [F].

(d) He loſt in one year above 500 thouſand crowns. Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. 270. under the year 1602.

(e) Cayet, Chronol. Septenaire, fol. 317.

for the Duke of Guiſe had ſupported that Lord's ambition, and how far it carried him. He knew that the chief reaſon of his fondneſs for the Duke was, that he laboured to exterminate the Proteſtants. Biron therefore imagined, that in order to become the darling of the inhabitants of Paris, it was proper for him to ſtrengthen by an affectation of bigotry the impreſſions, which his great courage had made on the minds of the Citizens of that populous city. It was for that reaſon, that he pretended to hate the Huguenots. I ſhall tranſcribe here the following part of the Sieur Gillot's Letter, which I have already quoted (33). I muſt tell you, that it was the true ſpirit of the Leaguers, and a mere Catholicon. He had promiſed upon oath, that he would never ſee an Huguenot, nor ſpeak, nor converſe with any, nor admit any at his houſe: and to keep his word, he refuſed to ſee his own mother, when he went to his native place; and he diſmiſſed all the ancient ſervants of his father and his own, Sacramento illo obligatus, having promiſed it upon oath to the Count de Fuentes.

(33) Epitres Françoiſes à Scaliger, pag. 249.

* (α) This would have been a proper place for the comical account concerning Monſieur de St. Biron, which we read in the Confeſſion de Sancy, B. 2. ch. 8. CRIT. REM.]

[H] He could hardly bear that Henry the Great ſhould have any ſhare in the glory of his ſucceſsful undertakings, and he threatened the Hiſtorians, who would not humour him in his pride.] There was a jealouſy between this King and the Marſhal de Biron. The King would not always own that the Marſhal deſerved the glory he aſcribed to himſelf, and uſed to ſpeak his mind freely before the Duke of Savoye (34), who by a very malicious artifice uſed to make the converſation run upon thoſe ſubjects, that he might have an opportunity to report things proper to exaſperate the Marſhal (35); who, when he heard them, uſed to fall into ſuch a violent paſſion as made him utter the moſt diſreſpectful words againſt the duty and ſervice he owed the King . . . he made very rough and inconſiderate anſwers; for nothing vexed him ſo much as the ſtrokes levelled againſt his reputation with regard to courage, which he valued more than any thing in the world; and when he happened to relate the hiſtory of his own life, he uſed to ſlander every one, without ſparing the King himſelf (36), to whom he ſaid ſometimes (37), that he would not ſuffer the Hiſtorians of France ſhould ſay any thing, but that he himſelf had done ſuch or ſuch a thing (38). Having ſeen a Diſcourſe of Peter Matthieu concerning the cauſes and effects of the long wars between the Houſes of France and Auſtria, and imagining that the Author did not mention him ſo often nor ſo honourably as he wiſhed, he complained of it to the Chancellor de Bellievre, and diſcovered his reſentment more openly ſtill to De Vic, who was ſent Embaſſador into Switzerland, adding to his paſſionate complaints the moſt cruel threatnings againſt the Author (39).

(34) During the time that Duke continued at the Court of France in the year 1600.

(35) Pierre Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, liv. 3. pag. m. 449.

(36) Ibid.

(37) Ibid. pag. 452.

(38) Theſe words were ſpoken and heard at the ſiege of Amiens, Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, liv. 3. pag. 452.

(39) Ibid. liv. 4. pag. 388.

Obſerve that there was in his character a kind of ambition perfectly like that of Achilles. This Hero of Homer would not ſuffer any other Greek to ſhoot at Hector; he would have alone the glory to kill him.

Λαοῖσιν δ' ἀνέντυε καρήατι δῖος Ἀχιλλεύς,
Οὐδ' εἴα ἔμμεναι ἐπὶ Ἕκτορι πικρὰ βελέμνα,
Μήτις κῦδος ἄροιτο βαλὼν, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος ἔλθοι (40).

(40) Homer, Iliad. lib. 22. ver. 205. pag. m. 639.

Notwithſtanding Homer's authority the ancients have been of opinion, that this character of Achilles is to be blamed. Here follows what Plutarch tells us (41). Even Achilles is juſtly condemned, who acted not as a wiſe man, but as a raſh and hot-headed young fellow, tranſported with ambition, when he made ſigns to the Greeks in the heat of the battle, and bid them not to aim at Hector, leſt another ſhould rob him of that honour, and he ſhould come too late.

(41) Plutarch. in Pompeio, pag. 634. according to Amiot's tranſlation.

[I] I can hardly believe what ſome relate of his learning.] Balzac tells us a very curious particular (42), which is as follows. " To the two Frenchman, I have " already quoted (43), I ſhall add a third, whom I " forgot to mention; you would never gueſs who he " is: I mean the late Marſhal de Biron, that blood-" thirſty man, of whom Torquato Taſſo ſays, under " the character of Argante,

" Impatiente, ineſſorabil, fiero,
" Ne l'arme infatigabile & invitto, &c.
That is.
" Impatient, inexorable, proud, in war indefatigable, " and invincible.

(42) Balzac, Entretien 4. towards the end, pag. m. 72, 73.

(43) He had mentioned in pag. 71. Monſ. de Givri, and Monſ. d'Urfé, who had been eloquent and learned, and wrote well both in proſe and in verſe.

" One of our friends, who was acquainted with " him, wrote of him in the following words. The " King ſent the Marſhal de Biron Embaſſador to Queen " Elizabeth, and called him in his Credentials, the " ſharpeſt inſtrument of his victories. The Marſhal ac-" quitted himſelf worthily of his functions, for he had " no leſs wit than courage. It has been obſerved in " another place, that in order to comply with the " ſtupidity of the world, he endeavoured to paſs for " a rude and unpolite man: but it is certain that be-" ſides his natural talents, he had alſo acquired ſome " learning: Which appeared once at Freſne, where " the King walking in a gallery, aſked ſome of the " Maſters of the Requeſts the ſenſe of a Greek Verſe, " which was ingraved on a piece of marble: as they " could not explain it, he gave the ſenſe of it, and " then went out, being aſhamed that he ſhould know " more than the Maſters of the Requeſts at that time." I am almoſt perſuaded that the ſon has been here miſtaken for the father; for as the father loved reading, and delighted to converſe with learned men, and, if he heard any thing remarkable, uſed to ſet it down in his pocket-book, it was he, probably, who found in his pocket-book the ſenſe of the Greek Verſe, and gave it. I will not, however, be poſitive: you will find in the following Remark a circumſtance which makes me doubtful. Monſieur de Perefixe (44) aſſerts, that Biron the ſon was very ignorant, but exceedingly fond of the Predictions of Aſtrologers, Soothſayers, Geomancers, and other impoſtors. Let us obſerve by the by, that Monſieur Balzac does not act here with a ſufficient candour; he makes uſe of an artifice which is common with vain-glorious Authors: he dares not to name the Author from whom he tranſcribes, and hopes that this ſilence will make the Reader imagine, that he has borrowed what he ſays from a Book unknown to the reſt of the world: and yet it is taken from a very common Book, I mean, from Aubigné's Hiſtory (45). I have made in another place (46) an obſervation of the ſame kind.

(44) Hiſtoire de Henri le Grand, pag. m. 374.

(45) Tom. 3. liv. 5. chap. 12. pag. 668, 669.

[K] What is reported of his memory deſerves to be obſerved.] I have related above that he was brought up by the Lady de Briſambourg, his aunt by his father's ſide. I ſhall add in this place, that he had not the leaſt inclination for learning, but always loved arms; wherefore his father the Marſhal de Biron, who was a martial man, and a Roman Catholick, ſent for him from his aunt, and took him for ſome time with him, in his journey through the Provinces of Saintonge, Aulnis, and Angoulmois, and had him brought up in the Roman Catholick in-law [L], and boaſted, they ſay, that he had ſaved his life [M]. I ſhall take notice only of two blunders of Moreri [N].

(46) In the Remark [C] of the Article CAVALCANTE towards the end.

Catholick Religion. . . . Charles de Biron therefore, who in his youth, and till the age of ſixteen years, had been incapable of learning, acquired ſuch a knowledge in the art of war, that he found nothing impoſſible for him; his father alſo delighted in it: and it has been obſerved as a wonderful thing in Biron the ſon, that having ſtudied Hiſtory at Briſambourg, under one Manduca, a learned man born at Malta, (though at that time he did not in the leaſt improve in it) yet he has afterwards related ſeveral examples, and given an account of all kinds of hiſtories, in an admirable manner, though naturally he was not a great talker (47).

(47) Cayet, Chronol. Septenaire, folio 319.

[L] Henry IV deſigned to make him his ſon in-law.] I have read this in the Additions to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau, and I imagine that my Readers will not be diſpleaſed to find here a conſiderable paſſage from them, which abounds with curious particulars (48). "If "the Duke de Biron did not conſpire againſt his perſon (49), it cannot be denied that he conſpired a- "gainſt the State, and that he had agreed to diſ- "member it, and to make it a prey for the King of "Spain and for the Duke of Savoy his pretended "father-in-law. The King was ſo much the more "exaſperated againſt him for this treaſon, that he "loved him to ſuch a degree, as to chooſe him for his "ſon-in-law, and deſigned to marry him to his "daughter Catherine Henrietta, who was afterwards "Ducheſs of Elbœuf, in order the better to ſecure his "Crown to the Duke of Vendoſme, whom he pre- "tended to legitimate by marrying the Ducheſs of "Beaufort. Soon after the death of this Lady, who "was his miſtreſs, he declared his deſign to the Sieur "du Vair, then Counſellor of State, after he had be- "wailed his loſs to him; and he obliged him freely to "give him his opinion of that deſign. Sir, anſwered "du Vair, if your Majeſty were a Duke of Tuſcany, of "Mantua, or of Urbino (he ſpoke thus becauſe Italy "abounds with inſtances of cruelty, eſpecially in the "eſtabliſhment of ſovereign Princes, which in the be- "ginning was always tyrannical,) I ſhould think "that by deſtroying all your relations and their friends, "you might raiſe your baſtard children to the throne. "But as you are King of France, and a mild Prince; "deſirous to live as your predeceſſors have done, you run "the hazard of ruining the whole State, and perhaps of "loſing your life. You are miſtaken, replied the King, "the French uſe themſelves to every thing. The King, "finding it was now out of his power to make the "Duke of Vendoſme reign, reſolved to make him the "greateſt man in the Kingdom, and perſiſted in the "reſolution to make the Duke of Biron his ſon-in- "law; but whether Biron did not think it an advan- "tage conſiderable enough for him, or was ſorry to "find himſelf obliged by authority to conſent to a "match, by which he could no longer gratify his "ambition, he fooliſhly flattered himſelf with the "hopes of marrying the Duke of Savoy's daughter, "who by her father and mother deſcended from King "Francis I, and Charles V. The ſame Sieur du "Vair, on his return to Court from Provence through "Dijon, had a long converſation with the Duke de "Biron's Secretary, and told him that he was ſurpriz- "ed, a great Lord of his age, and who had ſuch con- "ſiderable employments, ſhould not marry: upon "which Biron's Secretary gave du Vair ſome hints of "his maſter's deſigns by the following anſwer. Theſe "great Lords, ſaid he, aim at ſomething ſo high, "that they come quite to forget themſelves. And in- "deed the Duke of Biron was of a proud and haughty "ſpirit, almoſt intractable, he thought of nothing but "things difficult and hardly poſſible: he was jealous "of the greatneſs of others, and envied the Duke of "Montmorency his office of Conſtable, and his envy "extended even to Louiſa de Budos the Conſtable's "wife; ſo that he made propoſals of marriage to "her, even during her huſband's life, thinking that "he was to ſucceed him in his poſt (50), and every "thing was already ſettled between them, but fate diſ- "appointed them; for they both died in the flower "of their age, amidſt their grand deſigns, and the "Conſtable ſurvived them.

(48) Le Laboureur, Additions aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, tom. 2. pag. 132.

(49) That is to ſay, againſt the perſon of Henry IV.

(50) The Author of the Diſcours hiſtorique de la fortune & diſgrace des Favoris, inſerted in the Additions aux Mémoires de Caſtelnau, ſpeaks thus in pag. 135. This King in order to reward the ſervices of the ſaid Marſhal, made him a Duke and Peer, and gave him a very large penſion, and waited only for the Conſtable's death, who was very old, to give him his poſt.

[M] . . . . and boaſted that he had ſaved his life.] I have read this in an Hiſtory of Henry the Great written by G. Soffi. This Author makes him ſay (51): "Though I am a King, yet I ſaved one of my ſol- "diers life: If I had not come to his aſſiſtance, he "had been killed before my eyes: I have ſeen this "brave Warrior turn his back to the enemy. It is "certain, that what the King ſaid was ſufficiently "known. As they were purſuing Farneſe, who made "his retreat, there happened to be a fight of the horſe "on both ſides, upon the borders; the enemy reco- "vering his ſtrength attacked Biron, and ran his horſe "through with a ſpear. At the rencounter near Fon- "taine Françoiſe, Biron already greatly wounded, re- "ceived a terrible blow on his head, ſo that he could "hardly ſee, the blood running over his eyes." The King delivered him on theſe two dangerous occaſions. Peter Matthieu relates this more clearly. "He "has ſerved me well, ſaid the King, but he cannot "deny that I ſaved his life three times. I delivered "him out of the enemy's hands at Fontaine Françoiſe; "when he was ſo wounded and ſo ſtunned with the "blow he received, that as I had done the office of a "ſoldier to ſave him, I was alſo obliged to do the office "of a Marſhal in the retreat, for he told me that he "was not in a condition to do it, nor to ſerve me (52)." Here follows what we find in the margin of that Hiſtory. "During the fight at Fontaine Françoiſe, the King "delivered the Marſhal de Biron from the vollies of "muſquet-balls; one of his Majeſty's ſervants told "him upon this, that it was too dangerous for him "thus to venture amongſt the enemies. I know it, "replied the King, but if I do not do it, if I do not "advance, the Marſhal de Biron will reproach me "with it all his life time."

(51) Liv. 4. pag. m. 462.

(52) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, liv. 4, pag. m. 286.

[N] I ſhall take notice only of two blunders of Moreri.] He aſſerts, that the Barony of Biron was not erected into a Dutchy and Peerdom but after the Marſhal's return from his Embaſſy in England. This is not true (53); for this Barony was erected into a Dutchy and Peerdom about three years before this Embaſſy. He adds that the Sieur Biron having loſt the poſt of Admiral, and having ſome trifling reaſons of diſcontent, conſpired againſt the State. This alſo is falſe; for he had voluntarily reſigned his poſt of Admiral in the year 1594, and had been abundantly recompenſed for it.

(53) This blunder is in F. Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 211.

GONZAGA (CECILIA) muſt be reckoned amongſt the moſt virtuous and moſt learned maidens that lived in the fifteenth Century. She made a wonderful progreſs in the Belles Lettres under Victorine de Feltri; for if I am not miſtaken we muſt underſtand of her what we read in one of Ambroſe of Camaldoli's books [A]. Her mother Paula

[A] We muſt underſtand of her what we read in one of Ambroſe of Camaldoli's books.] Read his Hodœporicon, you will find there (1), that Victorinus Feltrius taught polite literature at Mantua with great reputation, and inſtructed the children of the Lord of that place. This Lord was John Francis Gonzaga. He had a daughter about eight years old who could read and write, and knew already the declenſions and conjugations of the Greek tongue, as ſhe ſhewed it before the very learned Ambroſe, General of the Camaldoli, when he paſſed through Mantua in the year 1432. Principis filiam octo ferme annorum ita imbuerat (Victorinus Feltrius) ut legeret jam & ſcriberet, Græcaque & nomina & verba inoffenſe declinaret, non ſine admiratione noſtra. Theſe are Ambroſe's words in the account of his journey, that is to ſay, of the viſitation he made of ſeveral Convents of the Order of which he was General. What I ſhall now relate muſt be referred, I think, to a later voyage. I tranſcribe it from Monſieur Joly (2). What is obſerv-

(1) In pag. 34.

(2) Joly, Avis Chrétiens & moraux pour l'Inſtitution des Enfans, pag. 347, 348.

ed

Paula Malateſta, a Lady illuſtrious for her virtue, learning, and beauty, inſpired her with a contempt for the world [B], and perſuaded her to be a Nun. She was conſtant in this reſolution, notwithſtanding all that could be urged againſt it. Cecilia made a ſpeech to her father who would not ſuffer her to take the reſolution never to marry, and ſhe proved by very good arguments the reaſonableneſs of that deſign (a). I have obſerved in another place (b) what ſhe was adviſed to read when ſhe was become a Nun. Monſieur Joly has made a few blunders [C].

(a) See the Remark [B] quotation (7).

(b) In the article CONRARUS.

GONZAGA

* Lib. 3. hiſtoriar. Camaldulenſ. cap. 24. Autore Auguſtino Florentino Monacho Camaldulenſi, edit. Florentiæ 1575, in 4to.

† The Author of this Hiſtory obſerves, that Ambroſe had related this in the 35th of his Epiſtles.

‡ Adfuit puella quoque Principis filia, decennis fermè, Græcè adeo ſcribens eleganter, ut tantundem in quolibet à ſe erudito homine Ambroſius deſideravit.

(3) The Lords of Mantua were not yet ſtiled Dukes at that time; they have had that title only ſince the year 1530.

(4) Pag. m. 749.

ed of another maiden, in the Life of Ambroſe * General of the Order of Camaldoli, is much more remarkable. Ambroſe being ſent by Pope Eugene IV to the Council of Baſil, went to a caſtle named Gorda, ſituated in the territories of Mantua, where he met with two children, the one a boy of fourteen, who repeated before him two hundred verſes, which he had compoſed and delivered them with ſuch a grace †, that he did not think Virgil had better delivered the ſixth book of his Æneid before Auguſtus: we are not told who this boy was. But we have the following account of the girl ‡. The daughter alſo of the Prince (that is to ſay of the Duke (3) of Mantua) appeared before them, a girl about ten years old, who wrote Greek ſo elegantly, that Ambroſe could not deſire a better ſtyle in any learned man.

I do eaſily believe that the ſame girl is meant in the accounts of theſe two journeys, and that ſhe is the perſon who is the ſubject of this Article.

Obſerve that Victorine of Feltri was a very famous man; ſee what Leander Albertus ſays of him in his Deſcription of Italy (4). Illuſtrarunt Feltrium ingenia quædam nobilia nominatim Victorinus memoria noſtrorum avorum linguæ Latinæ, quæ tam diu perierat, reductor ac inſtaurator. i. e. "The illuſtrious city of Feltri has "produced ſome eminent men, and particularly Victo- "rine, who in the time of our grandfathers re- "vived and reſtored the Latin tongue, which was "loſt."

[B] Paula Malataſta . . . . illuſtrious for her virtue . . . . inſpired her with a contempt for the world.] Leander Albertus commends her very much, and aſſerts that ſhe was loaded with praiſes by all the Authors that lived in her time. Paula Franciſci primi Gonzagæ Mantuani Marchionis conjux, non ſolum excellenti formæ pulchritudine (venuſtiſſima quippe totius Italiæ habebatur) ſed etiam multis virtutibus, literis, prudentia, ſanctitateque decorata (5). i. e. "Paula, the "ſpouſe of Francis Gonzaga the firſt of that name "Marquiſs of Mantua, was not only exceedingly "beautiful (being eſteemed the moſt handſome woman "in all Italy) but alſo adorned with a great many "eminent qualities, with learning, prudence, and "piety." Speaking in another place of the ſame Francis Gonzaga, who had been raiſed to the dignity of Marquiſs of Mantua by the Emperor Sigiſmund September the 22d 1433, he ſays, Uxorem habuit lectiſſimam fœminam, religione, ſapientia, pudicitia, literiſque decoratam Paulam Malateſtam, ab omnibus illorum temporum ſcriptoribus ob ſingulares virtutes mirificè laudatam (6). i. e. "He had a very di- "ſtinguiſhed ſpouſe, Paula Malateſta, who was a- "dorned with piety, wiſdom, modeſty, and learn- "ing, and who for her eminent qualities has been ce- "lebrated by all the writers of that time." Who would not have commended ſuch an incomparable woman? ſhe paſſed for the moſt beautiful Lady in all Italy, and yet ſhe deſpiſed all the ornaments of the body; and as ſhe ſpent nothing in jewels or fineries, ſhe knew how to employ her money in building or repairing Churches, in nouriſhing the poor, in giving portions to young maidens to marry them, &c. She inſpired our Cecilia with the ſame ſentiments, as we learn from Matthew Boſſus in the following paſſage (7). Habuit Mantua Paulam Gonzagam illuſtrem fœminam univerſa Italia celeberrimam, quam ſi dixero corporis cultum contempſiſſe, omnem ſuam rem in ædificandis inſtaurandiſque delubris, in pauperum Chriſti neceſſitatibus, in locandis nuptuique tradendis virginibus, quæ quidem maxima ſunt, erogaſſe, ſi nihil unquam illam omiſiſſe, quod ad veram humilitatem, culmenque virtutis conducat, ſi omnis denique ingenioli mei vires in ejus laudibus expendam, parum dixiſſe me profecto ſemper agnoſcam. Primam Paulam, cujus modo mentionem fecimus (8), imitata Cæciliam virginem ſuam filiam literarum peritiſſimam ſuo educatu, ſuaque imitatione ad tantam ſæcularium ornamentorum, ut ita dixerim, nauſeam perduxit, & ad religionem inflammavit, ut apud patrem primum Mantuæ Marchionem vincere ejus propoſitum cupientem, cauſam conſtantiſſimè agere non ſit verita. i. e. "There was at Mantua Paula Gon- "zaga an illuſtrious Lady, famous over all Italy: if "I ſhould ſay that ſhe deſpiſed all bodily ornaments, "that ſhe ſpent all her income in building or re- "pairing Churches, in providing for Chriſt's poor, "in giving portions to maidens that they might mar- "ry; if I ſhould ſay, that ſhe never omitted any "thing that related to a real humility, or conduced "to the higheſt degree of virtue; if I ſhould exert "the whole power of the little wit I have, to com- "mend her, I ſhould ſtill own that I had not ſaid "enough. She imitated the ancient Paula, whom I "mentioned before, and by her education and her "own example ſhe inſpired her moſt learned daugh- "ter with ſuch a diſguſt, if I may ſay ſo, for all "worldly ornaments, and inflamed her with ſuch a "zeal for a religious life, that ſhe did not ſcruple to "aſſert her cauſe courageouſly againſt her father, the "firſt Marquiſs of Mantua, who would diſſuade her "from her deſign (of being a Nun)." Theſe words are taken from a Diſcourſe which Matthew Boſſus (9) directed to Cardinal Beſſarion, to perſuade him not to ſuffer, that the Ladies of Bologna ſhould uſe their ornaments again.

(5) Leander Albertus, Deſcriptio Italiæ, pag. 456.

(6) Idem, ibid. pag. 608.

(7) Matthæus Boſſus de immoderato Mulierum Cultu, pag. m. 327.

(8) He had mentioned a little before Paula, the mother of Bleſilla and Euſtochium, who are ſo much celebrated in St. Jerom's works.

[C] Monſieur Joly has made a few blunders.] Let us not abridge his diſcourſe; a great number of perſons will be glad to find here what I might otherwiſe omit. If we duly conſider thoſe times, ſays he (10), we ſhall find that they abounded more with learned women than any other times, though ignorance was then very great amongſt the men; for towards the end of the fifteenth Century we meet with Paula Gonzaga daughter of the Marquiſs of Mantua, and a Nun, with Baptiſta, the widow of the Lord of Arimini, with the daughters of John Feruffini a Civilian of Milan; their mother Margaret took as much care to make them learn the Greek and Latin tongues, as Thomas More afterwards did with regard to his daughters; with Iſota Nogarola of Verona, of whom Cardinal Beſſarion, who went on purpoſe to viſit her, ſaid, that ſhe was a virgin divine rather than human *; with Volante, the widow of the Prince of Ceſena, and afterwards a Nun of the Order of St. Francis. All theſe are mentioned by Matthew Boſſus †, who alſo was of Verona, and a regular Canon of St. Auſtin. There is more than one error in this aſſertion, that the learned Lady, named Paula, whom Matthew Boſſus mentions, lived towards the end of the fifteenth Century, and that ſhe was the Marquiſs of Mantua's daughter and a Nun. She was of the Houſe of Malateſta. And ſince her huſband was the firſt Marquiſs of Mantua (11) ſhe muſt not be placed in the end of the fifteenth Century; for this Marquiſs died in the year 1444 (12), after he had had ſeveral children by her. If it were true that he married her in the year 1410, as Monſieur de Marolles aſſerts (13), Monſieur Joly's blunder would be more viſible ſtill. Add to this, that Matthew Boſſus obſerves, that ſhe perſuaded her daughter Cecilia to be a Nun; he does not ſay, that Paula being a widow, entered into a Nunnery. I have not this Author's letters; I cannot therefore determine whether or not he ſays in them, that Baptiſta had been married to the Lord of Arimini; I only know that he does not ſay it in the other work quoted by Monſieur Joly. I know beſides that ſhe was of the Houſe of Malateſta, who ruled at Arimini (14). However it be, I am very certain that this Lady had a great credit in that City; for her example, her exhortations, and her orders, obliged the women of Arimini to dreſs in a modeſt manner, and to leave off the long trains of their gowns. Such a reformation is not the work of a Lady whoſe authority and merit are but

(9) He was of Verona, and a Regular Canon. I have given an Article of him.

(10) Joly, Voyage de Hollande, pag. 163, 164.

* See the Dames illuſtres de la Coſte, pag. 721.

† In Recuperationib. Fæſulanis, ad Beſſarion. Card. de honeſto Cultu fœminarum. It. Ep. 3. & 101.

(11) Boſſus aſſerts it in the words I have cited above, quotation (7).

(12) Volater. lib. 4. pag. 113. Leand. Albertus, Deſcr. Ital. pag. 608. There is an error in the account of the latter. He quotes an Inſcription, by which it appears, that this Marquiſs was about 12 years old in March 1407. (Volater. lib. 4. pag. 123. makes him 14 years old) Then he places his death under the year 1444, October the 23d, and makes him live 54 years. The Abbot de Marolles, Mémoires, tom. 1. pag. 427. agrees with him in theſe two numbers.

(13) Marolles, Mémoires, tom. 1. pag. 427.

(14) Fuit & Baptiſta ſingularis formæ, ſapientiæ, honeſtatis ac eruditionis mulier. Leand. Albertus, Deſcrip. Italiæ, pag. 456. i. e. "Baptiſta "was alſo a woman of a great "beauty, wiſdom, chaſtity, "and learning."

GONZAGA (ELEONORA) the daughter of Francis II, Marqueſs of Mantua, and wife of Francis-Maria de la Rovere Duke of Urbino [A] in the ſixteenth Century, was illuſtrious for her eminent qualities. She ſhewed a great conſtancy in her misfortunes, and a great moderation in her proſperity. She always loved her huſband, and was his faithful companion in his adverſity [B]; but ſhe loved chaſtity above all other virtues, as appears by her ſeverity againſt lewd women [C]. She had five children, two ſons and three daughters. Guy-Ubaldo de la Rovere, her eldeſt ſon, was Duke of Urbino; her ſecond ſon was Duke of Sore and Cardinal. Hippolyta her eldeſt daughter was married to Anthony of Aragon Duke of Montalto; Juſta her ſecond daughter married Alfonſo d'Eſte Marquiſs of Montecchio; Iſabella the youngeſt of all was married to Alberic Cibo Prince of Maleſpina, and Marquiſs of Maſſa (a).

(a) Taken from Hilarion deCoſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 544, &c.

but indifferent: It is one of the greateſt undertakings a perſon can reſolve upon. However it be, let us ſee at length the beautiful Elogium, which Matthew Boſſus wrote on this Chriſtian Heroine. Baptiſtam inſignem Ariminenſe ſolum habuit, ſingulari humilitate, pariter & literarum ſtudiis præditam, quæ adeo animi ornamenta corporalibus prætulit, ut nihil unquam prætermiſiſſe viſa ſit, quod ad principis aut præſentis aut futuræ decus & ornamentum ullo pacto potuerit attinere. At cæteris ſuis rebus geſtis omiſſis, invenio illam etiam vivente viro nedum humili habitu inceſſiſſe, verùm cætera concives & populares hortatu ſuo imperioque temperatiſſimis ornamentis, breviſſimiſque veſtium caudis uſas fuiſſe (15). i. e. "At Arimini lived the celebrated Baptiſta, a Lady "diſtinguiſhed both by her ſingular humility, and "by her learning; ſhe did ſo much prefer the ornaments of the mind before thoſe of the body, that "ſhe never omitted any thing that might ſerve to promote the preſent or future glory of a Princeſs. But "paſſing over her other actions, I find that even during the life of her ſpouſe, ſhe not only dreſſed in a "very modeſt manner, but by her example and by "her authority obliged all the other women, who "lived in the ſame city with her, to dreſs modeſtly, "and to wear gowns with very ſhort trains." Volaterranus has (16) mentioned this Lady's learning, and obſerves that Leonard Aretine and ſeveral other learned men dedicated Books to her. Obſerve that I do not pretend to deny that there ever was a Nun called Paula Gonzaga; I only aſſert, that Matthieu Boſſus has not mentioned her. He was dead before ſhe entered into a Nunnery. She lived only in the XVIth Century: I met with no Author that commends her but only as a very religious Nun. See Hilarion de Coſte, in page 707 of the firſt volume of his Eloges des Dames illuſtres, where he obſerves that there has been ſome deſign to canonize her.

(15) Matthæus Boſſus, de immoderato Cultu fœminarum, pag. 327.

(16) Volaterran. Comment. Urban. lib. 6. pag. 203.

[A] She was the wife of Francis Maria de la Rovere.] He was Pope Julius II's nephew, and the ſon of that John de la Rovere, to whom Sixtus IV gave the Principalities of Sore and Sinigaglia, and who married Jane di Monteſeltro the daughter of Frederic di Montefeltro Duke of Urbino. Our Francis Maria, born of this marriage, became Duke of Urbino after the death of Guy-Ubaldo di Montefeltro his uncle by his mother's ſide, who died without iſſue (1).

(1) See Leander Albertus, Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 445.

[B] . . . And was his faithful companion in his adverſity.] Leo X, having made his nephew Laurence de Medicis Duke of Urbino, deprived Francis Maria de la Rovere of this Dutchy. This is the time of adverſity, when Eleonora ſhewed ſuch a conſtancy under the misfortunes of her huſband, and the heavy ſtrokes of fortune under which he laboured, when he was for ſome time deprived of his dominions. This never made her forſake her uſual generoſity, nor act againſt the duty ſhe owed her huſband: ſhe was his conſtant companion, and comforted him in his adverſity, which like a woman of honour, ſhe would always ſhare with him (2). He was reſtored to the Dutchy of Urbino after the death of Laurence de Medicis (3). The huſband died in the year 1538 (4). Paul Jovius commends him very much (5).

(2) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 545.

(3) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Ital. pag. 445.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Paulus Jovius, Elog. bellic. Virtut. Illuſtr. lib. 6. pag. m. 497.

[C] Her love for chaſtity appears by her ſeverity againſt lewd women.] "For ſhe would never receive "at her houſe, nor have the leaſt familiarity with "thoſe Ladies of birth and quality, againſt whom "there had been the leaſt rumour or ſuſpicion, that they "had tainted the honour of their ſex by a diſſolute "life; and ſhe was a mortal enemy to all thoſe, who "had indulged themſelves in the ſhameful pleaſures of "laſciviouſneſs, having baniſhed ſeveral of them from "her territories, and cauſed thoſe old proſtitutes "to be ſeverely puniſhed, who having loſt all ſhame, "modeſty, reputation and conſcience in their youth, "think of nothing elſe night and day, in their old "age, but how they may ruin the young and ſimple "virgins, who have no knowledge of the world yet. "She alſo deſerves an immortal glory for the care ſhe "took to deliver at her own expence all thoſe innocent and deluded doves from the clutches of thoſe "ravenous beaſts, and to conſecrate them to the Altar "(in Nunneries) where they have ſince been virtuous "to a wonder (6)." This was performing effectually the duties of a virtuous Princeſs: ſhe had not performed them well, had ſhe only been faithful to her huſband. This may be ſufficient for a private woman, but not for thoſe that are raiſed to a high ſtation: They are under an unavoidable obligation, to give ſuch glaring proofs of their indignations againſt all diſſolute women, as to caſt a public diſgrace upon them. This diſgrace is a much more powerful motive to a regular life, than all the Sermons of the moſt eloquent Preachers; and it is certain that the diſorders, which are produced by the diſſolute lives of the women is a blemiſh in the character of a ſovereign Princeſs, though ſhe be never ſo virtuous herſelf. For if ſhe would baniſh from her intimacy all the women, who have a bad reputation, if ſhe would refuſe them her palace, if, at leaſt, ſhe would mortify them by a cold reception, and by ſome cenſures, whilſt ſhe ſhewed a great friendſhip and eſteem for the modeſt women, this would infallibly procure a reformation of morals. Whence we may infer, that when diſſoluteneſs appears boldly, it is a ſign that the chief Lady of the place does not make any diſtinction, at leaſt as to outward appearances, between them that give a handle to ſlander, and them that live with modeſty and chaſtity. See what has been obſerved in another place (7). This connivance, you will ſay, is owing, not to a want of zeal for the propagation of chaſtity, but to a certain ſweetneſs of temper, which does not ſuffer a Princeſs, to ſtem the tide with all the ſtrength that is requiſite: I grant it; but though you ſhould never ſo much urge this excuſe, I ſhall always maintain, that this remiſsneſs, or if you will, this ſweetneſs of temper is a very great defect on ſuch occaſions.

(6) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 546, 547.

(7) In the remark [M] of the article LEWIS XII.

GONZAGA (ISABELLA), the wife of Guy-Ubaldo di Montefeltro (a) Duke of Urbino, deſerves to be ranked amongſt the moſt illuſtrious Ladies. One of her Panegyriſts ſtiles her a woman, who for her good nature, uprightneſs, conſtancy, and nobility, was rather divine than human (b). She was of a wonderful chaſtity; but there are ſome particulars related of her in that reſpect, which ſeem to be fabulous; for it is aſſerted, that after ſhe had lain two years with her huſband, who all that while performed nothing of what is called conjugal duty, ſhe was nevertheleſs fully perſuaded that there was nothing thing wanted her in marriage [A], and that all the other huſbands were like her's. She was at laſt undeceived of that miſtake, and her huſband himſelf confeſſed his impotency to her, when he found that ſhe knew of what nature it was [B]; notwithſtanding this ſhe continued to be very fond of him; ſhe comforted him, and never complained of her condition, nor declared it to any perſon whatſoever; and yet the public came to know that ſecret [C], whereupon ſhe was powerfully entreated to reſolve upon another match: it was repreſented to her that it would not be difficult to have her marriage declared void; ſeveral other arguments were propoſed to her, but nothing could prevail upon her [D]; ſhe

(a) And not de la Rovere, as Hilarion de Coſte ſays, pag. 691. of the firſt volume of his Eloges des Dames Illuſtres.
(b) Joſeph Betuiſſi, delle Donne illuſtre, quoted by Hilarion de Coſte, tom. 1. pag. 697. See alſo Chriſtophano Bronzino, della Dignita & Nobilita delle Donne, Giornata quinta, pag. 116.

[A] After ſhe had lain two years with her huſband, who all that while performed nothing of what is called conjugal duty, ſhe was nevertheleſs fully perſuaded, that there was nothing wanted in her marriage.] Let us tranſcribe the Minim Hilarion de Coſte's phraſes, leſt the alteration I might make in his ſtyle ſhould give offence to the ſcrupulous Reader. "She was one of thoſe, "of whom the Apoſtle ſpeaks, who are married, as "though they were not. For either through the ten- "derneſs of her age, or through mere innocence, ſhe "paſſed the two firſt years of her marriage in ſuch a "great ignorance of the *Sacrament, in which ſhe "was engaged, that ſhe imagined all the other married "women were like her; thus of old the wife of Hiero "did not complain of her huſband's ſtinking breath, "thinking that all the other men ſtunk like him. But "whether age taught her in a ſecret but not inſenſible "manner, what is underſtood by the moſt ſavage Na- "tions, and by perſons of the coldeſt conſtitution (our "nature being but too much inclined to ſenſual plea- "ſures) or whether the free converſations, ſhe as a "married woman had with the Ladies who were alſo "married, acquainted her with ſome particulars un- "known to her before, the miſt ſhe had before her "eyes vaniſhed away (1)." It is not probable that ſhe continued ſo long ignorant in an affair of that kind. Moſt of thoſe who read the Minim's Book, have ſaid, that to find ſo innocent a girl with regard to ſpeculation, one muſt chooſe one of the age of four or five years. For indeed there prevails a very bad cuſtom in all families, either becauſe it cannot well be prevented, or people are in hopes that it will be of ſome uſe, or becauſe Providence ſuffers it for the temporal good of the univerſe. However it be, as ſoon as children are come to a certain age, they hear of nothing but miſtreſſes and ſweethearts: if little Miſs is to be corrected for ſome fault, ſhe is told that if ſhe does not leave off ſuch a thing, ſhe will never have a huſband: but if ſhe does it, ſhe will have a ſweetheart (2). There are a thouſand ſuch promiſes and threatnings uſed continually. The ſervants of the family, the laundreſſes, the ſeamſtreſſes, the chamber-maids &c. go much further; they whiſper in Miſs's ear what all this means; a thouſand occaſions offer daily to do it. There is now and then a marriage in the neighbourhood or in the family: Miſs is curious to go to Church to ſee the new couple married; and this affords a fruitful ſubject for converſations not only in public but even in private, by which innocent Miſs receives myſterious inſtructions. This happens chiefly before the Articles are ſigned, or rather from the time they are ſigned to the wedding-day. Thus the theory of marriage is ſoon known before a girl is ripe for it. But ſuppoſe her parents found means to preſerve her from thoſe ſecret converſations, in which chamber-maids and many other women are buſy to ſatisfy and even to prevent that curioſity ſo natural to the ſex; ſuppoſe, I ſay, that a maiden, when ſhe marries, is as ignorant in the theory as in the practice of matrimony, is it poſſible that ſhe ſhould continue ignorant a long while? Is there not another cuſtom that prevails every where? Is not a new married woman aſked a thouſand queſtions the next day after her wedding? If her mother out of decency forbear queſtioning her, does ſhe not employ other women? Can the aunts, couſins, friends, &c. forbear to make her undergo the examination? It cannot therefore be imagined, that our Ducheſs of Urbino continued two years after her wedding-day ſo ignorant as our Minim pretends.

*The Roman Catholics maintain that marriage is a Sacrament.

(1) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. I. pag. 697, 698.

(2) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg, pag. 663, 664.

[B] Her huſband himſelf confeſſed his impotency to her, when he found that ſhe knew of what nature it was.] Let us quote again the Minim's words (3). The Duke her huſband perceiving that the Ducheſs Iſabella had found out his infirmity, was forced himſelf to declare in modeſt words and expreſſions his impotency to her; teſtifying by his diſcourſes what a grief it was to him, that he could not leave any children to ſucceed him in his dominions, and that if his ſubjects knew it, they would love him the leſs for it. Hereupon the modeſt and virtuous Iſabella began with a ſmiling look and chearful countenance to comfort him, entreating him to bear his misfortune with a perfect reſignation to God's will; ſhe repreſented to him, that ſeveral Kings and great Princes had been and ſtill laboured under the ſame affliction; and that it is often much better to have no children, than to have ſome that are wicked and vicious, ſince it generally happens, according to the ancient Latin Proverb, Filii Heroum noxæ, that Heroes beget only monſters, unnatural and ungrateful children, who become the fatal firebrands, that deſtroy their families, States, and Commonwealths, and are a ſcourge to the parents who begot them. That with regard to her, he muſt not be any way concerned; that his impotence would not in the leaſt affect her fondneſs and love for him; that ſhe would carry her virginity with her to the grave, that another might not enjoy her, ſince through a natural defect he could not poſſeſs what was deſigned for him; and that his misfortune ſhould never be known to any perſon in the world.

(3) Hill. de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. I. pag. 698.

[C] . . . . Yet the publick came to know this ſecret.] Hilarion de Coſte (4) having made an exclamation againſt thoſe who pretend that women cannot keep a ſecret, adds that the Ducheſs of Urbino kept her ſecret and promiſe more faithfully than her huſband did; having lived with him above fourteen years in ſuch a manner, that ſhe never by her complaints gave the leaſt hints of the defect of her marriage. During the firſt years ſhe hid it through the innocence and ignorance of youth, and afterwards from a principle of honour, thro' the ſtrength of her virtue, and becauſe ſhe had promiſed to keep it ſecret. Not only the people of the Duchy of Urbino, and the inhabitants of the beautiful city of Peſaro, but even their moſt intimate and familiar friends, and the Lords of their Court, did not know that this defect and this ſterilility was owing to the Duke; on the contrary they imagined the Ducheſs was barren. The truth would never have been known, had not the Duke himſelf diſcovered it, when being driven out of his Dominions by Cæſar Borgia Duke of Valentinois, he came to wait upon our King Lewis XII, who was then in his city of Milan and in his Duchy of the Milaneze. The Duke of Urbino applied to him, to be reſtored to his Dominions: but he could not obtain his requeſt, becauſe the King had entered into an alliance with Pope Alexander VI the Duke of Valentinois's father, and dreaded the reſentment of the Houſe of Borgia againſt him and his family; the Duke of Urbino therefore gave them hopes that he would divorce his wife and enter into holy Orders, aſſerting that through his impotence he never conſummated his marriage, and being aſked by the King himſelf whether this was true, he confirmed it to him. The huſband having thus revealed this ſecret, it was ſpread through the whole State of Urbino and over all Italy, ſo that the meaneſt among the people knew that Gui-Ubaldo de la Rovere (5) Duke of Urbino was a man only as to outward appearance, or if he was a man, it was not ſo as to have a rank amongſt the huſbands; and all the world admired the conſtancy and modeſty of the virtuous and chaſte Princeſs Iſabella Gonzaga. Her conſtancy, becauſe though it were in her power to have her marriage made void by a declaration, which ſhe might eaſily have obtained, yet ſhe would not petition for it, chooſing rather to be ſilent, than to defile her lips. Her modeſty, which appears in this heroical act of chaſtity, having lived above twenty years without being bare-fac'd enough to bluſh at the diſgrace of him, whom all the world reputed her huſband.

(4) Hill. de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. I. pag. 699.

(5) He was not of the Houſe of Rovere, but of that of Feltri, or Montefeltro.

[D] She was powerfully intreated to reſolve upon another match. . . . . But nothing could prevail upon her.] It ſhe was ſorry that her huſband's impotency was known, and nothing but death could ſeparate her from the Duke. His death made her almoſt deſperate; and her grief was very near being mortal to her, literally ſpeaking [E]. Obſerve that ſhe had been married twenty years (c). The exclamations of a Minim, who has commended her, are pardonable, conſidering the ſtory is very uncommon; but yet he might have been a little more ſparing of his flouriſhes, without acting againſt the rules which a good Rhetorician ought to follow. Our Iſabella paſſed the reſt of her life in a glorious widowhood. She was aunt to Eleonora Gonzaga, whom ſhe married with a nephew of Pope Julius II; I mean, with Francis-Mary de la Rovere, who ſucceeded her huſband in the Duchy of Urbino. You may know by this at what time ſhe lived; and if you will read Balthazar Caſtiglione's Courtier, you will ſee her very much commended there,

(c) Taken from Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 697, &c.

It is on this occaſion that Hilarion de Coſte cries aloud, and lifts up his voice like a trumpet, "O the wonderful chaſtity of a woman! cries he (6)! O incredible conſtancy! oh perfect and unexampled virtue! to live thus twenty years with an huſband in the ſame houſe and in the ſame palace. This is truly a pattern of chaſtity, and a ſtrong proof that a virtuous mind has more power than the fleſh and ſenſuality, and that conjugal fidelity and love are ſtronger than the ſenſitive appetite and luſt. How few women are there, who would have continued, I do not ſay, fourteen years, but even fourteen months without publiſhing a ſecret, which ſhe kept, not twenty months, but twenty years, and even till her huſband's death, without having her marriage declared void; ſince, though ſhe were preſſed, importuned, and almoſt forced by a great many powerful perſons, to conſent to a ſeparation from her huſband, and though a thouſand ſtrong arguments were urged to her, ſhe never would agree to it; on the contrary, ſhe always maintained that the defect did not come from him; ſhe was angry with thoſe who aſſerted it, and was very ſorry when the truth came to be known. O moſt faithful and chaſt Princeſs! Let them caſt an eye upon thee, who from a ſenſual inclination, and without reaſon, or with the leaſt pretence, and for the ſlighteſt reaſons, diſſolve marriages made by the agreement of their relations, and publickly ſolemnized at Church, procuring under a falſe pretence I know not what diſpenſations, which will ſerve them for nothing but to lead them to eternal damnation: ſince thou, that wert noble, and ſtill young and beautiful, thou that couldſt lawfully be ſeparated from thy huſband, yet wouldſt ſhew, that thy mind rather than thy body was married." He takes notice afterwards of four ſubjects of admiration in the victory "ſhe gained over herſelf (7). I. By her great conſtancy and virtue, ſhe did not procure a divorce from her huſband, tho' ſhe could do it lawfully. II. Her love for her huſband made her diveſt herſelf of that reaſonable deſire, common to all thoſe who marry, ... of leaving children behind them ... which deſerves ſo much the more to be admired in this great Princeſs, that ſhe knew the direct line of a ſovereign Family would be extinct with her huſband. III. She was ſo prudent as to accompany her ſpouſe wherever he went, that this Prince's defect might not be known. IV. The fourth wonder is that notwithſtanding the great liberty ſhe enjoyed in her high ſtation, and amongſt all the men who converſed with her, yet ſhe kept her virginity entire." The particulars of this fourth wonder are confirmed by Balthazar Caſtiglione; for he obſerves that the Court of Urbino abounded with handſome and witty Noblemen, who ſpent the whole day in ſuch exerciſes as ſuited their condition, and who uſed to go after ſupper into the Ducheſs's chamber, whilſt the Duke was aſleep, he going to bed early becauſe of his infirmities. Erano adunque tutte l'hore del giorno diveſe in honorevoli & piacevoli eſſercitii coſi del corpo, comme dell' animo: ma perche il S. Duca continuamente per la infirmità, dopo cena aſſai per tempo ſe n'andava a dormire, ogn' uno per ordinario, dove era S. Ducheſſa Elizabetta Gonzaga, a quell' hora ſi riduceva (8). i. e. "All the hours of the day were ſpent in honourable and agreeable exerciſes both of body and of mind. But as the Duke, becauſe of his infirmities, went to ſleep ſoon after ſupper, they all uſed to go then where the Ducheſs Elizabeth Gonzaga was." Let us relate what he obſerves with regard to the Duke's infirmities; it gives us room to think that Hilarion de Coſte has followed ſome Hiſtorians, who have too much exaggerated what they relate. Take particular notice of what I am going to obſerve. The Duke was a very handſome man, ſtrong and nimble (9); but at the age of twenty years (10), he became ſo terribly afflicted with the gout, that he could not ſtir. He married no doubt before he was reduced to this condition, it is therefore very probable, that he conſummated his marriage. It is true that the ſame Author tells us, the Ducheſs was urged to ſeparate from her huſband, ſince her marriage was a ſtate of widowhood. Which is a proof, that ſhe was thought to be ſtill a virgin. For an impotency, under which a man comes to labour after the marriage has been conſummated, is not a lawful cauſe of divorce. Non poſſo piu tacere una parola della Signora Ducheſſa noſtra, laquale eſſendo vivuta xv anni in compagnia del marito, comme vedoa, non ſolamente è ſtata conſtante di non paleſar mai queſto a perſona del mondo, ma eſſendo da ſuoi proprii ſtimulata da uſcir di queſta viduità, eleſſie piu preſto patir eſſilio, poverta, & ogni altra ſorte d'infelicita, che accetar quello, che a tutti gli altri parea gran gratia, & proſperità di fortuna: & ſeguitando pur Meſſer Ceſare circa queſto, diſſe la Signora Ducheſſa: parlate d'altro, & non intrate piu in tal propoſito, che aſſai d'altre coſe havete che dire (11). i. e. "I cannot forbear ſaying a word here of our Ducheſs, who having lived fifteen years with her huſband, as a widow, did not only never reveal it to any perſon in the world, but being preſſed by her relations, to go out of that ſtate of widowhood, would rather chooſe to ſuffer baniſhment, poverty, and all other kinds of misfortunes, than accept of a propoſal, which any other woman had thought a great favour, and a gift of fortune. And as Signor Cæſar was going to commend her for it, the Ducheſs ſaid; Speak of ſomething elſe, and do not dwell any longer upon this ſubject, when you have other things enough to ſay." You ſee in theſe Italian words an admirable inſtance of this Lady's modeſty: ſhe could not bear to be praiſed; ſhe turns the converſation another way, when a perſon begins to extol the merit of her continency.

Obſerve that Chriſtoforo Bronzini, who wrote this Lady's Elogium, relates the ſame things, and with the ſame exclamation, as our Minim does. See the Giornata quinta (the fifth day) of his Dialogues della Dignita e Nobilita delle Donne (12) (of the Dignity and Excellency of Women).

[E] Her grief was very near being mortal to her, literally ſpeaking.] Father Hilarion de Coſte "is at a loſs how to give proofs of her love and prudence under her affliction for her huſband's death: for ... as long as he was alive, ſhe never ſhed any tears, ... leſt her affliction being thus outwardly expreſſed ſhould grieve him: but the moment he had given up the ghoſt, ſhe gave herſelf entirely over to grief, and fell on her huſband's corps, crying aloud, Oh, my dear ſpouſe, why do you leave me thus, whither are you going? Having ſaid this, ſhe ſwooned away, without being able to ſay one word more, and remained thus half dead. Some thought her quite dead, becauſe they could not make her come to her ſenſes again, ſo that they all together lamented the death both of the huſband and of the wife. But God did not deſign to afflict them ſo much at once: ſhe recovered herſelf little by little, opening her eyes, which ſhe lifted up towards heaven, then looking on thoſe that ſtood by, ſhe ſaid to them by way of reproach and complaint; Why do you vex me ſo? Why are you ſo cruel to me, that you will not let me follow my moſt honoured Lord and huſband? "Why

(6) Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 700.

(7) Ibid. pag. 700.

(8) Count Balt. Caſtiglione, Il Cortegiano, lib. 1. pag. m. 10.

(9) Non eſſendo ancora il Duca Guido giunto alli xx anni, s'infermo di podagre, lequali con atrociſſimi dolori procedendo, in poco ſpatio di tempo talmente tutti i membri gli impedirono, che ne ſtare in piedi ne mover ſi potea: & coſi reſtò un de i piu belli, & diſpoſti corpi del mondo deformato & guaſto nella ſua verde età. Balt. Caſtiglione, il Cortegiano, lib. 1. pag. 8.

(10) Odaxius, in this Prince's Funeral Oration, ſays it was at the age of 21.

(11) Balt. Caſtil. il Cortog. lib. 3. pag. 460.

(12) This book was printed at Florence in the year 1625, in 4to.

there, and you will find that the Court of Urbino was at that time extremely polite. I ſhall relate what Peter Bembo has ſaid of this Ducheſs [F].

" Why will you not ſuffer me to accompany him in his " death with whom I have paſſed the moſt happy part " of my life? Oh wretched me, that he ſhould be gone, " and I muſt ſtay here! No, no, I cannot endure the " thought of ſtaying, I muſt go after him. As ſoon " as ſhe had thus bewailed her condition, her eyes " burſt out in tears, like two plentiful ſprings, nor " was it poſſible for two days following to bring her " to reaſon; ſhe refuſed all that time to take any " nouriſhment and any reſt, ſaying continually, that " ſhe could not ſurvive her dear ſpouſe (13).

(13) Hilar. de Coſte, Eloges des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 703, 704.

[F] I ſhall relate what Peter Bembo has ſaid of this Ducheſs.] The Author of a Treatiſe intitled De Matrimonio Literati, an cœlibem eſſe an vero nubere conveniat (14); i. e. " Of the marriage of a man of letters; " whether it be proper for him to live ſingle, or " to marry;" mentions the great merit of ſome women, nor does he omit our Iſabella Gonzaga. Quid de Elizabetha Gonzaga? ſays he, quam Bembus ita laudat, ut lapidem eum eſſe dicat, qui non unam ejus ſeſſiunculam omnibus Philoſophorum ambulationibus & diſputationibus anteponat. i. e. " What ſhall I ſay of Iſa- " bella Gonzaga? whom Bembo ſo much commends, " that he even aſſerts, a man muſt be as inſenſible as a " ſtone, who does not prefer one ſhort ſitting with her, " before all the walks and diſputes of the Philoſophers."

(14) It has been reprinted ſeveral times, and has been inſerted in a Collection of ſuch other pieces printed at Urſellis, in the year 1609. You will alſo find it in a book, intitled, Baudii Amores.

GONZAGA (JULIA), Ducheſs of Trajetto and Counteſs of Fondi, was the wife of Veſpaſian Colonna. After her huſband's death ſhe took for her device " an Amaranthus, which the Herbaliſts call Love-Flower, with this motto, non moritura (it " ſhall never die) hinting thereby, that her firſt love ſhould be immortal. The wonder " is, that her huſband was very old, and ſhe in the prime of her age, and was ſo much " celebrated for her beauty, that Soliman, Emperor of the Turks, longed to ſee her. " He ſent therefore Barbaroſſa (or Red-beard) King of Algiers (a), and his Lieute- " nant General, with a powerful army to Fondi, which was the place of her reſidence; " but he did not ſucceed in his deſign, for though Barbaroſſa arrived at night, and " took the City by ſtorm, yet the beautiful and chaſte Julia did not fall into the hands " of this ſavage man. For whether it was that ſhe had notice beforehand of the miſ- " fortune that threatened her, or was ſecretly inſpired by God, ſhe ran away bare-footed " at the firſt noiſe ſhe heard, and to ſecure her honour, expoſed her life to a thouſand " dangers (b)." This Lady has been ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm (c). Thuanus, Francis Billon, and other Authors commend her for her learning, for which the moſt able men in Italy eſteemed her very much (d). The reaſon why ſhe would not marry again is remarkable [A]. It is very doubtful whether ſhe acted the part of a ſtep-mother without being liable to ſome defects incident to that character [B]. We ſhall ſee below how Brantome relates the ſtory of Barbaroſſa [C].

(a) This ſaves me the trouble of obſerving that ſhe lived in the 15th Century.

(b) Taken from the Entretiens d'Ariſte & d'Eugene, pag. m. 458, 459. See alſo Hilarion de Coſte, tom. 2. of the Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, pag. 96, 97.

(c) Convictuſque quod eum ſectariis in Germania & in Italia cum Victoria Columnæ Marchionis Piſcarii vidua, & Julia Gonzaga, lectiſſimis alioqui feminis, de pravitate ſectaria ſuſpectis, amicitiam coluiſſet. Thuanus, lib. 39. circa init. i. e. " Being convicted " of Peſcara, and of having held a friendly correſpondence with the Sectaries in Germany, and in Italy with Victoria Colonna, the widow of the Marquiſs with Julia Gonzaga, two very eminent women, but ſuſpected of hereſy."

(d) Hilar. de Coſte, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, tom. 2. p. 97.

[A] The reaſon why ſhe would not marry again is remarkable.] " After her huſband's death ſhe was court- " ed by the greateſt Lords in Italy, who yet could " not perſuade her to marry again; becauſe, ſaid " ſhe, if the huſband ſhe ſhould take, was good, ſhe " would be in a continual dread to loſe him, and if " he were bad, it would be very grievous to her and " difficult to bear; and that ſince ſhe had had a good " huſband, ſhe would never baniſh from her heart the " love ſhe bore him (1)." It was happy for her that ſhe did not meet with ſome object capable to move her heart; in this caſe her dilemma had been ſoon turned the contrary way. In vain did Dido ſay,

(1) Hilarion de Coſte, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, tom. 2. pag. 97.

Sed mihi vel tellus optem prius ima dehiſcat:
Vel pater omnipotens adigat me fulmine ad umbras,
Pallentes umbras Erebi, noctemque profundam;
Ante, pudor, quàm te violo, aut tua jura reſolvo.
Ille meos, primus qui me ſibi junxit, amores
Abſtulit; ille habeat ſecum, ſervetque ſepulchro (2).

(2) Virgil. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 24.

" But firſt let yawning earth a paſſage rend;
" And let me to the dark abyſs deſcend;
" Firſt let avenging Jove with flames from high
" Drive down this body to the nether ſky,
" Condemn'd with ghoſts in endleſs night to lie
" Before I break the plighted faith I gave:
" No; he who had my vows, ſhall ever have;
" For whom I lov'd on earth, I worſhip in the grave." Dryden.

(3) Quam ſese ore ferens, quam forti pectore & armis. Virgil. Æneid. lib. 4. ver. 11. i. e. " What looks, " what greatneſs of mind, " what courage."

The charms (3) and merit of Æneas had already made a deep impreſſion upon her, and renewed the ancient footſteps (4); ſhe was obliged to ſubmit to a ſecond wedding, and to forget all her fine reſolutions. Julia Gonzaga's dilemma is, generally ſpeaking, a medal which may be turned; for one may ſay, if my ſecond huſband proves bad, I ſhall not fear to loſe him, if he proves good, he will make me very happy. And beſides, they who have loſt a good huſband, may argue thus. I was ſo happy with my firſt huſband, that I will enter again into a ſtate, in which I met with ſo much happineſs. They who loſe a bad huſband may ſay, It is but juſt that I ſhould try whether I ſhall be more happy the ſecond time than the firſt. I muſt not die without endeavouring to get ſomething to make amends for my former unhappineſs.

(4) Agnoſco veteris veſtigia flammæ, ibid. ver. 23. i. e. " Somewhat " I find within, " if not the " ſame, " For like the " ſparkles of my " former flame." Dryden.

[B] It is doubtful whether ſhe acted the part of a ſtep-mother, without being liable to ſome defects incident to that character.] It is a very difficult part; the moſt prudent women can hardly act it well; there is a certain fatality annexed to the character of a ſtep-mother, which makes her very ill-humoured. However it be, the Minim, whom I have already quoted, tells us (5), That Veſpaſian Colonna had by his firſt wife (6) a daughter named Iſabella, whom our Julia, her ſtep-mother, reſolved to marry with Lewis Gonzaga her brother; for which reaſon ſhe oppoſed Pope Clement VII's deſign (who would marry her with Don Hippolyto, his nephew, who was afterwards Cardinal) nor would ſhe comply with the Emperor Charles V's intention, who had ſeized upon Iſabella, in order to marry her with Ferdinand Gonzaga; but our Julia, partly by her courage, and partly by her artifice, compleated her deſign. But did ſhe conſult with the young girl to know her inclination? that is the queſtion. Iſabella Colonna had perhaps better liked the man whom Clement VII offered her, or him, whom the Emperor would have given her, than the perſon whom Julia choſe for her: and is it not acting like a ſtep-mother, thus to force the inclination of a young maiden's heart in an affair of this nature?

(5) Hilarion de Coſte, Vies des Dames illuſtres, tom. 2. pag. 96.

(6) Beatrix the daughter of Signior Piompino. Sanſovino, delle Caſe d'Italia, fol. 93.

[C] We ſhall ſee below how Brantome relates the ſtory of Barbaroſſa.] " There is a ſtory like this, " which was told me in the city of Fondi near Na- " ples, and is commonly known in thoſe parts; it is " very true, and ſtill in the memory of man. It re- " lates to Signora Livia (7) Gonzaga, who married " Aſcanio

(7) He ſhould have ſaid Julia.

GONZAGA (LUCRETIA) was one of the moſt illuſtrious Ladies that lived in the ſixteenth Century. Her ſhining wit, her learning, and her delicate ſtile added a luſtre to her noble birth [A]. The wits of that time could not fail to commend her [B]. She wrote ſuch beautiful letters, that they have been collected with the utmoſt care in order to be publiſhed. I have ſeen the Collection of them that was printed at Venice in the year 1552. We find there that her marriage with John Paul Manfrone was unhappy.

" Aſcanio (8) Colonna. She was in her time reckoned the moſt beautiful Lady in all Italy, and " the reputation of her beauty ſpread as far as the " Eaſt; (this is confirmed by her picture which I " have often ſeen, in which ſhe is drawn in a widow's attire) and as far as Conſtantinople; ſo that " Ariadan Barbaroſſa being made General of the " Grand Seignior's naval army, paſſed for the firſt " time, with great pomp (as it is reported) by the " Faro of Meſſina; and coaſting along Calabria, " laying all waſte before him, and near Naples, he " made an attempt on the City of Fondi, where he " arrived in the night-time, ſo unexpectedly, and on " a ſudden, that having landed two thouſand Turks, " they took the City by ſtorm and eſcalade, and fell " upon the caſtle, where Julia Gonzaga was aſleep " in her bed; ſhe hearing the alarm was ſo ſurpriſed " that ſhe roſe on a ſudden, and had but juſt time " to throw herſelf out of a window in her ſhift, and " to make her eſcape over the mountains ſo ſeaſonably, that the Turks entered her room almoſt the " very moment ſhe left it. It is reported, that Barbaroſſa intended to make a preſent of her to the " Grand Signior, and that this was the only deſign " of his undertaking, ſo that he was almoſt raving " mad, when he knew that he was diſappointed. " But the Lady's misfortune was, that to avoid Scylla " ſhe fell into Charybdis; for in her eſcape ſhe found " herſelf amongſt the vagabonds and banditties of the " Kingdom; ſome of them knew her again, others " did not. You may gueſs whether this nice and " delicate bit, being in the hands and in the power " of thoſe greedy fellows, was not thoroughly handled and taſted by them: ſome perſons do not in " the leaſt queſtion it, though others do. But though " ſhe never ſo much ſwore the contrary, it is impoſ- " ſible to be ieve her: ſuch a beautiful woman could " never eſcape untainted out of the hands of that ſort " of people. Clear ſighted perſons, who have any " ſkill in theſe affairs, and have taſted ſuch morſels, " know what to think of it: and ſome in that country did not ſcruple to ſay it openly. Thus men and " women do eaſily damn themſelves by their oaths; " for the moſt beautiful Queens and Princeſſes would " not be ſpared, no more than other women, if they " happened to be in ſuch a danger, ſince a great " beauty has no defence nor ſafeguard to protect her " in ſuch a caſe; love always exerting its right and " authority without any regard for quality or rank; " yet they, whoſe caſe this has been, think it is e- " nough, if they but declare and ſwear, that their " dignity kept thoſe in awe, who otherwiſe would " have been too free with them: God knows how " true it is (9)." Mr. Varillas (10) has extracted from this book of Brantome all that he relates of Julia Gonzaga's ſtory.

He has been miſtaken with regard to the time; for he places this ſtory under the year 1537, whereas he ſhould have followed Paul Jovius (11), who mentions it under the year 1534.

[A] Her learning . . . . added a luſtre to her noble birth.] There is no learning in her letters, but yet we find in them that ſhe was learned; for ſhe declares in a letter to Robortel, that his Commentaries led her into the true ſenſe of ſeveral obſcure paſſages in Ariſtotle and in the Poet Æſchylus. Egli è gran tempo, chè vi ſono affettionata per i beneficii chi mi ſcnto haver ricevuto dai voſtri divini componimenti, i quali m'hanno illuminato l'intelletto in molti oſcuri luoghi, & di Ariſtotele, & di Eſchilo dove il voſtro nobil ingegno s'è molto affaticato (1). i. e. " I have a long time had " a great affection for you, for the benefit I have received from your divine Commentaries, which have " cleared up my underſtanding with regard to ſeveral " obſcure paſſages in Ariſtotle and in Æſchylus, " which your noble genius has very much laboured to " explain." She had ridiculed Doctor Lewis Picco her couſin becauſe he taught Aſtrology; but when ſhe came to know the great ſervices which Sulpicius Gallus and Pericles had done, the former to the Romans, and the latter to the Greeks by their ſkill in Aſtrology, ſhe would ſtudy that Science, and deſired Lewis Picco to teach it her (2). One of the arts ſhe ſtudied moſt was Rhetoric (3). It appears alſo that ſhe learnt a great deal of Logick from her Maſter Bandel (4), who alſo explained Euripides to her (5).

[B] The Wits of that time could not fail to commend her.] Hortenſio Lando was the perſon who ſung her praiſes moſt zealouſly. He wrote a beautiful Panegyrick on this Lady: ſee the Letter in which ſhe modeſtly thanks him for it (6), and in which ſhe repreſents to him (7), that he had done better to keep his witty conceits and noble expreſſions for the Panegyrick della Signora Marcheſana (8). I obſerve this in order to acquaint the Reader with the name of another very illuſtrious Lady of that age. The ſame Author dedicated to our Lucretia his Dialogue del temperar gli affetti d'ell' animo (9); i. e. " of moderating the paſſi- " ons of the ſoul." There was a great literary correſpondence between them; ſhe wrote above thirty letters to him, which have all been printed. Let us ſay a word of that which we meet with in page 215. Hortenſio Lando is a little cenſured there, becauſe he was exceedingly vexed at his being poor. He is blamed for grieving at a condition, the conveniencies of which are here laid before him. Eſſendo voi perſona dotta, & tanto bene eſperta nei mondani coſi, mi maraviglio che di ſi ſtrana maniera vi attriſtiate per la poverta; quaſi non ſappiate la vita dei poveri eſſer ſimile ad una navigatione preſſo il lito; & quella de ricchi non eſſer differente da coloro, che ſi ritrovano in mare: à gli uni è facile gittar la ſune in terra, & condur la nave à ſicuro luogo, & à gli altri è ſummamente difficile, &c (10). i. e. " I wonder that you, who are a " learned man, and ſo well acquainted with the affairs " of this world, ſhould yet be ſo ſtrangely vexed at " your being poor: as though you did not know, that " a poor man's life is like ſailing near the coaſt; " whereas that of a rich man does not differ from the " condition of them who are in the main ſea; the " former can eaſily throw a cable on ſhore, and bring " their ſhip ſafe into an harbour, whereas the latter " cannot do it but with great difficulty &c." Jerom Ruſcelli was one of this Lady's Panegyriſts, as appears from a Letter ſhe wrote to him, and which begins thus. Inſieme col Panegirico fatto da non ſo cui, in mia commendatione, hò anco letto la bella & proliſſa lettera che per voi ſi è aggiunta; nelle quale, m'havete ritratta col penello della voſtra facondia, tale, quale io doveri eſſere per haver quella perfettione che non hò (11). i. e. " With the Panegyrick written in my commendation " by I do not know whom, I have alſo read the beau- " tiful and long letter, which you had added to it; " and in which you have drawn me with the pencil " of your eloquence ſuch as I ſhould be, if I had the " accompliſhments which I want." See alſo the other Letter ſhe wrote to him (12). Some Memoirs which come from very good hands, give me to underſtand, that " Bandel dedicated one of his Novels to her, it is " the 21ſt of the 2d part; it is there he tells her to- " wards the end, Spero ben toſto darvi del mio il libro " de le mie Stanze tutto compoſto in voſtra lode, ove ve- " derete come io mi ſforzo à farvi immortale. i. e. " I hope to give you very ſoon my Book of Stanza's " all written in your commendation, in which you " ſhall ſee how much I labour to make you immortal." " It is upon thoſe Stanza's that Julius Cæſar Scaliger, " who was Bandel's intimate friend, wrote an " Epigram intitled, De Bandelli amoribus Thuſca " lingua decantatis; i. e. " On Bandel's amours ſung " in the Italian Tongue (13)." The Reader will perhaps be glad to find that Epigram here.

Maxime Phœbigenum, cui Thuſco æqualis Homero
Lydia Mæonio nectare vena fluit:

(8) I have called him Veſpaſian in the text of this Article, and that was his true name.

(9) Brantome, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, p. 282.

(10) Varill. Hiſt. de François I. lib. 8. pag. m. 247, under the year 1537.

(11) Paul. Jovius, Hiſt. lib. 33. fol. m. 255.

(1) Lettre della Signora Lucretia Gonzaga da Gazuolo, pag. 78.

(2) The letter ſhe wrote to him is in pag. 50.

(3) Lettre di Lucretia Gonzaga, pag. 53.

(4) Ibid. pag. 52.

(5) Ibid. pag. 61.

(6) It is in page 30. See alſo, pag. 161.

(7) Molto meglio havreſto voi fatto trapportando nel Panegirico della Sig. Marcheſana tutti i bel concetti, & tutte le ſcelte parole che deſtinaſto al Panegirico compoſto per illuſtrare il mio nome oſcuro. Lettere di L. Gonzaga, pag. 30. i. e. " You had done " much better to " keep for the " Panegyric of " the Seignora " Marcheſana " all your witty " conceits, and " choice expreſ- " ſions, which " you have de- " ſigned to ren- " der my ob- " ſcure name fa- " mous."

(8) It was the Marchioneſs of Padula, of the Houſe of Cordonna. Ib. p. 31.

(9) Ibid. p. 140.

(10) Ibid. p. 215.

(11) Ibid. p. 76.

(12) Ibid. p. 131.

(13) Memoirs communicated by Monſieur de la Monoie.

unhappy. He was a man who was not rich enough to deſerve a woman like her, and ſhe married him with reluctancy when ſhe was not yet fourteen years old (a). Though ſhe did not live with him in all the ſplendor that her quality required, yet ſhe was very eaſy. One cannot meet with more noble maxims of morality, than thoſe which ſhe expreſſed in a letter to a Monk (b), who pitied her for being married to ſo inconſiderable a countryman [C]. Her huſband's conduct grieved and vexed her extremely. He was a brave but haughty man (c), and committed ſome actions for which he did not go unpuniſhed. The Duke of Ferrara had him carried off, and kept him ſeveral years in priſon, where he ſuffered very much (d). He cauſed him to be tried, and it was found that he deſerved to be capitally puniſhed. But yet the Duke was ſo merciful that he would not have him put to death (e). Our Lucretia did all that lay in her power to procure his liberty. She endeavoured to raiſe the Duke of Ferrara's compaſſion by a very moving letter (f): ſhe implored the interceſſion of Paul III (g), of Julius III (h), of the Sacred College, of the Emperor, of the King of France, and of all the other Princes in Chriſtendom. She applied for aſſiſtance to the Celeſtial Court by her prayers, and by thoſe which ſhe cauſed to be offered in all the Convents, and in the other Churches; and when ſhe found that all this was ineffectual, ſhe reſolved to have recourſe to the Grand Signior (i): ſhe wrote him a flattering but ſubmiſſive letter (k), deſiring him to make himſelf maſter of the Caſtle in which her huſband was kept priſoner, without attacking any other Chriſtian country. She had given her moſt humble thanks (l) to the Duke of Ferrara, for his mercy in ſparing the life of a priſoner [D], whom the Judges had ſentenced to death: but ſhe wiſhed that the Duke's mercy had been carried farther ſtill.

(a) See her Letters, pag. 191, and 214.

(b) It was written to F. Bandel, and is in pag. 61.

(c) See Lucretia Gonzaga's Letters, p. 57, 105.

(d) See ibid. pag. 59.

(e) Ibid. pag. 158.

(f) It is in pag. 16.

(g) Pag. 99.

(h) Pag. 101.

(i) See her Letters, pag. 104.

(k) In pag. 257. of her Letters.

(l) Ibid. pag. 158, 159.

Unde tibi æthereos immenſi numinis hauſtus
Largus opum pleno pectore ſpirat amor?
Tantus eras vates, tanta eſt Lucretia. An ipſum
Hoc illi dederas: an dedit illa tibi?
Dum cælo imponis, tranſcendes ſidera. Sic te Dat Dea, tam rari carminis eſſe Deum (14).

That is,

" O you, the greateſt of Phœbus's ſons, whoſe Ly-
" dian vein, equal to that of the Homer of Italy, runs
" with Mæonian Nectar: Whence does plentiful love
" blow to you with a full breath thoſe ætherial
" draughts of the immenſe Deity? You were ſo great
" a Poet; Lucretia is ſo great. Did you make her
" ſo, or did ſhe make you ſo? Whilſt you place her
" in heaven, you will yourſelf riſe above the ſkies.
" Thus this Goddeſs makes you the God of ſo rare a " Poem."

(14) Jul. Cæſar Scaliger, in Farragine, pag. 174 primæ partis Poematum, edit. 1591.

See in the Nymphs of the ſame Author the piece intitled, Pro Diva Lucretia Gonzaga Pyrrhi filia canit Talariſca (15); and in the Heroines the Epigram intitled Lucretia Pyrrhi Gonzagæ F. (16). But above all ſee the Rime di diverſi Autori in lode di donna Lucretia Gonzaga, i. e. " Poems of ſeveral Authors in praiſe of Lu-
" cretia Gonzaga;" printed at Bologna in the year 1565 in 4to. Let us tranſcribe here another paſſage from Bandel (17); it acquaints us with the name of our Lucretia's mother, and with ſome other particulars. He dedicates the LVIIth Novel of the firſt part to her, and ſpeaks thus. A la molto illuſt. e vertuoſa Heroina la S. Iſabella Gonzaga di Poccino. i. e. " To the moſt
" illuſtrious and virtuous Lady Iſabella Gonzaga of " Poccino." Eſſendo troppo al mondo manifeſto il debito e obligo che io ho a la felice e honorata memoria del valoroſo S. Pirro Gonzaga, e de la gentiliſſima S. Camilla Bentivoglia, voſtri honoratiſſimi Padre e madre che tanto m'amavano, e tutto il di con nuovi beneficii m'obligavano, e mentre viſſero, furono da me (ſecondo le deboliſſime forze mie) ſempre tenuti ni quella riverenza che io ſeppi la maggiore, come ne le Stanze mie ſi vederà che io in lode ho compoſte de la voſtra nobiliſſima Sorella dal mondo riverita, e da me ſanctiſſimamente amata, la Signora Lucretia, le quali in breve ſaranno publicate, ove ancora vederete il nome voſtro eſſere celebrato. i. e. " The " world knows perfectly well how much I am indebt-
" ed and obliged to the happy and honourable me" mory of the valiant Signor Peter Gonzaga, and of " the noble Signora Camilla Bentivoglio, your moſt ho" noured father and mother, who loved me ſo much,
" and daily loaded me with new favours, for whom
" as long as they lived I had the greateſt reſpect,
" according to my little power, as may be ſeen in
" my Stanzas, which I have compoſed in praiſe of " your ſiſter, who is reſpected by the world, and was " always moſt ſacredly beloved by me; I mean Lu-
" cretia Gonzaga. Theſe Stanza's will ſoon be publiſh-
" ed, where you will again ſee your name celebrated."

(15) It is in pag. 278. of the 1ſt Part.

(16) It is in pag. 377 of the ſame Part.

(17) It has been communicated to me by Monſieur de la Monoie.

[C] She was pitied for being married to ſo inconſiderable a countryman.] Thus, I think, I may tranſlate the following Italian words: Ho inteſo che la riverenza voſtra molto ſie maravigliata che i miei maggiori mi maritaſſero mai in huomo di ſi poche facultà, il quale, m'haveſſe à condurre in una poco amena villuccia, & farmi habitare in una torre poco degli Avoli onde ne ſono ſecondo la carne diſceſa; & per quanto appare dalle voſtre ſcritte à mia Sorella, aſſai ve ne doleſte (18). i. e. " I underſtand that you wonder my relations ſhould
" have married me to a man, who has ſuch a ſmall
" eſtate, and who was to conduct me into a little and
" unpleaſant town, and to make me live in a Tower
" unworthy of the anceſtors, from whom I am deſ-
" cended according to the fleſh; and it appears by " your Letter to my ſiſter, that you very much grieve
" at it." But that the Reader may not have falſe notions, I muſt obſerve that John Paul Manfrone was a much more conſiderable man, than this Monk imagined. We find in one of his wife's Letters, that he had been raiſed to honourable poſts in the Venetian Army, and had built ſtately palaces. Read what follows, you will find there ſome other particulars of his Life. Ve ne ſupplica tutto il territorio Vicentino, donde egli ne trahe l'origine; ve ne priega la Citta di Padoua, dove egli fanciullo eſſendo diligentemente ſtudio; ve ne priega il Poleſino, dove molti anni pratticò, & palazzi, & giardini con grande arte edificò; ve ne priega tutte il diſtretto Mantouano, dove ſpoeſandomi ben fanciulla, ſi imparentò: ve ne priega finalmente tutto il Senato Vinitiano, il qual hà ſin dalle faſcie per condottiere & fedelmente & honoratamente ſempre ſervito (19). i. e. " The whole Territory of the " Vicentine whence he originally came, humbly
" ſupplicates you; the city of Padua, where he ſtudied
" diligently in his younger years, prays you; the " Poleſine, where he lived many years, and where he " built ſtately palaces, and made noble gardens, prays
" you; the whole diſtrict of the Mantuano, where by " marrying me when I was very young, he became
" my relation, prays you; laſtly the whole Senate of " Venice, which he ſerved at the head of their ar" mies from his cradle, very faithfully and honoura-
" bly, prays you." Theſe are the arguments, which his wife urges to perſuade Pope Paul III to intercede for him.

(18) Lettere di L. Gonzaga, pag. 61.

(19) Ibid. pag. 100, 101.

[D] She gave thanks to the Duke of Ferrara for his mercy in ſparing the life of a priſoner, whom the Judges had ſentenced to death.] In order to be well acquainted with all the particulars of this trial, you muſt ſee the Hiſtory which Anthony Braſavolus (20) publiſh'd of it. We find in the Epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, that the three firſt Books of a volume written on phyſical ſubjects by Braſavolus, contained, Hiſtoriam capti & ſupplicio afficiendi Pauli Manfroni propter inſidias adverſus Ducem, & quomodo Dux ei vitam donaverit, ſed in carcere retinuerit (21). i. e. " The Hiſtory of Paul Man-
" frone's being taken and ſentenc'd to death, for a con-
" ſpiracy againſt the Duke; giving an account how
" the Duke ſaved his life, but kept him in priſon."

(20) An illuſtrious Phyſician of Ferrara.

(21) Epitome Bibliotb. Geſneri, pag. 65.

ſtill. Her huſband was not ſet at liberty; ſhe was not permitted to viſit him; they could only write to each other (m); and this was not enough for her; that is the reaſon why ſhe left no ſtone unturned to have him releaſed; all the pains ſhe took proved unſucceſsful; he died in priſon (n), having ſhewed ſuch an impatience under his misfortunes, as made people judge he had loſt his ſenſes (o). The anſwer his widow made to thoſe, who propoſed her to marry again, deſerves to be admired [E]. Of the four children ſhe had had (p), there were but two daughters left (q), whom ſhe put in Nunneries (r). All that came (m) Ibid. pag. 156.

(n) Ibid. pag. 221, &c.

(o) Ibid. pag. 208.

(p) Ibid. pag. 100, 155.

(q) Ibid. pag. 151.

(r) Ibid. pag. 141.

[E] The anſwer ſhe made to thoſe, who propoſed to her to marry again, deſerves to be admired.] I own that they did not obſerve the Decorum; they were too much in haſte; they made the propoſal to her before her huſband had been buried one month. The moſt wanton widows, the moſt eager after marriage would ſhew ſome indignation to thoſe, who would ſo ſoon mention a ſecond huſband to them. Decency, cuſtom, and the uſual ſtyle of converſation require, that a widow ſhould ſeem for ſome time to be very much afflicted, and averſe from a ſecond wedding; and as they, who would think to make themſelves agreeable by too haſtily propoſing a new match, would thereby betray an ill opinion of a widow's continence, it is fit that ſhe ſhould anſwer them with ſome marks of anger. I confeſs therefore, that the perſons who were ſo forward to propoſe a ſecond huſband to our Lucretia Gonzaga, did not well obſerve the uſual formalities. But I find ſomething in her anſwer, which is very much to her honour, and which is not in the leaſt like the artful language of la Fontaine's young widow (22). Appena hò raſciutto le lagrime che giorno è notte mi ſono con larghiſſima vena piovute da gli occhi: à fatica hò poſto termine ai ſinghiozzi & ai ſoſpiri: ne anche è compiuto il menſe che l'infelice mio conſorte è ſtato ſepolto, & voi gia mi parlate di rimaritare? Non ſapete voi caſta non eſſer mai ſtata iſtimata, chi due fiate ſi è maritata? Didone anchora preſſo di Virgilio, chiama ſotto nome di colpa le ſeconde nozze, & voi con tanta inſtanza mi ci invitate? nò nò, io non voglio piu ſentire de ſi fatti cordogli; ne altro marito intendo piu di volere che GIESU CHRISTO (23). i. e. "I have hardly dried up the tears, "which day and night run from my eyes in large "ſtreams: hardly have I put an end to my ſobs and "ſighs; it is not yet a month ſince my poor huſband "is buried; and you propoſe to me already to marry a-"gain? Do not you know that a woman was never "reckoned chaſte who was twice married? Even Dido "in Virgil calls a ſecond wedding a crime, and you "would ſo earneſtly perſuade me to it? No, no; I "will not expoſe myſelf to ſuch vexation again; I "deſign to have no other huſband but JESUS CHRIST." The reſt of the Letter treats only of the Reſolution ſhe had taken, to dedicate herſelf for the future entirely to Jeſus Chriſt as to her only huſband. There is ſome exaggeration in our Lucretia's aſſertion that a woman who marries again was never reckoned chaſte; but yet it is certain that they who would not take a ſecond huſband, and led a blameleſs life in a ſtate of widowhood, have always been more admired. We have ſeen juſt now what our widow anſwered to Signor Orſola Pellegrini who adviſed her to marry again; who I ſay, gave her that advice before her huſband had been one month in his grave. Let us ſee now, what anſwer ſhe made to Adriano Trivulzo, who had obſerved the Decorum much better: for his advice was not given till towards the end of the firſt year of her widowhood. Lucretia declares to him, that ſhe had been ſo unhappy with her firſt huſband, that ſhe found it very ſtrange that people would perſuade her to put herſelf again under the conjugal yoke, from which God had delivered her. I would have you to know, ſays he, that I would not put my ſelf under it again, though I were ſure to meet with an huſband wiſer than Lælius, handſomer than Nireus, and as rich as Craſſus. But it will be better to tranſcribe her own words (24). Non mi poſſo veramente penſare che fantaſia vi ſia venuta in capo, di procacciarmi marito, non eſſendo anchora conſunto il cadavero di chi già prima à ſe di legitimo nodo me legò, il quale mi hà fatto ſentire tanti affanni, che ſe divina forza non mi haveſſe aitata, non haurei potuto mai reſiſtere à tanti guai; IDDIO finalmante mi hà reſtituito quella libertà, che m'era ſtata occupata della fraterna voluntà, dandomi marito contra mia voglia: & voi, non ſo da qual ſpirito guidata, cercate di condurmi un' altra fiata ſotto 'l marital giogo: ponete pur il voſtro core in pace, & penſate ad altro; che non ritoglierei marito s'egli fuſſe piu ſavio di quel Lelio, che hebbe el titulo del ſavio, s'egli fuſſe piu bello di Nireo, & s'egli poſſedeſſe le facultà di Craſſo. i. e. "I cannot imagine what fancy "came into your head, to look for an huſband for me, "when the corps of him is not yet reduced to duſt, "who was formerly united to me by a lawful tie, and "who made me undergo ſo many vexations, that if "God had not aſſiſted me with his grace, I ſhould "never have been able to go through ſuch afflictions. "At laſt God reſtored me that liberty which was "taken from me by my brother's will, when he gave "me an huſband againſt my conſent: and you, actuated "by I know not what manner of ſpirit, endeavour "to put me a ſecond time under the conjugal "yoke: Reſt ſatisfied as to that; and be perſuaded "that I would not take a ſecond huſband, though "he were wiſer than Lelius, who was ſurnamed the "wiſe; though he were handſomer than Nireus; and "had all the eſtate of Craſſus." We have here a widow very different from la Fontaine's. She ſpeaks at the year's end as ſhe did the firſt day; we cannot therefore apply to her theſe four lines.

Entre la veuve d'une année
Et la veuve d'une journée
La difference eſt grande. On ne croiroit jamais Que ce fut la même perſonne (25).

That is,

"A year after her huſband's death a widow differs "very much from what ſhe was the firſt day: one "would never think her to be the ſame perſon."

(22) Thus Monſ. de la Fontaine has intitled the 21ſt Fable of his 6th book, page 226. of the 2d vol. of the Paris edition 1678.

(23) Lucretia Gonzaga, Letters, pag. 214.

(24) Ibid. pag. 213.

(25) La Fontaine, Fable 21. of the 6th book.

I think my ſelf under an obligation to ſoften a little the cenſure I have paſſed on this Lady's thought, when I obſerved that there was ſome exaggeration in her expreſſions. This exaggeration may be excuſed if we ſuppoſe that our Lucretia admitted St. Jerom's maxims with a little too much veneration for him. The moſt moderate Criticks obſerve, that this great Saint has run upon extremes with regard to this ſubject. Here follows a paſſage from Monſieur Daillé (26). I omit what he ſcornfully obſerves at every turn both againſt marriage in general, and particularly againſt ſecond marriages: he uſes ſometimes ſuch hard expreſſions, that after we have endeavoured to ſoften and explain them by all the obſervations, which he himſelf hints to us in the Epiſtle he wrote to Pammachius upon this ſubject, it ſeems yet impoſſible not to take his words in Tertullian's ſenſe, which has been condemned by the Church, as inconſiſtent with the dignity of marriage, and with the authority of the holy Scripture. For inſtance with what honey or ſugar could we ſweeten what he aſſerts in his Letter to a Lady named Furia? that* ſhe will not be ſo much tormented for continuing a widow, as ſhe will be deteſted if ſhe marries again; not being able though a Chriſtian to practice what even heathen women have obſerved: a notion which he repeats again in the next Epiſtle, where he endeavours to perſuade Ageruchia to the ſame deſign†, making uſe on this ſubject of merry indecent compariſons, applying to thoſe who marry again, the proverb, which St. Peter quotes on another occaſion: The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the ſow that was waſhed, to her wallowing in the mire. Is not this placing expreſly ſecond marriages in the ſame rank with lewd and polluted actions? If you have a mind to know more exactly what regards the chaſtity which St. Jerom aſcribes to Furia's female-anceſtors, read the article of CAMILLUS (27). Let us add, that the virtuous Lucretia Gonzaga had been dazzled by the brightneſs of the glory, which even amongſt the Heathens thoſe women acquired, who did not marry a ſecond time. Being thus dazzled, ſhe imagined that they who took a ſecond huſband were not eſteemed very chaſte. She had read no doubt the words which I ſhall quote by and by from an heathen Author,

COLLECTIONS concerning ſecond weddings.

(26) Daillé, de l'Emploi des Peres, lib. 2. ch. 4. pag. m. 381.

* Hieron. Ep. 10. ad Furiam T. 1. p. 89. D. &c. 101. C. 3. non tam laudanda ſi vidua perſeveres, quam execranda, ſi id Chriſtiana non ſerves, quod per tanta ſæcula Gentiles fœminæ cuſtodierunt. & mox. p. 90. Canis reverſus ad vomitum, & ſus lota ad volutabrum luti.

† Id. Ep. 11. ad Ageruch. tom. 1. p. 101. C. 101. Hæc brevi ſermone perſtrinxi, ut oſtendam adoleſcentulam meam non præſtare monogamiam generi ſuo, ſed reddere, nec tam laudandam eſſe ſi tribuat, quam omnibus execrandam ſi negare tentaverit.

(27) Remark [F].

came from her pen was ſo much eſteemed, that a collection was made even of the notes ſhe wrote to her ſervants [F]; you will meet with ſeveral of thoſe notes in the edition of Author, who tells us that a crown of chaſtity was decreed to the women who had had but one huſband, whence it appears, that a ſecond marriage was looked upon as a kind of diſſoluteneſs. Quæ uno contentæ matrimonio fuerant, corona pudicitiæ honorabantur. Exiſtimabant enim eum præcipuè matronæ ſincera fide incorruptum eſſe animum, qui poſt depoſitæ virginitatis cubile in publicum egredi neſciret: multorum matrimoniorum experientiam, quaſi illegitimæ (28) cujuſdam intemperantiæ ſignum eſſe credentes (29). i. e. "They who "were ſatisfied with one huſband only, were honour- "ed with the crown of chaſtity. For it was thought "a true ſign of an uncorrupt heart and true fidelity, "when a matron would not change that chaſte § "bed, in which ſhe loſt her virginity: whereas to "marry ſeveral times was looked upon as a proof "of an unlawful intemperance." I imagine alſo that ſhe had read in Tertullian the privileges which the Heathens granted to the women who had been married but once. Monogamia apud Ethnicos in ſummo honore eſt; ut & virginibus nubentibus, univira pronuba adhibeatur, & ſic auſpicii initium eſt. Item in quibuſdam ſolemnibus & auſpiciis, ut prior ſit univiræ locus. Certe Flaminia non niſi univira eſt. i. e. "The "Heathens have had a great reſpect for thoſe who "married but once: ſo that when virgins married, "none but a woman who had had but one huſband "could preſide over the nuptials. And in ſome ſo- "lemn feſtivals and in the Auſpicia, a woman who was "but once married was preferred before any other: and "indeed none but ſuch a woman was ſuffered to aſſiſt the "Flamen's wife in the ſacerdotal functions." Lipſius quotes this paſſage of Tertullian in his Commentary on that place of Tacitus, where he obſerves that Pollio's daughter was preferred before Fonteius Agrippa's to be a veſtal, for this reaſon only that her mother had had but one huſband. Prælata eſt Pollionis filia non ob aliud quam quod mater ejus in eodem conjugio manebat. Nam Agrippa diſcidio domum imminuerat (30). Lipſius does not relate all the privileges which Tertullian mentions. He does not obſerve that none but monogam (31) women could put the Crown on the head of the goddeſs Fortune (32). I do not mention the epitaphs, in which the epithet univira was carefully ſet down in thoſe womens honour who did not marry again. It is a proof that their conduct was thought worthy to be immortalized. Libanius's exclamation hints to us that this conduct was admired amongſt other reaſons, becauſe there were but few inſtances of it. This Sophiſt hearing that St. Chryſoſtom's mother was forty years old, and had been twenty years a widow, cried out, Good Lord! what women do we meet with amongſt the Chriſtians (33)!

The Author of the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres has obſerved ſomewhere, that a certain commendation which had been made of marriage, was grounded on ſuch arguments as proved too much, and were inconſiſtent with a notion that has been very common even amongſt thoſe, who for political reaſons made celibacy in a manner diſgraceful. This notion is, that a widow who does not marry again, is more eſteemed, all the other circumſtances being alike on both ſides, than a widow who marries again. Though we had not an infinite number of proofs of this, the words which Virgil makes Dido ſay would alone be ſufficient to acquaint us with the opinion of the Ancients in this reſpect. Æneid. 4. 28.)

Ille meos primus qui me ſibi junxit, amores
Abſtulit. Ille habeat ſecum ſervetque ſepulcro.

"He who had my vows, ſhall ever have;
"For whom I lov'd on earth, I worſhip in the grave."
Dryden.

The mens ſecond marriages are not attended with ſuch diſgraceful notions; I confeſs it; but yet it is certain, that the widowers who married again were formerly and are ſtill liable to eccleſiaſtical cenſures; and if we may believe the learned Civilian, who wrote the Rights of the Queen, the Devolution, which is in uſe in ſome countries, has been eſtabliſhed for no other reaſon but to reſtrain the incontinency of widowers, and to prevent their marrying again, to the great prejudice of the children they had by their firſt wife (34). What he obſerves of Dido was not unknown to the illuſtrious Lady, who is the ſubject of this Article. I do not know whether ſhe had read the paſſage from Pauſanias, which I have quoted in the article GORGOPHONE, or the reaſons, which Plutarch mentions, why a virgin's wedding was never celebrated at Rome on a holiday, nor a widow's on a working-day. According to Varro the foundation of this cuſtom was, that we muſt never do any thing againſt our will on a holiday (35): now, adds he, a widow is pleaſed when ſhe marries, but a maiden grieves (36). This thought would be unworthy of that learned man, if we were to take it literally; we muſt therefore ſuppoſe that he ſpeaks only of outward appearances. His meaning is, no doubt, that as holidays are deſigned for public rejoicings, every one muſt appear with a joyful and pleaſed countenance during thoſe ſolemn feſtivals. Since therefore decency requires that maidens ſhould appear ſad and dull on their wedding day (37), and ſince the widows are not obliged to this diſſimulation, maidens are not married on holydays, &c. Let us mention another reaſon, alledged by Plutarch. He obſerves, that marriage being honourable to virgins, but a diſgrace to widows, the nuptials of the former ought to be celebrated before a great many perſons: this is glorious to the bride: on the contrary widows ought to wiſh, that their nuptials might be celebrated only before a few perſons; thisis the reaſon why they chooſe a day when people are drawn off to other public ſights. Ἢ μᾶλλον ὅτι ταῖς μὲν παρθένοις, καλὸν μὴ ὀλίγων, ταῖς δὲ χήραις αἰσχρὸν πολλῶν ὄντων γαμεῖσθαι; ζηλωτὸς γὰρ ὁ πρώτῳ γάμῳ, ὁ δὲ δευτέρῳ ἀπευκταῖος· αἰσχύνονται γὰρ ἂν ζώντων τῶν προτέρων ἑτέρους λαμβάνουσι, δύρονται δὲ ἂν ἀποθανόντων· ὅθεν ἡσυχίᾳ χαίρουσι μᾶλλον ἢ θορύβοις καὶ προπομπαῖς· αἱ δὲ ἑορταὶ πιέζουσι τοὺς πολλοὺς, ὥστε τοῖς τοιούτοις μὴ σχολάζειν. i. e. "Or rather becauſe it is glorious "for maidens but ſhameful for widows to marry in the "preſence of a great many perſons; for the nuptials of "the former are deſirable; but thoſe of the latter are to "be avoided. For a woman is aſhamed to marry again, "if her firſt husband be ſtill alive; or ſhe marries with "grief, if he be dead. Therefore widows chooſe to "marry with ſecrecy, rather than with pomp, and be- "fore a crowd of people: now ſolemn feſtivals call "the multitude to other places, ſo that they cannot "aſſiſt at weddings (38)." I thought it neceſſary to tranſcribe all Plutarch's words, becauſe as I gave only the ſubſtance of them in French, I did not well repreſent the whole ſtrength of his expreſſions, nor did I relate all the circumſtances he mentions, by which it appears how little a woman was eſteemed, when ſhe married a ſecond time. If you add to this the anſwers which ſome illuſtrious ladies made, when it was propoſed to them to take a ſecond husband (39), you will eaſily excuſe the exaggeration which ſeems to be in our Lucretia's words.

Remember the anſwer of another lady of the houſe of Gonzaga (40)

[F] A collection was made even of the notes ſhe wrote to her Servants.] They did not omit even what ſhe wrote to her footman to chide him becauſe he did not readily obey dame Lucy, who was her houſe-keeper (41). They did not omit even what ſhe wrote to this ſame Lucy to forbid her to be ſo ſaving, and to command her to whip an undutiful ſervant maid till the blood run. Se Livia non vi è obediente alzatele in capo i drappi & datelene tante che le carni ſi facciano livide & il ſangue le ſcorra fino alle calcagna (42). i. e. "If Livia will not be o- "bedient, turn up her coats, and whip her till her fleſh "be black and blew, and the blood run down to her "heels." I do not know whether Monſieur Montrueil pretended to follow this example when he put into the collection of his letters what he wrote to his butcher (43); but I am of opinion that this kind of our Lucretia's notes might very well have been ſuppreſſed without any injury to her reputation. But I think quite otherwiſe of thoſe notes, by which it appears that ſhe took great care to provide husbands for her maid ſervants.

(28) The beſt manuſcripts have legitimæ.

(29) Valerius Maximus, lib. 2. cap. 1. num. 3.

§ In our edition of Valerius Maximus, which is of Francfort with the Notes of Stephen Pighius and Chriſtopher Colerus, we read Qui depoſitæ virginitatis cubile pudicum &c. which reading appearing to us the moſt probable we have followed it in our tranſlation.

(30) Tacit. Ann. lib. 2. cap. 86.

(31) That is to ſay who had had but one huſband.

(32) Fortunæ muliebri coronam non imponebat niſi univira. Tertullian.

(33) Βαΐαι, ἔφη, ἵνα παρὰ Χριστιανοῖς γυναῖκες ἦσι. Chryſoſt. Orat. ad viduam juniorem.

(34) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Sept. 1685, Art. 3. pag. 968, 969.

(35) Ἑορτὴ μηθὲν λυπουμένους ποιεῖν μηδὲ πρὸς ἀνάγκην. i. e. "We muſt not "do any thing "with grief, or "againſt our "will on an "holiday." Plut. in Quæſt. Roman. pag. 289. A.

(36) Λυπουμένας μὲν αἱ παρθένοι γαμοῦνται, χαίρουσαι δὲ γυναῖκες. i. e. "Virgins marry "with grief, "widows with "pleaſure." Idem, ibid.

(37) This was no doubt the cuſtom at Rome, as it is ſtill in ſeveral countries.

(38) Plut. in Quæſt. Roman. pag. 289. A.

(39) See the Remark [F] of the article PORCIA.

(40) See the article GONZAGA (Julia) quotation (1).

(41) This Letter is in pag. 226. See alſo what ſhe wrote to her Butler, pag. 222.

(42) Ibid. pag. 227.

(43) See the article PAYS. remark [B].

of her Letters: you will alſo meet there with a great many proofs of her virtue and piety. The reproofs ſhe made to ſome lewd, covetous, or haughty perſons, abound with good ſenſe [G], and do not leſs deſerve to be read, than thoſe ſhe addreſſed to a Prieſt, who indulged himſelf in the pleaſures of love [H]. One may alſo be very much edified by reading what ſhe wrote to a mother, who wanted to be comforted becauſe ſhe could not perſuade her daughter to chooſe rather to be a Nun than to marry (5): ſhe repreſented

(5) Ibid. pag. 34, 35.

vants. This is a circumſtance very honourable to her: It is one of the good Qualities which a great lady ought to have; and at the ſame time it is a virtue rarely to be met with amongſt perſons of a high rank; for if a lady is not well waited upon, ſhe diſmiſſes her ſervants, chamber maids, &c. without any reward. And if they ſerve her well, ſhe keeps them as long as ſhe can, without minding to get them married, which would deprive her of their good and faithful ſervices. There are no perſons more inexcuſable in this reſpect than ladies of a high rank, who have a great number of attendants; for they can know very eaſily by the great familiarity there is between their man and maid ſervants, that they could not do them a greater kindneſs than to marry them together. The greateſt carefulneſs of the miſtreſſes, their ſeverity, their exhortations, their reproofs, can never prevent the familiarity and private meetings of their Servants, nor another more free communication between them, the conſequences of which often break out in a very ſcandalous manner. This ſhews us moſt evidently what a perſon ought to do in order to reward the ſervices of his ſervants. Let us therefore blame thoſe Ladies, who do not follow our Lucretias's example, and let us commend her for her affection and kindneſs towards the perſons of her ſex, who waited upon her. She was ſo kind as to write with her own hand to Cornelia Giannoti that ſhe had found a young, rich, and handſom husband for her: She gave her an exact account of all his good qualities; ſhe told her that he was very modeſt in his diſcourſes (44), had a great deal of wit, was polite in his manners, induſtrious, grave, civil, &c. Thus much with regard to his mind; ſhe did not omit what related to the body: She even entered into a very particular account in that reſpect. Vengo hora alle qualità corporali, ſaid ſhe, lequai ſonomi parute degne di contemplatione percioche egli è piu toſto robuſto, che dilicato, non molto grande, ma thoroſo, d'occhio vivaciſſimo; di largo petto; di fianco rotundo; di gamba ſuelta, di fronte ampia; di capo tondo, & ricciuto, ne aggiugne al ventеſimo anno (per quanto ſi dice) (45). i. e. "I come "now to the qualities of his body, which appeared to "me worthy to be obſerved. He is rather ſtrong than "weak, not very tall but well ſhaped; he has a very "briſk eye, a wide breaſt, a round waſte, a ſtrait leg, "a broad forehead, a round head, a curled hair; and "he is not yet twenty, (according to what is ſaid)." All this ſhews, that ſhe had choſen like a good miſtreſs and a good friend. At another time having met with a very good match for one of her women, ſhe wrote the good news immediately to her, and exhorted her on the one hand to give thanks to God, and on the other, to keep herſelf clean and neat, that her gallant, who was to come and ſee her, might not take her for the Cook-maid. Rallegrati Giulia; & alza le mani al cielo, poi che mentre ſon ſtata alla fera di Rovigo; ti hò trovato un marito di tal qualita che ogn'uno che lo conoſce lo giudica laborioſo . . . . ponti adunque in ordine, percioche io penſo ch' egli ſe ne verra con noi alla Fratta; fache non ti retrovi con i capelli ſcarmigliati; col viſo tinto; ò con le mani impaſtricciate come ſe tu fuſſi la cuoca (46). i. e. "Rejoice, Julia, and lift up your hands "to heaven: whilſt I was at the fair of Rovigo *, "I met with ſuch an huſband for you, that all they, "who know him, judge him to be a very laborious "man, . . . dreſs yourſelf therefore neatly, for I imagine that he will come with us to Fratta †: take "care that he do not find you with your hair looſe "about your head, with a dirty face, and with clammy hands, as though you were the Cook." She did the ſame kindneſs to one of her ſiſter's women (47).

(44) Dalla ſua bucca non uſci mai parola (non dico vergognoſa) ma ne pur leggiera ò licentioſa. i. e. "He never dropt "a word (I do "not ſay ob- "ſcene) but even "indiſcreet or "too free. Lettere di Gonzaga, pag. 221.

(45) Ibid.

(46) Ibid. pag. 143.

* A City in the Commonwealth of Venice.

† A town in the State of the Church in Italy.

(47) Lettere di Gonzaga, pag. 143.

[G] The reproofs ſhe gave to ſome lewd, covetous or haughty perſons, abound with good ſenſe.] It is worth while reading what ſhe wrote to a perſon of her ſex, who pretended to excuſe her diſſoluteneſs by alledging that it was in vain to reſiſt (48). Our Lucretia adviſed her amongſt other things, to eat but little, not to ſleep long, to avoid idleneſs, to fly from all too frree converſations, to forbear lawful pleaſures, to ſtudy the holy Scripture, and to apply herſelf to prayers. I do not wonder, ſays ſhe to her, that you have not the ſtrength to deprive yourſelf of ſenſual pleaſures: for I do not find that you take any care to avoid thoſe things, which may prompt you to laſciviouſneſs. The temptations of the fleſh are like Sirens; to be free from them we muſt not come near them (49). Non ti vego porre alcuna diligenza per ſchivar quelle coſe che alla libidine incitar ti poſſono, & e bon raggione che CHI AMA IL PERICOLO PERISCA NEL PERICOLO. Sono le tentationi carnali ſimili alle Sirene, delli quali pochi ne ſcampano ſe non ſi allontanana (50). i. e. "I do not ſee that you take the leaſt "care to avoid thoſe things, which may prompt you "to laſciviouſneſs: and it is very truly ſaid, that who "loves danger periſhes in the danger. The temptations "of the fleſh are like Sirens, &c." We muſt here obſerve by the by, a very common miſtake: men complain that they are not able to reſiſt ſome temptations, though they ſtrive againſt them, they ſay, as much as lies in their power. But is it ſtriving againſt them with all one's power, to feed upon the moſt delicate meet, to viſit all ſorts of people, to hunt after the moſt agreeable companies &c. It is ſo eaſy to go beyond the bounds that ſeparate lawful pleaſures? from thoſe that are forbidden, that one cannot believe a perſon labours ſincerely to lead a virtuous life, who does not deprive himſelf of ſeveral innocent conveniencies. Raffrenati etiandio dai liciti piaceri (51), wean yourſelf alſo from lawful pleaſures, muſt we ſay to voluptuous men, as it was ſaid to the diſſolute woman whom I mention here. This lewd woman had a ſiſter who led the ſame life; our Lucretia wrote to her a long Letter (52), in which ſhe urged the ſtrongeſt reaſons to reclaim this creature. It is impoſſible to write with more ſtrength and eloquence againſt this brutiſh vice than ſhe does. She is not leſs eloquent when ſhe reproves an old ſinner, and turns him into ridicule. Oh bella coſa, che per tutta la città voſtra ſi dica, che non vi poſſitate per vechiezza che vi habbia ſovragiunto diſtogliere dallo libidinoſe ſchifezze, ... Fra tutti i moſtri, niuna coſa è piu monſtruoſa di un vecchio libidinoſo. Contemplate almeno allo ſpecchio i canuti capegli, la canuta barba, la fronte rugoſa, & la faccia ſimigliante ad un cadavero (53). i. e. "O the fine thing that is repeated all "over your City, that you, though you be very old, "cannot yet renounce your lewdneſs. Of all the "monſters none is more monſtrous than an old lecher. "Pray behold in the looking-glaſs thoſe grey hairs, "that grey beard, that wrinkled fore-head, and that "face which looks like a dead corps." What ſhe wrote to a man who far from meeting in the married ſtate with a cure of his diſſoluteneſs, was become more laſcivious ſtill, is not leſs ſtrong (54). If ſhe had a mind to reprove all the perſons, who neither by old age nor by marriage can be cured of their intemperance, ſhe muſt have written more Letters than could be contained in two volumes in folio. As for the covetous or haughty perſons, whom ſhe endeavoured to reclaim, ſee the pages I quote in the margin (55).

(49) Compare this with what is obſerved in the article FONTEVRAUD, remark [M] and [N].

(50) Lettere di L. Gonzaga, pag. 293.

(51) Ibid.

(52) Ibid. pag. 294, &c. See what ſhe wrote to other lewd women, p. 128, 166.

(53) Lettere di L. Gonzaga, pag. 298.

(54) Io mi credevo, che voi vi foſte maritato, perche il matrimonio vi haveſſe ad eſſere il rifuggio della voſtra incontinenza: ma per quanto s'intende, gli vi è piu toſto ſtato un ſprone, & uno incitamento alla luſſuria. Ibid. pag. 299.

(55) Ibid. pag. 29, 129, 174, 232, 304.

(56) Ibid. pag. 297.

[H] And do not leſs deſerve to be read than thoſe ſhe addreſſed to a prieſt, who indulged himſelf in the pleaſures of love.] She ſpeaks to him after this manner (56). Egli è pur forza che pospoſto ogni rispetto, io vi ammoniſca, & vi faccia rauvedere dei voſtri ſporchi falli, voi ſacerdote d' IDDIO, tutto conſacrato alle coſe divine, non vi vergognerete toccare la putrida carne di una meretrice, con quella bocca, con laquale ricevete il corpo del noſtro Signore; & non vi vergognerete trattare ſi odioſe brutture con quelle iſteſſe mani, con lequali, celebrate quello ineffabile miſterio miniſtrandovi gli agnoli? Oh come non ſi patono inſieme, farſi quel medeſimo corpo, & ſpirito con IDDIO, & un medeſimo corpo con la malvagia femina. i. e. "It is againſt my inclination that breaking in upon "the reſpect I owe you, I venture to give you ſome "advice, and to put you in mind of your filth[illegible]in. Are preſented to her in a few words the beſt arguments which the Proteſtants made uſe of to prove the excellency and holineſs of a married life. Let us not forget to obſerve, that ſhe was the daughter of Pyrrhus Gonzaga, and that ſhe had ſome brothers and ſiſters (t).

(t) Ibid. pag. 87.

" Are you not aſhamed, you that are a prieſt of God " entirely conſecrated to divine things, to touch the " rotten fleſh of a proſtitute with the ſame mouth in " which you receive the Body of our Lord? Are you " not aſhamed to handle ſuch odious filth with the " ſame hands with which you celebrate the unſpeak- " able myſtery, which the Angels adminiſter with you? " Oh, how impoſſible it is to be at the ſame time one " body and ſpirit with God, and one body with a " wicked woman!"

GORGOPHONE, the daughter of Perſeus and Andromeda, was the wife of Perieres the ſon of Æolus and King of the Meſſenians in the Peloponneſus. Having ſurvived her huſband ſhe married again with Oebalus, and is the firſt woman, that was twice married. For before her time the perſons of her ſex had made it a matter of conſcience never to marry again (a). This innovation cannot be ſo great a diſgrace to her as Lamech's was to him; when he introduced an innovation by marrying two wives who lived at the ſame time with him. But yet it is a diſgrace when it is obſerved by the Hiſtorians, that a perſon has been the firſt who was remiſs in the practice of ſtrict morality. The remiſſneſs of Gorgophone's children was infinitely more to be blamed; for they were guilty of inceſt. She had two ſons by her firſt huſband, namely, Aphareus and Leucippus. By her ſecond huſband ſhe had a daughter named Arene, who married Amphareus. This Amphareus ſuffered indeed his ſon to reign with him at Meſſenia, but he kept the chief authority in his own hands. He built a City, which for his wife's ſake he called Arene (b). Gorgophone was buried at Argos her native place (c). By her ſecond huſband ſhe had a ſon named Tyndarus, who was Helena's father (d). I imagine that Plautus took Gorgophone to be Amphytrion's grandmother [A], and not his aunt.

(a) Πρότερον δὲ καθεσθῆναι ταῖς γυναιξὶν ἐπὶ ἀνδρὶ ἀποθανόντι χηρεύειν. Pauſanias, ex Verſione Romuli Amaſæi, lib. 2. pag. 64.

(b) Pauſanias, lib. 4. pag. 112.

(c) Idem, lib. 2. pag. 64.

(d) Idem, ibid. pag. 81.

[A] Plautus took Gorgophone for Amphitryon's grandmother.] His words are (1); Ego idem ille ſum Amphitruo, Gorgophones Nepos, Imperator Thebanorum. i. e. " I am that Amphitryon, Gorgophone's grand-ſon, " and General of the Thebans." Madam le Fevre makes the following note upon this. " I never met in " the ancients with the word Nepos for what we call a " Nephew; it always ſignifies a Grandſon. However " I think that Ovid took it in the ſame ſenſe as Plau- " tus does here: for Gorgophone was the daughter of " Perſeus, and the ſiſter of Alceus, and conſequently " Amphitryon's aunt." For my part I cannot believe that Plautus took the word Nepos in any other ſenſe but that of Grandſon. We do not find with certainty that this word had any other meaning before the Latin Tongue began to be corrupted; ſo that all they, that read the Play of Amphitryon or ſaw it acted, could not but underſtand directly a Grandſon by the word Nepos. Is it probable, that the Poet would have thus impoſed upon them, by ſtyling the grandſon of Gorgophone a perſon who had been only her nephew? I know that according to the Genealogy related by Apollodorus (2), Amphitryon was only Gorgophone's nephew; but I know alſo, that all the Genealogies of thoſe fabulous times have been differently related, and Plautus had very probably read ſome Authors, according to whom Amphitryon was Gorgophone's grandſon. Let us remember that ſhe was twice married, and had children by both her huſbands. It has perhaps been ſuppoſed that ſhe had a daughter who was Alceus's wife and Amphitryon's mother. This would not be more ſtrange than what we read in Apollodorus (3), namely that Electryon married his niece Anaxo, the daughter of Alceus. If Electryon married the daughter of his brother Alceus, the latter may very well have married the daughter of his ſiſter Gorgophone. Add to this, that the Authors that are extant, differ about Alceus's wife, who was Amphitryon's mother. Some (4) pretend, that ſhe was the daughter of Menœceus, and that her name was Hipponome. Others (5) aſſert, that ſhe was called Lyſidice, and was Pelops's daughter. Laſtly, others (6) make her the daughter of Guneus, who was of Pheneum in Arcadia, and call her Laonome. Why might there not have been ſome Authors ſtill extant in Plautus's time, who aſſerted that ſhe was Gorgophone's daughter (7)? Let us obſerve, that we ought not to wonder that Amphitryon would boaſt of his Genealogy upon the Stage. The very name of Gorgophone put the Audience in mind of Perſeus the Conqueror of the Gorgons. This action occaſioned the name his daughter bore (8).

(1) Amphitr. Act. 4. Scen. 4. ver. 49.

(2) Lib. 2. pag. m. 97.

(3) Apollodor. lib. 2. pag. m. 97.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Pauſan. lib. 8. pag. 248.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Compare this with what I obſerved below in the Remark [F] of the Article TELEBOES.

(8) Pauſan. lib. 2. pag. 64.

GORLÆUS (ABRAHAM) born at Antwerp in the year 1549, gained a reputation by his care in collecting a great number of medals, and other antiques of that kind. He was chiefly fond of the rings and ſeals of the Ancients. He collected a prodigious number of them, as appears by the Work he publiſhed in the year 1601 [A]. Seven years after he publiſhed a Collection of ſeveral Medals. He had pitched upon the City of Delft for the place of his reſidence, and died there April the 15th, 1609. It

[A] The Work he publiſhed in the year 1601.] The title is this: Dactyliotheca, ſive Annulorum ſigillarium quorum apud priſcos tam Græcos quam Romanos uſus ex ferro, ære, argento, & auro, Promptuarium. i. e. " The " Ring-caſe, containing the ſeal-rings of the ancients " both Greek and Roman, made of iron, braſs, ſilver " or gold." This was the firſt part of the Work: The ſecond was intitled, Variarum Gemmarum, quibus Antiquitas in ſignando uti ſolita, ſculpturæ. i. e. " The " ſtamps of ſeveral gems, which the ancients uſed for " ſeals." The Date of the Dedication makes me ſay that this Work was printed in the year 1601, though Swertius (1) and Valerius Andreas (2) aſſert, that it was printed at Nuremberg in the year 1600. The Author dedicated his Book to the Elector of Cologne October the firſt 1601. Beſides the Author's picture prefixed to his Work is of the ſame year (3). Laſtly, Gronovius, who has publiſhed a new Edition of this Work (4), obſerves (5) that it was printed the firſt year of this Century (the ſeventeenth). The Edition of this Work in Thuanus's Library is of Leiden 1605; and in Monſieur le Tellier's, Archbiſhop of Rheims, it is of Antwerp 1609. Father Labbe mentions (6) an Edition of Leiden 1650; but the Printers have perhaps put 1650 inſtead of 1605 by the tranſpoſition of one figure only. However it be, the Edition of Leiden 1695 is infinitely better than any of the others; for it not only contains a vaſt number of Cuts, but alſo a ſhort but learned explication of them, made by Gronovius.

(1) Swert. Ath. Belgic. pag. 87.

(2) Val. Andreas, Bibliothec. Belgic. pag. 1.

(3) It ſhews, that he was then in the 52d year of his age.

(4) At Leyden for Vander Aa, 1695.

(5) In Præfat.

(6) Biblioth. Bibliothec. in Manuſſa Antiquariæ Supellectilis, pag. m. 341.

It is not true that he had a place in the mint there [B]. Some Authors assert that he never studied the Latin tongue [C], and that the learned Preface, which is prefixed to his Dactyliotheca was written by another [D]. His heirs sold his Collections of Antiques to the Prince of Wales (a). It is not always safe to trust to his Medals, if we may depend on the Scaligerana [E].

(a) See Swertius, Athen. Belgic. pag. 87.

[B] It is not true that he had a place in the mint, at Delft.] Valerius Andreas has made a very gross blunder. Abrahamus Gorlæus, says he, Antverpiæ natus celebri Emporio, Delphis Batavorum vixit in Collegio III Virorum Monetalium. i. e. "Abraham Gor-"læus, born at Antwerp a famous trading city, lived "at Delft in Holland in the College of the three Di-"rectors of the Mint." We have here two assertions; the first is, that there is at Delft a College of three Directors of the Mint; the second, that Gorlæus was one of these three Directors. Now both these assertions are false. This blunder was occasioned by these words of Gorlæus (8). Nescio quo fato in antiquorum numismatum Σκωρίαν delapsus, reique dulcedine allectus, totum me trado huic contemplationi, & tanquam in Collegium III Virorum Monetalium cooptatus, nihil præter nummos veteres somnio. i. e. "I do not know by what fa-"tality I happen to study the ancient coins; and allured "by the agreeableness of the subject, I apply myself "entirely to it, and as tho' I were one of the Trium-"virs of the Mint, I dream of nothing but of anci-"ent medals." Swertius (9) has very well understood the sense of these words: but Valerius Andreas has entirely mistaken the meaning of them; he does not say, that Gorlæus applied himself to the study of ancient coins, as though he had been one of the Triumvirs of the Mint, but he represents him as one that really was one of them. Gronovius has enquired into the reasons, which obliged this Antiquary to leave his native country and to retire into Holland for the rest of his life, and what employment the Magistrates of Delft gave him: but he could not discover any thing. Ipsum Gorlæum cognoscere familiarius cupivi, & quæ causa illum induxisset patriam Batavia mutare, præsertim cum dissona de eo memorentur, sic ut ibi quoque mori & sepeliri novem annis post voluerit. Ipse in præfatione postrema videtur se describere eum qui publicis quotidie distringeretur muneribus, & qualia ista fuerint rescíscere non magis potui, quam id ipsum quod modo dixi (10). i. e. "I desired to know more particulars of Gorlæus's life, "and what reason obliged him to leave his native "country and to settle in Holland, especially since "different reports are spread concerning him, so that "he would after nine years be buried there. He seems "in his last Preface to represent himself as a man "who by his publick employments is daily divert-"ed from his studies; but what these employ-"ments were I could no more learn than what I have "just now mentioned." It is certain that Gorlæus speaks of himself as of a man, whose public employments did not suffer him to study so much as he could have wished. Cæterum, says he (11), cum illud præstare quod a nobis ipsi exigimus, ejus sit verius, qui in umbratica rerum contemplatione & desidia literarum torpescit, quam qui publicis quotidie distringitur muneribus, aliis relinquemus quod optari possit, nobis quod ad nominis nostri existimationem publicamque utilitatem sufficiet reservabimus. i. e. "But as those things, which I had imposed "upon my self as a task, belong rather to them who "have leisure to study quietly in their closet, than to "them who are daily diverted from their studies by "publick employments, I shall leave to others what I "wished might be done, and keep for my self only "what may be sufficient for my own reputation, and "for the good of the Publick."

(7) Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 1.

(8) In Alloquio ad Lectorem.

(9) Athen. Belgic. pag. 87.

(10) Gronovius, in Præfat.

(11) In 2 Monito ad Lectorem.

[C] Some Authors assert that he never studied the Latin Tongue.] Peireskius related this, when he mentioned the conversations he had had with Gorlæus at Delft. The words of this Historian deserve to be transcribed. Quo loco narrare solebat rem memoratu non indignam; nempe Gorlæum, cum alias Latinæ Linguæ non studuisset, intellexisse tamen Libros omnes circa rem nummariam Latinè conscriptos, eodem modo quo Forcatulus omnes circa rem mathematicam: tantum valet improbus labor ex desiderio quidpiam noscendi vehementissimo profectus (12). i. e. "On which occasion he used to relate a circum-"stance not unworthy to be remembered; namely that "though Gorlæus never studied the Latin Tongue, "yet he understood all the Books written in Latin "concerning Medals and Coins, just as Forcatulus un-"derstood the mathematical Books; such is the effect "of an unwearied labour, when it proceeds from a "very earnest desire of knowing some things." This would be extraordinary enough, and more perhaps to Gorlæus's honour, than it would be disgraceful to him not to have studied. Is it not a sign of a great genius, to understand a Latin Book only by the knowledge one has of the subject it treats of? Plutarch observes somewhere, that his studying the Roman History in Greek Books was the reason why he understood the Language of the Latin Historians. Gorlæus might have said, that his skill in Medals made him understand the meaning of the Latin Authors, who wrote upon that science. But this story of Peireskius cannot be reconciled with what we read in Swertius, who had been familiarly acquainted with Gorlæus (13). A school-fellow of Andrew Schottus used no doubt to go to the Latin School. Gronovius (14) makes use of this argument against Gassendi's assertion.

(12) Gassendus, in Vita Peireskii, lib. 2. ad ann. 1606, pag. m. 265.

[D] . . . And that the learned Preface, which is prefixed to his Dactyliotheca was written by another.] Cunæus asserts that Ælius Everhard Vorstius was the Author of it; he asserts it, I say, in Vorstius's funeral Oration. A learned German (15), who wrote concerning Rings, asserts the same.

(13) Mihi familiaris; liberalibus studiis à primis adolescentiæ annis delectatus, condiscipulum habuit Andream Schottum Soc. Jesu Presbyt. Swertius, Athen. Belgic. pag. 87.

(14) In Præfatione.

(15) Kirchmannus, cap. 3. de Annulis, pag. 13. edit. Lugd. Batav. 1672.

[E] It would not . . . be safe to trust to his Medals, if we may depend on the Scaligerana,] We meet there with the following words (16). Gorlæus casts medals; he shewed me some, but I found that they were not ancient; since that time he shewed me none but genuine ones: he is a good man. This and the following part of the passage shews that Scaliger ranked Gorlæus amongst the Coiners of false medals.

(16) In pag. 97.

GORLÆUS (DAVID) a native of Utrecht lived in the seventeenth Century. He published some Philosophical Works (a), in which he did not follow the common opinions of the schools. Regius one of Des Cartes's disciples, suffering great vexations on account of a Thesis concerning the union of the soul with the body, said in his defence, that he had made use of Gorlæus's own words. But this availed him nothing, and engaged Voetius Professor of Divinity, to represent Gorlæus's opinions in the worst light he could [A].

(a) Exercitationes Philosophicæ, anno 1620, in 8vo. Item Idea Physices. Konig, Biblioth. Vet. & Nov. p. 355. See Sorel, p. 248. of the Perfection humaine.

GOSELINI

[A] Vossius . . . . represented Gorlæus's opinions in the worse light he could.] You will find an account of all this in Monsieur Baillet (1). He tells us, that Regius had asserted amongst other things *, that "the union "of the soul and body did not constitute a being by "itself, but only accidentally. . . . . As this did not a-"gree with the usual language of the School, Voetius "thought it a sufficient reason to declare Regius an "heretick, and to proceed to his deprivation. In vain "did Regius endeavour to defend himself by alledg-"ing, that this manner of speaking was not peculiar "to him, but that he had borrowed it from Gorlæ-"us's Writings, such as it was inserted in his Theses. "Voetius procured an order in the name of the Fa-"culty of Divinity . . . whereby the Students in Divi-"nity were forbidden to assist at Regius's Lectures, they "containing doctrines destructive to Religion. Some "days after, Voetius published some Theses, to which "he added three positions: The first was this; The "opinion of the Atheist Taurellus, and of David "Gorlæus, who assert that man composed of a soul "and a body is a being by accident, and not by it-"self

(1) Vie de Des Cartes, tom. 2. pag. 145, 146. under the year 1641.

* Ex mente & corpore non fit unum per se, sed per accidens.

GOSELINI (JULIAN) born at Rome in the year 1525, was at the age of ſeventeen Secretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicily. He continued in the ſame employment when this Viceroy was made Governor of Milan. He enjoyed that poſt alſo under the Duke of Alba, and the Duke of Sueſſa, who were ſucceſſively Governors of that State after Gonzaga's death. The Duke of Sueſſa took him with him to the Court of Spain, where Goſelini made himſelf ſo acceptable by his ability and prudence, that the Duke was given to underſtand, he would do well to employ only this Negotiator in the affairs he had to manage with the King. Goſelini was at the ſame time favoured with a yearly penſion of two hundred crowns for life. The Marquiſs of Peſcara, the Duke of Sueſſa's ſucceſſor, had the ſame regard for Goſelini, and repoſed the ſame truſt in him, as his predeceſſors had done. But things underwent a ſtrange alteration under the perſon that ſucceeded this Marquiſs. It was the Duke of Albuquerque. He treated Goſelini in ſuch a fantaſtical and ſavage manner, that he was like to make him loſe both his life and his reputation at once. Yet the iſſue of this perſecution turned to the Secretary's honour. He evaded the ſtroke artfully, and behaved himſelf with ſo much prudence during this heavy ſtorm, that he got honourably off. He was not reſtored to his poſt, but under the Marquiſs d'Aimonte, and under the Duke of Terranova, who were Governors of Milan; he ſerved them as Secretary, and they were very well pleaſed with his conduct. Amongſt the good qualities that are aſcribed to him, he is called the Pacifier of Diſputes; it is reported that he was extremely proper for it; this circumſtance deſerved to be taken notice of in his epitaph; titulo res digna ſepulcri; nor has it been omitted (a). The buſineſs of his employment, which he enjoyed above forty years, did not prevent him from publiſhing ſeveral works [A]. He died at Milan February the 12th 1587, aged near threeſcore and two years (b).

(a) Componendis diſcordiis nato.

(b) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro d'huomini letterato, Part. 1. pag. 134. See alſo Mandoſio, Biblioth. Roman. pag. 26.

GOSSELIN.

" ſelf, is abſurd and erroneous. The third was this; " That Philoſophy which explodes the ſubſtantial forms " of things with their proper and ſpecifick faculties, " or their active qualities, and conſequently the diſtinct " and ſpecifick natures of things, ſuch a Philoſophy, " as Taurellus, Gorlæus and Baſſon endeavoured to introduce amongſt us, is inconſiſtent with the Natural " Philoſophy taught by Moſes, and with all that the " Scripture teaches us. This Philoſophy is dangerous, " favouring Scepticiſm, capable to overthrow our belief concerning the reaſonable Soul, the Proceſſion " of the divine Perſons in the Trinity, the Incarnation " of JESUS CHRIST, original Sin, the Miracles, the " Prophecies, the Grace of our Regeneration, and the " being actually poſſeſſed with the Devil."

We ſee here evidently what effects the impreſſions of cuſtom and prejudice are capable to produce; they are a weight that carries us againſt the intereſt of the very cauſe we labour to aſſert. For can there be any thing more inconſiſtent with thoſe fundamental articles of religion (2), than to ſay, that they cannot be maintained but by the help of the Schoolmen's Doctrine concerning the diſtinction of the ens per ſe, and the ens per accidens, and concerning the Forms which make up the ſpecies of bodies? Ens per ſe, ens per accidens are unintelligible phraſes, a mere jargon of the Spaniſh logicians, which have no meaning at all. And as for the ſubſtantial forms, what is aſſerted of their nature, and of the manner in which they are produced or deſtroyed, is ſo abſurd and inconceivable, that one cannot make it paſs for a doctrine neceſſary to religion, without expoſing moſt dangerouſly the ſublimeſt truths of the Goſpel, and without filling the general courſe of nature with ſo many myſteries, that Religion will no longer have the leaſt advantage over nature. It is certain that the greateſt myſteries of the goſpel are at leaſt as eaſily underſtood, as the doctrine of the forms, and the nature of the ens per ſe of the ſchoolmen.

(2) I mean thoſe mentioned in the third Poſition.

Voſſius is not concerned in this reflection but after a very remote and indirect manner; for when we conſult his whole poſition, we find that the reaſon, why he thinks it ſo dangerous for the doctrines of the goſpel, to explode the forms, is not the very exploding of thoſe forms, but the motive for which they are exploded. Quidquid ſit de ſumma rei, quam Philoſophorum diſquiſitioni relinquimus, hoc unum ſaltem hyponema ſtudioſis noſtris ſubjicimus: Achillei argumenti iſtius, quo formas explodere conantur, conſequentiam ſuſpectam habeant; quæ eſt hæc, negatur eſſentia & exiſtentia formarum, quia earum origo ſeu modus originis incertus eſt, aut explicari non poteſt, ſic ut patroni formarum & ſibi & aliis in eo ſatisfaciant. Hoc periculoſo axiomate ſemel hauſto proclive erit vanitati, ſcepticiſmo & petulantiæ humani ingenii diſputare, non dari animam rationalem, &c. i. e. " As " for the ſubject it ſelf, I leave it to the Philoſophers " examination, I ſhall only obſerve this for the information of my Diſciples. Let them ſuſpect the conſequences of that ſtrong argument, by which ſome " perſons endeavour to confute the ſubſtantial forms: " The exiſtence and reality of thoſe forms is denied, " becauſe their origin, or the manner of their origin " is uncertain, and cannot be explained ſo as to ſatisfy both the aſſertors of the forms, and others. But " if this dangerous axiom be once admitted, the " vanity, ſcepticiſm, and petulance of the genius " of men, will ſoon make them queſtion, whether " there be ſuch a thing as a rational ſoul &c." He obſerves that the chief argument of thoſe who will not admit them is, that it is impoſſible to explain how they are produced; he ſhews afterwards, that it is to be feared leſt by ſuch an argument men come at laſt to deny the myſteries &c. This alters the ſtate of the queſtion, and brings the controverſy to a more eaſy concluſion. It is only explaining the equivocations, and ſhewing where the difference lyes. But as to thoſe who condemn the exploding of the forms, as though in it ſelf it was dangerous to religion, I ſay it again, they deſerve that one ſhould repreſent to them what I have obſerved above.

In the remark [E] of the article HEIDANUS you will meet with ſomething concerning the unanſwerable difficulties to which the doctrine of the peripateticks about ſubſtantial forms is liable. But if you have a mind to ſee this at length, you muſt conſult the firſt volume of Hadrian Hereboord's Theſes, from page 125, to page 148, where he urges the learned and ſubtle arguments of William Pemble, who wrote in Engliſh upon this ſubject.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral works] Here follow the titles of ſome. Rime: Diſcorſi: Lettere; Ragionamento ſopra i Componimenti del Borgheſi: Dichiarazione di alcuni Componimenti: Vita di Don Ferdinando Gonzaga: Trè Congiure, cioè de Pazzi e Salviati contra i Medici, del Conte Giovan Luigi de' Fieſchi contra la Republica de Genova, & d'alcuni Piacentini contra il loro Duca Pietro Luigi Farneſe. i. e. " Poems; " Diſcourſes; Letters; Dialogues concerning the Diſpoſitions of the Citizens; An Explication of ſome " other Diſpoſitions: The Life of Don Ferdinand " Gonzaga. Three Conſpiracies; that of the Pazzi " and Salviati againſt the Medicis; of Count John " Lewis de Fieſchi againſt the Republick of Genoa; " and that of ſome Citizens of Piacenza againſt their " Duke Peter Lewis Farneſe." He alſo wrote ſome Verſes and Letters in Latin; and he has tranſlated into Italian a French book intitled, Recit veritable des choſes qui ſe ſont paſſées au Pais-Bas depuis l'arrivée de Don Juan d'Autriche. i. e. " A true account of what " has happened in the Low-Countries ſince Don John " of Auſtria's arrival." Monſieur Varillas did not know

GOSSELIN. I know three Norman Authors of that name. WILLIAM GOSSELIN, a native of Caen, lived in the ſixteenth Century, and applied himſelf to the Mathematics [A]. JOHN GOSSELIN lived in the ſame Century. He was born at Vire, and was the King's Library-keeper. He applied himſelf very much to Aſtrology [B]. He died very old, and in a ſurpriſing manner. We ſhall ſee what Scaliger has ſaid of him [C]. ANTHONY GOSSELIN was of Caen, and Regius-Profeſſor of Hiſtory and Eloquence in that City, and Principal of the College called Du Bois. In the year 1636 he publiſhed in Latin the Hiſtory of the ancient Gauls. He committed a great many blunders in it, as Bochart ſhewed in ſome obſervations which he made upon that work, and which he would not publiſh, leſt he ſhould thereby diſpleaſe the Author's friends and relations. Theſe obſervations have been inſerted into the laſt edition of his works.

know that Goſſelini wrote an account of Count Fieſchi's conſpiracy; for when he tells us why he gives an account of that conſpiracy, he mentions (1) but four Authors who publiſhed hiſtories of it: Hubertus Folietta, Agoſtino Maſcardi, Madam de Scuderi, and Cardinal de Rets. He owns that they are all incomparable in their kind; but that the two firſt give France too great a ſhare in that plot, and the two laſt give her too little a ſhare in it.

(1) Preface to his Hiſtory of Francis I.

[A] WILLIAM GOSSELIN .... applied himſelf to the Mathematics.] This appears by the work which he publiſhed at Paris in the year 1577, with this title. De Arte magna, ſeu de occulta parte numerorum, quæ & Algebra & Almucabala vulgo dicitur, libri quatuor, in quibus explicantur æquationes Diophantis, & regulæ quantitatis ſimplicis, & quantitatis ſurdæ. i. e. "Of "the great Art, or of the hidden part of Numbers, "which is commonly called Algebra, and Almucabala; "in four Books; in which the Equations of Diophan- "tus are explained, and the rules given with regard "to ſimple, and ſurd quantities." He added Demonſtrations and Inventions to the French Tranſlation he made of Nicholas Tartaglia, an Italian Author's Arithmetick. This Tranſlation was printed at Paris in the year 1577 (1), and the next year at Antwerp by Plantin (2).

(1) Taken from Du Verdier Vau Privas, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 478.

(2) La Croix du Maine, pag. 147.

[B] JOHN GOSSELIN ... applied himſelf very much to Aſtrology.] Witneſs the Book he publiſhed at Paris in the year 1577, which he intitled, Hiſtoria Imaginum cæleſtium noſtro ſæculo accommodata, in qua earum viciſſitudines ſeu habitudines inter ſe, atque ſtellarum fixarum ſitus & magnitudines explicantur. i. e. "An Account "of the celeſtial appearances, ſuited to the preſent "age, containing an explication of their changings or "of the relations between them, and of the ſituation "and bigneſs of the fixed Stars." He had publiſhed ſix years before this, La main harmonique, ou les principes de la Muſique antique & moderne, & les proprietez que la moderne reçois des ſept Planétes, comme auſſi Ephemerides ou Almanach du jour & de la nuit, pour cent ans, commençant en l'an 1571 (3). i. e. "The "harmonick hand, or the firſt Principles of ancient "and modern Muſick, and the qualities which the "modern receives from the ſeven Planets; as alſo, E- "phemerides, or an Almanack for the day and the "night, calculated for an hundred years, beginning "with the year 1571." He publiſhed at Paris in the year 1582 a Table for the Reformation of the year; and a French Tranſlation of the Gregorian Calendar (4). Obſerve that Voſſius (5) does not in the leaſt mention theſe two Authors; which ſhews that he knew nothing of them.

(3) Taken from Du Verdier Vau Privas, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 708.

(4) La Croix du Maine, pag. 230.

[C] ...He died very old ... we ſhall ſee what Scaliger has ſaid of him.] "Goſſelin, the King's Library "Keeper, was burnt to death; he fell into the fire, "and being alone and very old, he could not get up "again; which happens generally to old people. "Caſaubon will have his place. This late Library "Keeper Goſſelin would not ſuffer any perſon to enter "into the Library: ſo that Caſaubon meets with trea- "ſures, which were not known to be there (6)."

(5) In his book De Scientiis Mathematicis.

(6) Scaligerana, pag. m. 97.

We may draw two inferences from this paſſage, the one is, that John Goſſelin died towards the beginning of the XVIIth Century; the other, that his place was given to Caſaubon.

GOUDIMEL (CLAUDIUS) one of the moſt excellent Muſicians in the ſixteenth Century was barbarouſly murthered at Lyons in the year 1572, becauſe he was of the Reformed Religion. The Martyrology of the Proteſtants mentions him [A]. D'Aubigné is miſtaken, who reckons him amongſt thoſe that was murthered at Paris on St. Bartholomew's day [B]. Monſieur Varillas has not committed this blunder; but he was in the wrong to imagiue that Goudimel and Claudin the younger were one and the ſame perſon [C]. He makes a curious obſervation againſt thoſe that did not ſave ſo able a Muſician's

[A] The martyrology of the Proteſtants mentions him]. In theſe words (1) "Claudius Goudimel, an excel- "lent muſician, whoſe reputation will be immortal, "by his ſucceſsful labours on the Pſalms of David, "moſt of whom he has ſet to muſick in the form "of motetto's for four, five, ſix or eight voices; and "he would ſoon after have compleated that work, "had he not been prevented by death: but the e- "nemies of God's Glory, and ſome wicked perſons, "who envied the reputation which this man had "gained, have deprived thoſe, that love chriſtian "muſick, of that advantage".

(1) Book 10. folio 727, under the year 1572.

[B] D' Aubigne is miſtaken, who reckons him amongſt thoſe that were murthered at Paris on St. Bartholomew's day.] After he has mentioned ſeveral perſons of note, whom the maſſacrers at Paris murthered, he adds, Goudimel, an excellent Muſician, and Perrot a Civilian; all theſe were thrown out of the windows, dragged along the ſtreets, and carried to the river, at the Duke of Montpenſier's inſtigation, who joined with thoſe, who, as we have obſerved, cried, kill them, for they have made an attempt on the King's life (2). If he had conſulted Thuanus, as he has done on other occaſions, he would not have committed that blunder. For here follows what we read in Thuanus in the paſſage concerning the ſlaughter committed at Lyons. Eandem fortunam expertus eſt Claudius Gaudimelus excellens noſtræ ætate Muſicus; qui Pſalmos Davidicos vernaculos Verſibus a Clemente Maroto & Theodore Beza expreſſos, ad varios & jucundiſſimos modulationum numeros aptavit, quibus & hodie publicè in concionibus Proteſtantium ac privatim decantantur (3). i. e. "Claudius Goudimel "an excellent Muſician of this age met with the "ſame fate; he had ſet to muſic in a moſt agreeable "manner the Pſalms of David written in French "verſe by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, which "are ſtill ſung to his tunes publickly by the Prote- "ſtants in their Churches, and privately at home."

(2) Hiſtoire Univerſelle, tom. 2. liv. 1. chap. 4. under the year 1572.

(3) Thuanus, Hiſtor. lib. 52. pag. m. 1084.

[C] Monſieur Varillas ....was in the wrong to imagine that Goudimel and Claudin the younger were one and the ſame perſon]. We ſhall ſee in the following remark that he makes but one perſon of theſe two. In order to refute him, I muſt relate here a remarkable circumſtance concerning this Claudin, by which it appears that he was ſtill alive nine years after the ſlaughter committed on St. Bartholomew's day. I have read that circumſtance in the Commentary which has been printed with the Life of Apollonius of Tyana tranſlated into French. I ſhall quote the Commentator's words, though they be not very elegant (4). "It was alſo by thoſe two tunes the Phrygian and "the Sub-Phrygian, that Timothy gave proofs of his

(4) Artu Thomas Sieur d'Embry, Comment. ſur la vie d'Apollo. liv. 1. chap. 16. pag. 92.

Muſician's life in the general ſlaughter [D]. If the Authors who mention Goudimel had taken notice how he uſed to write his name, they would not have altered it as they have done [E]. There are ſome of his Letters (a) printed amongſt the Poems of Meliſſus his intimate friend. He always ſigns there Goudimel. Meliſſus did not fail to exert his poetical talent on the ſad fate of his friend. I ſhall tranſcribe the Epigram in which it is obſerved that Goudimel would have met with a leſs barbarous treatment in the waves of the Ægean Sea, as Arion formerly, than he did in his native country [F]. I believe that this Muſician was a native of the Franche-Compté [G].

(a) They are in Latin, and well written.

GOVEA

" ſkil on the perſon of Alexander: By the Phrygian " he rouſed his ſpirit ſo, that he made him run " from the table to arms; and immediately he reſ- " tored him to his former tranquillity by the Sub- " Phrygian tune. I have often heard Claudin the " younger (5) who, without diſparagement to any " perſon, excelled all the ancient Muſicians in the " knowledge of thoſe different meaſures ſay, that " a certain air, which he had compoſed with all its " parts, was performed at the entertainments that " were made for the wedding of the late Duke of " Joyeuſe (6) in the time of Henry III of bleſſed " memory King of France and Poland on whom " God have mercy; this air being rehearſed in a " private conſort, had ſuch an effect on a gentleman " who was preſent, that he roſe up on a ſudden, " drew his ſword, and ſwore aloud that it was im- " poſſible for him, not to go and fight ſome body " immediately. They began then to play another " air of the Sub-Phrygian Mood, which made him " again as calm as he was before; this has ſince " been confirmed to me by ſome perſons, who were " preſent; ſuch a power has modulation with a good " motion and conduct of the voice, on the minds " of men.... (7) To cloſe this long note, if you " are willing to ſee thoſe twelve moods admirably " well contrived, you muſt ſing or hear the Dodeca- " chordium of the Sieur Claudin the younger, whom " I have mentioned above. And I am perſuaded that " they will find all theſe moods and variations hand- " led with ſo much art, harmony and ſkill, that " nothing can be added to this Maſter-piece, which " deſerves to be admired by all the lovers of mu- " ſick, who ought to have the greateſt eſteem for " that wonderful and excellent man, who was ca- " pable to carry his art to the higheſt degree of " perfection, had not death prevented him from ex- " ecuting the great and learned deſigns he had for- " med upon that ſubject."

(5) The Author puts here this Summary, or Title, A Commendation of the Sieur Claudin the younger, the honour of all the Muſicians.

(6) He married in the year 1581.

(7) Comment. ſur la Vie d'Apollonius, pag. 286.

[D].... He makes a curious obſervation againſt them that did not ſave ſo able a Muſician's life in the general ſlaughter.] His words are, " In vain did " Mandelot (8) endeavour to prevent the ſlaughter " of thirteen hundred Calviniſts at Lyons, and par- " ticularly of that incomparable Muſician Gaudinel " (9), who is ſo well known under the name of " Claudin the younger. His greateſt crime was " that he had compoſed the moſt beautiful airs for the " Pſalms of Marot and Beza, which are ſung at " Church by the reformed; and to puniſh him they " had no regard for the Roman Law, which is fa- " vourable to perſons who excel in their profeſſion; " becauſe their death would be infinitely more pre- " judicial to the publick, than their puniſhment, " though exemplary, would be uſeful(10)."

(8) He was Governor of Lyons. See Thuanus, l. 52. p. 5. 1083, who charges Mandelot with a ſhameful diſſimulation, for pretending to diſapprove the ſlaughter, and to deſign to puniſh the Authors of it.

(9) We challenge Monſ. Varillas to quote one ſingle Author who has aſſerted that Mandelot deſired chiefly to ſave this Muſician's life.

(10) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, liv. 9. pag. 471, 472. of the Paris edition in 12mo, 1684.

The Roman Law, mentioned here by Monſieur Varillas, will raiſe the curioſity of a great many readers; they will think it a very remarkable particular. But as they know, that he has very much impoſed upon the publick, even with regard to hiſtory, which he made his chief ſtudy, they will not think him worthy to be believed in matters of Law, which were not within his province. In order therefore to ſatisfy them, I ſhall afford them a better authority: it is that of a man much more learned than Varillas, and who has quoted two very grave Authors. See what Girac obſerved againſt Coſtar (11). " Our " Doctor, who pretends ſometimes to meddle with " ſubjects relating to the Law, does again treſpaſs " here againſt the rules of juriſprudence; it is abſo- " lutely falſe, that a workman deſerves ſo much the " more to be puniſhed, as his work is more admirable, " and ſtrikes the beholder's imagination. All the Com- " mentators on the Law aſſert the contrary; and it " is a practice which has been often obſerved by " Princes, and Sovereign Courts of Judicature, to " grant a pardon to thoſe that excelled in ſome art, " though they deſerved to be capitally puniſhed for " the crimes they had committed." Hinc apparet ratio ejus quod paſſim juris utriuſque Interpretes adnotarunt, ſcilicet, pœnam eſſe vel remittendam vel minuendam delinquenti ob inſignem ejus peritiam, ſeu ex eo quod artifex ſit celebris magnique nominis &c. i. e. " This " ſhews the reaſon of what the Commentators on the " Civil and Canon Law obſerve in ſeveral places; " namely, that when a man excels in any art, or has " gained a great reputation, the puniſhment he de- " ſerves ought to be remitted to him, or at leaſt " ſoftened*."

(11) Girac, Replique à Coſtar, Sect. 26. pag. m. 235.

[E] If the Authors, who mention Goudimel, had taken notice how he uſed to write his name, they would not have altered it as they have done.] Thuanus calls him Gaudimelus; Giſbert Voetius (12) Gaudimellus; Monſieur Varillas Gaudinel; Jeremiah de Pours Guidomel. " The ſame Guidomel, ſays he, compoſed " the Pſalms of David, printed at Paris by Hadrian " Le Roy and Robert Balaard in the year 1565. " He had alſo compoſed nineteen ſpiritual ſongs " printed at Paris by Nicholas du Chemin in the year " 1555 (13)."

* Covar. lib. 2. Var. Reſol. cap. 9. num. 6. See Juli. Clar. Sent. lib. 5. § fin. qu. 60. num. 26, & alios.

(12) Polit. Eccleſiaſt. tom. 1. pag. 534.

(13) Jeremie de Pours, Divine Melodie du Saint Pſalmiſte, liv. 2. chap. 41. pag. 581.

[F] I ſhall tranſcribe the Epigram in which it is obſerved, that he would have met with a leſs barbarous treatment in the waves... than in his native country.] It is in page 79 of a book intitled, Meliſſi Schediaſmatum Reliquiæ, i. e. " The Remains of Meliſſus's " Writings," which was printed in the year 1575 in 8vo. It contains ſeveral Poems on Goudimel, which were not written by Meliſſus.

Prenſus ab externo ſi Goudimel hoſte fuiſſes
Victor in Ionio Muſice clare mari;
Ille tibi vitam vel non voluiſſet ademtam,
Lenitus cithara carminibuſque tuis;
In tutos aliquis vel, ſicut Ariona, Delphin
Tergore portaſſet te quaſi nave locos.
Audivere tuos Galli moduloſque probarunt
Indigenæ, decori queis tua Muſa fuit:
At datus es letho, licet inſons, inque cruenti
Stagnanteis Araris præcipitatus aquas.
Prob ſcelus indigenûm! nam barbarus hoſtis in hoſtem
Barbaricum LANIIS mitior eſſe ſolet.

" Goudimel, if you had been taken by a foreign " enemy, on the Ionian Sea, you that were ſo famous " a Muſician, would have been the conqueror; for " either the enemy being moved by your love and " your ſongs, had ſaved your life; or ſome kind " dolphin would have carried you on his back, as in " a boat, to ſome ſecure place, as Arion was of old. " The French, your own countrymen, have heard " and liked your tuneful notes; your Muſe was an " honour to them; and yet you have been murther- " ed, though innocent, and you have been thrown " into the River Saone. O abominable crime of " your countrymen! The moſt ſavage enemy is more " merciful to his moſt barbarous adverſaries, than " theſe Butchers have been to you."

I would forgive the Latin Poets what cannot be forgiven to Hiſtorians, namely, to have omitted, altered, or added ſome letters in Goudimel's name; for it is a very harſh word for Latin Poems.

[G] I believe that this Muſician was a native of the Franche-Compté.] I imagine it, becauſe his native place was ſituated on the River Doux †, which runs by Bezançon.

† In Latin Dubis, or Alduadubus.

GOVEA (ANDREW) (a) in Latin Goveanus, a native of Beja in Portugal, was Principal of the College of St. Barbara [A] at Paris in the ſixteenth Century, where he educated three of his nephews, who became famous by their learning. The King of Portugal furniſhed them wherewithal to maintain themſelves at Paris. MARTIAL GOVEA, the eldeſt of the three brothers, became a good Latin Poet, and publiſhed a Latin Grammar at Paris. ANDREW GOVEA, the next after him, taught firſt Grammar, and then Philoſophy in the College of St. Barbara at Paris, and was afterwards made Principal of that College in his uncle's room. And as he acquitted himſelf very well of that function, he was choſen for the ſame employment in the College of Guienne at Bourdeaux, whither he went in the year 1534, and diſcharged his duty there with ſo much care and diligence, that he was very uſeful to the youth [B]; for which reaſon John III King of Portugal made him return into his dominions to eſtabliſh a College at Conimbra, that might be like the College of Guienne. Govea left Bourdeaux in the year 1547, and took with him ſome learned men capable to inſtruct the youth [C]. He enjoyed at Conimbra the ſame poſt he had filled at Bourdeaux (b). He deſigned to return to this laſt City after he ſhould have ſpent two years in ſettling the College of Conimbra, but he died before that time was expired (c), namely, in June 1548, being at moſt fifty years old (d). He was a Prieſt and a Preacher [D], but he publiſhed nothing (e). ANTHONY GOVEA the youngeſt of the three brothers has been the moſt illuſtrious. See in Moreri what Thuanus has ſaid of him (f): it would be needleſs to repeat it here. I ſhall only obſerve, that if it be true, as Thuanus obſerves, that Govea taught the Law at Grenoble (g) [E], before a very numerous audience, the Author of the Bibliotheque de Dauphiné was very much in the wrong to ſay that he was a Chamber Counſellor

(a) Thus Thuanus calls him, lib. 38. pag. 769. But And. Schottus, Biblioth. Hiſp. pag. 300; and Ribadeneira, Vita Ignatii, lib. 1. cap. 3. call him James. It was he that would whip Ignatius Loyola.

(b) Ex Eliæ Vineti Epiſt. ad Schottum, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(c) Schottus, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 618. See alſo Thuanus, lib. 17, ſub fin.

(d) Vinetus, Ep. ad Schottum, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Lib. 38. pag. 769, 770, ad ann. 1565.

(g) Gratianopoli jus civile magna auditorum frequentia profeſſus eſt.

Goudimel ille meus, meus (heu!) Goudimel ille eſt
Occiſus. Teſtes vos Arar & Rhodane,
Semineces vivoſque ſimul violenter utriſque
Abſorptos viſi plangere gurgitibus,
Sequana cum Ligeri flevit, flevitque Garumna;
Præcipuè patrius flevit amara Dubis.

"Goudimel, alas! my dear Goudimel has been murthered: Witneſs the rivers Saone and Rhoſne. I have ſeen their ſtreams carry bodies half dead and half alive, and violently lament their fate: the Seyne, the Loyre, the Garonne ſhed tears, but eſpecially the Doux, near which he was born, cried moſt bitterly."

I have tranſcribed thoſe verſes from page 79. of the Meliſſi Schediaſmatum Reliquiæ.

[A] He was Principal of the College of St. Barbara.] Thus we ought to tranſlate theſe words of Andrew Schottus (1) Collegii Barberini Præfectus, and not Principal of the College Barbarini, as Monſieur Teiffier has done (2).

(1) Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 300.

(2) Teiſſier, Eloges, tom. 1. pag. 291.

[B] ANDREW GOVEA .... diſcharged his duty with ſo much care and diligence, that he was very uſeful to the youth.] You may ſee this in Buſinus's Preface, which is prefixed to Gelida's Letters, printed at Rochelle in the year 1571. Ubi quamdiu egerit, quem ſe geſſerit (Andreas Goveanus) & quomodo ab rege ſuo in patriam ſit revocatus, Conimbricenſis Scholæ inſtituendæ gratia, quæ ſimilis eſſet Burdigalenſi in Præfatione Buſini in Epiſtolas Gelidæ cognoſci poteſt (3).

(3) Elias Vinetus, Epiſt. ad Schottum, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

[C] He took with him ſome learned men capable to inſtruct the youth.] George Buchanan, and his brother Patrick Buchanan were of that number, as alſo Nicholas Grouchi, William Guerente, Elias Vinet, Arnold Fabricius, John la Coſte, James Tevius, and Anthony Mendez (4).

(4) Schottus, Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 617.

[D] He was a Prieſt and a Preacher.] I do not know whether Beza, who makes him a Doctor of the Sorbonne, deſerves to be credited. I do not believe it; however it is proper to tranſcribe what he obſerves of him. "It came at laſt to nothing, ſays he (5), except only that a poor ſervitor was put into the hands of the Principal of the College, Andrew Govea a Portugueze and Doctor of the Sorbonne (commonly ſurnamed Sinapivorus, that is to ſay a ſwallower of muſtard) to be chaſtiſed and whipped in the common hall." He had juſt before been mentioning Aymon de la Voye a Proteſtant Martyr burnt at Bourdeaux in the year 1541, and ſome ſchool-boys who were taken up the next day, being ſuſpected of writing a Libel that was found poſted up.

(5) Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes, liv. 1. pag. 28.

[E] If it be true ... that ANTHONY GOVEA taught ... at Grenoble.] I muſt leave a thouſand particulars uncertain for want of books. They that left them ſo firſt, though they had Libraries of all ſorts at hand, are much more to blame than I. However my doubts will engage ſome Readers to endeavour to clear them up (α). I give this hint again in this place with ſo much the leſs ſcruple, that I am perſuaded that this Dictionary will not be read but by peace-meals. So that a hint given but once would run the hazard of being never obſerved.

Andrew Schottus would be proper to perſuade me of what I read in Thuanus concerning Govea's being Profeſſor at Grenoble, if I did not obſerve that in the very ſame paſſage, in which Schottus declares that Govea read Lectures in that city, he writes with the utmoſt inaccuracy. Here follows the whole paſſage (6). Cadurci jus annos aliquot magno concurſu docuit, & Valentiæ Delphinatus anno a Chriſto nato 1555. ad tit. de vulgari & pupillari Subſtitutione dictabat. Toloſæ 6 antea anno Andreæ natura atque animo fratri, beneficiis vero parenti librum de Jure accreſcendi inſcripſit. Gratianopoli ad Legem Falcidiam, quæ perdifficilis eſt, dictabat anno 1566 (7). Quarto poſt anno uxorem ibi domum duxit, ex eaque liberos ſuſtulit Petrum & Manfredum, quorum illum Petrus Bertrandus Cadurcorum Epiſcopus in baptiſmi fonte ſuſceperat. i. e. "He had read Lectures "at Cahors for ſome years to a very numerous audi- "ence, and he read on the Law concerning Intail either "common or relating to pupils at Valence in Dauphiné "in the year 1555. Six years before he had dedicat- "ed his Book concerning the Improvement of the "Law, to Andrew Govea, by nature and inclination "his brother, but a father by his favours. He explain- "ed the Law Falcidia, which is very difficult, at "Grenoble in the year 1566. Four years after, he "married there, and had two children by his wife, "Peter and Manfred, to the former of whom Peter "Bertrand, Biſhop of Cahors, ſtood God-father." The natural meaning of this account is; 1. That Govea taught the Law at Cahors before he taught it at Valence, that is to ſay, before the year 1555. 2. Secondly, that he taught it at Grenoble in the year 1566, and married there in the year 1570. 3. Thirdly, that the Biſhop of Cahors ſtood God-father to his eldeſt ſon. Theſe three particulars are ſo prepoſterouſly related, that they cannot but greatly diſpleaſe the Reader. Good ſenſe will tell you, that Govea was Profeſſor at Cahors, when he deſired the Biſhop of that place to do him the honour to be God-father to his ſon. Now, according to the account I have tranſcribed, he was Profeſſor at Cahors before the year 1555. What then does Schottus mean, when he aſſerts that Govea read Lectures at Grenoble in the year 1566, that he married there in the year 1570, and that the Biſhop of Cahors was God-father to his eldeſt ſon? Is it not with a great deal of reaſon, that I miſtruſt Father Schottus's account. A Civilian of Germany, who reprinted at Leipſic the Lives of ſome Lawyers, encreaſes my doubts; for this

(6) Andr. Schottus, Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 401.

(7) Paul Freherus, who tranſlates this in his Theatro, pag. 849. puts anno 1555, and even begins a new paragraph with it; in which he commits two egregious blunders.

Counſellor at Grenoble, and read Lectures in the Univerſity of Valence. There is another obſervation to be made with regard to Thuanus's account [F]. I ſhall obſerve, by way of Supplement to Moreri, that Govea was ſtudying the Law at Toulouſe in the year 1539; that he had already taught at Bourdeaux in the ſame College, of which his brother was Principal; that in the year 1542 he read Lectures at Paris under his uncle [G]; that ſome

Jeſuit makes a very ſtrong objection with regard to thoſe words, Gratianopoli ad Legem Falcidiam.... dictabat 1566. i. e. "He explained the Law Falci- " dia at Grenoble in the year 1566." The objection is as follows. Videtur hic Schottus temporis rationem minus recte obſervaſſe; fieri enim non potuit ut prælectiones ſuas ad L. Falcidiam anno demum 1566 habuerit Govianus Gratianopoli, qui eaſdem jam anno 1560 Michaeli Hoſpitalio Franciæ Cancellario inſcripſerat (8). i. e. "Schottus does not ſeem to have been accurate " here in his Chronology: For how is it poſſible, that " Govea ſhould not have read his Lectures on the Law " Falcidia at Grenoble till in the year 1566, ſince he " had already dedicated them in the year 1560 to Mi- " chael de l'Hoſpital Chancellor of France."

(8) Frider. Jac. Leickherus, In not. ad Vitas Clariſſ. Juriſconſultorum, p. 202, 203, edit. Lipſ. 1686.

Obſerve, that Stephen Paſquier aſſerts (9), that Antonius Goveanus taught the Law at Grenoble, and died there. He is miſtaken at leaſt in the laſt particular. I have juſt now read in the XIIth Letter of Languet's IId Book, dated February the 13th 1560, that Govea was Profeſſor at Grenoble. Ei (Cujacio) Valentiæ ſuccedet Gribaldus, pulchrum ſane par, ubi ipſe & Loriotus conjuncti fuerint, & habuerint Gratianopoli vicinum Goveanum, qui utroque eſt longe ſceleratior. i. e. "Gribal- " dus will ſucceed him (Cujacius) at Valence; this will " make a noble pair indeed, when he and Loriot ſhall " be united, and ſhall have for their neighbour at " Grenoble, Govea, who is much more wicked than " them both."

(9) Paſquier, Recherches, liv. 9. chap. 38. pag. m. 898.

* (α) My doubts will engage ſome Readers to . . clear them up.] This has been done in the Paris Edition of Monſieur Bayle's Dictionary, where we meet with the following account. "Govea had a Profeſſor's Chair " at Toulouſe in the year 1549. The next year he " dedicated his Book de Jure accreſcendi to his bro- " ther Andrew, whom he thought ſtill alive. The " Dedication is dated, Toloſæ. Id. Auguſti MDXLIX. " (From Toulouſe, Auguſt the 15th, 1549). From " this date I infer that Mr. Bayle is miſtaken, who " places Andrew's death in June 1548; I place it one " year later. Towards the end of Auguſt 1549 An- " thony Govea went to Cahors, where he married in " September following, and read Lectures there for " five years. In 1554 he accepted a Profeſſor's Chair " at Valence, and kept it but one year. In his Trea- " tiſe de vulgari & pupillari Subſtitutione it is ſaid, Dic- " tabat Anton. Goveanus Valentiæ Delphinatus anno " MDLV. (He dictated it at Valence in Dauphiné " in the year 1555.) Towards the end of the ſame " year, that is to ſay of the Academical year, which " ends towards the month of Auguſt, he removed to " Grenoble. Schottus ſays, Gratianopoli ad Legem " Falcidiam dictabat anno 1566. This is what raiſed " Mr. Bayle's doubts; but it is probable only an er- " ror of the preſs, inſtead of 1556, which is the true " date... He dedicated thoſe Lectures to the Chancel- " lor de l'Hoſpital by a Dedication dated, Gratiano- " poli Id. Martii MDLX. That is to ſay, March " the 15th, 1560, or 1561, if the year be ſuppoſed " to begin with January §." CRIT. REM.]

§ From the Critical Remarks, printed at the end of Mr. Bayle's Diction. of the Paris edition.

[F] There is another obſervation to be made with regard to Thuanus's account.] His words are (10), Ab Æmilio Ferreto qui Avenione jus civile docebat, cum Lugduni privatis ſtudiis intentus deſideret (Antonius Goveanus) ad illius perplexæ ſcientiæ profeſſionem evocatus eſt. The whole connection of the Diſcourſe ſhews, that Ferret did not exhort Govea to ſtudy the Law, but to teach that ſcience: this is even plain enough by the very words I have tranſcribed, and which Du Rier has tranſlated thus. "Æmilius Ferret, who taught " the Civil Law at Avignon, invited Govea to go " thither, to profeſs that laborious and difficult ſci- " ence there, ſeeing that he ſpent his time in private " ſtudies at Lyons." Let us aſſert therefore that Thuanus declares in thoſe words that Govea was prevailed upon by Ferret to go and teach the Law at Avignon. Two objections may be urged againſt this; the firſt is taken from Thuanus himſelf, who having obſerved that Govea ſoon found the true method of teaching the Law, and was ſo much admired, that Cujacius was jealous of him, adds, Igitur Goveanus Toloſæ primum, dein Divione Cadurcorum, poſt Valentiæ & Gratianopoli jus civile magna auditorum frequentia profeſſus eſt. This whole account is then as follows. Govea invited by Ferret to go and teach the Law at Avignon, ſoon became an excellent interpreter of the Civil Law, ſo that he even raiſed Cujacius's jealouſy. He taught therefore the Law firſt at Toulouſe, then at Cahors, and afterwards at Valence and Grenoble before a very numerous Audience. May we not aſk this great Hiſtorian, how he came to omit Avignon here? Does he not plainly contradict himſelf (β)? Ought he not to have ſaid that Govea taught firſt in that city? The ſecond objection is grounded on the account that is given in the Bibliotheca Hiſpana; in which there is a ſhort life of Govea extracted from his own works. It is indeed obſerved there, that he taught the Law at Cahors, at Valence, and at Grenoble, but as for Avignon and Toulouſe it is only obſerved that he ſtudied the Law in thoſe cities with the utmoſt application. Juvenis natu grandior tres fere annos in juris civilis ſtudio operam dedit Æmilio Ferretto Avenione profitenti, ſuæ memoriæ facile principi; quemque parentem alterum appellare Lib. 2. de Juriſdictione non dubitat; neque ex eo tempore a Juriſconſultorum libris longius unquam oculos dimovit, Toloſæ mox tanta in ſtudio aſſiduitate tantaque eſt uſus contentione ut majore non poſſet (11). i. e. "Being grown up a youth he employed almoſt " three years in the ſtudy of the Civil Law under Æ- " milius Ferret Profeſſor at Avignon, the moſt eminent " man of his time, and whom he ſtiles a Father, in " his ſecond Book of Juriſdiction; from that time he " never left off reading Law-Books, and ſoon after " applied himſelf to that ſtudy at Toulouſe, with the " utmoſt diligence and aſſiduity." A famous Hiſtoriographer of Savoy (12) would perplex the accounts of a great many Authors, if he were in the right to aſſert, that the Duke of Savoy founded an Univerſity at Mondevis in the year 1559, and choſe amongſt other learned men Anthony Govea to be one of the Profeſſors there.

(10) Thuanus, lib. 38. pag. 769.

(11) Bibliosh. Hiſpan. Schotti, pag. 300.

(12) Guichenon, Hiſt. de Savoy, tom. 1. pag. 678.

* (β) Does he not contradict himſelf?] The Author of the Critical Remarks, printed at the end of the Paris Edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary, pretends, that theſe words of Thuanus ad illius Scientiæ profeſſionem evocatus, do not ſignify that Govea was Profeſſor at Avignon, but only that he ſtudied there. Let the Reader judge whether Thuanus's words can be thus tranſlated. But here follows a more conſiderable miſtake of that noble Hiſtorian, which Mr. Bayle has alſo followed. Thuanus imagined that Ferret was at Avignon when he exhorted Govea to ſtudy the Law; whereas the truth of the matter is that Ferret was then at Lyons with Govea; and ſeeing that this learned man ſpent his time in Poetry, and in trifles, he adviſed him ſeriouſly to the Law: and offered to direct him in that ſtudy, and to be in a manner his Profeſſor. Govea himſelf tells us all this at the end of his Treatiſe de Jure accreſcendi. His words are: Operam tamen annos ferme tres Lugduni dedi Æmilio Ferreto .... cum ille & reſpondendo & monendo, & interdum aliquid veluti prælegendo, ſatisfaceret ſtudio noſtro civilis diſciplinæ. CRIT. REM.]

† From the Critical Remarks, printed at the end of the Paris edition of Mr. Bayle's Dictionary.

[G] In the year 1542 he read Lectures at Paris under his uncle.] When Anthony Govea the nephew went to Bourdeaux in the year 1534, he had already been ſome years Principal of the College of St. Barbara in the room of Andrew Govea (γ) his uncle (13). Since therefore Andrew Govea was Principal at Paris in the year 1542 (14), he muſt have taken his office again when his nephew went to Bourdeaux. This is what Elias Vinet ſhould have obſerved expreſly to make his account more clear and intelligible.

(13) Andreas apud Patruum Grammaticam primum, mox Philoſophiam profeſſus, ab eodem ſcholæ illi tandem præfectus fuit. Vinet. in Bibliotheca Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(14) Illic (Lutetiæ) Antonium Goveanum vidi primum an. à Chriſto nato 1542, quum docceret apud Patruum. Idem, ibid.

* (γ) In the room of Andrew Govea.] It is obſerved in the Critical Remarks mentioned above, that Anthony Govea was not made Principal of the College ſome time after he returned to his brother at Bourdeaux; that he continued in that City after his brother was gone to Conimbra (h); that he paſſed for an Atheiſt in ſome people's opinion [H]; and that it is not at all probable that he died in the year 1565, as Thuanus aſſerts (i), nor in the year 1595, as Nicholas Antonio ſays. This laſt Author has not been here very accurate [I]. It is impoſſible to ſay any thing more to Anthony Govea's honour, than what Ronſard ſaid of him (k). The public has ſeen ſeveral of Govea's

(h) Ex Epiſt. Eliæ Veneti, apud Schottum, Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(i) See the remark [I].

(k) See below, quotation (26).

lege of St. Barbara in his uncle's ſtead, but only with him as his aſſiſtant and coadjutor, and that the uncle never reſigned his place. It is alſo aſſerted that the uncle, whom Mr. Bayle calls Andrew, ſhould be called James, which was his true name. CRIT. REM.]

[H] He paſſed for an Atheiſt in ſome people's opinion.] "He practiſed the Law at Grenoble, read Lectures "in the Univerſity of Valence, and compoſed ſome "Works in theſe two cities. He was even charged "there (15) with reflecting upon the Deity, and was "obliged to clear himſelf of that charge, which he "did in an excellent diſcourſe, which has been ſeen "formerly in the Library of Ennemond de Rabot "d'Ilins, firſt Preſident in that Parliament. This "diſcourſe engaged de Gordes, the King's Lieutenant in that Province, to declare himſelf Govea's "protector. It is for his freedom in ſpeaking that "Calvin called him an Atheiſt in one of his Works "(16)." If the Work from which I have extracted this paſſage contained two or three large volumes in folio, we might forgive the Author ſuch a general quotation: but it is only a Book in 12mo of 224 pages. The Author might very well have given himſelf the trouble to look for the paſſage in which Calvin ſpoke ſo ill of Govea: he would have obliged his Readers very much had he quoted the place; this would have ſaved them the trouble of turning over eight or nine volumes in folio. I ſhall not commit the ſame fault though my work be never ſo large. I ſhall tranſcribe Calvin's words, and ſet down the page where they are to be found. Agrippam, Villanovanum, Doletum & ſimiles vulgo notum eſt tanquam Cyclopas quoſpiam Evangelium ſemper faſtuoſe ſpreviſſe. Tandem eo prolapſi ſunt amentiæ & furoris, ut non modo in Filium Dei execrabiles blaſphemias evomerent, ſed quantum ad animæ vitam attinet, nihil a canibus & porcis putarent ſe differre. Alii (ut Rabelæſus, Deperius, & Goveanus) guſtato Evangelio eadem cæcitate ſunt percuſſi. Cur iſtud? Niſi quia ſacrum illud vitæ æternæ pignus, ſacrilega ludendi aut ridendi audacia ante profanârunt (17). i. e. "It is commonly "known that Agrippa, Villanovanus (that is Servet) "Dolet, and ſuch other men, have always like ſome "Cyclops proudly deſpiſed the Goſpel. They are "come at laſt to ſuch a degree of madneſs and folly, "as not only to belch out the moſt abominable blaſphemies againſt the Son of God, but alſo to imagine, "that with regard to their ſouls they did not differ in the "leaſt from dogs or hogs. Others (as Rabelais, Deperius, and Govea) having once had a taſte for the "Goſpel, have been ſtruck with the ſame blindneſs. "For what reaſon? Becauſe they had before profaned "that holy pledge of eternal life by their impious au"dacioufneſs in laughing and bantering at all that is "ſacred." We find by theſe words that Govea was a banterer, and that at firſt he approved the Proteſtant party. This particular is not much known. Here follow two Verſes againſt Govea relating to his infidelity.

Antoni Goveane, tua hæc Marrana propago,
In cælo & cellis non putat eſſe Deum.

That is, "Anthony Govea, your Lawyers imagine "that God is neither in heaven nor in the cellar."

Theſe Verſes were made in anſwer to the following diſtich, which had been wrote againſt a Counſellor (18).

Dum tonat, in cellas propero pede Vallius imas
Confugit: in cellis non putat eſſe Deum.

That is, "When it thunders, de Vallée makes all the "haſte he can into the deepeſt cellar; he thinks that "God is not in the cellars."

You will find theſe four verſes in the firſt Scaligerana, with ſome other obſervations to Govea's honour. Goveanus doctus erat vir, & valens Dialecticus, optimus poeta Gallicus, nec enim Hiſpanum judicaveris, adeo bene Gallice loquebatur. i. e. "Govea was a learned man, "a powerful Logician, and a very good French Poet: "For he ſpoke ſuch good French, that you would "never have taken him for a Spaniard." In the ſecond Scaligerana Calvin's charge of Atheiſm againſt Govea is ſaid to be ſlanderous. Goveanus fuit doctus Luſitanus. Calvinus vocat illum Atheum, cum non fuerit: debebat illum melius noſſe. i. e. "Govea was a "learned Portugueze; Calvin calls him an Atheiſt, "which he was not; he ought to have known him "better."

[I] Nicholas Antonio has not been here very accurate.] He aſſerts (19), that Anthony Govea taught the Law at Toulouſe about the year 1539. But Elias Vinet deſerves more credit, ſince he had been particularly acquainted with Andrew and Anthony Govea, and was deſired by Andrew Schottus to write their Lives and ſend them to him. Now he only ſays that in the year 1539 Anthony Govea was already ſtudying the Law at Toulouſe (20). The difference there is between teaching the Law and ſtudying it is obvious to every Reader. Nicholas Antonio adds, that Govea was ſoon after Profeſſor at Paris and at Bourdeaux, and that at laſt he ſettled at Cahors, where he read Lectures on the Law with very great reputation, which flying as far as Turin, determined the Duke of Savoy to keep him in his ſervice, by making him his Maſter of Requeſts, and his Counſellor. Cadurci demum ſubſtitit Juris civilis anteceſſor in ſummo laudis atque exiſtimationis loco poſitus. Quod cum proſpexiſſet ab ipſa Auguſta Taurinorum Sabaudiæ Dux, &c. (11). All this is very inaccurate. Govea had been much nearer to Savoy ſince he left Cahors; he had read Lectures in the Duke of Savoy's neighbourhood, namely at Valence in Dauphiné. The Prince's offers did not go to him in the Province of Quercy, he made himſelf above two thirds of the way to meet them. Beſides this, the Princeſs Margaret (22) Henry IId's ſiſter, and the Duke of Savoy's conſort, recommended him to her huſband. Now, as ſhe was learned, ſhe always took care to enquire who were thoſe that diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their wit and learning. Nicholas Antonio pretends, that Govea was ſtill living in the year 1595; for, ſays he, Teſauro the younger mentions him honourably under that year in his XIXth Queſtion forenſe or Law-Queſtion. If I had that Book, I could diſcover perhaps, that it is not the Govea we ſpeak of, but his ſon, that is thus commended: and though I could not diſcover this, I would ſtill believe that Govea did not live till the year 1595; for Vinet ſpeaks of him as a man who was dead (23). Now Vinet died in the year 1587 (24). Nicholas Antonio ſuppoſing erroneouſly that Govea was living in the year 1595, cenſures Elias Vinet (25), who thought that Govea died at the age of ſixty years. This cenſure is grounded on Govea's teaching the Law at Toulouſe in the year 1539. He is in the right to infer from thence, that if Govea was ſtill alive, as he ſuppoſes, in the year 1595, he died older than Elias Vinet imagined. This conſequence is not ſo evident, if it be ſuppoſed that Govea ſtudied the Law in the year 1539; but yet it will have a great weight, becauſe Vinet obſerves that Govea had taught a Form at Bourdeaux before he ſtudied the Law at Toulouſe. Now the Teacher of a Form is generally above twenty years old; ſo that Govea muſt have been at leaſt three ſcore and ſeventeen years old in 1595. What have you then to ſay againſt Nicholas Antonio, will ſome Reader aſk? Is not Vinet vanquiſhed with his own arms? I anſwer, not at all; for ſince he died in the year 1587, he could not ſuppoſe that Govea was ſtill living in the year 1595, and it is only upon this ſuppoſition that Nicholas Antonio's cenſure can be well grounded. It is very certain that he did not know when Vinet died, his cenſure is an unqueſtionable proof of this inconſiderable ignorance. He did not know alſo that Thua-

(19) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 97.

(20) Literas ante profeſſus eſt, quam ego qui veni an. Chriſt. 1539. quo tempore Toloſæ jam operam juri dabat. Vinetus, in Epiſt. ad Schott. in Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(21) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 97.

(22) Thuanus, lib. 38. pag. 770.

(23) Qui Taurinis deceſſiſſe fertur Libellorum ſupplicum Magiſter. i. e. "Who, as "it is reported, "died at Turin, "where he was "Maſter of the "Requeſts." Vinetus, apud Schott. Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(24) Thuanus, lib. 88. pag. 137.

(25) He calls him erroneouſly Elias Venetus. The ſame blunder is in Schottus's Bibliotheca Hiſpanicar.

(15) This ſignifies very plainly that he was charged both at Grenoble and at Valence; but it is not at all probable that the ſame charge was twice brought againſt him. In all likelihood the Author did not expreſs himſelf accurately. He meant that Govea was accuſed in one of thoſe two Cities. But he had done well to expreſs his meaning without equivocation, and to tell us whether it was at Valence or at Grenoble that Govea was accuſed.

(16) Allard, Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, pag. 118, 119.

(17) Calvinus, in Tractatu de Scandalis, in Volumine Tractatuum Theologicorum, pag. 90. col. 1. edit. Gen. 1611.

(18) In the Parliament of Bordeaux and not of Toulouſe, as it is aſſerted in the Prima Scaligerana, pag. 86. See Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 262. where he ſhews, that this Counſellor's name was Briand de Vallée.

Govea's works both upon Philological ſubjects and upon the Law. Some perſons mention that he had a greater genius than the famous Cujacius [K]. I ſhall give ſome account of his ſon MANFRED GOVEA [L].

(26) I confeſs, that he gives him much greater praiſes there, tho' he mentions him but occaſionally, than where he ſpeaks of him ex profeſſo, that is, purpoſely. He places him in the number of thoſe few learned ſchool-maſters, who by an uncommon happineſs were abſolutely free from all pedantic manners. Buchanan, Turnebus, and Muret are the three others whom he places in the ſame rank, according to Ronſard's taſte. See the Article BUCHANAN, quotation (29).

§ See the end of the remark (a).

(27) Antonius Faber, in Præfat. lib. 7, & ſeq. Conjectur. ad Petrum Fabrum. apud Leickherum, in Not. ad Vitas Clariſſ. Juriſconſultorum. pag. 200.

nus made Govea's Elogy; for if he had known it, he would have quoted it, and would not have been contented with another paſſage, in which that great Hiſtorian mentions Govea only occaſionally (26). Further, ſince Thuanus places Govea's death under the year 1565, Nicholas Antonio would certainly have taken notice of that miſtake, which according to his account is very great. Several Authors follow Thuanus in this, eſpecially Monſieur Allard in page 119 of his Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, and Konig in page 356 of his Bibliotheca vetus & nova. But Andrew Schottus is not of that number, ſince he affirms in page 301 of his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, that Govea read Lectures in the year 1566, and got children even ſince the year 1570 §.

[K] Some perſons maintain that he had a greater genius than the famous Cujacius.] Anthony Faure pretends, that Govea and Cujacius have been the moſt eminent Civilians of their time; but with this difference, that Govea having a more happy genius, and truſting too much to his natural parts, thought it was neither neceſſary nor honourable for him to labour much. Whereas Cujacius, who had a leſs penetrating genius, laboured like a man who was ſenſible that by a cloſe application we may even come at thoſe things, which cannot be acquired but by the dint of wit. They who underſtand Latin will perhaps be pleaſed to ſee how Anthony Faure delivered this judgment. Talis ætas noſtra maximos in Juriſprudentia viros non paucos, ſed præcipuos, ſi quid mei ingenii eſt, (cæterorum pace dixerim) Anton. Goveanum & Jac. Cujacium. Illum, ut mihi quidem videtur, multo feliciore ingenio ad Juriſprudentiam natum; ſed qui naturæ viribus tam confideret, ut diligentiæ laudem ſibi non neceſſariam, minus etiam fortaſſe honorificam putare videretur. Hunc contra minus lucido præſtantique ingenii acumine, ſed qui aſſiduo labore ea quoque ſe aſſequi poſſe crederet, quæ ſolis ingenii nervis parari queunt (27). Cujacius himſelf had almoſt the ſame opinion of Govea; he would have yielded the palm to him without diſpute, had he thought him as laborious as he was ingenious. Adoleſcens (Cujacius) Antonii Goveani Juriſconſulti ingenium admirabatur, ſed indiligentia hominis notata, nihil deterritus eſt, deterritum iri ſe dicens a jure tractando, ſi homo Luſitanus tanto ingenio tamque ſubtili, labores civilium ſtudiorum ſerio ſuſcipere ac ſubire voluiſſet (28). i. e. "Cujacius being ſtill young, admired the great genius of the Civilian Anthony Govea; but taking notice of this man's inapplication, he was not diſcouraged from purſuing the ſtudy of the Law, as he would have been, ſaid he, if this Portugueze, who had ſo great and ſo ſubtle a genius, had applied himſelf ſeriouſly and with care to the ſame ſtudy."

(28) Pap. Maſſo, in Vita Cujacii, pag. 300, 301.

Paſquier ſets Cujacius above Anthony Govea. Let us again, ſays he (29), take a view of the three claſſes of thoſe that wrote upon the Law. In the firſt, I have a great value for Accurſius amongſt the Gloſſographers. In the ſecond, Bartolus. . . . Amongſt thoſe of the third, whom I chooſe to ſtyle Literati, I give the firſt rank to our Cujas, who in my opinion, has not, and perhaps will never have his equal: and amongſt the latter I know none that wrote a more elegant ſtyle than Govea and Duaren, conſidering how little they both wrote; and of them two I give the firſt rank to Govea. I do not underſtand how it can be ſaid that Duaren wrote but little; for his works make up a large volume in folio (d).

(29) Paſq. Recherch. liv. 9. ch. 10. pag. 902.

* (d) Duaren has wrote a great deal leſs than Cujacius. And this is what Paſquier meant, not L. 9, ch. 10, p. 902, but l. 9, ch. 39, p. 902, according to the Edition of 1643. CRIT. REM.]

[L] I ſhall give ſome account of his ſon MANFRED GOVEA.] He was born at Turin, and became a very good Writer both in verſe and proſe. He underſtood the Belles-Lettres, and the Civil and Canon Laws very well, and was much eſteemed by his maſter the Duke of Savoy, who honoured him with the Employment of Counſellor in the Senate of Turin, and in the Council of State. He died in the year 1613. He publiſhed Conſilia, (Advices). Notæ & Animadverſiones in Opera Julii Clari. i. e. "Notes and Obſervations on the Works of Julius Clarus." Carmina, (Poems). Orazione funebre nella morte di Filippo II, Re di Spagna (30). i. e. "A funeral Oration on the Death of Philip II, King of Spain."

(30) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro, Part. 2. pag. 189.

GOULART (SIMON) a native of Senlis, and Miniſter of Geneva, was one of the moſt indefatigable Writers of theſe latter times [A]. When he did not put his name to his books, he uſed to mark it by theſe three initial letters S. G. S. which ſignified Simon Goulart of Senlis (a). It is by this mark that F. Labbe (b) thought, and not without reaſon, he had diſcovered him to be Author of the marginal notes and heads, which are printed with the Annals of Nicetas Choniates in the Geneva edition of 1593. Goulart died very old at Geneva in the year 1628 [B]. He uſed to date his Dedications from St. Gervais, which is the name of a part of the City of Geneva. If it

(a) They call him in the Oxford Catalogue, Simon Goulartius Senliſienſis Sylvanectinus: they ſhould have put five between the two laſt words.

(b) De Script. Eccleſ. tom. 2. pag. 765.

[A] He was one of the moſt indefatigable Writers of thoſe latter times.] This appears by the great number of Works, on which he wrote Notes or Summaries (1), or which he commented upon, or tranſlated into French, or compoſed himſelf. Du Bartas's Semaines or Weeks is one of the Books on which he wrote Commentaries. He did not only tranſlate into French Camerarius's Hiſtorical Meditations, he alſo made a great many additions to them. He has made a large Collection of wonderful and remarkable Hiſtories. You will find in La Croix du Maine the titles of ſeveral Works tranſlated into French by Simon Goulart; as the Hiſtory of Portugal (2), Carion's Chronicle; ſome Treatiſes of Theodoret, the Books of John Wier concerning the impoſtures of the Devils: add to them all the Works of Seneca publiſhed at Paris in two volumes in 4to in the year 1590. This ſame Author wrote alſo ſeveral Treatiſes of Devotion, and upon moral ſubjects, as alſo upon the occurrences of his time. D'Aubigné commends theſe laſt Works; for having mentioned the titles of ſome Books of that kind, he continues thus: "To which I ſhall add the learned, "pathetick writings, abounding with ſtrong argu- "ments, which Simon Goulart of Senlis publiſhed on "ſeveral occaſions, a man worthy to write Hiſtory, "if his character would ſuffer him to write without "partiality (3)."

(1) He has done this upon all Plutarch's Works, tranſlated by Amiot.

(2) Written by Oſorius.

(3) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. tom. 3. liv. 3. chap. 23. pag. m. 401.

I have obſerved in the margin that Simon Goulart added Notes and Summaries to Amiot's Tranſlation of Plutarch. We muſt alſo obſerve that he added ſome Parallels to it, on which Monſieur Varillas does not paſs a favourable judgment. "How learned ſoever, "ſays he (4), Simon Goulart of Senlis Miniſter of "Geneva, might have been in our Fathers time, and "what care ſoever he took to add to the French Tranſ- "lation of Plutarch the Parallels that are wanting in "the Greek original, there is yet but one of them "good for any thing; it is that between Alexander "the Great and Julius Cæſar."

(4) Varillas, Hiſtoire de Louis XI, liv. 9. in the beginning, pag. m. 358, 359.

[B] He died very old . . . in the year 1628 (a).] We find in a Letter he wrote to Scaliger October the 17th 1606 (5), that he had then almoſt completed his ſixty third year. There are but few perſons who continued their paſtoral functions as long as he has done; for he ſucceeded Calvin in the year 1564 (6).

(5) It is the 52d of the 3d book, in James de Reves's Collection.

* (a) Simon Goulart died aged 86 years, and had preached but ſeven days before his death, as D'Aubigné obſerves in the laſt page of his little miſcellaneous Works, where we find this Miniſter's Elogium. CRIT. REM.]

(6) Spon, Hiſt. de Geneve, pag. m. 263.

it were not known that he did the ſame in thoſe letters, which were not deſigned to be publiſhed (c), one might imagine that he made uſe of this manner of dating, becauſe it could not raiſe ſuch ſuſpicions againſt his works in the minds of the Roman Catholics, as the name of Geneva would have done. He was very well acquainted with all the particulars relating to Authors and Books; and it was for this reaſon that Henry III ſent a man on purpoſe to Geneva, in order to know from Goulart, who the Author was that concealed his name under that of Stephanus Junius Brutus to publiſh ſome very republican maxims. But Goulart, who knew the whole ſecret, would never reveal it, leſt he ſhould thereby expoſe thoſe that were concerned in it (d). Scaliger had a great eſteem for him [C]. One of Simon Goulart's ſons was a Miniſter of the Walloon Church at Amſterdam, and a ſtrenuous aſſertor of the Arminian party [D].

(c) See his Letters to Scaliger, in the Collection publiſhed by James de Reves, at Harderwick 1624.

(d) See his Funeral Oration, delivered by Monſ. Tronchin, Profeſſor of Divinity.

[C] Scaliger had a great eſteem for him.] "Monſieur Goulart's.... Lucubrations on St. Cyprian's "works are very uſeful. He was an ingenious man, "who learnt all that he knew without the aſſiſtance "of a maſter. He applied himſelf but late to the "Latin tongue, when I was at Geneva. I have "heard that his ſon's flock is very well pleaſed "with him. Monſieur Goulard has laboured ſo "well and ſo prettily on his St. Cyprian, that I "have read it from the beginning to the end. His "ſermons were very plain. He cauſed Montagne's "works to be caſtrated. Quæ audacia in ſcripta "aliena! Non putaſſem Goulartium, quod ſerius in-"cepit, tam bene poſſe ſcribere, ut fecit (7) i. e. What "a boldneſs with regard to other people's writings! "I ſhould never have thought that Goulart, who "began but late to ſtudy, could have wrote ſo "well as he has done." I ſhall juſt now mention this ſon of Goulart.

(7) In Scaligeranis, pag. m. 97, 98.

[D] One of his ſons.... was a ſtrenuous aſſertor of the Arminian Party.] Being challenged by a young miniſter, who was his collegue, he ventured to preach once againſt thoſe who aſſert that ſome children who die at the breaſt, or in their mother's womb, are damned for ever by the decrees of reprobation. He was for this ſuſpended in the year 1615 (1). He was one of thoſe remonſtrant Miniſters who were depoſed from their offices, and baniſhed the country, becauſe they refuſed to ſubſcribe the articles of the ſynod of Dort. He retired to Antwerp, whence he wrote ſome letters, which have been inſerted in the collection I quote in the margin. In March 1620 he wrote a letter (9) to his Father, in which he mentions a book he had publiſhed two years before with this title: Examen des Opinions de M. F. Baſſecourt (10) contenues en ſon Livre de diſputes, intitulé, Election éternelle & ſes dependances. i. e. "An examination of M. F. Baſſecourt's opinions, "contained in his book of diſſertations, intitled, "eternal election, with the doctrines relating to it." He retired into France after the truce between the Dutch and the Spaniards was expired, and ſtaid ſome time at Calais, whence he went into the Dutchy of Holſtein. There is one of his letters (11) in which he does not give a good character of the miniſters, with regard to the religious war, which raged then in France. According to Monſieur Witte, he was born at Senlis (12) and died at Fredericſtad in the year 1628, aged fifty two years. Monſieur Mollerus, who thought him a native of Geneva before he read the ſecond volume of the Diarium Biographicum, changed his opinion, when he knew that Monſieur Witte aſſerted that he was born at Senlis. Senliſienſem Silvanectinum eſſe rectius forte tradit vir Clariſſimus Henn. Wittenius (13). Mollerus's firſt opinion ſeems more probable to me than the laſt; and as he obſerves, that Witte aſcribes to Goulart the ſon ſome works, which ſhould be aſcribed to Goulart the Father, he might have obſerved alſo, that in all likelihood the time of the Father's death has been miſtaken for that of the ſon's death (14). See what he has obſerved ſince in his book de Scriptoribus homonymis, i. e. of writers who have the ſame name, in page 678, and 679.

(8) See the Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, pag. 414. edit. in folio.

(9) It is the 374th of the ſame Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ, &c.

(10) He was a Miniſter who had been a Monk.

(11) It is the 424th. See pag. 696.

(12) Senliſienſis, Silvanectinus. Witte, Diar. Biograph. tom. 2. pag. 35. He ſhould have put five, between theſe two words. Mr. Mollerus, ubi infra, tranſcribes them without a comma.

(13) Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſt. Cherſ. Cimbr. Part. 2. pag. 223.

(14) Witte puts Goulart the ſon's death on the 19th of March 1628.

☞GOULSTON, GOULSON, or GULSON (THEODORE), an eminent Engliſh Phyſician in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in Northamptonſhire (a), and was ſon of Mr. William Goulſton, Rector of Wymoundham in Leiceſterſhire (b). He became Probationer Fellow of Merton College in the Univerſity of Oxford in 1596, where he took the degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts, and afterwards applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Phyſic, which he practiſed firſt in Oxford, and afterwards at Wymoundham, where he was greatly reſorted to for his advice. April the 30th 1610, he took the degree of Doctor of Phyſic, and became Candidate of the College of Phyſicians at London, being well approved by the Preſident, Cenſors, and Fellows; and the year following he was made a Fellow of the ſame, and Cenſor thereof. He was ſoon introduced into a very large practice in the City of London, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage by his ſkill in the Latin and Greek Languages, and Divinity, and by his Writings [A]. His affection to the public good and to the advancement of the Faculty of Phyſic was ſuch, that by his laſt will and teſtament he gave two hundred pounds to purchaſe a rent-charge for the maintenance of an annual Lecture within the College of Phyſicians of London. This Lecture was to be performed from time to time by one of the four youngeſt Doctors in Phyſic of the ſaid College, and to be upon two, or three, or more diſeaſes, as the Cenſors ſhould direct; and this Pathological Lecture to be read yearly in ſome moſt convenient ſeaſon betwixt Michaelmas and Eaſter upon ſome dead body (if poſſibly by any means ſuch a body could be procured) on three days ſucceſſively, in the forenoon and afternoon of each of the ſaid days (c). He left likewiſe ſeveral books to Merton College, beſides ſeveral other donations, which were performed by his widow Ellen, who being poſſeſſed of the impropriate Parſonage of Bardwell in Suffolk, procured leave from the King to annex the ſame to the Vicarage, and gave them both to the College of St. John's in Oxford. Our Author died at his houſe within the pariſh of St. Martin Ludgate May the 4th 1632, and was interred with great ſolemnity in the Church of that pariſh.

(a) Dr. Charles Goodall's Epiſtle Dedicatory to his Hiſtorical Account of the College of Phyſicians Proceedings againſt Empirics and unlicenſed Practiſers &c. edit. London 1684 in 4to.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 569. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Dr. Goodall, ubi ſupra.

GOULU

[A] His Writings.] They are as follow: I. Verſio Latina & Paraphraſis in Ariſtotelis Rhetoricam London 1619, 1623, &c. in 4to. II. Ariſtotelis de Poeticâ Liber Latinè converſus, & Analyticâ Methodo illuſtratus. London 1623 in 4to. III. Verſio, variæ Lectiones, & Annotationes criticæ in opuſcula varia Galeni. London 1640 in 4to, publiſhed by his friend Mr. Thomas Gataker, B. D. and Rector of Rotherith in Surrey.

H

GOULU (NICHOLAS) in Latin Gulonius, the ſon of a vine-dreſſer near Chartres [A], was made Regius-Profeſſor of the Greek Tongue in the Univerſity of Paris in the year 1567 (a), in the room of John Daurat, one of whoſe daughters he had married. He has tranſlated out of Greek into Latin Gregentius's diſpute with the Jew Herbanus (b), which Giles de Noailles, the French King's Embaſſador to the Grand Signior, had brought with him from Conſtantinople. This Tranſlation, to which Nicholas Goulu added ſome Notes, was printed with the Greek Text at Paris in the year 1586. They had already printed in the ſame City in the year 1580 a Collection of ſeveral of this Profeſſor's works [B]. He had two ſons, John and Jerom, of whom we ſhall give ſome account hereafter. Magdalen Daurat his wife was a learned woman. We find in her epitaph that ſhe underſtood the Greek, Latin, Italian and Spaniſh tongues. I borrow all theſe particulars from Monſieur Menage (c). The reader will find in the Articles of Nicholas Goulu's ſons, or in the Remarks below, what I have ſtill to obſerve concerning his works. It is ſomewhat probable, that d'Aubigné had him in view in the eighth chapter of the firſt book of his Baron de Fæneſte. That paſſage is very ſmart and ſatyrical [C]. Some perſons wonder that Daurat did not oblige his ſon-in-law to change his name of Goulu [D].

(a) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. 365.

(b) Menage, Rem. ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 232, & 501.

(c) Ibid.

[A] He was the ſon of a Vine-Dreſſer near Chartres.] William Du-Val, who in his catalogue of the Regius-Profeſſors writes, that Goulu was a native of the province of Limouſin, is miſtaken; and he fell perhaps into that miſtake by conſidering that Daurat, who gave Goulu one of his daughters, and reſigned his Profeſſorſhip to him, was of that province. Goulu himſelf declares at the head of ſome Latin Poems, which he publiſhed, that he was a native of the Dioceſe of Chartres (1).

(1) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 251, 252.

[B] They have printed a collection of ſeveral of this Profeſſor's works.] Namely his tranſlation of Apollinarius's Greek Paraphraſe on the Pſalms; a Paraphraſe in Greek verſe of the Magnificat, of the Nunc dimittis, of Zacharias's Song; an hymn to Jeſus Chriſt; and a preface in Greek verſe to Apollinarius's Paraphraſe. This book was unknown to the laſt continuator of Geſner's Epitome, and to Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who wrote ſupplements to that Epitome: nor is it to be found in the catalogues of Draudius, of Oxford, of Thuanus, nor in that of the Archbiſhop of Rheims.

[C] That paſſage is very ſmart and ſatyrical.] I could wiſh, for the learned Magdalen Daurat's honour, either that Nicholas Goulu had been twice married, and that the Quatrain I ſhall tranſcribe related to his other wife; or that d' Aubigné had not been miſtaken with regard to the native Country of the perſon he mentions, in which caſe his ſatyre would not relate to Nicholas Goulu. However it be, he ſpeaks thus. There was at Paris a learned man named le Goulu, who was a native of the Loudunois. He was angry, when his wife took in thoſe that ſtudied the law to board at his houſe; he would not ſuffer any other boarders but ſchool-boys, which occaſioned the following Quatrain or Stanza.

Du Goulu ſavant ne prend gueres
Les barbus pour penſionnaires;
Il choiſit les petits enfans,
Mais la Goulue les veut grands.

* Goulu ſignifies Greedy.

" The learned Greedy * never car'd
" To take in boarders with a beard;
" He chooſes only little boys;
" But miſtreſs Greedy loves great toys.

What might make us ſuſpect that this does not relate to John Daurat's ſon-in-law, is, that he is not called Profeſſor nor Reader of the Greek tongue, of which, probably, d'Aubigné was not ignorant; and he was not the man, who on ſuch occaſions would omit any thing that could ſerve to make the perſons, he mentioned, known. Let this particular therefore remain undetermined, if you will have it ſo. Du Verdier Vau-Privas did not know our Goulu's Chriſtian name. Daurat, ſays he (2), had a daughter whom he married to G. Goulu public Reader of the Greek Tongue, with whom he had had ſome diſputes, and ſpeaking of him he uſed to call him mon Goulu; i. e. my greedy man.

(2) Proſopogra-phie, tom. 3. pag. 576.

[D] Some perſons wonder that Daurat did not oblige his ſon-in-law to change his name of Goulu.] I borrow this Remark from Monſieur Baillet. " This ſame " Daurat, ſays he (3), who ſeemed to be aſhamed of " and quite diſguſted with his name of Diſnemandi *, " did not ſcruple to give his daughter . . . to another " learned man, named Goulu, which ſignifies ſome- " thing meaner ſtill than the word Diſnemandi, and is " not much better than the Lurco † of the Latins. " After what he did with regard to his own name, " it is a wonder that he did not inſert in his daugh- " ter's marriage-articles, that the name of Goulu ſhould " be altered, and it is ſurpriſing, that he ſuffered not " only his daughter but even his grand children to " go under that name, and ſhould even make it fa- " mous and immortal, without taking any other li- " berty but that of turning it very indifferently into " Latin, by the word Gulonius." This is indeed ſurpriſing; for on the one hand it was a common thing at that time amongſt the Learned to alter their names; and on the other it is ſomewhat vexing to have a name, which raiſes ſome diſagreeable notions, and gives a handle to make a thouſand ſilly alluſions. It is very probable, that when the ſeveral families began to be diſtinguiſhed by proper names, ſome perſons received the name that fitted them on account of ſome defect under which they laboured; hence it happened very probably that in all countries ſome families are called by the name of Le Aveugle (the Blind) Le Boſſu (the Crooked) Le Noir (the Black). Upon this ſuppoſition Daurat ought to have diſliked a name, which hinted that he was deſcended from an hungry perſon; and that his ſon-in-law had not a better origin. I omit the ſilly jokes, which the Poets of Balzac's party grounded on the name of Father Goulu, his adverſary. See the Vaticinium Galateæ de exitio Pantophagi, prefixed to the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron's anſwer (4).

(3) Auteurs déguiſez, pag. 156.

* See the Remark [B] in the article DAURAT.

† A greedy man, a glutton.

(4) Compare this with what you will find above in the remark [A] of the article FEUARDENT.

GOULU (JOHN) the ſon of the preceding, was not perhaps a more eminent man than his father, but he made a greater noiſe in the world. He was born at Paris Auguſt the 25th 1576 (a); and being admitted an Advocate, he deſigned to follow that profeſſion at the Bar of the Parliament of that City, but he had the misfortune to be at a ſtand in the firſt cauſe he pleaded [A]; and it is thought that this diſgrace determined him

(a) S. Romuald, Thréſor. Chron. under the year 1629.

[A] He had the misfortune to be at a ſtand in the firſt cauſe he pleaded.] I quote for my voucher one of Father Goulu's enemies; namely, the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron (1), who relates the ſtory in ſuch a manner, that it appears evidently from a great number of circumſtances, which he mentions, that the firſt time the Lawyer John Goulu pleaded, he was ſo unhappy as not to know how to continue his diſcourſe.

(1) Réponſe à Phyllarque, pag. 74, &c.

him to leave the world, and retire into a Convent. He chose the Order of the Feuillans, and entered amongst them 1604. He was so much esteemed in his Order that he always enjoyed some office in it, and was at last made General of the Order [B]. The name he took, when he became a Monk was Dom John of St. Francis. As he understood the Greek tongue, he translated into French Epictetus's Manual, Arrian's Dissertations, some of St. Basil's Treatises, and the Works of Dionysius Areopagita [C]. To this last Translation he added a Vindication of this St. Dionysius's Works. He also revised his father's Latin Translation of St. Gregory Nyssen against Eunomius, and published it. It is inserted into the edition of St. Gregory Nyssenus (b), which Fronto Ducæus procured (c). Father Goulu would not confine himself to Translations only; he also meddled with controversy, and wrote a book against Du Moulin's Treatise of the Calling of Pastors [D]; De la Vocation des Pasteurs. We have also the Life of Francis de Sales Bishop of Geneva, written by Father Goulu, and his Funeral Oration on Nicholas le Fevre Preceptor to Lewis XIII; but it is pretended that he never delivered it [E]. To tell the truth, he did not gain a great reputation by all those writings. But there happened an affair to him in the year 1627, for which he was very much talked of [F]. A Feuillant who

(b) Labbe, de Script. Eccles. tom. 1. pag. 382.

(c) At Paris in the year 1615.

The Author dares not to assert, that he ventured a second time to plead at the Bar, and had the same misfortune again. But he asserts (2) that some persons have said it, and he hints (3) that John Goulu never ventured to preach after he entered amongst the Feuillans. But Balzac declares the contrary in the following words. "His picture, says he (4), is shewn as a "piece of curiosity in a house in the galleries of the "Louvre; it is made by the Painter of the Heroes and "Heroines; and so well drawn, that you would think "it alive if it did but speak. Nay, some persons "will tell you, that this silence is not so much a want "of art in the Painter, as a natural propriety of my "adversary, and that when he pleaded at the Bar of "the Parliament, or when he PREACHED in the Chapter-house (for he has been both a Lawyer and a "PREACHER) he was used to keep thus his gravity, "and to conclude his discourse before he had said any "thing. Some wicked persons are pleased to ridicule "him on that account, and quote amongst other instances that of the dumb Rhetorician, whom the "Poet Ausonius (5) so egregiously banters, and on "whose picture he jokes thus at the end of an Epigram, What does Rufus in his pulpit? The same he "does in his picture."

(2) Ibid. pag. 75.

(3) Ibid. pag. 80, 83.

(4) Relation à Menandre, Part. 1. pag. m. 309.

(5) In the 47th Epigram.

A REFLECTION on the crime of quoting falsly.

I shall quote another passage, not because the same story is mentioned in it, but because it may be of use, to undeceive those that imagine, it is not a great crime, to quote an Author's words unfairly, in order to render him odious. I maintain that this wickedness is the same with that of those Notaries, who falsify a deed. But let us hear upon this subject a man, whose eloquence is very noble. Confess to me, says he (6), that it is a remarkable effect of God's Providence, that he so visibly prevented that man from following the course of living, to which he was determined, and banished him from the Bar by that famous disgrace that happened to him in a full Court. The fatal blow, with which his tongue was struck, has been the preservation of a thousand families, and was a great happiness for all the widows and orphans, that would have fallen into his hands; and on that day God did visibly preserve this Kingdom from several false Contracts and forged Testaments, with which his great wit threatned it (7). Let us observe that Father Goulu's Elogium, which I shall quote in the following Remark, mentions him as a man, who might have distinguished himself amongst the most famous Lawyers. Foro jam assuetus, ubi celeberrimus inter Jurisconsultos tunc temporis eminere possit. One ought not to dispute in an Elogium the privilege of being surreptitious, but it should not enjoy that of being obreptitious.

(6) Balzac, Oeuvres diverses, Disc. 14. pag. m. 377.

(7) The foundation of all this is, that it was pretended Goulu had falsified and altered the passages he quoted from Balzac. See concerning this crime the Avis au petit Auteur des petits Livrets, i. e. "Advices "to the little "Author of lit-"tle Pamphlets," which were published during the Controversy concerning the imaginary cabal of Rotterdam, in the years 1691, and 1692.

(8) Menage is one of them, Remarques sur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 252.

(9) It was printed in the year 1629; F. de Visch has inserted that Elogy into his Biblioth. Script. sacri Ordinis Cisterciensium, pag. 220.

(10) Pag. 72.

[B] He chose the Order of the Feuillans . . . and was made General of that Order.] They who have asserted that he was twice General of his Order (8) did not consult his Elogium, in the second Edition of his Dionysius Areopagita (9). We read in that Elogium, that after his noviciate he always enjoyed some office in his Order, and that at last he was raised to the highest post, in which he continued six years, after which he was made Counsellor and Assistant to the person who succeeded him in it. Whence it appears that La Motte-Aigron is mistaken, who asserts (10) that Dom John Goulu was three years General of his Order. He wrote that in the year 1627 or 1628; and Father Goulu died in the beginning of the year 1629, being then no more General of the Order, which post he had filled six years: the consequence of all this is obvious to every Reader. An Author of Livonia asserts (11), that this Father was General of the Congregation of the Cistercians; he should have said of the Congregation of the Feuillans, which is a branch of the Cistercian Order.

(11) Witte. Diar. Biographic. in Append.

[C] He translated into French Epictetus's Manual . . . and the Works of Dionysius Areopagita.] I have not mentioned every one of these Translations in a Chronological Order. But I shall give a more accurate account of them here. The first was that of St. Dionysius Areopagita, which was printed in the year 1608, and reprinted in the year 1629, and in the year 1642. His second Translation was that of Epictetus; it was published in the year 1609; and it appears by the Licence for printing it, that he had undertook it for the use of Queen Mary de Medicis. The third was that of St. Basil's Homilies on the Hexameron or six days work of Creation; it was printed in the year 1616 (12).

(12) Ex Biblioth. Cisterciens. Caroli de Visch.

[D] He wrote a Book against Du Moulin . . . . of the Calling of Pastors.] I find a great difference between the Monk St. Romuald, and the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron, not only with regard to the merit of this Answer, which the latter despises as much as the former commends it; but also with regard to the time when this Answer was made. It was during Francis de Sales's life, if we may believe the Monk, who tells us (13), that this Prelate having read the Book of the Calling of Pastors in answer to Du Moulin, judged that Father Goulu was the only person worthy to succeed Cardinal du Perron in his labour against Heresy. But la Motte-Aigron pretends (14), that this Father took it into his head to write this Answer after Coëffeteau's death, and he wonders, that he dared to presume he was capable to succeed Coeffeteau in the great controversies he had carried on with Du Moulin. Francis de Sales died some months before Coeffeteau; he could not therefore see F. Goulu's Answer, if it was not undertook but at the time set down by la Motte-Aigron. But that the Reader may know where the error lies, I must observe that Father Goulu's Work against Du Moulin was printed in the year 1620, and that Coeffeteau did not die before the year 1623.

(13) Thresor. Chronol. under the year 1627.

(14) Pag. 91, 92.

[E] We have . . his funeral Oration on N. le Fevre . . but it is pretended that he never delivered it.] La Motte-Aigron asserts it positively; we ought therefore to read with some consideration what Moreri observes, in the Article of Nicholas le Fevre, namely that John de Saint François, a Feuillant made his funeral Oration. Monsieur de Balzac (15) quotes a passage of it, which is written in a very bombast and harsh style. It was printed the first time in the year 1612: the Author did not put his name but to the second Edition of it, which was published in the year 1616. To the third Edition were added two Treatises (16).

(15) Relat. à Menandr. Part. 3.

(16) Biblioth. Cisterciens. Caroli de Visch.

[F] There happened to him an affair in the year 1627, for which he was very much talk'd of.] This is the true Æra of Balzac's controversy with Father Goulu: For it was the Apology published for the former, and printed off April the 8th 1627, which exasperated the latter. I own that Balzac is chiefly attacked in the first volume of Phyllarque's Letters, which was published the same year; but Balzac's Apologist is also attacked now and then in those Letters. This shews that who went only by the name of Frere André (d), i. e. Brother Andrew, had made a ſmall collection of ſuch thoughts, which he imagined Balzac had only borrowed or imitated from others. They who envied Balzac's reputation, cried up that piece ſo much, though it was only handed about in manuſcript, that it gave riſe to the apology of Balzac, which his good friend Ogier publiſhed, and in which Brother Andrew was very ſeverely treated. The copy of it which was ſent to F. Goulu, who was then General of the Order, was taken for a challenge, and exaſperated him to the utmoſt degree. He publiſhed two volumes of Letters againſt Balzac, which are written in the moſt paſſionate manner. He ſtiled himſelf there Phyllarque, that is to ſay, the Prince of the Leaves, as his adverſaries have explained it; and we may be certain that he hinted at his title of General of the Feuillans *, when he diſguiſed himſelf under that fictitious name. In order to have a true notion of his animoſity, you need only obſerve, that, as much as lay in his power, he would perſuade all the world to procure Balzac's deſtruction, and gave him up to the whole ſeverity of the temporal power. He even endeavoured to perſuade the Ladies to puniſh this adverſary. He courted their favour by the flattering elogium of beautiful Ladies (e), and declared to them, that if they had the leaſt courage in the world, they were under an obligation to put Balzac's eyes out with the points of their needles, or in caſe they would have ſome mercy upon him, to make him ſuffer at leaſt the ſame puniſhment, which the Court-Ladies deſigned to make John de Meun undergo. It was whipping. Father Goulu's zeal, who thus in a book exaſperated all the world againſt an Author, whoſe only crime was that he had employed ſome thoughts either dull, too free, or too immodeſt, and that he did not keep within bounds the heat and hyperboles of his riſing imagination, that zeal, I ſay, which he exerted in printed books, was not the moſt miſchievous. That of his emiſſaries, who as far as their authority reached, and wherever they could be admitted, publiſhed in converſation a thouſand things againſt Balzac's reputation [G], as is cuſtomary with bigots [H], was much more dangerous. It was then that Father Goulu became very famous [I]. He had on his ſide firſt almoſt all

(d) It is him, whom Balzac calls Dom André de St. Denys, in the Letters he wrote to him after their reconciliation. See the remark [C] of the article BALZAC (John &c.)

* Feuille in French ſignifies a Leaf.

(e) Letter 15 of the 1ſt vol.

Monſieur Menage and the Sieur Peter Borel are miſtaken, who aſſert, the one (17), that the Prior Ogier anſwered Father Goulu's Books againſt Balzac, in a Work which he intitled, Apologie de Monſieur de Balzac; An Apology for Monſieur de Balzac; the other (18) that Des Cartes interceded very ſeaſonably in the year 1625 for Balzac againſt Father Goulu, with Cardinal Barberini the Pope's Legate in France. It is certain that Prior Ogier's Book was publiſhd before Phyllarque's Letters, and that Balzac had no quarrel with F. Goulu in the year 1625.

(17) Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 252.

(18) Vitæ Carteſii Compendium.

The Sieur Richelet has committed the ſame blunder as Monſieur Menage. Father Goulu, ſays he (19), inveighed more bitterly againſt Balzac; for he wrote a very outrageous cenſure againſt his works; and this might have given ſome uneaſineſs to that eloquent man, had not Monſieur Ogier, a young Clergyman, ſhewed in an Apology, that the good Father was in the wrong. It would be in ſome meaſure neceſſary, to follow in matters of fact the ſame advice which Des Cartes gives with regard to philoſophical ſpeculations; that is to ſay, to examine every thing anew, without minding what other perſons have wrote of them. But there is infinitely leſs trouble in truſting to the teſtimony of others; and this is what prodigiouſly multiplies the witneſſes of falſe accounts.

(19) Richelet, Vies des Auteurs François, prefixed to a Collection of Letters, pag. xlii.

[G] His Emiſſaries . . . . publiſhed in converſation a thouſand things againſt Balzac's reputation.] The proof of this is to be found in the Relations à Menandre, (Accounts given to Menander). You will find there (20), that Monſieur Balzac was never called otherwiſe than a Monſter in all the places that were under the Juriſdiction of the General of the Feuillans, and that he was known under no other name by the Novices and Lay-brethren. You may ſee there Monſieur de Balzac's complaints againſt the devices and artifices of the ſlanderers. "Nothing has been omitted, ſays he (21), "that could raiſe my adverſary's fame and ruin my "reputation. A controverſy of the School has been "turned into an affair of the State, and a little diſpute "concerning ſyllables and words, has been raiſed to a "general war between the men of wit. A great many "falſe ſtories have been related to my prejudice, and a "great many more to my adverſary's honour. All the "votes have been ſued for, all the Corporations have been "petitioned, all France has been moved in his favour. "Neither Orators, nor Poets, nor Paraſites have been "wanting to cry him up, to ſing his praiſes, and to drink "his victory in all good companies . . . . (22). Not to "mention the ſecret practices that are carried on out of "the Kingdom, nor the monſtrous character that has "been publickly given me in all the Courts in Chriſtendom, it will be ſufficient to acquaint you with "what paſſed at Paris during the firſt heat of the controverſy. For three months, a certain number "of his party were ſeen every morning to leave their "habitation, and to go two and two to take their "quarters, being ordered to do me ill offices in every "part of the little world, and to ſpread their ſlanders "every where, with an intent to raiſe the mob againſt "me, and oblige them to treat me as their Superior had "done my Book. . . . To increaſe their number, they "have courted ſome men, who are already condemned "by the voice of the people; men noted for their diſſolute and ſcandalous life; famous thro' all France "for their wicked opinions in matters of Faith, and "by their contempt for our holy myſteries. They "have offered to thoſe men, who would imagine it? "and yet it is true; they have offered to them their protection againſt the Jeſuits. They have encouraged "them under the ſtings of conſcience, and againſt the "threatnings of the Law: it is certain that they have "promiſed them their favour, and that they would "give them a character, in caſe they were ever charged with profanation and impiety, or with any other "capital crime, if they would but join with them on "this occaſion, and declare war againſt me under the "banner of my adverſary."

(20) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, pag. 310. edit. of Roan, 1658, in 8vo.

(21) Ibid. pag. 336.

(22) Ibid. pag. 339.

[H] . . . As is cuſtomary with bigots.] This is their practice. Some of them write Libels, which others cry up in all companies; and there are no cavils but by this means paſs for ſtrong arguments upon an infinite number of perſons. This is a Play that is acted in every Country. Theſe men give ſuch glaring proofs of what they are, that it is not a difficult taſk to draw their character to the life. This has lately been done by ſome Wits at Paris (23). But what avails it to draw their character? Their artifices and underhand dealings are not the leſs dreadful for it.

(23) Madam des Houliéres, Monſ. de la Bruyére, the Abbé de Villiers, &c.

[I] . . . . It was then that Father Goulu became very famous] Beſides what I have juſt now quoted from the account to Menander, here follows another paſſage from it, which proves admirably well that this quarrel ſpread Father Goulu's name far and near (24). Some of his party have aſſerted, that he has received a Brief from our holy Father the Pope. . . Others have aſſerted, that the Convocation of the Clergy ſent him a Deputation to congratulate him upon the good ſucceſs of his arms. . . . There is never a Prince nor a Princeſs, a Lord nor a Lady of Quality, but he ſent them his Books in pomp, moſt of all the Monks [K], becauſe Balzac had mentioned their learning with a little too much contempt; ſecondly all thoſe that envied this young Author's great reputation. A great many writings were publiſhed on both ſides (f); they came even to make uſe of ſword and piſtol, which in all likelihood ſilenced ſome Writers, who did not care to come to blows. Father Goulu did not long enjoy the pleaſure of having raiſed ſuch a great diſturbance in the Republic of Letters; for he died January the 5th 1629 (g) [L], and was buried in the Choir of the Feuillans at Paris. It was obſerved in his epitaph amongſt other things, that by his writings he had reſtored the French tongue to its exactneſs (h). Monſieur de Balzac complained loudly of this [M]. One of his champions, named La Motte-Aigron, publiſhed ſome particulars relating to Father Goulu, which are remarkable [N].

(24) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, pag. 337, 338.

(f) See Sorel, Biblioth. Franç. chap. vii.

(g) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 252. Saint Romuald, Journal Chronol. tom. 1. pag. 24.

(h) Scriptis ſuis mirum quantum adulteratam eloquentiæ puritatem revocaverit, conſervaverit, illuſtraverit. i. e. "By his writings "he has wonderfully reſtored, preſerved, "and illuſtrated "the pureneſs of "Eloquence, "which was "corrupted."

GOULU

of them bound like Primers or Prayer-Books. They have croſſed the Rhine, the Danube, the Ocean; they have flown over the Alps and Pyrenean hills; they are the ſubject of every converſation, and find a place in every Library: Whole cart-loads of them have been ſent to the Siege la Rochelle . . . (25). His picture is ſhewn as a piece of curioſity in a houſe in the galleries of the Louvre . . . A man muſt not belong to the Court, and not be curious in the leaſt, who has not ſeen the figure of that dreadful Prince.

(25) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, pag. 309.

[K] He had on his ſide . . . almoſt all the Monks.] It is for very good reaſons that I made uſe of a limitation, ſince Monſieur de Balzac declares (26), that a great many honeſt Monks had publickly blamed Father Goulu's conduct. Whole Orders, continues he, that is to ſay, as he himſelf tells us a little lower, the chief perſons of their Societies bore witneſs to my innocency, and proteſted againſt my enemy's diſhoneſty. . . . . There have been ſome, even of his own Order, who have not been very well pleaſed with his action. . . . He has not received from the ancient and the grave, thoſe elogies, which the young and the gay have beſtowed on him. . . And beſides, all is not ſo well joined and united in his own party, but ſome parts ſuffer or make others ſuffer. That venerable Body has its wounds and hidden infirmities: and if I had a mind to make an advantage of the diviſions I have obſerved in it, and to improve the ill will of thoſe that are diſcontented, I might make a conſiderable diverſion. And it is certain that offers have been made to me even from Italy, and that ſome perſons would furniſh me with memoirs, of which I refuſed to make any uſe. He hints in another place (27), that if he did not exert his whole ſtrength againſt a Monk, it was becauſe he would not give the Huguenots the pleaſure to banter the Monks. It was perhaps for the ſame reaſon that the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron never publiſhed the Latin Book with which he had threatened (28) Father Goulu, and in which he would have diſcovered a great many myſteries. Such is the advantage of being liſted in the ſervice of the Church; a man dares not to preſs his adverſary too cloſe, and whether he will or not, he muſt let him go unpuniſhed, leſt he ſhould afford thoſe of other Religions an opportunity to banter. I have mentioned (29) a man, who diſſuaded his ſon from being a Lawyer, and to perſuade him to enter into holy Orders, urged a very good argument to him; but he omitted another which is ſtronger ſtill; I mean that very impunity which I have juſt hinted at.

(26) Ibid. pag. 342, 343.

(27) Ibid. pag. 316.

(28) Reponſe à Philarque, pag. 71, 322.

(29) Above, remark [L] of the article ACCIUS.

[L] He died January the 5th, 1629.] The Author of Father Goulu's Elogium, and Peter de Saint Romuald, from whom I borrow this date, add that Father Goulu died aged fifty four years. I could not admit this, after I had read the date of his birth, which I found in St. Romuald, namely Auguſt the 25th 1576. I do not know whether I have followed a good guide. For though one would think that St. Romuald ought to have been well acquainted with this particular, conſidering he was a Feuillant, yet it cannot be denied that he has refuted himſelf, ſince he has aſſerted in the Abridgment of his Theſaurus, and in his Chronological Journal, that Father Goulu died aged fifty four years. It is a ſad thing that we ſhould be obliged to make uſe of ſuch inaccurate Writers; it would be much better if we had to do with Authors whoſe blunders are in ſome meaſure conſiſtent together. A Writer who follows now one account, and then another, ſhould at leaſt give us notice in which of them he was miſtaken. However it be, the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron is guilty of a very great negligence; for when he wrote againſt F. Goulu in the year 1628, he gave him ſixty odd years (30), and made him about twenty years older than the Samaritan woman is (31).

(30) Pag. 101.

[M] Monſieur de Balzac complained loudly of this.] See his Latin Poem intitled Crudelis Umbra, i. e. "the "cruel Shadow; and the Letter (32) in which he ſo wittily applies to his adverſary theſe two lines of Ovid:

(31) Pag. 72.

(32) It is in pag. 243. of the Paris edition 1651, in 12mo.

Ergone & adhuc metuendus erat? Cinis ipſe ſepulti
In caput hoc ſævit: tumulo quoque ſenſimus hoſtem (33).

(33) Ovid. Met. 13. ver. 503. makes Hecuba ſay this of Achilles, who required that Polixena ſhould be ſacrificed.

That is,

"What! Is he ſtill to dread? Can he do more?
"But ſee, he ſtill purſues me as before.
"With rage rekindled his dead aſhes burn,
"And from his grave I feel my foe return."

Peter de St. Romuald aſſerts in his Chronological Treaſure (34), that Monſieur Corneille made Father Goulu's Epitaph. Obſerve that the Duke of Vendôme natural ſon of Henry IV, and his ſpouſe Frances de Lorraine cauſed Father Goulu's Epitaph, which is upon his tomb, to be put there. Monſieur Menage aſſerts it in page 252 of his Remarks on Peter Ayrault's Life.

(34) Under the year 1629.

[N] La Motte-Aigron publiſhed ſome particulars relating to Father Goulu, which are remarkable.] Father Goulu (35), being ſtill but a Tutor at a Gentleman's houſe who lived at Paris, went with him into the Province of Angoumois, and lodged at the houſe of Monſieur de la Motte-Aigron's father. He was afflicted there with ſuch a violent thirſt, that they were obliged to give him drink in all ſorts of companies, and even in the night-time he was forced to get up to drink. He was happily in a country which abounds with wine. But in all this plenty the ſmallneſs of the glaſſes ſerved only the more to provoke his thirſt. They ſearch for the biggeſt in the houſe, and amongſt all their friends; but as none could be found that were large enough for him, they had one made on purpoſe, which is ſtill kept in the family, in memory of Phyllarque, whoſe name it bears. It was large indeed, but not to be compared with Neſtor's cup; for three men were not wanted to lift it up from the table; any perſon might have taken it up with both hands. This diſtemper of F. Goulu (36) is more extraordinary, than that which obliged him to eat nothing but fleſh, when he lodged again in the ſame houſe a great many years after, being then General of his Order; though (37) he had ſuch a freſh complexion, and ſeemed ſo well in health, that it could not be believed he wanted to be excuſed from ſubmitting to the rules of a monaſtick life.

(35) Reponſe à Philarque, pag. 318.

(36) Ibid. pag. 322, 324.

(37) Reponſe à Philarque, pag. 330.

I do not know where la Motte-Aigron found that Neſtor's Cup could not be carried but by three men; Homer does not ſay this; he only obſerves, that when it was full any other perſon but Neſtor could hardly lift it up; but that Neſtor did it with eaſe.

Ἄλλος μὲν μογέων ἀποκινήσασκε τράπεζης
Πλεῖον ἐών· Νέστωρ δ' ὁ γέρων ἀμογητὶ ἄειρεν.

Alius quidem non ſine labore ſubmoviſſet e menſa
Plenum exiſtens: Neſtor vero ſenex ſine labore tollebat (38).

(38) Homer. Iliad. lib. 11. ver. 635.

In the eleventh Book of Athenæus we meet with a long explication of all Homer's Verſes, which relate to this Cup; but far from finding any thing there, proper to ſupport the Sieur de la Motte-Aigron's opinion, I read there, that we muſt not underſtand Homer, as though he had ſaid that none of the Greeks could have lifted that Cup, but only that no old man, ſuch as Neſtor was, could have done it. Hercules, who was a hard drinker GOULU (JEROM) younger brother of the preceding, was Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue in his father's ſtead, to whom he ſucceeded at the age of eighteen (a) in the year 1595 (b). He has been afterwards a Phyſician of the Faculty of Paris. I mention his children in a remark [A]. It has been aſſerted in the Elogium of the General of the Feuillans, that he reſigned to his younger brother his right to ſucceed his father in the Profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue [B].

(a) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 254.

(b) Du Breul, Antiquit. de Paris, pag. 565.

(39) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 21.

(39), had a large Cup, but I do not find that three men were wanted to carry it; Statius ſuppoſes but two:

Huic pretium palmæ gemini cratera ferebant
Herculeum juvenes. Illum Tyrinthius Heros
Ferre manu ſola, ſpumantemque ore ſupino
Vertere ſeu monſtri victor, ſeu Marte, ſolebat (40).

(40) Stat. Theb. lib. 6.

We might relate a great many particulars concerning Hercules's Cup, which, according to ſome Authors, was ſo prodigiouſly large, that it ſerved him for a ſhip at ſea (41); but all this would not be here in its proper place (42).

(41) Macrobius, Saturn. lib. 5. cap. 21.

(42) I mention all that in the remark [D] of the article HERCULES.

[A] I mention his children in a Remark.] He was married with Charlotte de Monantheuil, the daughter of Henry de Monanthueil, Dean of the Faculty of Phyſick at Paris, and Regius Profeſſor of Mathematicks. From this marriage came amongſt other children NICHOLAS GOULU who wrote a Book containing the Elogiums of the Goulu's. JAMES, Steward to the King under the name of Monſieur de Monanthueil; and Martha, wife of Renatus Labitte Advocate in the Parliament, grand-nephew to that James Labitte, Judge of Maienne who made the Index to the Books of the Civilians, and whom Cujacius has honourably quoted in the IIt Chapter of the IVth Book, and in the XVth Chapter of the Vth Book of his Obſervations (1).

(1) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault, pag. 254.

[B] The General of the Feuillans . . . reſigned to his younger brother his right to ſucceed his father in the Profeſſorſhip of the Greek Tongue.] Here is the beginning of that Elogium (2). Inter Gallos doctrina illuſtres Joannes Gulonius annumerari meretur, quem Nicolaus Pater (Joannis aurati Gener, ac in regia Græcæ Linguæ Profeſſione ſucceſſor) ſingulari naturæ bonitate præditum adoleſcentem non vulgariter & adeo felici ſucceſſu inſtituit, ut ab Academiæ Pariſienſis Curatoribus digniſſimus ſit judicatus, qui ſublato è vivis parente literariam ejus profeſſionem ſuſciperet: ſed in fratrem ſe minorem muneris iſtius functionem paterna pietate tranſmiſit. i. e. "John "Goulu is uſually reckoned amongſt the Frenchmen "eminent for their learning. His Father Nicholas "Goulu, John Daurat's ſon-in-law, and his ſucceſſor "in the Profeſſorſhip of the Greek Tongue, gave his "ſon ſo good an education, and had beſides ſuch happy "natural talents, that the Directors of the Univerſity "of Paris judged him worthy to ſucceed his father. "But he reſigned that office with a fatherly kindneſs to "his younger brother."

(2) Apud Carol. de Viſch, Bibliotheca Ciſterc. pag. 220.

GOURNAI (MARY DE JARS Lady of) Montagne's daughter by alliance [A], and famous for her learning. See in Moreri of what family ſhe was, and ſome other circumſtances of her life. I have not a great many things to add to his account of her. We find in the Perroniana a very diſobliging ſtroke againſt this Lady [B], it is with regard to a Satyr in which ſhe was concerned, and which was a conſequence of the Anti-Coton [C]. There was alſo a Libel publiſhed, intitled the Anti-Gournai (a). Cardinal du

(a) See the remark [C], towards the end.

[A] She was Mortagne's daughter by alliance.] She ſhewed no leſs reſpect or zeal for this father by alliance, than for her true father. You will eaſily grant it, if you will conſider what ſhe obſerves in her Preface to Montagne's Eſſays. She cauſed that Book to be printed in the year 1635, and dedicated it to Cardinal de Richelieu. The Preface which ſhe added to it deſerves to be read, and cannot but be particularly acceptable to thoſe that love the Hiſtory of Books and Editions. The judgment ſhe paſſed on Montagne's firſt Eſſays, and the kindneſs ſhe expreſſed, grounded only on the eſteem ſhe had for him a great while before ſhe had ſeen him, gave this Author an occaſion to make a great many reflections, and gave riſe to the alliance. He eſteemed her from that time, and foretold that ſhe would be capable of the greateſt performances (1).

(1) See Montagne's Eſſays, B. 2. ch. 17. towards the end. pag. m. 606.

Paſquier acquaints us with ſome circumſtances of this kind of adoption. Michael de Montagne, ſays he (2), "left two daughters: the one born of his marriage, "who inherited his whole eſtate, and is honourably "married; the other his daughter by alliance, who "was heir to his learning: both of them very "virtuous Ladies. But above all things, I cannot "cloſe my Letter without giving you ſome account of "the latter. I mean the Lady de Jars, who is related "to ſeveral eminent and noble Families in Paris; ſhe "deſigns never to have any other huſband but her own "honour improved by the reading of the beſt Books, "and amongſt others, of Montagne's Eſſays; as he "continued a great while at Paris in the year 1588, "ſhe went on purpoſe to viſit him, that ſhe might "know his face. The Lady de Gournay her mother "and ſhe took him with them to their houſe of Gour-"ney, where he ſtaid with them three months in two "or three journeys he made thither, being always en-"tertained as civilly and kindly as he could wiſh. "Laſtly, this virtuous Lady hearing of his death; "croſſed almoſt all France, by the help of a "paſs-port, both of her own accord and at the deſire "of Montagne's widow and daughter, who had in-"vited her to come and mix her tears and lamentati-"ons, which were exceſſive, with theirs. This is in-"deed a remarkable circumſtance."

(2) Paſq. in the 2d vol. of his Letters, liv. 18. p. m. 384, 385.

[B] We find in the Perroniana a very diſobliging ſtroke againſt this Lady.] I ſhall tranſcribe the whole paſſage. As Monſieur Pelletier told him (3) one day, that he had met with Mademoiſelle de Gournay, who was going to preſent a Petition to the Lieutenant criminal (4), to obtain a prohibition of the Defence of the Butter-women, becauſe in that pamphlet ſhe was called a proſtitute, who had ſerved the publick, he told me, I believe the Lieutenant will not order her perſon to be taken, for few perſons would care for the trouble; and as for what is aſſerted, that ſhe ſerved the publick, it was ſo privately, that it is only affirmed by gueſs; and to perſuade us of the contrary, let her but prefix her picture to her Book. This is what I once told Mademoiſelle de Surgeres, who deſired me at Monſieur de Rets's houſe, to write an Epiſtle to be prefixed to Ronſard's Works, in order to ſhew, that there was not the leaſt diſhoneſty in his love for her. I anſwered, inſtead of that Epiſtle you need only prefix your picture to the Work. I am perſuaded, that the Lady de Gournai would have taken his raillery for a deadly affront, tho' nature had abundantly made her amends for the defects of her face by the perfections of her mind, ſo that though ſhe were deſpiſed with regard to her body, ſhe had matter of comfort ready at hand, and even a powerful motive to boaſt. It is not at all probable that ſhe ever was humble enough, to diſclaim all eſteem for her bodily charms, as much as right reaſon required ſhe ſhould. I doubt whether the virtue of the greateſt women-ſaints would be proof againſt ſo great an affront as the following would be. To put an end to the ſlanders of all thoſe ſatyrical Wits, who publiſh abroad that you have not been ſo ſtrictly continent as you ought, you need only to ſhew either your face or your picture. It is certain that Cardinal du Perron carried the injury beyond all bounds, and I imagine that the Lady de Gournai would rather have choſen to be ignorant, and to have but little wit, than to paſs for a perſon ſo deſtitute of all charms, as a maiden would be who had kept her maidenhead only becauſe nobody cared to take it.

(3) That is to ſay, to Cardinal du Perron.

(4) I think that the prohibiting of books belongs to the Lieutenant-Civil.

[C] On account of a Satyr in which ſhe was concern- ed,

du Perron eſteemed this learned Lady, notwithſtanding his bitter raillery againſt her: he is in the catalogue of thoſe that commended her [C]. The little penſion which ſhe had from the Court was punctually paid (b); ſhe lived in a conſtant celibacy. She was very welcome to the Princeſſes [E]. It had been better for her not to write againſt thoſe that ſupported the Anti-Coton. A perſon of her ſex ought carefully to avoid that kind of controverſies. The ſatyrical writers are ruſtical fellows, they have no regard for their adverſaries (c); they attack the women in the moſt ſenſible part. This Lady was repreſented not only older than ſhe really was [F], but alſo as a diſſolute woman (d). They have publiſhed almoſt at the ſame time two different ſtories concerning Monſieur de Racan, and Mademoiſelle de Gournai [G]. I think it ſtrange that Moreri ſhould aſſert, that this Lady's Works were not publiſhed but after her death (e).

(b) See the remark [D].

(c) Ruſtica progenies neſcit habere modum.

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) See the remark [D].

Monſieur

ed, and which was a conſequence of the Anti-Coton.] This Satyr is called in the Perroniana la Defenſe des Beurrieres, the Vindication of the Butter-women, I am apt to believe that this is not the true title, and that it ſhould have been called le Remerciment des Beurrieres, i. e. "The Thanks of the Butter-women." For I have read a Satyr (5) which is intitled, Le Remerciment des Beurrieres de Paris au Sieur de Courbouzon Montgommery i. e. "The Thanks of the Butter-women at Paris to "the Sieur de Courbouzon Montgommery;" in which we meet immediately (6) with theſe words: And particularly by the noble vindication of the Fathers Jeſuits, who follow the example and directions of the Lady de Gournai, who has always ſerved the publick well; you have cauſed to be publiſhed a week ago &c. Some pages lower we find this (7). There have been ſome unſkilful perſons of late, ſays a Butter-woman to the Sieur de Courbouzon, who pretended to incroach upon you, and to intice your cuſtomers away, as, for inſtance, one Pelletier, and the Lady Gournay, that young virgin of fifty five years, who took upon them to publiſh vindications of the Jeſuits, as though they were concerned with them, becauſe they have been called back and reſtored at the ſuit, requeſt (α), and ſollicitation of Venus's Poſt-boy general. If we add to this the paſſage I quote in the margin (8), I am perſuaded that it will be evident, that all the complaints, which the Lady de Gournai deſigned to lay before the Judges, related to the Butter-women's Thanks. Let us obſerve, that it appears by the paſſage I have quoted from that Satyr, that the Lady de Gournai (9) had publiſhed ſome Books in favour of the Jeſuits, and againſt the Anti-Coton. Here follows the title of the Pamphlet, which is ridiculed in the Butter-women's Thanks. *Le Fleau d'Ariſtogiton, ou contre le Calomniateur des Peres Jeſuites, ſous le Titre d'*ANTICOTON, par Louis de Montgommery Sieur de Courbouzon. i. e. "A Scourge for Ariſtogiton, or "for the ſlanderer of the Jeſuits under the name of Anticoton: By Lewis of Montgommery, Sieur of Courbouzon." We may aſſert a particular, which Mr. Baillet does not aſſert (10), namely, that the Author of the Fleau d'Ariſtogiton appeared under his true name. Monſr. Baillet imagines, that Courbouzon's book was publiſhed after the Fleau d'Ariſtogiton (11); whereas it is the ſame Book. It was not enough for the adverſaries of the Jeſuits, to have abaſed our virgin the Butter-women's thanks, they alſo publiſhed a Book againſt her, which they intitled Anti-Gournai. Monſieur Baillet mentions it; but not in the place where he gives us a catalogue of the pieces that were occaſioned by the Anti Coton (12). It ſeems even that he did not know the Lady Gournai was concerned in that Anti.

(5) Printed at Niort in the year 1610.

(6) Page 3.

(7) Page 8.

(8) F. Coton addreſſed himſelf firſt to a Lady Carabiner, who had ſoon ſpent all her powder and ſhot in the defence of that venerable man; and having afterwards directed the Sieur the Courbouzon to the ſhop where this ammunition is ſold, they made him act the part of a deſperate ſoldier, like the forlorn hope of an army. Ibid. pag. 11, 12.

(9) It is her, Father Richeome calls an Amazon. See Baillet's Anti, tom. 1. pag. 146.

(10) Tom. 1. of the Anti, pag. 146.

(11) Ibid. pag. 145.

(12) See tom. 1. of the Anti, pag. 176.

* (α) Inſtead of priére (prayer or ſuit) there is brieve (ſhort) in the paſſage of that Satyr, which abounds with errors of the preſs. CRIT. REM.

[D] Cardinal du Perron . . . . is in the catalogue of thoſe that commended her.] In order to prove this, I ſhall tranſcribe a long paſſage which relates to her, in the Abbé de Villeloin's Memoirs. They that ſhall think I ought to have tranſcribed but part of it, are perſons that do not much care to know a great many particulars of the Lives of illuſtrious perſons. It is not for men of that taſte, I write; let this be obſerved once for all. This good Lady, thus ſpeaks the good Abbot de Marolles concerning the Demoiſelle de Gournai, whom I always eſteemed very much, and whom I uſed to viſit often privately, had an upright and generous ſoul. Her beauty was of the mind rather than of the body: ſhe knew a great many things, which perſons of her ſex ſeldom know. We have ſeveral works of hers both in verſe and proſe, which have been collected in one volume, and publiſhed by her ſelf with this title. Preſens de la Demoiſelle de Gournay (The Lady de Gournai's giſts.) Thoſe who pretended to turn her into ridicule, had no reaſon to boaſt of it, and ſeveral eminent men have commended her both during her life time and after her death; as for inſtance, Michael de Montagne, Juſtus Lipſius, the Cardinals Du Perron and de Richelieu, Monſieur Coſpean Biſhop of Nants, Monſieur de Rochepoſai Biſhop of Poitiers, Monſieur Seguier Chancellor of France, and the Superintendants, who always took care to pay her the very ſmall penſion which the King had granted her; nor would ſhe ever have a larger penſion upon condition to keep a coach, which I know was offered her by Cardinal de Richelieu's order. Several learned men viſited her often, and the good Lady reckoned amongſt her friends Monſieur de La Mothe le Vayer, the Prior Ogier and his brother; Meſſieurs le Habert, Ceriſai, Leſtoile, Boiſrobert, de Revol, Colletet, Malleville, all perſons well known in the Republic of Letters, and if I am not miſtaken ſhe did me the honour to place me amongſt them (13).

(13) Mémoires de l'Abbé de Marolles, pag. 58. under the year 1623. See alſo what he ſays in page 105. under the year 1636. He ſays, that he went to live in the ſtreet of St. Honoré, in this Lady's neighbourhood, who was then publiſhing the 1ſt edition of her Works.

[E] She was very welcome to the Princeſſes.] The ſame Abbé de Marolles tells us this, ſpeaking of the Duke of Retelois the Duke of Nevers's eldeſt ſon. The Lady de Gournai, ſays he (14), was one of his greateſt diverſions; and though he was of a very courtly and galant temper, yet he would leave any other Lady, to converſe with this, whether he ſaw her at his ſiſter's, or met her at his aunt's Madam de Longueville, or at the Counteſs of Soiſſons's, where ſhe went ſometimes.

(14) Ibid. pag. 58.

[F] She was repreſented older than ſhe really was.] See in the remark [C] the paſſage from the butter-women's thanks, in which ſhe is ſuppoſed to be fifty five years old, when ſhe really was but forty five. She died in the year 1645, at the age of fourſcore; ſhe could not therefore be above forty five years old in the year 1610.

[G] They have publiſhed . . . two different ſtories concerning Monſieur de Racan, and Mademoiſelle de Gournai.] The firſt is inſerted in the Menagiana (15), and the ſecond in the Recueil des bons mots (16), or Collection of witty Sayings. Monſieur de Racan and Mademoiſelle de Gournai are repreſented in the firſt, as two perſons, who uſed to ſee one another very often, and who diſcovered their minds very freely to each other when they diſliked one another's verſes. This is the higheſt degree of familiarity between Authors who are friends. On the contrary, the ſecond ſtory is entirely proper to perſuade us that theſe two perſons were at variance. This ſecond ſtory is given us as one of Boiſrobert's pretty tales, and is intitled, The three Racans. It is ſuppoſed that the Lady de Gournai longed to be acquainted with the Marquiſs de Racan; whereupon a man of wit perſuaded him to make her a viſit; but having known the day and hour appointed for it, he was ſo wicked as to ſend to the Lady a little before a Gentleman of the Court, who pretended he was the Marquiſs de Racan. This viſit being made, he went himſelf to the Lady de Gournai, and ſaid he was the Marquiſs de Racan: he was admitted, and pretended to wonder how another could be ſo bold as to borrow his name and perſonate him, in order to make this Lady a viſit. He was no ſooner gone, but the true Racan came. "The Lady de Gournai was "immediately acquainted with it; ſhe was of Gaſ-"cony (17), and conſequently ſomewhat haſty; ſhe "fell into a paſſion at the ſight of this third Racan, "and without giving him time to ſpeak, ſhe cried "out in a fury, Shall I never ſee but Racans all my "life time? and arming herſelf with her ſlipper, ſhe

(15) Printed at Paris in the year 1697.

(16) Printed at Paris in the year 1693.

(17) I do not believe that to be true. I wonder that Hilarion de Coſte, who ſpeaks ſo much of her, Vies des Dames illuſtres, tom. 2. pag. 668, &c. does not ſay where ſhe was born. The paſſage quoted from Paſquier in the remark [A] proves, methinks, that ſhe was not of Gaſcony.

Monſieur Menage's ſuppoſition in his petition of the Dictionaries, namely, that the Lady de Gournai was very much concerned for the misfortune of the obſolete words, is no fiction: for it is very true that ſhe was very angry at this alteration of the language [H]. I cannot tell whether her cat was celebrated in verſe; but I am ſure that the wits in her time would have made ſeveral Poems upon that ſubject, if ſhe had been young and " beat him ſoundly with it, and thruſt him out " of doors, without hearkning to what he could ſay, " and giving him all the opprobrious language " her anger could ſuggeſt to her. The poor Marquiſs " was ſo amazed, that he did not know what to an- " ſwer, and went away immediately, thinking with " himſelf, that this learned Lady was grown mad (18)." I am apt to think that this is a mere ſtory; I judge it chiefly with regard to the blows given with the ſlipper. This was probably either a mere invention, or at leaſt a ſtory canvaſſed by Boiſrobert, to banter both Monſieur de Racan and this learned Lady at once. However it be, this ſtory renders the friendly correſpondence which Mr. Menage ſuppoſes between this Lady and the Marquiſs de Racan, abſolutely improbable. Here follows what we read in the Menagiana (19). " Monſieur de Racan went one day to viſit " Mademoiſelle de Gournai, who ſhewed him ſome " Epigrams ſhe had made, and aſked him his opi- " nion of them. Monſieur de Racan told her, that " they were good for nothing, and that they had no " edge. The Lady de Gournai replied, he muſt not " mind that, that they were Epigrams after the " Greek faſhion. They went afterwards to dine to- " gether at Monſieur de Lorme's, a Phyſician at the " Wells of Bourbon. Monſieur de Lorme entertain- " ed them with a ſoup which was not very good; " whereupon Mademoiſelle de Gournai turning her " ſelf towards Monſieur de Racan, ſaid to him, Sir, " here is a very indifferent ſoup. Madam, replied " the Marquiſs, it is a ſoup after the Greek faſhion." I ſhall obſerve by the by, that this little ſtory met with the ſame fate as almoſt all the ſtories of the ſame kind; the circumſtances of them are prodigiouſly altered as they are related by different perſons. Read the following paſſage from Voiture's Apology (20). " Some Epigrams of the Anthologia being once tranſ- " lated for one of our Poets (21) . . . who did not " underſtand Greek . . . he found them ſo dull and " ſo inſipid, that dining the next day at a Prince's " table, where they ſerved him with a ſoup that taſted " of nothing but water, he turned to one of his " friends, who had ſeen thoſe Epigrams with him, " and ſaid, Here is indeed a ſoup after the Greek " faſhion, if ever there was any." Obſerve that the ſtory of the three Racans has been inſerted into the ſecond part of the Menagiana (22), whereby it is ſuppoſed that Monſieur Menage's converſations were ſometimes inconſiſtent.

[H] She was very angry at the alteration of the language.] Let us quote a paſſage in which Sorel cenſures an omiſſion of Father Bouhours. " To " ſpeak of a perſon who fell into a violent paſſion in " thoſe times, againſt the ſuppreſſion of words, he " ſhould have mentioned the good Lady de Gournai, " whom Ariſte, one of the perſonages in the Dia- " logue before us, places amongſt the illuſtrious and " ingenious maidens. She has really well deſerved it: " I value her ſtill more for her generoſity, good na- " ture, and other incomparable virtues, than for her " learning. But yet it muſt be confeſſed, that ſhe " had always ſome reſentment againſt the new Au- " thors of her time; nor was it without reaſon, for " they took a delight in playing her always ſome " trick or another. They that have been acquainted " with her formerly, know that ſhe was in a terrible " paſſion, when ſhe mentioned perſons of the new " party or of the new cabal; this was her blind ſide. " She might afford us a copious ſubject to diſcourſe " upon the language, both by what ſhe has been heard " to ſay of it, and by what ſhe wrote of it. They " who are not old enough to have converſed with " her, muſt conſult her book intitled, Les Avis & " les Preſens de la Demoiſelle de Gournai; i. e. " The Advices and Preſents of the Lady de Gournai." " They will find there ſeveral chapters concerning the " French language, and particularly a chapter con- " cerning Diminutives, and ſome relating to Poetry, " in all which ſhe would bring into uſe compoſed " words after the manner of the Greek tongue, and " would have Ronſard's language to continue for " ever, without the leaſt exception (23)." Let us ſee how Monſieur Menage has turned into ridicule this paſſion of the Lady de Gournai. He firſt ſhews how ſome perſons would baniſh from the French language the following noble words,

Ces nobles mots, moult, ains, jaçoit
Ores, adonc, maint, ainſi-ſoit,
A-tant, ſi que, piteux, icelle,
Trop plus, trop mieux, blandice, iſnelle,
Pieça, toilir, illec, ainçois.
Comme étant de mauvais François, as being bad French. Then he ſuppoſes that the Petition of the Dictionaries ſheweth, that

. . . Bien que telle outrecuidance
(Soit dit ſauf vôtre reverence)
Fiſt préjudice aux Suppliants
Vos bons & fideles Clients;
Et que de GOURNAY la Pucelle,
Cette ſavance Demoiſelle,
En faveur de l'Antiquité
Euſt notre Corps ſollicité
De faire ſes plaintes publiques
Du décri de ces mots antiques:
Toutefois, &c.

" Though ſuch a preſumption (with ſubmiſſion to " your Reverence be it ſaid) be very prejudicial to " the petitioners your good and faithful clients; and " though the Virgin de Gournai that learned Lady, " importuned our Corporation in favour of Antiqui- " ty, and would perſuade us to complain publickly " of the diſcredit, under which theſe old words la- " bour, yet, &c."

Several perſons, no doubt, will ſay, that the Lady de Gournai labouring under the dotage of people, condemned the reformation of the language, only becauſe it was the work of young Authors, or becauſe ſhe could not approve it, without confeſſing at the ſame time that in her old age ſhe wanted to go to ſchool again. They applied probably to her what Horace ſo ingeniouſly obſerves of certain perſons, who imagine that their own taſte is the only rule of what is good, or that it would be a ſhame for them to yield the firſt rank to new comers, and to own in their old age that all they ſtudied in their youth is vain and uſeleſs (24).

Vel quia nil rectum, niſi quod placuit ſibi, ducunt:
Vel quia turpe putant parere minoribus, & quæ
Imberbes didicére, ſenes perdenda fateri.

" They think nought ſweet, but what their taſte delights.
" Or to ſtoop to their juniors rules diſdain,
" Or elſe to think, what once they learnt was vain,
" And only fit to be forgot again.

Creech.

But all things being duly conſidered, this Lady was not ſo much in the wrong, as ſome perſons imagine; and it were to be wiſhed, that the moſt illuſtrious Authors of that time had vigorouſly oppoſed the proſcription of ſeveral words, which have nothing harſh, and which would ſerve to diverſify our expreſſions, to avoid the return of the ſame ſound, the verſes in a diſcourſe in proſe, and an ambiguous ſtyle. The exceſſive nicety which was then too much indulged, has made the language extremely barren. The beſt Writers complain of it: I mean thoſe Writers who ſuffer the (18) Recueil des bons Contes & des bons Mots, pag. 158. of the Dutch edition.

(19) Pag. 138. of the 1ſt Dutch edition.

(20) Coſtar, Défenſe de Voiture, pag. 274.

(21) It was Racan.

(22) Printed at Paris in the year 1695.

(23) Sorel, de la Connoiſſance des bons Livres, pag. m. 418, 419.

(24) Horat. Epſ. 4. ver. 83. lib. 2.

and beautiful. It was a cat whoſe fidelity has been immortalized by the Abbot de Marolles [I].

the leaſt from this barrenneſs, and find means to ſupply it by the fruitfulneſs of their genius. See Monſieur de la Bruyére's Reflections (25). Some of them give a thouſand thanks to the Biſhop of Meaux, to the Biſhop of Nimes, and to ſome other Writers of the firſt rank, when they ſee that they employ ſome word that begins to grow obſolete. This rehabilitates it, and makes it grow new again; it is at leaſt a Barrier, that prevents a preſcription againſt it, and which may be oppoſed to the cavils of the Puriſts. Our language is very much indebted to thoſe Writers, who ſay certes (indeed) in proſe, and who for the ſake of that word expoſe themſelves in their Works (26). The ſame obſervation might be made with regard to other words, which are very convenient, but of which the too great nicety of ſome Criticks, or the oddneſs of uſe have deprived us, and ſtill deprive us daily. But this evil is not owing only to the inconſtancy of the living languages, which the ancients have alſo obſerved, and very well deſcribed.

(25) La Bruyére, Caracteres de ce Siécle, in the chapter intitled, de quelques Uſages, pag. 635. of the 8th edition of Paris.

(26) La Bruyére, ibid.

—— Mortalia facta peribunt:
Ne dum ſermonum ſtet honos & gratia vivax.
Multa renaſcentur, quæ jam cecidere, cadentque,
Quæ nunc ſunt in honore vocabula, ſi volet uſus,
Quem penes arbitrium eſt & jus & norma loquendi (27).

(27) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 68.

That is,

" —— E'en theſe muſt waſte.
" Then how can feeble words pretend to laſt?
" Some words that have or elſe will feel decay,
" Shall be reſtor'd, and come again in Play.
" And words now fam'd ſhall not be fancied long,
" They ſhall not pleaſe the ear or move the tongue.
" As uſe ſhall theſe approve, or thoſe condemn,
" Uſe the ſole rule of ſpeech, and judge ſupreme."

Creech.

There is in this I know not what plot, which is carried on, not ſo much by thoſe Readers, who are alſo Authors, as by thoſe who do not write. I except however two kinds of Authors; the young Authors, and thoſe that publiſh but one ſmall Work in two or three years time. A young Author, who ſeldom reads any but the moſt modern Books calls nothing fine language, but the words and expreſſions he meets with in them. Woe to any other words or phraſe he meets with elſewhere; this is old faſhioned, ſays he, it begins to be obſolete. As for a Writer who compoſes but half a page a day, he has not time to perceive the trouble that is occaſioned by the proſcription of an infinite number of expreſſions, which were good under the reigns of Henry IV and Lewis the Juſt: He therefore values himſelf on account of his diſguſt with regard to every word, which is in the leaſt ſuſpected of being obſolete. But if he was obliged to write a large and conſiderable Work, which required ſome expedition, he would not affect ſuch a nicety: the difficulty of the undertaking, the trouble of repetitions, the neceſſity almoſt unavoidable to rhime in proſe, &c. would ſoon make him ſenſible of the injury that is done to Authors, by thus rendering that language barren, which they are obliged to uſe.

[I] She had a Cat, whoſe fidelity has been immortalized by the Abbot de Marolles.] He has done the ſame ſervice to his Landlady's Linnet. " A Linnet, " ſays he (28), which I have ſeen, and which belonged " to the moſt honeſt and moſt virtuous Lady de Belle- " ville, at whoſe houſe I lodge at Paris, lived above " forty years with her. And though the weather were " never ſo fair, this little bird would never take its " flight, when its good miſtreſs put it out of its cage " in the window of her room. Mademoiſelle de Gour- " nay's Piaillon (it was her cat) in ten years time that " it lived with her, would never leave her room for " one night to go and ramble on the tiles or in the gut- " ters, as other cats uſe to do." If this Lady had had ſuch lovers, as Catullus was, her cat would have been as famous as Leſbia's ſparrow. Obſerve that Monſieur de Marolles does not omit this ſparrow, nor Melior's parrot (29), nor Stella's dove (30). To theſe inſtances you may add, if you pleaſe, Madam des Houlieres's ſpaniel (31).

(28) Marolles, Suite des Mémoires, pag. 98, 99.

(29) See Stat. Sylv. 4. lib. 2.

(30) See Martial. Epigr. 8. lib. 1.

(31) See the 1ſt vol. of the Mercure Galant, 1672, pag. m. 8; and 103.

(a) Joannis Lelandi, Commentar. de Scriptor. Britannic. tom. 2. cap. 493. pag. 414. edit. Oxon. 1709, in 8vo. (b) Idem, ibid. and Baleus, Scriptor. illuſtr. majoris Brytanniæ Catal. Cent. 7. c. 23. p. 524. edit. Baſil. 1557. and Pitſeus, de illuſtrib. Angliæ Script. num. 731. pag. 576.

☞GOWER (JOHN), an eminent Engliſh Poet in the fourteenth Century, was born of a noble family ſettled at Stitenham in Yorkſhire (a). He ſtudied and practiſed the Law; but his inclination led him principally to polite learning, in which he made a prodigious progreſs, and was a great maſter of the Latin tongue, and an eminent refiner of the Engliſh language (b). He flouriſhed in the time of King Richard II [A], to whom he dedicated his books (c), and was contemporary with Chaucer; and is ſaid to have been his ſcholar and ſucceſſor in the laurel (d). Leland, Bale, and Pits aſſert, that he was a Knight; but Mr. Strype (e) affirms, that he was only an Eſquire. He wrote ſeveral works, in Latin, French, and Engliſh [B]. He was blind ſome time before his death, and lived to an advanced age, dying at London in 1402. He was interred in the Church of St. Mary Overies in Southwark (f), to which he had been a benefactor

(c) Leland, ubi ſupra, pag. 415. (d) Edward Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum, Modern Poets, (e) Strype's edition of Stowe's Survey of London and Weſtminſter, vol. 2. B. 4. pag. 8. edit. London 1721. (f) Leland, Baleus, and Pitſeus, ubi ſupra.

[A] Flouriſhed in the time of King Richard II.] In his Book de Confeſſione Amantis he tells us, that this King taking his diverſion on the Thames, ſent for our Poet, who was in a boat near him, into his barge, and commanded him to write upon ſome ſubject.

" As it befylle upon a tyde,
" As thynge whych ſhuide tho' betyde,
" Under the town of Newe Troy,
" Whyche toke of Brute his fyrſte Joye;
" On Themſe whan it was flowende,
" As I by Bote came roende,
" So as fortune his Tyme ſette,
" My Liege Lorde perchaunce I mette,
" And ſo befelle, as I came nygh,
" Out of my Bote when he me ſygh,
" He bade me come into hys Barge,
" And whan I was with hym at large,
" Amonges other thynges ſeyd,
" He hath ſuch charge upon me leyd, &c."

(c) Scriptor. illuſtrium Majoris Brytann. Catalog. Cent. 7. cap. 23. pag. 524.

[B] He wrote ſeveral Works in Latin, French, and Engliſh.] Bale tells us (1) that beſides his Engliſh Works in proſe and verſe he wrote a great many in Latin and French. Patrio multa ſcripſit ſermone, non ſolum rythmis, verum etiam ſolutâ Oratione, quæ vel hoc noſtro florentiſſimo tempore a doctis ſtudioſe leguntur. Scripſit & plura Latinè & Gallicè. Pits obſerves (2), that he wrote well in French, not inelegantly in Latin, but with the greateſt beauty in Engliſh. Scripſit autem Gouerus multa, & quidem Gallicè laudabiliter, Latinè non ineleganter, ſed Anglicè longè elegantiſſimè. Leland informs us (3), that he wrote a great many Poems in Latin, imitating Ovid with more labour than ſucceſs; which is no wonder, if we conſider, that the age, in which he lived, was half barbarous. Hoc ejus teſtantur Carmina, quæ multa Latinè ſcripſit, ſtudioſiùs quam feliciùs P. Ovidium imitatus. Nec mirum illud videri debet, præſertim in ſemi-harbaro ſæculo. Bale and Pits give us a Catalogue of his Writings, which are as follow: I. Chronicon, intitled, Vox Clamantis in Deſerto, in ſeven Books. This is extant in the Cotton-Library (4), under this title: Johannis Gouer Chronica, quæ Vox Clamantis dicitur; ſive Poema de Inſurrectione Ruſticorum contra ingenuos & nobiles tempore Regis Ricardi II, & de Cauſis, ex quibus talia contingunt enormia: libris ſeptem. II. Confeſſio Amantis, in eight Books in Engliſh Verſe. This was printed at London in 1532, under the following title: Jo. Gower de Confeſſione Amantis. Imprinted at London in Fleteſtrete by Thomas Barthelette, Printer to the King's Grace. Ann.

(2) De illuſtrib. Angliæ Scriptoribus, num. 731. pag. 576.

(3) Commentar. de Scriptoribus Britannicis, Part 2. cap. 493. pag. 414, 415.

(4) Tiberius, A. IV.

(g) Leland, ubi ſupra.

benefactor, where his wife is interred (g), and where he founded a Chauntry, and endowed it with an yearly income for a maſs to be daily ſung for him, as alſo an Obit within the ſaid Church, to be performed on the Friday after the Feaſt of St. Gregory. Over his tomb is a ſtatue of him in a habit of purple damaſk down to his feet, a collar of S. S. about his neck, and on his head a chaplet like a coronet of four roſes. Under his feet are repreſented three of his principal works, the firſt Speculum Meditantis, the ſecond Vox Clamantis, the third Confeſſio Amantis. On the wall over him were painted three, Charity, Mercy, and Pity, with devices; and near theſe hung formerly a table, in which was written that "whoſo prayed for the ſoul of JOHN GOWER, ſo oft as he did it, "ſhould have MD days of pardon."

1532. Cum Privilegio. On the reverſe of the title-page are the following Verſes:

Epigramma Autoris in ſuum Librum.
Torpor, hebes ſenſus, ſchola parva, labor minimuſque
Cauſant quo minus ipſe minora canam.
Qua tum Engiſti lingua canit Inſula Bruti
Anglica Carmente metra juvante loquar.
Oſſibus ergo carens, quæ conterit oſſa loquelis,
Abſit, & interpres ſtet procul, oro, malus.

This Edition is dedicated to King Henry VIII by the Printer, who in the Dedication has the following paſſage. "And who ſo ever in redynge this Wurke dothe "conſyder it well ſhal finde that it is plentifully ſtuf-"fed and fournyſhed with manyfolde eloquent reaſons, "ſharpe and quicke argumentes, and examples of great "Auctoritie perſwadynge unto Vertue, not only taken "out of the Poetes, Oratours, Hiſtory-Wryters, and "Philoſophers, but alſo out of the holy Scripture. "There is to my Dome no man but that he may bi "reding of this Wurke get right great knowlege as "wel for the underſtanding of many and divers Au-"tors, whoſe reſons, ſayenges, and hiſtories are tranſ-"lated into this Wurke, as for the plenty of Englyſhe "Wordes and Vulgars, beſyde the furtheraunce of the "Lyfe to Vertue. Whiche olde Englyſhe Wordes "and Vulgars no wyſe man becauſe of their Antiqui-"tie wyll throwe aſyde. For the Writers of later "dayes, the whiche beganne to loth and hate thoſe "olde Vulgars, whan they themſelfe wolde wryte in "our Englyſhe tonge, were conſtrayned to brynge in "their Wrytinges newe termes (as ſome calle them) "whiche they borowed out of the Latyne, Frenche, "and other Languages, from whens theſe new Vul-"gars are fette, could not perceyue theyr Wrytynges. "And though our moſt allowed olde Autors dydde "otherwhile uſe to borowe of the Languages eyther "bycauſe of their Metre, or elles for lacke of a feete "Englyſhe Worde, yet that ought not to be a preſi-"dent to us to heape them in, whereas nedeth not, "and whereas we have all redy wordes approved and "received of the ſame effecte and ſtrength: The "whiche if any man wante, let him reſorte to this "worthy olde Wryter, John Gower, that ſhal as a "Lanterne gyve him Lyght to wryte coynningly, and "to garniſhe his ſentences in our vulgar tongue." III. Speculum Meditantis, in ten Books, in French. There is a Manuſcript of this in the Bodleian Library (5). IV. De Compunctione Cordis, in Latin, in one Book. V. Chronicon Richardi ſecundi, in three Books. It begins thus; Opus eſt humanum inquirere. VI. Chronicon tripartitum, in three Books. It begins thus; Tolle caput mundi &c. VII. Ad Henricum Quartum, in one Book. It begins thus; O recolende, bone, pie Rex, Henrice. VIII. Ad eundem de Laude Pacis, in one Book, which begins; Nobilis ac digne Rex Henrice. IX. De Rege Henrico quarto, in one Book; which begins, Rex Cæli Deus & Dominus. X. De Peſte Vitiorum, in one Book. It begins thus; "Non excuſatur qui non verum fatea-"tur." XI. Scrutinium Lucis, in one Book, which begins; "Heu quia per crebras humus eſt." XII. De Conjugii Dignitate, in one Book. It begins; "Qualiter Creator omnium rerum Deus." XIII. De Regimine Principum, in one Book, which begins; "O Deus immenſe, ſub quo dominatur." XIV. Epigrams, in one Book, beginning; "Alta petens Aquila "volat alitque." XV. De Amoris Varietate, in one Book, which begins; "Eſt amor in gloſa, pax bel-"lica." XVI. Divers Poems, in one Book. Pits obſerves, that a great many other of his Writings are extant in ſeveral Libraries. T.

(5) Num. 2375.

☞GRABE (JOHN ERNEST), a very learned Writer in the beginning of the eighteenth Century, was born at Koningſberg in Pruſſia, July the 10th 1666, and was ſon of Martin Sylveſter Grabe, Profeſſor of Divinity and Hiſtory in the Univerſity of that City [A], who died at Stutgard in 1686. Our Author proſecuted his ſtudies at Koningſberg, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts. He was educated in the Lutheran Religion; but by his application to the reading of the Fathers, he became convinced, that it was neceſſary that there ſhould be in the Church an uninterrupted ſucceſſion of the Miniſtry. Upon this he reſolved to embrace the Roman Catholic Religion; for which purpoſe in 1695 he preſented to the Electoral Conſiſtory at Sambia in Pruſſia a memorial containing his doubts with regard to the Lutheran Religion [B]. The Elector of Brandenbourg

[A] Sylveſter Grabe Profeſſor of Divinity and Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Koningſberg.] The Writer of a Letter to Dr. Hickes, dated May 26th 1712, and publiſh'd by the Doctor in his Account of Dr. Grabe and of his Manuſcripts, prefixed to Dr. Grabe's Some Inſtances of the Defects and Omiſſions in Mr. Whiſton's Collection of Teſtimonies &c (1), informs us (2), that when this Profeſſor was Rector of the Univerſity, he read Lectures againſt Chriſtopher Sanden or Sandius, that great reviver of Arianiſm, "in which he clearly demonſtrat-"ed the groſs miſtakes and miſrepreſentations of that "Author; ſome of which [Lectures] he printed, par-"ticularly thoſe which relate to the controverſy about "the paſſage in St. John concerning the three Wit-"neſſes in Heaven, whether genuine or interpolated; "whence Dr. Milles ſeems to have had no ſmall aſſiſtance "in his writing that learned Diſſertation on that Text, "and which are now found among the manuſcripts of "the ſon with large Notes and Additions both of the "father and ſon, in order to another more complete "Edition, as it ſeems."

(1) Printed at London 1712, in 8vo.

(2) Some Account of Dr. Grabe, Pag. 72.

[B] A Memorial containing his doubts with regard to the Lutheran Religion.] This piece was printed in High-Dutch at the end of the Anſwers, which were written to it by Philip James Spener, and Bernard Van Sanden in the ſame language; the former of which was publiſhed at Francfort upon the Mein in 1695 in 4to under this title; A Defence of the Evangelic Church againſt the Accuſation of Schiſm and Communion with the antient Heretics, falſely charged upon it; in anſwer to the Doubts propoſed by John Erneſt Grabe. By Philip James Spener, Eccleſiaſtical Counſellor to the Elector of Brandenbourg, and principal Miniſter of Berlin. The latter was printed at Koningſberg in 1695 in 4to under this title: An Anſwer to the Doubts of John Erneſt Grabe. By Bernard Von Sanden, principal Profeſſor at Koningſberg. Mr. Baier's Anſwer to Mr. Grabe was publiſhed at Jena 1695 in 8vo under this title: A ſolid demonſtration of the groundleſs accuſation of Schiſm and Hereſy charged upon Luther and his diſciples; in oppoſition to the doubts preſented to the Conſiſtory of Sambia. By John William Baier.

Brandenbourg immediately gave orders to three Lutheran Divines, Philip James Spener, Bernard Von Sanden, and John William Baier, to anſwer his doubts, which each of them did; and the Tracts which they wrote were ſent to Mr. Grabe, who had then left Koningſberg, and was going to Erford, in order to abjure the Lutheran Faith in ſome Catholic City. Mr. Grabe having read theſe pieces, was a little ſhaken in his reſolution, and wrote to Spener, that he would return to Berlin, to confer with him, if he would procure him a ſafe conduct; which being granted, he went thither, and diſcourſed with Spener. But not being able to overcome his prejudice with reſpect to the uninterrupted ſucceſſion of the miniſtry, Spener adviſed him to go to England, aſſuring him that he would there meet with the outward ſucceſſion, which he wanted (a). Mr. Grabe upon this went to England, where he was received with great civility, and recommended to the favour of King William, who gave him a penſion, which was afterwards continued to him by Queen Anne. Here he ſpent the reſt of his life in publiſhing ſeveral valuable Works [C], and was ordained Prieſt of the Church of England, and honoured with the

(a) See Menckens German Dictionary; and Chriſtophori Matthæi Pfaff Notæ in Liturgiam Græcam Grabii.

[C] Here he ſpent the remainder of his Life in publiſhing ſeveral valuable Works.] We ſhall give the Reader a Catalogue of them. I. Spicilegium S. S. Patrum, ut & Hæreticorum Sæculi poſt Chriſtum natum I. II. & III. Quorum vel integra Monumenta, vel Fragmenta, partim ex aliorum Patrum libris jam impreſſis collegit, & cum codicibus manuſcriptis contulit, partim ex MSS. nunc primum edidit, ac ſingula tam præfatione, quam notis ſubjunctis illuſtravit Joannes Erneſtus Grabe. The firſt volume was printed at Oxford 1698 in 8vo, and the ſecond in the ſame city 1699 in 8vo. They were both reprinted at Oxford 1700 in 8°. In the Preface to the firſt volume he informs us of the motives of his publiſhing theſe pieces, being induced to it by the conſideration of the many Sects and Parties, which divide the Chriſtian Church, and imagining, that no better expedient can heal theſe diviſions and diſſentions, than to reflect on the practice and opinions of the primitive Fathers. The firſt volume contains the Writings of the Catholic Fathers and the Heretics of the firſt Century; wherein he obſerves this general method. Firſt, he uſhers in each Writing with a Diſſertation; then he gives us the whole copy of the Work, or Fragments of it extracted out of the writings of other Fathers, with the various readings to be met with either in printed copies or manuſcripts; and the whole he illuſtrates with curious remarks annexed to the end of his Book. He begins with a Diſſertation concerning the Epiſtle of Agbarus or Abgarus, King of Edeſſa, to Jeſus Chriſt, and our Saviour's Anſwer to that King. Theſe Epiſtles, tho' ſaid to be taken from the Archives of Edeſſa, and recorded by Euſebius, yet are look'd upon as ſpurious by many of the Roman as well as the Reformed Church (3); but Mr. Grabe urges ſeveral arguments for their authority, and endeavours to anſwer all the objections againſt them; though after all he owns them to be doubtful and apocryphal. He then gives us a copy of both theſe ſame Epiſtles and the Hiſtory of them taken from the Archives in Greek and Latin, as they are in a manuſcript in the Bodleian Library. To theſe he ſubjoins ſeveral ſayings of our Saviour not mentioned by the four Evangeliſts, but by others, as by St. Paul, Acts xx. 25. by St. Barnabas in his Epiſtle, Num. 4 and 5. by Clemens Romanus in his Epiſtle to the Corinthians, Num. 4, 5, 8. by Juſtin Martyr in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, p. 267. by Clemens Alexandrinus in the firſt Book of his Stromata, p. 346. and by Origen in his Commentary on St. Matthew p. 308. He proceeds next to the Goſpel of the twelve Apoſtles, or the Goſpel according to the Hebrews; upon which he beſtows a large preface; and tho' it be a dubious piece, and eſteemed apocryphal by the primitive Chriſtians, yet it was accounted orthodox by them, who frequently cited paſſages out of it. For St. Ignatius in his Epiſtle to the Smyrneans, Clemens Alexandrinus in his Stromata L. II. p. 380. Origen, Epiphanius, and St. Jerom in ſeveral places of their Works have cited this Goſpel; and the laſt of theſe Fathers took the pains to tranſlate it into Greek and Latin; "which, ſays Mr. Grabe, he would never have "done, if it had been only a forged piece of the He"retics; ſi purum putum Hæreticorum fuiſſet Commen"tum." The Goſpel according to the Egyptians was compiled by the Chriſtians of that Country, as appears from the very ſtyle of it, which is myſterious and allegorical. However tho' it was reckoned among the apocryphal Writings, yet it was cited by Clemens Romanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Epiphanius as orthodox. But ſome Heretics took the advantage of the obſcurity of its ſtyle to pervert it, in order to ſupport their own opinions; and it is probable, foiſted ſeveral interpolations into the Text. After this Mr. Grabe proceeds to give an account of the Acts of the Apoſtles, cited by Iſodorus Peluſiota; for the Conſtitutions and Canons of the Apoſtles; for St. Peter's Apocrypha, Apocalypſe and Acts; and for the Acts of Paul and Thecla. To each of theſe he has prefixed a prefatory Diſcourſe, in order to prove theſe pieces to be ancient, tho' corrupted by Heretics, and perhaps not belonging to the perſons, whoſe names they bear. The Acts of Paul and Thecla he has ſet down at large, the Greek being taken out of an ancient copy in the Bodleian Library, and the Latin Verſion he has corrected from the old Tranſlation, and ſupplied from the Greek Commentary of Baſil of Seleucia; and at the end has ſubjoined the old Verſion entire. Mr. Grabe looks upon theſe Acts "as true and "genuine, written in the apoſtolic Age, and contain"ing nothing in them, which is ſuperſtitious or diſ"agreeable to that time (4)." But Mr. Jeremiah Jones (5) obſerves, that ſeveral of the Tenets of Popery are by the Advocates of that party confirmed out of this Book, as being authentic, genuine, and apoſtolic. So, for inſtance, the ſtory, ch. xx. of Falconilla (Trifina's daughter) coming after death from the other world, and deſiring her to aſk Thecla to pray for her, that ſhe might be tranſlated from her ſtate of miſery to a ſtate of happineſs; which requeſt Trifina made to Thecla, and Thecla accordingly prayed for her. This paſſage is brought by Damaſcenus (o) to ſupport the Doctrine of praying for the dead, and helping the miſerable in the other world by our prayers and alms. Again, the Popiſh Doctrine of Celibacy is frequently contended for, and confirmed out of this Book; as perhaps the firſt prevalence and progreſs of that Doctrine owed its original to it (p). But to return to Mr. Grabe, he next gives us the Teſtament of the Twelve Patriarchs, which had been publiſhed at firſt by itſelf, and afterwards in the firſt volume of the Bibliotheca Patrum. Who was the writer of this piece, is uncertain. Dr. Cave and Mr. Dodwell ſuppoſe it to be written by a converted Jew; the former thinks about the latter end of the ſecond Century; but the latter believes it to have been compoſed in the firſt Century, becauſe, as he ſays, the ſtyle is Helleniſtical. Mr. Grabe advances a conjecture of his own; for he imagines it to have been written at firſt by a Jew, and afterwards interpolated by a Chriſtian. Mr. Grabe has given it us intire in Greek and Latin, and illuſtrated it with Notes and Chronological Tables at the end of the Volume; which Tables were communicated by Mr. Dodwell. He concludes his accounts of the Eccleſiaſtical Writings of the firſt Century with the genuine and ſuppoſititious Works of St. Clement the Roman; and obſerves, that his firſt Epiſtle to the Corinthians was never called in queſtion; but the exact time of his writing it has afforded matter of diſpute among the learned, whoſe arguments Mr. Grabe has given us at large in his Diſſertation. As to the ſecond Epiſtle of St. Clement to the Corinthians, a fragment of which is ſtill extant; our Author believes it to be ſpurious, and written about the middle of the third Century. He has given us likewiſe ſome brief Remarks upon the Writings aſcribed to Simon Magus, Cerinthus, and other Heretics of the firſt Century. In the ſecond Volume of the Spicilegium Mr. Grabe obſerves the ſame

(3) See the Article of ABGARUS, note [B], vol. 1. pag. 70.

(4) Spicileg. tom. 1. pag. 90 94.

(5) New and full Method of ſettling the Canonical Authority of the New Teſtament, vol. 2. Part 3. cap. 34. pag. 476. edit. London 1726, in 8vo.

(o) In Serm. de Mortuis adjuvandis apud Sixt. Senenſ. Bibl. Sanct. lib. 6. pag. 450.

(p) Vide Chemnit. Exam. Concil. Trident. Part. 3. pag. 89, 90.

the degree of Doctor of Divinity by the Univerſity of Oxford, on the 26th of April 1706, upon which occaſion Dr. George Smalridge pronounced two Latin Orations, which were afterwards printed (b). Dr. Hickes informs us (c), that our Author had a ſingular

(b) Under this title: Orationes duæ in Theatro Sheldoniano VI Kal. Maii MDCCVI. (quo die Academiæ Francofurtanæ Encœnia ſæcularia ibidem celebrata ſunt) habitæ a Rev. Viro Geo. Smalridge S. T. P. altera cum V. C. J. E. Grabe Boruſſum ad Doctoratum in S. Theol. Univerſitati Oxon. commendaret, altera cum eundem Inſignibus Academicis ornaret. (c) Some Account of Dr. Grabe and of his Manuſcripts, pag. viii. prefixed to Dr. Grabe's Some Inſtances of the Defects and Omiſſions in Mr. Whiſton's Collection of Teſtimonies, edit. London 1713 in 8vo.

method as in the former. He begins with an Account of St. Ignatius and his Writings; and in his Preliminary Diſſertation takes notice of the diſputes, which have aroſe concerning the place of his birth, and relates the opinions of ſeveral learned men about it, particularly of Dr. Thomas Hyde, whoſe judgment determined our Author in that point. He next informs us of the ſeveral acceptations of the word Theophorus, the ſurname of St. Ignatius; and remarks, that Dr. Cave explains it two ways, viz. Θεόφορον, i. e. Hominem, qui Deum pectore geſtat; and Θεοφόρον, i. e. Hominem à Deo geſtatum. After this he acquaints us with the fictions of the Latins concerning the Surnames of St. Ignatius, as taken in the firſt ſenſe; and ſets down what Vincentius Biſhop of Beauvais, L. X. C. 7. ſays concerning it, whoſe words are as follow: Hujus cor, cum minutatim diviſum eſſet, nomen Domini Jeſu Chriſti literis aureis inſcriptum, (ut legitur,) in ſingulis partibus inventum eſt. Dixerat enim ſe habere Chriſtum in corde. That this account is a mere fiction and fable, Mr. Grabe proves from the teſtimony of Evagrius, Simeon Metaphraſtes, and an unpubliſh'd Manuſcript; which all agree, that St. Ignatius was torn in pieces by wild beaſts, which devoured all his bones, not leaving his heart to make ſuch obſervations upon, as Vincentius ſays is ſomewhere related, tho' he neither names the Author nor place, where ſuch an account may be found. Mr. Grabe proceeds next to the Acts or Martyrdom of Iguatius. Here he takes notice of the ſeveral manuſcripts of that piece, and where they are to be found, with the reaſon, which induced him to inſert it in Greek and Latin in this Spicilegium. He likewiſe aſſigns his reaſons why he waves the proving of the ſeven Epiſtles of St. Ignatius to be genuine, and returns an anſwer to that objection ſo often ſtarted by the oppoſers of the Chriſtian Faith, "Why the Epiſtles of St. Ig-" natius, St. Barnabas, St. Clement, St. Polycarp, and "other Apoſtolical Writers, were not admitted into "the Canon of the New Teſtament, if they were ge-"nuine, and really written by thoſe, whoſe names "they bear?" After this he inſerts at large the Acts or Martyrdom of Ignatius, under this title; Μαρτύριον τῦ ἁγίυ ἱερομάρτυρος Ἰγνατίυ τῦ Θεοφόρυ. He gives us his judgment of this piece, and annexes ſome Fragments of the ſame Father taken out of Damaſcenus L. III. Parall. C. 27. Anton. Meliſſ. L. 1. Serm. 14. and St. Chryſoſtom's Homily XI. in Epiſt. ad Epheſios. The next Author, of whoſe Fragments Mr. Grabe gives us an account, is Papias Biſhop of Hierapolis. In his Preliminary Diſſertation he enters into the diſpute; whether this Papias was the diſciple of John the Apoſtle, or John the Preſbyter or Elder; and having given us the opinions of ſeveral learned men on both ſides, he declares, that he believes, that he might be the diſciple both of St. John the Apoſtle, and John the Elder. He then takes notice of the character, which Euſebius (6) gives of Papias, whom he there acknowledges to be Ἀνὴρ τὰ πάντα ὅτι μάλιστα λογιώτατος, καὶ τῆς γραφῆς εἰδήμων, i. e. "A very eloquent and "learned man, and well ſkilled in the Scriptures." This character, tho' it be not in the Verſion of Ruffinus, nor in three Greek copies of Euſebius, which Valeſius made uſe of, nor in another manuſcript given by Sir Henry Savil to the Bodleian Library, yet our Author juſtifies, and ſhews that Papias might well enough deſerve it. He diſſents from Valeſius, who thinks that the Scholiaſt foiſted this paſſage into Euſebius's Hiſtory; and ſuppoſes, that it was rather ſtruck out of thoſe copies abovementioned for ſome particular reaſons, of which he afterwards takes notice. Mr. Grabe likewiſe reconciles this Encomium given to Papias with what Euſebius ſays of him in the 39th chapter of the ſame Book, where he is ſtiled σφόδρα σμικρὸς ὃν τὸν νοῦν, valde exilis ingenii. He obſerves further, that this Biſhop was a great favourer of the notion of the Mil-

(6) Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. 3. cap. 36.

lenaries, which occaſioned his falling into diſrepute among the learned of the ſucceeding Ages; and takes notice of his death and martyrdom. He then ſets down the Fragments of Papias. The firſt is in Latin, and taken out of Irenæus L. V. adverſus Hæreſes, c. 33. and is intitled, Fragmenta Librorum Papiæ de Expoſitione Oraculorum Dominicorum. The next is in Greek and Latin, taken out of the Preface to the Works of Papias, and cited by Euſebius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. L. III. C. 29. Another Fragment in Greek and Latin is extracted from Andreas Cæſarienſis in Apocalypſin, C. 34. Serm. 12. The fourth is cited by Oecumenius, Comment. in Act. Apoſtol. C. 2. The laſt is in Latin, ex Cod. 2397. Bibliothecæ Bodleianæ, Ann. 1302 & 1303 in Abbatia Oſneyenſi prope Oxonium ſcripto. fol. 286. p. 2. Mr. Grabe next proceeds to an account of Baſilides and Valentinus, two Hereſiarchs: of Epiphanes, Iſidorus, Ptolomæus, Heracleon, and other Heretics; in all which he obſerves the ſame method: viz. Firſt he treats by way of diſſertation on each Writer, and then ſets down the fragments of their Works, with the places where they are to be found. He afterwards gives an account of Matthias and his Traditions, of Quadratus and his Apology, Agrippa, Caſtor, and Ariſto Pellæus; and treats at large of Juſtin Martyr and his writings. Throughout this whole Diſſertation upon Juſtin Martyr he ſets down the ſeveral opinions and judgments of learned men concerning his Works, with his own ſentiments thereupon. He then gives us the fragments of that Father; and afterwards proceeds to the remains of Hegiſippus, Dionyſius Corinthius, and Theophilus Antiochenus. II. S. Juſtini, Philoſophi & Martyris, Apologia prima pro Chriſtianis ad Antoninum Pium; cum Latinâ Joannis Langi Verſione, quam plurimis in locis correcta, ſubjunctis Emendationibus & Notis Roberti ac Henrici Stephanorum, Perionii, Billii, Sylburgii, Scaligeri, Halloixii, Caſauboni, Montacutii, Grotii, Salmaſii, Valeſii, Cotelerii, pluribuſque novis additis: adnexis inſuper ad calcem adnotationibus Langi & Kortholti, præmiſſâ vero Langi Præfatione, quâ ſummam ejus Apologiæ enarravit. Edita a Joanne Erneſto Grabe. Oxford 1700 in 8vo.. The Greek Text is taken from Robert Stephen's Edition, which Mr. Grabe would have collated with manuſcripts, if they could have been procured. With regard to the Latin Verſion, he preferred that of Langius before thoſe of Gelenius and Perionius; but he has corrected it in many places, retrenching what was redundant, and rendering what was obſcure more clear and plain. Beſides the Notes of Robert, and Henry Stephens, Perionius, Billius, Sylburgius, Scaliger, Halloix, Caſaubon, Montague, Grotius, Salmaſius, Valeſius, Cotelerius, and other learned men, he has added a great many new remarks of his own, whereby he ſometimes corrects the reading of the Text, and at other times explains the difficult and obſcure places of it. He has likewiſe in the margin of this Edition on the Greek ſide marked the pages as they ſtand in the Paris Edition. Monſ. le Clerc in his Bibliotheque choiſie (7) has made ſome critical Remarks upon Langius's Verſion and the Notes inſerted in this Edition. Mr. Hutchins reprinted all that is contained in this Edition, with ſome other Works of Juſtin Martyr, at Oxford 1703 in 8vo. III. S. Irenæi, Epiſcopi Lugdunenſis, contra omnes Hæreſes Libri quinque. Textus Græci partem haud exiguam reſtituit, Latinam Verſionem è quatuor MSS. Codicibus emendavit; fragmenta aliorum Tractatuum deperditorum ſubjunxit; omnia Notis variorum & ſuis illuſtravit Joannes Erneſtus Grabe. Oxford 1702 in fol. Mr. Grabe has prefixed the Teſtimonies of the Antients concerning Irenæus and his Works, and the Life of that Martyr, collected out of his own and other Fathers Writings, by Francis Feuardentius, Doctor of Sorbonne. In the Prolegomena, which is divided into three Sections, Mr. Grabe treats of the Life and Works of Irenæus, of the various ſingular eſteem for the Church of England above all other reformed Churches; and upon his death-bed deſired it might be known that he died in her faith and communion, which he thought a pure and ſound part of the Catholic Church. But he "never made "any various Editions of them, and the Method obſerved in this Edition. With reſpect to the time of the Birth and Death of Irenæus, treated of in the firſt Section, Authors are much divided in their opinions, ſome fixing the time of both higher, others lower. And tho' Mr. Dodwell in his Diſſertations on that Father's Life and Writings has offered many conjectures, in order to ſettle the time of his birth and the exact year of his death, yet Mr. Grabe cannot agree with him in every point. The truth of it is, that Chronology being little regarded, and conſequently very obſcure in thoſe times, nothing can be eſtabliſhed as certain about the Birth and Death of Irenæus; and all that has been advanced on that head, is collected out of ſome expreſſions in his own and other Fathers Writings, which at moſt amounts only to probable conjectures, but not to any direct certainty. However it is acknowledged by all, that Irenæus was a diſciple of Polycarp; and that he flouriſhed in the middle, and ſuffered martyrdom about the end of the ſecond Century. In the ſecond Section of the Prolegomena, Mr. Grabe treats of the five Books of Irenæus againſt all Hereſies, and the Latin Verſion of them, with others of his Writings, which are now loſt. That the whole five Books were not publiſhed together, but that the two firſt by themſelves were ſent to a friend, Mr. Dodwell ſhews from the Proem or Preface to the third Book; and that the three others came out ſingly, appears likewiſe from the Prefaces to the fourth and fifth Books. As to the time when theſe Books were written, Mr. Grabe tells us, that it is a very difficult matter to fix it. Mr. Dodwell in his fourth Diſſertation maintains, that they were written about the year of Chriſt 177 in the 80th year of Irenæus, and the ninth or tenth of his Epiſcopate. However there are ſome arguments alledged to ſhew, that this Treatiſe againſt Hereſies was penned either after or before that period of time. In defence of the former opinion is commonly urged the mention, which is made in Book III. C. 24. of Theodotion's Verſion, which Epiphanius brings down to the times of Commodus; wherein he is followed by the Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum, who fixes the time in the ſixth year of that Emperor's reign. To this Mr. Dodwell, in his Diſſertation de Pontificum Romanorum Succeſſione C. 14. §. 17, replies, that perhaps theſe words concerning Theodotion were not in the firſt copy of Irenæus, but inſerted by him afterwards. But Mr. Grabe is better pleaſed with another Anſwer, which Mr. Dodwell gives in his fourth Diſſertation on Irenæus §. 39 &c. where he maintains, in oppoſition to the Author of the Chronicon Alexandrinum, that the Verſion of Theodotion was publiſh'd even in the time of Marcus Antonnius. And indeed, adds Mr. Grabe, the ſkill of that Author or of Epiphanius is not ſo great in Chronology, that we ought to depend upon the authority of their Æra, when we can have a more certain account from other hands. The argument brought on the other ſide, which proves that Irenæus publiſhed his whole Refutation of Heretics, whilſt he was a Preſbyter and before the year 177, almoſt perſuades Mr. Grabe to be of the ſame mind. This argument is deduced from the riſe of the Sect of the Cataphryges, which diſturbed the Churches of Phrygia and Aſia, and which Euſebius in his Chronicon places in the 17th year of Marcus Antoninus. Now in what period of time ſoever this Sect ſprang up, Mr. Grabe infers that the two firſt Books of Irenæus were at leaſt written before it, ſince in them no mention is made of that Sect, which he would never have omitted, had it already begun to give a diſturbance to the Aſiatics, to whom he ſent thoſe books. On the contrary, in the third and fourth books, he gives but a very ſlight rebuke to thoſe falſe Teachers; from whence it follows, that the troubles, which they raiſed, were a little after he had finiſhed his Treatiſe; and that Irenæus was not ſo old, nor a Biſhop, but only a Preſbyter, when he publiſhed his Writings between the years 171 and 174; eſpecially if the Sect of the Cataphryges aroſe in that interval of time, and if the other Æra of the perſecution raiſed by Marcus Antoninus fixed by Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, be valid. But, continues Mr. Grabe, if Mr. Dodwell's reaſons be to be relied on, who carries the abovementioned perſecution back to the year 167; then it would follow that the Books of Irenæus are of an older date; which yet the mentioning the Hereſy of Tatian, and other things, do not admit of. That theſe books were written in Greek, is ſufficiently evinced by Mr. Dodwell in his fifth Diſſertation, Sect. 1 &c. ſo that Mr. Grabe does not think proper to add any thing farther to what he has ſaid. But then he cannot agree with the learned Diſſertator in his opinion about the Latin Verſion, viz. that it is more modern than Tertullian, and was made about the latter end of the fourth Century. The reaſon why Mr. Grabe diſſents from Mr. Dodwell in this point, is, becauſe there are ſeveral paſſages in the tenth chapter of Tertullian's Treatiſe againſt the Valentinians, in which he ſeems to imitate the Latin Interpreter of Irenæus. Thus Tertullian ſays of Sophia, eam primo quidem contriſtari propter inconſummationem generationis, metuere poſtremo, ne finis quoque inſiſteret: which agrees exactly with what the Latin Interpreter ſays, Contriſtatam propter inconſummationem generationis, poſt deinde timuiſſe, ne hoc ipſum finem habeat. Again, Tertullian goes on in his relation, confirmatam Sophiam & conjugio reſtitutam & ipſam quidem in Pleromatis cenſu remanſiſſe; Enthymeſin vero ejus, & illam quidem Appendicem paſſionem ab Horo relegatam & crucifixam, & extra ævum factam, &c. which likewiſe is very conſonant to what the Latin Interpreter ſays in theſe words, Confirmatam Sophiam & reſtitutam conjugi; ſeparatâ enim intentione ab eâ, cum appendice paſſione, ipſam quidem infra (intra) Pleroma perſeverâſſe; Concupiſcentiam vero ejus cum paſſione ab Horo ſeparatam & crucifixam, & extra eum factam eſſe. Mr. Grabe therefore is of opinion, that the Verſion of Irenæus's Works into this barbarous Latin, as he terms it, was made towards the end of the ſecond Century, whilſt Irenæus was ſtill living, or but lately dead; and that it was done by ſome Miniſter at Lyons or ſome other Church in Gaul, ſince there are ſeveral words in this Verſion, ſcarcely made uſe of by any of the Writers of that Country. Mr. Grabe next conſiders the general title of thoſe Books, and why he has rendered the Greek, Ἔλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδωνύμου γνώσεως, by theſe words, Contra omnes Hæreſes. As to the titles of each chapter, and the diviſion of this volume into diſtinct books, and each book into diſtinct chapters, he obſerves, that he ſhall add nothing to what Mr. Dodwell has ſaid in his fifth Diſſertation, Sect. 12. and only tells us, that he has divided the Greek Text into chapters, and thoſe ſhorter than they were divided before in the Latin Verſion. He then remarks after Mr. Dodwell, that there is no Greek manuſcript of this work in the whole world, but what is mutilated. And though Feuardentius ſays, that there were ſome, who atteſted, that they had read an intire copy of it in the Library of Venice, and others, that they had ſeen one in the Vatican Library; yet Feuardentius could not meet with any in either place, nor is there any at preſent in the Vatican Library, as Laurentius Alexander Zacignius, the Library-Keeper, aſſured the Editor, tho' he had not the opportunity of enquiring about that pretended to be at Venice. With reſpect to the Latin copies, Mr. Grabe obſerves, that that which is preſerved among the manuſcripts of Iſaac Voſſius, and which is reported to be the ſame with the antient manuſcript of Feuardentius, he thinks to be a quite different copy, upon the account of ſome various readings in it. And tho' Mr. Dodwell looks upon it to be a very perfect copy, yet Mr. Grabe remarks, that it is mutilated very much in the latter end of the fifth Book. He concludes this Section with an account of thoſe Writings aſcribed to Irenæus, which are now loſt. In the third Section Mr. Grabe treats of the ſeveral Editions of Irenæus's Works, which were formerly publiſh'd, and of the Method obſerved in this. The firſt, who publiſhed the antient Latin Verſion of Irenæus was Eraſmus, under this title, Opus eruditiſſimum divi Irenæi Epiſcopi Lugdunenſis in quinque libros digeſtum, in quibus mire retegit & confutat veterum Hæreſeon impias & portentoſas opiniones, ex vetuſtiſſimorum codicum collatione, quantum licuit, emendatum, operâ Deſ. Eraſmi Roterodami, ac nunc primum

(7) Tom. 2. pag. 328.

* Ibid. pag. ix, x.

" any difficulty, ſays Dr. Hickes *, of telling his mind with a truly Chriſtian Parrheſia " of the oblation of bread and wine, and the prayer of invocation to God the Father in " the conſecration, to ſend down his holy Spirit upon them, that they might be unto " the in lucem editum operâ Johan. Frobenii. Additus eſt Index rerum ſcitu dignarum. Apud inclytam Baſileam Ann. M. D. XXVI. cum Gratia & Privilegio Cæſareo. This Work Eraſmus dedicated to Bernard, then Biſhop of Tours; and in this edition he prefixed to the four firſt books the antient titles of each chapter, and before the four latter proper prefaces and arguments, which Mr. Grabe gives us in the Prolegomena, thinking it not convenient to inſert them in the body of the work. There were two other impreſſions of Eraſmus's edition printed in 1528 and 1534. Monſieur Du Pin in his Bibliotheque des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques mentions an edition of Irenæus at Paris in 1534; but Mr. Grabe tells us, that he never ſaw it, tho' he had ſeen another printed in 8vo in 1545. As for thoſe Baſil editions of 1545, 1548, and 1554, mentioned likewiſe by Du Pin, he owns that he had not a ſight of them, though he had ſeen the later Baſil edition of 1560, which differs in nothing from the Paris ones in 1563 and 1567. After this Dr. Nicholas Gallaſius publiſhed an edition of Irenæus's works at Geneva 1570, dedicated to Dr. Edmund Grindal, Biſhop of London. The next year came out another edition at Baſil by John James Grynæus. Laſtly, Francis Feuardentius, Doctor of Sorbonne, publiſhed in the year 1575 and 1576 the five books of Irenæus, corrected in a great many places from a Manuſcript of Joannes San-Andreanus, Canon of the Church of Paris, with the addition of five chapters to the end of the fifth book. Du Pin mentions this edition, though Mr. Grabe could not meet with it either at Oxford or at London; but that was of no importance, ſince there are two other impreſſions of Feuardentius's edition printed at Cologne in 1596 and 1625, and at Paris in 1639. With reſpect to Mr. Grabe's edition, Dr. Aldrich, Dean of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, was the chief promoter and encourager of it. In this edition we have the antient Latin verſion, printed from the copy of Feuardentius, but corrected in almoſt two hundred places by the aſſiſtance of four manuſcripts, and of the editions of Eraſmus and Gallaſius, and of the Greek copies; beſides the conjectures of the editor and ſome others. It is likewiſe diſtinguiſhed more exactly than any of the former, by comma's, colons, parentheſes, periods, and chapters. We find almoſt half of the Greek text reſtored, with the fragments collected by Feuardentius, Halloix, and Mr. Grabe, inſerted in their proper places. It contains likewiſe the choiceſt notes of Gallaſius, Feuardentius, Billius, Fronto Ducæus, Leopardus, Scaliger, Petavius, Halloix, Valeſius, Iſaac Voſſius, Cotelerius, and others, with Mr. Grabe's own Annotations under the text; and at the bottom of the page are the various readings of ſeveral copies. To the whole are added two very large indexes, one of the texts of Scripture, the other of the principal matters contained in the works of Irenæus. Next to the indexes follows a threefold Gloſſary, a Latin-Greek one, which ſets down in order the Greek words, which anſwer to thoſe of the antient Interpreter; a Greek-Latin one, which exhibits the Greek words and phraſes, which are of uncommon uſe; and laſtly, a Latin one, in which the unuſual and more obſcure terms of the Latin Interpreter are explained by thoſe which are more common and clear light. Laſt of all is John Croius's Specimen Conjecturarum & Obſervationum in Irenæum, Epiphanium, &c. reprinted upon the account of its ſcarceneſs. Mr. Grabe concludes his Prolegomena with his acknowledgments to thoſe learned perſons, who aſſiſted him in rendering this edition as compleat as poſſible. René Maſſuet, a Benedictine Monk, who publiſhed an edition of Irenæus at Paris 1710 in fol. objects to Dr. Grabe theſe five particulars. 1. That he has thrown ſeveral good readings in the margin, and ſubſtituted worſe in the text. 2. That in his notes he has endeavoured too much to draw Irenæus to favour the Church of England; which renders his remarks too prolix, and full of forced explication. 3. That he has ſaid nothing upon ſeveral paſſages, but only inſerted the notes of others without choice, or conſideration, whether they illuſtrate Irenæus, or not. 4. That he has retrenched, mutilated, or miſplaced the titles of the chapters. 5. That he has not properly placed the fragments of the Greek text, ſince it is frequently very difficult to find what they relate to. Father Remy Ceillier informs us (8), that Mr. Grabe " being diſpleaſed, that Father Maſſuet ſhould have " ſucceeded better than he, wrote againſt the edition " of Maſſuet, to ſhew that this learned Benedictine " had altered the text and doctrine of St. Irenæus in " a great number of places. Grabe's piece was in- " titled, Irenæus ad novam editionem inſtructus, ac ad " Defenſionem contra Maſſuetum paratus. But death " prevented him from publiſhing it. It is ſaid like- " wiſe, that he deſigned to reprint the works of St. " Irenæus with notes." IV. Georgii Bulli, S. Theologiæ Profeſſoris, & Preſbyteri Anglicani, Opera omnia. Cum Præfatione & Annotatis Joannis Erneſti Grabe. London 1703 in fol. V. He had likewiſe an hand in publiſhing, Teſtamentum novum, Græcè, cum ſcholiis Græcis Opera ac ſtudio Joannis Gregorii. Oxford 1703 in fol. He reviſed the Scholia, which Gregory, who was then dead, had collected from various Authors, and marked the places whence they were taken. VI. Joannis Erneſti Grabii Epiſtola ad clariſſimum Virum Dn Joannem Millium, S. T. P. Aulæ S. Edmundi apud Oxonienſes Principalem, & Eccleſiæ Cantuarienſis Canonicum digniſſimum; qua oſtenditur Liber Judicum genuini LXX. Interpretum Verſionem eam eſſe, quam MS. Codex Alexandrinus exhibet; Romanam autem editionem, quod ad dictum Librum, ab illâ prorſus diverſam, atque eandem cum Heſychiana eſſe. Subnexa ſunt tria novæ τῶν ὁ. Editionis Specimina, cum variis Annotationibus. Oxford 1705 in 4°. The Imprimatur by Dr. Will. Delaune the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford is dated July 31, 1704. The deſign of this Epiſtle is, Firſt, To ſhew why Mr. Grabe, in his intended edition of the Septuagint, choſe for his text the very antient Alexandrian Manuſcript in the Royal Library at St. James's, rather than the Vatican Copy, from which the Roman edition was publiſhed, and afterwards reprinted at London and Cambridge, in Holland and at Leipſic, though in all of them many alterations had been made, as Mr. Grabe obſerves, who has particularly remarked, that a negative particle has been inſerted in Hoſea ch. iv. ver. 14. ὁ λαὸς ὁ μὴ συνιὼν συνεπλέκετο μετὰ πόρνης, inſtead of ὁ λαὸς ὁ συνιὼν &c. He hath ſhewn likewiſe, that the Roman edition is incorrect, and not exactly printed from the Vatican Manuſcript; of which he brings ſeveral inſtances in the ſaid prophecy of Hoſea. But even the Vatican Manuſcript itſelf Mr. Grabe thinks not fit to make his text, becauſe the whole book of Judges in the ſaid manuſcript is not the uncorrupt verſion of the Septuagint, but a quite different and almoſt a new one, made by Heſychius at the end of the third Century after Chriſt, or rather engrafted upon the former; whereas the Alexandrian Manuſcript contains the old verſion of the ſaid book of Judges; which had been inſerted in the Hexapla of Origen, as Mr. Grabe proves from two Manuſcripts out of Mr. Colbert's and Iſaac Voſſius's Libraries; and had been made uſe of by Philo Judæus and all the Chriſtian Fathers through the whole world, except thoſe of Alexandria and Egypt, and been read in the Eaſtern Churches. To evince this, Mr. Grabe hath gone through the whole book of Judges from chapter to chapter, and ſet down ſeveral places according to the Roman and Alexandrian copy, oppoſite to each other; and at the bottom ſubjoined the paſſages of the Fathers, as alſo other manuſcripts, which agree with the Alexandrian Manuſcript; whereas the Vatican Copy hath been uſed by none but two Patriarchs of Alexandria, St. Athanaſius and Cyrill, becauſe thoſe of Alexandria and Egypt had received Heſychius's verſion of the Septuagint. The ſecond deſign of Mr. Grabe's Epiſtle was to let the world ſee two or three methods, in which the Septuagint might be printed, that the Learned might chooſe which they like beſt. For this purpoſe Mr. Grabe gives a large and diſtinct account how accurately in the edition of the Alexandrian Copy he intended to proceed, and in what manner he thought to amend the (8) Hiſtoire des Auteurs Eccleſiaſtiques, tom. 2. pag. 196.

" the communicants [in the myſtical ſenſe] the body and blood of his Son Jeſus Chriſt, " not in Subſtance, but in Grace and Virtue, as in the antient Liturgies, for the remiſſion " of their ſins; for their confirmation in godlineſs; for the benefit of their " ſouls the faults, and ſupply the defects; as alſo to mark the additions or interpolations; and yet in ſuch a manner, that every body may eaſily and plainly diſtinguiſh his emendations and ſupplements from the Alexandrian copy itſelf, this being printed in a large character, and the former in a ſmaller; and beſides the additions being marked with ſtars after Origen's way, or with croſſes. He has likewiſe corrected ſeveral errors in our editions of the Septuagint. He hath filled up in his third Specimen out of the Prophecy of Jeremiah ſeveral Lacuna's, and particularly in the 33d chapter a remarkable one from the 14th verſe to the end of the chapter, in which the moſt eminent prophecy and promiſe concerning the Meſſiah and the Jewiſh Nation is contained, which in the Alexandrian as well as the Roman copy, and the editions from the latter, is wanting. As for the two firſt Specimens, which chiefly contain the three firſt chapters of Geneſis, he hath added to each chapter four ſorts of notes in four ſections, of which the firſt gives us emendations and other readings different from the Alexandrian copy, but more agreeable to the Hebrew text, taken from other copies and writings of the Fathers. The ſecond ſhews wherein the Alexandrian Manuſcript is to be preferred to the editions of the Septuagint printed before. The third gives ſeveral various readings and emendations of learned men, which are not true or neceſſary. The fourth ſection contains the fragments of Aquila's, Theodotion's, and Symmachus's verſions, collected from ſeveral printed and manuſcript treatiſes of the Fathers. VII. Caroli Daubuz, Preſbyteri & A. M. pro teſtimonio Flavii Joſephi de Jeſu Chriſto Libri duo; cum Præfatione Joannis Erneſti Grabe. London 1706 in 8vo. VIII. Vetus Teſtamentum juxta Septuaginta Interpretes. Tomus I. Continens Octateuchum, quem ex antiquiſſimo Codice Alexandrino accurate deſcriptum, & ope aliorum Exemplarium ac Scriptorum veterum, præſertim vero Hexaplaris editionis Origenianæ emendatum & ſuppletum, additis ſæpiſſimè Obeliſcorum & Aſteriſcorum ſignis edidit J. Ern. Grabe. Oxford 1707 in fol. and 8vo. Tomus II. continens Veteris Teſtamenti Libros Hiſtoricos omnes, ſive Canonicos, ſive Apocryphos. Oxford 1719 in fol. and 8vo. Tomus III. continens Libros Prophetico omnes. Oxford 1720 in fol. and 8vo. Tomus IV. continens Pſalmorum, Jobi, ac tres Salomonis Libros, cum Apocrypha ejuſdem, necnon Siracidæ Sapientiâ. Oxford 1709 in fol. and 8vo. Dr. Grabe deſigned to have publiſhed this work in the order abovementioned; but an accident obliged him to change his ſcheme, and to publiſh the laſt volume before the ſecond and third. This was occaſioned by his deſire to render his edition as compleat as poſſible. He ſearched out himſelf, and engaged all his friends every where to procure thoſe antient manuſcripts, which have preſerved the different marks made uſe of by Origen in his Hexapla, in order to point out what he thought there was more or leſs in the Greek Tranſlation of the Septuagint than in the Hebrew Original. Dr. Grabe found great aſſiſtance in this point: but he deſired nothing ſo importunately as to know what was become of the Syriac manuſcript, from which Maſius had printed the book of Joſhua, and which contains ſeveral other hiſtorical books of the Old Teſtament. He requeſted therefore all the learned men of Europe, who had a regard for Antiquity, to ſearch immediately all the Libraries for this treaſure (9). For two years he had no account of it; ſo that deſpairing to hear any thing of it; he had already begun to print the ſecond volume (10), when Mr. Daniel Erneſt Jablonſky, Chaplain to the King of Pruſſia, wrote to him, that the valuable manuſcript, which he wanted, was at Herborn among the books of Mr. Lentius, who had been Profeſſor of the Oriental Languages in that Univerſity. The difficulty was to procure it from thence. It required time to write and receive an anſwer. The letters might miſcarry. The moments were on one hand too precious to be loſt; and on the other it was improper to undertake an Edition of the hiſtorical Books without the help of the only manuſcript, which had Origen's marks upon thoſe Books. The beſt and indeed only method was to paſs over to another volume, till he ſhould receive the aſſiſtance neceſſary for the former. The third volume ought naturally to have followed; but he ſtill wanted for this ſome lights, which he expected from two manuſcripts, one belonging to Cardinal Chigi, and the other to the College of Lewis the Great. Except this, Dr. Grabe had collected all the materials neceſſary to execute his deſign. He had even prepared the Notes upon the whole Work, tho' none of them are publiſhed in the three volumes, which were firſt publiſhed. He had reaſons to reſerve them till the whole ſhould be printed (11). He was apprehenſive, that the Dutch Bookſellers would publiſh an Edition from his more beautiful and cheap than that of Oxford. And one of his friends had written to him, that they had ſuch a deſign. This edition is a very noble one, and coſt the Editor a prodigious deal of pains. John James Breitinger has copied it in the edition, which he publiſhed of the Septuagint at Zurich 1730, 1731, 1732, in four volumes in 4to, under the following title: Vetus Teſtamentum ex verſione Septuaginta Interpretum, olim ad fidem Codicis Alexandrini ſummo ſtudio & incredibili diligentiâ expreſſum, emendatum, ac ſuppletum à J. Ern. Grabe. Nunc verò Exemplaris Vaticani aliorumque MSS. Codicum Lectionibus variis, necnon Criticis Diſſertationibus illuſtratum, inſigniterque locupletatum ſummâ curâ edidit Joannes Jacobus Breitengerus. There is a very ſevere critique upon this new Edition publiſhed in the ſecond Tome of the Bibliotheque Raiſonnée (12). The preference which Dr. Grabe gave to the Alexandrian Manuſcript of the Septuagint, diſpleaſed ſome perſons, who thought it inferiour to that of the Vatican. The Reader may ſee their reaſons in a Lettre de Th. de Sal. à M. l'Abbé B. inſerted in the Supplement to the Journal des Savans for December 1709. IX. Jo. Erneſti Grabii Diſſertatio de variis Vitiis LXX Interpretum Verſioni ante B. Origenis ævum illatis, & Remediis ab ipſo Hexaplari ejuſdem Verſionis Editione adhibitis, deque hujus Editionis Reliquiis tam manuſcriptis quam prælo excuſis. Oxford 1710 in 4to. X. An Eſſay upon two Arabic Manuſcripts of the Bodleian Library, and that antient Book, called, The Doctrine of the Apoſtles, which is ſaid to be extant in them; wherein Mr. Whiſton's miſtakes about both are plainly proved. By John Erneſt Grabe, D. D. Oxford 1711 in 8vo. It is dedicated to Dr. William Lloyd, Lord Biſhop of Worceſter, and in the Dedication he obſerves, that this was the firſt Treatiſe, which he publiſhed in the Engliſh Tongue for the ſervice of the Church. In the Preface he tells us (13), that he wrote his Eſſay againſt Mr. Whiſton for two reaſons relating to himſelf and his own affairs, and two relating to Mr. Whiſton. The firſt reaſon relating to himſelf was, that he was neceſſitated to publiſh at leaſt ſomething againſt him about the Doctrine or Conſtitutions of the Apoſtles, becauſe Mr. Whiſton had not only in private diſcourſes, but alſo in public Writings plainly intimated, and made ſeveral people, unacquainted with Dr. Grabe, believe, that the latter was nearly of his mind about the Conſtitutions of the Apoſtles (14), written by St. Clemens, and that he owned in general the genuine Truth and Apoſtolical Antiquity of this Collection (15); " not to mention, " ſays Dr. Grabe, ſeveral other expreſſions of this " kind up and down in his Books lately publiſhed. " Which as I utterly deny, ſo I thought it neceſſary " after ſo long, and perhaps too long a ſilence, " to let the world know by a public Writing of my " own, that my opinion of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions is quite different from, yea oppoſite to Mr. Whiſton's ſentiments about them. And this will be clearly enough perceived by any one, who reads over " this Eſſay upon the Arabic Doctrine of the Apoſtles." In this Eſſay he tells us, that he has proved, that the ſaid Doctrine conſiſting of the firſt ſix Books of the Clementine Conſtitutions, is not the ſame with that ancient ſmall Book called the Doctrine of the Apoſtles or the Conſtitutions of them; and that as it is very doubtful, whether even the latter was a genuine piece, ſo it is moſt certain, that the former with its pompous preface, upon which Mr. Whiſton lays ſo great a ſtreſs, is a counterfeited and falſified writing,

(9) Grabe, Prolegom. in Octateuch. cap. 3. §. 5.

(10) Idem Prolog. in Tom. 4. cap. 4. §. 9.

(11) Idem Prolegom. in Octateuch. c. 3. §. 9.

(12) Pag. 222.

(13) §. 1. pag. 1.

(14) See Mr. Whiſton's Reply to Dr. Allix's Remarks, pag. 3.

(15) See Mr. Whiſton's Hiſt. Preface, pag. 54.

" ſouls and bodies; for the communication of the Holy Ghoſt; for ſure truſt " and confidence in God; and for the reſurrection unto life eternal. For the " ſame reaſon he never was afraid to declare his mind freely for the practice of " chriſm in confirmation; for anointing the ſick with oil; for confeſſion and ſacerdotal " abſolution, and by no means to be called by, or publiſhed under the title of a ſacred Book of the New Teſtament. He afterwards (16) acknowledges the aſſiſtance, which he had received from the Reverend Mr. Gagnier, who about ten years before had come over to the Church of England from that of France, and then taught the Hebrew tongue at Oxford, and who being well ſkilled in moſt of the Oriental Languages had been appointed the year before by Dr. John Sharp, Archbiſhop of York, to aſſiſt Dr. Grabe in the peruſal of the Arabic Manuſcripts in the Bodleian Library, relating to the Clementine Conſtitutions; of which the Archbiſhop had engaged the Doctor to write a Treatiſe againſt Mr. Whiſton's notion concerning them. Accordingly when the Doctor came in May to Oxford to ſearch in the ſaid Library all the Oriental Books, which contain any Conſtitutions or Canons of the Apoſtles, to ſee what light they might afford him in that matter, Mr. Gagnier very diligently read and interpreted to him all that might be ſerviceable to him in any of them, but eſpecially the Arabic Didaſcalia contained in the abovementioned two manuſcripts, for which he chiefly went thither, hoping to find the ſaid Didaſcalia to be really that which Mr. Whiſton ſo poſitively had affirmed it to be, namely that antient Writing, which went under the name of the Doctrine of the Apoſtles; and to be thereby enabled to ſhew how much the ſame was interpolated and altered in the firſt ſix Books of the Clementine Conſtitutions. And altho', as the Doctor obſerves, he quickly perceived this aſſertion of Mr. Whiſton's to be falſe, when he conſidered the bulk of the Arabic Didaſcalia, concluding from thence, that it could not be that antient ſmall Book, called the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, which conſiſted but of 200 ſtichs or commas; yet being deſirous to know what then this Arabic Doctrine was, he reſolved to employ himſelf and Mr. Gagnier for ſeveral days together in this inquiry; in which he ſucceeded as follows. When Mr. Gagnier had interpreted to the Doctor the firſt four or five chapters of the Arabic Doctrine of the Apoſtles, the Doctor found them agree verbatim with the firſt and ſecond Books of the Clementine Conſtitutions; and thereupon ſuſpected preſently the whole Book to be nothing elſe but an Arabic Tranſlation of them. However he began to be doubtful of this, when he obſerved the firſt chapter of the ſaid Didaſcalia to begin from the middle of the fourth chapter of the firſt Book of the Conſtitutions; ſo that what goeth before ſeemed to be wanting, and left out. But this doubt was ſoon removed, after he had deſired Mr. Gagnier to interpret to him that Prologue, which follows after the Preface to this Arabic Doctrine of the Apoſtles, (publiſhed by Mr. Whiſton in his firſt Reply to Dr. Allix's Remarks upon his Book, pag. 25 and 26.) and perceived by the interpretation, that the ſaid Prologue contained not only the ſhort Procœmium of the Clementine Conſtitutions; but alſo the firſt three chapters with the beginning of the fourth. The Doctor therefore went on to compare the Arabic Text with the Greek, and found them exactly correſponding, and going together in order one with the other, to the end of the ſecond Book of the Conſtitutions; except that now and then he met with a various reading, or deſigned alteration, made by the Arabic Interpreter. But he was ſtartled again, when he obſerved, that the fourth Book of the Conſtitutions immediately followed the ſecond, without a word of the third; as alſo that ſome chapters of the fourth Book were left out in their proper place. However thinking that theſe chapters with the whole third Book might perhaps be tranſpoſed and follow afterwards, he reſolved to run even thro' the whole, to ſee if he did not gueſs right, and to get a compleat knowledge of the Arabic Didaſcalia from the beginning to the end. And when he had done this, he found it even ſo as he thought, and that none of the chapters of the firſt five Books of the Clementine Conſtitutions were wanting, altho' they are ſtrangely tranſpoſed; but that in the ſixth Book only one great chaſm appeared, of which he has given an account in §. 10. of his Eſſay; and that five or ſix chapters were added in this Arabic copy, of which nothing occurs in the Greek; ſo that bating theſe new chapters, of which he gives the titles §. 9. in his Table, and excepting the ſaid chaſm, the Arabic Didaſcalia proved to be nothing elſe but a Tranſlation of the firſt ſix intire Books of the Clementine Conſtitutions. The Doctor remarks afterwards (17), that " Mr. Whiſton is found apparently guilty of ſo " great a raſhneſs as can hardly be parallel'd, by pro- " miſing to publiſh a ſacred Writing or Book of the " New Teſtament, which yet he never read once over; " and he will appear likewiſe plainly convicted in this " Eſſay of four groſs miſtakes or errors in one point. " Firſt, by calling that a loſt Book, which has been " extant theſe 150 years every where. Secondly, by " taking that Book to be the antient Διδαχη or Doc- " trine of the Apoſtles, which by all circumſtances re- " corded of the ſaid Διδαχη muſt needs be quite diffe- " rent from it. Thirdly, by not only taking the " Book called the Doctrine of the Apoſtles to be un- " doubtedly a ſacred Book of the New Teſtament, of " which yet all the Authors, who have mentioned " the ſame, have ſpoken very doubtfully, and moſt of " them very ſlightly; but miſtaking moreover, fourthly, " the counterfeited or groſly interpolated Doctrine of the " Apoſtles, and its Preface written in their name, for " their genuine work; whereas the ſame carries in " almoſt every line or comma evident marks of ſpuri- " ouſneſs, and in one place directly contradicts the Book " itſelf." The Doctor towards the cloſe of his Preface (18) tells us, that he does not blame Mr. Whiſton for having freely and yet modeſtly enough in ſome of his writings, ſays he, declared himſelf againſt ſome abuſes or defects of particular Churches and Chriſtians in theſe latter times, either Roman Catholics or Proteſtants, or both; where he has evidently on his ſide not only the conſent of many other Chriſtian Nations in our days, but alſo of the antient Church over all the world, beſides the plain teſtimonies of Scripture; as in the three caſes, mentioned in his Advice for the Study of Divinity, pag. 287. namely Baptiſm by bare ſprinkling, and the not mixing water with the wine in the cup of the Lord's Supper; as alſo the eating of blood and things ſtrangled, of which, and the like, any Chriſtian Divine may, nay ought to ſpeak or write his mind freely, as occaſion offers, or neceſſity requires. In the Eſſay the Doctor endeavours to ſhew, I, That the Arabic Doctrine, except the Preface and five or ſix leaves, is not an extract from the ſix Books of the Clementine Conſtitutions, but the very firſt five intire Books of them, and part of the ſixth; (which by what accident it came to be left out, he gives an account of;) and that therefore Mr. Whiſton has been greatly miſtaken in eſteeming it as a loſt Book, and made a vain promiſe to publiſh it as ſuch, together with the Conſtitutions, when it is the very ſame with theſe, altho' the order of ſome parts be tranſpoſed. II. That this Arabic Doctrine is not the ſame with that ancient Book called, the Doctrine of the Apoſtles; but that, altho' the latter has been the foundation of the former, yet it has been ſo much altered, and ſo many things have been added to it, as have made it a quite different and a much larger Book. III, That it appears from the very Preface of this Book and the laſt chapters, that it is not an Apoſtolical Writing, and ought not to be called a ſacred Book of the New Teſtament, nor to be publiſhed as ſuch. Mr. Whiſton publiſhed in anſwer to this Eſſay a piece, intitled, Remarks upon Dr. Grabe's Eſſay upon two Arabick Manuſcripts of the Bodleian Library, &c. By William Whiſton, M. A. London 1711 in 8vo. It is dated Sept. 24th 1711. In this piece he obſerves (19), that before he ſaw Dr. Grabe's Eſſay his thoughts were contained in this propoſition: " That the Doctrine of the Apoſtles, which the Churches " of Ethiopia and Egypt received, and that we have " in Arabic at Oxford, ſo far as it is the ſame, is " genuine, and a ſacred Book of the New Teſtament. " I mean this, in caſe theſe copies of the former were " not an Athanaſian Abridgment of the genuine Book " only.

(16) Sect. 3. pag. 4, & ſeqq.

(17) Preface, §. 6.

(18) Ibid. pag. 11.

(19) Pag. 3, and 18.

" abſolution, as judicial; for prayer for the ſouls of the dead, who died in the faith and " fear of God; for the antient commemoration of Saints in the holy Euchariſt... As " he uſed to ſpeak of the want of theſe things as defects in the Reformed Churches; ſo " it was not without ſorrow and ſome indignation that he uſed to lament the corruption " and depravation of them in the Church of Rome." The writer of a letter to Dr. Hickes, publiſhed by that Divine (d), and dated May the 26th 1712, obſerves, that Dr. Grabe was " deſirous, that after his death ſomewhat might be made public, to declare " his dying in the Communion of the Church of England, notwithſtanding ſome defects " (as he apprehended) in its reformation, and his moſt hearty wiſhes for the reunion of " all Chriſtians, according to the moſt primitive and perfect model. That he had " ſome ſcruples about communicating publickly in our Churches, at leaſt without he " could have an intire confidence in the Prieſt that was to officiate (as in his own coun- " try I know he had,) or except in the caſe of neceſſity, he was very ſincere in own- " ing. Notwithſtanding this, he had not near that eſteem for any other part of the Ca- " tholic Church, as for the Church of England. And as he counted himſelf under an " indiſpenſable obligation of duty to teſtify his Catholic Communion with all Saints in " the holy Euchariſt, he declared with a great deal of ſenſible ſatisfaction, that ever " ſince his coming into our Iſle, it had pleaſed God to grant him an opportunity of re- " ceiving the Sacrament, according to his heart's deſire, in its moſt antient purity and " perfection; and that he had conſtantly all this while received it from ſuch only as " were in holy Orders, according to the Reformed Church of England, for the autho- " rity of whoſe Prieſts and Biſhops, and the validity of their Orders againſt the Church " of Rome, he gave all poſſible teſtimonies to the very laſt." The ſame Writer re- marks (e), that however ſome might accuſe the Doctor of too much credulity, there was no man in reality further than he from ſuffering himſelf to be determined by the opinions and dictates of any Church, becauſe eſtabliſhed by Law, or from being dazzled with worldly ſplendor and power. And though he was not indeed for an unbounded liberty of thinking, yet moſt certain it is from the whole proceſs of his life and ſtudies, that he was not for taking up

(d) In his Account of Dr. Grabe &c. pag. lxviii, & ſeq.

(e) Ibid. pag. lxix, lxx.

" only." His thoughts after reading the Doctor's Eſſay were contained in the following propoſition (20): The Preface to this Arabic Doctrine is the real Preface to the original Doctrine of the Apoſtles; but the Book itſelf is a corrupt Edition of the Catholic Doctrine, or former ſix Books of the Apoſtolical Conſtitutions, made by the Athanaſians in the fourth Century of the Church. Mr. Whiſton concludes with theſe words (21): " Up- " on the whole I think Dr. Grabe could not have " been doing a thing ſo uſeful to true Chriſtianity, " and ſo fatal to the Athanaſian Herely; I may add, " ſo much for the credit and eſtabliſhment of the Apo- " ſtolical Conſtitutions themſelves, even as they are " for the main in our preſent copies, and ſo much for " the diſcovery of the true origin of thoſe orthodox " interpolations, which are ſtill continued in them, as " by employing himſelf about theſe Arabic Manuſcripts " as he has done. Nor has almoſt any diſcovery, I " think, happened ſo fortunate to me and to that ſacred " cauſe I am engaged in from the beginning, as this " Eſſay of his before us; the ſerious review and recon- " ſideration of which therefore I do heartily recom- " mend to him and the reſt of the learned upon this " occaſion; that, if poſſible, ſuch honeſt, pious, and indu- " ſtrious men, as he, may no longer be made the unhap- " py inſtruments of ſupporting the Athanaſian Hereſy a- " mong us, and of the continued rejection of the moſt ſacred " of the Canonical Books of the New Teſtament." The year following there was publiſhed An Account of the Authority of the Arabic Manuſcripts in the Bodleian Library controverted between Dr. Grabe and Mr. Whiſton. In a Letter to Mr. Thirlby. By Simon Ockley, B. D. Profeſſor of Arabic in the Univerſity of Cambridge, and Chaplain to the moſt honourable Robert Earl of Oxford and Mortimer, Lord High Treaſurer of Great Britain. London 1712, in 8vo. This Letter is dated October 15th 1712. In this piece Mr. Ockley obſerves (22), with regard to Mr. Whiſton's firſt propoſition, that " it is ſo folded together, that any Reader almoſt " might very well be excuſed, that could not under- " ſtand it..... The meaning I take to be this. Our " Arabic copy at Oxford, ſo far as it agrees with the " copy uſed in the Ethiopic Church [which we have not " yet ſeen] is a ſacred Book of the New Teſtament. Pro- " vided the Ethiopic copy was not a forgery of Atha- " naſius. So far then as theſe two copies agree, they " are genuine: [which remains ſtill to be proved.] " Provided the Ethiopic copy was not an Athanaſian " Abridgment: which has no conſequence at all. Beſides " there is this included in it, that it neceſſarily ſuppoſes " the Arabic Verſion to have been made from the E- " thiopic; which is the very reverſe of the truth. His " imagination that the Ethiopic Verſion is better, is " falſe; for he miſtakes if he ſuppoſes, that the E- " thiopians have any copy of that kind tranſlated from " any antient Greek copy. It is moſt certain, that " what they have, is from the Egyptian Arabic copy." Mr. Ockley afterwards remarks (23), that Mr. Whiſton's manner of maintaining his propoſition ſeems no leſs ſtrange than the propoſition itſelf. XI. Some inſtances of the defect and omiſſions in Mr. Whiſton's Collection of Teſtimonies from the Scriptures and the Fathers againſt the true Deity of the Holy Ghoſt, and of miſapplying and miſinterpreting divers of them. By Dr. Grabe. To which is premiſed a diſcourſe, wherein ſome account is given of the learned Doctor and of his MSS. and of this ſhort Treatiſe found among his Engliſh MSS. By George Hickes, D. D. London 1712 in 8vo. Dr. Hickes tells us (24), that this Tract of Dr. Grabe was written at the requeſt of Dr. John Sharp, Archbiſhop of York; and that it was apparently finiſhed before his Eſſay upon two Arabic Manuſcripts &c. and that the reaſon why he did not publiſh it with that diſcourſe, was very probably becauſe he intended to write more obſervations upon that Account of the Faith of the two firſt Centuries, as he ſeems to intimate in the ſecond page of this Tract, wherein he declares, that he had obſerved many things in it defective, more ſuperfluous, little or nothing at all to the purpoſe, and moſt of them wrong or miſapplied; but that the circumſtances, in which he then was, would by no means permit him to ſet down all his obſervations. XII. Liturgia Græca Joannis Erneſti Grabii. This Greek Liturgy, which was drawn up by our Author for his own private uſe, was publiſhed by Chriſtopher Matthew Pfaff at the end of Irenæi Fragmenta anecdota, printed at the Hague 1715 in 8vo. The Editor has given us a Latin Verſion of it and Notes upon it. XIII. De formâ Conſecrationis Euchariſtiæ; hoc eſt, Defenſio Eccleſiæ Græcæ contra Romanam in articulo de Conſecratione Elementorum Euchariſticorum, Latinè ſcripta; Autore D. Joanne Erneſto Grabio, & nunc primum publicata, unà cum Verſione in uſum Lectoris Anglicani. Accedunt ex iiſdem MSS. annotata quædam de oblatione Corporis & Sanguinis Chriſti, formâ & effectu Conſecrationis Euchariſticæ, & duo fragmenta Præfationis deſtinatæ novæ Editioni primæ Liturgiæ Regis Eduardi VI. Cum Præfatione Editoris; quâ oſtenditur quænam ſententia ſit Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ de uſu Patrum & maximorum ejus Membrorum de Rebus, quas Autor hujus Libri defendit. London 1721 in 8vo.

(20) Pag. 41.

(21) Pag. 47, 48.

(22) Pag. 14, 15.

(23) Pag. 17.

(24) Some Account of Dr. Grabe, &c. pag. xxxii.

up any thing in matters of Religion upon truſt, or upon an implicite faith, but was for bringing them all to the teſt, and comparing them with the originals. This was the occaſion to him for a good while of a great many doubts and ſcruples concerning that communion of Chriſtians, wherein he was born and educated, as alſo concerning the ſeveral other communions of them both in the Eaſt and Weſt; with all of which he laboured to acquaint himſelf by the exacteſt information that could poſſibly be got, before he could arrive at any ſettlement, or be able to fix his notion of the Catholic Church, and of the true Communion therein by Apoſtolical Faith and Charity. This coſt him very dear, as I have heard him complain... He was tempted at ſundry times, and after ſundry manners, but could by no means be prevailed on to part with the purchaſe, which he had made, or to let go the peace of his conſcience. Mr. Nelſon tells us (f), that "all the Learned, who could beſt judge of the "Doctor's great talents, readily offer him that incenſe of praiſe, which is juſtly due to "his profound erudition; whereby he was qualified to enlighten the dark and obſcure "parts of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, to trace the original frame and ſtate of the Chriſtian "Church, and to reſtore the ſacred volumes, the pillars of our faith, to their primitive "perfection." He had ſo great a zeal for promoting the antient government and diſcipline of the Church, among all thoſe who had ſeparated themſelves from the corruptions and ſuperſtitions of the Church of Rome, that he formed a plan, and made ſome advances in it, for reſtoring the Epiſcopal Order and Office in the territories of the King of Pruſſia his Sovereign; and propoſed moreover to introduce a Liturgy, much after the model of the Engliſh Service, into that King's dominions; and recommended likewiſe the uſe of the Engliſh Liturgy itſelf, by the means of ſome of his friends, to a certain neighbouring Court (g). "By which means, adds Mr. Nelſon, he would have united "the two main bodies of Proteſtants in a more perfect and Apoſtolical Reformation, "than that upon which either of them did yet ſtand, and would therefore have fortified "the common cauſe of their Proteſtation againſt the errors of Popery. But yet his "learned ſtudies did not ſo engroſs his mind, as to prevent his daily attending the hours "of public prayer, to which purpoſe he always choſe his lodgings near a Church. Nei-"ther did the applauſe he received from the greateſt men of the age ſo exalt him, but "that he readily condeſcended to converſe with thoſe of the loweſt underſtanding, when "he could be any ways ſerviceable to them in their ſpiritual concerns. He was juſtly "eſteemed one of the greateſt Divines of the age; yet the great modeſty of his tem-"per, and the profound humility of his mind, made him prefer others before himſelf. "He laid the chiefeſt ſtreſs upon the conſtant practice of the virtues of the Chriſtian "life; and was alſo a ſtrict obſerver of all the rules of the Apoſtolical times, and of "the Catholic uſages of the firſt Chriſtians." He left a great number of manuſcripts behind him [D] to Dr. Hickes for his life, and at his deceaſe to Dr. George Smalridge, afterwards Biſhop of Briſtol, who attended him in his laſt moments; and laſtly to the Bodleian Library, to which he finally bequeathed them. He died at London November the 13th 1711, aged forty five years, and was interred in Weſtminſter-Abbey, where a monument was erected for him by the late Earl of Oxford. Magnus Cruſius had a deſign a few years ago to publiſh the letters of ſeveral learned men to our Author, with a life of him (b). Dr. Styan Thirlby in the Dedication of his edition of Juſtini Philoſophi

(f) Life of Dr. George Bull, Lord Biſhop of St. David's. By Robert Nelſon Eſq; pag. 403. 2d edit. London 1714, in 8vo.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(b) See Magni Cruſii Heſvicenſis Diſſertatio Epiſtolica ad eminentiſſ. atque reverendiſſ. Dom. Chriſtianum Wormium, Diœceſeos Sidlanciæ in Daniâ Epiſcopum, &c. de Scriptis quibuſdam integris Fragmentiſque hactenus inéditis, quæ in Itinere Galliæ, Angliæ atque Germaniæ reperire contigit, & nunc in lucem edenda parat, Viroſque eruditos inſimul ad conferendas Symbolas humaniſſimè invitat. Leipſic 1728 in 4to, pagg. 12.

[D] He left a great number of Manuſcripts behind him.] Dr. Hickes in his Account of Dr. Grabe and of his Manuſcripts, prefixed to Dr. Grabe's Some Inſtances of the Defects and Omiſſions in Mr. Whiſton's Collection of Teſtimonies, informs us, that our Author left the following Manuſcripts. I. The two remaining volumes of the Alexandrian Text of the Septuagint complete, containing the hiſtorical and prophetical books, with very large Collections for a volume of Annotations, as alſo for ſome curious Diſſertations, Prolegomena, &c. upon the four volumes; and the collations out of ſome foreign MSS. with the marks of the Origenian Aſteriſks and Obeliſks. II. The Alexandrian Texts of the New Teſtament and of St. Clement's Epiſtles, firſt publiſhed by Junius, with notes. He never diſcovered his deſign of printing this work, which would perfect the whole Alexandrian Manuſcript, leſt he ſhould prejudice the ſale of his friend Dr. Mill's New Teſtament. III. The two volumes of his Spicilegium reviſed and corrected in many places, with large additions and collections for continuing the ſame; which he deſigned to do in a third volume, wherein, as he tells us himſelf (25), he intended to publiſh a fragment of one of St. Clement's loſt books, in which he calls the Holy Ghoſt Θεὸν, God. IV. His Irenæus reviſed and corrected, with collections and references for a new edition, in which he deſigned to animadvert upon Renatus Maſſuet, the Editor of the Paris edition of that Father in 1710, in his own defence. V. Many Greek Fragments of Origen, particularly out of his Commentaries, containing an hundred and twenty ſheets in 4to, and five in folio. There are likewiſe among his manuſcripts a numerous collection of other Greek Fragments of Fathers, and ſome of Heretics, which would make ſeveral volumes in print. Among his plans, there is one in Latin, intitled, ANGLICANÆ ECCLESIÆ prærogativæ præ aliis Proteſtantium cœtibus in Praxi & Doctrinâ ſpeciatim. The titles of the chapters of this intended treatiſe, are theſe which follow in his own words. In Hierarchiâ Eccleſiaſticâ & Epiſcoporum continuâ ab Apoſtolis ſucceſſione, & legitimâ ſacerdotum Ordinatione, cap. I. In Celebratione Euchariſtiæ: ubi de oblatione panis & vini, illiuſque fermentati, de benedictione, de gratiarum actione atque precibus, de fractione panis, necnon de ipſo Sacerdote primam Oblatorum partem ſumente agitur, cap. II. In Adminiſtratione Confirmationis per manuum impoſitionem, quam Apoſtolus in Epiſtolâ ad Hebræos, c. 6. v. 2. inter fundamenta Chriſtianæ Religionis refert, de quo hoc loco prolixe agitur, cap. III. In Ritibus quibuſdam communiter obſervatis, ut ſunt memoriæ Apoſtolorum, Evangeliſtarum, omniumque Sanctorum, Signum Crucis, Genuflexio in Precibus, Recitatio Pſalmorum Davidis, & Lectio Bibliorum in matutino & veſpertino cultu, cap. IV. In Ritibus quibuſdam haud ſemper quidem & ubique in Eccleſiâ Anglicanâ obſervatis, attamen bene commendatis in Liturgiâ Anglicanâ, ut ſunt immerſio baptizandorum in aquam, Jejunium Quadrageſimale, aliaque ſtata Jejunia, cap. V. In moderatione, quæ in formandis Articulis Fidei ſive Doctrinæ Anglicanæ eſt adhibita, indeque pendente majori Conſcientiæ libertate, (25) Some Inſtances of the Defects and Omiſſions in Mr. Whiſton's Collection of Teſtimonies, pag. 17.

phi & Martyris Apologiæ duæ & Dialogus cum Tryphone Judæo. Cum Notis & Emendationibus Styani Thirlbii (i) to the Lord Craven, tells us, that Dr. Grabe "was a good man "and not unlearned, and well verſed in the writings of the Fathers. But he was no "Critic, nor could be one, ſince he was not furniſhed with genius, or judgment, or, to "ſpeak the truth, with learning, ſufficient for that purpoſe (k)." Monſieur Le Clerc (l) approves of this judgment paſſed on Dr. Grabe, and adds, that his books gained him the character of a laborious perſon, rather than of a great Critic. But the Authors of the Acta Eruditorum in their account of Dr. Thirlby's edition of Juſtin Martyr have animadverted upon him with great ſeverity on account of his Dedication of it, in which he has cenſured Dr. Grabe. Caſimir Oudin had charged our Author with impiety and drunkenneſs; but Dr. John Keil (m) vindicates him from that accuſation, and obſerves, that he was temperate even to an exceſs, and that Dr. G. Smalridge, who attended him in his laſt ſickneſs, gave an ample teſtimony of his ſincere piety and religion.

(i) London 1722, fol.

(k) Grabius vir bonus nec indoctus, & in ſcriptis patrum apprimè verſatus. Criticus non fuit, neque eſſe potuit, utpote neque ingenio, neque judicio, neque ſi verum dicere licet, doctrinâ, ſatis ad eam rem inſtructus; id quod Juſtinum poſt illum edenti neceſſe erat ſæpe demonſtrare.

(l) Bibliotheque Ancienne & Moderne, tom. 23. pag. 11.

(m) Epiſtola ad Vir. Clariſſ. Joannem Bernoulli in Academia Baſilienſi Mathematum Profeſſorem, pag. 8, 9. edit. Londini 1720, in 8vo.

cap. VI. In Catechiſmo, ſpeciatim in reſtitutione ſecundi Præcepti Divini de Imaginibus Dei haud formandis atque adorandis, quod in Lutheri perinde ut in Romano Catechiſmo, eſt omiſſum, cap. VII. Speciatim in Articulo de Juſtificatione & Prædeſtinatione, ubi obſcurior Pauli Diſputatio de Juſtificatione declaratur, & clara Jacobi in hoc Articulo Doctrina ex aliis Scripturæ locis confirmatur, ac oſtenditur quam malè Jacobus a Luthero Delirii accuſatus, ejuſque Epiſtola ſtraminea vocata fuerit, & quam miſerè ab aliis planus ejus ſenſus pervertatur, cap. VIII. In aliis quibuſdam punctis, veluti de Poteſtate Eccleſiæ circa Leges in adiaphoris ferendas, cap. IX. In veneratione erga univerſalem Patrum conſenſum & Catholicam Eccleſiæ traditionem, quodque nec Lutheri nec Calvini Placitis ita ſtrictè adhæreat, multo minus more Hæreticorum & Schiſmaticorum ſe à quoquam ſingulari homine denominet, uti Lutherani ſemetipſos ita a Luthero vocant, planè contra Apoſtoli Pauli & Apoſtolicæ Eccleſiæ doctrinam atque praxin. After theſe heads he hath written in capitals DESIDERATA; "for it cannot be denied, ſays Dr. Hickes "(26), but that he was for reſtoring the pure primi- "tive practices and diſcipline of the Catholic Churches, "which continued more or leſs corrected in all "Churches till the Reformation." Among his manuſcripts there were ſeveral finiſhed or unfiniſhed, written againſt the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome, the titles of which are as follow. 1. De Articulis Fidei non multiplicandis, ſive de Fidei ſymbolo perfecto contra Pontificios. 2. Schiſmatis inter Græcos & Latinos cauſa, pro Græcis contra Latinos. 3. De Cathedrâ S. Petri, ſive de verâ Catholicæ Eccleſiæ Unitate, contra Pontificios. 4. Petrus non Monarcha, ſive Diſcurſus de Quæſtione, utrum Petrus Monarchicum Eccleſiæ caput fuerit, in quo Pontificiorum argumenta pro affirmativâ parte hujus quæſtionis diſſolvuntur. 5. Petrus non Petra ſive Petrus à Petra, non Petra à Petro. 6. Romanæ Eccleſiæ & Ethnicæ Religionis ſimilitudo & convenientia. 7. De Idololatriâ Tractatus. In ſpecie de crimine Idololatriæ, cujus Romanam Eccleſiam Proteſtantes accuſant, eamque hoc reſpectu Babylonicam Meretricem S. Johanni divinitus oſtenſam eſſe dicunt, diſſeritur. 8. Nova Babylon, ſivè de corrupto Eccleſiæ ſtatu: in ſpecie de Romanæ Eccleſiæ adulterio. 9. Teſtimonia de Corruptione Eccleſiæ Romanæ quoad Dogmatica. 10. Diſſertatio contra Communionem Euchariſticam ſub una Panis ſpecie in Romanâ Eccleſiâ uſitatam. 11. De Communione ſub utraque Panis & Vini ſpecie, contra Pontificios. 12. Roma Meretrix: ſive Teſtimonia, quod ſub finem Mundi à verâ fide in Chriſtum deficiens magnam in Religione corruptionem ſit admiſſura, quodque ſedes Antichriſti tandem Roma futura ſit. 13. Argumenta quod Eccleſiæ Romanæ Fornicatio ſpiritualis non ſit propriè cultus Antichriſtianus, ſed præcedens Apoſtaſia tantum. There were found alſo among his papers ſeveral of his Letters, which he wrote with ſucceſs to ſeveral perſons, to prevent their apoſtaſy to the Church of Rome, when they were ready to be reconciled to it. In theſe Letters he challenged the Prieſts to meet him at conferences before the perſons whom they had led aſtray; "but they knowing, ſays "Dr. Hickes (27), the Hercules with whom they "muſt have conflicted, wiſely declined the challenge; "for they could not but be ſenſible, that he was pre- "pared to demonſtrate all the errors and corruptions "of their Church, both in doctrine and practice, "from the pure doctrines and practices of the antient "Catholic Church, which, as it is the moſt effectual "and unanſwerable way of managing the controverſy "with the Popiſh emiſſaries and writers, ſo it is "that which they moſt fear." There was among his manuſcripts a copy of the Didaſcalia of Clemens Romanus and of Hippolytus, with copies of other manuſcripts, which he had tranſcribed and collected towards a third volume of his Spicilegium; and to ſhew, that the Clementine Conſtitutions were not written by the Apoſtles, but was a patched work out of the Didaſcaliæ or Doctrines, which went under the names of the Apoſtles and their ſucceſſors. Dr. Hickes gives a particular account of theſe manuſcripts (28); and obſerves (29), that he found among our Author's papers and in his printed books, ſome things, which ſhew his free and communicable temper without reſerve, in imparting every thing he knew to any other perſon, for the good of the Church, and the benefit of the learned world. Among his Engliſh manuſcripts there is one containing Remarks upon the Epiſtles of Clemens Romanus, Polycarp, Ignatius, and upon the Shepherd of Hermas, which he communicated to Dr. Wake, now Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who not only in the Preface to the ſecond edition of his Tranſlation of thoſe Apoſtolical Fathers, but in a letter which he wrote for that purpoſe to the Doctor, gratefully acknowledges the great obligation which he had to him for them. In his laſt will Dr. Grabe ordered ſome few notes, which he had written upon Clemens Alexandrinus, to be ſent to Dr. Potter, the preſent Biſhop of Oxford. He began alſo to write notes on Dr. Wells's Paraphraſe on the Epiſtles. He made likewiſe ſome Remarks on The propitiatory oblation in the holy Euchariſt, which he undoubtedly intended to communicate to the Author. He left ſome Emendanda and Addenda to Dr. Cave's Hiſtoria Literaria. "And had "Dr. Mill ſurvived him, ſays Dr. Hickes (30), he "would have acknowledged to the world, as he did "to me and others, the many ready and generous "aſſiſtances he received from him in his great work. "The learned Biſhop Bull, as long as he lived, on "all occaſions acknowledged his ſingular generoſity, "as well as learning, in publiſhing his works with "ſo much improvement and advantage to the great "truths he had defended, and to the learned world."

(26) Some Account, pag. viii.

(27) Some Account, pag. xi. xii.

(28) Ibid. pag. xviii, & ſeqq.

(29) Ibid. pag. xxiii, xxiv.

(30) Ibid. pag. xxiv, xxv.

T

☞GRÆVIUS (JOHN GEORGE), one of the moſt learned Writers in the ſeventeenth Century, was born of a good family at Naumbourg in Germany (a) January the 29th 1632 (b). After he had paſſed thro' his firſt courſe of ſtudies in his own country [A], he was ſent in 1650 to Leipſic (c), where he maintained under John Stauchius, a relation

(a) Petri Burmanni Oratio Funebris in Obitum Viri Clariſſ. Joannis Georgii Grævii, dicta XI Kal. Martii CIↃ IↃ CCIL. pag. 9. edit. Trajecti ad Rhenum 1703 in 4to. (b) Acta Eruditor. Anni 1703. pag. 187. (c) Ibid.

[A] One of the moſt learned Writers in the XVIIth Century.] This ſufficiently appears from his Works, a Catalogue of which is as follows: I. Iſaaci Caſauboni Epiſtolæ. Editio ſecunda 82 Epiſtolis auctior, & juxta ſeriem relation of his mother's, a Theſis de Moribus Germanorum [B]. He applied himſelf at firſt to the ſtudy of the Law in obedience to his father; but his inclination ſoon diverted his application entirely to polite Literature. A converſation, which he occaſionally had at Deventer with John Frederick Gronovius, who was Profeſſor there, confirmed him in his inclination; and he ſtaid in that City in order to proſecute his ſtudies under the direction of that Profeſſor (d). Having continued there two years he went to Leyden, and afterwards to Amſterdam, where David Blondel perſuaded him to abandon the Lutheran Religion, in which he was born, and to which he had adhered till then, and to embrace that of the Calviniſts (e). In 1656 the Elector of Brandenburg nominated him, upon the death of John Schulting, to the Profeſſorſhip at Duiſbourg, though he was then but in the 24th year of his age (f). But before he entered upon his place, he took a journey to Antwerp, Bruſſels, Louvain, and the adjacent countries. He held this poſt but ſeriem temporum digeſta. Curante Johanne Georgio Grævio. Magdeburgi & Helmſtadii 1656 in 4to. The Dedication of this Edition to Thomas Reineſius is dated at Amſterdam Auguſt 31ſt 1655. The firſt Edition of theſe Letters was publiſhed at the Hague in 1638 by John Frederic Gronovius. But Græviuſ's Edition is much preferable to that, though this was afterwards eclipſed by Theodore Janſon ab Almeloveen's Edition at Rotterdam 1709 in fol. II. Joannis Meurſii Ceramicus geminus, ſive de Ceramici Athenienſium utriuſque Antiquitatibus Liber ſingularis. Utrecht 1662 in 4to. This Treatiſe, which was publiſhed by Grævius, was afterwards inſerted in the fourth volume of Gronovius's Antiquities. III. Alberti Rubenii de re Veſtiariâ, præcipuè de Latoclavo Libri II, cum aliis ejuſdem opuſculis poſthumis. Antwerp 1665 in 4to. Rubenius dying while he was engaged in preparing theſe pieces for the preſs, Grævius undertook the digeſting them into order, and publiſhing them. They are inſerted in the ſixth volume of the Greek Antiquities. IV. Heſiodi Aſcræi, quæ extant, Opera, ex recenſione J. G. Grævii; cum ejuſdem animadverſionibus & notis. Accedunt Notæ ineditæ Joſ. Scaligeri & Franc. Guieti. Amſterdam 1667 in 8vo. Grævius's Notes are printed together at the end of the volume, and illuſtrate not only Heſiod, but likewiſe a great many other paſſages of the Greek and Latin Writers. V. Luciani Solæciſta cum Notis J. G. Grævii. Amſterdam 1668 in 8vo. VI. Suetonius Tranquillus ex recenſione J. G. Grævii, cum ejuſdem Animadverſionibus, & Commentariis integris Læv. Torrentii, Iſ. Caſauboni, Theodori item Marcilii, necnon ſelectis aliorum Notis. Utrecht 1672 in 4to. Secunda Editio auctior & emendatior. Hague 1690 in 4to. Our Author's method in publiſhing the intire Commentaries of thoſe, who had laboured before him upon the Writer, which he propoſed to explain, has theſe advantages, that tho' it renders the volume larger, it ſatisfies thoſe, who love to trace things to their ſource, and to read the very words of the Commentators, eſpecially of thoſe, who are moſt eminent. VII. Johannis Meurſii Libri poſthumi de Cypro, Rhodo, & Cretâ, &c. Amſterdam 1675 in 4to. VIII. In Obitum Johannis de Bruyn Oratio. Amſterdam 1675 in 4to. IX. M. Tullii Ciceronis Epiſtolarum Libri XVI ad Familiares, ut vulgo vocantur, ex recenſione J. G. Grævii, cum ejuſdem animadverſionibus & notis integris Petri Victorii, P. Manutii, Henr. Ragazonii, D. Lambini, Fulvii Urſini, necnon ſelectis Jo. Fr. Gronovii & aliorum. Amſterdam and Leyden 1676 two volumes in 8vo. The ſecond Edition was publiſhed in 1693. Theſe Letters were reprinted at Amſterdam in 1689 in 12mo, with the Notes of Grævius alone, whoſe admirable talent in criticiſm has explained a great number of places in them. X. L. Annæi Flori Epitome rerum Romanarum, ex recenſione & cum Annotationibus J. G. Grævii. In fine additus eſt L. Ampelius ex Bibliothecâ Cl. Salmaſii. Utrecht 1680 in 8vo. Item, Cum Annotationibus longè auctioribus & correctioribus, & cum notis integris Cl. Salmaſii, & ſelectis variorum. Amſterdam 1692 in 8vo. This Edition is preferable to all that preceded it. It is illuſtrated with medals. Grævius's Preface is an admirable one. He frankly acknowledges the faults of his Author, contrary to the general cuſtom of Commentators. XI. C. Catullus, Tibullus, Propertius, ex recenſione J. G. Grævii, cum integris Joſ. Scaligeri, Mureti, Achillis Statii, Roberti Titii, Hieron. Avantii, Douſarum, Theod. Marcilii, & ſelectis Paſſeratii & aliorum notis. Utrecht 1680 in 8vo. XII. Juſtini Hiſtoriarum Philippicarum Libri 44, ex recenſione J. G. Grævii; cum ejuſdem Caſtigationibus. His accedunt integræ notæ M. Berneggeri, Iſ. Voſſii, Ian. Fabri, Jo. Vorſtii, Jo. Schefferi, Jac. Bongarſii, Franciſci Modii & aliorum. Leyden 1683 in 8vo. Grævius had publiſhed this Author with his own Notes alone at Utrecht in 1668 in 12mo. But he thought proper now to add, according to the method obſerved by him in other Authors, whom he publiſhed, the entire Notes of former Commentators. This Edition is preferable to all the preceding ones, tho' ſome complain of ſeveral omiſſions in it. This Author was reprinted with Grævius's Notes alone at Amſterdam 1694 in 12mo. XIII. M. T. Ciceronis Epiſtolarum ad Atticum Libri ſedecim, ex recenſione Johannis Georgii Grævii, cum ejuſdem Animadverſionibus & Notis integris J. Victorii, P. Manutii, F. Urſini, D. Lambini, &c. ineditis; item Iſ. Caſauboni, Mureti, & J. Fr. Gronovii, necnon ſelectis variorum. Amſterdam 1684, two volumes in 8vo. XIV. J. Meurſii Theſeus, ſive de ejus Vitâ Liber ſingularis. Utrecht 1684 in 4to. It is inſerted in the tenth volume of Gronovius's Greek Antiquities. XV. Joannis Meurſii Themis Attica, ſive de Legibus Atticis Libri duo. Utrecht 1685 in 4to. It is inſerted in the fifth volume of Gronovius's Greek Antiquities. XVI. Joannis Meurſii de Regno Laconico Libri duo: de Piræo Liber ſingularis; & in Helladii Chreſtomathiam Animadverſiones. Utrecht 1687 in 4to. Inſerted in the fifth volume of Gronovius's Greek Antiquities. For the Edition of theſe Tracts of Meurſius we are obliged to Baron Puffendorf, who communicated them from the King of Sweden's Library to his friend Grævius, who publiſhed them. XVII. Luciani Samoſatenſis Opera omnia ex verſione Joannis Benedicti, cum notis integris J. Bourdelotii, J. Palmerii a Grentemeſnil, T. Fabri, Æg. Menagii, Fr. Guieti, J. G. Grævii, J. Gronovii, L. Barlæi, J. Tollii, & ſelectis aliorum. Accedunt inedita Scholia in Lucianum ex Bibliothecâ Iſaaci Voſſii. Amſterdam 1687 in 8vo, two volumes. XVIII. Claudii Rutilii Numatiani Galli Itinerarium, integris Simleri, Caſtalionis, &c. Grævii aliorumque animadverſionibus illuſtratum. Ex Muſæo Th. Janſon ab Almeloveen. Amſterdam 1687 in 12mo. XIX. M. T. Ciceronis de Officiis Libri III; Cato Major ſive de Senectute; Lælius, ſive de Amicitiâ; Paradoxa; Somnium Scipionis ex recenſione J. G. Grævii, cum ejuſdem Notis & integris Animadverſionibus Lambini Urſini, Langii, Fabricii, Manutii, necnon ſelectis aliorum. Amſterdam 1688 in 8vo. Theſe pieces were publiſhed with Grævius's Notes alone at Amſterdam 1691 in 12mo. XX. De humanæ Rationis imbecillitate, unde proveniat, & illi quomodo poſſimus mederi, Liber ſingularis. Auctore Georgio Mackenzio a Valle Roſarum, apud Scotos Cauſarum Patrono. Utrecht 1690 in 8vo. Jena 1691 in 8vo. Francfort 1700 in 12mo. Grævius had ſo good an opinion of this Treatiſe, that he publiſhed it. XXI. Bernardini Ferrarii Mediolanenſis Theologi de Ritu ſacrarum Eccleſiæ Veteris Concionum. Cum Præfatione J. G. Grævii. Utrecht 1692 in 8vo. XXII. Notæ in Lactantium de Mortibus Perſecutorum. Theſe Notes, which are not very conſiderable, are inſerted in Bauldri's Edition of Lactantius at Utrecht 1692 in 8vo. XXIII. Alb. Rubenii de Vitâ Fl. Mallii Theodori V. C. Utrecht 1694 in 12mo, publiſhed by Grævius, and dedicated to Dr. Richard Bentley, who ſent over the manuſcript to him, which had been purchaſed by Sir Edward Sherburne among ſome papers of Gevartius. XXIV. P. Danielis Huetii Poemata quotquot colligi potuerunt. Utrecht 1694 in 8vo. Auctiora, 1700 in 12mo. XXV. Theſaurus Antiquarum Romanarum. Utrecht 1694, 1699, twelve volumes in fol. The world is greatly obliged to our Author for collecting and publiſhing correctly the Tracts, of which this work conſiſts, and which for the moſt part but two years; for in 1658 he was invited to Deventer to ſucceed his former maſter Gronovius, who had recommended him, when he left that City for Leyden; and he accepted that Profeſſorſhip, though leſs conſiderable than that of Duiſbourg, either out of affection to a free part were difficult to be procured. And tho' they are not all equally good, yet every one of them has its uſe. XXVI. Franciſci Junii de Pictura Veterum Libri III. Accedit Catalogus Artificum adhuc ineditus. Rotterdam 1694 fol. Grævius publiſhed this Edition, and added the Preface and Life of the Author. XXVII. Callimachi Hymni, Epigrammata, & Fragmenta, ex recenſione Theodori J. G. F. Grævii, cum ejuſdem & aliorum Animadverſionibus. Utrecht 1697 in 8vo two volumes. This Edition, which is a very beautiful one, had been undertaken by Theodore Grævius, the ſon of our Author; but he being prevented by death from finiſhing it, his father compleated it, and publiſhed it under his ſon's name. XXVIII. C. Julius Cæſar cum Notis Dionyſii Voſſii. Acceſſit Julius Celſus de Vitâ & Rebus geſtis C. Julii Cæſaris, ex Muſæo J. G. Grævii. Amſterdam 1697 in 8vo. XXIX. Gloſſarium Iſidori emendatum curâ J. G. Grævii. Publiſhed with Martinius's Lexicon at Utrecht 1698 in fol. XXX. M. T. Ciceronis Orationes, ex recenſione J. G. Grævii, cum ejuſdem Animadverſionibus, & Notis integris Variorum. Amſterdam 1699 in 8vo, three volumes. XXXI. Lectiones Heſiodeæ auctiores; publiſh'd in Monſr. le Clerc's Edition of that Author at Amſterdam 1701 in 8vo. They had been publiſh'd before in Mr. Grævius's Edition. XXXII. Danielis Eremitæ Aulicæ Vitæ & Civilis Libri IV. Ejuſdem Opuſcula varia. Utrecht 1701 in 8vo. This Work, which had been compoſed a century before, was entirely out of print; which induced Grævius to publiſh this Edition. XXXIII. Syntagma variarum Diſſertationum rariorum, quas Viri doctiſſimi ſuperiore ſæculo elucubrârunt. Ex Muſeo J. G. Grævii. Utrecht 1702 in 4to. This Collection contains, firſt, A Diſſertation of Thomas Reineſius on the Punic or Carthaginian Language, which was firſt printed in 1638 at Altemberg, where Reineſius was a Phyſician. The learned men in Germany at that time thought that language to be the Dialect of the Arabic. Joſeph Scaliger, Fullerus, Erpenius, and ſome others, were not of this opinion; but as they treated on this ſubject only by the bye, what they ſaid made no great impreſſion on the minds of others. Reineſius was the firſt, who undertook to treat thoroughly on this ſubject; and ſhews, that the Carthaginians were deſcended of the Tyrians and Sidonians and other people of Phœnicia; and conſequently that their language was the Hebrew and Phœnician; or that there was very little difference between them. The reaſons, which he alledged, ſeemed ſo plauſible to the learned, that they all agreed to them. Monſieur Bochart having ſince that time written his Treatiſe of the Colonies and Language of the Phœnicians, ſet this matter in ſo clear a light, that none can doubt of the Carthaginian or Punic Language's being the ſame with the Hebrew or Phœnician; or that if there be any difference between them, it is inconſiderable. Next follows Reineſius's Diſſertation on the God Endovellicus; in which he obſerves after ſome other Authors, that a certain man called Endovel brought a Colony from the Eaſt into Spain, and reigned there; and after his death was adored as a Deity. The Romans having conquered that Kingdom, offered vows to this Deity; and gave his name a Latin termination. Geographers tell us of a mountain near Portugal called Endovela or Endobela. The next piece is a Diſſertation by Herman Conringius, Profeſſor of Phyſic at Helmſtad. It contains hiſtorical and chronological Remarks on the antient Dynaſties of Egypt and Aſia. This Author is the firſt, who hath ſhewn, that what Cteſias hath ſaid of the Antiquity of the Aſſyrian and Median Monarchy, is fabulous and contrary to ſacred Hiſtory, and to what Herodotus, the moſt ancient Greek Hiſtorian, relates of it. This ſubject hath been ſince learnedly and ſolidly treated of by Archbiſhop Uſher in his Annals; and the ancient Dynaſties of Egypt, which Scaliger and Petavius have abandoned as fabulous or inexplicable, have been cleared with ſuch dexterity by the learned Sir John Marſham, that thoſe, who come after him, have either contented themſelves to copy them, or advanced nothing ſolid, when they offer to contradict him. The next piece is a Letter of Jonſius, who taught polite Learning at Francfort; in which he explains the original of the Spartæ, whom Ariſtotle mentions in his Politics to be born with the mark of a lance. St. Gregory Nazianzen, and ſome others after him, have unluckily taken the Spartæ for the Spartiates. Jonſius ſhews, that the Spartæ are the poſterity of Cadmus's companions, and that they have their name from the teeth of the ſerpents, which Cadmus had ſowed by order of Minerva. Plutarch ſays that in his time he ſaw men, who had the mark of a lance, who were thought to be deſcended from thoſe antient Spartæ. Next follows a Diſſertation of John Vandalin, a Dane, Profeſſor of Divinity and Hebrew in the Univerſity of Copenhagen, and afterwards Biſhop of Seeland in Denmark; which was written in anſwer to a Book of William Langins, who pretended, that our Saviour was crucified on a Thurſday; whereas our Author maintains, that he ſuffered on a Friday. The next piece is a Diſſertation of George Eryçius Phaletranus, or rather Guntherus Henricus Phlathnerus Getus; for the firſt name is ſuppoſititious. In this Diſſertation he treats of the Explication of the Prophecy of Jacob, who promiſed to his ſon Judah, that the Scepter ſhould not depart from him till Shilo came. Next follows a Tract by Chriſtian Daum, Rector of the College of Zwickaw in Miſnia, in which he ſhews, that we have loſt many Latin words both primitive and derivative; and produces examples out of Authors of all Ages. He gives us a large catalogue of words not found in Dictionaries. This Treatiſe might be of great uſe to thoſe, who would give new Editions of Latin Authors corrected by manuſcripts. They may here ſee, that the Copiers and Critics, who firſt printed ancient Authors, have often ſubſtituted words at pleaſure in the room of thoſe, which they did not underſtand; and that they have corrupted the originals inſtead of correcting them. After this Treatiſe follow three Diſſertations of Andrew Rivinus, who taught Philology at Leipſic about the middle of the laſt Century. In the firſt he examines what is meant by Majuma, Maicampus, and Roncalliæ. Having ſhewn, that thoſe Lawyers, who have derived the word Majuma from that of the month of May, are miſtaken; he proves, that theſe games or feaſts, which were celebrated by the people on the coaſt of Paleſtine, and afterwards received by the Greeks and Romans, take their name and original from a gate of the city of Gaza called Majuma, from the Phœnician word Maim, which ſignifies Waters. The feaſt was at firſt only a mere game repreſented on the water by Sailors and Fiſhermen, who ſhewed a thouſand tricks of activity in throwing one another into the water for the diverſion of the ſpectators. It became afterwards a regular ſpectacle, which the Magiſtrates exhibited to the people on certain days. Theſe ſpectacles having degenerated into debauchery, becauſe they brought naked women on the Stage, the Chriſtian Emperors enacted Laws to forbid them; yet they were not quite aboliſhed, for they were kept up by the Northern Nations; and the Maycamp of the French, which was celebrated in the preſence of Charlemagne and other Kings, and the Campus Roncalliæ near Placentia, where the Kings of Italy came with their veſſels, preſerved for many Ages a great part of thoſe ancient cuſtoms. The two other Diſſertations of Rivinus were written to explain what we are to underſtand by Venilia, Salacia, Malacia, Malina, and Lictuna. Rivinus examines what ancient and modern Authors have ſaid on the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; and relates their various ſentiments as to the cauſe of this motion of the waters, which appears ſo regular in its variation. There is likewiſe in this Collection a Treatiſe concerning the Roman public Treaſury, written by Chriſtian Frederic Franckenſtein, Profeſſor at Leipſic; in which he examines the origin and progreſs of the public treaſury; in what place it was kept; what Magiſtrates had the charge of it; and when they had the money depoſited in it. On this occaſion he treats of the Taxes and other Tributes, which the Romans levied in the Provinces of the Empire. He ſpeaks alſo of the Remiſſions, which they give from time to time to the people. He conſiders the Office of the Quæſtores Ærarii, (g) Burmannus, pag. 24, 23.

(d) Burmannus, ubi ſupra, pag. 16-20.

(e) Idem, ibid. pag. 21, 22.

(f) Idem, ibid. pag. 22, 23.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(i) Idem, pag. 30, 31.

a free Commonwealth (g), or inclination to a place, where he had lived before, or hopes to obtain afterwards ſome poſt of more importance. He was not diſappointed; for in 1661 he was appointed Profeſſor of Eloquence at Utrecht in the room of Paulus Æmilius (h). And twelve years after he had the Profeſſorſhip of Politics and Hiſtory conferred on him. He fixed his thoughts here; and though ſeveral advantageous offers were made him elſewhere, he refuſed to accept them. The Elector Palatine and the Republic of Venice endeavoured to draw him, the former to Heydelberg, and the latter to Padua; but he conſtantly preferred his ſettlement at Utrecht and in the Low-Countries, where he was in a manner naturalized (i). He had however the ſatisfaction to be ſought for by divers Princes, and to ſee ſeveral of them come from Germany to ſtudy under him (k). He was ſeized by an Apoplexy January the 11th 1703, and died the ſame day in the ſeventy firſt year of his age. He married in 1656, and had eighteen children, but left behind him but one ſon and four daughters. One of his ſons, Theodore Peter Grævius, a youth of prodigious hopes, died in 1692 in the 23d year of his age, and was then engaged in an edition of Callimachus. He deſigned to have written the Hiſtory of William III King of England (m).

(k) Ibid. pag. 29.

(m) Acta Erud. ubi ſupra.

rarii, with their origin and all that relates to that ſubject. XXXIV. Theſaurus Antiquitatum & Hiſtoriarum Italiæ, Mari Liguſtico & Alpibus vicinæ: quo continentur optimi quinque Scriptores, qui Ligurum & Inſubrum, ſeu Jenuenſium & Mediolanenſium confiniumque populorum ac civitatum res antiquas aliaſque vario tempore geſtas memoriæ prodiderunt collectus curâ J. G. Grævii. Leyden 1704 fol. three volumes. In the Preface written by James Perizonius, he informs us, that Grævius entered upon this taſk of collecting the Writers contained in this Work, upon conſideration, that having publiſhed his Theſaurus of the Roman Antiquities, that of the Antiquities of Italy would be an uſeful ſupplement to it for the explication of the origin, manners, laws and hiſtories of the ſeveral cities of it. In this deſign he imitated Sigonius, who after he had explained the Jus antiquum Civium Romanorum, in his very next Treatiſe adds the Jus Italiæ, as being of almoſt equal advantage for the due apprehending of whatever relates to the Roman State and Empire. It is true Andrew Schottus publiſhed ſome things of this nature formerly; but he had not room in one ſingle volume to crowd in all the Authors, who had written on this ſubject; whereas Grævius in this Collection has preſented us with fair and beautiful copies of every Author's Work. He has likewiſe together with them collected ſeveral very ſcarce and curious Commentaries, in which the origin and antiquities of each city are explained. It was his deſign once to have added the more modern Writers to this Collection; but perceiving it would have ſwelled this Work to too great a bulk, he reſerved them for a ſubſequent Theſaurus, which he intended to have publiſhed, if he had not been prevented by death. He dying before he had drawn up a general Preface, his ſon-in-law Matthias de Roy deſired Perizonius to perform that taſk, who complied with his friend's requeſt; and tells us, that in this collection he perceives there are joined together the Writers, not only of the Italian Antiquities, but alſo of the Italian Hiſtory of the middle and laſt Age. He obſerves, that Grævius's intention was, that the Reader in this Work might at one view ſee the fate of people and cities both ancient and modern, and apprehend the ſeries of the tranſactions of each city, and the chain of their Hiſtory. Add to this, that ſeveral Writers have brought their accounts of the cities and places, which they treat of, from their firſt riſe and beginning down to the times, wherein themſelves lived. Thus, for inſtance, Ubertus Folietta, Triſtanus Chalcus, John Baptiſta Villanova, &c. have traced the affairs of the Cities and Nations, which they write of, from the very ſource. After this we are informed of the Romantic Hiſtorians, whoſe accounts Grævius thought fit to leave out of his collection, as well as thoſe, who have only repeated what others had ſaid before them. XXXV. J. G. Grævii Præfationes & Epiſtolæ CXX in uſum Latinæ Eloquentiæ ſtudioſorum collectæ & editæ a Joanne Alberto Fabricio. Adjuncta eſt P. Burmanni Oratio dicta in Grævii funere. Hamburg 1707 in 8vo. XXXVI. Inſcriptiones antiquæ totius Orbis Romani in abſolutiſſimum corpus redacti, olim auſpiciis Joſephi Scaligeri, & M. Velſeri, induſtriâ autem J. Gruteri, nunc curis ſecundis ejuſdem Gruteri & Notis M. Gudii emendatæ, tabulis æneis Boiſſardi illuſtratæ curâ J. G. Grævii. Amſterdam 1707 fol. two volumes. XXXVII. Baſilii Fabri Theſaurus Eruditionis Scholaſticæ cum Notis Buchneri, & Cellarii, & Obſervationibus poſthumis J. G. Grævii. Leipſic 1710 in fol. XXXVIII. J. G. Grævii Orationes, quas Ultrajecti habuit. Leyden 1717 in 8vo. XXXIX. A great number of his Letters are publiſhed by P. Burman in his Sylloge Epiſtolarum, printed in five volumes in 4to. The learned Dr. Richard Mead has a Collection of his Letters never yet printed. T.

(a) See his Decade de Henry le Grand, liv. 1. pag. 80. edit. of Roan, 1633, in 4to.

GRAIN (BAPTIST LE) Maſter of the Requeſts in ordinary to Mary de Medicis Queen of France's Houſhold, wrote ſome Hiſtories, which are pretty good [A]. He was born about the year 1563 (a). He does not ſhew any hatred againſt the Reformed; on the contrary he is a vigorous aſſertor of the edict which had been granted to them [B].

GRAMMONT

[A] He wrote ſome Hiſtories, which are pretty good.] He publiſhed two Decades; the firſt is the Hiſtory of Henry the Great; the ſecond is the Hiſtory of Lewis XIII, from the beginning of this King's reign, to the death of the Marſhal d'Ancre in the year 1617. "He relates in ſome places ſuch particulars as are "not to be met with any where elſe, and the com-"mon opinion is, that this Hiſtory is written with "impartiality, and by a true patriot." This is what Sorel obſerves (1) with regard to the firſt Decade. He obſerves (2) with regard to the ſecond, that as it is an Hiſtory publiſhed in the time of thoſe that are mentioned (α) in it, and when they were in power, the foregoing adminiſtration is repreſented in an odious manner. The Marſhal d'Ancre and thoſe of his party are very much abuſed in this work, and even the Queen-mother's faithful ſervants are not ſpared; ſo that there was formerly a great demand for that book: ſome perſons would keep it as a curioſity; others would ſuppreſs and deſtroy it. It is obſerved particularly with regard to the Biſhop of Luſſon *, who has been ſince famous under the name of Cardinal de Richelieu, that the Author tranſcribes a letter of his to the Marſhal d'Ancre, which ſome pretend to be written in a very humble ſtyle. They are in the right to pretend it (3).

(1) Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. m. 352.

(2) Ibid. pag. 353, 354.

* Luçone.

(3) See Le Grain, liv. 10. pag. 411, under the year 1617.

(α) I ſuppoſe Sorel means in the time of them that ſucceeded thoſe who are mentioned in it. For ſince this Hiſtory extends only to the death of the Marſhal d'Ancre, how can it mention the Miniſters who ſucceeded him in the adminiſtration? Or how can the Hiſtorian give an account of their conduct, ſince his Hiſtory does not reach to their time?

[B] He is a vigorous aſſertor of the edict that had been granted to the Reformed.] See the 7th book (4) of his Hiſtory of Henry the Great; you will find there a beautiful apology of that Prince with regard to the edict of Nantz; an apology, I ſay, ſupported with arguments and examples. D'Aubigné has given the

(4) Pag. m. 704.

GRAMMONT (GABRIEL DE) a French Cardinal in the ſixteenth Century. I mention him only with a deſign to correct ſome blunders in Moreri's Dictionary [A].

the ſubſtance of it in his Hiſtory (5). Le Grain followed the ſame principles in his Hiſtory of Lewis XIII; for he vindicates (6) the letters patents (7), by which his Majeſty declared, that he did not deſign to include his ſubjects of the pretended reformed Religion, in the oath he took, and in the ſolemn declaration he made at his coronation TO EMPLOY HIS SWORD AND ALL THE NECESSARY MEANS FOR THE EXTIRPATION OF HERESY. Theſe two beautiful paſſages in favour of a toleration of Religion are inſerted in a work of Monſieur Colomiés (8).

(5) Tom. 3. liv. 5. chap. 2. pag. m. 631.
(6) In book the 8th, pag. 299.
(7) They were regiſtred in the Parliament Auguſt the 4th 1616.
(8) Intitled, Rome Proteſtante, pag. 65, &c.

[A] I mention him only with a deſign to correct ſome blunders in Moreri's Dictionary.] I. The interview between Pope Clement VII and Francis I at Marſeilles did not happen in the year 1552, but in the year 1532. II. Cardinal de Grammont was not promoted to the Biſhopric of Poitiers, as a reward for his pains, becauſe he had perſuaded the Pope to conſent to this interview; for he was already poſſeſſed of that Biſhopric when he ſet out from France to go and negotiate with Clement VII. III. Theſe words, the King gave him the Archbiſhopric of Bourdeaux and of Toulouſe: and he went to take poſſeſſion of them, deſerve to be criticiſed upon; for in their moſt natural ſenſe they ſignify, that this Cardinal was preferred to thoſe two Archbiſhoprics at one and at the ſame time, which is falſe. And beſides, one does not know whether he went to take poſſeſſion of the Archbiſhopric of Bourdeaux, or of that of Toulouſe; Moreri's expreſſion does not determine it. IV. It is not true that this Cardinal died before he took poſſeſſion of the Archbiſhopric of Toulouſe. He took poſſeſſion of it by proxy October the 27th 1533, and in perſon the 15th of March following. V. The caſtle of Balura is a chimera; he ſhould have ſaid the caſtle of Balma. The Cardinal died there March the 26th (1) 1534. This caſtle belongs to the Archbiſhops of Toulouſe, and is but at a ſmall half league's diſtance from the City. VI. If the Cardinal laboured under an hectic fever, it did not come upon him when he went to take poſſeſſion of his Archbiſhopric. Moreri ought to have ſaid, that this Prelate's journey to Rome threw him into a long fit of ſickneſs, of which he died eleven days after he had taken poſſeſſion of his Archbiſhopric. Does a man die in ſo little time of an hectic fever? But the wonder is, that Catel (2), one of the Authors quoted by Moreri, is the very Writer who furniſhes me with theſe corrections. What does that man mean to quote Authors he never read? Catel corrects a blunder of John du Bouchet, concerning the name of the caſtle (3); ſo that Moreri might have known the true name of that building.

(1) Moreri ſays March the 24th.
(2) Memoires de l'Hiſtoire du Languedoc, liv. 5. pag. 945.
(3) Du Bouchet ſays that the Cardinal died at the place called Abalme, belonging to the Archbiſhopric, at two leagues diſtance, near Toulouſe.

GRAMOND (GABRIEL BARTHOLOMEW DE) in Latin Gramondus, Preſident in the Parliament of Toulouſe, and ſon of the ſenior Counſellor in the ſame Parliament [A], wrote an Hiſtory which is eſteemed [B]. I have read in a German Author a remarkable particular, the truth of which I queſtion very much [C], and which if it were true would be very glorious to the Preſident de Gramond. Patin's letters

[A] He was the ſon of the ſenior Counſellor in the Parliament of Toulouſe.] This ſenior Counſellor's name was Bartholomew de Gramond. He was a man eminent for his great virtue, and accompliſhed honeſty. His ſon paſſes this encomium upon him, at the ſame time that he relates an action of him becoming a Courtier rather than a Senator who is zealous for the preſervation of order and decency. He obſerves (1) that Monſieur de Mommorenci, Governor of Languedoc, required that his wife ſhould be received in all the Cities of his Government with ſuch marks of diſtinction as were never uſed before in ſuch a caſe. He deſired more particularly that the Magiſtrates of Toulouſe would ſend armed men to meet her. His requeſt was ſeveral times rejected, and they repreſented to him, that plays, dances, and muſick were the proper pomp of a Lady's reception; but that military honours were only deſigned for thoſe who have an authority in the armies. Bartholomew de Gramond was of another opinion; for he voted that the Ducheſs of Mommorenci be received as her huſband deſired; he was deputed by the Parliament to the Capitouls (2), and perſuaded them to comply with the Governor's deſire. This happened in the year 1619. We do not find in this the leaſt footſtep of the ancient Roman gravity. Our Hiſtorian would have ſaid ſomething much more to his father's glory, could he have obſerved, that the Parliament's Deputy confirmed the Capitouls in their reſolution to reject the innovation which Monſieur de Mommorency required of them for his wife. Such a conduct would have been a proof that they knew how to make uſe of Tiberius's wife counſel, moderandos fœminarum honores (3), i. e. "the honours paid to women ought to "be reſtrained," and the Orarion of Severus Cæcina a Senator of Rome under that Emperor. His Oration proved indeed ineffectual; but ought we to wonder at it? Rome had forgot all her great and noble maxims. Obſerve that this Senator propoſed that the Governors of Provinces ſhould not be permitted to take their wives with them into their governments (4). He urged very ſtrong arguments to ſupport his opinion.

(1) Gramond, Hiſt. Galliæ, lib. 3. pag. m. 213, ad ann. 1619.
(2) Thus they who preſide in the Town-houſe of Toulouſe are called.
(3) Tacit. Ann. lib. 1. cap. 14.
(4) Idem, ibid. lib. 4. cap. 33.

[B] He wrote an hiſtory, which is eſteemed.] It is divided into eighteen books and contains an account of the tranſactions in France, from the death of Henry IV to the year 1629 (5). It was printed at Toulouſe in the year 1643. Foreigners judged it worthy to be reprinted by them, both in Holland and in Germany (6). I make uſe of the edition of Mentz, 1673, in 8vo. This Author's ſtyle is a little too conciſe, and not natural enough; but it ſhews that the Preſident de Gramond underſtood the Latin tongue very well. He had publiſhed at Toulouſe in the year 1623 a particular Hiſtory of the War which Lewis the Juſt * carried on againſt his Proteſtant ſubjects.

(5) And not to the year 1639, as Moreri aſſerts.
(6) Obſerve that the German Authors quote him very often. See amongſt others Pellerus in his Politicus ſceleratus impugnatus.
* Or Lewis XIII.

[C] I have read in a German Author a remarkable particular, the truth of which I queſtion very much.] Chriſtian Funccius aſſerts, that the Preſident de Gramond following Thuanus's example in his boldneſs of writing the truth, and diſcovering the errors of the adminiſtration, and the faults of the perſons of the higheſt rank, exaſperated a great many perſons againſt him, ſo that he was not ſafe even in his own native place. In eo Thuano par quod intrepide dicat, quid ſentiat, non diſſimulans graviſſima aulæ & magnatum peccata, indeque idem quod Thuanus, fatum expertus. Simul enim ac prima pars hiſtoriæ prodiit, multorum incurrit odia, ita ut vix Tholoſæ tuto vivere potuerit. Quare non prodiit tenus hac, niſi pars prima; ſi altera ſuccederet, opus eſſet incomparabile, vel non niſi cum ipſa antiquitate comparandum. Arcaniſſima enim Reip. Gallicæ author penetraverat (7). i. e. "Being equal to Thua- "nus in this, that he freely ſpeaks what he thinks, and "does not conceal the greateſt errors of the Court, nor "of the Nobility; for which reaſon he met with the "ſame fate as Thuanus. For no ſooner was the firſt "part of his Hiſtory publiſhed, but it raiſed the "hatred of a great many perſons againſt him, ſo that "he could hardly be ſafe at Toulouſe. This is the "reaſon why nothing but the firſt part of his Work "has been publiſhed yet. If the reſt were added to it, "it would be indeed an incomparable Work, or at "leaſt not to be compared but with the writings of "the Ancients. For the Author had dived into the "Myſteries of State." Monſieur Graverol an Advocate of Nimes, who had a great correſpondence at Toulouſe, and of whom I have aſked ſome account of this, acquainted me with ſeveral particulars in his Anſwer, but there was nothing by which I could know that he ever heard of any ſuch thing.

(7) Chr. Funccius, tom. 1. Orbis Impor. pag. 443. apud Konig, Biblioth. pag. 358.

ters are not very proper to support the German Author's assertion [D].

[D] Patin's Letters are not very proper to support the German Author's assertion.] Guy Patin is so far from representing Gramond as a man who suffered for his sincerity, that on the contrary he stiles him a base flatterer. I am apt to think that he exaggerates, and that after all the extreme to which the German Author runs would be less to blame than Patin's exaggeration. However it be, here follow the words of the latter. "I "have by me the President de Gramont's History. "He was a good old man, but of a weak and bigotted mind. He endeavoured to get Memoirs, that "he might continue his History to the death of the "late King: but Cardinal Mazarin would not give "him that employment. He died lately at Toulouse "(8). His History is but indifferent, and infinitely "inferior to that of the President Thuanus. It abounds "with falsities, and with flatteries unworthy a man of "honour. When it was printed off and ready to be "exposed to sale, Monsieur de Gramont caused fifteen "half sheets to be reprinted, that he might more effectually flatter Cardinal de Richelieu, who was then "in the highest degree of the King's favour. This "good man imagined that no expressions were strong "enough to commend him: but he got nothing by it; "for the Cardinal came to die (9)."

(8) We may infer from thence that Konig is mistaken, who places his death under the year 1672; for this Letter of Patin is dated Sept. 13, 1654.

(9) Patin, Lettre 90. tom. 1. pag. 365.

GRAMONT (SCIPIO DE) Sieur de St. Germain and Secretary of the King's Closet, was a native of Provence. I have observed in another place (a), that he saw at Rome the funeral solemnities of Monsieur Peirescius, and that he died some time after at Venice. He wrote some books [A], and amongst others one intitled, Le Denier Royal: Traité curieux de l'Or & l'Argent. i. e. "The Royal Penny: A curious Treatise con-"cerning Gold and Silver." Naudé commends this Work [B]. It is in Octavo printed at Paris in the year 1620.

(a) In the Remark [C] of the article PEIRESCIUS.

[A] He wrote some Books.] He publish'd at Paris in the year 1614, L'Art des Consequences, 8vo. i. e. "The "Art of drawing consequences." De la nature, qualité & prerogatives admirables du Poinct. i. e. "Of the "nature, propriety, and admirable prerogatives of "the Point;" in the year 1619, 8vo. Abregé des Artifices, traitant de plusieurs inventions nouvelles, & surtout d'un secret & moyen exquis pour entendre & comprendre quelle langue que ce soit dans un an, même la Latine & la Greque. i. e. "A Compendium of the "Arts, treating of several new inventions, and espe-"cially of a secret, and an exquisite method to learn "and understand in one year only any language what-"soever, even the Greek, and Latin Tongues." This Book was printed at Aix in Provence in the year 1640, in 8vo.

[B] Naudé commends his Royal Penny.] His words are as follow. Quoniam res ipsa (vectigalium impositiones) plerumque à necessitate dependet, aut Principum voluntate, quæ leges non admittunt, inde est, quod pauci admodum reperti sunt, qui de illis Politicum quicquam monere voluerint. Quare unicum tantummodo proferam Scipionem Gramontium; ex cujus Nummo Regio, Gallicè quidem edito, plurima depromi possunt, quæ rem ipsam præclarè illustrent, simulque legentium animos reficiant dulci pabulo variæ lectionis, & gravissima diversarum observationum varietate (1). i. e. "The laying of "duties being generally owing to a necessity, or de-"pending on the will of Princes, neither of which ad-"mit of any law, hence it is, that there are very few "Authors, who ventured to give a man, who studies "Politicks, any directions upon this subject. I shall "therefore mention but one, namely Scipio de Gra-"mont, whose Royal Penny, written indeed in French, "contains a great many things, which serve to clear "up this subject, at the same time as they will delight "the Reader with an agreeable variety of curious ob-"servations."

(1) Naud. Bibliogr. Politic. cap. 13. pag. 543. edit. Crenianæ.

GRANDIER (URBAN), Curate and Canon of Loudun, burnt alive for a Magician, was the son of a Notary-Royal of Sablé, and was born at Bovére near Sablé. He was a good preacher, for which reason the Monks of Loudun soon entertained a great envy against him, and at last a great hatred, after he had strongly urged in a Sermon the necessity of confessing one's sin to the Curate at Easter. He was a handsom man, of an agreeable conversation, neat in his dress, and cleanly in his person, which made him be suspected of loving the fair-sex and being beloved by them [A]. In the year 1629 he was accused of having had a criminal conversation with some women in the very Church of which he was a Curate. The Official condemned him to resign all his Benefices, and to live in penance. He brought an appeal, this sentence being an incroachment upon the Civil Power, and by a decree of the Parliament of Paris he was referred to the Presidial of Poitiers, in which he was cleared. Three years after some Ursuline Nuns of Loudun were thought by the vulgar to be possessed with the Devil [B]. Grandier's enemies soon spread

[A] He was suspected of loving the sex and being beloved by them.] It is observed in the Mercure François (1), that Urban Grandier was a majestic but proud man, who had some reading, and a pretty good judgment; who was also endowed with some perfections natural and acquired; but who by a complication of extraordinary vices, and particularly of fornication and lasciviousness had . . . prostituted the dignity of his character; and that when he made interest for the place of Director of the Ursulines, his intention was to turn their Convent into a dishonest Seraglio, and to make of all the beautiful Virgins there, as many concubines. In the Letter of the Sieur Seguin a Physician of Tours it is asserted (2), that "the very friends of Grandier acknowledged, that "he led such a debauched life, that it could not be "called by any other name but that of impiety; that "he profaned the most sacred things, and openly dis-"graced that very Religion, which he preached with "some reputation." You may have observed in the Text of this Article, that he was charged with lying with women in the very Church of which he was Curate. Monsieur Menage who relates this, observes only in the notes, that he was accused of adultery, but he does not say that it was with the wife of a Magistrate of Loudun. Monsieur de Monconis asserts it (3) upon the credit of the Superior of the Ursulines. The account published in Holland in the year 1693 leaves us no room to doubt, but this Priest was a lascivious and proud man.

(1) Tom. 20. pag. 748.

(2) Ibid. pag. 777.

(3) Voyages, Part 1. pag. 9.

[B] Some Nuns of Loudun were thought by the vulgar to be possessed with the Devil.] Monsieur Menage (4) is not content with this clause (the vulgar) but he adds immediately; "For with regard to the learned, most "of them asserted that these Nuns were not out "of order; since notwithstanding all that was said to "the contrary, none of the three marks of a true pos-"session according to the Roman Ritual, could be ob-"served in them; these marks are Divination, "the understanding of languages, which one never "learnt, and a supernatural strength of the body." He ſpread the report that he was the Author of that poſſeſſion, and accuſed him of witchcraft, which ſeems very odd; for if they imagined it was in his power to ſend the Devil into people's bodies, they ought to have dreaded to exaſperate him [C], they ought to have had ſome regard for him, leſt he ſhould give them up to a legion of Devils. However it be; they charged him with witchcraft. The Capuchins of Loudun, his moſt bitter enemies, thought that in order to make the charge ſucceed according to their wiſhes, it was very proper to ſtrengthen themſelves with Cardinal de Richelieu's powerful authority. For which purpoſe they wrote to Father Joſeph their fellow-Capuchin, who had great credit with the Cardinal, that Grandier was the Author of a Libel intitled, La Cordonniére

(4) Remarques sur la Vie de Guillaume Ménage, pag. 340.

He quotes two Books which were written againſt this pretended poſſeſſion: the one written by Duncan, a famous Scotſman, and a Phyſician of Saumur; the other James Boutreux Sieur d'Etiau, a learned man of Angers; and he tranſcribes what Claudius Menard, Lieutenant of the Provoſtſhip of Angers obſerves, in his Catalogue of the Writers of the Province of Anjou, concerning this Book of James Boutreux. Laudunenſis Theatri ſcenam aggreſſus, Parochi Granderii tepidatas ſilentio longo favillas memoriamque ſcripto vindicare auſus, dubiæ quæſtionis thema renovavit, ut triſtes virginum male tractarum pœnas, vel exercitæ potius trophæa virtutis ad ſcurrilia planorum ludibria, vindicandique & ſuppoſiti in Granderium, ut credi vult, maleficii miniſteria perſonata traduceret, grandi certe mentis fiducia, calami ſcriptique libertate, neſcio an ceſſura feliciter. i. e. "Coming to ſpeak of the great event that happened at Loudun, he ventured to vindicate the memory of the Prieſt Grandier, and his aſhes which had been a long while cold and forgotten; and treated this dubious queſtion again, in order to expoſe the ſufferings of the unhappy virgins, or rather the trophies of a virtue that has been tried, to the ſcandalous railleries of wicked perſons, and to clear Grandier of the ſuppoſed witchcraft (as he would make us believe it was) by traducing thoſe who feigned to be poſſeſſed. This ſhewed indeed a great courage in him, and a great freedom in writing; but I do not know whether he ſucceeded according to his expectation." See below the Remark [I]. Now as to what Monſieur Menage obſerves, namely that the underſtanding of languages, which is one of the three marks of a true poſſeſſion, was wanting in theſe Nuns, it is proper to obſerve, that the Sieur Seguin, a Phyſician of Tours, relates, that "Monſieur de Launai Razilli ſpoke to them in the language of the Taupinanboux, and that they anſwered him in the ſame language. Now, adds he, I believe this Gentleman more than I do my ſelf; and I quote his authority, becauſe you know him to be a man worthy to be credited (5)." But ſince Monſieur Menage, who knew what this Letter contains, and all the ſtories that had been ſpread abroad concerning the knowledge of languages aſcribed to theſe Nuns, does yet aſſert, that they did not ſhew by this ſign, that they were really poſſeſſed, it appears by this, that we ought not to depend much on ſuch kinds of accounts. What Monſieur de Balzac obſerves in his Converſations deſerves to be tranſcribed here. If he were to be charged with witchcraft, ſays he (16), becauſe he happened to gueſs right . . . the Devils, with whom he correſponded, muſt be only the black-guards of Lucifer's Troops. They muſt be leſs learned than the Devils of Loudun, who yet did not go beyond the third form in their ſtudy of the Latin Tongue, as one of the Cardinal de Richelieu's Courtiers obſerved. Laſtly they muſt be of that order of Devils, who are ſtill but ſchool-boys, and who in Theodorus's Orations commit blunders in the numbers, and language, and tranſgreſs in their verſes the rules of Quantity and Grammar (7). We ſhall now give ſome proofs of the ignorance of the Devils of Loudun. The Maſs being finiſhed Barré came to the Superior to give her the Sacrament, and to exorciſe her: and holding the Hoſt in his hand, he ſpoke to her in theſe words, Adora Deum, Creatorem tuum; Worſhip God, thy Creator. Being preſſed to anſwer, ſhe ſaid, Adoro te, I worſhip thee. Quem adoras? Whom doeſt thou worſhip? asked the the Exorciſt ſeveral times; upon which ſhe replied, Jeſus Chriſtus, with ſuch motions, as though ſhe had ſuffered a very great violence. Daniel Drouin, Aſſeſſor of the Provoſtſhip, could not forbear ſaying pretty loud, Here is a Devil, who is not congruous in his ſpeech. Barré changing his phraſe, aſked the poſſeſſed Lady, Quis eſt quem adoras? Who is he, whom thou worſhippeſt? He hoped ſhe would ſay again, Jeſus Chriſtus; but ſhe anſwered, Jeſu Chriſte. Upon which ſeveral perſons were heard crying aloud, This is falſe Latin. Barré boldly maintained, that ſhe had ſaid, Adoro te, Jeſu Chriſte; I worſhip thee, O Jeſus Chriſt (8).

(8) Hiſtoire des Diables de Loudun, printed at Amſterdam in 1693, pag. 57.

Here follows a very ſmart raillery againſt the Capuchin, who directed Martha, who pretended to be poſſeſſed. It was aſſerted, that ſhe had two Devils in her body, the one called Beelzebub, and he other Aſtaroth. The Judges of Angers examined them both in Greek and Latin; Beelzebub anſwered in a paſſion, "that if "he had a mind to it, he would anſwer as well in "Greek as in Latin. The Capuchin, to afford him "an excuſe, ſaid, friend Beelzebub, there are ſome hereticks here, and that is the reaſon why you will "not ſpeak. He began to ſpeak Latin with Aſtaroth, "who deſired to be excuſed, becauſe he was too young "ſtill (α). Beelzebub's excuſe was, that he was a poor "Devil. Upon which there aroſe great diſpute amongſt the Judges, to know whether or not the Devils were obliged to go to School. The Civilians "maintained that the underſtanding of all languages "was the proprium quarto modo † of all Demoniacks; "like that of Cartigni in Savoye, who was examined in ſixteen languages with this token, that the "Miniſters of Geneva durſt not venture to exorciſe "him. Thoſe of Angers were more bold, for they "began the exorciſm after this manner: Commando "tibi ut exeas Beelzebub & Aſtarot, aut ego augmentabo "veſtras pœnas, & vobis dabo acriores. i. e. "I "command you, Beelzebub and Aſtaroht, to go out of "that body, otherwiſe I ſhall increaſe your ſufferings, "and make you undergo a ſeverer puniſhment. The "ſecond time he ſpoke more ſtoutly; Jubeo exeatis "ſuper pœnam excommunicationis majoris & minoris. i. e. "I order you to go out, upon pain of the greater "and the leſſer excommunication. Laſtly, he added in a paſſion, Niſi vos exeatis, vos relego & confino "in infernum centum annos magis quam Deus ordinavit "(9). i. e. "If you will not go out, I baniſh and "confine you to hell for an hundred years longer than "God has ordered." I do not doubt but this is a mere invention of the Author.

† What is proper to all of them, to them alone, and always.

(9) Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, liv. 1. chap. 6.

* (α) This is an alluſion to theſe words of Lucifer to Aſtaroth, in the Conception à Perſonnages, i. e. "The "Conception repreſented by Actors," folio 45 verſo.

Aſtaroth, ne parle jamais:
Tu es encore trop novice.
That is,
"Aſtaroth, you ſhould never ſpeak:
"For you are yet a young beginner." CRIT. REM.

[C] If they imagined it was in his power to ſend the Devil into people's bodies, they ought to have dreaded to exaſperate him.] Monſieur Menage was ſo delighted with this obſervation, that after he had inſerted it in William Menage's Life (10), he again adorned his Notes upon that Life with it. It will be proper to ſee how he ſpeaks in French, the Latin words are in the margin. "They charged Grandier with Magick, "the uſual crime of thoſe, who are guilty of none; "and which, according to the excellent thought of "Apuleius, who was formerly accuſed of the ſame "crime, is not believed by the very perſons who charge "others with it: for if a man was fully perſuaded "that another can put him to death by the magical "art, he would be afraid to exaſperate him, if he "were to charge him with this abominable crime." How reaſonable ſoever this argument may appear, I cannot but think that there have been perſons, who imagined, that thoſe they accuſed of magick, were really

(10) De Maleficio fingit ſe oſſentiri (Armandus Richelius) nam ut verè Apuleius & ipſe maleficii reus poſtulatus, id genus crimen non eſt ejus accuſare qui credit; accuſare enim eo crimine is eum timeret, quem vi tantaminum poſſe tantum fateretur. Menag. in Vita Guillelmi Menagii, pag. 83.

(5) Mercure François, tom. 20. pag. 777.

(6) Entretien 17.

(7) See the Nouvelles de la Republiques des Lettres, March 1684, pag. 10. of the ſecond edition.

OBSERVATIONS upon the perſons poſſeſſed with the Devil underſtanding languages unknown to them before.

nière ae Loudun [D] ; i. e. " The Woman-ſhoemaker of Loudun ;" which was very injurious to the Cardinal's perſon and to his family. This great Miniſter, amongſt a number of noble perfections, laboured under this defect, that he would perſecute to the higheſt degree the Authors of the Libels that were publiſhed againſt him ; ſo that Father Joſeph having perſuaded him [E] that Grandier was the Author of the Cordonniére de Loudun, he wrote immediately to Monſieur de Laubardemont, Counſellor of State, who was his creature, and who by the King's order took care to ſee the fortification of the Caſtle of Loudun demoliſhed, to make a diligent enquiry into the affair of the Nuns, and he gave him ſufficiently to underſtand, that he deſired to deſtroy Grandier. Monſieur de Laubardemont had him arreſted in December 1633, and after he had thoroughly examined this affair, he went to meet the Cardinal, and take proper meaſures with him. July the 8th 1634 Letters Patent were drawn up and ſealed to try Grandier. Theſe Letters were directed to Monſieur Laubardemont, and to twelve Judges choſen out of the Courts in the neighbourhood of Loudun ; all men of honour, indeed, but very credulous, and for their great credulity they were choſen by Grandier's enemies [F]. Auguſt the 18th (a) 1634, upon the evidence of Aſtaroth [G], a Devil of the Order of the Seraphims, and the Chief of the poſſeſſing Devils, of Eaſas, of Celſus, of Acaos, of Eudon, really guilty : for in the firſt place we ought not much to expect, that a man will act coherently. Secondly, it is generally imagined that a Sorcerer has no longer any power as ſoon as his cauſe is come before a Court of Judicature. Laſtly, men think that a Magician will not exert his power againſt his accuſers ; ſince this would be furniſhing proofs againſt himſelf.

(a) Mr. Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Guil. Menage, p. 342, ſays the 8th; but he is miſtaken.

[D] They wrote to Father Joſeph . . . that Grandier was the Author of a Libel intitled, La Cordonniére de Loudun.] The reaſon of this title was, that a ſhoemaker's wife was ſuppoſed to ſpeak in that libel. Monſieur Menage imagined that the ſilly ſtuff with which this ſatyr abounds, is a ſtrong proof that Grandier did not write it (11), and he heard Monſieur Bouillaud aſſert, it was certain Grandier was not the Author of that Libel (12). Monſieur Bouillaud, who was a native of Loudun, had been particularly acquainted with that man (13). See in the account printed at Amſterdam (14) with how much artifice they made uſe of this ſatyr to deſtroy Grandier.

(11) Granderii non eſſe tot ineptiæ quibus ſcatent arguunt. Idem, ibid.

(12) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Guillaume Ménage, pag. 343.

(13) Ibid. pag. 341.

(14) Pag. 99.

[E] Father Joſeph having perſuaded Cardinal de Richelieu.] I have read ſomewhere that he encouraged this farce, with a deſign to frighten Lewis XIII, and to keep him under, by ſtories of witchcraft, which were continually buzzed into his ear. This is not at all probable ; though it muſt be confeſſed, that the greateſt genius's are, generally ſpeaking, perſons who are the leaſt diſpoſed to neglect thoſe occurrences which ſeem to be the moſt ridiculous, and the moſt abſurd. I ſpeak of thoſe elevated minds, that govern a State. Their extenſive penetration makes them diſcover ſprings where there ſeem to be none : it is becauſe they know better than other men, of what uſe a mere trifle may be ; it is becauſe they are better acquainted with the weakneſs of mankind : they know better what the ignorance and weakneſs of ſome, and the wickedneſs of others can produce. We ought not therefore always to argue thus. Such a thing is ſo abſurd, ſo mean, ſo ridiculous, that a man of wit and judgment would never mind it ; it is therefore falſe that ſuch a Miniſter of State made uſe of it ; invented it : that he invented it ; that he encouraged it. The Author of the Hiſtory of Nantz obſerves (15), that ſeveral perſons imagined the farce that was acted during ſeveral years in the Nunnery of the Urſelines at Loudun, was a buſineſs at the bottom of which Religion was. He means, I believe, that thoſe perſons thought this ſpring was ſet a going, with a deſign to undermine the edict of Nantz. He relates in a very agreeable manner, how ridiculous the anſwers were, which theſe poſſeſſed Ladies made. Obſerve that he aſſerts, that Grandier governed the Convent of the Urſulines ; but he gives us notice in the Errata, that he ſhould have ſaid Grandier viſited thoſe Nuns ſometimes. This laſt circumſtance does not agree better than the former with the account publiſhed in the year 1693. See page 25. where you will meet with theſe words. It is at leaſt certain that theſe maidens had lived ſeven or eight years at Loudun before Grandier made them one ſingle viſit ; and when they were confronted with him in the year 1634, it appeared that they had never ſeen him. Father Tranquille has alſo aſſerted this in one of his books, adding, that the Curate never meddled with their affairs.

(15) Tom. 2. liv. 10. pag. 538. under the year 1634.

This very moment I remember that it is in the Sorberiana, I read what I have obſerved in the beginning of this remark. The paſſage is very curious. We find there that Monſieur Quillet challenged the Devil that poſſeſſed the Nuns, and made him quite aſhamed, ſo that all the Devils were put to a nonplus : that Monſieur de Lobardemont (16) was very much ſcandalized at it, and gave a warrant againſt Quillet, who finding that the whole mummery was nothing but an artifice of Cardinal de Richelieu to frighten the late King (17), who was naturally very much afraid of the Devil, judged that it was not ſafe for him, to continue at Loudun, nor even in France, ſo that he retired into Italy (18).

(16) He ſhould have ſaid Laubardemont.

(17) This expreſſion is not right, it ſignifies Henry IV, and the Author intends to ſpeak of Lewis XIII.

Naudé confirms what relates to the challenger's diſgrace. Let us tranſcribe his words. " Duncam " and Quillet having excepted againſt the impoſture " of the Nuns of Loudun, the former was repri- " manded and ſeverely threatened for it by Car- " dinal de Richelieu, and the latter was obliged to " go and wait upon the Marquiſs de Cœuvre at " Rome (19).'

(18) Soberiana, voce Quillet. pag. m. 172.

(19) Naudé, Dialogo de Maſcurat, pag. 310.

[F] The Judges . . . were all choſen by Grandier's enemies.] I think that Monſieur Menage's obſervation upon this deſerves to be tranſcribed. It is to be obſerved, ſays he (20), that the greateſt innocence cannot be proof againſt packt Judges. Let an accuſer chooſe Judges, and he will find means to have all the Janſeniſt Biſhops condemned to be burnt by Moliniſt Judges ; and the Moliniſt Biſhops by Janſeniſt Judges. This affords matter of reflection (21). One Denian, Counſellor in the Preſidial of La Fléche, who was the Sollicitor in Grandier's trial, wrote a treatiſe concerning the poſſeſſion of the Nuns of Loudun (22), to vindicate the ſentence of the Commiſſaries.

(20) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Guillaume Menage, pag. 342.

(21) See ſomething like this in the remark [B] of the article MONTAIGU (John).

(22) Menage, Remarques, &c. pag. 342.

[G] Upon the evidence of Aſtaroth.] This is what we infer from the ſecond Verbal Proceſs of the Exorciſts (23). There were three poſſeſſions. During the firſt all the Devils except one refuſed to tell their names ; they only anſwered that they were God's enemies. During the ſecond and third they made themſelves known by their names and dignities, and poſitively charged Grandier. It muſt be obſerved that they anſwered in French, though the Exorciſts ſpoke Latin to them. But what is infinitely more remarkable is, that their teſtimony was admitted by the Judges, as an evidence in a trial, in which the perſon accuſed was condemned to be burnt alive. Were theſe Judges ignorant of the character the Eternal Truth gives the Devil (24) ? The Sieur Seguin's reflections ſeem to me very ſurpriſing. One would think, ſays he (25), that this was not ſo much a judgment of men, as of God, who forced the Devils from hell, for this wicked man's ſhame : for it is an admirable thing, how the Devils roſe up againſt him, and obliged him to acknowledge, that they were his accuſers. I leave the Sorbonne to judge whether the exception againſt them ought to have been admitted, when they ſpoke in God's name, and gave evident proofs of the truth they were forced to declare. One is ſtruck with horror, when one conſiders that Chriſtian Judges thought

(23) In the Mercure François, tom. 20. pag. 760, 762.

(24) In St. John's Goſpel, chap. viii. ver. 44.

(25) Mercure François, tom. 22. pag. 777, 778.

Eudon; of Aſmodeus, of the Order of the Thrones; of Alex, of Zabulon, of Nephthalim, of Cham, of Uriel, and of Achas, of the Order of the Principalities, that is to ſay upon the evidence of the Nuns, who aſſerted that they were poſſeſſed with thoſe Devils, the Commiſſaries paſſed judgment, by which Maſter Urban Grandier, Curate of St. Peter's Church in the market-place of Loudun, and Canon of the Church of the Holy Croſs, was declared well and duly attainted and convicted of the crime of Magic, Witchcraft, and Poſſeſſion, which by his means happened on the bodies of ſome Urſuline Nuns of Loudun, and of ſome other Lay-perſons mentioned in his trial; for which crimes he was ſentenced to make honourable amends, and to be burnt alive, with the magical covenants and characters which are in the Regiſter-Office, as alſo with the manuſcript wrote by him againſt the celibacy of the Prieſts [H], and his aſhes to be thrown up into the air (b). Grandier heard this dreadful ſentence without any perturbation, and deſired that they would give him for his Confeſſor the Guardian of the Convent of the Cordeliers at Loudun, a Doctor of Divinity of the Faculty of Paris. But they refuſed it, and gave him a Recollect, to whom he would not confeſs, ſaying he was his enemy, who contributed more than any other perſon to his ruin. They continued to refuſe him any other Confeſſor but this Recollect, and on his part he would abſolutely not accept of him; ſo that he only made his confeſſion in his heart to God; after which he went to the place of execution, and ſuffered his puniſhment with great courage and like a Chriſtian. It happened as he was on the wood-pile that a large fly, of that kind which are called drones, flew buzzing about his head. A Monk who was preſent at the execution, and who had read in the Council of Querzi (c) that the Devils always aſſiſt at peoples death in order to tempt them (d), and who had heard ſome perſons ſay that Beelzebub ſignifies in Hebrew the Lord or God of Flies, cried out immediately, that the Devil Belzebub was flying about Grandier to carry his ſoul to hell; upon which a very comical ſong was made. The poſſeſſion at Loudun continued a year longer after Grandier's death. Theophraſtus Renaudot, a famous Phyſician, and the firſt Author of the French Gazette, wrote Grandier's Elogium, which was publiſhed at Paris in looſe ſheets. All this is extracted from Monſieur Menage (e), who openly takes the Curate of Loudun's part, and calls the poſſeſſion of thoſe Nuns chimerical [I]. One would even think that he deſigned to refute

(b) See the Mercure François, vol. 20. pag. 771.

(c) Apud Cariſiacum. It is a village in Picardy.

(d) Certum eſt, quia ad omnes homines, quando egrediuntur de corpore, veniunt Diaboli & ad juſtos & ad peccatores. In a letter from the Fathers of that Council to Lewis King of Germany.

(e) In Vita Guilelmi Menagii, and in his Remarks upon that Life.

thought the exceptions againſt ſuch witneſſes void; for it is an article of faith, that theſe witneſſes are the fathers of lies. It would be to no purpoſe to ſay, that the efficacy of the exorciſms did not ſuffer them to tell lies; for the contrary was ſoon found by experience. It is declared in the ſecond Verbal Proceſs (26), that the exorciſms were ſo long continued, that ſo many faſts were celebrated, ſo many prayers and petitions offered up to heaven, that the chief Devil and his aſſociates having promiſed to ſtrike the Magician ſo violently in ſuch a part of his body, that the mark would be viſible, and ſenſible, and having again acknowledged that they were obliged to yield to God's allmighty power, and declared that they would for ever leave that Nunnery, finally on the 13th of October 1632, the Devil got out of the body of the ſaid Superior, and gave notice of it by ſeven phlegms, which ſhe ſpit out of her mouth, to a great diſtance; the Devil who poſſeſſed ſiſter Clara got alſo out of her body, after which the Nuns lived without uneaſineſs, their bodies were no longer infeſted, and their Convent enjoyed an happy peace. But the Devils did not keep their word; they deceived the Exorciſts; for the 20th of November in the ſame year 1632, moſt of the Nuns were again troubled and poſſeſſed with evil ſpirits (27).

(26) Mercure François, ibid. pag. 761.

(27) Ibid. pag. 762.

[H] The manuſcript wrote by him againſt the celibacy of the Prieſts.] Monſieur Menage, who heard Monſieur Bouillaud ſay, there were no proof that Grandier compoſed this book (28), does not deny that it was found amongſt his papers (29). He adds, that this book was pretty well wrote, that it was directed to a woman, and ended with theſe two lines.

(21) Remarques, pag. 343.

(29) It is hinted in the Hiſtoire de l'edit de Nantes, tom. 2. pag. 538. that Grandier had publiſhed this Work.

Si ton gentil eſprit prend bien cette ſcience
Tu mettras en repos ta bonne conſcience.

" If thy briſk genius does this ſcience taſte,
" Your conſcience will be ſafe, your heart at reſt.

He had no doubt read this in the Letter of the Sieur Seguin a Phyſician of Tours, which is inſerted in the Mercure François. But he ought not perhaps to have omitted what is alſo obſerved there, namely, that Grandier confeſſed upon the rack, that he had compoſed that work. This Phyſician is not in the wrong to aſſert (30), that " this Pamphlet gave room to ſuſpect that Grandier was " married. Obſerve, continues he, that is directed to " his deareſt concubine, whoſe name is every where " ſuppreſſed, as well as in the title-page. . . . " He adds, " I muſt confeſs that this Treatiſe ſeems to me " to be very well done, and conſiſtent to the " concluſion exclufively, which indeed is wrong, and " diſcovers the venom. There is nothing in it that " ſavours of Magic; it ſeems rather that one could in- " fer from it quite the reverſe, if there were not other- " wiſe ſufficient proofs of his being a Sorcerer." A little before he expreſſed himſelf thus: " Upon the " whole he (Grandier) was a man of a ſtout and re- " ſolute temper, and one may ſay, of a ſtrong ſoul. " He was ſuch that the Preſident told me he ad- " mired him upon his trial and lamented his loſs." The funeral Oration of Scevola Sammarthanus, which Grandier delivered at Loudun, is printed with Sammarthanus's Works (31).

(30) Mercure François, tom. 20. pag. 779.

(31) Menage, Remarques, pag. 346.

[I] Monſieur Menage . . . . calls the poſſeſſion of thoſe Nuns chimerical.] He thinks it very probable (32), that they were only troubled with a ſuffocation of the matrix; and he aſſerts (33), that Grandier deſerves to be added to Gabriel Naudé's Catalogue of great Men unjuſtly charged with Magic. He confeſſes (34) however, that he heard the Superior of the Urſulines of Loudun ſay, that " when ſhe was delivered of the Devils that tor- " mented her, an Angel engraved upon her hand the " words JESUS, MARY, JOSEPH, F. DE SALLES, and " that ſhe ſhewed him her hand, on which theſe words " were indeed ingraved, but ſlightly, as thoſe croſſes * " are ingraved, which are to be ſeen on the arms of " the pilgrims, who have taken a journey to the Holy " Land. He heard her ſay alſo, that this Angel en- " graved on the upper part of the outſide of her hand " firſt the name of Francis de Salles, that this name " was ſo civil as to ſlide down to make room for the " name of Joſeph, and for that of Mary, and that " they all three got lower ſtill, to make room for the " Name of JESUS." Monſieur Menage has been in the right not to declare poſitively, that he look'd upon all this as a mere impoſture; the Reader can eaſily gueſs the reaſon. But Monſieur de Monconis (35) leaves us no room to doubt of the impoſture; for which reaſon it will not be improper to tranſcribe here what he ſays of it. He went May the 8th, 1645, to pay a viſit to the Superior of the Urſulines, and as ſhe made him wait in the parlour above half an hour, he ſuſpected ſome artifice. He deſired her to ſhew him the charac-

(32) In Vita Guil. Menagii, pag. 82.

(33) Remarques, pag. 339.

(34) Ibid. gag. 344.

* * See Thevenot, chap. 56. of his Voyage du Levant.

(35) Voyages, Part 1. pag. 8, 9.

refute in general all that is ſaid of Magicians [K]. This would be getting free from one difficulty by another [L]. Since this article was compoſed they have publiſhed in Holland Hiſtoire des Diable de Loudun (f); i. e. "The Hiſtory of the Devils of Loudun;" and it appears evidently by that work, that the pretended poſſeſſion of the Urſulines was an horrible conſpiracy againſt Grandier's life. This account is very curious, and is ſupported with all the records that relate to this trial. I met there with a particular, which ſurpriſed me a little, with regard to the great outcry that was made againſt Father Coton [M]. You may find in the Life of a Jeſuit, who was one of the Exorciſts ters which the Devil who had poſſeſſed her, ingraved on her hand when ſhe was exorciſed (36). She did it: "and he ſaw letters of a blood-colour on the outſide "of the left hand from the wriſt to the little finger; "the word JESUS was at the top of all, under it, towards the ſhoulder, was written Maria, under that "Joſeph, and lower ſtill, in the fourth line, F. de "Sales. She gave him an account of all the wickedneſſes of the Prieſt Grandier, who had been burnt "for ſending the Devil into the Nunnery. She told "him, how a Magiſtrate of the City (of Loudun), "whoſe wife he had debauched, complained of it to "her, and how they had impeached him by a common conſent, notwithſtanding the ſtrong inclination "with which this wicked wretch filled her heart by "his magical art, againſt which God's mercy ſecured "her. At laſt Monſieur de Monconis took his leave of "her, and deſired to ſee her hand again, which ſhe "ſhewed him very civilly through the grate: he made "her obſerve, that the colour of the letters was not "ſo lively, as when ſhe firſt came, and that it appeared to him that the letters began to ſcale off, and "that the whole ſkin of the hand ſeemed to burſt, as "though it had been a pellicle of dried ſtarch. Touching it ſlightly with the end of his nail, he took off "part of the leg of the M, at which ſhe ſtartled, and "the place underneath continued as ſound as the other "parts of her hand. This was enough for him." I do not doubt of it: the diſcovery of ſo great an impoſture, which had infatuated a great many perſons, was an ineſtimable treaſure for a man of his character. You will find in the new Hiſtory of the Devils of Loudun, that when old age had render'd her hand dry, ſkinny, and wrinkled, the drugs that were made uſe of to renew theſe names, could no longer make the impreſſion; whereupon the good old mother ſaid, that God had at laſt heard her prayers, and ſuffered now thoſe names to wear out, becauſe they occaſioned a thouſand perſons to come daily to trouble and importune her, and divert her from her devotions (37). You will alſo find there, that Ceriſantes had the art of marking a name upon his hand (38), and that in the year 1652 the Queen's Maids of Honour ridiculed the Urſuline Nuns for thoſe ingraved names (39).

(f) At Amſterdam, 1693 in 12mo. It has been tranſlated into Dutch.

(36) According to Mr. Menage it was an Angel who engraved thoſe characters, when ſhe was delivered of her poſſeſſion.

(37) Hiſtoire des Diables de Loudun, pag. 469.

(38) Ibid. pag. 394.

(39) Ibid.

[K] . . . One would even think, that he deſigned to refute in general all that is ſaid of Magicians.] For indeed, he turns the firſt ſcene of this horrid tragedy into ridicule, and infers arguments from it in Grandier's favour. This firſt ſcene was as follows. One of the Nuns reſting one night upon her little but chaſte couch (40), perceived a phantom, very much like their late Father Confeſſor, who owned it was he, and returned from the grave to impart very extraordinary ſecrets to her. The party was put off till the next day at the ſame hour. The phantom did not fail to come, and received the ſame anſwer as the firſt time; namely that one could not enter upon any converſation with him without the Superior's conſent. The phantom thereupon became on a ſudden perfectly like Grandier. He made love to the Nun, inticed her by his careſſes, which were both bold and immodeſt . . . . She ſtruggles, but no body aſſiſts her; ſhe grieves, and no body comforts her; ſhe calls, and no body anſwers; ſhe cries out, no body comes; ſhe trembles, ſhe ſweats, ſhe ſwoons away, ſhe calls upon the holy Name of Jeſus, and at laſt the phantom vaniſhes away. I agree with Monſieur Menage, that this is very proper to clear Urban Grandier with regard to magick; but not in other reſpects. Could he not have bribed the door-keeper, without the aſſiſtance of the Devil Cedon to open him the gate (41)? Could he not get into the Nun's cell, by diſguiſing himſelf like a ſpirit, and wearing a maſk reſembling the late Confeſſor? The Nun's account ſeems plainly to hint, that the venereal act was accompliſhed. Monſieur Menage obſerves alſo (42), that no perſon of good ſenſe will imagine, that it was in Grandier's power to diſpoſe of the Devils according to his will and pleaſure, and to ſend them to torment innocent Virgins, who were conſecrated to God. Laſtly, he commends Lewis the fourteenth's juſtice and wiſdom, "who put a ſtop to "the proſecution of thoſe who were charged with ſorcery and witchcraft, by commuting the capital puniſhment into baniſhment with regard to ſeveral perſons, who by a Decree of the Parliament of Roan "were ſentenced to be burnt alive as guilty of that "crime; and, by a Decree of the Council of State "given April 26, 1672, the King ordered that thro' "the whole Province of Normandy the priſons ſhould "be opened to all the perſons who were kept there "for the ſame crimes, and that for the future perſons "accuſed of them ſhould be judged according to the "Declaration, which by the ſame Decree his Majeſty "promiſed to ſend to all the Courts of Judicature, in "order to regulate the proceedings of the Judges in "the tryals relating to Sorcery and Witchcraft."

(40) Mercure François, tom. 20. pag. 749.

(41) It is pretended that during the third poſſeſſion, he entered in the night-time through a door, which the Devil had opened for him. Mercure François, tom. 20. pag. 762.

(42) Remarquet, pag. 141.

[L] This would be getting free from one difficulty by another.] It is certain that the moſt incredulous and moſt ſubtle Philoſophers cannot but be puzzled with the phænomena relating to Sorcery. But as to Grandier, I do not know whether we might not ſay of him, what Olympias ſaid upon ſeeing her huſband's miſtreſs, whom ſhe found extremely beautiful and witty. Do not charge her with witchcraft, all her charms are in her own perſon (43). The Curate of Loudun was an handſom man, neat in his dreſs, and of an agreeable converſation. This was probably the magick with which he led the Superior of the Urſulines into temptation (44), and made the Nuns ſuffer a violent and unchaſte flame (45). The vow of continence and devotion not being capable to remove this diſorder, it was imagined to be ſupernatural. This fancy ſaved ſelf-love the ſhame of cheriſhing a long while an unlawful paſſion that was natural: the Nuns therefore thought they were bewitched; the whole Convent was in an uproar; and it was neceſſary, for the whole Society's reputation, to purſue the firſt ſteps they had taken. There is nothing more dangerous for perſons, who think that it is neceſſary for the good of the Church that they ſhould have a good character in the world, than to take falſe ſteps. This Superior of the Urſulines acted perhaps with ſincerity at firſt: but ſhe was no longer ſincere, when ſhe received Monconis's viſit: and yet ſhe was obliged to carry on the farce, in order to vindicate her former conduct. Thoſe who were well acquainted with all the particular perſons and circumſtances in the ſmall city of Loudun, when theſe deviliſh intrigues were carried on, could have unfolded the whole much better, than it could be done at preſent.

(43) See the Remark [I] in the article APULEIUS, where I quote Plutarch's Greek words.

(44) Monconis, Voyages, Part 1. pag. 9.

(45) Mercure François, tom. 20. pag. 761.

A few months after all this was written, I heard that a perſon of that Country was publiſhing at Amſterdam an accurate account of this ſtory. I found in it the confirmation of my conjectures: the Author of that account ſhews that the particular paſſions of ſome perſons were the true ſpring of this ſtrange Mummery; and if we may credit him, the Superior was not one ſingle moment ſincere.

[M] The great out-cry that was made againſt Father Coton.] He ſet down upon a piece of paper ſeveral things upon which he deſigned to examine a woman poſſeſſed with the Devil. Amongſt other queſtions he propoſed this, Which is the paſſage in the holy Scripture, that is the moſt proper to prove a purgatory? The Proteſtants and a great number of Roman Catholics exclaimed againſt this impious curioſity, and abuſed both Henry the fourth's Confeſſor, and the whole Order of the Jeſuits. And yet it is certain that this Father Confeſſor Exorciſts of the Nuns of Loudun, ſeveral particulars concerning this affair; I ſhall tranſcribe two of them, one of which is very ſurpriſing [N].

(46) Hiſtoire des Diables de Loudun, pag. 371.

(47) Ibid. pag. 372.

(48) Ibid. pag. 373.

(49) Heideggerus, Diſſertat. Select. Triacade, pag. 98. See alſo Voetius, Diſput. tom. 3. pag. 622, 623.

(50) Journal des Savans, for May the 9th 1689, pag. 311. of the Dutch edition.

(51) His name was Henry Marie Boudon.

(52) Journal des Savans, for May 1689, pag. 310.

(1) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. 62.

(2) See the Advertiſement to the reader.

(3) Hos Sibyllinos lentinus Jacobus varch, dus Lope Hiſtoriis Oriental & alii rant.

(4) Ni tonio, Hiſpan pag. 4 that was d Cajad in Ita

(5) M Legat Japa apud de Bi 366,

(a) Ex Mu Italico Mab ntii, tom. 1. 176.

(b) See Gr winckel, de præcedentiæ 263, 320,

(2) Ut Ma refert ex A de Graſſis enſi Facce Epiſcopo. ibid.

feſſor did only follow the practice of his Church, except with regard to ſome queſtions which he would propoſe relating to political affairs. Did not the Exorciſt of Loudun aſk the Devil (46), which is the beſt way by which a creature, who has ſtrayed from God, may return to him again? Did he not aſk him (47), whether ſince his fall he never taſted the ſweets of divine love, . . . and which is the ſtrongeſt tye that keep men united to the things of this world? . . . (48) whether there were ſome perſons in hell, who had had a lively ſenſe of divine love on earth? The Devil made a full anſwer to all theſe queſtions, and even diſcovered ſeveral ſecrets of his policy, and the means to diſappoint it. Such queſtions have not been aſked at Loudun only; they are the cuſtomary ſtyle of the Exorciſts, as the Proteſtant Divines object againſt the Roman Catholicks. Si quis attente legerit nupera Exorciſtarum ſcripta, ut Monachi Michaelis, Hiſtoriam Ludovici Gaufridi, & obſeſſarum mulierum, non ſatis mirari poterit, impietatem & ſtultitiam hominum, qui judicium controverſiarum fidei à dæmonibus expoſcunt, eos fingunt pœnitentiæ prædicatores, eos adigunt, ut preces ad Deum fundant, & omnia religionis & pietatis externa munia obeant (49). i. e. "Whoever reads with attention the late Writings of "the Exorciſts, as for inſtance, that of the Monk Michael, the Hiſtory of Lewis Gaufridus, and of the "women poſſeſſed with the Devil, will find reaſons to "wonder at the impiety and folly of thoſe men, who "ſubmit the determination of the controverſies relating "to the Articles of Faith, to the determination of "the Devils; who ſuppoſe them to be the Preachers "of Repentance, who prevail upon them to pray "to God, and to perform all the outward acts of Religion and Devotion." So that it was only the animoſity and hatred men had againſt the Jeſuits, that made them exclaim ſo loudly againſt Father Coton's conduct, which would have paſſed unobſerved had it been any other perſon's. I do not mean the Proteſtants here. Men will never be reclaimed from that vice of having a partial reſpect for perſons.

[N] I ſhall tranſcribe two particulars, one of which is very ſurprizing.] I know them no otherwiſe but by Monſieur Couſin's Extracts. Here follows what I have read in his Journal des Savans, in the paſſage where he gives an account of Father Seurin's life (50). "Having mentioned this Father's feats againſt the Devil, "the Author of his Life (51) takes this opportunity to "prove at length, that the Nuns of Loudun were "really poſſeſſed with the Devil, and he proves it "chiefly by the authority of two of the greateſt ge"nius's of this Age. The one is Cardinal de Richelieu, who ſent to Loudun ſome Exorciſts main"tained at the King's expence. The other is my Lord "Montague, who having ſeen the Devils going out "of the body of Mother des Anges, was fully "perſuaded of the truth, and mentioned it to Pope "Urban VIII, when he abjured his hereſy and em"braced the Catholic Faith before him."

What I ſhall now obſerve is much more remarkable. You will ſee there a man, who literally gave his own body, to redeem that of Jeſus Chriſt: That is to ſay, who to get Chriſt's Body out of the Devil's hands, delivered himſelf up to the Devil. Read theſe words of the Journaliſt (52). "When Father Seurin was "exorciſing the Nuns of Loudun, who were poſſeſſed "with the Devil, the evil ſpirits declared that two "Magicians had taken three Hoſts with a deſign to "profane them. Father Seurin applied himſelf to "prayer, in order to obtain the delivery of his "maſter's body; and to redeem it, he conſented that "his own body ſhould be put in the power of the "Devils. His propoſal was accepted, and the exchange was made. The Devils got the three Hoſts "out of the hands of their agents, and brought them "to the foot of the Altar, where the holy Sacrament "was then expoſed to view, and one of the Devils en"tered the body of Father Seurin, who thus continued "poſſeſſed or obſeſſed almoſt all the remaining part of "his life."

GRAPALDUS (FRANCIS MARIUS) a learned man who lived in the ſixteenth Century. He was a native of Parma; and when his country, being delivered of the yoke of the French, ſubmitted again to Pope Julius II, he was choſen to be at the head of the embaſſy which was ſent to that Pope (a). His eloquence and beautiful ſhape were the reaſons why he was choſen to that employment (b). He made a very good Oration to Julius II, and publiſhed ſome verſes upon the ſubject he had treated in his diſcourſe. The Pope crowned him with his own hand after a very ſolemn manner in the Vatican. Grapaldus being encouraged by this poetical crown ſet about writing a great many verſes, which have been printed (c). The work in which he ſhewed his learning moſt, is that in which he deſcribes all the parts of a houſe [A]. He died of a retention of urine being above fifty years old (d).

(a) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. 62.

(b) A præſtanti facundia & inſigni corporis proceritate Legationis princeps. Idem, ibid.

(c) Ex Jovii Elogiis, cap. 62.

(d) Idem, ibid.

[A] The Work in which he ſhewed his learning moſt, is that in which he deſcribes all the parts of a houſe.] This is Paul Jovius's opinion, which is very judicious. Sed multo uberius, ſays he (1), & latius ingenii famam propagavit, edito libro de partibus ædium, quo per optimas diſciplinas per ornatum diligenti cultura ingenium demonſtravit. i. e. "But he gained a much greater and "more extenſive reputation by the Book he publiſhed "concerning the Parts of a houſe; by which he ſhewed "that he had improved his mind by a careful ſtudy of "polite Literature." This work has been printed ſeveral times. The firſt Edition is of Parma, by Anthony Quintianus; I do not know in what year it was printed; I know only that the Author publiſhed a ſecond Edition of it ſeven years after; it is larger than the firſt (2). Geſner mentions only the Editions of Baſil of 1533, and 1541 in 4to. The Edition I make uſe of is of Dort 1618 in 8vo.

GRASSIS (PARIS DE) deſerves very much to be blamed for his impoſition on the public. He compoſed the epitaph of a mule [A], and cauſed it to be engraved on a piece of marble, which he hid afterwards under ground in his vineyard. Some time after he ordered trees to be planted in the place where that marble was buried; and when they came and told him that they had found this inſcription, he gave it out for a particular which had been foretold concerning his mule. Men only laughed at this at firſt; nor was this piece of marble much minded for ſome time; but ſeveral years after it became famous, and paſſed with a great many perſons for an antique [B]; ſo that Thomas Porcacchi

[A] He compoſed the Epitaph of a Mule.] He feigned that one Publius Graſſus had raiſed this Monument to his Mule. The Inſcription begins thus. DISPEDIBUS SAXUM.

[B] This Epitaph . . . paſſed with a great many perſons for an antique.] Father Mabillon aſſerts it. Viris eruditis nonnullis fucum fecit, ſays he (1), opinantibus id eſſe antiquum, ... Thomas Porcacchius inter alios hoc Epitaphium cacchi inſerted this epitaph in a book, as a genuine piece and really antient (a). Paris de Graſſis is not the only perſon that laid ſuch ſnares before the Antiquaries [C]. I ſhall obſerve by the by, that I think he is the ſame, who in the beginning of the ſixteenth Century was Maſter of the Ceremonies under ſeveral Popes, and Biſhop of Peſaro, and brother of Cardinal ACHILLES DE GRASSIS. His Journal was quoted in the writings that were publiſhed in the controverſy between the Republic of Venice and the Duke of Savoy about the right of precedency (b). His ceremonial has been publiſhed, and is eſteemed (c). He appeared very zealous againſt a plagiary; for it is of him that Couſin Preſident ſpeaks in the paſſage which you will find below [D].

(1) Mabillon, in Muſeo Italico, tom. 1. pag. 176.

(a) Ex Muſeo Italico Mabillonii, tom. 1. pag. 176.

(b) See Grafwinckel, de Jure præcedentiæ, pag. 263, 320, 329.

(c) See Naudé, Bibliograph. Polit. pag. m. 42.

GRASWINCKEL

Epitaphium pro genuino & antiquo habuit in libro funeralium: immo Alexander VII in Adverſariis ſuis notat id repertum fuiſſe prope ſanctum Petrum. i. e. "He has "a little impoſed upon the learned, who thought it "an Antique.... And Thomas Porcacchi, amongſt "others, inſerted it as genuine and ancient in his "Book concerning Burials: Nay Alexander VII ob"ſerves in his Memoirs, that it was found near St. "Peter's Church." He tells us that Sebaſtian Maccius gives an account of this impoſture in his Collection of ancient Inſcriptions, which is in manuſcript in Cardinal Chigi's Library. Maccius had this from Annibal de Graſſis Biſhop of Jaccentia (2).

(2) Ut Maccius refert ex Annibale de Graſſis Bononienſi Jaccentiæ Epiſcopo. Idem. ibid.

[C] He is not the only perſon that laid ſuch ſnares before the Antiquaries.] I ſhall relate but one inſtance of ſuch impoſtures, though it were an eaſy matter to compile a great many. Auguſt the 9th 1505 three ſtones were found near the Cape of Roco de Sintra in Portugal. There was upon thoſe ſtones a Latin Inſcription in old Letters, which contained a Prophecy. Here follows that Inſcription.

Sibylla vaticinium occiduis decretum,
Volventur ſaxa literis, & ordine rectis,
Cum videas Occidens Orientis opes.
Ganges, Indus, Tagus, erit mirabile viſu,
Merces commutabit ſuas, uterque ſibi.
Soli æterno, ac Lunæ decretum.

That is,

"The Sybils Decree and Prophecy to the inhabitants "of the Weſt. Stones with Letters ingraved on them "will be found, when the Weſt will ſee the riches of "the Eaſt. The Ganges, the Indus, and the Tagus, "a wonderful ſight? ſhall make an exchange of their "wares. Thus the eternal Sun and the Moon have "decreed it."

This was taken for an Oracle of the Sibyl (3), and ſome learned men endeavoured to explain theſe verſes; but it was at laſt diſcovered that Cajado a Portugueze Poet was the Author of them, and had buried thoſe ſtones in the ground, and cauſed them to be dug out, when he thought it a proper time. Fraudem detexit Caſpar Varrerius; ſcilicet quo tempore Emmanuel Luſitaniæ Rex, per Vaſcum Gamam, navigationes in Indiam Orientalem feliciter tentâſſet; Ulyſſepone vixit Hermicus Cajadus, poeta celebris, Angeli Politiani diſcipulus (4): Hic tria marmora literis antiquis hoc vaticinium continentibus, incidi, & clam circa oppidum Syntra leviter terra tegi curavit. Poſtquam verò, tractu temporis, aliquam Antiquitatis ſpeciem contraxiſſent, amicos quoſdam, in villa ſua, circa quam hæc marmora occultata erant, convivio excepit; quibus ſtrenuè epulantibus nunciat Villicus, foſſorem marmora, ignotis literis inſcripta, inveniſſe; procul dubio Theſaurum eo loco defoſſum eſſe. Advolant omnes, inveniunt lapides, mirantur vaticinium, non ſane foliis inſcriptum: Rex hujus fraudis conſcius, ſtuporem tamen ſimulat, verſus aulicis deſcribendos tradit, ipſa vero marmora, tanquam ſanctiora κειμήλια, in gazophylacio religioſe ſervat (5). i. e. "Caſpar Varrerius diſcovered the cheat: For at the time, when "Vaſco de Gama undertook with ſucceſs his navigation to the Indies, under the authority of Emanuel "King of Portugal, there lived at Liſbon a celebrated "Poet named Hermicus Cajado, Angelo Politiano's "diſciple. He cauſed this Prophecy to be ingraved in "ancient Letters on three marble ſtones, and ſent ſecretly into the neighbourhood of the place called "Syntra, and had it ſlightly covered over with earth. "Some time after, when theſe ſtones were become "ſomewhat like antiques, he invited ſome friends to "his country-ſeat, near which theſe ſtones were hid; "and whilſt he and his friends were at dinner, his "Farmer came and told them, that a man who was "digging, had found ſome pieces of marble, on "which ſome unknown letters were ingraved, and "that there was no doubt a treaſure buried in the "ground thereabout. They all ran to the place, "found the ſtones, and wondered at the prediction, "which indeed was not written on leaves: The King "himſelf, who knew the cheat, affected nevertheleſs "to be ſurprized; he ordered his Courtiers to explain "the verſes, and laid thoſe ſtones up amongſt his Col"lections, as a very ſacred curioſity." Some aſſert, that Cajado hoped to inſinuate himſelf by this artifice into the King's favour, and to get ſome money from him. Poſtea tamen compertum eoſdem confictos & impoſitos fuiſſe a quodam Hermo Charado Luſitano, qui illos marmori inſcripſerat, defoderatque, ut ſitu humoreque terræ aliquantulum deformati, vetuſtatis indicium exhiberent; rurſuſque per mercenarias operas refoderat, ut hoc tam nobili atque peregregio Antiquitatis monumento, Regis (Luſitaniæ Emanuelis) gratiam, avide in Orientis opes intenti, pecuniamque aucuparetur, ut teſtantur Cæſar Orlandius, & Gaſpar Barrerius, quos refert Ortelius in Theatro magno tab. 5. novi orbis, & ab eo mutuatus Malvenda lib. 3. de Antichriſto cap. 16. Torniellus in Annalibus 2 tom. an. mundi 3043, num. 7. pag. 48 (6). i. e. "However, it was found at laſt, that theſe verſes "had been forged by one Hermus Charadus, a Portu"gueze, who ingraved them on a piece of marble, "and buried it in the ground, that being ſome"what deformed by the moiſture of the earth, it might "ſeem to be ancient: he had it afterwards dug up by "ſome workmen, and preſented it to the King (Ema"nuel of Portugal) who was very eager after the riches "of the Eaſt, with a deſign to gain his favour, and "to get ſome money from him: as Cæſar Orlandius, "and Caſpar Barrerius aſſert, whom Ortelius quotes "in his great Theatre of the new World, Tab. 5. "from whom Malveda tranſcribes it, in his 3d Book of "the Antichriſt, Chap. 26, and Torniellus in the 2d "Vol. of his Annals, under the year 3043, num. 7. "p. 48."

(3) Hos verſus Sibyllinos eſſe Valentinus Moranus, Jacobus Navarch, Ferdinandus Lopez in ſuis Hiſtoriis Indiæ Orientalis, ſibi & aliis perſuaſerant. i. e. "Valentine Moranus, James "Navarch, Ferdinand Lopez "in his Hiſtory "of the Eaſt "Indies, imagined that theſe "were really Sibylline Verſes, "and endeavoured to make o"thers believe "it." Jo. Euſebius Nurembergius, de Origine Sacræ Scripturæ, lib. 3. cap. 3. apud Voetium, Diſputat. tom. 4. pag. 696.

(4) Nicolas Antonio, Bibliot. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 433. ſays that Politiano was dead when Cajadus arrived in Italy.

(5) Montanus, Legat. Belg. ad Japan. pag. 15. apud Lomeierum, de Bibliotb. pag. 366, 367.

(6) Nierembergius, de Orig. S. Script. lib. 3. cap. 3. apud Voetium, Diſput. tom. 4. pag. 696.

[D] It is of him that Couſin ſpeaks in the paſſage which you will find below.] "Chriſtopher Mar"cel, nominated to the Biſhopric of Corfu, having pro"cured a copy of the Book, which Auguſtin Patricius "wrote under the Pontificate of Pope Innocent VIII, "concerning the Rites of the Roman Church, cauſed "it to be printed at Venice in the year 1516, and de"dicated it to Leo X, without mentioning in the leaſt "Auguſtin Patricius, who was the true Author of it, "and had been Maſter of the Ceremonies at Rome "from the time of Pius II, who was his uncle, and "gave him the ſurname of Picolomini, to the time of "Innocent VIII, under whom he corrected the Ro"man Pontifical, and wrote this Ceremonial. Paris "de Graſſis, who was the Maſter of Ceremonies under "Leo X, had no ſooner ſeen this Edition of Venice, "but he complained of it to his Holineſs as of an at"tempt, which could not be atoned for but by a fire, "which ſhould conſume all the copies with the Au"thor. The Pope, who had given a Licence for this "Edition, feigned to fall in a paſſion upon the Repre"ſentation of this zealous Maſter of the Ceremonies, "and appointed a Congregation to examine into that "affair. But Paris de Graſſis, notwithſtanding all his "care and diligence, could not prevent the ſeveral new "Editions of that Book, which were ſoon after pub"liſhed at Cologne and in other places (7)."

(7) Journal des Savans, for March the 7th 1689, pag. 141, 142. of the Dutch edition.

This is what we read in Monſieur Couſin's account of the ſecond volume of the Muſeum Italicum. I have looked into that ſecond volume ſince the firſt edition of my Dictionary; and this made me ſenſible of what Ovid aſſerts with a great deal of good ſenſe, that it is much more agreeable to drink the waters at the very ſpring. Gratius ex ipſo fonte bibuntur aquæ

GRASWINCKEL (THEODORE) a native of Delft, was a very learned Civilian in the ſeventeenth Century, and he has proved it by ſeveral works [A]. He was quæ (8). I have found, that Paris de Graſſis's anger againſt the Archbiſhop of Corfu was not owing ſo much to that Prelate's aſcribing to himſelf a book of which he was not the Author, as to his divulging even with ſome alterations, thoſe ceremonies, which ought to be kept ſecret. He repreſents to Pope Leo X, in a letter he wrote to him (9), that he had been near ſixteen years Maſter of the Ceremonies, and that he ſhould think himſelf very much to blame, if he ſuffered them to be either corrupted or publiſhed, and that his predeceſſors ſhould be deprived of the praiſes that are due to them. He does not ſcruple to confeſs, that one cauſe of his complaint is, that the publiſhing of thoſe things, leſſens the veneration men ought to have for them, and makes that to be deſpiſed, which under the vail of ſecrecy and myſtery would be revered. Quemadmodum juſti cujuſque Principis eſt curare, ne quiſquam ſuo jure fraudetur; ita, ſi diligenter inſpexerimus, ad quempiam alium non magis ſpectat quam ad Romanum Pontificem, ne ſacræ ſuæ ceremoniæ maculentur, neve aliqua in parte alterentur, ac præſertim ne corrumpantur: ſed & quod omnium principum eſt, ne prolatæ in vulgus velut proſtitutæ pontificalium ſacrorum exiſtimationem minuant, flocci faciant, & contemnantur (10). i. e. "As it is the duty of every good "Prince to take care that none of his ſubjects be de- "prived of their right; ſo, if we duly conſider it, "it will appear to be chiefly the duty of the Popes, "to ſee that their ſacred ceremonies be not ſtained, "nor altered in any reſpect, and eſpecially that they "be not corrupted. But it is alſo the duty of all "Princes, to take care that the ſacred rites be not "expoſed by being publiſhed, whereby they would be "leſs eſteemed, ſlighted and deſpiſed." He inſtances in the conduct of the ancient Heathens, who would not ſuffer the myſteries of their Gods to come to the knowledge of the profane. He mentions particularly the conduct of the ancient Romans, and of King Tarquinius, who ſentenced Marcus Tullius to be thrown into the river, to puniſh him for giving the book of Ceremonies to be tranſcribed. Obſerve that Graſſis required that the Archbiſhop of Corfu's book be burnt with its Author, or that the Author at leaſt ſhould be puniſhed as it ſhould be thought proper. The Pope judged this petition reaſonable, and promiſed to have it examined in the following conſiſtory. Hanc Epiſtolam cum in manibus Papæ dediſſem, legiſſetque libenter & avide, & acceptaſſet rationes & argumenta in ea per me allegata; verſus ad Cardinales aliquos, qui ſibi forte adhærebant, dixit me rationem habere ſuper petitionibus meis: & librum ceremoniarum nuper impreſſum omnino comburi ſimul cum falſo auctore, ſicut poſtulaſſem, aut ſaltem ipſum auctorem corrigi & caſtigari omnino debere prout præſentibus videretur. Itaque ad primum conſiſtorium rem & cauſam differre (11). i. e. "When I had given this letter to the "Pope, he read it immediately with pleaſure, and "approved the reaſons and arguments I had ſet forth "in it; and turning himſelf to ſome Cardinals, who "happened to be near him, he told them that my "petition was well grounded, and that the Book of "Ceremonies lately printed ought by all means to "be burnt with its falſe Author, as I requeſted; or "at leaſt, that the Author ought to be reproved and "chaſtiſed, according as they ſhould think fit. He "therefore referred this affair to the next Conſiſtory." How this affair ended is not known; for there are ſome ſheets wanting in Graſſis's ceremonial, in the place where this account ſhould be continued (12). Father Mabillon is very near turning Paris de Graſſis's great zeal into ridicule; and he obſerves with ſome pleaſure (13), that the Archbiſhop of Corfu's book was not burnt. He aſſerts that the Roman Catholics, who have good ſenſe, do not regulate their veneration for the Pope by theſe ſecret ceremonies, but that they ground it on his being the head of the Church. It muſt nevertheleſs be granted, that this zealous aſſertor of ſecrecy was not in the wrong to maintain that the publiſhing of the myſteries of the Roman ceremonial would leſſen the veneration which the people had for it (14); for it is uſual with men much more to admire what they know not than what they know. He ſeems even to be ſorry that the Pontifical was publiſhed; by which, ſays he, to the contempt of the Prieſthood, the ceremonies contained in that book fall daily into the hands of the profane, and afford the Sectaries a continual opportunity to laugh at our Religion. Sed utinam etiam & illa quæ dixi, ſecretiora forent & magis recondita. Non enim ea quotidie ad profanas manus in ſacerdotii contemptum, nec ad alienas ſectas in noſtræ religionis irriſionem devenire videremus (15). However it be, we ought to ſay that he fell into too violent a paſſion againſt the Archbiſhop of Corfu; he loads him with injuries; and I do not know whether he did not abhor him as much as thoſe were antiently abhorred, who revealed the ceremonies of the myſteries of Ceres; men with whom none would go on board a ſhip, leſt they ſhould ſuffer with them the puniſhment they deſerved.

Eſt & fideli tuta ſilentio
Merces. Vetabo, qui Cereris ſacrum
Vulgarit arcanæ, ſub iiſdem
Sit trabibus, fragilemque mecum
Solvat phaſelum: ſæpe Dieſpiter
Neglectus, inceſto addidit integrum (16).

"And juſt rewards the Gods decree
"For fair obedient piety;
"Nor he that ſcorns or ſcoffs his God
"Or blabs the myſteries abroad,
"Shall live in the ſame houſe, or ſail with me.
"Oft Jove doth heedleſs thunder throw,
"And mix the good and bad below."

Creech.

[A] He ſhewed it by ſeveral works.] He publiſhed at the Hague in the year 1642 a book De Jure Majeſtatis; i. e. "Of the Right of Majeſty," which he dedicated to the Queen of Sweden. He ſet down there ſuch principles as are the moſt favourable to Kings, and the moſt contrary to Buchanan's republican maxims. He aſſerted the claim of the Republic of Venice againſt the Duke of Savoy in their controverſy about precedency; for in the year 1644 he publiſhed a book de Jure præcedentiæ inter ſereniſſimam Venetam Rempubl. & ſereniſſ. Sabaudiæ Ducem. i. e. "Of "the Right of Precedency between the moſt ſerene "Republic of Venice, and the moſt ſerene Duke of "Savoy." He had a great while before given proofs of his zeal for the Republic of Venice: for in the year 1634 he publiſhed an anſwer to the Squittinio, which he intitled, Libertas Veneta, ſeu Venetorum in ſe ac ſuos imperandi jus. i. e. "The Liberty of Ve- "nice; or the Right of the Venetians to govern "themſelves and their Subjects." In the year 1652 he wrote againſt a Genoeſe, named Burgus, who aſſerted the ſame opinion with Selden, namely, that the ſea as well as the earth is ſubject to ſome States. Maris liberi Vindiciæ adverſus Petrum Baptiſtam Burgum Liguſtici maritimi dominii aſſertorem. i. e. "The "Liberty of the Sea aſſerted againſt Peter Burgus, "who maintains that the Genoeſe are maſters of the "Sea." This is the title of Graſwinckel's work (1), who the next year publiſhed a Treatiſe againſt Velvodus. I have alſo ſeen a Treatiſe of him De Præludiis Juſticiæ & Juris; i. e. "The Prolegomena of "Juſtice and Right," printed in the year 1660; he refutes a Portugueſe Civilian (2) in this work. He added to it a Diſſertation De Fide Hæreticis & Rebellibus ſervandâ; i. e. "That promiſes made to Heretics "and Rebels muſt be kept." I muſt not omit his Strictura adverſus Felden; i. e. "Critical Remarks "againſt Felden;" nor his Commentary upon Saluſt, and upon a Spaniſh Author De Vita & Nece Caſſii & Bruti; i. e. "Of the Life and Murther of Caſſius "and Brutus:" nor his Tranſlation of David's Pſalms in heroic verſe; nor his Tranſlation of Thomas a Kempis (4) in elegiac verſe; nor his poem in hexameters, in which he gives an account of the Life of Andrew Canterus, a native of Groningen, who from his youth was a prodigy of learning. He alſo wrote ſome books in Dutch, as the Art of living well, a Commentary on the Edicts de Annonis, concerning Proviſions; and two volumes in 4to (5) concerning the Sovereignty of the States of Holland.

(8) Ovid. in Ep. ex Ponto, Epiſt. 5. ver. 8.

(9) Written in the year 1517.

(10) Muſeum Italic. tom. 2. in Appendice, pag. 588.

(11) Ibid. pag. 592.

(12) Ibid. in Commentar. pag. vi.

(13) Ibid. pag. vii.

(14) Quod ſi ſacrorum arcana pandantur, & ſacræ publicentur ceremoniæ, ilico futurum eſt, ut omnis opinio minuatur, ut pontificia auctoritas elanguеſcat neceſſe eſt. i. e. "If the "myſteries of "the ſacred "Rites are laid "open, if the "holy Ceremo- "nies are pub- "liſhed, the "great opinion "men have of "them, will "immediately "be leſſened, and "the Pope's au- "thority muſt "neceſſarily lan- "guiſh." Ibid. in Append. pag. 589.

(15) Ibid. pag. 588.

(16) Horat. Od. 2. lib. 3.

(1) Soprani, in his Collection of the Writers of Liguria, mentioning Burgus, ſays that Thomaſo Graſeninckelio wrote againſt him in the year 1652. Oldoini has tranſcribed this blunder in his Athenæum Liguſticum. This is altering the name and ſurname of our Graſwinckel.

(2) Named Ferdinand Rebellus.

(3) See above, quotation (51) of the Article BRUTUS (Marcus Junius.)

(4) De Imitatione Jeſu Chriſti.

(5) They were printed after his death, the one in the year 1667, the other in the year 1674.

was not only well ſkilled in matters relating to the Law, but alſo in polite Literature and in the Latin Poetry. His merit was rewarded, for he was promoted to conſiderable employments at the Hague [B]. The Republic of Venice made him a Knight of St. Mark. He died of an Apoplexy at Mechlin October the 12th 1666, at the age of threeſcore and ſix years, and was buried in the great Church at the Hague, where his epitaph is to be ſeen, which contains a very great encomium.

[B] He was promoted to conſiderable employments at the Hague.] He was Advocate Fiſcal of the Demeſns of the States of Holland, and Recorder and Secretary of the Mixed-Court from the States General.

GRATAROLUS (WILLIAM) a learned Phyſician lived in the ſixteenth Century. He was born at Bergamo in Italy, and left his native country to go into Germany, with a deſign to profeſs the Proteſtant Religion there. He ſtaid ſome time at Baſil, whence he was called to Marpurg, where he was made Profeſſor of Phyſic. But he continued but one year there, either becauſe the air of the country of Heſſe did not agree with him, or becauſe he left at Baſil ſomething agreeable to him, which he miſſed (a), He returned to this laſt city, and ſoon after died there [A], at the age of fifty two years. He wrote ſeveral very good books [B]. It is aſſerted that he excelled in the art of phyſiognomy (b). Beza wrote ſome letters to him, which are printed (c).

(a) Nobilis hunc miſit Cattis Baſilea, ſed anno Vix ſemel exacto rurſus eò rediit; Sive quod Haſſiaco non poſſet vivere cœlo, Sive quod in votis urbs Baſilea foret. Petr. Nigid. apud Freher. Theatr. p. 1252.

(b) Taken from Paul. Freher. Theat. Vir. Illuſt. pag. 1252.

(c) The 42d and 46th.

[A] He died ſoon after at Baſil.] It is aſſerted in Paul Freher's Theatre, that he died May the 6th 1562; and the fourth part of John James Boiſſard's learned Men is quoted for this. Reuſnerus's Diarium Hiſtoricum might alſo have been quoted. This Phyſician's death is put under the year 1562 in the new Edition (1) of Vander Linden; Konig puts it under the year 1566, and Thuanus (2) and Bucholcer (3) on April the 16th 1568. Two Prefaces (4) and ſome ſmall Works, which Gratarolus, being at Marpurg, dedicated Auguſt the 25th 1562 to the Landgrave of Heſſe, prove that he did not die at Baſil May the 6th in that ſame year. It is a ſad thing that we ſhould meet with ſuch different accounts in ſeveral Authors, with regard to a circumſtance of this kind, which it would be eaſy to know exactly. I have obſerved the ſame variations with regard to Giſanius. See the Remark [A] of this Article.

(1) De Script. Medic. pag. 376.

(2) Thuan. lib. 43, ſub fin.

(3) Bucholcer. in Indice Chron. pag. m. 622.

(4) Printed at Straſburg in the year 1563, 8vo.

[B] He wrote ſeveral very good Books.] Here follow the titles of ſome: De Memoria reparanda, augenda, conſervanda, ac de Reminiſcentia. i. e. "Of reſtoring, preſerving, and improving one's memory, "and of Reminiſcence." The firſt Edition which is of the year 1554, has been followed by ſeveral others (5). De Prædictione morum naturarumque hominum facili, & Inſpectione partium corporis. i. e. "Of the eaſy "foretelling of men's genius and inclinations; and of "the obſervation of the parts of the body." Prognoſtica naturalia de temporum mutatione perpetua, ordine literarum. i. e. "Natural Prognoſtications of the per"petual changings of the times, in an alphabetical or"der." De Literatorum & eorum qui Magiſtratibus funguntur conſervanda præſervandaque Valetudine. i. e. "Of preſerving in health Men of Letters and Magi"ſtrates." De vini natura, artificio & uſu, deque omni "re potabili. i. e. "Of the nature and uſe of Wine, "and the manner of making it; and of all that can be drank." De Regimine iter agentium, vel equitum, vel peditum, vel navi, vel curru ſeu rheda &c. Viatoribus quibuſq; utiliſſimi Libri duo. i. e. "The Diet of thoſe "that travel either on horſeback, or on foot, or in a "ſhip, or in a coach &c. in two Books, very uſeful "to all Travellers." He publiſhed ſome Books of other Authors, to which he added ſomething of his own. Petri Pomponatii Libri de cauſis occultorum effectuum, ſeu de Incantatione, cum Præfatione & Gloſſulis. That is, "Peter Pomponatius's Books of the cauſes of hidden "Effects, or of Inchantments." Petri Aponenſis Libellus de Venenis ad manuſcriptum exemplar correctus, cujus adjecit multa ejus argumenti utilia. i. e. "Peter of A"pono's Book concerning Poiſons; corrected from a "manuſcript; to which he (Gratarolus) added a great "many uſeful obſervations upon the ſame ſubject." Correctiones & Additiones in Librum Italicum falſo attributum Gabrieli Fallopio cui titulus eſt, Secreta Fallopii. i. e. "Corrections and Additions to an Italian book falſly "aſcribed to Gabriel Fallopius, and which is intitled, "Fallopius's Noſtrums." He made a Collection of ſeveral Treatiſes concerning the Engliſh Sweat, and concerning Baths, and a Compilation of ſeveral Works relating to Alchymy (6). One cannot refuſe him the character of a publick-ſpirited man, ſince he endeavoured to find out not only the remedies proper for Magiſtrates, but alſo thoſe that are proper for all ſorts of Travellers. Nor did he omit the Men of Letters, and endeavoured to furniſh them with the neceſſary helps not only for the preſervation of their health, but alſo for the preſervation and improvement of their memory. A man who could procure them what they want in thoſe reſpects, would deſerve divine honours in the Republick of Letters. Memory is as neceſſary to them as life itſelf.

(5) Vide Lindenium renovatum, pag. 376, 377.

(6) Lindenius Renovatus, pag. 377. and Paul Freher. in Theat. pag. 1252.

☞ GRAUNT, or GRANT (EDWARD) a man of eminent learning in the ſixteenth Century, was educated in Grammar Learning in the College School at Weſtminſter, from whence he was removed either to Chriſt Church or Broad-Gate's Hall in the Univerſity of Oxford (a), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts February 27, 1571 (b), and that of Maſter the 27th of March 1572 (c); about which time he was appointed maſter of Weſtminſter School, where a great many perſons, who were afterwards eminent in Church and State, were educated under his care (d). In 1575 he publiſhed at London in 4to Græcæ Linguæ Spicilegium; which was afterwards contracted by his learned uſher Mr. William Camden, and printed at London 1597 in 8vo, under the title of Inſtitutio Græcæ Grammatices compendiaria in uſum Regiæ Scholæ Weſtmonaſterienſis. In 1577 our Author was made Prebendary of the twelfth Stall in the Collegiate Church of Weſtminſter in the room of Dr. Thomas Watts; and about that time being admitted Bachelor of Divinity of Cambridge (e), was incorporated in the ſame degree at Oxford in May 1579 (f). He was afterwards Doctor of that Faculty, but not of that Univerſity (g). He reſigned his Maſterſhip of Weſtminſter School about the month of February $159\frac{2}{3}$ [A] (h), and was ſucceeded in March following by Mr. Camden (i). He died

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 310. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 105.

(c) Idem, ibid. col. 106.

(d) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 119.

(g) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(h) Idem, ibid. col. 311.

(i) Guil. Camdeni Vita, ſcriptore Thomâ Smith, page xviii. prefixed to Guil. Camdeni & illuſtrium Viror. ad G. Camdenum Epiſtolæ, edit. London 1691 in 4to.

[A] He reſigned his Maſterſhip of Weſtminſter School abouth the month of February $159\frac{2}{3}$.] This we are aſſured of by Mr. Wood (1). Dr. Thomas Smith therefore is miſtaken in ſuppoſing, that our Author died in March died in September or October 1601, and was interred in St. Peter's Church at Weſtminſter (k). He collected and publiſhed the Letters and Poems of Roger Aſcham, to which he ſubjoined a piece of his own, intitled, Oratio de Vita & Obitu Rogeri Aſchami, ac Dictionis Elegantiâ, cum Adhortatione ad Adoleſcentulos. London 1577 in 8vo. He was an excellent Latin Poet, as appears from ſeveral copies of verſes written by him, and printed in various books; and was exceedingly well verſed in all parts of polite Literature.

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 310.

(k) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 311.

March 1593 : MORTUO viro doctiſſimo Edwardo Granto, S. Theologiæ Doctore, qui Regiam Scholam Weſtmonaſterienſem diu rexerat, menſe Martio MDXCIII. in ejus locum ſuffectus eſt Camdenus (2). H.

(1) Guilielmi Camdeni Vita, ſcriptore Thomâ Smith, pag. 18. prefixed to Gul. Camdeni & illuſtr. Virorum ad G. Camdenum Epiſtolæ, edit. London 1691, in 4to.

☞GRAUNT (JOHN), Author of a celebrated book, intitled, Natural and political Obſervations made upon the Bills of Mortality [A], was ſon of Mr. Henry Graunt of Hampſhire, and born in Birchin-Lane in the City of London April the 24th 1620. He was

[A] Author of a celebrated Book, intitled, Natural and Political Obſervations made upon the Bills of Mortality.] In this Book he had the advice and aſſiſtance of Sir William Petty (1). It was printed at London 1661 in 4to. The ſecond Edition was printed at London 1662 in 4to, under this title: Natural and Political Obſervations mentioned in the following Index, and made upon the Bills of Mortality. By John Graunt, Citizen of London. With reference to the Government, Religion, Trade, Growth, Air, Diſeaſes, and the ſeveral changes of the ſaid City. The ſecond Edition. The third Edition was printed at London 1665 in 8vo, under the following title: Natural and Political Obſervations, mentioned in a following Index, and made upon the Bills of Mortality. By Capt. John Graunt, Fellow of the Royal Society. With reference to the Government, Religion, Trade, Growth, Air, Diſeaſes, and the ſeveral changes of the ſaid City. The third Edition, much enlarged. The Imprimatur by the Lord Brouncker Preſident of the Royal Society is dated Tueſday June 20th 1665. The Dedication of our Author to John Lord Roberts, Lord Privy-Seal, is dated from Birchin-Lane January 25th 166½. In this Diſcourſe Capt. Graunt endeavours to ſhew, that about one third of all that were ever quick, die under five years old, and about thirty ſix in an hundred under ſix (2). That two parts of nine die of acute, and ſeventy of two hundred and twenty nine of chronical diſeaſes; and four of two hundred and twenty nine of outward diſeaſes, as cancers, fiſtulas, ſores, ulcers, &c (3). That ſeven in an hundred die of age (4). That ſome diſeaſes and caſualties keep a conſtant proportion, whereas ſome others are very irregular (5). That not above one in four thouſand are ſtarved (6). That it were better to maintain all beggars at the public charge, tho' earning nothing, than to let them beg about the ſtreets; and that employing them without diſcretion may do more harm than good. For "if there be, ſays he (7), but a certain proportion of work to be done, and that ſame "be already done by the Non-Beggars; then to em- "ploy the Beggars about it, will but transfer the want "from one hand to another; nor can a learner work "ſo cheap as a ſkilful practiſed Artiſt can. As for ex- "ample, a practiſed Spinner ſhall ſpin a pound of "wool worth two ſhillings for ſix pence; but a learner "undertaking it for three pence ſhall make the wool "indeed into yarn, but not worth twelve pence. This "little hint is the model of the greateſt work in the "world, which is the making of England as conſider- "able for trade as Holland; for there is but a cer- "tain proportion of trade in the world, and Holland "is prepoſſeſſed of the greateſt part of it, and is "thought to have more ſkill and experience to ma- "nage it. Wherefore to bring England into Holland's "condition as to this particular, is the ſame as to ſend "all the Beggars about London into the Weſt-Country "to ſpin; where they ſhall only ſpoil the Clothiers "wool, and beggar the preſent Spinners at beſt; "but at worſt put the whole trade of the Country to "a ſtand, until the Hollander being more ready for "it, have ſnapt that with the reſt." Capt. Graunt proceeds then to obſerve, that not one in two thouſand are murthered in London, whereas in Paris few nights ſcape without their Tragedy. The reaſons of this he conceives to be two: one is the government and guard of the city by Citizens themſelves, and that alternately, no man ſettling into a trade for that employment: the other is, the natural and cuſtomary abhorrence of that inhumane crime and all bloodſhed, by moſt Engliſhmen; for of all that are executed, few are for murther. Beſides the great and frequent revolutions and changes in Government ſince the year 1650 have been with little bloodſhed, the uſurpers themſelves having executed few in compariſon, upon the account of diſturbing their innovations. In brief when any dead body is found in England, no Algebraiſt or Uncipherer of Letters can uſe more ſubtile ſuppoſitions and variety of conjectures to find out the demonſtration or cipher, than every common unconcerned perſon doth to find out the murtherers, and that that for ever, until it be done (8). He remarks, that not one in fifteen hundred dies lunatic (9). That few of thoſe, who die of the venereal diſeaſe, are ſet down, but diſguiſed under the conſumption &c (10). That the Rickets is a new diſeaſe both as to name and thing, and that from fourteen dying of it in 1634 it gradually encreaſed to above five hundred in 1660 (11). That there was another new diſeaſe appearing, called by the vulgar a ſtopping of the ſtomach, which increaſed in twenty years from ſix to near three hundred (12). "Hereupon, ſays he (13), I apprehended that this "ſtopping might be the Green ſickneſs; for as much as "I find few or none to have been returned upon that "account, altho' many be viſibly ſtained with it. Now "whether the ſame be forborn out of ſhame, I know "not; for ſince the world believes, that marriage "cures it, it may ſeem indeed a ſhame, that any maid "ſhould die uncured, when there are more males than "females, that is, an overplus of huſbands to all that "can be wives." He obſerves next, that the riſing of the lights (ſuppoſed in moſt caſes to be the fits of the mother) had alſo encreaſed in thirty years from ninety four to two hundred forty nine (14). That both the ſtopping of the ſtomach and riſing of the lights are probably reliques or depending upon the Rickets (15). That the ſtone ſeemed to decreaſe. That the gout ſtood at a ſtay (16). That the ſcurvy increaſed (17). That deaths by reaſon of agues were to thoſe cauſed by fevers, as one to forty (18). That abortives and ſtillborn were to thoſe that were chriſtned, as one to twenty (19). That not one woman in an hundred dies in child-bed, nor one of two hundred in her labour (20). That there had been in London within that Age four times of great mortality, viz. in the year 1592 and 1593, 1603, 1625, and 1636; whereof that of 1603 was the greateſt, there dying of the plague then 30561. That in the years 1603 and 1625 about a fifth part of the whole died, and eight times more than were born (21). That a fourth part more die of the plague than are ſet down (22). That the plague in 1603 laſted eight years; that in 1639 twelve years; but that in 1625 continued but one year (23). That alterations in the air do incomparably more operate as to the plague than the effluvia from the bodies of men. That purple fevers, ſmall pox, and other malignant diſeaſes forerun the plague a year, two or three (24). That a diſpoſition in the air towards the plague diſpoſes likewiſe women to abortions (25). That as about one fifth part of the whole people died in the great plague-years, ſo two other fifth parts fled (26). That whether the plague be great or ſmall, the city is fully repeopled within

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 311. and vol. 2. col. 810. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Pag. 25.

(3) Pag. 28, 29.

(4) Pag. 32.

(5) Pag. 33.

(6) Pag. 34.

(7) Pag. 37, 38, 39.

(8) Pag. 39, 40.

(9) Pag. 40.

(10) Pag. 44, 45.

(11) Pag. 46, 47.

(12) Pag. 50.

(13) Pag. 51.

(14) Pag. 51, 52.

(15) Pag. 54.

(16) Pag. 55, 56.

(17) Pag. 56.

(18) Ibid.

(19) Pag. 57.

(20) Pag. 58, 59.

(21) Pag. 64, 65.

(22) Pag. 66.

(23) Pag. 70.

(24) Pag. 70, 71.

(25) Pag. 74.

(26) Ibid.

was by trade an Haberdaſher of ſmall wares, and ſerved all the offices of the City as far as that of a Common-Council Man, which he held two years, and was Captain, and afterwards Major of the Train Bands. At laſt he laid down his trade, and all public employments, upon the account of his Religion; for though he was educated a Puritan, and afterwards profeſſed himſelf a Socinian, yet in the latter part of his life he declared himſelf of the Roman Catholic Religion, in which he died. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society.

within two years (27). That the more ſickly the year is, the leſs fertile it is of births (28). That it is falſe, that plagues always come in with Kings reigns (29). That Autumn is the moſt unhealthful ſeaſon (30). That in London there have been twelve Burials for eleven Chriſtnings: but on the contrary in the country ſixty three Chriſtnings for fifty two Burials (31). That the people in and about London may be ſuppoſed to be a fifteenth part of the people of England and Wales. That there were about ſix millions and an half of people in England and Wales. That the people in the Country double by procreation but in two hundred and eighty years, and in London in about ſeventy; the reaſon of which is, that many of the breeders leave the country, and that the breeders of London come from all parts of the Country, ſuch perſons breeding in the Country almoſt only who were born there, but in London multitude of others. That about ſix thouſand a year came up to London out of the Country. That in London about three die yearly out of eleven families. That there are about twenty five millions of acres of land in England and Wales (32). He then aſſigns the reaſon why the proportion of breeders in London to the reſt of the people is leſs than in the Country; and remarks, that in London there are more impediments of breeding than in the Country. That there are fourteen males for thirteen females in London, and in the Country but fifteen males for fourteen females (33). He then obſerves (34), that "the "Chriſtian Religion prohibiting polygamy, is more "agreeable to the Law of Nature, that is, the Law "of God, than Mahumetiſm and others that allow it. "For one man's having many women or wives by law "ſignifies nothing, unleſs there were many women to "one man in nature alſo. II. The obvious objection "hereunto is, that one horſe, bull, or ram having each "of them many females, do promote increaſe. To "which I anſwer, that although perhaps there be naturally even of theſe ſpecies more males than females; yet artificially, that is, by making geldings, "oxen, and weathers, there are fewer. From whence "it will follow, that when by experience it is found "how many ewes, (ſuppoſe twenty) one ram will ſerve, "we may know what proportion of male lambs to caſtrate or geld, viz. nineteen or thereabouts. For if "you emaſculate fewer, viz. but ten, you ſhall by promiſcuous copulation of each of thoſe ten with two "females, hinder the increaſe, ſo far as the admittance of two males will do it. But if you caſtrate "none at all, it is highly probable, that every of the "twenty males copulating with every of the twenty "females, there will be little or no conception in any "of them all. III. And this I take to be the trueſt "reaſon, why foxes, wolves, and other vermin animals, that are not gelt, increaſe not faſter than ſheep, "when as ſo many thouſands of theſe are daily "butchered, and very few of the other die otherwiſe "than of themſelves. IV. We have hitherto ſaid, "there are more males than females: we ſay next, "that the one exceed the other by about a thirteenth "part. So that altho' more men die violent deaths "than women, that is, more are ſlain in wars, killed "by miſchance, drowned at ſea, and die by the hand "of juſtice; moreover more men go to Colonies, and "travel into foreign parts, than women; and laſtly, "more remain unmarried than of women, as Fellows "of Colleges and Apprentices above eighteen, &c. "yet the ſaid thirteenth part difference bringeth the "buſineſs but to ſuch a paſs, that every woman may "have an huſband without the allowance of polygamy. Moreover altho' a man be prolific forty years, "and a woman but five and twenty, which makes the "males to be 560 to 325 females; yet the caſes above "named and the later marriage of the men reduce all "to an equality." He then remarks, that he had heard Phyſicians ſay, that they have two women patients to one man; which aſſertion ſeems the more probable, ſince women have either the green-ſickneſs, or other diſtempers, are ſick of breeding, abortions, childbearing, ſore breaſts, whites, obſtructions, fits of the mother, and the like. Now from this it ſhould follow, that more women ſhould die than men, if the number of burials anſwered in proportion to that of ſickneſſes. But this muſt be ſalved, either by alledging, that the Phyſicians cure thoſe ſickneſſes, ſo as few more die than if none were ſick; or elſe that men being more intemperate than women, die as much by reaſon of their vices, as women do by the infirmity of their ſex; and conſequently more males being born than females, more alſo die (35). He obſerves (36), "that from the difference between males "and females we ſee the reaſon of making eunuchs in "thoſe places, where Polygamy is allowed, the latter "being uſeleſs as to multiplication without the former, "as was ſaid before in the caſe of ſheep and other animals uſually gelt in thoſe countries. By conſequence "this practice of caſtration ſerves as well to promote "increaſe, as to meliorate the fleſh of thoſe beaſts that "ſuffer it. For that operation is equally practiſed "upon horſes, which are not uſed for food, as upon "thoſe that are. In Popiſh Countries, where polygamy is forbidden, if a greater number of males oblige themſelves to celibate, than the natural over-plus "or difference between them and females amounts "unto; then multiplication is hindered; for if there "be eight men to ten women, all of which eight men "are married to eight of the ten women, then the "other two bear no children, as either of admitting "no man at all, or elſe admitting men as whores, (that "is, more than one,) which commonly procreates no "more than if none at all had been uſed; or elſe ſuch "unlawful copulations beget conceptions but to fruſtrate them by procured abortions or ſecret murthers; "all which returns to the ſame reckoning. Now if "the ſame proportion of women oblige themſelves to "a ſingle life likewiſe, then ſuch obligation makes no "change in this matter of increaſe. From what has "been ſaid appears the reaſon why the Law is and "ought to be ſo ſtrict againſt fornications and adulteries; for if there were univerſal liberty, the increaſe "of mankind would be but like that of foxes at beſt. "Now for as much as Princes are not only powerful, "but rich, according to the number of their people, "(hands being the father, as lands are the mother and "womb of wealth) it is no wonder why States, by "encouraging marriage, and hindering licentiouſneſs, "advance their own intereſt, as well as preſerve the "Laws of God from contempt and violation." Capt. Graunt remarks then (37), that it is a bleſſing to mankind, that by this over-plus of males there is this natural bar to Polygamy; for in ſuch a ſtate women could not live in that purity and equality of expence with their huſbands, as now and here they do. The reaſon whereof is, not that the huſband cannot maintain as ſplendidly three as one; for he might, having three wives, live himſelf upon a quarter of his income, that is, in a parity with all three, as well as, having but one, live in a parity at half with her alone. But rather becauſe that to keep them all quiet with each other and himſelf, he muſt keep them all in greater awe and leſs ſplendor; which power he having, he will probably uſe it to keep them all as low as he pleaſes, and at no more coſt than makes for his own pleaſure; the pooreſt ſubjects (ſuch as this plurality of wives muſt be) being moſt eaſily governed. In the ninth chapter he treats of the Growth of the City, and remarks, that the ninety ſeven Pariſhes within and the ſixteen Pariſhes without the walls of the City of London increaſed in twenty years from ſeven to twelve, and in forty years from twenty three to fifty two. That the ſixteen Pariſhes had increaſed more than the ninety ſeven, the latter having increaſed but from nine to ten in the ſaid forty years. That the ten Out-Pariſhes had in fifty four years increaſed from one to four. That the ninety ſeven, ſixteen, and ten Pariſhes increaſed in fifty four years from two to five (38). That the City removes Weſtwards; for which he aſſigns the reaſons. That there were ſome Pariſhes in London two hundred

(27) Pag. 75.
(28) Pag. 78.
(29) Pag. 80.
(30) Ibid.
(31) Pag. 81, 82, 83.
(32) Pag. 83—88.
(33) Pag. 88—94.
(34) Pag. 95, & ſeqq.
(35) Pag. 98, 99.
(36) Pag. 101, & ſeqq.
(37) Pag. 104, 105.
(38) Pag. 106, 111.

Society. Beſides the treatiſe abovementioned he wrote Obſervations on the Advance of Exciſe, and a tract upon Religion; but theſe were never printed. He died on Eaſter Even April the 18th 1674, and was interred four days after in St. Dunſtan's Church in Fleetſtreet, his body being attended by a great many perſons of diſtinction and learning, and particularly Sir William Petty. Mr. Wood tells us (a), that he was "an ingenious and ſtudious perſon, generally beloved, a faithful friend, a great peace-maker, and one that had often been choſen for his prudence and juſtneſs an arbitrator. But above all his excellent working head was much commended, and the rather for this reaſon, that it was for the public good of learning."

(a) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 311. 2d edit. London 1721.

times as big as others. That the City of London and Suburbs being equally divided, would make an hundred Pariſhes about the largeneſs of Chriſt-Church, Black-Friars, or Coleman-Street. That there were about 24000 teeming women in the ninety ſeven, ſixteen, and ten Pariſhes in and about London. That about three die yearly out of eleven families containing each eight perſons. That there were about 12000 families within the walls of London. That the houſing of the ſixteen and ten Suburb-Pariſhes was thrice as big as that of the ninety ſeven Pariſhes within the walls. That the number of ſouls in the ninety ſeven, ſixteen, and ten Out-Pariſhes was about 384000, whereof 199000 were males, and 185000 females. That in the ninety ſeven, ſixteen, and ten Pariſhes there were near 70000 fighting men, that is, men between the ages of ſixteen and fifty ſix. That Weſtminſter, Lambeth, Iſlington, Hackney, Redriff, Stepney, and Newington contained as many people as the ninety ſeven Pariſhes within the walls, and conſequently one fifth of the whole pile, ſo that in and about London there were about 81000 fighting men, and 460000 in all (39). That Adam and Eve in 5610 years might have by the ordinary proportion of procreation begotten more people than were then probably upon the face of the earth; and conſequently the world cannot be older than the Scriptures repreſent it to be. That every wedding one with another produces four children. That in ſeveral places the proportion between the males and females differ. That in ninety years there were juſt as many males as females buried within a certain Pariſh in Hampſhire. That a Pariſh conſiſting of about 2700 inhabitants had in 90 years but 1059 more Chriſtnings than Burials. That there came yearly to dwell in London about 6000 ſtrangers out of the Country, which ſwelled the Burials about 200 a year. That in the country there had been five Chriſtnings for four Burials. That the proportion between the greateſt and leaſt mortalities in the Country are greater than the ſame in the city. That the country air is more capable of good and bad impreſſions than that of London. That the difference of births is greater in the Country than at London. That in the Country but about one of fifty dies yearly, but at London one of thirty, over and above the plague (40). That London was not then ſo healthful as formerly, which he thinks was occaſioned partly by its being more populous, but chiefly becauſe he had heard that ſixty years before few ſea-coals were burnt in London, which were in our Author's time univerſally uſed. For I have heard, ſays he (41), that Newcaſtle is more unhealthful than other places, and that many people cannot at all endure the ſmoke of London, not only for its unpleaſantneſs, but for the ſuffocations, which it cauſes. He obſerves that the art of making gold, if it were much known, would only exalt ſilver into the place, which gold now poſſeſſes; and if it were known but to ſome one perſon, he could not, nay durſt not enjoy it. That the elements of true policy are to underſtand thoroughly the lands and hands of a Country (42). He concludes with remarking, that if all theſe things were clearly and truly known, "it would appear that how ſmall a part of the people work upon neceſſary labours and callings, viz. how many women and children do juſt nothing, only learning to ſpend what others get. How many are mere voluptuaries, and as it were mere gameſters by trade: how many people by puzzling poor people with unintelligible notions in Divinity and Philoſophy: how many by perſuading credulous, delicate, and litigious perſons, that their bodies are out of tune, and in danger: how many by fighting as ſoldiers: how many by miniſtries of vice and ſin: how many by trades of meer pleaſure or ornaments; and how many in a way of lazy attendance, &c. upon others. And on the other ſide, how few are employed in raiſing and working neceſſary food and covering: and of the ſpeculative men how few do ſtudy nature and things; the more ingenious not advancing much further than to write and ſpeak wittily about theſe matters." T.

(39) Pag. 111-127.

(40) Pag. 127-142.

(41) Pag. 142.

(42) Pag. 145-150.

GRAWERUS (ALBERTUS) born at Meſecow in the Mark of Brandenburg in the year 1575, has been very much eſteemed amongſt the Divines of the Augſburg Confeſſion. He may be compared to thoſe ſoldiers of fortune, who paſſing through all the degrees in the army arrive at laſt at the higheſt poſts. He was at firſt only a ſchool-maſter in Hungary (a) [A]. But when the City of Agria was taken (b) by the Turks he retired to Wittemberg; whence he went to Eiſleben to be Principal of the College there: he was afterwards made Dean of Mansfeld (c); then he was admitted Doctor of Divinity in the Univerſity of Jena (d), and two years after he was made Profeſſor of Divinity there. Laſtly, in the year 1616, he obtained the office of Superintendent of the country of Weimar (e). He died November the 30th 1617 (f). He was the moſt paſſionate Divine that ever was; never did a man write more paſſionately againſt thoſe of the Geneva Confeſſion. The Miſſionaries quote him chiefly [B], when they deſign to ſhew the hatred

(a) Firſt at Scepuſ, and afterwards in the year 1597 at Caſſovia.

(b) In the year 1599.

(c) In the year 1607.

(d) In the year 1609.

(e) Ex Spizelio in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 39. See alſo Paul. Freher. Theatr. pag. 324, 395.

(f) Freher. Theatr. pag. 395. Spizelius ſets down the year 1616.

[A] He was at firſt only a Schoolmaſter in Hungary.] This is the notion we ſhould have of him, if we only conſulted Spizelius: but when we examine his funeral Sermons (1), we find that Baron Gregory Harwath, having founded a new College at Scepuz (2), made Grawerus Principal of it, at Giles Hunnius's recommendation, and that Grawerus taught Philoſophy and Divinity in that College.

(1) Apud Freherum, in Theat. pag. 394, 394.

(2) In the year 1595.

[B] The Miſſionaries quote him chiefly.] When Father Adam wrote a Book againſt Monſieur Daillé, he quoted I do not know how many Germans, a Giles Hunnius, a Zephirius, a Gibelin, a Philip Nicholas, a Granverus (3), who load the Reformed with a thouſand injuries. He inſiſted chiefly upon a Treatiſe of Grawerus the moſt abſurd abſurdities of the Calvinian abſurdities (4). Here follows Monſieur Daillé's wiſe anſwer, but a little too diſobliging for the Author I mention in this article. "Theſe are brethren who are in "a paſſion; we muſt forgive their anger, and comfort ourſelves by the teſtimony which their very "paſſion bears in favour of our cauſe, in this con"troverſy in which we are engaged with them. If "they were not in the wrong, they would not abuſe "us. It is certainly their error that provokes them; "truth is milder and more modeſt. For that Luther "and his diſciples were in a paſſion when they wrote "all thoſe ſhameful and horrible paſſages, which you "have collected from their writings, appears ſufficiently from the folly and impertinence of their own "words: as for inſtance, to omit all the reſt, that ri-

(3) Thus it is in Monſ. Daillé's Replique; but it ſhould have been Grawerus.

(4) The Latin title is, Abſurda abſurdorum abſurdiſſima, Calviniſtica abſurda, hoc eſt invicta Demonſtratio Logica & Theologica aliquot horrendorum paradoxorum Calviniani dogmatis in articulis de perſona Chriſti, Cœna Domini Baptiſmo, & Prædeſtinatione, Printed at Jena in 1612, 4to. This is the ſecond edition.

tred and animoſity there is between the two Proteſtant Communions. He was boiſterous not only in the controverſies carried on by word of mouth, but alſo in his writings [C], which are very numerous [D], moſt of them againſt the Reformed. He wrote alſo againſt the Socinians, and againſt the Church of Rome.

" diculous title of a book of one of them, which you " was ſure not to forget. The moſt abſurd Abſurdities of " the Calvinian Abſurdities. A learned man would " not ſpeak ſo ſillily, if he were cool." He finiſhes this chapter in theſe words. God be praiſed, they are not all ſo paſſionate as your Gibelins and your Granveres. There are ſome of milder temper, who will hear reaſon; and the late Doctor Calixtus a Divine of Helmſtad, the moſt learned of all the Lutherans of his time, has ſufficiently ſhewed it in two or three books * which he publiſhed upon that ſubject (5).

* Judicium de Controv. Luther. & Ref. ann. 1650. Deſiderium & Studium Concord. Eccleſ. ann. 1651.

(5) Daillé, Replique à Adam, Part 2. ch. 14. pag. m. 86.

Obſerve that Monſieur Daillé might have charged the Jeſuit Adam with tranſlating the title of our Grawerus's work erroneouſly. The true tranſlation is as follows. The Calvinian abſurdities more abſurd than any other Abſurdity.

[C] He was boiſterous . . . in the Controverſies carried on by word of mouth, . . . and in his writings.] He had a conference with Amling in the year 1604 in the Caſtle of Schotchwiz, and publiſhed it with notes, which breathe nothing but his zeal for the Lutheran Religion. Veritatis Lutheranæ amore notulis quibuſdam aſperſis evulgatum (Colloquium cum Amlingo). He had never exerted himſelf ſo ſtrongly in behalf of his party as he did on that occaſion. Singulari zelo & fervore Spiritus ſancti motus ſtrenuè & maſcule adverſus hoſtium quorumvis cohortes depugnavit, nec quicquam omiſit quo veritatis cœleſtis doctrina aſſeri propugnarique queat, CUM PRIMIS in graviſſimo illo Colloquio cum Amlingo habito (6). i. e. " Being acted by an extra- " ordinary zeal, and by the aſſiſtance of the Holy " Ghoſt, he fought ſtoutly and bravely againſt all the " troops of any enemies whatſoever, nor did he omit " the leaſt thing that was proper to aſſert and defend " the doctrine of the heavenly truth, eſpecially in his " conference with Amling." Judge how paſſionate he was againſt Sebaſtian Lamius, whom he convicted of Calviniſm in a Synod. Quemadmodum etiam in Synodo Hungarico-Keyſmarcenſi anno 95 habita Sebaſtianum Lamium heterodoxiæ Calvinianæ convicit (7). He had no doubt impeached him for a falſe brother, who under the name of a Lutheran Miniſter was hatching the errors of a Calviniſt; that alone was ſufficient to exaſperate a cool man. And beſides, he diſputed with him in a Synod. This circumſtance of the place could alone raiſe his paſſion. Let us not forget to obſerve, that he has been called the ſhield and the ſword of Lutheraniſm (8).

(6) Spizelius, in Templo Hon. reſerato, pag. 43.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Idem, pag. 40.

[D] His works are very numerous.] The titles only will give you a notion of his exceſſive zeal. Bellum Calvini & Jeſu Chriſti; i. e. " The war between " Calvin and Jeſus Chriſt;" printed at Magdeburg in the year 1605. Harmonia præcipuorum Calvinianorum & Photinianorum; i. e. " The Agreement be- " tween the chief Calviniſts, and the Photinians;" printed at Jena in the year 1612, in 4to. I have already mentioned his Abſurda abſurdorum &c. His Anti-Lubinus, hoc eſt Elenchus paradoxorum & emblematum Calviniſticorum D. Eilhardi Lubini, de prima cauſa & natura mali; i. e. " A ſummary of the " Calviniſtical Paradoxes and Emblems of Eilhard " Lubinus concerning the nature and firſt cauſe of " evil;" printed at Magdeburg in the year 1604 in 4to, is a work againſt the Calviniſts, though Eilhard Lubinus always lived a Lutheran, as Baillet aſſerts (9); for no doubt Grawerus ſuſpected him of being of Calvin's opinion upon ſome ſubjects. I omit the titles of his other works; you will find them in Spizelius (10), and in Paul Freher (11).

(9) In tom. 1. of the Anti, pag. 351.

(10) In Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 40.

(11) Theatr. Viror. Illuſt. pag. 395.

☞GREAVES (JOHN) a very learned Engliſh Writer in the ſeventeenth Century, was eldeſt ſon of Mr. John Greaves, Rector of Colmore near Ailresford in Hampſhire (a), and the moſt eminent ſchoolmaſter of that county (b). He was born at Colmore in the year 1602 (c), and being well grounded in grammar-learning, was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford in 1617 (d). July the 6th 1621 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e); and in 1624, being of Maſter's ſtanding, became a Candidate for a Fellowſhip of Merton-College, and on account of his uncommon ſkill in Philoſophy and polite Literature was the firſt of the five who were elected (f). June the 25th 1628 he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (g). Having now read over all the Greek and Latin writers with great attention, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of natural Philoſophy and Mathematics; and having contracted an intimate friendſhip with Mr. Henry Briggs, Savilian Profeſſor of Geometry in the Univerſity of Oxford, Dr. John Bainbridge, Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy there, and Mr. Peter Turner, a Senior Fellow of his College, who afterwards ſucceeded Mr. Briggs in the Profeſſorſhip of Geometry at Oxford, he was animated by their example to proſecute the ſtudy of the Mathematics with indefatigable induſtry. And not content to have read over the writings of Copernicus, Regiomontanus, Purbach, Tycho Brahe, Kepler, and other celebrated Aſtronomers of that and the preceding age, he made the antient Greek, Arabian, and Perſian Authors in that Science familiar to him, having before gained an accurate ſkill in the Oriental Languages (b). His reputation began now to be ſo conſiderable, that in 1630 he was choſen Profeſſor of Geometry in Greſham College at London, upon the reſignation of Mr. Peter Turner; and at the ſame time held his Fellowſhip of Merton-College (i). By means of Mr. Turner he was introduced into the acquaintance and favour of Dr. William Laud, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Chancellor of the Univerſity of Oxford (k). He had now formed a reſolution of travelling into foreign countries; and it appears that about the year 1635, before his voyage to the Eaſt, he went to Paris, and to Leyden [A], where he contracted a friendſhip with the celebrated James Golius. But his grand deſign was to viſit the Eaſtern Countries, which by means of the Archbiſhop being enabled to do

(a) Vita Joannis Gravii, ſcriptore Thomâ Smith, S.T.D. p. 3. printed among Vitæ eruditiſſimorum & illuſtrium Virorum, ſcriptore Thomâ Smith, S.T.D. & Eccleſiæ Anglicanæ Presbytero, edit. London 1707, in 4to.

(b) Idem, ibid. and Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 156. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Smith, ubi ſupra.

(d) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(e) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 218.

(f) Smith, pag. 4.

(g) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 240.

(b) Smith, pag. 5.

(i) Idem, pag. 6.

(k) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 157.

[A] It appears, that about the year 1635 before his voyage to the Eaſt, he went to Paris and to Leyden.] Dr. Smith (1) was at a loſs to determine, whether our Author went to Paris and Leyden before or after his voyage to the Eaſt. But it is evident, that he was at Paris in 1635 from a paſſage in a Letter of Claudius Hardy to him dated in that city September 1ſt 1641, where he ſays, Dubium eſſe tibi potuiſſe non exiſtimo, quin de tuo Reditu in Europam maximum perciperem gaudium, Vir eruditiſſime, pro eo affectu quo te colui, cum apud nos degeres. . . . . Ante ANNOS SEX cognovi te ſtudioſiſſimum Linguæ Perſicæ.

(1) Vita Joannis Gravii, pag. 7.

do [B], he embarked in the River of Thames in 1637 for Leghorn, from whence he proceeded to Rome, where he accurately viewed the venerable remains of Antiquity; and it appears from his Note-book, that he not only wrote down the inſcriptions, but likewiſe meaſured the pillars and other monuments there, and took a draught of them, particularly of Ceſcius's Pyramid and the Pantheon. He viewed likewiſe the Catacombs, and examined all the principal Cabinets and Muſeums in that City. Here he became acquainted with Lucas Holſtenius, Keeper of the Vatican Library, Athanaſius Kircher, and Gaſpar Bertius, a celebrated Aſtronomer, who informed him, that he had found by repeated obſervations with a large inſtrument of Clavius's, that the altitude of the pole at Rome was forty one degrees and forty ſix minutes. From Rome he went to Padua, where he was introduced into the acquaintance of Francis Urſati, John Rhodius, and Andrew Moretti, Profeſſors there. Hence he went to Florence, where he ſtaid a few weeks, and afterwards to Leghorn, whence he embarked for Conſtantinople. He arrived there about April 1638 [C]; and in the beginning of September following embarked [B] His grand deſign was to viſit the Eaſtern Countries, which by means of the Archbiſhop being inabled to do.] Mr. Wood (2), who is groſly miſtaken in placing our Author's voyage to the Eaſt in 1633, informs us, that the Archbiſhop "ſent him to travel into the Eaſtern "parts of the world to obtain Books of the Languages "for him." And Dr. Smith obſerves (3), that Mr. Greaves furniſhed himſelf with quadrants and other inſtruments neceſſary for taking the altitudes and diſtances of the Stars and the latitudes of Cities, for meaſuring the Pyramids, and making obſervations of the Eclipſes, at his own expence, having in vain applied himſelf for the patronage and aſſiſtance of the Magiſtrates of the City of London, whoſe honour and advantage he deſigned to conſult in this voyage; but that he was very probably aſſiſted by the Archbiſhop, who gave him Letters of Recommendation to Sir Peter Wyche, Embaſſador from King Charles I, to the Port, and a full power to purchaſe at whatever price he thought proper any manuſcripts of value, eſpecially in the Arabic Language. Mr. Greaves likewiſe in his Letter dated at Conſtantinople Aug. 2, 1638, and probably addreſſed to Mr. Peter Turner, obſerves, that the City of London had failed him in his expectations of the contributions towards mathematical inſtruments; and that he had been neceſſitated to ſell moſt of his Books he brought with him; but that the love and care of his brothers ſtraining their own occaſions to ſupply his, had enabled him in deſpite of the City to go on with his deſigns.

(2) Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 157.

(3) Ubi ſupra, pag. 7.

[C] He arrived there about April 1638.] Auguſt the 2d following he wrote the following Letter from that City, the original of which is in the Savilian Library at Oxford, tho' extremely worn and effaced in two or three paſſages.

"Sir,

"I received your Letters of February the 26th "about the midſt of July, and with thoſe the expec- "tation of Clemens, with the Catena upon Job; both "which, according to his Grace's inſtruction, I ſhould "have preſented to the Patriarch, with all obſervance "and reſpect, if his death had not prevented the deli- "very. Upon the 27th of June, by expreſs com- "mand from the Grand Signior, he was as a Traytor "ſtrangled, and his body thrown into the Sea; it be- "ing pretended, that he had ſent Letters to the Em- "peror of Muſcovia, by means whereof ſome two years "ſince the Muſcovite ſurprized a Town upon the Black "Sea belonging to the Turk. His accuſers were men "of his own coat, Greek Biſhops (bred up under the "Jeſuits) whereof Bereas one of the chief of them "hath ſucceeded in his place; who, that it may ap- "pear whoſe diſciple he hath been, hath made ſuch "combuſtion in the Greek Church, that I think the "like hath ſeldom been. For beſides the anathema- "tizing of * * * for being a Lutheran, he hath put "in priſon, and partly in chains, above fifty Biſhops "and Prieſts of his followers and adherents, whereof "ſome he hath ſtrangled. The Dutch Embaſſador "hath been called in queſtion by him before their "Divan, to have received from the Church two hun- "dred thouſand crowns in the time of former diſſen- "ſions, beſides ſtore of MSS. belonging to the Patri- "arch. I my ſelf might have fallen into the ſame "danger, if by the mediation of ſome Greeks of my "acquaintance I had not prevented the ſtorm. For hav- "ing procured out of a blind and ignorant Monaſtery, "which depends upon the Patriarch, fourteen good "manuſcripts of the Fathers, I was compelled pri- "vately to reſtore the Books, and loſe my money, for "fear of a worſe inconvenience. Yet if Cyril had "lived a little longer, I might have ſent to my Lord's "Grace not only theſe, but many other choice copies. "For my purpoſe was to have gone to Mount Athos, "being from thence but four days journey by Sea, "whither I ſhould have been recommended by the "Patriarch, and have had liberty of entering into all "the Libraries in that place, to have collected a Cata- "logue of ſuch Books as either were not printed, or "elſe by the help of ſome there might have been more "correctly ſet out. Theſe (by diſpenſing with the "Anathema's, which the former Patriarchs have laid "upon all Greek Libraries, thereby to preſerve the "Books from the Latins) the Patriarch purpoſed to "have preſented to his Grace, for the better proſecu- "tion of his Grace's honourable deſigns in the Edition "of the Greek Authors. But the ſame hand, which "took away the Patriarch's life, ſpoiled my endea- "vours (the beſt that I can ever hope for) of ſerving "his Grace in this particular. Though I preſume in "Arabic Books my Lord hath received a remonſtrance "of my care, by thoſe, which the Companies have "ſent from thence. It is true, many more very "choice ones might be procured with inquiry, and "watching after opportunities, if they would give the "price. Some few of thoſe, which they thought to "be overvalued, I have purchaſed at exceſſive rates. "You may wonder how I have been able to do it, "ſince the City of London hath failed me in my ex- "pectations of their contributions towards mathema- "tical inſtruments. I have been neceſſitated to ſell "moſt of the Books I brought with me. But the "love and care of my brothers ſtraining their own oc- "caſions to ſupply mine have inabled me, in deſpite of "the city, to go on with my deſigns. You may there- "fore hope to ſee moſt of the Greek Mathematicians, "tranſlated into Arabic, brought home. Amongſt "others I have procured Ptolemy's Almageſt, the fair- "eſt Book, that I have ever ſeen, ſtoln by a Spahy "(as I am informed) out of the King's Library in the "Seraglio. Whereby you ſee there is a poſſibility of "having alſo thoſe Greek and Latin Authors (which I "mentioned in my former Letters to be buried in the "Seraglio) if the * * were handſomly followed by an "Embaſſador. My purpoſes, I hope, ſhortly I ſhall "put in execution, being this month to go with the "* * for Egypt. The Eclipſe of the Moon in Dec. next "will be obſerved (if it pleaſe God) at Bagdad, Con- "ſtantinople, Smyrna, and Alexandria; all which "places I have furniſhed with convenient inſtruments, "and given them inſtructions according to Tycho "Brahe's, how they ſhould obſerve. I preſume at "Bagdad it will be punctually and carefully done, "ſince the Phyſician to the King's favourite, a Chri- "ſtian, hath undertaken the buſineſs, who hopes to "get reputation by doing it in the ſight of the Grand "Signior and of his Army. I doubt not, it will be "as carefully obſerved in England, and could wiſh (as "by my Letters I earneſtly deſired) that the ſame time "obſervations might be made at the Azores. Sir, I "grow tedious, and therefore will only kiſs your hands, "thanking you for many former favours to me. And "tho' in theſe particulars I preſume I ſhall give my embarked for Egypt; but being obliged to put in at Rhodes, he went aſhore, and taking with him a braſs Aſtrolabe of Gemma Friſius, becauſe he durſt not make uſe of any larger inſtrument, for fear of giving ſuſpicion to the Turks, he found the elevation of the pole there to be thirty ſeven degrees and fifty minutes (l). At laſt he arrived at Alexandria, where he ſtaid four or five months, and made a great number of uſeful obſervations [D]. Hence he went twice (m) to Grand Cairo to meaſure the pyramids, carrying with him a radius of ten foot, moſt accurately divided into 10,000 parts, beſides ſome other inſtruments for the fuller diſcovery of the truth (n). While he was there, he made the meaſure of the foot obſerved by all Nations, in one of the rooms under the ſaid pyramids, with his name John Gravius under it (o). Having made a curious collection of Greek, Arabian, and Perſic manuſcripts, (a catalogue of which he afterwards ſent to Claudius Hardy and James Golius at their requeſt) with a great number of gems, coins, and other valuable antiquities, he returned to Leghorn about Midſummer 1639; from whence he proceeded to Florence, where he was received with great civility by Ferdinand II, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, to whom he inſcribed a Latin Poem written by him at

(l) See his Account of the Latitude of Conſtantinople and Rhodes.

(m) In 1638 and 1639.

(n) See his Preface to his Pyramidographia.

(o) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 157.

" friends ſatisfaction, yet have I not ſatisfied my ſelf, " in that I have not as yet, though after diligent en- " quiry, found any opportunity of performing your " worthy deſigns. I ſhall endeavour ſo much the more, " both in Egypt and Italy, to give you a remonſtrance " of my care of your inſtructions, by how much your " many favours, and in particular your late recom- " mendations of me to his Grace, have made me

" Your affectionate Friend to ſerve you,

" From Conſtantinople John Greaves."

" Auguſt 2d 1638.

[D] Made a great number of uſeful obſervations.] Several of thoſe are noted down in a manuſcript of his in the Savilian Library at Oxford, which was bought with other manuſcripts of his of the widow of Dr. Nicholas Greaves, our Author's brother by Mr. Richard Stubbes, Rector of the Eaſt-Hamſted in Berkſhire, and formerly Fellow of Wadham College in Oxford (4). Dr. Thomas Smith in a Letter dated at New-College in Oxford Decemb. 15th 1683 ſent to the Royal Society an extract from that manuſcript, which we ſhall give the Reader from the ninth vol. p. 80, & ſeqq. of the Letters of that Society. It is as follows:

(4) Vide T. Smith Præfat. pag. ix. x. in Vitas quorundam eruditiſſimorum & illuſtr. Virorum.

" Obſervations aſtronomical and geographical made " in Egypt by the moſt learned Mr. John Greaves " collected out of his papers.

" Declinatio Acus Magneticæ a Meridiano Alexan- " driæ Occidentem verſus 5°. 45′ e multis obſervationi- " bus iiſque accuratis.

" Altitudo Poli Alexandriæ 30°. 10′; licet in iiſdem " Ephemeridibus alibi dicit 30°. 5′; alibi tantum 3 " minut.

" The Sun's Meridian Altitude taken at Galata by " Conſtantinople 11th March 1637, S. V. 49° : $\frac{11}{100}$. " 49° : 18 : 36″ ☉ in ♈ 1° : 5′. Declin. Bor. 0° : " 26′. Altitudo Poli Conſtantinopoli 41° : 7′½.

" At Rhodes Sept. 11th 1638. 53 : $\frac{53}{60}$. 53. 53.

" At Alexandria 19th Decemb. 1638, 35° : $\frac{201}{300}$, " 35°. 40′ : 12″.

" Snellius ſuppoſes the Altitude of the Æquinoctial " at Alexandria to be 58° : 58′; and ſo the Pole to be " raiſed there but 30° : 2′.

" The Variation of the Needle at Rome March " 17th, S. V. three quarters of a Degree Eaſt.

" Of Leghorn March 14th, S. V. 50′ to the Eaſt.

" The Obliquity of the Zodiac 1639, 23° : 30′ : 15″.

" The Colours of the Planets and of the Stars in " Egypt not different at all from what the antient Aſtro- " nomers obſerved, and from what we ſee in England.

" At the riſing and ſetting of the Sun in Egypt, eſ- " pecially about Alexandria, there is great ſtore of " vapours.

" At a good diſtance from the Horizon the body of " the Sun grows ruddy, and appears bigger than it " uſually ſeems to be in England.

" Few nights, and thoſe without wind, that he " could ſee the Stars near the Horizon; for which he " alledgeth this reaſon, becauſe when the winds blow, " they cauſe great quantity of ſand, which oftentimes " makes the ſky to look as when it is hazy weather in " England.

" He could obſerve no ſpots in the Sun for ſeveral " weeks together in the latter end of January, Fe- " bruary, and March. On the 5th of April three " little ſpots in the Sun, two cloſe together.

" The Diameter of the Sun taken January 25th, " S. V. 2ʰ : $\frac{40}{100}$ p. m. and ſo again 4ʰ. p. m. was " 35′. 25″.

" January 29th, S. V. 1638 about 5ʰ. p. m. he " found the ſame Diameter.

" His eyes were hurt with gazing upon the Sun, " ſo that for ſeveral days after there appeared to the " eye, with which he had obſerved, as it were a com- " pany of crows flying together in the air at a good " diſtance.

" Poſidonius, as Cleomedes writes, obſerved the Alti- " tude of Canobus at Alexandria to be 7½: he obſerv- " ed it to be but 6 and almoſt ½.

" The Jewiſh Paſſover began on Monday night 8th " April S. V. 1639 at Alexandria; ſo that Tueſday " 9th April was the 15th of Niſan.

" At this day he ſays there be but four channels or " Oſtia of Nilus; two natural, Damiata and Roſetto, " which make the Delta, and part ſome 20 miles be- " low Cairo; and two artificial, the one on the South " ſide of Alexandria, and hath its beginning South 30 " miles above Roſetto. By this all merchandize was " antiently brought to Alexandria, which now comes " from Roſetto to Giermas with great uncertainty by " reaſon that Bocca of Nile is very dangerous, both " becauſe of the N. W. and N. N. W. winds, which " barr in all thoſe ſhips and veſſels; as alſo for the " ſands and ſhallows, which at the overflowing of the " Nile good ſhips may paſs. The other artificial cha- " nel is at Boulas, where it falls (into the Delta) into a " ſinus of the Sea, that is in the middle way between " Roſetta and Damiata, and the like to that at Madiga, " which is the mid-way between Alexandria and Roſet- " to. Between theſe two places about forty miles Engliſh.

" Roſetto lies from Alexandria Eaſt by South.

" The courſes of Nilus, (allowing the ſeveral turn- " ings,) S. S. E. Wherefore Memphis and Alexandria " cannot be in the ſame Meridian, nor Rhodus; from " Rhodus they ſail S. S. E. to Alexandria.

" On land about 3 miles from Shiemon you may ſee " the Pyramids, which lie Weſt of it at the diſtance " of between 50 and 60 miles.

" Ptolomy's Pillar at Alexandria, as it is commonly " called, is of Corinthian work. He ſays, that he " had ſeen two or three Greek characters on the Plin- " thus to the Sea ſide: on the Weſt ſide of the Plin- " thus ΔΙΟ ΟΣ.

" At Cairo, where they hatch chickens by an artifi- " cial warmth, they know by looking on a new laid " egg of what colour the chicken will be, as alſo " whether it will be a cock or a hen."

This paper was read before the Royal Society Dec. 19th 1683, and referred to the conſideration of Mr. Edmund Halley, who made his report on the 9th of January 168¾, and collected from it the Latitude of Conſtantinople to be 41°. 7′½ N. that of Rhodes to be 30°. 47′ N. and that of Alexandria to be 31°. 4′ N. The very learned and ingenious Mr. John Machin, Secretary of the Royal Society, and Profeſſor of Aſtronomy at Greſham College, having conſidered this paper of Mr. Greaves, has communicated to us the following obſervations. " I make the obliquity of the " Ecliptic about the years 1637 and 1638 at its me- " dium to be 23°. 29′. 20″. Mr. Greaves in " this paper makes it to be 23°. 30.′ 15″. The " obſervations of Mr. Greaves will make the La- " titude of Conſtantinople by the Sun to be 41°. 08′; at Alexandria in 1638, in which he exhorted that Prince to clear thoſe ſeas from pirates, who extremely infeſted them. At Florence he contracted an intimacy with Robert Dudley, who was ſtiled in Italy Duke of Northumberland [E], who informed him, that after a careful obſervation, and allowing for the refractions and parallax according to Tycho Brahe's method, he found the elevation of the pole there to be forty three degrees and forty ſix minutes. From Florence Mr. Greaves went to Rome, in order to repeat the obſervations which he had made there before, and to make new ones, and deſigned to have continued there ſeveral months; but the deſire of returning to his own country induced him to ſhorten his ſtay there; upon which he went to Leghorn, where he embarked for England, and arrived there in the ſummer of the year 1640 (p). November the 14th 1643 (q), upon the deceaſe of Dr. John Bainbridge, he was choſen Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy at Oxford, and Superior Reader of Linacre's Lecture in Merton-College (r), and had a diſpenſation from the King for holding his Fellowſhip of that College, becauſe the ſtipend belonging to his Profeſſorſhip was extremely leſſened during the civil wars (s). In 1645 he propoſed a method for reforming the calendar, by omitting the intercalary day for forty years to come [F]. In 1646 he publiſhed at London in 8vo his Pyramidographia: or a Deſcription of the Pyramids in Egypt [G]; and in 1647 at London in 8vo his Diſcourſe of the Romane foot and denarius; from whence, as from two principles, the meaſures and weights uſed by the Antients may be deduced [H]. November the 9th 1648 (t) he was ejected by the Parliament Viſitors from the Profeſſorſhip of Aſtronomy and Fellowſhip of Merton-College, and obliged to quit the Univerſity, on pretence of his avoiding an anſwer to the articles alledged againſt him [I]. Dr. Walter (p) Smith, pag. 13, 14.

" of

(q) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiquit. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 42.

(r) Idem, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 157.

(s) Smith, pag. 15.

(t) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univerſ. Oxon. lib. 1. pag. 413.

" of Rhodes 36°. 4′6⅔; of Alexandria 31°. 5′¾. by " Canobus 31°: 7′½. The Sun's place in this paper is " ſaid to be on March the 11th. St. v. in ♈. 1°. 5′, " and the Declination North 0′. 26′; whereas at that " time I make the Longitude in ♈ 1°. 9′. 46″, and " the Declination 0°. 27′. 48″."

[E] Robert Dudley, who was ſtiled in Italy Duke of Northumberland.] He was ſon of Robert Earl of Leiceſter by Douglas Howard, daughter of William Lord Howard of Effingham, and widow of John Lord Sheffield. This Gentleman endeavoured to prove his legitimacy in the beginning of the reign of King James I, in order to inherit the eſtate and titles of his father and his uncle Ambroſe Earl of Warwick; but miſs'd of his deſign thro' the endeavours of his father's widow, and therefore returned to Florence, where he had the title of Duke of Northumberland conferred upon him by Ferdinand II, Emperor of Germany, and became an excellent Mathematician, Phyſician, and Navigator, and ſkilled in all arts and ſciences. He wrote Arcano del Mare, printed at Florence 1630 and 1646 in two volumes in fol. (5).

(5) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 126, 127.

[F] In 1645 he propoſed a method for reforming the Calendar by omitting the intercalary day for forty years to come.] This paper was publiſh'd by Dr. Thomas Smith in the Philoſophical Tranſactions for the month of October 1699.

[G] In 1646 he publiſhed at London in 8*vo his* Pyramidographia, Or a Deſcription of the Pyramids in Egypt.] He made a great number of alterations and additions in a copy of this Book, which he preſented to his brother Mr. Thomas Greaves, now repoſited in the Savilian Library at Oxford. This Treatiſe is reprinted in the ſecond volume of Churchill's Collection of Voyages; and was tranſlated into French, and printed in the firſt volume of Relations de divers Voyages publiſhed by Monſr. Thevenot. Dr. Thomas Smith had ſome thoughts of tranſlating it and the Diſcourſe of the Roman Foot and Denarius into Latin for the ſake of foreigners (6); but this deſign was never executed. Soon after the publication of the Pyramidographia, ſome Animadverſions were written upon it by a Gentleman of great learning, as Dr. Smith ſtiles him (7), tho' he does not name him; in which the animadverter endeavoured to invalidate our Author's obſervations, as if his inſtruments had been defective, or not well applied, thro' the neglect of ſome circumſtance neceſſary to be obſerved in an accurate enquiry. Dr. Smith remarks (8), that theſe animadverſions did not want learning, but were ill grounded and unjuſt; and that he ſhould have wondered how the Author would ſuffer them to eſcape him, to the injury of his friend's reputation, which he had ſo juſtly acquired by his Book, but that it appears from the hiſtory of times, that he wrote theſe Animadverſions out of the reſentment to Mr. Greaves, who had refuſed him his intereſt for procuring a place, which he ſollicited, but in vain. Mr. Greaves upon ſeeing theſe objections, applied himſelf with the utmoſt care to the reviſal of his Book, and by repeated calculations found, that he had aſſigned too ſmall an height to the largeſt of the Pyramids, which he now diſcovered to be four hundred and ninety nine foot high, inſtead of four hundred and eighty one, as he had affirmed in his Book p. 69. line 15. This correction he ſent in a Letter to Dr. Charles Scarborough.

(6) Smith, pag. 22.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Ibid.

[H] His Diſcourſe of the Roman Foot and Denarius &c.] It is dedicated to his truly noble and learned Friend John Selden Eſq; Burgeſs of the Univerſity of Oxford in the honourable Houſe of Commons. Dr. Edward Bernard in his Book de Menſuris & Ponderibus Antiquorum (9), highly applauds this Treatiſe of our Author whom he ſtyles Juſtitiæ Romanæ diligentiſſimus Indagator; and in his manuſcript Lectures, cited by Dr. Smith (10) ſays, that his Book is aureus, imo ſupra aurum omne & metallorum lucem pretioſus, luculentus. Dr. Richard Cumberland in his Eſſay towards the Recovery of the Jewiſh Meaſures and Weights, comprehending their monies, having obſerved (11), that our Author " in his " Book of the Roman Foot, hath given us the Egyp- " tian Derah or Cubit accurately adjuſted to the 1000 " part of our Engliſh Standard-foot;" proceeds thus: " What uſe this very learned man intended to make " of this Egyptian Cubit, I find not, but heartily " wiſh, that he had lived to finiſh the work he intend- " ed, about the Meaſures and Weights of the Anci- " ents. The Jewiſh Cubit he hath no where ſtated " that I know of; only in his Epiſtle Dedicatory to " Mr. Selden he intimates it to be inveſtigable by the " help of the Roman Foot: how he thence could have " deduced it, I know not." Dr. George Hooper, Biſhop of Bath and Wells, in his Inquiry into the State of the ancient Meaſures, the Attick, the Roman, and eſpecially the Jewiſh, ſtiles him an accurate Author, and ſpeaks of the known ſkill and accuracy of that Obſerver (12); and having obſerved (13), that Mr. Greaves intended to proſecute the ſubject of the Dirhems and Denars of the Arabians beſides what he has done in his Diſcourſe of the Roman Foot (14), tells us, that it is great " pity for many reaſons, that the accurate judgment " and exquiſite learning, with which he was furniſhed, " met with thoſe unhappy times, in which an honeſt " man was not only diſcouraged, but diſabled from " the proſecution of ſuch ſtudies." Dr. John Arbuthnot in his Tables of ancient Coins, Weights and Meaſures, explained and exemplified in ſeveral Diſſertations tells us (15), that Mr. Greaves may be juſtly reckoned a claſſical Author on the ſubject of the Roman Weights and Coins. Mr. John Ward, F. R. S. and Profeſſor of Rhetoric in Greſham College, in his De Aſſe & Partibus ejus Commentarius, publiſhed in Mr. Robert Ainſworth's Monumenta Vetuſtatis Kempiana ex vetuſtis Scriptoribus illuſtrata, eoſque viciſſim illuſtrantia, ſpeaks of Mr. Greaves's Diſcourſe of the Roman Foot and Denarius with great commendation.

(9) Printed at Oxford in 1683.

(10) Vita Joannis Gravii, pag. 37.

(11) Pag. 7. edit. London 1686.

(12) Part 1. cap. 4. § 2. pag. 24. edit. London 1721 in 8vo. See likewiſe Part 2. cap. 1. §. 4. pag. 45.

(13) Part 3. cap. 2. §. 4. pag. 92.

(14) Pag. 115.

(15) Cap. 3. pag. 15. edit. London 1727, in 4to.

[I] The Articles alledged againſt him.] They were as follow (16): " I. That he had betrayed the College " in

(16) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 157.

Walter Pope, who erroneouſly calls our Author Edward (u), obſerves (w), that Mr. Greaves had been for a ſeaſon ſkreened againſt the fury of the viſitation by ſome powerful friends; but finding it impoſſible to keep his Profeſſorſhip, made it his buſineſs to procure an able and worthy perſon to ſucceed him, and by the advice of Dr. Charles Scarborough (x) the Phyſician pitched upon Mr. Seth Ward, afterwards Biſhop of Sarum, who obtained for Mr. Greaves the full arrears of his ſtipend, amounting to five hundred pounds, and deſigned him a conſiderable part of his ſalary (y). Mr. Greaves upon his ejectment had his cheſts broken open by the ſoldiers, and his papers and manuſcripts taken from him, part of which were loſt, and the reſt recovered by means of his friend Mr. Selden (z). He then retired to London, where he married, and proſecuted his ſtudies with great vigour, as appears from the writings, which he publiſhed and left in manuſcript [K]. He died at London October the 8th 1652 (aa), being not full fifty years of (u) Life of Seth Ward, Lord Biſhop of Salisbury, cap. 4. pag. 18. edit. London 1697 in 8vo.

(w) Ibid.

(x) He was afterwards Phyſician to King Charles II, and knighted by him.

(y) Life of Seth Ward, pag. 18, 19, 20, 21.

(z) Smith, pag. 33.

(aa) Deſiderata Curioſa, by Francis Peck, M. A. vol 2. lib. 14. pag. 25. edit. London 1735 in fol.

" in diſcovering to the King's Agents 400 l. in the " Treaſury, which thereupon was taken away for the " King's uſe. II, That contrary to his oath he had " conveyed away a conſiderable part of the College " goods without the conſent of the company, and " thereby gratified Courtiers with them in other houſes. " III, That he feaſted the Queen's Confeſſors, and " ſent divers preſents to them, among which was an " holy Throne; and that he was more familiar with " them, than any true Proteſtants uſe to be. IV, " That he was the occaſion of ejecting Sir Nathaniel " Brent from his Wardenſhip, for adhering to the Par- " liament, and bringing in Dr. Harvey (17) into his " place. V, That he was the occaſion why Mr. Ed- " ward Corbet and Mr. Ralph Button were turned out " of their reſpective offices and chambers in the Col- " lege, becauſe they abode in the Parliament's quar- " ters, &c. VI, That he gave leave to Father Phi- " lips the Queen's Confeſſor, and Wyatt (18) one of " her Chaplains to come into the College Library to " ſtudy there, and that he put Mr. John French, a " Fellow, out of his chamber in Merton-College, " and put them into it, &c."

(17) Dr. William Harvey, the Phyſician, who diſcovered the circulation of the blood.

(18) Veatt, a Frenchman.

[K] His Writings, which he publiſhed, and left in manuſcript.] Beſides thoſe already mentioned he publiſhed the following: Demonſtratio Ortus Sirii Heliaci pro parallelo inferioris Ægypti; printed at the end of his Edition of Dr. John Bainbridge's Canicularia, at Oxford 1648 in 8vo. To this is added by Mr. Greaves, Inſigniorum aliquot ſtellarum Longitudines & Latitudines ex Aſtronomicis Obſervationibus Ulug Beigi, Tamerlanis Magni Nepotis. This Book is dedicated to George Ent M. D. who was afterwards Knighted and Preſident of the College of Phyſicians at London, and whom Mr. Greaves had contracted a friendſhip with at Padua. Elementa Linguæ Perſicæ. London 1649 in 4to. In the Dedication to Mr. Selden he obſerves, that he drew up this Grammar of the Perſian Language at the requeſt of that Gentleman, who approved of it; and that he propoſed to have publiſhed it nine years before, but wanting types, and being diverted by other affairs, and particularly his journey into the Eaſt, he had been obliged to ſuſpend the Edition. To this he ſubjoins, Anonymus Perſa de Siglis Arabum & Perſarum Aſtronomicis, printed at London 1648 in 4to. In the Dedication to Claudius Hardy, dated at London July 28th 1648 he obſerves, that tho' many perſons had written of the Siglæ of the Jews, which occur every where among the Rabbins, yet no perſon had publiſhed any account of thoſe uſed by the Arabians and Perſians, eſpecially in their Aſtronomical Tables. Mr. Greaves having met at Conſtantinople with this anonymous Perſian Writer, who explains this ſubject with great clearneſs and accuracy, thought it not improper to be joined to his Elementa Linguæ Perſicæ, which he had begun at Paris at Monſr. Hardy's ſollicitation. In 1650 our Author publiſh'd at London in 4to, Epochæ celebriores, Aſtronomis, Hiſtoricis, Chronologis, Chataiorum, Syro-Græcorum, Arabum, Perſarum, Choraſmiorum, uſitatæ, ex traditione Ulug Beigi, Indiæ citra extraque Gangem Principis. Eas primus publicavit, recenſuit, & Commentariis illuſtravit Johannes Gravius. This is dedicated to the Republic of Venice, to which he addreſſes a compliment in elegant Latin verſe. In order to render theſe Epochæ, which are of great importance in correcting a vaſt number of errors in our Books of Chronology, the more intelligible, Mr. Greaves has reduced them to the Julian Period and the vulgar Dionyſian Æra of Chriſt, and added a Praxis of the Tables, with proper Lemmata and Examples. To this Work he ſubjoined Choraſmiæ & Mawaralnahræ, hoc eſt, Regionum extra Fluvium Oxum Deſcriptio, ex Tabulis Abulfedæ Iſmaelis, Principis Hamah. London 1650 in 4to. Dedicated to Archbiſhop Uſher. In the Preface he obſerves, that he had collated theſe Tables of Abulfeda with five manuſcripts; one of which belonged to Erpenius, and was tranſcribed from a manuſcript in the Elector of Palatine's Library; another was the very manuſcript, from which Erpenius's copy was taken, but removed to the Vatican Library; two others in Mr. Edward Pocock's Library; and the fifth bought by Mr. Greaves at Conſtantinople. By the aſſiſtance of thoſe he corrected a great many errors in each of the Tables; but never made the leaſt alteration, unleſs where the caſe evidently required it, or the greateſt part of the manuſcripts juſtified it. Learned men had long wiſh'd for, or promis'd to publiſh the Tables of the celebrated Abulfeda. Ramuſius ſeems to have been the firſt, who cited them, and ſhewed the uſe of them. After this Caſtaldus, an eminent Geographer, corrected a great many paſſages in them relating to Aſia, which he had undertaken the Deſcription of, eſpecially with regard to the Longitudes and Latitudes of places, which had been before corrupted. Next followed the learned and judicious Ortelius, who in his Theſaurus Geographicus frequently mentions them, not as having ſeen them himſelf, but upon the authority of Caſtaldus. Erpenius regretted, that the whole Work of Abulfeda was not publiſhed, and promiſed an Edition of it; but being prevented by death, left it to William Schickard, who, in his Tarich ſeu Series Regum Perſiæ (19), gave the world out of Abulfeda a great many curious things, till then unknown to the Europeans, and illuſtrated the Geography of the Eaſtern Countries by means of the manuſcript of Vienna, communicated by the noble Tengnagelius. But Schickard, in a Letter to Mr. Greaves, obſerved, that this manuſcript of Vienna, which he had made uſe of, was in a variety of places impoſſible to be read, and generally very doubtful in the numbers; ſo that no Tables, or at leaſt only incorrect ones, could be formed by it. Our Author therefore undertook this Work, in the midſt of his own private misfortunes and anxiety, and the public calamities; and compleated it. He informs us, that Abulfeda ſucceeded his brother, as Prince of Hamah in Syria, in the year of the Hejira 743, or of the Chriſtian Æra 1342, and died in the year 746 of the Hejira; and for this he quotes the Author of the Book, intitled, Al Sacerdan. But Mr. George Sale in the Article of ABU'LFEDA in this Dictionary 20), has ſhewn, that the paſſage cited by our Author from Al Sacerdan, (or rather Al Sukkerdân, which is Perſian, and ſignifies a Sugar-Diſh,) does not relate to our Abu'lfeda, but to another, who was a King of Egypt, and did not begin his reign till ten years after our Abulfeda's death. Mr. Gagnier (21) diſcovered this miſtake of Mr. Greaves, but has committed ſome inaccuracies in his examination of it, which are taken notice of by Mr. Sale. But to proceed to Mr. Greaves's Preface, he obſerves, that the title of this Work of Abulfeda in the Arabic ſignifies Canon or rather Rectificatio Terrarum; and that it is declared at the concluſion of the Work, that it was finiſhed in the 721ſt year of the Hejira, or of the Chriſtian Æra 1321. It appears to be compiled from the principal Arabian Writers, about ſixty of whom Mr. Greaves remark'd to be cited in it. With regard to the method of theſe Tables, he obſerves, that Ptolemy (19) Printed at Tubingen 1628 in 4to.

(20) Vol. 1. pag. 115.

(21) In Præfat. ad Abulf. Vitam Mah. pag. 4, & ſeq.

(bb) Smith, pag. 33. and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 158.

of age, and was interred in the Church of St. Bennet Sherehog in London (bb). He left his brother Dr. Nicholas Greaves Executor of his laſt will and teſtament, which had been made the year before his death; and the latter left by will our Author's Aſtronomical lemy and the reſt of the Greek and Latin Writers compute the longitude of places from the Fortunate Iſlands; and that the ancient Arabians follow the Greeks in that point. But Abulfeda and ſome others compute from the extreme promontory, which runs out into the Atlantic Ocean. Hence appears the reaſon why in ſome of the Aſtronomical Tables and Geographical Charts of the Arabians, Alexandria in Egypt is in fifty one degrees of Longitude, in others in ſixty one degrees, the former computing from the ſhore of the Atlantic Ocean, the latter from the Fortunate Iſlands. But the Indian Geographers and Aſtronomers have a quite different method of computing the Longitude; for they draw the firſt Meridian in the Eaſt through Cancador, contrary to the Greeks, Latins, Perſians, Arabians, and others, who fix it in the Weſt, as appears from Ali Koſhgi, an eminent Perſian Aſtronomer, in his Inſtroduction to Aſtronomy. With regard to the Climates, Abulfeda takes a method very different from the common one. The antient Greek Writers reckoned ſeven Climates; in which number they are followed by the Arabians and Perſians. But Abulfeda, beſides theſe ſeven Climates, which are real and κατὰ θέσιν, depending on the length of the days, aſſigns twenty eight others κατ' ὑπόθεσιν. In his Tables therefore he diſtinguiſhes between Clima verum & Clima cognitum; "the latter being, ſays he, any "Country or Kingdom, which contains ſeveral Pro- "vinces or Tracts of Land; as Syria, al Erak, and "other countries. Sometimes Clima cognitum is part "of one true Climate, ſometimes of two; as Syria is "partly in the third, and partly in the fourth Cli- "mate. Sometimes Clima cognitum contains parts of "ſeven Climates, as it is reported of China; the "Longitude of which is ſaid to exceed the Latitude." The reaſon why Abulfeda reckons Arabia, or, as he calls it, the Peninſula of Arabia, the firſt Climate, was on account of the temple of God and the ſepulchre of Mahomet being ſeated there. Mr. Greaves then proceeds to explain the meaſures of the diſtances of places uſed by Abulfeda. The ſame year our Author publiſhed at London in 12mo, A Deſcription of the Grand Seignior's Seraglio, or the Turkiſh Emperor's Court, written by Mr. Robert Withers, and dedicated by Mr. Greaves to his honoured and truly noble Friend George Tooke Eſq;. In the dedication he obſerves, that this is a piece of that exactneſs, as the like is not extant in any other language; that he aſſumes nothing to himſelf, either as author of the diſcourſe, or as poliſher of it; that it was freely preſented to him at Conſtantinople; and that the name of the Author being then unknown, upon enquiry he had ſince found it to be the work of Mr. Robert Withers, "who by the "favour of the Engliſh Embaſſador, procuring him "admittance into the Seraglio (a courteſie unuſual,) "and by continuance many years in thoſe parts, had "time and opportunity to perfect his obſervations. "To him therefore are ſolely due the thanks of his "labour; to me it is ſufficient, that I have faith- "fully diſcharged my truſt, in publiſhing, ſince the "Author's death, the fruits of his travels, and in "communicating to the reader the pleaſure and ſa- "tisfaction of peruſing a relation full of truth and "exactneſs." But it appears that Mr. Greaves did not know, that this piece was already printed in Mr. Purchas's Pilgrims, Part II. lib. 9. cap. 15. pag. 1580, & ſeqq. edit. London 1625 in fol. and in the Preface to it we have the following words. "It is a "royal preſent worth the receiving, to ſet thee in "poſſeſſion, and make thee maſter of the Grand Sig- "nior's Seraglio; a ſight hitherto prohibited in a "manner to Chriſtian eyes .... Theſe hath maſter "Robert Withers collected after his ten years obſer- "vation at Conſtantinople, where he was educated "by the care and coſt of that late honourable Embaſ- "ſador from his Majeſty Sir Paul Pindar, and well "inſtructed by Turkiſh ſchoolmaſters in the Lan- "guage, and admitted alſo to further ſight of their "unholy holies, than is uſual." In 1652 our Author publiſhed at London in 4to, Aſtronomica quædam ex Traditione Shah Cholgii Perſæ: una cum Hypotheſibus Planetarum & cum Excerptis quibuſdam ex Alfergani Elementis Aſtronomicis, & Alî Kuſhgii de terræ magnitudine, & ſphærarum cæleſtium a terrâ diſtantiis: ſtudio & operâ Johannis Gravii, nunc primum publicata. In the dedication to John Marſham Eſq; afterwards Sir John Marſham, dated at London October the 1ſt 1650, he obſerves, that it was upon his ſollicitation that Marſham was induced to publiſh his Diatriba Chronologica, printed at London 1649 in 4to, and dedicated to Mr. Greaves; who in the Preface to his Aſtronomica quædam, tells us, that very near four hundred years before Gerardus Cremonenſis, a man excellently ſkilled in the Arabic Language, though not ſo well verſed in Aſtronomy, publiſhed theories of the Planets. His errors, which were every where received in the ſchools, and raſhly adopted by the ignorant Profeſſors of the Sciences, were firſt refuted by Regiomontanus (22); a little before whoſe time George Purbach (23), an eminent Aſtronomer, and Regiomontanus's maſter, ſeeing theſe ſtudies neglected, becauſe no perſon had laid down the elements of the ſcience in a ſolid and perſpicuous manner, wrote his book de Theoricis Planetarum, by which he facilitated the reading of Ptolemy and the antient Aſtronomers. Though this was done long before by Ptolemy himſelf in his old age, (not to mention a great number of Arabian and Perſian writers after him, particularly Albattani, Alfergan, Coſta Ebn Luka, Naſſir Eddin, and Kuſhgi,) for Ptolomy having finiſhed his Μεγάλη Σύνταξις, ſubjoined his treatiſe περὶ ὑποθέσεων πλανωμένων, i. e. De Hypotheſibus Planetarum, with a view either to refreſh his own memory, or to aſſiſt the youth. But this piece continued in obſcurity, ſcarce known to the Greeks, much leſs to the Latins, till Dr. John Bainbridge publiſhed it with Proclus's Sphæra at London 1620 in 4to. Purbach is therefore highly to be commended for being the firſt after the reſtoration of learning in Europe, who wrote a ſhort introduction into the more abſtruſe parts of the ſcience. Since his time there have been publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes upon the elements of Aſtronomy, or Commentaries upon that writer. Amongſt theſe the moſt eminent are Eraſmus Rheinhold and Michael Mæſtlin, the latter of whom is frequently recommended by Tycho Brahe. But Mr. Greaves obſerves, that it muſt be confeſſed, that even theſe writers, though otherwiſe very valuable, have not explained every thing to ſuch advantage, as an attentive reader could wiſh. For, to omit other defects, we meet in them a great number of barbarous terms, unknown to the Latin language, but every where uſed in the writings of Aſtronomers, the origin of which is requiſite to be underſtood. For ſince the time that Alphonſus, King of Caſtile, had with immenſe coſt, by the aſſiſtance of the Jews, Moors, and Arabians, whom he ſent for from all parts, formed the tables which bear his name, this maſs of exotic words overſpread the Latin writers upon Aſtronomy. Hence came the words Juzahar, Zenith, Nadir, Buth, with a prodigious variety of others, either taken from the Arabians, or formed in imitation of them. Mr. Greaves gives ſome inſtances of this, and remarks, that ſince the time of al Mamon, (by whoſe direction the Greek writers were firſt tranſlated into Arabic at Babylon,) all the books of ſcience, eſpecially Phyſic and Mathematics, came out of the Arabian ſchools; ſo that it is no wonder, if even in this more enlightened and polite age, there are ſtill retained ſome words, which diſcover their firſt origin. For it happens in ſcience as in the names of countries and places, that what has once been commonly received, will ſcarce be obliterated by length of time. Mr. Greaves therefore thought it would not prove unacceptable to the Republic of Letters, to trace up theſe exotic words to their original; and for that purpoſe to fix upon ſome genuine and approved writer. But as it was of no importance whether this was a Perſian or Arabian Author (ſince both Nations uſed the ſame technical expreſſions,) he choſe the ſhort tract here publiſhed, taken from the Commentaries of Mahmud Shah Cholgi. From this the reader will receive a double advantage; for thoſe who are converſant in Aſtronomy, will ſee the origin of ſeveral words, without which the tables uſed

(22) He was born June 6, 1436, and died July 6, 1476. Vide Petr. Gaſſendum in Vita Johann. Regiomontani, pag. 67, 92.

(23) He was born May 30th 1423, and died April 7, 1461. Vide Gaſſendum in Vitâ Georgii Peurbachii, p. 58, 74.

mical inſtruments to the Savilian Library in the Univerſity of Oxford, where they are repoſited. Mr. Greaves held a correſpondence with ſeveral learned Foreigners, particularly uſed by the Arabians as well as the Perſians and Indians, cannot be underſtood; and perceive that the celeſtial hypotheſes of thoſe Nations are exactly conformable to thoſe of Ptolemy, and have them ſuccinctly and clearly explained here, and adapted to the motions of the Planets, from the accurate obſervations of Naſſir Eddin in the City Maragâ. Thoſe likewiſe who ſtudy the Oriental tongues, will be pleaſed to ſee a book publiſhed in the genuine Perſian language; ſince what had hitherto been publiſhed in that tongue, and particularly the Pentateuch by the Tawuſh the Jew, and Xavier's Hiſtoria Chriſti & Petri publiſhed by Ludovicus de Dieu at Leyden in 1639, are full of barbariſms and improprieties. Mr. Greaves concludes his preface with remarking, that Shah Cholgi flouriſhed in the year 866 of the Hejira, and 1461 of the Chriſtian Æra; at which time he compoſed his Commentaries upon the Aſtronomical Tables dedicated by Naſſir Eddin to Ilechan Tatar. Whether he wrote any thing beſides the Commentaries, (part of which Mr. Greaves here publiſhes) is not known; but that Gentleman tells us, theſe alone are ſufficient to correct a great many errors in Aſtronomy; to confute divers aſſertions in Chronology, received upon the authority of Joſeph Scaliger; and to explain a variety of things in the Arabian writers, eſpecially the Mathematicians. To this book he ſubjoined Binæ Tabulæ Geographicæ, una Naſſir Eddini Perſæ, altera Ulug Beigi Tatari. Operâ & ſtudio Joannis Gravii nunc primum publicatæ. London 1652 in 4to, dedicated to his friend Mr. Edward Pocock, and his brother Mr. Thomas Greaves. In the Preface he tells us, that having at the ſollicitation of ſeveral learned men, undertaken an edition of the Geographical Canon of Abulfeda, he thought proper to publiſh firſt theſe two Tables, by which he hoped at preſent to ſatisfy the impatience of thoſe, who were importunate for the edition of Abulfeda, by whoſe aſſiſtance they imagined Geography might be illuſtrated and placed in a right view. Mr. Greaves remarks, that theſe learned men had formed a juſt notion of Abulfeda; but appear not to have known, that ſeveral other Arabian writers have treated extremely well of the ſubject of Geography. For, to omit others, Ebn Haukal wrote a large work, in which he diſcourſes very accurately of every thing remarkable in each country. Al Edriſi in his book concerning Kingdoms and Empires, deſcribes exactly the ſituation of cities and places, the boundaries of each Nation, and their Longitude and Latitude. The ſame deſign is executed by Ebn Chordadabah, an eminent Arabian Geographer. Yacut al Hamaw has compiled a Geographical Theſaurus, of great uſe to thoſe who ſtudy the Oriental Languages. But theſe writers are all excelled by Abu al Rihán al Birun, an admirable Mathematician, who, in imitation of Ptolemy, wrote a Geographical Canon about ſix hundred and ſixty years after the time of Ptolemy. And to paſs over other Writers, (about thirty of whom are cited in the Geography of Abulfeda), Gabriel Sionita and John Heſronita publiſhed the Geographia Nubienſis with a Latin Verſion; though the Arabic edition at Rome, which thoſe learned men followed, is rather to be conſidered as an imperfect abridgment of al Edriſi, who flouriſhed in the year 548 of the Hejira, and of the Chriſtian Æra 1153, than a complete work; as appeared from two manuſcripts, one bought by Dr. Pocock in Syria, and the other purchaſed by Mr. Greaves in Egypt, written in African Letters, though very antient, and with elegant maps. The firſt Table publiſhed by Mr. Greaves in this volume, was made by Naſſir Eddin, who flouriſhed about the year 660 of the Hejira, and was an eminent Perſian Mathematician and Aſtronomer, and is highly commended by Gregory Abu'l Faragius. The Hiſtorians relate, that preſenting a book written by him to Moſtaaſem, the laſt Kalif of Babylon, and being treated with contempt by the Kalif, he was ſo exaſperated, that he went to Holac Chân, Prince of the Tatars, and perſuaded him to make war upon Moſtaaſem, whoſe army was defeated, and himſelf with his four ſons ſlain by Holac Chân, after the taking of Babylon. By this event the Empire and Name of the Abaſſidæ, which had flouriſhed about five hundred years in Aſia, were entirely extinguiſhed. It is probable, that Naſſir Eddin was advanced to great honours by Holac, and had a conſiderable ſhare in his friendſhip; and under his patronage formed the Aſtronomical Tables, which he ſtiled the Ilechan-Tables from Ilechan King of the Tatars, by the aſſiſtance of the moſt famous Mathematicians in the City Maraga. Mahmud Shagh Cholgi prefers theſe Tables to all others; and Mr. Greaves remarks, that if they had been known to the Emperors in the preceding ages, thoſe monſtrous hypotheſes of an eighth heaven, long before introduced by Thebet Ebn Corah, and other errors would have been exploded. Mr. Greaves therefore extracted this table out of his Collection, which he thinks will be of great advantage in illuſtrating the Geography of the remoteſt parts of Aſia, moſt of which Naſſir Eddin had ſeen and travelled over, and given an accurate account of the reſt from the writings of the Indians and Arabians. The other table was made by Ulug Beig, King of Parthia and India, and grandſon of Timurlan the Great, who reſiding in Affluence at Samarkand, his metropolis, exerciſed himſelf in the ſtudy of Mathematics and Aſtronomy, and having ſent from all parts for Aſtronomers, (the principal of whom were Giyath Eddin Jamſhid, and Ali Cuſhgi, Author of a famous book concerning the Elements of Arithmetic and Aſtronomy,) and furniſhed them with inſtruments, obſerved the Phænomena of the Heavens with the utmoſt accuracy, and formed from thence his tables, which are celebrated over the whole Eaſt, in the year 841 of the Hejira, and 1437 of the Chriſtian Æra. Among theſe, according to the cuſtom of Aſtronomers, is ranked the Geographical Table here publiſhed by Mr. Greaves; who obſerves, that he was informed at Conſtantinople by ſome Turkiſh Aſtronomers of no mean parts and ſkill, upon remarking the agreement between the obſervations of Tycho Brahe and thoſe of Ulug Beig, that the latter, beſides his other moſt exact inſtrument, had procured a Quadrant, the radius of which was as high as the top of the Dome of St. Sophia, which is above an hundred and eighty Roman feet. This account the Turks had from Perſians of credit. Mr. Greaves leaves the Reader to believe as much of this relation as he pleaſes; but remarks that very large inſtruments were abſolutely neceſſary to take the height of the Pole at Samarkand, (where Ulug Beig reigned, according to Emir Cond, above forty years;) for he makes it to be thirty nine degrees, thirty ſeven minutes, and twenty three ſeconds; from whence we may conclude his prodigious accuracy in the reſt of his obſervations. Beſides thoſe Works, which he had publiſhed, ſome other pieces of his were printed ſince his death, viz. I. Lemmata Archimedis apud Græcos & Latinos jam pridem deſiderata, è vetuſto Codice manuſcripto Arabico à Johanne Gravio traduͣta, & nunc primum cum Arabum Scholiis publicata. Reviſa & pluribus mendis repurgata à Samuele Foſter: publiſh'd at London 1659 fol. in a Book intitled, Miſcellanea, ſive Lucubrationes Mathematicæ Samuelis Foſter olim Londini in Collegio Greſhamenſi Aſtronomiæ Profeſſoris publici. Omnia in Lucem edita, & pleraque Latinè reddita operâ & ſtudio Johannis Twyſden, C. L. M. D. qui etiam ex ſuis nonnulla adjunxit. Our Author in his Letter to Archbiſhop Uſher, dated September 19th 1644, ſpeaks thus of his Tranſlation of thoſe Lemmata. "I have finiſhed thoſe Lemmata of Archimedes, which "the Arabians call بماخذه ان; and if I be not de- "ceived, ſuch as wiſh well to the Mathematicks, "will think my pains well beſtowed; as indeed it was "no ſmall labour to correct the Diagrams and the Letters, (which were too often perverted in the manu- "ſcript,) and ſometimes to ſupply what was defective "in the Demonſtration itſelf." II. Of the manner of hatching of eggs at Cairo: publiſhed by Sir George Ent in the Philoſophical Tranſactions for January and February 1677, N°. 137. p. 923. It is not improbable, that the Emperor Hadrian might allude to this cuſtom in his Letter to Servianus the Conſul, in which he ſpeaks this of the Egyptians: Nihil illis opto, niſi ut ſuis pul- larly William Schickard, James Golius, Claudius Hardy, Francis Junius, Peter Scavenius, and Chriſtian Ravius; and had an intimate friendſhip with Archbiſhop Uſher, Mr. Selden, Dr. Gerard Langbaine, Dr. William Harvey, and Sir John Marſham, to whom he left by will all the coins which he had collected in Italy and the Eaſt; Dr. Edward Pocock, Dr. George Ent, Dr. Charles Scarborough, and other great lis alantur; quos quemadmodum fœcundant pudet dicere. III. An account of the Longitude and Latitude of Conſtantinople and Rhodes; directed to the moſt Reverend James Uſher, Archbiſhop of Armagh: publiſh'd by Dr. Thomas Smith in the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. 178, for December 1685. Reprinted in A Collection of curious Travels and Voyages, publiſh'd by Mr. John Ray, Tom. II. p. 84 & ſeqq. 2d Edit. London 1705 in 8vo. IV. Reflections on a Report made by the Lord Treaſurer Burleigh to the Lords of the Council of the Conſultation had and the Examination of the Plain Diſcourſe and humble Addreſs for our gracious Queen Elizaberh, her moſt excellent Majeſty to peruſe and conſider, as concerning the needful Reformation of the Vulgar Kalendar, for the civil years and dayes accompting of verifying according to the time truly ſpent, by John Dee, Martii 25. 1582. Mr. Greaves's Reflections were publiſh'd by Dr. Thomas Smith in the Philoſophical Tranſactions Vol. XXI. N° 257, for October 1699. V. An Account of ſome Experiments for trying the force of great Guns by Mr. John Greaves: publiſh'd by Mr. Richard Stubbs, Rector of Eaſt-Hamſted in Berkſhire in the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. 173, p. 1090. for July 1685. VI. Deſcriptio Peninſulæ Arabicæ ex Abulfedâ. Arabicè & Latinè. He deſigned to have publiſhed this in 1645; but was prevented by the Civil Wars. The Tranſlation was inſerted together with the original by Mr. Gagnier in the third volume of Dr. John Hudſon's Geographiæ Veteris Scriptores Græci minores; from which Edition chiefly Monſr. la Roque made his French Tranſlation of the ſame Deſcription of Arabia, ſubjoin'd to his Journey to Paleſtine. Mr. Greaves had likewiſe prepared for the preſs the following works. I. Tabulæ integræ Longitudinis & Latitudinis Stellarum fixarum juxta Ulug Beigi Obſervationes. He collated theſe Obſervations with five Manuſcripts, in order to render his Edition as correct as poſſible. He left this Book in the hands of Archbiſhop Uſher. Dr. Thomas Hyde not knowing any thing of this Work of our Author, publiſhed the ſame Obſervations with a Latin Tranſlation and Notes at Oxford in 1665 under this title: Verſio Latina e Lingua Perſicâ, & Commentarii in Obſervationes Ulughi Beigi de Tabulis Longitudinis & Latitudinis Stellarum fixarum; dedicated to Dr. Seth Ward, then Biſhop of Exeter, and afterwards of Sarum. II. He had prepared a Tranſlation of George Chryſoccoca out of Perſian Manuſcripts into Greek, as he found that piece among the Baroccian Manuſcripts in the Bodleian Library; and a Table containing the Longitude and Latitude of twenty five of the moſt conſiderable Fixed Stars, and another Table, or Κανόνιον τῦ μήκους καὶ πλατῦς τῶν ἐπισημοτάτων πόλεων. The tables had been publiſhed by Iſmael Bullialdus in the Appendix to his Aſtronomia Philolaica at Paris 1645. Dr. Smith tells us (24), that he had ſeen the various Readings noted down by Mr. Greaves in the margin of his MS. collated with the printed copy. III. A Geographical Account of the Mountains of the Earth according to the Arabians from Abulfeda: in Engliſh. In this piece he made the following obſervations. "That Mount Sina reaches to "the Red-Sea, is confirmed by the Geographers and "Travellers of our times. One thing is remarkable, "which neither Hiſtorians, nor any other that I know "of, make mention of; and that is this: that the "rocks are there of a goodly ſpeckled kind of marble, the colour being red with ſome mixture of black "and white. From whence almoſt all the choiceſt "pillars and huge vaſt ſtones, that are now in the "world, have been brought down the Red-Sea, and "ſo conveyed to the Nilus, by which they have been "carried up to Thebes or down to Alexandria and o-"ther places. I have ſeen wonderful fair and great "ſtones, that have been brought anciently from Mount "Sina, whereof ſome of them are in the pyramids, "others are made into obeliſks and pillars. Thoſe "pieces both of Conſtantinople and Rhodes, which are "ſo huge and vaſt, thoſe goodly pillars, which are in "the Pantheon built by Agrippa, as alſo the Aguglias "full of Ægyptian Hieroglyphics, have all had their "original from thence. This I may the more confi-"dently aver, becauſe a learned man, a Venetian, who "had been ſome pretty while at Mount Sina, and whom "I knew to be very curious, aſſured me, that he "had ſeen ſome pillars there, which were almoſt fi-"niſhed, when by caſualty had been left imperfect, "and not brought away. And that for many miles "there were huge rocks and mountains of this red "marble ſpeckled with black and white, of which "kind all the antient fabricks of Ægypt conſiſted. "And beſides this place of Mount Sina all the other "quarries and hills are of a kind of white free-ſtone, "like ours; wherefore they could not have of them "from theſe, but from thoſe of Mount Sina." IV. Of the Tatars or Mogols, from Texeira the Spaniard; who borrowed many things from Emir Cond the Perſian; with a ſhort Deſcription of the chief Cities in Perſia by the ſame Writer. In Engliſh. V. Commentaries upon the Epochæ, which he had publiſhed an Account of in the year 1650. Theſe Commentaries were unfortunately omitted in that Edition; tho' in the title-page Mr. Greaves mentions them, and in the Book itſelf refers the Reader to them. Dr. Smith could not diſcover what was become of them, not meeting with them among our Author's or Archbiſhop Uſher's papers. VI. Verſio integra Tabularum Geographicarum Abulfedæ. This could not be found by Dr. Smith. It appears from Mr. Graves's Preface to his Edition of Choraſmiæ & Mawaralnahræ Deſcriptio, that this Tranſlation was finiſh'd by him. VII. Elementa omnium Scientiarum, præſertim Mathematicarum. This Treatiſe comprehends a ſhort view of all the Sciences, and contains a great many things relating to Aſtronomy, Geography, and Chronology collected from the Arabic and Perſian Writers, with ſeveral excellent Aſtronomical Obſervations made by himſelf and others. This Book written by his own hand was given to Dr. Dudley Loſtus by Dr. Nicholas Greaves, and afterwards came into the hands of Dr. Thomas Smith, who deſigned to have publiſh'd it (25); but was prevented by death. VIII. He made ſeveral Maps from the Tables of Naſſir Eddin, Abulfeda, and Ulug Beig compared together; and another of Leſſer Aſia, at the deſire of Archbiſhop Uſher, who was then writing a learned Diſſertation, which was afterwards printed under the title of Geographica & Hiſtorica Diſquiſitio de Minori Aſiâ proprie dicta, &c. IX. He deſigned alſo to publiſh a Perſian Lexicon, as appears from his Letter to Archbiſhop Uſher above quoted, where he writes thus; "According to your "Grace's advice, I have made a Perſian Lexicon out "of ſuch words as I met with in the Evangeliſts and "in the Pſalms, and in two or three Arabian and Per-"ſian Nomenclators; ſo that I have now a ſtock of "above ſix thouſand words in that language; I think "as many as Raphelengius hath in his Arabic Dictionary. Wherefore I have a greater mind than ever "to go to Leyden, and peruſe their Oriental Manuſcripts, which were printed by the expence of the "States, a thing which long ſince your Grace would "have had me to have done. But yet conſidering my "Lecture in Oxford (tho' as yet it cannot be read) it will "not be fit for me to go without ſpecial leave from our "honourable Chancellor, and two or three more of "the Lords of his Majeſty's Privy Council. I ſhall "therefore deſire your Grace to procure this favour for "me in writing, with this caution, that my abſence "for a while may be no prejudice to me at home, eſpecially ſince my journey is for the improvement "of learning and for the publiſhing of ſome of thoſe "Books, which I long ſince have finiſhed. There I ſhall "have an opportunity of printing your Grace's Map, "and of perfecting and publiſhing that Diſcourſe of "Dr. Bainbrigg concerning the Periodus Sothiaca." X. He propoſed likewiſe to have publiſhed many other Tracts, particularly concerning the Arabian Geographers, the Weights and Meaſures of the Arabians, the Mummies of the Egyptians, and their Hieroglyphics, and concerning many other Antiquities of that Country.

(24) Pag. 30.

(25) Smith, pag. 31.

great men. He had three brothers, NICHOLAS, THOMAS, and EDWARD, all men of diſtinguiſhed learning [L].

GREGORY

[L] He had three brothers, Nicholas, Thomas, and Edward, all then of diſtinguiſhed learning.] Dr. NICHOLAS GREAVES was a Commoner of St. Mary's Hall in Oxford, from whence in 1627 he was elected Fellow of All-Souls-College (26). In 1640 he was Proctor of that Univerſity (27). November 1ſt 1642 he took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity (28), and July 6th the year following that of Doctor of Divinity (29). He was Dean of Dromore in Ireland (30). Dr. THOMAS GREAVES was admitted a Scholar of Corpus Chriſti College in Oxford March 15th 1627, and choſen Fellow thereof in 1636, and Deputy Reader of the Arabic during the abſence of Mr. Edward Pocock in 1637 (31). He took the Degree of Bachelor of Divinity October 22d 1641 (32), and was Rector of Dunſby in Lincolnſhire during the times preceding the Reſtoration, and of another Living near London (33). October 10th 1661 he had the Degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon him (34), and a Prebend in the Church of Peterborough in 1666, being then Rector of Benefield in Northamptonſhire, "which Benefice he reſigned ſome years before his "death thro' trouble from his Pariſhioners, who be-"cauſe of his ſlowneſs of ſpeech and bad utterance "held him inſufficient for it, notwithſtanding he was "a man of great learning (35)." In the latter part of his Life he retired to Weldon in Northamptonſhire, where he had purchaſed an eſtate, and died there May 22d 1676 in the 65th year of his age, and was interred in the chancel of the Church there (36). His writings are, De Linguæ Arabicæ Utilitate & Præſtantiâ, Oratio Oxonii habita 19 Julii 1637. Oxford 1637 in 4to. Obſervationes quædam in Perſicam Pentateuchi Verſionem; printed in the ſixth Tome of the Polyglot Bible (37). Annotationes quædam in Perſicam Interpretationem Evangeliorum; printed in the ſame Tome (38). Theſe Annotations were tranſlated into Latin by Mr. Samuel Clarke. We ſhall preſent the Reader with an original Letter of his, which will inform us of a work, which he then deſigned.

(26) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 669.

(27) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 283.

(28) Idem, ibid. vol. 2. col. 21.

(29) Idem, ibid. col. 33.

(30) Smith, pag. 34.

(31) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 556.

(32) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 2.

(33) Idem, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 556.

(34) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 147.

(35) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 556.

(36) Idem, ibid.

(37) Pag. 48.

(38) Pag. 56.

To Mr. Richard Baxter.

Aug. 5. 1656.

"I thanke you for your kind letter and cenſure of "my little Treatiſe. I have compoſed another, but "much larger, and in a different language concerning "a Religion oppoſite to Chriſtianity, yet (which is one "of the great depths of Satan) pretending to be a con-"firmation of it; I mean the Mahometan Religion, "which hath prevailed in ſo great a part of the world, "the firſt publiſher whereof doth profeſs, that he was "ſent with the ſame meſſage, and to preach the ſame "doctrine, which Chriſt before had delivered. From "whence I think it undeniably follows, that by the "judgment of their own Prophet they ought to em-"brace the Chriſtian Religion; and in diſputation "with them I conceive this ought to be chiefly urged "and inſiſted on. I know their ordinary exception "and evaſion is, that the Scriptures are corrupted, "(which Mahomet often objects to the Jews and Chri-"ſtians,) and changed, not in matters of ſmall moment, "but in fundamentals, as touching Chriſt's prediction "and expreſs mention of Mahomet, as an Apoſtle or "Meſſenger to be ſent from God, beſides divers other "paſſages relating to the perſon and office of Chriſt, "wherein they affirm our Scriptures and Records to be "falſified; an error very eaſy to be refuted, though "they will not eaſily be convinced. A Treatiſe of "their Credenda and Agenda, in part of both which "they are diametrically oppoſite to Chriſtianity, I have "compoſed out of their own writings; the Tranſlations "now extant, and relations of the Greeks and Latins "concerning Mahomet's Original and a great part of "his doctrine, being very erroneous, which hath oc-"caſioned divers miſtakes in Vives, Grotius &c. Hav-"ing therefore ſhewn ſome part of the Work with "other Obſervations to the Reverend Biſhop Uſher, he "often adviſed me to publiſh them; but I have not "yet an opportunity. This incloſed Note I have "ſent you for a little taſte, and eſpecially becauſe a-"mong thoſe arguments of God's Providence, "and reaſons to perſuade the belief of the Chriſtian "Religion, which you and others produce, I think "this very conſiderable, the confeſſion and teſtimony "of the chief adverſaries. What plainer or clearer "evidence could be deſired from the mouth of ſo great "an enemy as this, which I have tranſcribed? To "me it is a great ſatisfaction and confirmation to ſee "God's Truth and Wiſdom juſtified not only by her "own children, but even by ſtrangers and the greateſt "oppoſers of it; which cauſeth me to think of that "expectation often uſed in the Scripture, Inimici tui Pſ. lvi. 3. "mentientur tibi, as many render it, mendaciter ſe de- יְכַחֲשׁוּ לָךְ "dunt tibi, as Junius; our Tranſlators ſometimes, "Thine enemies ſhall be found liars unto thee. The "truth, which they acknowledge, ſhall diſcover them "to be liars; as it is certain, that Mahomet, the more "truth he utters in this, the more he is found a liar in "the reſt. Who knoweth whether they, who ac-"knowledge our Saviour's miraculous Nativity, won-"derful Works, and Miſſion from Heaven to preach "the Goſpel, ſo frequently atteſted in the Alcoran, "may not at length be induced to receive the whole "truth, of which ſuch a part is already believed by "them, if Chriſtians would ſeriouſly endeavour it, "and labour to improve ſuch an advantage? I ſhould "be glad to hear of your health, and to receive an "anſwer from you, if it may not hinder your better "employments. God preſerve you for the further be-"nefit of his Church. I remain

"Your loving Brother and Servant,

"T. Greaves."

He had a correſpondence by Letters with ſeveral of the moſt learned men of that time, particularly Mr. Selden and Mr. Abraham Whelocke, Profeſſor of Arabic in the Univerſity of Cambridge, as appears from the following Letters to him from thoſe eminent Scholars.

"To my worthy Friend Mr. Thomas Greaves at Cor-"pus Chriſti College in Oxford, theſe.

"Worthy Sir,

"I received a part of your excellent Notes upon "that Arabique Dialogue, and have had ſome ſpeech "with the Printer concerning them. His anſwere is "yet ſomewhat uncertain. What is fit to be done or "may be, to ſecond your wiſhes, ſhall hereafter, "when you come up, be performed as farre forth as "it lies in the power of

"March 23th. 1635. Your affectionat Freind

"The Temple. J. Selden."

"Worthy Sir,

"You know, I doubt not, by this time, that God "hath taken from us our deer Freind Mr. James. On "Munday laſt he was buried at Weſtminſter. He had "divers Collections and Notes of Hiſtory and other "things; which, I preſume, are in ſome trunks of "his in his chamber at the College. Into whoſe "hands of his kindred they ſhall come, I know not; "nor could I tell, under that name, to whom to make "any addreſſe. But becauſe I preſume they are yet "under ſomme command of yours, I have ventured "upon putting you to this trouble, that you would "favour me ſo much as to take the beſt courſe, that "might be, that upon ſuch ample ſatisfaction as may "be fit, I might have them in bulk as they are. "You ſhall be umpire in the buſineſſe, and they ſhal "be ſatisfied immediately, if I may have them. If "any thing ly in my power, wherein I may ſerve "you, I beſeech you command, and you ſhall find a "very ready heart in Your moſt affectionat Freind and Servant,

"Dec. 13. 1638.

"The Temple. J. Selden."

"To his much honoured Freinde Mr. Thomas Greaves,

"Reader of the Arabick Lecture in Oxford, theſe,

"At Corpus Chriſti College.

"Worthie Mr. Greaves,

"I am very mech indebted (I confeſſe) to you, and "blame myſelfe for ſoe longe ſilence. My neceſſities "have caſt me uppon many buſineſſes of late, ſoe that "I have almoſt forgott myſelfe, and before old age be-"gin

GREGORY, ſurnamed the Great, born at Rome of a Patrician family, diſcovered ſuch great abilities in the exerciſe of the ſenatorial employments, that the Emperor Juſtin the younger appointed him Prefect of Rome (a). He quitted this office as ſoon as he found that it attached him to the good things of this world, and ſecluded himſelf in a monaſtery [A], under the government of Valentius the Abbot (b). He was ſoon taken from thence by Pope Pelagius II, who made him his ſeventh Deacon, and ſent him as his Nuncio to Conſtantinople, to demand ſuccours againſt the Lombards. He returned to Rome after the Emperor's death [B], and was, for ſome time, Secretary to Pope Pelagius; after which he obtained leave to retire into his monaſtery (c). When he thought of enjoying a ſolitary and unruffled life there, he was elected Pope by the Clergy, the Senate, and People of Rome; and after employing all the methods poſſible to avoid this dignity [C], he was forced to accept of it (d). It appeared by his conduct, that (a) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontific. de St. Gregoire.

(b) Others call him Valentine.

(c) Maimb. Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. pag. 7, 8.

(d) He was inthron'd the 3d of Sept. 590.

" gin to enter into سن الاضمحلاط the declining age;
" for my eye-ſight, which is as deare to me as my life,
" (I feare) decayes. You much revived me both by " the gift of that excelleut and trewlie eloquent ſpeech
" of yours, as alſoe by the report of my ever honoured
" freind Mr. John Greaves, whoſe preſence (when
" by God's help it ſhall come to paſſe) together
" with yours may bringe me to Oxford. I am aſham-
" ed to tell you, few do Arabicari in this Univerſity;
" yet ſome doe, yet ἄλις ἐις ἄλις ἐδείς. So that in " the Church there will be ſome that promote theſe
" ſtudies. I ſhal be heartily joyful to ſee you here
" this Vacation, and will ſet apart a roome or two
" for you, one in my houſe, another in the publicke
" Scholes, where you ſhal be in gremio venerandæ ma-
" terteræ veſtræ matriſque noſtræ. I hope alſoe to be " myſelfe at home, and to enjoy your company. I
" thanke you againe and againe for that wiſe, learned,
" and rhetorical Panegyriq of the Arabic Language.
" I am not able to ſend you mine in print, becauſe
" not worthie. Commend me heartily to all our freindes,
" to your brother with you, to Mr. Jacob, Mr. Gre" gory, Mr. Chidloe, your Chaplaine, my very lov-
" inge freinde. I have heard by Sir Chriſtopher Hat-
" ton of Northampton ſhyre, that worthy Mr. Rowſe
" was pleaſed to ſpeake good wordes of me to him. I
" much thanke him for it; and if you pleaſe, re" member my ſervice to him next after your ſelfe.
" Now God preſerve you ever his.

" Your very lovinge Freinde and Fellow-Labourer
" Cambridge Julie 24,
" 1639. " Abraham Wheelock."

Dr. EDWARD GREAVES, the youngeſt brother of Mr. John Greaves, was born at or near Croydon in Surrey, and admitted Probationer Fellow of All-Souls-College in Oxford in 1634 (40); and entering on the Phyſic Line took the Degree of Doctor of that Faculty July 8th 1641 (41), in which year and afterwards he practiſed with good ſucceſs about Oxford. In 1643 he was elected Superior Lecturer of Phyſic in Merton College, to read the Lecture of that Faculty founded by Dr. Thomas Linacre. Upon the declining of the King's cauſe, he retired to London, and practiſed there, and ſometimes at Bath (42). March 16th 1652 he was examined for the firſt time before the College of Phyſicians at London, and October 1ſt 1657 was elected Fellow thereof (43). After the Reſtoration he was appointed Phyſician in ordinary to King Charles II, and became a Baronet. Mr. Wood (44) ſtiles him a pretended Baronet; but we find, that he takes this title in his Oration before the College of Phyſicians; and in the ſixth Edition of A Diſplay of Heraldry: by John Guillim, Purſuivant of Arms (45), are the following words: " He beareth Gules, an Eagle diſplay'd,
" crowned Argent, by the name of Greaves, and
" with the Arms of Ulſter is the Coat of Armour of
" Sir Edward Greaves of St. Leonard's Foreſt in Suſ-
" ſex and of Harietſham in Kent, Bart. This Coat
" without the Arms of Ulſter, and with its due diſ-
" tance is born by his brother Thomas Greaves, D. D."
He died at his houſe in Covent-Garden London November 11th 1680, and was interred in the Pariſh-Church there (46). He wrote and publiſh'd Morbus Epidemius, ann. 1643: Or, the New Diſeaſe, with ſigns, cauſes, remedies, &c. Oxford 1643 in 4to, written upon occaſion of a diſeaſe called Morbus Campeſtris, which raged in Oxford, while the King and Court were there. Oratio habita in Ædibus Collegii Medicorum Londinenſium 25 Julii 1661, die Harvæi memoriæ dicato. London 1667 in 4to. This Oration ſhews him to have been a great Maſter of the Latin Tongue. T.

(40) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 669.

(41) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 2.

(42) Idem, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 669.

(43) From the Regiſter of the College, communicated by the very learned Dr. Thomas Pellet, Preſident of the College.

(44) Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(45) Pag. 210. edit. London 1724.

(46) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 669.

[A] He ſecluded himſelf in a Monaſtery.] It was that of St. Andrew, which he himſelf had founded at Rome in his father's houſe (1), and had given the direction of it to Valentius, whom he drew from a Country Monaſtery (2). He founded ſix other Convents in Sicily, and ſold all the reſt of his poſſeſſions, the monies ariſing from which he gave to the poor (3).

(1) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. le Grand, pag. 7. Dutch edit.

[B] He returned to Rome after the Emperor's death.] This Emperor's name was Tiberius, who died the 14 of Auguſt 582 (4), which points out an egregious error of Maimbourg. He relates (5) that Gregory, who could not obtain any ſuccours, did nevertheleſs very great ſervice to the Church, ſince he compoſed in Conſtantinople his excellent Treatiſe of morality on Job; and that he obliged, by his learned conferences, Eutychius the Patriarch to retract his errors with reſpect to the Reſurrection. After which, continues he, his Nunciature being ended by the death of the Emperor Tiberius, who died during this interval, . . . he returned to Rome. He fixes theſe conferences to the year 586, and therefore muſt ſuppoſe that Tiberius did not die before this year, which is a groſs chronological error. Dr. Cave dates theſe conferences, and the death of this Emperor to the year 586 (6), and has conſequently committed the ſame error. Baronius (7) alſo fixes the death of this Emperor to the ſame year. His chronological error was not known to Du Pin (8).

(2) Monaſterio ſuo urbano Valentium ex Monaſterio S. Equitii in provincia Valeria accitum præfecit. Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 430.

(3) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Gregoire, pag. 7.

(4) Chronic. Alexand. See Father Pagi, Diſſ. Hypatica, pag. 336. & Denys de St Marthe, pag. 100, 101. of the Hiſt. of St. Gregory.

[C] Employing all the methods poſſible to avoid this dignity.] He wrote a very urgent Letter to the Emperor, in which he conjures him not to confirm his Election, and to give order to have a perſon choſen who had greater capacity, vigour and health than he himſelf could boaſt (9); and when he heard that his Letter had been intercepted by the Governor of Rome, and was perſuaded that his election would be confirmed by the Imperial Court, he fled, and went and hid himſelf in the moſt ſolitary part of a foreſt in a cave, firmly reſolved to ſpend his days there . . . till deſpairing to find him, a new election enſued (10). He would not accept of the Papal Dignity, till he had manifeſtly found by ſome celeſtial ſigns that God called him to it. It is pretended (11) that a Dove flying before thoſe who ſought for him, ſhewed them the way they were to go; or that a miraculous light pointed out to them the place of his retreat. This reſembles very much the adventure of the Magi who went to worſhip the new-born Meſſiah. Maimbourg's exclamation with reſpect to the reſiſtance made by St. Gregory is very juſt. An illuſtrious example, ſays he (12), which ought to confound the furious ambition of thoſe, who not approaching in any manner the holineſs, doctrine and abilities of this great Man, who, burying himſelf in his life-time under ground, to ward off the Papal Dignity as a thunder-bolt, do, by their ſcandalous intrigues, a kind of violence to the Holy Ghoſt, raiſe themſelves, contrary to its orders, by ways merely human, and very uncanonical, to the moſt exalted ſtation in the Church. See the extract of a Book intitled, de Clerico renitente, in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (13). I muſt not omit another paſſage of Maimbourg, with reſpect to the anſwers made by St. Gregory to the numberleſs Letters which were ſent to him from all quarters (14), to declare the ſhare which the Writers had in the univerſal joy which his exaltation occaſioned. He anſwered no otherwiſe than by expreſſing, in the ſtrongeſt terms, the extreme affliction with which he was ſeized, at his being forced out of his ſolitude

(5) Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Grezoire, pag. 8.

(6) Hiſt. Literar. Script. Eccleſiaſt. pag. 430.

(7) In Annal.

(8) Nouv. Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 5. pag. 102. Dutch edition.

(9) Maimb. Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Greg. pag. 10.

(10) Idem, ibid. pag. 13.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Pag. 14.

(13) In February 1685, pag. 179.

(14) Maimb. Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. pag. 14.

that they could not have elected a perſon who was more worthy of this exalted ſtation; for, beſides his great learning, and the pains he took to inſtruct the Church, by both preaching and writing, he had a very happy talent to win over Princes in favour of the temporal as well as ſpiritual intereſt of Religion. It would take up too much time to deſcribe the particulars of his conduct on this occaſion; and I am the more unwilling to enlarge upon it, becauſe any one may inform himſelf of it in a modern writer (e). But I will not omit, that our Pope undertook the converſion of the Engliſh [D], and ſucceeded very happily in it by the aſſiſtance of a woman (f), as is generally found in revolutions relating to Religion. His maxims with reſpect to the forcing the conſcience of men were not uniform, and he ſometimes gave up that matter too far [E]; and indeed it ſolitude, in order to be engaged anew in worldly affairs. But becauſe experience has ſhewn in all ages, (this is Maimbourg's reflection) that the fine things which a man of genius may write and ſay, are not always a good proof of his integrity and virtue; and that there are many who think and act in a quite different manner from their preaching and writing, I ſhall not tranſcribe here what this great Pontiff has ſaid concerning himſelf on this occaſion in his writings. But here is one thing which juſtice will not allow me to omit, this is an error of the famous du Moulin, animadverted upon by Maimbourg. But that no one may complain of my extenuating or amplifying the thing, I ſhall make uſe of the Cenſor's own words (15).

(e) Maimb. in the Hiſt. du Pontificat. du St. Greg. le Grand.

(f) See the remark [D].

(15) Maimbourg, Preface de l'Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Gregoire.

Du Moulin the Miniſter, in a little piece he compoſed under the falſe Title of the Life of St. Gregory I, ſurnamed the Great, . . . would make us believe, that this Roman Pontiff was of a different Religion from ours. But, in order to ſpare my ſelf the trouble of refuting ſo wretched a Libel, it will be enough for me to ſhew, to evince what credit he deſerves, that he begins with the moſt groſs as well as moſt horrid untruth that ever was vented: For thus he ſpeaks, in chapter 11, pag. 9, to prove, contrary to the teſtimony of St. Gregory of Tours, that St. Gregory did not oppoſe in any manner his being made a Biſhop. Thoſe, ſaid he, who have writ the Life of Gregory, (particularly Gregory of Tours) declares that he made an oppoſition for ſome time; but this agrees very ill with what Gregory himſelf ſays in Epiſt. 4. of Book I, where he declares that he did not oppoſe his being made a Biſhop; and cites the following words in the margin, ſibi ut imponeretur Epiſcopatus non reſtitiſſe, i. e. that he did not oppoſe his being made a Biſhop. Now whoever reads this Epiſtle will find the direct contrary. And indeed, St. Gregory complains to his friend John Patriarch of Conſtantinople, for his not having prevented, by the good offices he ought to have done him with the Emperor, the confirming of his election; and he delivers himſelf as follows: If we are commanded to love our neighbour as ourſelves, why do not you love me as your ſelf? for I know with what ardour you would have declined the being made a Biſhop; and yet you did not endeavour to keep this burthen from my ſhoulders. St. Gregory complains here in expreſs terms, becauſe the Patriarch did not oppoſe his being made Biſhop of Rome; and du Moulin the Miniſter will have it, that St. Gregory owns in that very place, that he did not oppoſe this in any manner; thus aſcribing to this holy Pope what he himſelf ſays of the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, by way of complaint.

[D] Our Pope undertook the converſion of the Engliſh.] He ſent ſome Monks of his Monaſtery (16) into England, under the direction of Auguſtin their Abbot (17), whom the Biſhops of France conſecrated firſt Biſhop of the Engliſh Nation, according to the power given them by St. Gregory for that purpoſe (18). Ethelred was at that time King of England, and had married Aldeberga or Bertha, daughter to Charibert King of France, a young Princeſs of great wit, learning, and a very zealous Catholic (19). This Queen prevailed with him to hearken to the Pope's Miſſionaries. He ſent for them before him, and would not give them audience but in the open field, purſuant to an ancient ſuperſtitious notion of the vulgar, in order that if they had a mind to employ any charm, or ſome ſecret inchantment to deceive him, it might be diſpelled, and loſe all its power in the open air. . . . After having liſtned to them very calmly, he told them, that he was highly delighted with all they had related: but that nevertheleſs thoſe fine things, and eſpecially thoſe glorious promiſes they made him of everlaſting life, not appearing very certain to him, he did not think it expedient for him to abandon what he had received from his anceſtors, purely to hunt after uncertainties (20). He gave them permiſſion to preach in his Kingdom, and allowed every one, who approved of their doctrine, to embrace it. He himſelf became a convert to their Religion (21); and becauſe the example of Kings is commonly very powerful, either in matters of good or evil, moſt of the Engliſh embraced the Chriſtian Faith after him. And the circumſtance which compleated their converſion, was the ſmooth and efficacious manner by which he won them over: for he did not conſtrain or force any perſon to renounce their antient ſuperſtitions, having learnt from his Teachers, that the ſervice we do Chriſt ought to be voluntary (22). The Queen was prodigiouſly inſtrumental to theſe converſions; for ſhe not only prompted the King her Conſort to treat the Miſſionaries kindly, but alſo to become himſelf a convert. There have been few revolutions in Religion, whether of a good or ill kind, but have been chiefly influenced by women. Maimbourg will give us ſome examples of this (23). "We may affirm, that as the Devil made uſe formerly of the artifices of three Empreſſes (*), who were the wives "of Licinius, Conſtantius and Valens, to eſtabliſh "the Arian hereſy in the Eaſt; ſo God, to attack the "enemy with his own weapons, would alſo employ "three illuſtrious Queens, Clotilda wife of Clovis, "Ingonda wife of St. Ermenigilde, and Theodelinda "wife of Agilulphus, to ſanctify the Weſt, by converting the French from Heatheniſm, and by extirpating Arianiſm out of Spain and Italy, by the "converſion of the Viſigoths and Lombards." In another Work he had ſpoke only of the ſervice which women had done to bad cauſes; As tho' it were the fate (24) of every hereſy, ſays he, as an hundred examples have ſhewn, to find always a protection, and, if I may be allowed to expreſs myſelf in that manner, its ſtrength in the weakneſs of ſome Princeſs, who, either out of vanity, pride or illuſion, thinking perhaps to make a merit of it, will become the chief of a party, which not being able to maintain it ſelf, falls, and at laſt buries her miſerably under its ruins.

(16) i. e. of that which he had founded in his houſe at Rome.

(17) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. pag. 201.

(18) Idem, ibid. pag. 206.

(19) Ibid. pag. 207.

(20) Ibid. pag. 208, ad ann. 597.

(21) Ibid. pag. 212. ad ann. 600.

(22) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for Feb. 1686, pag. 193, 201. againſt the compariſon which Maimbourg makes between the methods employed by Ethelred and Lewis XIV to make converts.

(23) Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Gregoire, pag. 69.

(*) Conſtantia, Euſebia, Dominica.

(24) Hiſt. du grand Schiſme d'Occident, liv. 2. pag. m. 183. with regard to the Princeſs of Wales, who protected Wickliff. See alſo what he ſays in the ſame work, book 4. pag. 79.

[E] He ſometimes gave up that matter too far.] The little uniformity there was in his maxims, appears evidently, from his not approving to have force employed in converting the Jews; and his approving to have force uſed in bringing the hereticks back to the Church. St. Avitus Biſhop of Clermont in Auvergne . . . . walking in proceſſion, after his Clergy, thro' the City, all the people that followed him . . . . fell ſuddenly on the Jewiſh Synagogue, and razed it ſo entirely, that one ſtone was not left upon another (25). The Prelate, deſirous to make uſe of ſo favourable an opportunity, ſent to inform the Jews, that they either muſt turn Chriſtians or leave his Dioceſe, upon which three hundred of them were converted, and the reſt obliged to depart. This example was followed ſoon after in Spain and Italy, and eſpecially in Provence, where more was done than he did. For without giving himſelf the trouble to win them over to the Faith by holy inſtructions and good examples, they were baptized by forcible methods; a circumſtance that cauſed as many profanations of ſo ſacred a thing, and ſacrilegious actions, as there were Jews baptized. St. Gregory, to prevent ſo great an evil, wrote (†) to Virgilius Archbiſhop of Arles, and to Theodore Biſhop of Marſeilles, (both great and good men) ordaining them to prevent force from being employed in baptizing of the Jews, for fear leſt the ſacred Fonts, where men are born again to a new life by Baptiſm, may not be to them the occaſion of a ſecond death, more fatal to them than the firſt by apoſtacy. He had wrote a little before, to the ſame effect to the Biſhop of Terracina (26). He commanded him to leave the Jews the entire liberty of aſſembling in the place which had been granted them for the ſolemni-

(25) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Greg. pag. 239.

(†) Dum quiſpiam ad Baptiſmatis fontem non prædicatione, ſed neceſſitate pervenerit, ad priſtinam ſuperſtitionem remeans, inde deterius moritur, unde renatus eſſe videbatur. lib. 1. Ep. 45.

(26) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Greg. p. 240.

(27) Ibid. pag. 241.

zation

it is very difficult to prescribe rules for a thing so very repugnant to reason. But to compensate for this, his morality with regard to the chastity of Churchmen, was extremely rigid [F]; he asserting, that a man who had ever known women ought not to be admitted zation of their Feasts (27). This he wrote some time after to the Bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia. "The "Laws, says he, indeed forbid the Jews to build new "Synagogues; but then they permit them to enjoy "their old ones unmolested." Quia sicut legalis definitio Judæos novas non patitur erigere Synagogas; ita quoque eos sine inquietudine veteres habere permittit. "And he adds, what he says also with respect to the "Jews of Marseilles, that they must be brought over "to the Faith, by preaching and not by forcible me-"thods; that God requires the sacrifice which is made "to him, of the mind and heart, to be voluntary; "and adds, that those who are converted by violent "methods, and from necessity, return to their vomit "the first opportunity they have for it (28)." So far is admirably well; but here follows a strange distinction, and which forms a monstruous medley in a System. . . (29). "Not but that, according to him, there "is, in this, a great difference between the Infidels and "Hereticks, chiefly in the rise and beginning of he-"resies. For the latter ought to be treated as rebels, "perfidious and perjured wretches, who have violated "the Faith they had given to God and the Catholic "Church, out of which they came, by revolting "against her, and employing their utmost efforts to "destroy it. They may be forced to return to the obe-"dience which they owe to it, and to their duty; and "if they will not, they may be punished, according "to the Imperial Laws, the holy Fathers, and Cal-"vin himself who has wrote a piece on this subject, "to justify his conduct with regard to Servetus, whom "he caused to be condemned to the flames in Geneva. "But the case is different with respect to Heathens, "Jews, and Mahometans, and even to those Here-"tics, who being born in the heresy, which they re-"ceived from their ancestors, were not brought up in "the Church any more than the abovementioned In-"fidels. They ought not to be forced directly, and "by violence, to become converts to Christianity, "especially when they have been tolerated some time. "But St. Gregory informs us, both by his doctrine "and example, that it is good to constrain them in-"directly, according to the Gospel which saith, Com-"pelle intrare (force them to enter in,) which may be done these two ways; the one, by treating the ob-"stinate with rigour; and the other, by doing good to those who become converts to the Christian Religion. "It is thus that St. Gregory will have such "Manichees as are obstinate in their heresy to be "persecuted; that he ordains the Bishop of Cagliari "to load with heavy taxes the peasants, and such "heathens as are members of the Church, hold lands "of her, and refuse obstinately to embrace the Chri-"stian Religion; and that on the contrary, he will "have such Jews, who become converts, to be eased "of one third part of what they are obliged to pay "the Roman Church, for such lands of its patri-"mony as they cultivate in Sicily; in order that the "rest, allured by the hopes of a like abatement, "may be the more readily induced to turn Christians: "and to those who might very much suspect this sort of "conversions, he says (‡), that if these people im-"pose upon the world, and are not true converts, yet "much will be got by it, in as much as at least "their children will become good Catholics."

(28) Ibid. pag. 242.

(29) Ibid. pag. 243, 244.

(‡) Etsi ipsi minus fideliter veniunt: hi tamen qui de iis nati fuerint jam fidelius baptisantur. Aut ipsos ergo, aut eorum filios lucramur. lib. 4. Ep. 6.

REFLECTIONS on St. Gregory's maxims, with regard to the forcing of consciences.

This might suggest matter sufficient for a long discourse, but I shall content my self with a few notes. I. It is certain that the choice of conversion or banishment is very hard and severe, and very apt to make hypocrites; for what lengths will not people of moderate piety go, rather than lose the sweets of their native country? In a word, all who propose this choice, condemn it as a tyrannical action, wherever they themselves are exposed to it: an evident sign that they judge of the justice of an action, only as it squares with their own interest, quod volumus sanctum est, i. e. "what we require is holy." II. It is ascribing to the Church a power which it has not, to pretend that it may treat all who forsake it, as temporal States treat rebels. The Church can have none but voluntary subjects, and can never extort an oath that is derogatory to the law of order, by which men are commanded to follow the light of conscience in all times and places; and consequently those, who in obedience to this light, violate the faith which they have given to it, ought to be compared to those who prefer primitive and absolute oaths, to such as are posterior and conditional; for it would be impious in that person who should engage himself to a formulary of faith or belief, without presupposing that it is good; and thus all oaths by which men bind themselves to the Church are conditional; but the obligation to the light of conscience is natural, essential, and absolute. What may be said of those who, to obey their consciences, violate the oath they had taken to the Church, is, that from men of understanding they are become ignorant. But what well regulated State enacts punishments against such as forget their learning, or against others who imbibe ideas and notions which persuade them that what they mistook for error is truth? We may therefore say, that if the Church could punish those as rebels, who forsake it, it would have more power than the most despotic Princes (30) exercise; it might punish, as a capital crime, the change of some ideas or notions. III. We may easily comprehend that this is a chimerical distinction; for a man who has been brought up in a Church could never renounce the power of leaving it, whenever his conscience should prompt him to go over to another communion, and therefore he has as much right to follow this communion as those who were brought up in it: for the only right the latter have is, their being persuaded that their Religion is good. IV. My maxims are so true, that every party agrees to it, when they do not suppose their own principle. A Jew, so far from branding with the name of perfidious and rebellious, a man who forsakes the Christian belief to embrace the Jewish Religion, calls him, on the contrary, faithful to God, to Truth, and to the Church; and gives the name of perfidious to those only who forsake the Jewish belief. This is the practice of all Religions. V. As to the two ways of compelle intrare, i. e. "forcing people to come in." I refer the reader to the Philosophical Commentary. I shall only observe, that the expression Merchants of the word of God (31), suits in a more particular manner those who employ these two methods to convert people (32); and that it is morally impossible but that Monarchs who give a sanction to them, must be excited by those who promote this affair, to take unjust and base measures (33). VI. The reason why St. Gregory would not have the Jews converted to Christianity by forcible methods, is a very good one, viz. because that those who are converted in this manner return to their vomit whenever they have an opportunity for it: but he therefore was very much in the wrong, in ordering conversions to be made by loading the obstinate with taxes, and remitting a third part of them to those who should become converts to Christianity; for it is manifest that those who are thus converted, return to their vomit whenever they can do it with safety. VII. If the reason he gives for converting the Jews, by loading the obstinate with taxes, and easing converts be good, he is in the wrong for disapproving the employing of forcible methods in bringing them to baptism; for this is his reason; if these converts are hypocrites, yet much will be got by it, because, at least, their children will become good Catholics. May not the same be said with respect to those who are forced to baptism? It therefore must necessarily be a pitiful contradiction.

(30) i. e. considered only as Sovereigns; for it is to be observed that such Sovereigns as punish what they call heresy, do this only by vertue of their Religion, and therefore it is their Religion that properly inflicts the punishment: QUOD NOTANDUM.

(31) 2 Epist. to the Corinth. chap. ii. ver. 17.

[F] His morality, with regard to the chastity of Churchmen, was extremely rigid.] Whenever a Bishop was to be elected, he recommended above all things to the Electors, to enquire if the candidate for the See was guilty of adultery or simple fornication. "He even would have him asked privately, whether "he was not guilty of this crime; admonishing "him, that if he were guilty of it, though unknown "to any person, and there was no proof to convict "him, he yet could not in conscience take orders;

(32) This recalls to my memory the two following verses of Ennius: Nec mi aurum posco, nec mi pretium dederitis, Nec cauponantes bellum, sed belligerantes. Cicero, de Offic. lib. 1. cap 12.

(33) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calvinisme de Monsieur Maimbourg, tom. 1. pag. 205, & seq. and what is observed with regard to the methods of conversion employed by Queen Mary in England. Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, for Nov. 1685, pag. 1283.

ted to the Prieſthood; and always cauſed the candidates for it to be examined on that point. However, he excepted widowers on this occaſion, provided they had not behaved irregularly during their marriage, and had led a life of continence during a long courſe of years. He likewiſe exerted himſelf with great ſeverity againſt ſuch as were found guilty of calumny [G]. All things duly conſidered, he merits the ſirname of Great;

" however, that they ſhould be given him, in caſe he " would proteſt that he was clear from it; but if he " confeſſed his guilt on this occaſion, it ſhould be told " him in a gentle manner, that he ought rather to " think of retiring to a monaſtery, there to do pe- " nance, than to the Prieſthood, of which his crime, " though unknown to the whole world, rendered him " unworthy (34)." This great Pontiff being informed (35), that ſome Eccleſiaſtics of Sardinia had committed this ſin of uncleanneſs after their taking orders; ordained that they ſhould not only be depoſed, without hopes of ever being reſtored to the ſacerdotal function; but alſo that, to prevent ſo great an evil (*) no more perſons might be admitted to holy orders, and eſpecially to the Epiſcopate, without its being firſt certainly known whether they had always lived chaſtly; and that they had even lived in a ſtate of continence for ſeveral years after they had been ſeparated from their wives, in order to their being admitted to the Prieſthood. The Electors being divided at Naples in the choice of a Biſhop, this Pope declared expreſly, that he would not allow of John the Deacon (36), (37), " becauſe he had " been well informed, that he had a very young " daughter. Now what preſumption, added he, is " it in him, to aſpire to the Epiſcopal Dignity; he " who is manifeſtly convicted by this young child of " his, of the ſhort time he has lived in a ſtate of " continence? Nam quâ præſumptione ad Epiſcopatum audet accedere, qui adhuc longam corporis ſui continentiam, filiola teſte, convincitur non habere (†). He cauſed it to be inviolably obſerved, purſuant to the Canons, " that every Eccleſiaſtic or man who held a " benefice, whether Sub-deacon, Deacon, Prieſt, Abbot or Biſhop, who had committed the ſin of uncleanneſs, in caſe there were proofs of his guilt, " ſhould be depoſed, and ſent to a monaſtery there to " do penance; and be for ever after incapacitated " from being reſtored to his order and dignity.... " Having been informed (‡) that Abbot Secundinus, " who was a very wicked man, had been guilty of " horrid crimes, he ſaid, that without ſeeking for " proofs, in order to convict him of it judicially, it " was ſufficient that himſelf, perhaps in boaſting " what theſe kind of debauchees call their fortunate " adventures, had (‡) confeſſed, that he had diverted " himſelf with women, which yet had not prevented " his being made an Abbot; upon which he diveſted " him of his function (38). He treated after the ſame manner the Biſhop of Docleatina a City of Illyricum, now called Cataro; and gave orders to his Metropolitan, that if this wicked man who had been juſtly diveſted of his office, for having ſullied his character by this infamous vice, ſhould ever pretend, and even diſcover by a ſingle expreſſion, that he entertained any more thoughts of the Epiſcopate, he ſhould be ſhut up in a monaſtery, there to do penance, during the remainder of his life, and be deprived of the communion till his death. Si forte poſt depoſitionem ſuam inverecunde ac mente perverſa aliquid de Epiſcopatu loqui, atque rurſus ad hoc qualibet aſpirare præſumptione tentaverit. (). A very remarkable circumſtance in this is, that the Biſhop of Tarentum, not being accuſed, but only ſuſpected of having kept a concubine ſince his being a Biſhop; he admoniſhed him very ſeriouſly, that if he is conſcious to himſelf of his having committed this crime (although it were not known to any one) and that he denies it, and there was no convincing proof of it, he nevertheleſs is bound in conſcience to diveſt himſelf of his character, and to forbear all ſacerdotal functions. This will appear the ſtronger, in as much as this ſame Biſhop, having committed another crime, which the public thought more heinous, he yet inflicted an infinitely more gentle puniſhment upon him. For this too paſſionate Prelate, having received ſome treatment that diſpleaſed him, from " one of the poor old women who were maintained " at the expence of the Church, cauſed her to be " beaten at ſuch a rate, that it half killed her. It " is certain that had ſhe died a few days after having " been ſo barbarouſly beat, he would have been ſe- " verely puniſhed, in the utmoſt rigour of the Ca- " non Law, as guilty of murther: however, as ſhe " did not die till eight months after, St. Gregory " imagined that he ought not to aſcribe her death to " the blows ſhe had received, and therefore only ſuſ- " pended him for two months. But as to the incon- " tinence, which, according to the Laws of human " juſtice, would be puniſhed with much leſs rigour " than this other action ſo unworthy of a Biſhop; he " declares to him, that if he has committed it, (al- " though no proof could be given of it) he yet, to " ſatisfy his conſcience, muſt abſolutely quit his " Biſhoprick (39)."

Maimbourg does not leave this ſubject without obſerving, that the Canon-Laws are not now rigorouſly put in force in things of this kind; and that a man is not obliged to follow St. Gregory's opinion with reſpect to this caſe of conſcience (40).

[G] He likewiſe exerted himſelf with great ſeverity againſt ſuch as were found guilty of calumny.] All that Maimbourg relates on this ſubject ſeems ſo appoſite, that not finding any thing ſuperfluous in it, I did not think fit to abridge it. He obſerves (41), in the firſt place, that there is a very ſubtle oppreſſion (*), and ſo much the more dangerous as it is the more difficult to diſcover, viz. calumny, which the wiſeſt, and even thoſe who glory in ſuffering joyfully the firſt (42), find ſo barbarous and intolerable, that they cannot prevent, how great ſoever may be their ſtrength of mind, their conſtancy from being ſhaken. After which he proceeds thus. " I am ſenſible that () both the civil and ca- " non Laws appoint puniſhments for this crime, ſo " much complained of in the world; but they are not " always well obſerved with reſpect to Eccleſiaſticks, " as St. Gregory ſhews, and eſpecially in communities, " where calumny is ſcarcely puniſhed, upon pretence " that the puniſhing of a falſe accuſation, would take " away the liberty of producing new ones; and of " diſcovering to Superiours ſuch faults as really de- " ſerve puniſhment. Now this is what St. Gregory " could not bear with in any manner, as is manifeſt " from ſeveral of his Letters. And indeed (†), Epi- " phanius Prieſt of the Church of Cagliari, having " been falſely accuſed of ſome heinous crime by other " Sardiot Eccleſiaſticks, who had even brought the ac- " cuſation before the Pope; he himſelf would take full " cognizance of this cauſe: And having found that " it was nothing but mere calumny, with which they " wanted to oppreſs the innocence of this Prieſt, he " ſent him back fully abſolved to his Biſhop, enjoin- " ing that Prelate to reſtore him to his Order, and to " deprive the perſon who had accuſed him of the " Communion, unleſs he were ready to ſhew, by cano- " nical and very evident proofs, the truth of what he " had advanced againſt this Prieſt. This is (††) what " the Law requires, which adds, that he who accuſes " his brother falſly, ought to undergo the ſame puniſh- " ment the perſon accuſed would deſerve, were he " found guilty. Here follows ſomething farther. Hi- " larius, Subdeacon of the Church of Naples, having " brought a falſe accuſation againſt John, Deacon of " the ſame Church, which he could not maintain a- " gainſt ſeveral witneſſes who gave evidence of the " Deacon's innocence; the holy Pontiff was very much " offended that Paſchaſius their Biſhop had not yet " puniſhed the ſlanderer. Upon which he command- " ed Anthemius the defender, to tell him in his name, " that he will firſt have him deprived of his office of " Sub-Deacon of which he is unworthy; ſecondly, " that he be publickly whipp'd. Ut eundem Hilarium " prius Subdiaconatus, quo indignus fungitur, privet of- " ficio, atque verberibus publicè caſtigatum faciat in exi- " lium

(34) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Gregoire, pag. 351.

(35) Idem, ibid.

(*) Sed ne unquam ii qui ordinati ſunt pereant, provideri debet quales ordinantur, ut prius aſpiciatur ſi vita illorum continens in annis plurimis fuerit &c. L. 3. Ep. 26.

(36) One of the two who had been elected.

(37) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Gregoire, pag. 353.

(†) L. 8. Ep. 11.

(‡) Qui poſt acceptum ſacrum Ordinem lapſus in peccatum carnis fuerit, ſacro Ordine ita careat ut ad altaris miniſterium ulterius non accedat. L. 3. Epiſt. 26. Si Clericus fuerit à ſuo remotus officio, pro ſuis continuo lugendis exceſſibus in Monaſterium detrudatur. L. 3. Ep. 9. L. 1. Ep. 18, 42.

(‡) Hoc ſolum ad ejus damnationem poteſt ſufficere, quod etiam ipſe de ſe dicitur fuiſſe confeſſus, quod à ſtatu habitus ſui in lapſum corporis cecederit. L. 2. Ep. 23. Ind. 11.

(38) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Greg. pag. 354.

() Lib. 10. Ep. 34.

(39) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Gregoire, pag. 355, & ſeq.

(40) Ibid.

(41) Ibid. pag. 460.

(* Calumnia conturbat ſapientem. Eccleſ. c. 7. v. 8.

(42) i. e. the unhappineſs of being oppreſſed by the rigour of thoſe who govern.

() Digeſt. l. 3. tit. 2. Grat. c. 5. q. 6. cauſ. 6. q. 1.

(†) L. 3. Ind. 12. Ep. 24.

(††) Cod. l. 4. & 9. tit. de probat. leg. finali. Cum calumniantes ad vindictam poſcat ſimilitudo ſupplicii. Cauſ. 2. q. 8. c. 3.

Great; but we cannot excuſe the profuſion of encomiums by which he ingratiated himſelf in the favour and eſteem of an Uſurper [H], whoſe hands were ſtill reeking with one of the moſt execrable parricides that is found in hiſtory. It is a very remarkable example of the ſervitude into which that perſon falls, who is determined to maintain himſelf in an exalted employment. When we compare his flattery of the Emperor Phocas, with that which he beſtowed on a very wicked Queen of France [I], it muſt be confeſſed

(†) L. 9. Ind. 4. Ep. 66.

(††) Qui modus coercionis, & à Magiſtris liberalium artium, & ab ipſis parentibus, & ſæpe etiam in judiciis ab Epiſcopis ſolet uſurpari. Aug. Ep. 159.

" lium deportari, ut unius pœna multorum poſſit eſſe " correctio (†): for this kind of puniſhment was in- " flicted on Clerks at that time, as may be ſeen in St. " Auſtin (††), altho' this cuſtom has been ſince abo- " liſhed; and laſtly that, after having been puniſhed " in this manner, he be ſent into baniſhment, either " into a Monaſtery there to do penance, or by the or- " der of the Magiſtrate, to whom alone it belonged to " puniſh a criminal with baniſhment, by the Law of " the State. And as he manifeſted the horror in which " he held calumny, by puniſhing it with ſo much ſe- " verity; ſo he kept a very ſtrict guard upon himſelf, " to prevent his being overreached on theſe occaſions; " and did not give the leaſt credit to an informer or " accuſer, till ſuch time as having examined even to " the moſt inconſiderable circumſtances of the accuſa- " tion, and heard both parties with great attention, " he could not doubt in any manner of the truth of it. " He, beſides, was ſo much afraid of being impoſed " upon, though innocently, by the artifices of ca- " lumny, that whenever he had an opportunity for " ſo doing, he forbore to paſs ſentence on the accu- " ſation, by referring to ſome other perſon, on whoſe " capacity and probity he could entirely depend.

[H] We cannot excuſe the profuſion of encomiums by which he ingratiated himſelf in the favour and eſteem of an Uſurper.] The army of Mauritius the Emperor having revolted from him at the inſtigation of Phocas, marched towards Conſtantinople, and took it very eaſily. The Emperor was delivered up to Phocas, who was ſo dreadfully cruel, as to cauſe to be murthered, in his preſence, and before the eyes of Mauritius, five little Princes his children, whom their unfortunate father could not ſave (43). The nurſe of the youngeſt had ſaved him artfully from the maſſacres, and put her own ſon in his ſtead; but this being perceived by Mauritius, he cauſed his own to be given back to the executioners (44). " After this the tyrant, " more cruel than the fierceſt wild beaſts, not being " affected in any manner with ſo great and generous " an action, which drew floods of tears from all the " ſpectators, gave orders for the ſlaying of that little " innocent creature, and for ending this bloody ſa- " crifice of his cruelty by laying Mauritius on the " body of his five children as on an altar, where he " was inhumanly butchered." Mauritius's eldeſt ſon had been ſent a little before to the King of Perſia; but he was taken at Nicæa and beheaded. " The cruel " Phocas likewiſe put to death moſt of the Emperor " Mauritius's relations and friends, and even the " Empreſs Conſtantina, and her three daughters, " contrary to the promiſe he had made to the Pa- " triarch Cyriacus, viz. that he would ſuffer them to " live unmoleſted in a convent wherein they had ſe- " cluded themſelves. In fine, there never was ſo " much innocent blood ſhed, nor ſo many miſeries and " misfortunes as under his reign. . . . (45). And in- " deed, there never was a more infamous tyrant than " this wicked man, who had neither virtue, birth, " honour or merit; was very ill ſhaped, frightfully " ugly, having a hideous aſpect, ſeeming always in " a fury whenever he ſpoke; a drunkard, laſcivious, " brutal and ſanguinary; devoid of the leaſt ſen- " ſation of humanity; being wholly a ſavage beaſt " in his countenance and temper, and having no- " thing of a man about him, but his ſhape which " was horridly deformed; in a word, having all the ill " qualities that may be contraſted with thoſe which " Hiſtorians have ſo greatly applauded in Mauri- " tius (46)." I have tranſcribed the very words of Maimbourg, in order that no one may ſay, that I magnified Phocas's crimes, merely to caſt the greater odium on St. Gregory; and I will again borrow the expreſſions of the ſame Author, with regard to the adulation employed by this Pope, in order that I may not be accuſed of repreſenting things maliciouſly to his diſadvantage. I own, ſays the Hiſtorian (47), that all I have here related may give ſome uneaſineſs to thoſe who ſhall afterwards read the three epiſtles (*) which the holy Pontiff wrote to Phocas, and to Leontia his conſort, when advice was brought to Rome of what had been tranſacted in Conſtantinople, at his being crowned Emperor there. For he ſeems to rejoice in all theſe three letters, and to return thanks to God for his acceſſion to the imperial throne, as being the greateſt happineſs that could accrue to the Empire; and to ſpeak of him in the moſt advantageous terms, as of an admirable Prince who would make it flouriſh again, and raiſe it to great felicity, by delivering it from all the calamities with which it had been hitherto afflicted. And he praiſes God, that the people, after having ſuffered under ſo ſevere and uneaſy a yoke, began to enjoy the return of the ſweets of liberty under his adminiſtration. Maimbourg throws the beſt varniſh he can over this ſtrange adulation (48). He ſeeks ſeveral reaſons for this, but does not take any notice of the true one, viz. that Mauritius had declared in favour of the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, againſt Pope Gregory (49), in ſome very tickliſh diſputes, ſuch as thoſe always are which relate to authority or ſuperiority. The Pope, overjoyed at being delivered from an Emperor who favoured the Patriarch of Conſtantinople, beſtowed the moſt laviſh encomiums on this new Prince, in order to obtain from him what he deſired in oppoſition to his rival (50). There are very few examples of a virtue ſo pure and exalted, as to have been proof againſt the jealouſy of authority or party intereſt. Though a Prince be poſſeſſed of the moſt ſhining qualities, and withal acts againſt a certain Church, and is drove from his throne or murthered, ſhe looks upon this as a favour from heaven; kiſſes reſpectfully the human hand that procures it, and eſpecially when this hand oppoſes the other Prince. In ſuch a circumſtance, two contradictory propoſitions are found in the mouths of the Clergy; the party which loſes its protector, conſiders this loſs but as a horrid conſpiracy forged by the infernal powers, and cites both the divine and human Laws againſt the Revolution. But as to the other party, it ſpeaks of nothing but the miraculous way of Providence, of the paternal care of heaven, and runs vehemently into worldly politicks. But I queſtion whether this prepoſſeſſion was ever carried to ſuch infamous lengths as in the caſe of St. Gregory. How great a fall! what a blindneſs and baſe condeſcention was this! A Pope who exerts himſelf with ſo much ſeverity againſt a poor fornicating eccleſiaſtic, and pronounces ſuch dreadful ſentences on this occaſion, writes to Phocas, and at the ſame time does not expreſs the leaſt ſorrow, that Mauritius and his children had been put to death. No ſet of men inveigh more againſt Scepticks than the Clergy, and yet none are more apt to make a noſe of wax of the rules of morality, according to the reciprocal intereſt of their cauſe, which is in reality a very dangerous kind of Scepticiſm.

(43) See Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Greg. pag. 179.

(44) Ibid. pag. 180.

(45) Ibid. pag. 181.

(46) Ibid. pag. 182. ex Cedreno.

(47) Pag. 183.

(*) L. 2. Ep. 38. Ind. 6. & 45, & 46.

(48) Dr. Cave, in Hiſt. Liter. Scriptor. Eccleſ. pag. 431. expreſſes himſelf as follows: Anno 603 datis ad Phocam tyrannum literis imperium illi peſſimis flagitiis arreptum gratulatus eſt: quin & ſi verum fateri fas ſit, adeo turpiter in hac re lapſus eſt Gregorius, ut ſceleſtiſſimo parricidæ excogitatiſſimis adulandi artibus blandiri, & in pietiſſimi principis Mauricii manes acerrime debacchari non erubeſceret.

(49) Maimbourg, owns this, pag. 124.

(50) Phocas favoured the Court of Rome, and enacted a Law by which he forbid the Biſhop of Conſtantinople to entitle himſelf Oecumenial Patriarch, declaring that this title belonged to none but the Biſhop of antient Rome. See Maimbourg, pag. 126.

[I] A very wicked Queen of France.] This was Brunehaut. In all the letters which this Pope wrote to her, he beſtowed upon her (51) " all the praiſes " that can be laviſhed on one of the moſt perfect " Princeſſes of the world, ſo far as not to ſcruple to " declare expreſly, that no nation in the world is ſo " happy as the French, ſince it has merited ſuch a " Queen, endowed with virtues and fine qualities of " every kind." Præ aliis gentibus gentem Francorum aſſerimus felicem, quæ ſic bonis omnibus præditam meruit habere Reginam (†). Here follows what we meet with on this occaſion in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (52): We ought to make more account of this Pope's good intentions, than of his extreme complaiſance for Queen Brunehaut, who, according to moſt Hiſtorians, was the moſt wicked woman upon earth; but at the ſame time the moſt artful in winning over the Clergy to her intereſt, becauſe that at the ſame time that ſhe committed the moſt enormous crimes, ſhe was exceſſively liberal to Eccleſiaſtics (53), and founded temples and convents, not forgetting to ſue very devoutly for relicks to the

(51) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Gregoire, pag. 313.

(†) L. 2. Epiſt. 8.

(52) Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, for Feb. 1686, pag. 196.

(53) See Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. pag. 236.

confeſſed that thoſe who forced him to attend the papal throne, knew him better than he knew himſelf. Theſe ſaw that he was maſter of all the artifices and inſinuating addreſs neceſſary in thoſe who would raiſe great protectors to themſelves, and draw down the bleſſings of the earth upon the Church. It is very probable that the zeal which he ſhewed againſt the ambition of the Patriarch of Conſtantinople was ill governed [K]. It is not certain that he deſtroyed the noble monuments of the antient magnificence of the Romans [L], in order that ſuch as viſited Rome might not attend more to the triumphal arches, &c. than to holy things. The ſame may be affirmed with reſpect to the accuſation of his having burnt a numberleſs multitude of heathen books [M], and Livy in particular.

the holy Father. . . . Maimbourg proves the exemptions which are pretended to have been granted by this Pope to pious Queen Brunehaut to be ſuppoſititious; for St. Gregory applauds her for this virtue, and the like encomiums will be for ever beſtowed on any perſon who is munificent to the Church, the natural dupes of thoſe people, who ſometimes are dupes in their turn. This recalls to my memory the anſwer which a Carthuſian made to Philip de Comines: "the body of Jehan "Galeas, a great and wicked tyrant. . . . lies at the "Carthuſians in Pavia, near the Park, higher than "the chief altar; and the Carthuſians ſhewed it "me, at leaſt his bones (to which we go up by a "ladder) which ſmell no otherwiſe than it is natural "for them to do; and a native of Bourges gave him "the title of Saint, when aſking him ſoftly, why he "called him Saint, for that he could ſee painted round "him the arms of ſeveral cities which he had uſurped, "or had no right to; . . . he whiſpered in my ear, "and ſaid; we give the title of Saint, in this country, "to all from whom we receive any benefactions (54). The rule or maxim of theſe honeſt Friars ſuits all ages and countries.

(54) Philip. de Comines, Mem. liv. 7. pag. m. 451.

[K] The zeal which he ſhewed againſt the Patriarch of Conſtantinople was ill grounded.] This Patriarch is honoured as a Saint in the Greek Church. He was called John the Faſter. The ſirname of Faſter was beſtowed upon him, becauſe he was incredibly abſtemious, and led a life of the greateſt auſterity . . . (55). He employed his utmoſt endeavours to prevent his being raiſed to the Patriarchate (56), of which Pope Gregory gives him the following teſtimony, quo ſtudio beatitudo veſtra Epiſcopatus pondus fugere voluerit ſcio (57). But when this mighty Faſter had been ſeated ſome time on this noble throne, he was no longer able to govern his pride. Perhaps he was infected with this ill quality before his being raiſed to the Patriarchate; for it often happens, that when corrupted nature cannot excite men to voluptuouſneſs, ſhe compenſates for it by other faults, and chiefly by the ſpirit of pride. Perhaps too the patriarchal dignity, by I know not what contagious fatality, inſpired the ſoul of John the Faſter with ambitious thoughts. However this be, this exalted dignity furniſhed him with an opportunity of giving a looſe to his paſſions, and he might colour them with the ſpecious pretence of maintaining the rights of his Patriarchate. Thoſe who pretend to an auſtere devotion have the better opportunity of concealing their faults when they do not enjoy an employment, in which they may plead the intereſts of the Church, thoſe of God's glory, charity to their neighbour, &c. but when they are raiſed to ſuch poſts, they may give way to ſeveral paſſions, and indulge them to ſatiety under the ſacred Auſpices abovementioned. To return to John the Faſter. He aſſumed the title of Oecumenical Patriarch; at which the Pope was ſo much exaſperated, that he commanded him, upon pain of excommunication, to lay that title aſide. John the Faſter was ſo little intimidated at theſe menaces, that he always retained his title of Oecumenical; and this he did with ſo much haughtineſs, or rather affectation, that in the Acts or Inſtruments of a Synod which he ſent to Rome, . . . he ſtiles himſelf Oecumenical Patriarch almoſt in every line (58). This gave riſe to a very great quarrel between St. Gregory and him. Many people are of opinion that this was only a diſpute about words, and Maimbourg ſeems to prove this well enough. But this he cannot abſolutely do, without exhibiting a furious ſatyr againſt the two chief Prelates of that age, viz. the Biſhop of Rome and the Patriarch of Conſtantinople; for what can be more ridiculous than the ſtorms they raiſed, in caſe their diſpute was only about a name (59)?

(55) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pont. de St. Greg. pag. 103.

(56) Ibid. pag. 106.

(57) Gregor. lib. 1. Epiſt. 4. Ind. 9. apud Maimbourg, pag. 106.

(58) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. pag. 109.

(59) See the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, for February 1686, pag. 189.

[L] It is not certain that he deſtroyed the noble monuments of the ancient magnificence of the Romans.] It is certain that he was accuſed of this, as appears from the following words of Platina who rejects this accuſation. Neque eſt cur patiamur Gregorium hac in re à quibuſdam literarum ignaris potiſſimum carpi, quod ſuo mandato veterum ædificia ſint dirupta, ne peregrini & advenæ (ut ipſi fingunt) ad urbem religionis cauſa venientes poſthabitis locis ſacris, arcus triumphales & monumenta veterum cum admiratione inſpicerent. Abſit hæc calumnia à tanto Pontifice Romano præſertim; cui certe poſt Deum patria quam vita charior fuit (60). i. e. "Neither "ought we, in this matter, to ſuffer Pope Gregory "to be cenſured by ſome illiterate people, upon pre"tence that he commanded the edifices of the anti"ents to be demoliſhed, leſt travellers and foreigners "(as they pretend) coming to viſit Rome from a re"ligious motive; neglecting the holy places, ſhould "gaze with admiration upon the triumphal arches "and monuments of antiquity. Far be ſuch a ca"lumny from ſo great a Pope, who certainly, next "to God, loved his country more than his life." The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves, that Sabinianus, ſucceſſor to Gregory, diſcovered ſo ſtrong an animoſity againſt his predeceſſor, that he was going to burn his books. Some inhabitants of Rome prompted the new Pope to this, becauſe (as we are told) St. Gregory had either maimed or demoliſhed the ſtatues of the antient Romans; but Platina rejects alſo this accuſation. Paululum etiam abfuit quin libri ejus comburerentur, adeo in Gregorium ira & invidia exarſerat homo malevolus. Sunt qui ſcribant Sabinianum inſtigantibus quibuſdam Romanis hoc in Gregorium molitum eſſe, quod veterum ſtatuas tota urbe dum viveret, & obtruncaverit & disjecerit: quod quidem ita vero diſſonum eſt, ut illud quod de abolendis ædificiis majorum in vita ejus diximus (61).

(60) Platina, in Gregorio.

(61) Idem, in Vita Sabiniani.

[M] He was accuſed of having burnt a numberleſs multitude of heathen books.] It is related that the Palatine Library, founded by Auguſtus, had been burnt to aſhes by St. Gregory. I have read this particular only in Joannis Sariſberienſis, and therefore do not give much credit to it, but will nevertheleſs tranſcribe his words. Si vero mathematicorum via eſſet uſquequaque laudabilis, non tantopere pœnituiſſet magnum Auguſtinum ſe eorum conſultationibus inclinaſſe. Ad hæc doctor ſanctiſſimus ille Gregorius, qui melleo prædicationis imbre totam rigavit & inebriavit eccleſiam, non modo mathefin juſſit ab aula, ſed ut traditur à majoribus, incendio dedit probatæ lectionis ſcripta, Palatinus Quæcunque tenebat Apollo.

In quibus erant præcipua, quæ cæleſtium mentem, & ſuperiorum oracula videbantur hominibus revelare (62). i. e. "But if the practice of the Aſtrologers were ſo "laudable, the great St. Auſtin would not have re"pented ſo much his having conſulted them. Far"ther, the moſt holy Doctor St. Gregory, who im"proved and edified the whole Church with his mel"liſluent Sermons, did not only forbid the practice of "Aſtrology in the Court, but as we find by tradition, "committed to the flames the moſt excellent books "in the Palatine Library; among which were thoſe "that ſeemed to reveal to mankind the will of hea"ven and the oracles of thoſe above." He ſays elſewhere, that St. Gregory deſtroyed profane books, in order to bring the ſacred books into greater eſteem. Fertur beatus Gregorius bibliothecam combuſſiſſe gentilem, quo divinæ paginæ gratior eſſet locus, & major autoritas, & diligentia ſtudioſior (63). A moſt certain circumſtance is, that the Pope had a very great averſion to the books of the heathens. This the reader may particular [N]. He died the 10th of March 604. I ſhall not make any remark concerning his works, but refer my reader to Du Pin, whoſe work is more eaſily met with than this Dictionary will be. I had like to have omitted the zeal which this Pope ſhewed for the Pſalmody of the Church [O].

(62) Joan. Sariſberienſis, de Nugis Curialium, lib. 2. cap. 26. pag. m. 104.

(63) Ibid. lib. 8. cap. 19. pag. 557.

(g) A Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Maur.

The work which Father Denys of St. Marthe (g) printed (h), intitled, The Hiſtory of St. Gregory the Great, had not appeared in public when I drew up this article. I have juſt now peruſed this hiſtory; and I ſhould take it for one continual panegyric of this great Pope, had not the Author frequently interſperſed the elogiums with ſeveral obſervations, which explain matters, illuſtrate facts, or refute ſome other writers. He gives, in the preface, a catalogue of thoſe who have wrote the Life of St. Gregory; and it is there he cenſures ſome errors of Peter du Moulin the Proteſtant Miniſter, excluſive of that which was taken notice of in the remark C. He does not ſeem ſatisfied with Maimbourg [P]. He refutes Cardinal Baronius with regard to what is related of St. Gregory's judge of from the following paſſage in hiſtory. "Didier "Archbiſhop of Vienna, was a man of very great "merit, rare erudition, and moſt diſtinguiſhed vir- "tue, to whom St. Gregory wrote more than once "with very great encomiums; and nevertheleſs he "blamed his conduct, and reproved him very ſharp- "ly, as being guilty of a very great crime, for em- "ploying his time in teaching ſome of his friends "grammar, polite literature, and explaining the Po- "ets to them. He aſſures him that this unhappy "news filled him with ſo much affliction, that all the "joy he felt upon hearing the ſucceſs of his ſtudies, "and his extenſive capacity, was changed on a ſud- "den into ſorrow. Quia in uno ſe ore cum Jovis "laudibus Chriſti laudes non capiunt. Et quam grave "nefandumque ſit Epiſcopis canere quod nec Laico religioſo "conveniat, ipſe conſidera. Quantò execrabile eſt hoc "de Sacerdote enarrari, tantò utrum ita nec ne ſit "diſtricta & veraci oportet ſatisfactione cognoſci. Be- "cauſe, ſays he, the praiſes of Jupiter and thoſe "of Chriſt cannot conſiſt from the ſame mouth. "Conſider a little how ſhameful and deteſtable it is "in a Biſhop, to ſing ſuch verſes as even a devout "and religious layman could not repeat with decency, "and without injuring his profeſſion. He adds, "though other people had aſſured him this was o- "therwiſe, it yet grieves him very much; and that "he will make the more exact enquiry into the "truth of this, becauſe it is more dreadful and even "execrable, to hear ſuch a report of a Prieſt and "Biſhop. Si poſthac evidenter ea quæ ad nos perlata "ſunt falſa eſſe claruerint, nec vos nugis & ſæcula- "ribus literis ſtudere conſtiterit: Deo noſtro gratias a- "gimus, qui cor veſtrum maculari blaſphemis nefando- "rum laudibus non permiſit. But if, (ſays he,) to "comfort him, I can plainly perceive that this report "ſpread againſt you is falſe, and that you do not "amuſe your ſelf with thoſe fooleries of human lite- "rature and worldly and ſecular ſciences; I ſhall re- "turn thanks to God, for not ſuffering your heart "to be defiled with encomiums filled with blaſphe- "mous expreſſions, which theſe profane Authors be- "ſtow on the moſt wicked wretches (64)." Maim- bourg did not fail to reflect upon himſelf after writing what I have copied above. See his words in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, for September 1686, pag. 1034; and in Seckendorf pag. 4. Book 1. of the Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm.

(h) At Roan, in 1697, 4to.

(64) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Pontif. de St. Greg. pag. 263, 264.

[N] ... and Livy in particular.] Antoninus Archbiſhop of Florence, is the moſt antient Author cited for this purpoſe by Voſſius. It is pretended that Livy was treated in this manner, becauſe he expatiates too much on the ſuperſtitious cuſtoms of the Heathens. At mirificus zelus fuit S. Gregorii, qui ut S. Antoninus, & ex eo J. Heſſelius, ex utroque Raderus ad Martialem tradit, Livium propterea combuſſit, quod in ſuperſtitionibus & ſacris Romanorum perpetuo verſetur (65).

(65) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 98.

[O] I had like to have omitted the zeal which this Pope ſhewed for the Pſalmody of the Church.] "(66). He "applied himſelf chiefly to the regulating the office "and ſinging of the Church, for which purpoſe he "drew up his Antiphonarium ... (67). Nothing "can be more wonderful than what he did on this "occaſion. Although he had the adminiſtration of "all the affairs of the univerſal Church, and was "ſtill more burthened with maladies, than with that "numberleſs multitude of different affairs, (which he "was obliged to ſuperintend) in every part of the "world: he nevertheleſs found time to examine to "what tunes the ſeveral Pſalms ſhould be ſet, as "well as the Hymns, Prayers, Verſes, Reſponſes, "Canticles, Leſſons, Epiſtles, Goſpel, the Præfatio "(part of the Maſs) and the Lord's Prayer; what "tones, meaſures, notes and moods, were moſt ſuit- "able to the majeſty of the Church, and beſt adapted "to inſpire devotion; and of all this he formed that "Church Muſic, every part of which is ſo ſolemn "and edifying, and which now goes by the name of "Gregorian Muſic. He likewiſe inſtituted an Aca- "demy of Choriſters (†), for all Clerks, to the Dea- "conſhip excluſively, and this becauſe Deacons ought "to be employed only in preaching the Goſpel, "and in diſtributing the Church-alms among the "poor; and that he would have the Choriſters ap- "ply themſelves to learn in perfection the art of true "chaunting by note; and to modulate their voices "in ſuch a manner as that they may ſing agreeably "and devoutly, which, according to St. Iſidore, is "obtained only by faſting and abſtinence. Pridie "quam cantandum erat cibis abſtinebant pſallentes, "legumine in cauſa vocis aſſidue utebantur, unde & "cantores apud gentiles Fabarii dicti ſunt (*). The "Antients, ſays he, uſed to faſt the eve of their "chaunting, and uſed only pulſe for their ordinary "diet, in order to make their voices clearer, whence "the heathens gave the name of bean-eaters to "ſingers. I know not whether the Choriſters of the "preſent age would willingly ſubmit to this method, "to which they are not much uſed. However this "be, St. Gregory employed very great pains in in- "ſtructing them; and himſelf taught them to ſing, "though he was Pope. Joannes Diaconus informs "us, that, in his time, there was kept with great "veneration, in the palace of St. John of Lateran, "the bed in which, though he was ſick, he never- "theleſs uſed to chaunt, for the better inſtructing of "the young Clerks; the whip with which he uſed to "menace young Clerks, and the Choir-boys, when- "ever they failed in the key, and miſtook in the "notes of his muſic. Uſque hodie lectum ejus in quo "recubans modulabatur, & flagellum ejus quo pueris "minabatur, veneratione congruâ cum authentico An- "tiphonario reſervatur (†)." I muſt here make an obſervation with reſpect to ſuch as quote Authors without examining circumſtances. The Walloon Clergyman who publiſhed, anno 1644, a large volume on the divine melody of the holy Pſalmiſt, did not take time to conſider, whether or no the circumſtances of things had been changed ſince the age of Joannes Diaconus, who wrote the Hiſtory of St. Gregory. Joannes Diaconus lived in the ninth Century. He tells us, that the whip was ſtill preſerved with which this great Pope uſed to menace the ſcholars who learnt muſic. But it does not follow from thence that we may employ, as he does, the preſent tenſe, in relating that particular; and conſequently the Walloon Miniſter very juſtly deſerves cenſure. His words are theſe (68). The above cited Gregory the Great inſtituted a ſchool for Choriſters, and built colleges for their uſe, which he endowed with ſuitable revenues. There is STILL ſhewed, in Rome, his bed on which he uſed to lie and chaunt; the whip with which he uſed to correct his ſcholars, and the authentic Antiphonarium. Naucl. 94.

(†) Scholam quoque Cantorum quæ hactenus, eiſdem inſtitutionibus in S. R. Eccleſ. modulatur conſtruit. L. 4. Ep. 44.

(*) Iſid. de Eccleſ. Offic. lib. 2. c. 12.

(†) Jo. Diac. L. 2. c. 6.

(68) Jerem. de Pours divine Melodie, pag. 1070.

[P] Father Denys of St. Marthe ... does not ſeem ſatisfied with Maimbourg.] According to him the Hiſtory of the Pontificate of St. Gregory the Great, publiſhed

(i) The Editor of St. Gregory's Works of 1675.

Gregory's monaſtic life; and he oppoſes ſome ſentiments of Gouſſainville (i). His remark with regard to the Centuriators of Magdeburg is intermixed with falſe Criticiſms, as we ſhall ſee below [Q]. I do not find that he cenſures Pope Gregory in any reſpect. He publiſhed by this Author, does not contain the entire Life of this Saint (69). He adds, that Maimbourg expatiated only on certain incidents of his Pontificate which ſquared with his deſigns and views; neglecting all the reſt which yet were worthy of being known. " I am " ſenſible, ſays he in another place (70), that a famous writer, who has publiſhed the hiſtory of the " Pontificate of St. Gregory, and who pretends ſo " much to impartiality, has blamed him for expatiating with ſo much warmth on a trifling affair. I " nevertheleſs don't doubt but that if St. Gregory, or " any other Pope, had endeavoured to get himſelf " entitled Oecumenical Patriarch: and that John the " Patriarch of Conſtantinople, or any other Biſhop, " had oppoſed this; the ſame writer would have cenſured the Pope for ſuch an attempt, as being an " intolerable preſumption and uſurpation; have applauded the generoſity of the Patriarch, of the Biſhop, and of all in general who had oppoſed it. " So dangerous it is in an Hiſtorian to take up the " pen with a prejudiced mind; a mind that is as ſtudious of intermixing incidents with its own reflections, as of delivering thoſe incidents with the utmoſt ſincerity." This Author has here given us a diſadvantageous idea of Maimbourg's probity.

(69) Denys de Sainte Marthe, in his preface.

(70) Idem, Hiſt. de St. Gregoire, liv. 3. chap. 1. pag. 336, 337.

[Q] His remark with regard to the Centuriators of Magdeburg, is intermixed with falſe Criticiſms, as we ſhall ſee below.] It is univerſally known, that the diſpute, with regard to the vow of celibacy, between the Proteſtants and Romaniſts is very great; and that one of the arguments alledged by the Proteſtants is, that thoſe vows are attended with many diſorders, and a numberleſs multitude of (71) works of darkneſs, unfruitful according to the ſenſe of the Goſpel; but very fruitful in another ſenſe, ſince they give life to a great number of human creatures. It is true indeed, that theſe are fruits which are not ſuffered to ripen; the utmoſt endeavours are uſed to ſtifle them before their birth; efforts muſt be uſed in order to ſcreen the firſt crime, and this can hardly be done without committing a ſecond ſin of a more heinous nature than the former. This is what controverſial writers never fail to alledge; and they even ſay that the diſcovery of theſe irregularities and diſorders has ſometimes occaſioned a repeal of the harſh Law of Celibacy. Here follows a long citation from Father Denys de St. Marthe. " I ſhall not undertake to re" fute here a fiction publiſhed by the Centuriators of " Magdeburg (†), which deſtroys itſelf. According " to them St. Gregory the Great, after enacting a " decree, by which Prieſts were ordered to put away " their wives, was obliged to repeal it, becauſe of " the conſequences attending it. A little after this " regulation, the Pope, ſay they, having ordered " ſome people to go a fiſhing in a reſervoir belonging " to him, inſtead of fiſh, there were drawn out of " the water ſix thouſand heads of little children. " Gregory knowing therefore that the children were " the fruit of the incontinence of the Prieſts whom " he had bereaved of their wives, repealed his de" cree; and did penance for the ſin he had commit" ted, by occaſioning ſo many crimes. It is added, " that St. Udalric Archbiſhop of Augſburg wrote " this to Pope Nicholas. Now this whole relation " is only a confuſed heap of ridiculous falſities. Why " did they make choice of the Pope's reſervoir, ra" ther than the Tyber, or other public places, to caſt " in the heads of the ſix thouſand children? What " was done with their bodies of which not the leaſt " mention is made? Is it probable that thoſe who " murthered them, and whoſe intereſt it was to con" ceal them, took a pleaſure in beheading them, " and in carrying their heads within the walls of the " Pope's palace, in order that their crimes might be " ſoon diſcovered? Were they not afraid of their " floating upon the water? How had they agreed all " together to carry all thoſe bodies into one and the " ſame place? For we are not told that any were " found elſewhere (72)." Here are difficulties that are not ſtarted either by Baronius or Bellarmin, when they refute this tale of the Centuriators of Magdeburg. I connot ſay whether they were not invented by Father Denys of St. Marthe; but he will permit me to ſay, that if they appear ſpecious to thoſe who ſtop at the firſt impreſſions of things, they will ſeem no ways ſolid to thoſe who examine matters attentively. Every one will acknowledge to me, that in matters of fact or incidents, thoſe who refute ought to raiſe ſuch objections as may oppoſe the aim of their adverſary. Let us ſee whether the difficulties ſtarted by Father St. Marthe have this property. I ſhould think them ſolid, if Udalric, and thoſe who quote his letter, had pretended that the murtherers of the baſtards in queſtion cut off their heads, and threw them no where but in the Pope's refervoir. This aſſertion would be liable to the great inconveniencies propoſed by the Author; and it would be extremely difficult to alledge any probable reaſon againſt his ſeveral queſtions. But we are not to ſuppoſe that the Centuriators intended this, their deſign being only to relate what had been diſcovered in St. Gregory's reſervoir; and if they made no mention of the Tyber, or any other public place, it is not that they believed that none of the baſtards of the Eccleſiaſtics had been thrown into them, but becauſe they did not know that the like crimes had been diſcovered in thoſe places; or becauſe they were ſatisfied with the conſequences that might be drawn from what had been ſeen in the reſervoir. They ſuppoſed that the following inference would naturally be drawn from it; the Pope's reſervoir only contained ſix thouſand children; conſequently an almoſt numberleſs multitude of children have been made away with, to conceal the guilt of their parents; for how many have been thrown into the Tyber, into Common-ſewers and Wells? What numbers were buried, &c? Does a man who relates that in digging the foundations of a certain palace, a great number of medals or bones were found, infer from ſuch a relation, that this was the only place in which ſuch things were found; and could his adverſaries, upon pretence of his making no mention of other places, deny what is affirmed by him? It is to be obſerved, that there is one particular reaſon why this reſervoir is mentioned rather than the Tyber, &c. Rivers are not emptied, but reſervoirs or ponds are drained from time to time in order to take the fiſh out of them; and it is on ſuch occaſions that people may ſee whether any children had been thrown into them. To know their number, the heads only are counted, which are ſingle parts in every child, and very eaſily diſtinguiſhed. Theſe are the reaſons why the heads only ought to be mentioned in Udalric's Letter. Father de St. Marthe ought not to be diſpleaſed at their making no mention of the bodies. Such an objection might properly have been made to commiſſioners who had been ſent upon the ſpot, to examine the ſtate of the reſervoir. Theſe would be blame worthy, did not their enquiries contain more circumſtances than Udalric's Letter. They would have been obliged to obſerve whether, beſides the heads, any bones had been found; whether all the bodies were as ſo many ſkeletons; whether ſome were but half rotten, or but half devoured by the fiſh, and ſuch like particulars; but an Author who mentions this diſcovery, as an argument againſt the Laws of Celibacy, has no buſineſs to deſcend to particulars; and needs but obſerve, in general, that ſix thouſand heads were found. If what Father Sainte Marthe relates concerning the ſituation of the reſervoir was true, this would be a conſiderable objection; but who told him that the reſervoir in queſtion was within the walls of the palace? Would Baronius have overlooked this reaſon, had there been any grounds for it? Would he have barely ſaid, that the reſervoirs or ponds were not public, but very well guarded? Cum certum ſit piſcinas illas in quibus piſces aſſervari ſolent, non fuiſſe omnibus publicas, ſed optime cuſtoditas (73). This is but a weak reaſon; for centinels are not poſted in the night time round theſe places;

(71) See the Epiſt. to the Epheſ. chap. v. ver. 11.

(†) Cent. 6. c. 7.

(72) Denys de St. Marthe, Hiſt. de St. Greg. liv. 2. chap. 4. pag. 206.

(73) Baron. ad ann. 591. num. 21. pag. m. 29.

He acts the Apologiſt on every occaſion; on the encomiums beſtowed on Phocas and Brunehald; the credulity this Pope ſhewed by the multitude of miracles publiſhed by him in his Dialogues [R], and on the inconſtancy of his principles with regard to perſecutions places; the proprietors only take care to prevent any perſons coming to fiſh in them without their leave, which however will not be an obſtacle to thoſe who would throw an infant into them.

Perhaps many controverſial Writers, who ſhould be Apologiſts for the Centuriators of Magdeburg in oppoſition to Father Sainte Marthe the Benedictine, would end their Apology here. I am acquainted with ſome who would act in this manner; and who even ſinging Io triumphe with an air of inſult would boaſt their having deſtroyed all the new engines which the Monk had employed againſt the relation of theſe German Authors. But with regard to my ſelf, who think it an honour not to imitate (74) a conduct ſo repugnant to ſincerity, I aſſure my readers, that Father Denys de Sainte Marthe has employed infinitely more ſolid reaſons than thoſe I have refuted, he adding what follows (75): But how impudent is it to aſſert, that St. Gregory was leſs ſtrict with reſpect to the continence of Prieſts? What Pope ever ſhewed more zeal and reſolution for the obſervance of it? We may know his real ſentiments, by the anſwer he made to St. Auſtin with regard to certain difficulties which he had propoſed to him. For, in his anſwer to the ſecond article, he expreſly excludes all Clerks, in holy Orders, from the number of thoſe who are allowed to marry. To confound ſtill more the heretical Writers, who give credit to this fabulous ſtory, we have already ſhewn, that Pope Nicholas I was dead before St. Udalric was born; and that Nicholas II was not raiſed to the Pontificate till many years after the death of this Saint. Here are two ſtrong arguments againſt the aſſertions of the Centuriators: Baronius (76) and Bellarmin (77) had employed them to very great advantage. The Benedictine in queſtion ſhould have ſtopt here; for the true method of multiplying replies and rejoinders in infinitum, is to intermix falſe reaſons or arguments with true ones: an adverſary will ever find matter ſufficient to foment the diſpute, ſo long as falſe proofs ſhall be given him to refute; and he will perſuade many people of his party, who never read the Works of his antagoniſts, that his cauſe is ever victorious. Hence it is that nothing is ever cleared up with reſpect to a numberleſs multitude of people; and that many conſider, as doubtful, ſuch particulars as deſerve to be utterly rejected. Methinks we may rank in this claſs, that incident mentioned by the Centuriators of Magdeburg and their Uldaric; for, on one ſide, we don't find, in any other Writer, the leaſt traces either of the repeal or repentance aſcribed by them to St. Gregory; and on the other, it appears evidently by the writings of this Pope, that he never gave up or retracted with regard to forbidding Prieſts to marry. All he did on this occaſion was, his not requiring ſuch Sub-deacons, as had been ordained before the Decretal (78) of his Predeceſſor, to be ſeparated from their wives; but he would not allow of their being raiſed to ſuperiour Orders; and enacted that Biſhops ſhould not ordain any new Sub-deacons, till after making them promiſe to lead a life of continence (79). Unleſs therefore ſolid proofs are brought, both of the repealing of the Law relating to celibacy, and of St. Gregory's repentance; and farther, if it be not manifeſtly ſhewn, that there was an Udalric Biſhop of Augſburg, contemporary with ſome Pope named Nicholas; thoſe Writers who ſpeak of a Letter of one Udalric, and the ſix thouſand childrens heads found in St. Gregory's fiſh-pond, will never merit the leaſt credit.

I will add two or three obſervations more. I. The Continuators have not drawn up their ſtory well. Their own words are as follow. Beatus Gregorius magnus Papa primus aliquando ſuo quodam decreto uxores ſacerdotibus adimit. Deinde paulo poſt cum idem Gregorius juſſiſſet ex piſcina ſua piſces aliquot capi, piſcatores pro piſcibus ſex millia capitum infantium ſuffocatorum repererunt. Quam cædem infantium cum intelligeret S. Gregorius ex occultis fornicationibus vel adulteriis ſacerdotum natam eſſe; continuo revocavit decretum, & peccatum ſuum dignis pœnitentiæ fructibus purgavit (89). Theſe Writers ſuppoſe, that Pope Gregory enacted a Decree, by which the Prieſts were forbid to marry; and that a little after, he ordered ſome fiſh to be taken out of his pond; but that the Fiſhermen, inſtead of fiſh, found ſix thouſand children's heads; that thereupon the Pope in queſtion repealed his Decree, and atoned for his ſin by fruits worthy of repentance; and knew, that the incontinence of the Prieſts had occaſioned the murther of ſo many children. This ſtory, I again ſay, is very ill drawn up. It ſuppoſes that ſix thouſand children were thrown into the Pope's reſervoir, in a very ſhort ſpace of time; and that the Fiſhermen, who found the ſix thouſand heads of theſe ill fated creatures, did not catch any fiſh. All this is abſurd: many years are required for the drowning ſo great a number of children in one and the ſame place (81), and would rather increaſe the fiſh to a very great degree, than quite deſtroy them. The ſtory would have appeared much more probable, had it been ſaid, that St. Gregory annulled the celibacy of the Clergy which had been eſtabliſhed a great number of years; and that the cauſe why he allowed them to marry was, that having ordered his fiſh-pond to be cleared, which had not been ſo during a long courſe of years, ſix thouſand children's heads were found therein. Such a relation as this gives as great a number of years as could be deſired. My ſecond obſervation is, that a Writer, by not digeſting or well diſpoſing the ſeveral circumſtances of an incident (82), makes it doubtful, improbable, ridiculous and abſurd, tho' it be ever ſo true and certain in itſelf; for taking it for granted, that the heads of ſix thouſand children had been really found, Udalric and the Centuriators would make it appear improbable, by their careleſs manner of relating it. My third obſervation is, that Theophilus Raynaud, in a paſſage cited by me elſewhere (83), ſuppoſes, that the heads were found in the well of Pope Gregory II; now here are two miſtakes, the one with regard to the place, and the other with reſpect to the Pope. The queſtion aſked by Bellarmin (84), how they knew that theſe ſix thouſand children had been got by Eccleſiaſtics, and not by Laymen, may be conſidered as an objection, but not as a puzzling difficulty; for altho' Gregory I. might have imagined, that the Laity had got ſome of the children in queſtion, he yet would have conſidered at the ſame time, that the celibacy which was enjoined the Clergy made the enormity ſtill greater. It is certain that the Laity deſtroy a numberleſs multitude of children, in order to ſcreen their guilt (85). I am to obſerve, that Udalric, Biſhop of Augſburg, lived in the tenth Century, and that the letter in queſtion was printed in the work intitled Orthodoxologia ſanctorum Patrum, at Baſil, in the ſixteenth Century.

[R] The credulity this Pope ſhewed, by the multitude of miracles publiſhed by him in his Dialogues.] "Some "learned men, who are not pleaſed with the relation "of all theſe miracles, have doubted whether thoſe "Dialogues were really written by St. Gregory, they "not thinking them worthy ſo great a Luminary of "the Church (86)." Father Denys de Sainte Marthe, having ſpoke in this manner, refutes very ſolidly the doubts of theſe learned men, and ſhews them that the Dialogues in queſtion were really compoſed by St. Gregory. Du Pin acknowledges them to be ſo (87); but then he confeſſes at the ſame time, that they ſeem not worthy of the gravity and diſcernment of this holy Pope, becauſe they abound with ſo many extraordinary miracles, and ſtories that are almoſt incredible. It is true indeed that he has related them on the teſtimony of others; but then he ſhould not have believed them ſo inconſiderately, nor publiſh them afterwards as true incidents. . . The ſtories which are told in theſe Dialogues, have often no better authority than the bare relation of ſome ignorant old men, or vulgar report. The miracles told in them are ſo numerous, ſo extraordinary; and often about things of ſo little conſequence, that it would be very difficult to believe them all. There are ſome ſtories which can hardly be reconciled with the lives of thoſe of whom he ſpeaks; as the voluntary impriſonment of St. Paulinus in Africa, under the King of the Vandals. No Author abounds with ſo many viſions, apparitions, and dreams. And indeed St. Gregory owns at the cloſe of his work, that more particulars, relating to the other world, had been diſcovered in his time, than in all the preceding Ages.

(74) Longe mea diſcrepat iſtis Et vox & ratio. Horat. Sat. 6. ver. 92. lib. 1.

(75) St. Marthe, Hiſt. de St. Gregoire, pag. 207.

(76) Baron. ad ann. 591. num. 19, 20, 21.

(77) Bellarmin, de Clericis, lib. 1. cap. 22. pag. m. 1124, 1125.

(78) That by which Pope Pelagius II had commanded all the Sub-deacons of Sicily to part from their wives.

(79) See Sainte Marthe, Hiſt. de St. Greg. pag. 205, 206.

(80) Magdeburg. apud Baron. ad ann. 591. num. 19. pag. m. 27.

(81) Baron. ad ann. 591. num. 21. employs this reaſon.

(82) Apply theſe words here, Nihil eſt, Antipho, Quin male narrando poſſit depravarier. Terent. in Phor. Act. 4. Scen. 4. ver. 16. i. e. "There is no "ſtory but may "be ſpoilt in the "telling."

(83) In the article BELLARMIN, remark [E].

(84) Bellarmin. de Clericis, lib. 1. pag. 1125.

(85) See the remark [C] of the article PATIN.

(86) St. Marthe Hiſt. de St. Greg. pag. 273.

(87) Du Pin, Bibliotb. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. tom. 5. pag. 138. Dutch edit.

ſecutions in matters of Religion &c. He joins with thoſe who deny that St. Gregory delivered Trajan's ſoul out of hell (k). Had it been true that after the death of this Pope, part of his writings had been burnt; and that they all would have met with the ſame fate, had it not been for an incident [S] very much reſembling that which had anti-ently

(k) See the remark [A] of the Article TRAJAN.

Ages. But, in my opinion, no man would warrant the truth of all theſe ſtories. Father Denys de Sainte Marthe acknowledges (38), "that he would not warrant the "truth of all the miracles and viſions which are re-"lated in the Dialogues." He nevertheleſs does not blame the conduct of this Pope. Our Saint, ſays he, might have told part of them, on the teſtimony of ſome perſons who were a little too credulous. He imagined that he ought not to contemn them, becauſe of the edifying particulars he found in them. It will be prudent in the Reader to examine, in the peruſal of them, in what degree of certainty they are placed by St. Gregory, and who are the perſons from whom he received his informations. This is the direct ſtile of an Advocate or Apologiſt, who aſſerts that St. Gregory does not merit cenſure in any manner. The worſt is, that the reaſons which are given to ſhew this, are no ways ſolid; for if, upon pretence of there being many edifying particulars in a relation, a writer was allowed to adopt it, how many fictions may not be exhibited to the Public, as ſo many pious and true hiſtories? An Author's forbearing to ſay in expreſs terms, I give this incident or circumſtance as undoubted and certain; his not citing contemporary and very grave Writers, but only an ancient Tradition; theſe, I ſay, do not afford a ſufficient preſervative, nor ſo prudent a conduct as juſtifies ſuch an Author. He muſt declare poſitively and expreſly, I relate this as a doubtful matter, and therefore you may give what credit you pleaſe to it, I not having one good authority for it. I ſay, he ought to expreſs himſelf thus, that his readers may be ſure he is not perſuaded of the truth of what he advances, and is not extremely deſirous that others ſhould believe it. Every man who relates a miraculous event, without giving the leaſt hint that he himſelf doubts the truth of it, or is willing that any perſon ſhould doubt of it, declares manifeſtly that he relates it as a truth. Let it not be objected to me that an Hiſtorian is not allowed to ſuppreſs all ſuch particulars as may ſeem falſe to him; and that it is his duty to relate ſuch, as he finds well atteſted, tho' he does not ſuppoſe them to be true; let not, I ſay, this objection be made to me, for it would be no confutation of what I laid down. My aſſertion relates to an Hiſtorian, who dares not hint ever ſo little to ſignify his doubt, or the liberty he gives any perſon to diſbelieve it. Every good Hiſtorian who relates a thing which he conſiders as fabulous, adds to it the words 'tis ſaid, or ſome other expreſſion which ſhews ſtill more clearly what he thinks of it (89); and therefore when he adds nothing of this kind to his relations, it is a token that he exhibits them as matter of fact, and deſires to perſuade his readers that they are ſo. This is the general aim of all perſons who relate a thing which they are perſuaded is true; they deſire that all thoſe for whom they write ſhould believe it; and they ſhould take it as a great affront, a mark of contempt, ſhould any perſon anſwer, I don't believe any thing of the matter. Now if theſe maxims are true with regard to an Hiſtorian, they are much more ſo with reſpect to a Divine who gives an account of miracles in a treatiſe of morality or devotion, or in general in a work like that of St. Gregory. We muſt take it for granted, not only that this Pope believed all the miracles he related, but likewiſe that he deſired all his Readers ſhould look upon the ſeveral prodigies related by him as fact. The Author in queſtion was therefore too credulous; he wanted judgment; and it was not his fault if all his Readers did not imbibe his miſtakes; for if a prudent Reader rejects part of what he relates, this is not owing to any hints he gave him. It may be obſerved, that it would be a very fair juſtification of him, to anſwer that he himſelf did not credit all the particulars he advanced. I would only aſk, whether he deſired that his Readers ſhould believe every circumſtance he told? In caſe he did, he is an impoſtor; and in caſe he did not, why did he trifle away his time in writing ſuch things? The beſt apology that could be made for him, would be to ſay, that he was over credulous and wanted judgment.

(88) Hiſt. de St. Gregoire, pag. 275, 276.

(89) Equidem plura tranſcribo quam credo: nam nec adfirmare ſuſtineo de quibus dubito, nec ſubducere quæ accepi. Q. Curtius, lib. 9. cap. 1. See Frenſhemius's Commentary on this ſubject, where the reader will meet with ſeveral ſimilar paſſages from other Hiſtorians. See alſo Tacit. Annal. lib. 4. cap. 40. and Maimb. liv. 5. of l'Hiſtoire des Croiſades, cited in the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 293. La Mothe le Vayer, in his Diſc. ſur l'Hiſtoire, mentions ſeveral paſſages of Livy, which ſhew the caution this Author uſed in relating prodigies.

This is what may be ſaid in oppoſition to the apology, which Father Sainte Marthe has made for the miracles in which this great Pope might have been miſtaken. The Apologiſt does not declare, whether he believes that there are a great number of miracles of this kind in St. Gregory's dialogues; but we may naturally ſuppoſe that he does not. He expatiates very much on the reaſons which he thinks capable of perſuading his Readers, that the extraordinary incidents related in theſe Dialogues, were very common in that Age. One of his reaſons is, that there were then a great number of hereticks, whom it was neceſſary to convert to Chriſtianity; and many Catholicks who did not believe the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection of the dead (90). "It is an undoubted fact, "that in St. Gregory's time, a great number of Chri-"ſtians were wavering, with regard to theſe capital "points of our doctrine and religion. He (*) is ſo "humble as to own, that he himſelf had formerly "been in doubt, with regard to the Reſurrection; "for which reaſon he uſes his utmoſt endeavours, in "ſeveral of his homilies, to perſuade his auditors of "theſe truths. As there have always been a great "many libertines, even in the pale and the outward "communion of the Catholic Church; ſo there al-"ways have been many whoſe intereſt it was that "there ſhould be no other life but the preſent, no re-"ſurrection and laſt judgment; they therefore eaſily "perſuaded themſelves that there were no ſuch things; "for a corrupt heart will ſoon be followed by a miſ-"taken and erroneous judgment. However this be, "it is very certain that, in St. Gregory's time, Italy "and Rome in particular, abounded with ſuch unbe-"lievers. It would be needleſs for me to go about to "prove this, after what has been obſerved, on this "ſubject, by the laſt Tranſlator of theſe Dialogues, "in the excellent Preface he has given us. Gregory "of Tours (†) takes notice of a diſpute he had with "one of the Prieſts of his Church, who aſſerted that we "are not to look for a reſurrection. He likewiſe "mentions a Deacon of the Church of Paris, who "ſet up for a man of great parts, and was fallen into "the ſame error, he being extremely eager to diſpute "on this article of our Faith: whence we may con-"clude, that a great many more people in France had "imbibed theſe heretical tenets. Thoſe who ſhall "peruſe the Dialogues, will there find from Peter the "Deacon, that he knew ſeveral Chriſtians, who "doubted whether the ſoul continued to exiſt after its "ſeparation from the body (‡). Was it not therefore "conſonant to God's mercy, to diſplay miracles in "that Age, in order to aſſiſt the weakneſs of thoſe un-"happy unbelievers? And can we blame St. Gregory "for collecting them?" I ſhall make but two ſhort remarks on this paſſage: firſt, that if thoſe unbelieving Catholicks doubted only that the ſoul is immortal, and that bodies would riſe from the grave, they in this caſe were very pitiful reaſoners; for it would be very ſilly and ridiculous in any perſon who admitted the truth of the Goſpel, to entertain any doubts with reſpect to theſe two articles. My ſecond remark is, that perhaps there never were ſo many unbelievers as in the XVIth and XVIIth Century; I mean thoſe unbelievers who are not contented with throwing down the edifice without ruining the foundation, but who are for deſtroying, both the edifice and foundation. There were, beſides, a very great number of hereticks (91) in thoſe two Centuries, who ſtood in need of converſion. Miracles ſhould have been as frequent, at leaſt, in thoſe Ages, as in that of Gregory the Great: whence it may be concluded, that Father Sainte Marthe's argument proves nothing, becauſe it proves too much.

(90) St. Marthe, Hiſt. de St. Greg. pag. 274.

(*) Multi enim de reſurrectione dubitantes, ſicut & nos aliquando fuimus. Hom. 26. in Evang.

(†) Hiſt. l. 10. c. 13, 14.

(‡) L. 3. c. 38. & l. 4. c. 4.

(91) i. e. according to the definition of Father Denys de St. Marthe.

[S] Had it been true that, after the death of this Pope, part of his writings had been burnt, and that they all would have met with the ſame fate, had it not been for an incident.] Joannes Diaconus, in Chap. 69th, Book 4th of St. Gregory's Life, relates (92), that Italy was afflicted with a grievous famine the ſame year that this Pope died. "The poor who had been accuſtomed "to the liberality of this common Father of the Faith-"ful, ently diverted the people of Rome from putting to death the Senators as murtherers of Romulus (l); ſome perſons, I ſay, would have concluded from this, that the fame and glory of this Pope, as well as that of ſome other antient Fathers, is like to rivers, which being very ſmall at their ſources, ſwell prodigiouſly when at a very great diſtance from it. Some objections might be made to this compariſon; but it is certain, generally ſpeaking, that the objects of memory are of a very different nature from thoſe of ſight. The latter diminiſh in proportion to their diſtance, whilſt the former generally magnify according to the diſtance of time and place (m).

(92) St. Marthe, Hiſt. de St. Greg. liv. 4. chap. 7. pag. 613.

(l) See Plutarch in the Life of Romulus, pag. 35.

(m) Omnia poſt obitum fingit major vetuſtas.

" ful, not receiving the ſame ſuccours from Sabinian " his ſucceſſor, from a pretence that Gregory had " ſquandered away all the poſſeſſions of the Church of " Rome by his extravagance; ſome perſons were ſo " furious, as to exerciſe their rage on the Works of " this holy Doctor, (not being able to wreak it on his " perſon) and they burnt a conſiderable part of them. " But when they were going to burn the reſt, Peter " the Deacon, a diſciple of our Saint, told them, that " it was to no purpoſe they threw thoſe Books into " the fire, to eclipſe the memory of this Pope whom " they hated, becauſe they, by the eager deſire the " public had to peruſe them, were already diſperſed " over the world. He added that it was a ſacrilegious " act to offer ſo unworthy a treatment to the writings " of this holy Father, on whoſe head he had often ſeen " a Dove deſcend (*), repreſenting the Holy Ghoſt, " which converſed familiarly with him. Peter, to " confirm the truth of what he aſſerted, went up into " the Pulpitum holding the holy Goſpels, on which " he ſwore that what he had ſaid was true; adding, " that he beſought the Lord, in caſe he had not ſpoke " truth, to put an end to his life that inſtant. His " requeſt was granted: for he died that inſtant, with- " out the leaſt pain, and was buried at the foot of the " Pulpitum where this ſurprizing accident had happen- " ed." The Author from whom I have borrowed this paſſage, cannot believe, that any perſons would exerciſe their rage in ſuch a manner on the works of ſo great a Biſhop of Rome; and he obſerves that Cardinal Baronius rejected this relation as a mere fable, ſupported only on a falſe tradition, becauſe no author more ancient than John makes any mention of it (93). Theophilus Raynaud the Jeſuit oppoſes this opinion of Cardinal Baronius, and combats it in the following manner. He obſerves, in the firſt place, that the ſilence of Paterius, of Iſidorus and Ildefonſus, is a negative argument; and that the ſtrength of this kind of argument is inſufficient and weak, as is univerſally acknowledged (94). In the ſecond place, that the authority of Sigebert, cited by Baronius, cannot ſerve as a proof againſt Joannes Diaconus. This Cardinal ſays, that Sigebert has expreſly denied that any work of St. Gregory was left on this occaſion; they having been all preſerved at the interceſſion of Peter the Deacon. Now the Jeſuit aſſerts, that Sigebert affirms the very contrary, in chapter 41 and 43 of the work intitled de Viris illuſtribus. He obſerves in the third place, that St. Gregory had writ ſome Books, the leaſt traces of which are not to be now found. Præſertim cum idem Joannes ſequenti capite 70, ex ipſiſmet Sancti Gregorii epiſt. ad Joannem Ravennæ ſubdiaconum, demonſtret, pleroſque libros à ſancto Gregorio fuiſſe conſcriptos, quorum nullibi extant veſtigia; ut expoſitionis in Proverbia, & in Prophetas, & in libros Regum, neque enim pauca quæ habemus in 1 Regum & Ezechielem, menſuram implent titulorum illorum (95). i. e. " Particularly when the " ſame John, in the 70th chapter which fol- " lows, proves, from the Epiſtle of the ſame Gregory " to John Sub-Deacon of Ravenna, that St. Gregory " compoſed many Books of which no footſteps re- " main, ſuch as, an Expoſition on the Proverbs, the " Prophets and the Books of Kings; nor do the few " which are ſtill extant on 1 Kings and Ezekiel, come " up to the title of them." He employs, in the fourth place, an argument ad hominem, grounded on Baronius's confeſſing, that the writings of this great Pope were expoſed to very great danger; and that the mutineers, not being able to exerciſe their rage on Gregory himſelf as he was dead, wreak'd it on his Books, and that openly, and in the forum at Rome. It is certain that Baronius, by owning ſuch a circumſtance, deſtroys his own aſſertion; for, after this, of what uſe is it to him, that none of St. Gregory's works have been burnt? Have we not proofs ſufficiently ſtrong of the contempt or hatred which the Romans had for this Pontiff, ſince they had formed a reſolution to burn all his writings publicly; which reſolution was ſo furious and obſtinate, that they ſtood in need of a very great miracle to prevent the effects of it (96)?

(*) St. Ephrem, Deacon of the Church of Edeſſa, declared, that he had ſeen a white dove on the ſhoulder of the great St. Baſil, which ſeemed to ſuggeſt to him all he ſpoke to the people. Ephræm. Orat. in Baſil. apud Coteler. tom. 3. Monum. Græc. pag. 59.

(93) St. Marthe, Hiſt. de St. Greg. pag. 614.

(94) Quod (argumentum ab autoritate negativa) omnes agnoſcunt eſſe inſufficiens & enervie. Theoph. Raynaud, de bonis ac malis libris, num. 582. pag. m. 327.

(95) Theoph. Raynaud. de bonis ac malis Libris, num. 582. pag. m. 327.

(96) It is to be obſerved that John Rubeus, in the Life of Boniface VIII, pag. 246. affirms, quoting Joannes Diaconus, that Pope Gregory was accuſed of hereſy: Accuſatus fuit effuſi ſanguinis & Malchi Epiſcopi in cuſtodia occiſi, theſauri Eccleſiæ dilapidati, doctrinæ non ſanæ, contendentibus æmulis illius libros, tanquam reos hæreticorum dogmatum Vulcano debere tradi.

GREGORY VII, named Hildebrand before he was raiſed to the See of Rome. Of all the Popes who have boldly and happily laboured to increaſe the power of the Pontificate, none ſucceeded ſo well as he (a). How wicked a man ſoever he may be ſuppoſed, no one can deny but that he poſſeſſed the qualities of a great man [A], as well as certain conquerors, who, in other reſpects, had committed the moſt enormous crimes of every kind [B]. He was born at Soana, a little City of Tuſcany, and made himſelf

(a) For notwithſtanding that he was at laſt drove from Rome by the Emperor, he yet furniſhed the Popes his ſucceſſors with an opportunity of triumphing, as they have done, on ſo many occaſions.

[A] No one can deny but that he poſſeſſed the qualities of a great man.] Here follows the picture which a modern Author has given of him. " He was of " a very ſmall ſtature, but in his body lodged a " very great ſoul, a very lively and enlightened " mind; an intrepid courage, incapable of yielding, " what difficulties ſoever he might meet with in the " purſuit of its enterprizes: of a fiery, imperious, " haſty, bold and enterprizing temper; too forward " indeed in the execution of his deſigns, and carrying " things to extremes, without dreading the evil con- " ſequences that might attend his vigorous, and ſome- " times too violent reſolutions. In all other reſpects " his life was unblameable, notwithſtanding the ca- " lumny with which his enemies have endeavoured " to blacken him, ſetting himſelf, the firſt example " of what he required from others (†); and very " learned, eſpecially in the divine ſciences (‡), the " laws, rules, and cuſtoms of the Church, as the " Hiſtorians, (not excepting Germans) who cannot " have been too favourable to him, acknowledge. " In fine, could his impetuous and inflexible temper " have permitted him to temper his zeal with the " excellent moderation which his five predeceſſors " employed, it is certain that he would have pre- " vented many evils, and a great effuſion of Chriſ- " tian blood; and then Hiſtorians could have beſtowed " nothing but very great encomiums upon him (1)." If the reader conſiders the character which Naudé gives of him, he will find it to be that of a very great man. He was one of the greateſt pillars the Church ever had; and to ſpeak of him with ſincerity and impartiality, it was he who firſt gained it the poſſeſſion of its franchiſes, and who freed the ſovereign Pontifs from their ſervitude to the Emperors (2). Some may ſay, that gaining one's liberty, ſhaking off the yoke, putting one's ſelf in a ſtate of independence, and ſubduing one's own maſters, are indeed actions of a very criminal nature; but they cannot ſay, that ſuch actions can be performed without the greateſt courage, and endowments of mind.

(†) Forma gregis factus, quod verbo docuit, exemplo demonſtravit. Otto Friſing.

(‡) Virum ſacris literis eruditiſſimum, & omnium virtutum genere celeberrimum. Lambert. Schafnab.

(1) Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, liv. 3. pag. m. 220. Dutch edit. He cites Willel. Malmſb. l. 3. de Geſt. Reg. Angl. Petr. Dam.

(2) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, pag. 577.

[B] ....as well as certain conquerors, who, in all other reſpects, had committed the moſt enormous crimes of every kind.] I am the bolder in making this compariſon, becauſe I am perſuaded, that the conqueſt of the Church required as much bravery and abilities as the conqueſt of an Empire. The authority to which the Roman Pontifs have raiſed themſelves, himſelf ſo conſiderable in the monaſtery of Clugni, that he was appointed Prior of it. He negotiated ſeveral affairs with, and for the Popes, and was himſelf raiſed at laſt to the Pontificate of Rome in 1073. Upon his acceſſion, he reſolved to diveſt the Emperors of a regal privilege they enjoyed viz. of giving the Inveſtiture to the Biſhops; he ſuppoſing that he ſhould meet at firſt with inſurmountable obſtacles to this, in caſe it could be objected to him, that he had acted as Pope before his election had been ratified by the Emperor (b), he wrote to this Prince in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms; and declared that he would not be either conſecrated or crowned, till he had been informed of his will in that matter. The German Biſhops adviſed the Emperor to annul this election; but all they could obtain was, that he would cauſe enquiries to be made in what manner it had been performed; and accordingly he gave his ſanction to it, as ſoon as he was told the wiſhed-for anſwer which his Envoy had received from Hildebrand. However, he ſoon had reaſon to repent of it; for the new Pope, in the firſt Council held by him in Rome, revived the antient decrees againſt Simoniſts, and ſuch Eccleſiaſtics as kept concubines [C]; and enacted a new one, by which he declared to be excommunicated, both him who ſhould receive the inveſtiture of any benefice from a layman, and the perſon who ſhould beſtow it. He did not except any perſon on this occaſion; and hence it was that his Legates declared to the Emperor, who had gone to meet them as far is more worthy of admiration than the wide-extended monarchy of antient Rome; ſo that it may be aſſerted, that Providence had deſtined this city to be, in two different manners (3), the ſource of the moſt exalted qualities neceſſary for the founding of a very great ſtate. If this does not prove that the Romans equalled other nations in the practice of moral virtues, it is at leaſt a proof that they either were more courageous or induſtrious. It is amazing to conſider that a Church which pretends to have no other weapons but the ſpiritual ones of the word of God; and which can build its rights on no foundation but the Goſpel, every part of which inculcates humility and poverty, ſhould have been ſo arrogantly bold as to aſpire at an abſolute power over all the Kings of the earth: but it is ſtill more amazing, that ſo chimerical a deſign ſhould have been ſucceſsful. That antient Rome, which valued nothing but conqueſts and military virtue,

(b) It was the Emperor Henry IV.

(3) When it loſt its temporal power, it acquired the ſpiritual. Sedes Roma Petri, quæ paſtoralis honoris Facta caput mundi, quicquid non poſſidet armis, Religione tenet. Proſper Aquitanicus, Lib. de Ingratis, & Lib. 2. de Vocatione Gentium, cap. 6.

Excudent alii ſpirantia mollius æra.
\- - - - - - - -
Tu regere imperio populos Romane memento,
(Hæ tibi erunt artes) pacique imponere morem,
Parcere ſubjectis & debellare ſuperbos (4).

(4) Virg. Æn. lib. 6. ver. 848, &c.

" Let others better mold the running maſs
" Of metals, and inform the breathing braſs;
" And ſoften into fleſh a marble Face.
\- - - - - - -
" But Rome, 'tis thine alone, with artful ſway,
" To rule mankind, and make the world obey;
" Diſpoſing peace and war thy own majeſtic way.
" To tame the proud, the fetter'd ſlave to free;
" Theſe are Imperial arts and worthy thee."
Dryden.

ſhould have ſubdued ſo many other nations: this is noble and glorious in the eye of the world; but then when we weigh and reflect upon it, our wonder is not raiſed in any manner. But it is infinitely more ſurprizing to ſee new Rome, (pretending to nothing but an Apoſtolical miniſtry) acquire a new authority and power, to which the greateſt monarchs have been forced to ſubmit: for it may be affirmed, that very few Emperors who reſiſted the Popes, but found themſelves great loſers by it at laſt. In this very age, the diſputes of the moſt powerful Princes with the Court of Rome generally terminate in their confuſion. The examples of this are ſo recent (5), that it would be needleſs to ſpecify them. In the eye of the world, ſuch a conqueſt is more glorious than that of Alexander and the great Julius Cæſar; and thus Gregory VII, who was the chief inſtrument of it, ought to be ranked among thoſe great conquerors who have poſſeſſed the moſt exalted qualities.

(5) I write this an 1695.

The reader will find, in the remark [S], my anſwer to an Objection that has been raiſed to what I have advanced here.

[C] He revived the antient Decrees againſt Simoniſts, and ſuch Eccleſiaſticks as kept concubines.] No Pope was ever ſo vigorous as our Hildebrand, againſt ſuch Prieſts as did not keep ſtrict celibacy; and this made him to be very much hated. Here follow the words of Lambertus Schaffnaburgenſis, according to Coeffeteau's verſion. " Pope Hildebrand, having frequently " called Synods of the Biſhops of Italy, had or- " dained that, according to the antient canons, the " Prieſts ſhould have no wives; and that thoſe who " had, ſhould put them away, upon pain of being " diveſted of the ſacred character; and that none " thenceforwards ſhould be admitted to the Prieſthood, " who would not promiſe to live in a ſtate of per- " petual continence. This Decree being publiſhed " throughout all Italy, he ſends letters to the Biſhops " of Gaul, ordaining them to do the ſame in their " Churches; and that the Prieſts ſhould leave their " wives upon pain of excommunication. The whole " faction of the Clergy roſe up immediately againſt " this Decree; crying that it was heretical, and " taught a ridiculous doctrine, repugnant to the word " of God, which ſays, all men cannot receive this " ſaying; he that is able to receive it, let him receive " it; repugnant likewiſe to the Apoſtle, who com- " mands thoſe who cannot contain themſelves to marry, " for it is better to marry than to burn. They ad- " ded farther, that this man, Gregory VII, by an " injurious Decree, would conſtrain men to live as " angels, giving thereby a looſe to obſceneneſs of " every kind, by his checking the courſe of na- " ture. Theſe factious Eccleſiaſtics concluded at laſt, " that in caſe the Pope ſhould perſiſt obſtinately " in his reſolution, they would renounce the Prieſt- " hood rather than forſake their wives; and that " then he might ſee, where he could meet with an- " gels to govern the Church, ſince he would make uſe " of Angels for that purpoſe (6)." Coeffeteau adds, according to Marianus Scotus, " that many of the " clergy choſe rather to be excommunicated by the " Pope than to forſake their wives; but the Pope " ordained in a Synod, that no Chriſtian ſhould " hear Maſs from a married Prieſt (7)."

(6) Lambertus Schafn. de Rebus Germanic. ad ann. 1074, apud Coeffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquite, pag. 677.

I ſhall take notice of one circumſtance which appears to me worthy of notice; viz. that the Popes found it infinitely more difficult to ſubject the Eccleſiaſtics of the North than thoſe of the South, to the Law of Celibacy. A long time after that thoſe of Italy and Spain had ſubmitted to this ſevere yoke, the Prieſts of Germany and other northern nations reſiſted ſtill, and diſputed the ground for marriage, tanquam pro aris & focis; and I know not if we may not even juſtly affirm, that in Luther's time, the concubinage of Prieſts was more apparent, and more ſcandalous in Germany than in Italy: but it muſt not be inferred from thence, that the inhabitants of the ſouthern countries are chaſter; on the contrary, one would imagine rather, that the Prieſts of the North choſe rather to keep to certain concubines, than to diſguiſe their incontinence by random amours. They acted therefore in this with greater frankneſs and ſincerity; and perhaps thought it a leſs crime.

(7) See the remark of the Article MUTIUS (Huldrich).

far as Nuremberg, that they had expreſs orders to treat him as an excommunicated perſon ; and not to have any conference with him, till ſuch time as they had abſolved him from the excommunication, which he had incurred for the ſin of Simony, of which he had been impeached before the late Pope (c). The Emperor ſubmitted to every thing that was required from him ; received abſolution, and aſſured Gregory by letter, that he would for ever pay him the moſt profound ſubmiſſion. But notwithſtanding this, he would not ſuffer the Legates to call a Council ; and ſtill kept ſuch of his Miniſters as the Pope had expreſly excommunicated. The Pope, for theſe and ſeveral other reaſons, cited him to appear in the approaching Synod of Rome ; and threatened, in default thereof to excommunicate him. The Emperor laughed at this menace, and made the Legates, who had been ſo bold as to threaten him, ſuffer indignities of every kind, and called a Council at Worms, in which Cardinal le Blanc acted as the accuſer of Gregory. He impeached him of ſo many crimes [D], that the Aſſembly annulled the election of this Pope ; and wrote to him Letters, filled with the moſt injurious expreſſions, to inform him of this deciſion. The perſons who preſented thoſe letters behaved with the utmoſt brutality on this occaſion ; and nevertheleſs this Pontif, who notwithſtanding his haſty and fiery temper could maſter it at pleaſure, took them with great unconcern, and without ſpeaking a word (d) ; but having communicated them the very next day to his Synod, he pronounced (e) ſolemnly the ſentence of anathema againſt the Emperor [E], and excommunicated a great number of German and Lombard Prelates ; but the latter, ſo far from being afraid of it, aſſembled immediately after in Pavia, and excommunicated him. Having foreſeen that his conduct on this occaſion would draw upon him very powerful enemies, he had ſet every engine at work in order to ſtrengthen his party ; and was particularly aſſiduous in winning over three Princeſſes to his intereſt [F], one of whom, Maud or Mathilda by name, adhered to him in ſuch a manner as furniſhed a great handle for diſcourſe [G]. Farther, he prompted the Saxons to rebel ; made a league

(c) See Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, liv. 3. pag. 228. Dutch edit.

(d) Ibid. pag. 236.

(e) Anno 1076.

[D] Cardinal le Blanc . . . impeached him of ſo many crimes.] To know the accuſations brought againſt this Pope, we need but peruſe the ſentence that was pronounced againſt him by the aſſembly of Worms, which I ſhall here give, according to the verſion of the Sieur du Pleſſis Mornai (8). " Hildebrand, who " calls himſelf Gregory, is the firſt who without " our conſent, againſt the will of the Roman Empe- " ror appointed by God ; in oppoſition to the will " of our anceſtors, and of the laws, has, by his ſole " ambition ſo long continued, invaded the Papal " See. He will do whatever comes into his head, " per fas nefaſque, whether it be lawful or unlawful. " He is an apoſtate Monk who depraves holy Divinity " by a new doctrine ; adapts the ſacred Scriptures to " his views and ſchemes by falſe and forced interpre- " tations ; creates diviſions in the college ; blends in- " diſcriminately things ſacred and profane, pollutes " both equally ; lends an ear to devils and to the " ſlanders of wicked men, himſelf acting at the ſame " time as witneſs, judge and accuſer. He parts huſ- " bands from their wives, and prefers whores to vir- " tuous women ; and fornication, inceſt and adultery " to a chaſte marriage. He inflames whole nations " againſt the Prieſts, and the populace againſt the " Biſhops ; would perſuade the world that no man is " rightly ordained, but who crouches to him for " Prieſt's orders, or has purchaſed them ab ejus Auri- " fugis, from his Leeches. He impoſes cheats and " bubbles upon the vulgar by an outſide ſhew of re- " ligion. This man, in ſenatulo mulierc ularum, in " an aſſembly of ſilly women, treats of the moſt " holy myſteries of religion, abrogates the Law of " God, and incroaches upon the Papal See and the " Empire. He is guilty of high treaſon both divine " and human, as he attempts to deprive a ſacred " Emperor, a very good Prince, both of life and Em- " pire. For theſe reaſons, the Emperor, the Biſhops, " the Senate and people of Chriſtendom, declare him " fallen from his dignity, and will no longer leave " Chriſt's flock under the guard of ſuch a wolf."

(8) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 240. He cites Avent. Annal. Boior. l. 5. Lambertus Schaffnab. de Rebus Germaniæ. Carolus Sigonius, de Regno Italiæ l. 9. Autor Vitæ Henrici.

[E] He pronounced ſolemnly the ſentence of anathema againſt the Emperor.] " And, what no Pope had ever " yet done, he diveſted him of his Imperial Dignity, " and of his Kingdoms of Germany and Italy ; de- " clared that all his ſubjects were abſolved, by the " Pontifical authority, from the oath of fidelity they " had taken to him ; and afterwards wrote ‡ circu- " lar letters to this effect, to all the Biſhops and " Princes of Germany, by which he permitted them, " in caſe Henry ſhould perſiſt obſtinately in his re- " ſolution againſt the holy See, to elect, by the ſame " authority, another monarch, who might receive the " crown of the Empire, and govern it juſtly accord- " ing to the Laws (9)."

(‡) Gregor. l. 3. Ep. 6. & l. 4. Ep. 2. & 3.

(9) Maimbourg, Decad. de l'Empire, pag. 237.

[F] Was particularly aſſiduous in winning over three Princeſſes to his Intereſt.] " Theſe were the Empreſs " Agnes his mother (10), the Ducheſs Beatrix his " aunt, and the Counteſs Maud or Mathilda his firſt " couſin. As for the Empreſs, her prayers and re- " monſtrances might be of great ſervice to him. And " indeed * ſhe travelled into Germany with the Le- " gates whom Gregory firſt ſent thither ; and the Em- " peror promiſed to comply with every thing ſhe re- " queſted in the Pope's name, but failed in every par- " ticular. However, as the Counteſſes Beatrix and " Mathilda were very powerful in Italy, where they " poſſeſſed very large territories ; Gregory might " draw ſuccours from thence that would be much " more efficacious than bare remonſtrances, which " Henry did not very much regard. Theſe two " Princeſſes, who were very devout, had formed to " themſelves a very high idea of Gregory's virtue, " who indeed paſſed for a great ſaint, and a very " auſtere one ; and was even ſaid to have revelations " and trances, together with the gift of prophecy and " miracles, which create a great eſteem and reverence " for ghoſtly fathers. They afterwards had put " themſelves entirely under his direction ; and he, " anſwering the confidence they repoſed in him, took " great pains, by his letters, to lead them into the " paths of virtue ; and diſcovered a great affection " for them, and a mutual confidence : ſo that, when " the ſignal rupture which broke out between the " Pope and the Emperor had divided the Empire in- " to two parties, they did not heſitate in the leaſt, " but declared publickly for Gregory, and reſolved to " ſuccour him with all their forces, particularly the " Counteſs Mathilda (11)." I employ the very words of this Jeſuit, in order that none of my readers may entertain the leaſt ſuſpicion of my deſigning to impoſe upon them by unfaithful tranſlations. It muſt be confeſſed that this Pope was very artful ; and that notwithſtanding his impetuous temper, he yet employed the moſt efficacious ſtratagems ; he made ſure of the fair ſex, and pitched upon ſuch Ladies as were moſt powerful.

(10) i. e. the mother of the Emperor Henry IV.

(*) Lambert. Greg. l. 1. Ep. 85. & l. 2. Ep. 30.

(11) Maimbourg, Decadence de l'Empire, pag. 238.

[G] Maud or Mathilda . . . adhered to him in ſuch a manner, as furniſhed a great handle for diſcourſe.] The moſt pacific Pope, tho' he had been ever ſo much beloved, could not have eſcaped the ſlander of evil tongues, had he been engaged in ſo very intimate a correſpondence as that of Hildebrand with Mathilda. Now I leave the Reader to judge, whether ſo fiery a Pope league with the Duke of Suabia (f), and ſent a great number of circular letters, which proved of the greateſt ſervice to him; for he declared all thoſe to be excommunicated who ſhould correſpond with the Emperor; he forbid all the Biſhops to grant him abſolution, and commanded all Princes, either to force him to ſubmit himſelf to the holy See, or to proceed to the election of a new Emperor. A very remarkable circumſtance is, his daring to aſſert that, in depoſing of this Monarch, he had acted no otherwiſe than in conformity to the practice of the Court of Rome [H]. The league which was formed in his favour in Germany, was ſo powerful, that after long debates it was declared by them, that they ſhould elect another Emperor by the Pope's authority, who ſhould give him the Imperial Crown (g). The Emperor, notwithſtanding his groveling condeſcenſion with reſpect to the confederate Princes, yet could obtain no other but very hard conditions; which prompted him to wait upon the Pope in perſon, to deſire abſolution from him, and was forced to ſubmit to the moſt unheard of indignities before he could obtain it [I]. His excommunicated adherents were treated almoſt as rigorouſly.

(f) He was named Rodolphus, and was elected Emperor by the Germans.

(g) Maimbourg, Decad. de l'Empire, pag. 251.

Pope as this, and who had made himſelf ſo many enemies, could eſcape being ſatirized, for the reciprocal attachment between him and this Counteſs. We will again employ the words of a Jeſuit, who cannot be any ways ſuſpected on this occaſion. "The Counteſs Mathilda now finding herſelf alone, and abſolute miſtreſs of her dominions, becauſe the Ducheſs Beatrix her mother died (†) much about the time that Godfrey's (12) death came to be known; ſhe reſolved to follow more ſtrictly than ever the Counſels of Gregory; made him abſolute maſter of her mind, her conduct and poſſeſſions; and therefore, purſuant to the cuſtom of thoſe female Devotees, who imagine that they muſt be utterly undone, ſhould their ghoſtly Father be put from them, for whom they ſometimes have too great an attachment, ſhe employed her utmoſt endeavours not to loſe ſight of him (‡). She followed him aſſiduouſly wherever he went; did him a thouſand little ſervices in a moſt incredible affectionate manner. She never tranſacted any thing but by his orders, which ſhe executed with ſurprizing exactneſs; and tho' ſhe was the greateſt Princeſs in all Italy, ſhe nevertheleſs preferred to this title that of his moſt humble ſervant and dear daughter; ſhe looking upon, and treating him, as her father and her maſter, with a great deal of reſpect, zeal and devotion indeed, but perhaps with a little leſs prudence and diſcretion than was fitting, if I may be allowed to ſay thus much, without injuring the reverence that is due to the memory of ſo illuſtrious a Princeſs. For, in ſhort, the Emperor's adherents and the enemies of Pope Gregory, and eſpecially the Eccleſiaſtics in Germany, whom he was firmly determined to ſeparate from their wives, becauſe they had impudently married them againſt the moſt holy Laws of the Church; theſe, I ſay, took occaſion even from thence, to inveigh againſt him in a moſt odd manner; to charge him with too private an intimacy with that Counteſs (§), and to publiſh the ſcandalous and improbable ſtories on that occaſion, they being directly repugnant to truth and the known virtue of both. And indeed the German Hiſtorian, who lived at that time and relates theſe particulars, adds, that there was not one perſon then living, who had ever ſo little judgment and was not prejudiced and blinded by an unjuſt paſſion, but ſaw as clear as the Sun at noon-day, that theſe were nothing but impudent ſlanders which, like faint clouds, were ſo completely diſperſed, ſolely by the apoſtolical life which the Pope led in the ſight of the whole Court of Rome, that there did not remain ſo much as the leaſt ſhadow of ſuſpicion, in the minds of thoſe who knew him (13)."

(†) 18 April 1076.

(12) This was Mathilda's huſband.

(‡) Lambert. Schaffnab. Poſt cujus mortem Romani Pontificis lateri penè comes individua adhærebat, eumque miro colebat affectu. Cumque magna pars Italiæ ejus pareret imperio, & omnibus quæ prima mortales ducunt, ſupra cæteros terræ illius Principes abundaret: ubicumque opera ejus Papa indiguiſſet ociùs aderat, & tanquam patri & domino ſedulum exhibebat officium.

(§) Unde nec evadere potuit inceſti amoris ſuſpicionem, paſſim jactantibus Regis fautoribus, & præcipuè Clericis quibus illicita, & contra ſcita Canonum conjugia prohibebat, quod die ac nocte impudenter Papæ ejus, &c. Sed apud omnes ſanum aliquod ſapientes luce clariùs conſtabat falſa eſſe quæ dicebantur. Nam & Papa tam eximiè tamque Apoſtolicè vitam inſtituebat, ut nec minimam ſiniſtri rumoris maculam converſationis ejus ſublimitas admitteret, & ille in urbe celeberrima, &c. Lambert. Schaffnab.

I am obliged in juſtice to take notice here of a complaint of Coeffeteau againſt du Pleſſis Mornai. That Friar is very much offended at du Pleſſis, for having cited only the firſt part of the paſſage from Lambertus Schaffnaburgenſis; and therefore ſhe cannot avoid being ſuſpected of an inceſtuous paſſion; the King's partizans ſpreading a report every where, and eſpecially the Eccleſiaſtics, whom he forbid to marry contrary to the Canons, that he uſed to wallow impudently night and day in her embraces; and that ſhe, being very fond of the ſtolen ſweets ſhe uſed to taſte with this Pope, would not marry again after her huſband's death (14). Here du Pleſſis ſtops, and Coeffeteau makes the following complaint. But reader, what wilt thou ſay, if I ſhew thee that this Author, this grave Hiſtorian, as he calls him, refutes the impudent and barefaced calumny in queſtion in this very place. . . . With what face then can he be ſo inſincere as to quote this paſſage, to caſt a blemiſh on his life and domeſtic converſation (15)? It is too violent an exclamation for a matter of ſo little conſequence. I own that du Pleſſis would not have done amiſs had he obſerved tranſiently, that Lambertus Schaffnaburgenſis refutes this; however, as his chief view is only to relate what judgment was formed of Pope Gregory, it is no ways ſtrange that he ſhould employ barely thoſe words of Lambertus Schaffnaburgenſis, where he informs the Public of the ſlanders which were vented againſt this Pope. It is to be obſerved, that he calls this Lambert, Abbot of Hirtzaw, for which his adverſary cenſures him, and declares that he was only a Friar of Hirſfeld, in the Dioceſe of Mentz.

(13) Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, p. 243.

(14) Du Pleſſis, Myſt. d'Iniquité, pag. 695.

(15) Coeffeteau, Reponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 695.

I ſhall conclude with a reflection of Father Maimbourg: All theſe ſtories, ſays he (16), were ſo many palpable falſities; but nevertheleſs as the Public, from a malignity natural to them, are much more inclined to believe evil reports than favourable ones, eſpecially with regard to perſons who are in ſome reputation on account of their virtue; it did not fail to produce an evil effect, and to prejudice Gregory at that time; which ought to teach ghoſtly Fathers, that the ſhorter conferences they have with their female devotees, the better; and, that long and frequent converſations with women, are often more dangerous, (at leaſt to their reputation) than uſeful to perſons of their character.

(16) Décad. de l'Empire, pag. 245.

[H] He dared to aſſert . . . that he had acted no otherwiſe than in conformity to the Court of Rome.] This ſhews the little ſtreſs that ought to be laid, on thoſe who boaſt of their doing nothing but in imitation of the ancients. The greateſt innovators have been ſo confident as to aſſert this, of which we have a remarkable example in this place. I ſhall quote a Jeſuit's own words, in order that no one may think I amplify matters (17). "I find alſo that Heriman Biſhop of Metz, "having propoſed in writing his difficulties to Gre- "gory on this ſubject; and aſked, among other par- "ticulars, what anſwer he ſhould make thoſe who aſ- "ſerted, that the Pope had no authority to diſpoſſeſs "the King of his throne, nor diſcharge his ſubjects "from their oath of fidelity, as he had done in the "laſt Synod of Rome; he had anſwered him flatly, "and without the leaſt heſitation (), that he had "done it very juſtly, agreeably to the cuſtom and "uſage of his predeceſſors, who had excommunicated "Kings and Emperors, by depriving them of their "Empires and Kingdoms. Nevertheleſs Otho Fri- "ſinghenſis, a very learned and very holy Biſhop, "and a man very well affected to the Popes, and fre- "quently applauded by Cardinal Baronius, affirms "with great ſincerity, that having read the Hiſtorians "very carefully, he had never found that any Pope, "before him in queſtion, had made any ſuch attempt "(18)." Lego & relego Romanorum Regum & Imperatorum geſta, & nuſquam invenio quemquam eorum ante hunc à Romano Pontifice vel excommunicatum, vel regno privatum (††).

(17) Maimbourg, Décad. de l'Empire, pag. 248.

() Lib. 4. Epiſt. 25.

(18) See Father Alexander, Select. Hiſt. cap. Seculi 11, & 12. Part 2. where he ſuppoſes that Gregory VII was impoſed upon by his Secretary, who produced to him falſe records.

[I] The Emperor . . . was forced to ſubmit to the moſt unheard of indignities.] He had ſet out in the beginning of winter, with his wife, and his children, and a very ſmall train; and croſſed the Alps in the moſt ſe- rously [K]. This abated very much the zeal which the Lombards had for him; and he had no other way of recovering their favour, but by discovering an eager desire to revenge the injuries which had been done him. The wars he was obliged to carry on in Germany, where Rodolphus Duke of Suabia had been elected King, prevented his invading the Pope; but as he gained great advantages over his competitor, he discovered very little inclination to execute what Gregory required from him; for which reason this Pope, in a Council held at Rome in 1080, excommunicated and divested him anew of his Imperial dignity [L]. This last thunder-clap, carried things to the utmost extremities. The Emperor summoned an Assembly, first at Mentz, and afterwards at Brixen were season of the year, he being exposed to such great inconveniencies as might have excited compassion even for a private Traveller, and much more for so great a Prince, reduced to so miserable a condition (19). Nevertheless his arrival in Italy gave the Pope some uneasiness, for which reason Mathilda, in order that he might be safe, let what would happen, carried him to the fortress of Canossa (20). Several Princes besought him to absolve this Emperor; but he was a long time inexorable; and then, being rather overcome by importunities than moved by the repeated and earnest sollicitations of those Princes, he at last answered, that he was determined (since they so strongly desired it) to absolve him, on condition nevertheless, that, to prove to the whole world that he truly repented of his rebellion, he should first send him his Crown and all the rest of his Insignia of royalty, to be disposed of as he should think proper; and that he should confess publickly, that after what he had done in his infamous conventicle or unlawful assembly at Wormes, he was unworthy of ever being a King or Emperor. The Princes fell prostrate before the Pope, and conjured him, in the Almighty's name, to require more supportable terms. They obtained with much difficulty, that he might e'en come if he were desirous of being absolved; but that, in order to obtain this favour, he must resolve to submit to whatever penance should be enjoined him (21). The Emperor submitted to every thing (22). "He went "to the first gate of the castle, and there waited, with "the greatest submission, for what should be required "of him. First he was obliged to enter it alone, and "to leave all his attendants without, to wait for him, "and conduct him back at his coming out; which "was certainly a very delicate point, and no Monarch "but himself would have submitted to it. For, in "short, this was as if he had delivered himself, bound "hand and foot, into the hands of those who could "dispose of him in an absolute manner at their plea"sure; and keep him prisoner in a castle which was "judged impregnable, and whence his attendants could "never have forced him. Farther, when he had "passed the first inclosure or wall, he was stopt at the "second, and there forced to lay down all the Insig"nia of Majesty. Then having stript off his clothes, "he put on only a plain woollen tunic or jacket, like a "hair-cloth (23), and staid there bare-footed, in the se"verest weather in winter, (for it was the latter end of "January,) and fasting; he not having eat a morsel "from morning till night; imploring with deep groans "God's mercy and that of the Pope. The most "strange circumstance is, that this poor Prince was "forced to wait, in so sad, so painful and pitiful con"dition, three days together, whilst the Pope would "not be moved, either by tears or intreaties, to ad"mit him sooner to his presence to comfort him; and "the matter was carried so far, that, as he himself "confesses, (boasting and glorying of his extreme se"verity on this occasion, in his Letter to the Princes "of Germany,) all those who were with him could "not forbear murmuring, they being greatly astonish"ed at his unparallel'd hardness of heart; and some "even said publickly, that his behaviour was like "the barbarous cruelty of a tyrant, rather than the "just severity of an apostolical judge. Ut pro eo mul"tis precibus & lachrymis intercedentes, omnes quidem in"solitam nostræ mentis duritiem mirarentur, nonnulli "vero in nobis non Apostolicæ severitatis gravitatem, "sed quasi tyrannicæ feritatis crudelitatem esse clama"rent (††). These are Gregory's own words, cited by Cardinal Baronius . . . (24). This Monarch was "going to lose all patience, after having suffered so "severe a penance during three days: and he was up"on the point of breaking with the Pope, . . . when "the Countess Mathilda undertook this business with "with greater earnestness than she had hitherto done; "for now Pope Gregory, who could not deny any "thing to the earnest intreaties of so great a Princess, "to whom he owed so many obligations; that he at "last resolved to admit Henry to his presence the 4th "day in the morning, and to reconcile him to the "Church upon the following conditions: that he "should submit to the sentence, which the Pope, at the "time and place appointed him, should pass with regard "to the articles laid to his charge . . . that in the mean "time he should not exercise any act of sovereignty." I omit the rest of the conditions, all which were extremely severe.

(††) Otto Friſing. Chron. l. 6. c. 35.

(19) Maimbourg, Decad. de l'Empire, pag. 254.

(20) Ibid. pag. 255.

(21) Ibid. pag. 257.

(22) Ibid. pag. 258.

(23) Malmsbury adds, with scissors and a broom in his hand, as submitting himself to be shaved and scourged. Du Plessis, Mystere d'Iniquité, pag. 242, 243.

(††) Greg. l. 4. Ep. 12. & apud Baron. ann. 1077. n. 17.

(24) Maimb. Décadence de l'Empire, pag. 260.

[K] His excommunicated adherents were treated almost as rigorously.] "He did not exercise much greater "mildness towards the German Bishops, and the rest "as well Clergy as Laity, who were come a little "before, to throw themselves at his feet, in order to "be absolved from the excommunication they had in"curred. For before he granted them absolution, he "caused them to be confined separately in little cells, "like so many prisons; and there made them fast "very rigorously a considerable time, contrary to the "custom of their Country, where, because of the ex"treme cold, it is much more difficult to fast than in "Italy (25)." Fasting is certainly one of the most mortifying penances that can be laid upon the Northern Nations, and especially on the rich, who are accustomed, from their infancy, to high feeding, and to make long meals; where they not only eat a great deal, but drink more in proportion. Had the Christian Religion first rose in this country, it is my opinion that it would not have sent into the East the same Canons relating to abstinence and vigils, which came from the East into the North. See the complaints which were made against Cardinal Alamandus (26).

(25) Ibid. pag. 259.

[L] He excommunicated the Emperor and divested him anew of his Imperial Dignity.] By this fulminating Decree he (*) divests him of the Empire and the Kingdoms of Germany and Italy; absolves all his subjects from the oath of fidelity they had taken to him; and, what he would not till now consent to do, he confirmed the election of Rodolphus, to whom he sent a rich golden crown, round which was an inscription in one verse, signifying, that Christ Jesus who is the mystical Stone, having given the diadem to Peter, gave it to Rodolphus in the person of Gregory (†). These are Father Maimbourg's own words (27). It is very true that Hildebrand's father was a Carpenter; this would be a proof, that a person of the most exalted courage may be born among the dregs of the people. Could any man have behaved with greater haughtiness than our Hildebrand? Did he not make it his business to humble Kings, because, as he said, they were too lofty, and that he would humble them by his severe treatment (28) Imperatoribus & Regibus, cæteribusque Principibus, ut elationes maris & superbiæ fluctus comprimere valeant, arma humilitatis, Deo auctore, providere curamus; proinde videtur utile, maximè imperatoribus, ut cum mens illorum se ad alta erigere, & pro singulari vult gloriâ oblectare, inveniat quibus se modis humiliat, atque unde gaudebat, sentiat plus timendum. i. e. "We take it upon ourselves, by God's as"sistance, to humble the pride of Emperors, Kings, "and the rest of Princes, as so many swelling surges "with the arms of humility: it seeming useful, espe"cially with regard to Emperors, that when their "minds are puffed up and delighted with glory, they "may be taught to be humble, and to tremble at the "exalted station in which they so much prided them"selves." It is to be observed that Maimbourg the Jesuit rejects what has been related of Gregory VII's father. Here follow his words: What is generally said of his being a Carpenter's son, and that playing with

(26) The Remark [A] of the article ALAMANDUS.

(*) Conc. Rom. 7 t. 10. Concil. edit. Paris.

(†) Petra dedit Petro, Petrus dia-dema Rodolpho.

(27) Maimbourg, Décadence de l'Empire, pag. 278.

(28) Greg. Ep. ad Heriman. Episc. Met. de Excom. Hen. IV. apud Maimb. Décad. de l'Empire, pag. 259.

(b) This City is in Tirol, between the City of Trent and Inſpruck.

Brixen (b), where Gregory was declared to have forfeited the Pontificate; and they elected in his ſtead Guibert of Parma, Archbiſhop of Ravenna, who aſſumed the name of Clement III. This Aſſembly charged Hildebrand, among other crimes, with Necromancy [M]. The Emperor having won two battles, the one in Germany againſt Rodolphus, notwithſtanding the Pope's prophecies [N]; and the other near Mantua, againſt the army of Mathilda the Counteſs, reſolved to go and ſettle his Anti-pope in Rome. This he effected after ſtruggling with many difficulties; and had the ſatisfaction to force his enemy to fly from Rome, and retire to Salerno. It was there that Gregory VII died the 24th of May 1085 (i). It is not an eaſy matter to give a more particular detail of his actions with any certainty; for not to mention that the writers who ſpeak

(i) Conſult the Authors whom Father Maimbourg has cited in his Décadence de l'Empire, I have made uſe of his relation.

ſhavings when he was but a child, he had by mere accident formed letters out of them, ſo diſpoſed that they formed the following verſe of the Pſalmiſt, Dominabitur à mare uſque ad mare, i. e. "He ſhall rule from one Sea "to another," is a mere fiction (29).

(29) Maimbourg, pag. 218.

[M] This Aſſembly charged Hildebrand, among other crimes, with Necromancy.] This appears by the ſentence that was pronounced againſt him, of which du Pleſſis Mornai makes very ample mention. And likewiſe, ſaid he (30), in the year 1080, the Biſhops of Italy, Germany, and Gaul met at Brixen in Bavaria (31); and again condemned Hildebrand as guilty of ambition, hereſy, impiety and ſacrilege; "becauſe, ſay they, he "is a pſeudo-monk, a magician, ſoothſayer, an interpreter of dreams and prodigies; a deſpiſer of the "Chriſtian Religion, who has purchaſed the Pontificate contrary to the cuſtom of our anceſtors, againſt "the will and inclination of all good men &c. A "ſworn enemy to the Emperor and the Empire, a corrupter of laws both divine and human; teaching "falſhood inſtead of truth, evil inſtead of good &c. "The trumpet or proclaimer of wickedneſs of every "kind, the ſautor of a tyrant, the ſpreader of diviſions between brethren, relations and friends, and of "divorces between married people; this excellent man "denying that Prieſts, who have lawful wives, are "true Prieſts; and yet bringing to the altars, fornicators, adulterers and inceſtuous wretches &c. We, "by the authority of God Almighty, declare him diveſted of the Pontificate; and in caſe he himſelf "does not quit it, we ordain that he be for ever debarred acceſs to it. Sigonius, who alſo gives us this "ſentence, has the following words in it; manifeſtum "Necromanticum, pythonico ſpiritu laborantem, i. e. a "real Necromancer, and poſſeſſed with an evil ſpirit."

(30) Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 244.

(31) Or rather in Tirol.

[N] The Emperor having won two battles . . . . notwithſtanding the Pope's prophecies.] Hildebrand, to animate Rodolphus and the Saxons, aſſured them that he knew by revelation, that a falſe King was to die that year, which he interpreted of the Emperor Henry IV; and if this do not come to paſs, added he, may I be no longer Pope, even if it does not come to paſs before St. Peter's day. Du Pleſſis Mornai (32) borrows this from Sigebert; and obſerves that Rodolphus, relying on that oracle, renewed the battle four times, according to others ſix; and not only loſt it, but likewiſe his right hand wherewith he had ſworn to the Emperor, and loſt his life. Coeffeteau anſwers (33), that Cardinal Baronius had foreſeen this calumny, and ſhewed that Gregory never pretended to the revelations which his enemies fathered upon him; but only that he had aſſured in general terms, confiding in God's mercy, and in the juſtice of the cauſe which his zeal prompted him to defend, that God would ruin his adverſaries, and that thoſe of his party ſhould ſoon be victorious, but without fixing any day, as the ſchiſmaticks have accuſed him. "Hence, ſays Ba"ronius, Gregory's enemies took occaſion to ſlander "him, and to call him falſe Prophet, as though he "ſhould foretel that Henry would die ſoon, and many "ſuch particulars; tho' the truth is, he never pretended to ſay this by a ſpirit of prophecy, but only "according to the ordinary courſe of things, it frequently happening that men reap according as they "have ſowed; and therefore Gregory, relying on "the juſtice of his cauſe, was ſtrongly perſuaded that "God would render him victorious; which, ſays he, "all things conſidered, will be found true, if we conſider that Henry and his accomplices came to a miſerable end." Here follows the anſwer that was made to Coeffeteau. He ſhould have conſidered that Baronius ſays this with regard to an Epiſtle (†), written by Gregory to his fellow Biſhops, and others of the faithful, the expreſſions of which may indeed admit of his interpretation. But this does not prove that the Pope did not ſpeak otherwiſe elſewhere. And indeed, the charge laid upon him is quite another thing, not contained in a Letter, but delivered in a public Sermon, which he preached in his pontifical habit. The words are as follow: Look upon me hereafter no longer as Pope, but caſt me from the altar, if this prophecy be not fulfilled on St. Peter's day. But it fell out unluckily, that the aſſaſſins, having been bribed, could not ſtrike the blow, in order to fulfil the prophecy; ſo that, to juſtify himſelf, he eluded his words by ſaying, that they were to be underſtood of the death of Henry's ſoul, becauſe it was not in his power to kill his body (34).

(32) Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 244.

(33) Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 692.

(†) Gregor. Regiſt. lib. 8. Ep. 7.

(34) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part 2. pag. 182.

It is manifeſt that du Pleſſis's objection remains in its full force, ſince Coeffeteau's anſwer, copied from Baronius, is altogether inſignificant. It may therefore be affirmed, that Hildebrand pretended to propheſy things which were ſoon proved falſe by the event. Weigh well the following words of Father Maimbourg (35). "He wrote circular Letters (‡) to "all the faithful, and particularly to thoſe of the Province of Ravenna, to engage them to join in a con"federacy with the Norman Princes againſt the Anti"Pope. He ſent others to the Princes of Germany, "to excite them to draw the ſword againſt Henry, "and aſſured all of them that they would gain a glo"rious victory. But it happened unluckily for him, "that the ſucceſs was quite contrary to the aſſurances "he had given them; for three weeks after the date "of his Letters, which are of the twenty ſecond of "September, the two armies of Henry and Rodol"phus fought a furious battle (*), the fifteenth of Oc"tober, on the banks of the river Elleſtre, near Merſ"burg in Saxony (36)." Here we have a dilemma: Hildebrand imagined that his prediction would, or would not come to paſs. If he believed it would, we muſt call him a falſe Prophet; if he thought it would not, and had no other view but to animate the rebels, we muſt call him an impoſtor, who, by a deteſtable policy, ſacrificed to his temporal intereſt the holineſs of prophecy and the honour of the ſacred Name of God. We have ſeen in our days ſome interpreters of the Revelations, who may be perplexed and confounded by a like dilemma. The artifice employed by Hildebrand puts me in mind of the Article DEJOTARUS (37). Men who ſet up for fore-tellers of things to come, are eſpecially careful to provide themſelves with a front of braſs, and an inexhauſtible ſtorehouſe of equivocations, in order that they may have an opportunity of explaining events in their own favour, whatever may be the iſſue of them. If the events are proſperous, in a worldly way, theſe fore-tellers aſſert that they grow more obdurate, and that this is the true evil that had been foretold. See Hildebrand here applying to the death of the ſoul, what he had preſumed to propheſy with reſpect to the Emperor's death. Of what uſe could it be to Rodolphus for the Emperor Henry IV to be damned at the expiration of many years, if Rodolphus, before this, was to be killed in a battle which the Emperor ſhould win? What judgment or ſenſe was there in foretelling the damnation of Henry IV, a Prince who would ſoon triumph over his rival? Had he been a true Prophet, the firſt thing he would have foretold would have been this triumph. I obſerve this, in order to ſhew the vanity of Pope Gregory VIIth's ſubterfuge.

(35) Décadence de l'Empire, pag. 281.

(‡ Greg. l. 8. Ep. 7.

(*) Lib. 8. Epiſt. 9.

(36) Rodolphus was killed in this battle.

(37) Remark [K].

ſpeak of him refute one another [O]; it cannot be denied, but that his enemies are ſuſpected to have wrote againſt him with too much prejudice; and that what they have related with reſpect to his Necromancy, has very much the air of a fiction [P]. Be this as it will, I can aſſure the reader that no Pope was ever ſo well or ſo ill ſpoken of as Gregory VII. A great number of miracles are aſcribed to him, and he is ranked among the number of the Saints (k). It is pretended that his body was found almoſt entire, five hundred years after his death [Q]; and we may very juſtly wonder at the uncertainty of hiſtory, (k) See des Ouvrages des Savans, for April 1689, pag. 166, 167. In the Extract of Acta Sanctorum Maii, tom. 6, & 7. which contains the Life of Gregory VII.

[O] The Writers who ſpeak of him refute one another.] It is certain that they have run into the oppoſite extremes; ſome againſt Pope Gregory VII, and others againſt the Emperor Henry IV. The modern Hiſtorian, whom I have frequently cited, deſcribes this ſo happily, that I chooſe to make uſe of his expreſſions rather than my own. "This quarrel, ſays he (38), which di- "vided all Europe, and prompted one part of it to take "up arms againſt the other, divided, and afterwards "fired the Authors who have wrote on them to ſuch a "degree, that I can affirm there never was ſo much "heat, bitterneſs, rancour, and even rage, as appears "in the works of thoſe, who have undertaken to de- "fend and maintain one or other of thoſe parties; "and who, through their paſſions and prejudices, run "into extremes, without ſuffering people ſo much as "to examine the merits of either. For, beſides that "they are not ſparing of the moſt opprobrious expreſ- "ſions, with which they load one another, contrary "to all the rules, I will not ſay of Chriſtianity, but of "common civility and even humanity; ſome, in imi- "tation of Benno that ſchiſmatical Cardinal, revile, "in a moſt horrid manner, the memory of Pope "Gregory VII, and paint him as the moſt wick- "ed and deteſtable wretch that ever lived; whilſt "others, on the contrary, deſcribe him poſſeſſed of "all the perfections which form a great Pon- "tiff; and cannot find expreſſions adequate to the "praiſes they think he deſerves." To form the better judgment of the Hiſtorians of that Age, it may be proper to conſider the ſeveral things, which have been wrote for and againſt the League under Henry III and Henry IV. How many fictions, how many ſlanders were publiſhed at that time? I omit inſtances of a later date; and am perſuaded that the moſt prejudiced minds will agree with me, that Ages to come would be very unjuſt, ſhould they judge of thoſe men who are now the chief actors in affairs of State, from the libels which are daily printed on both ſides, in which every Writer publiſhes, with the moſt bare-faced impudence, not what he knows to be true, but what he himſelf invents or picks up in the ſtreet. I write this in 1695.

(38) Maimbourg Décadence de l'Empire, pag. 216, 217.

(39) See du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquit. pag. 248, 249.

(40) Coeffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 704, ſays that Benno relates the following ſtory about this Laurence; That one day a ſparrow chirping in preſence of ſeveral Prelates, ſome aſked him what that bird ſaid, and that he told them, this bird ſays to the other birds, that they are going to fly immediately to Porta Maggiore, where a cart loaded with millet, is juſt now broke down: He therefore invites them to go and eat their ſhare of it; upon which ſeveral of them went to that gate, and found the thing as he had ſaid.

(41) Ibid. pag. 704.

[P] What they have related with reſpect to his Necromancy, has very much the air of a fiction.] Cardinal Benno writes as follows on this ſubject (39). He ſays that Gregory had learnt Necromancy of Theophylactus, who was Pope Benedict IX, of Laurence his companion, of the Archbiſhop of Melfi, and of John Archprieſt of San Giovanni Porta Latina, who was Pope Gregory VI, "who by a correſpondence with Devils, "and the flight and ſinging of birds (40), pretended "to know what was tranſacted in the moſt remote "Countries, the event of wars and the death of "Princes. That ſo long as theſe lived, even whilſt "they ſat in the Pontifical Thrones, he was the inſtru- "ment and chief accomplice of all their ſorceries... "That coming one day from Alba, he had left behind "him his magical Book, which he ſeldom went abroad "without, when miſſing it as he was entering at the "gate of the Lateran, he ſent two truſty ſervants to "fetch it, forbidding them in the ſtricteſt terms to open "it; but that theſe being excited by curioſity, read it: "and that immediately there appeared to them a great "number of Satan's angels, which terrified them to "ſo great a degree, that it made them run almoſt "diſtracted &c. That it was a common thing with "him, by only ſhaking his ſleeve, to diſcharge from "it fire, flame and ſuch like." Coeffeteau complains (41) of du Pleſſis's & cætera. "He omits, "ſays he, the moſt wonderful part of this ſtory, for "Benno adds, that the evil ſpirits were urgent to "know of theſe two ſervants the reaſons why they "had called them, and put them to ſo much trouble. "Command us immediately, ſaid theſe pretty Demons "to the ſervants, to do what you deſire, otherwiſe we "will fall upon you and torment you. Upon this the "youngeſt ſaid to them, overturn thoſe walls this in- "ſtant; and ſaying this, they pointed to the high walls "of Rome which ſtood not far from them. Immediately "theſe ſpirits threw down the walls of Rome; when "the two young men, making the ſign of the croſs, re- "turned in the utmoſt terrors to their maſter." Coeffeteau declares, that du Pleſſis was aſhamed to inſert this laſt idle tale in his book, no author of that age having ſpoke of this overthrowing of the walls of Rome. God forbid I ſhould ſuſpect du Pleſſis to have ſuppreſſed, out of artifice, the moſt fabulous part of this paſſage from Benno; but I ſhall be ſo bold as to ſay, that he would have done well, had he omitted his et cætera on this occaſion, This apologiſt declares, that Coeffeteau is guilty of a falſification. He ought not, ſays he (42), to have inſerted in the margin, that no author of that age has mentioned the overthrowing of the walls of Rome. Benno does not mention it neither; he only ſays of this young man, oſtendit illis muros altos vicinos Romæ, quos in momento maligni ſpiritus dejecerunt. i. e. "That he ſhewed them the "high walls near Rome, which the evil ſpirits "threw down in a moment;" and therefore he ſaid nothing of the walls of Rome, near which ſome old walls might have fallen, though no notice be taken of it by the hiſtorians. The ſincerity which I profeſs does not permit me to declare in this place againſt Coeffeteau, for I am perſuaded that he is cenſured unjuſtly; muros altos vicinos Romæ are the walls themſelves of Rome, which were not far from the people in queſtion, and not in the neighbourhood of Rome. Such are the ambiguities in the Latin tongue. How many diſputes do they not occaſion?

(42) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part 2. pag. 193.

I ſhall here give Naudé's judgment with reſpect to the incidents related by Cardinal Benno. "I can "hardly perſuade myſelf, that ſuch ſtrange things "could be ſaid of the moſt wicked wretch that ever "lived, as are told by this author of ſuch a Pope, "and occaſionally of Sylveſter II, John XX, XXI, "and Benedict IX, who, according to him, uſed to "make women, by his magical incantations, run "after him over woods and mountains, and foretold "things to come with certainty. But theſe ſtories "are nothing in compariſon of what he adds of "Laurence the Archbiſhop, who underſtood extremely "well the ſinging of Birds; of Gregory VII, who "threw the ſacred hoſt into the fire, conſpired the "Emperor's death, cauſed Gerard Brazutus his con- "fident to poiſon ſix Popes; and had learned Ne- "cromancy ſo perfectly of Theophylactus and Lau- "rence, diſciples of Sylveſter, that he uſed to throw "out fire by ſhaking his arm, and dart thunder out of "his ſleeve. But this author has ſaid to much to ob- "tain credit; and ſince he was deſirous of ſlan- "dering the Popes, he ought to have done it with "more modeſty and judgment (43)." Theſe laſt words ought to be meditated upon perpetually by ſatirical writers. By endeavouring to overdo a thing, they fall ſhort of it; ipſa ſibi obſtat magnitudo (44); they diſcredit the truths related by them, by the fictions with which they blend them. They would act much more wiſely, to ſuppreſs ſome particulars, than to add ſuch as are inſignificant (45). The maxim, dimidium plus toto, i. e. "the half is more "than the whole (46)," ought to be for ever their rule in writing. Father Maimbourg (47) obſerves, that the ſlanders publiſhed againſt Gregory VII "deſtroyed themſelves, becauſe they were too inju- "rious; too groſly invented by men blinded with "paſſion and prejudice, which ſays nothing by its "endeavour to ſay too much, and what at the ſame "time is altogether improbable."

(43) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, pag. 553.

(44) Florus, in Proœmio. See the remark [H] of the article ACHILLEA.

(45) It is not here that we are to apply the maxim of the Civilians, Superflua non nocent.

(46) The remark [H] of the article ACHILLEA.

[Q] It is pretended that his body was found almoſt intire, five hundred years after his death,] He was interred in Salerno, in St. Matthew's Church, which he himſelf had conſecrated a little before his death. His body was ſought for in 1573, and found cloathed in the Pontifical veſtments. Here follows the epitaph hiſtory, when we read the Apologies which have been written by thoſe who favoured him [R].

(47) Décadence de l'Empire, pag. 290.

(l) From June 1699.

The anonymous Author who publiſhes monthly, L'Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe (l), has made a reflection which it will be proper for me to examine. It relates to what is told by me in the remark [B], concerning the conqueſts of the Popes. He pretends they were not ſo difficult as I imagine [S] ; and that we ſhould rather wonder that they were not which was added to it (48). Gregorio VII. Soanenſi Pont. Opt. Max. Eccleſiaſticæ libertatis vindici acerrimo, aſſertori conſtantiſſimo, qui dum Rom. Pontificis auctoritatem adverſus Henrici perfidiam ſtrenuè tuetur, Salerni ſanctè decubuit, anno Dom. 1085. 8 Kal. Junii. Marcus Antonius Columna, Marſilius Bononienſis, Archiepiſcopus Salernitanus, cùm illius corpus, quingentos circiter annos, ſacris amictum, ac ferè integrum reperiſſet, ne tanti Pontificis ſepulchrum diutius memoria careret. Gregorio XIII. Bononienſe ſedente, anno Domini 1578 pridie Kalendas Quintilis. i. e. " To the me- " mory of Gregory VII, of Soana, Pope of Rome, " a moſt ſtrenuous aſſerter of the liberties of the " Church, who, whilſt he was vigorouſly maintain- " ing the authority of the Pontifical See againſt the " perfidy of Henry, died piouſly in Salerno, Ann. " Dom. 1085, May the 25th. This epitaph, in " order that the ſepulchre of ſo great a Pope might " no longer be undiſtinguiſhed, was ſet up by Marc " Anthony Columna, Archbiſhop of Salerno, he " having found his body after it had been buried " about 500 years, and dreſſed in the Pontifical " veſtments: in the Pontificate of Gregory XIII, " June the 30th, 1578." A place was given him in the Roman martyrology anno 1584, and his feſtival was ſolemniſed in 1595 (49).

(48) See Father Jacob, Bibliotheca Pontificia, lib. 1. pag. 93. There ſeem to be many errors in this paſſage; many words omitted by the Printers.

(49) Hiſtoires des Ouvrages des Savans, for April 1689, pag. 166.

[R] The apologies which have been written by thoſe who favour him.] He who ſignalized himſelf chiefly for this Pope was a German Jeſuit (50), who has produced the good teſtimony which fifty very holy and very learned (as he calls them) authors, have given of Gregory VII. Among theſe are Paulus Bernriedenſis, and Gerochus or Gerhohus Reicherſpergenſis. Du Pleſſis (51) imagined, that this Gerochus had writ the Life of Gregory VII, and has given a quotation from it, on the credit of Joannes Aventinus. It is pretended that he is doubly miſtaken: it is aſſerted in oppoſition to him (52), 1. that Gerochus did not write ſuch a life, but that he only ſpoke (53) of divers things, which relate to the diſputes between this Pope and the Emperor. 2. That he does not ſay what du Pleſſis has cited him for. It is proved by the work itſelf of Gerochus, publiſhed at Ingolſtad anno 1611. Rivet replies (54), that one is not obliged to truſt that edition, ſince it was procured by Gretſerus the Jeſuit, who might have ſuppreſſed whatever he pleaſed in it. This Jeſuit aſſerts (55), that the words aſcribed to Gerochus, are of Aventinus. He talks in an extreme haughty ſtrain againſt ſuch, as ſhall dare ſtill to doubt of the innocence of Gregory VII, after his apology, and the pieces publiſhed by Sebaſtian Tegnanel, Librarian to the Emperor. Quis Benno & Sigebertus, Gregorii VII, calumniatores; ſi conferantur cum tot ſanctiſſimis & doctiſſimis Scriptoribus à parte Gregorii VII ſtantibus, quorum in Apologia pro eodem Pontifice, quinquaginta protulimus, recitatis eorum verbis; ex quibus nonnulli interea integri in lucem venerunt, ut Paulus Bernriedenſis, & Gerochus ſeu Gerhohus Reicherſpergenſis, ut taceam præclara illa antiquorum monumenta, quæ in defenſionem Gregorii VII jam olim ſcripta, nuper ex tenebris eruit vir clariſſimus Dominus Sebaſtianus Tegnanel, J. U. D: Cæſareus Viennæ Bibliothecarius, quorum fulgore tam priſcorum, quàm recentium in Gregorium VII convicia adeo obnubilantur, ut jam non niſi à noctuis, ululis, veſpertilionibus & nycticoracibus, & ſi quæ ſunt aliæ hujus generis caliginis patientes, lucis impatientes aves, conſpiciantur (56). i. e. " What " are Benno and Sigebert, thoſe ſlanderers of Gre- " gory VII, when compared with ſo many moſt holy " and moſt learned authors, advocates for that Pope, " of whom I have cited fifty, and their very expreſ- " ſions, in my apology for that Pontif. Among " thoſe writers, ſome have come to light intire, as " Paulus Bernriedenſis and Gerochus or Gerhohus " Reicherſpergenſis; not to take notice of thoſe ex- " cellent remains of antiquity, which having been " written formerly in defence of Gregory VII, were " lately publiſhed by Sebaſtian Tegnanel, Doctor of " Laws, Librarian to his Imperial Majeſty at Vienna; " by the ſplendor of which, as well antient as mo- " dern, the ſlanders vented againſt Gregory VII are " ſo obſcured, that they now are viſible only to owls, " bats, night-ravens, and the like nocturnal birds."

(50) James Gretſerus.

(51) Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 246.

(52) Coeffeteau, Réponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquite, pag. 696. Gretſerus, in Examine Myſterii Pleſſ. pag. 356.

(53) In primo Libro de Inveſtigatione Antichriſti.

(54) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Rép. au Myſt. d'Iniquité, pag. 186.

(55) In præloquiis ad Gerochianum Syntagma. See his Examen Myſterii Pleſſæani, pag. 357.

(56) Gretſ. in Exam. Myſter. Pleſſæani, pag. 359, 360.

Is it poſſible that Aventinus ſhould have been guilty of the baſeneſs which is aſcribed to him? It is pretended, that in order to ſlander the Popes with the greater malignity, he declared that thoſe ſatyrs which he himſelf invented had been found by him in antient books. Quis vel obiter in Aventino verſatus neſcit, Aventinum ſine fronte in pontifices maledicta jacere, & ne impudentia accuſetur mentiri talia à veteribus vel dicta vel prodita de pontificibus, cum ipſe ex hæretico ſuo cerebro omnia hujus generis exſculpſerit, & quæ olim dicta vel ſcripta voluiſſet, dicta vel ſcripta fuiſſe, Cynico prorſus ore affirmet (57). i. e. " What " man is ſo little converſant in Aventinus, as not to " know that he calumniates the Popes in the moſt " barefaced manner; and to avoid the accuſation of " impudence, falſely pretends that ſuch and ſuch par- " ticulars were related of the Pontifs, when he himſelf " forged all theſe incidents in his heretical brain; " and whatever he would have to have been ſaid or " written antiently, aſſerts, with a Cynical aſſurance, " to have been really ſaid or written." To prove this it is alledged, that he has cited Gerochus for ſome particulars which are not in that author's manuſcript. This would be a ſtrong objection, if Aventinus's favourers could not plead, as their laſt refuge, that Gretſerus falſified his edition of Gerochus (58). It may be ſaid, in anſwer to Gretſerus, that it is no ways probable Aventinus publiſhed his own ſatires under the name of an antient author, ſince he might have found a conſiderable number of antient authors, who have ſlandered the Court of Rome in the higheſt degree. It was but naming thoſe writers; zealous Papiſts never fail to complain, that the enemies of the holy See, " are continually employed in ſearching for ſuch " proofs and calumnies as are not to be found for " their purpoſe in good writers, among the ſepulchres " and old ſinks of the ſciſmaticks; and as Michael " Ritius (*) the Civilian has very well obſerved," Antiquos & manuſcriptos libros in latebroſis locis laborioſe evolvunt, & ex fœtido pulvere auctores quoſvis excitant, quos licentioſe in ipſos Pontifices ſcripſiſſe deprehendunt. " They laboriouſly peruſe antient books " and manuſcripts, lying in obſcute corners; and raiſe " any authors out of the duſt, whom they find to " have written licentiouſly againſt the Popes." Witneſs the collection made of theſe by Matthias Flaccius Illyricus, in the huge work intitled Catalogus teſtium veritatis, which I cannot better compare to any thing than to the Poneropolis of Philip of Macedon; for as this city was inhabited by none but wretches baniſhed for their crimes, villains, thieves, murderers, and all the ſcum of the country; in like manner we may juſtly ſay, that excepting the paſſages corrupted out of the fathers and councils; this whole long catalogue is ſtuffed with nothing but old fragments and ſcraps, from thoſe who have formerly combatted againſt the Church, or were cut off from the body of it, as rotten and gangrened members, ſuch as, among a thouſand others, the falſe Cardinal Benno (59).

AVENTINUS ſlandered.

(57) Gretſerus, ibid. pag. 354.

(58) Rivet affirms it above, citation (54).

(*) Lib. de fide Gallica.

(59) Naudé, Apologie des grans Hommes, p. 551.

[S] The anonymous author, . . . of l'Eſpirt des Cours de l'Europe, . . . pretends that, . . . the conqueſts of the Popes . . . were not ſo difficult as I imagine.] We may divide his reflexion into two parts, and ſay that in the firſt, he rallies in an artful and agreeable manner the power of the Popes; and that, in the ſecond, he plainly and ſeriouſly acknowledges, that it was eaſy for them to aggrandize themſelves. The ingenious ironies in the firſt part are ſo drawn up, that an Ultramontain Doctor might be impoſed upon by them, and employ them ſeriouſly as proofs; and therefore it may not be improper to examine them. " Is it not ſaid that " every earthly knee ſhall bend at the name of the in- " viſible Head? How can the viſible Head want power " to not greater, than that they have been ſo great. I ſhall ſay a word or two concerning a book

" to overthrow all his enemies, and to confound all " thoſe who oppoſed him. The viſible head acts only " by the power of the inviſible Head: if the Sovereign " is always victorious, his Lieutenant muſt be ſo like- " wiſe. This miracle is an article of faith: nay, 'tis " the grand ſpring of religion, which ought to ſubject " the body as much as the mind to its empire. This " no one diſputes; it has a power over the whole man. " As rewards are offered to the material, as well as to " the ſpiritual ſubſtance, both ought to be equally ſub- " ject to the laws, and the menaces relate indifferent- " ly to both. Should this principle be once over- " thrown, what would become of the holy inquiſition? " This divine tribunal would then have no other foun- " dation but a barbarous cruelty; and this ſacred arſe- " nal would not contain one ſingle weapon but what " had been forged in hell-fire. The Pope is therefore " the maſter over bodies as well as ſouls; and as his " authority over conſciences is unlimited, his power " over bodies ought to be ſupreme. Beſides, did not " the œconomy of ſalvation juſtly require, that power " ſhould be as extenſive as light? Of what ſervice " would it be to a chief or head eſtabliſhed by the Dei- " ty to be omniſcient, if he was not at the ſame time " inveſted with abſolute power? It would little avail " this Hercules, to cruſh the monſters of error, if he was " not alſo enabled to overthrow monſters of impiety: " this right includes Kings and Emperors, who tho' " they command over nations, are not therefore leſs " ſubject to the Church. The Popes oppoſed theſe ex- " alted ſubjects, whenever they rebelled againſt this " good mother: they employed an infinite power a- " gainſt them; how then was it poſſible for the Popes " to be worſted? Hence the true cauſe of the glori- " ous and incomprehenſible ſucceſſes of the new Mo- " narchy of Rome (60)." Should we take this paſſage out of its ironical dreſs, it would form the ſerious argument following; that as ſoon as the Biſhops of Rome were conſidered as the Vicars or Lieutenants of Jeſus Chriſt, whoſe power over bodies and ſouls is unlimitted; their empire muſt neceſſarily have been eſtabliſhed eaſily over nations, and even over the temporalities of Sovereigns. One diſtinction will be ſufficient to clear up this difficulty. In what manner ſoever it be propoſed, that Chriſt eſtabliſhed a Vicar or Deputy in his Church, yet good ſenſe and right reaſon will ſuggeſt to us, that he eſtabliſhed it, not as ſupreme Maſter and Creator of all things, but in quality of Mediator between God and men, or in quality of Founder of a religion, which ſhows men the way to ſalvation; promiſes the joys of Paradiſe to the faithful, and threatens impenitent ſinners with God's wrath. Such then are the bounds which Chriſt Jeſus would have ſettled to the power of his Vicar; and the moſt that the latter could have done, would have been to decide with regard to the doctrine which ſaves or damns. After having declared to mankind the promiſes with regard to Paradiſe, and threatnings with reſpect to hell, and after having employed inſtructions, cenſures, and ſuch like ſpiritual methods; he would be obliged to leave to God the executing of the threatnings, not only with regard to the puniſhment in the other world but to the corporal puniſhment inflicted in this world. Chriſt himſelf acted in this very manner. He conformed exactly to the true ſpirit of religion, which is, to enlighten and ſanctify the ſoul, and lead into ſalvation by perſuaſive methods; without incroaching ſo far upon politics, as to puniſh corporally the ſtubborn and incredulous, of whom he found numberleſs multitudes; for it is not true that, in this reſpect, the head and maſter of the Church is always victorious (61). And therefore they themſelves who were the moſt ſtrongly perſuaded that the Pope is Chriſt's Vicar, muſt have conſidered his pretending to a temporal juriſdiction, and the authority he aſſumed of puniſhing the body, as an abuſe of his Vicarſhip; and hence there ſhould have naturally aroſe, a numberleſs multitude of obſtacles to the Biſhop of Rome's conqueſts. It is not a uſeleſs faculty to know all things, tho' one has not the power to govern and diſpoſe all things. It is enough that Religion teaches exactly what men are to believe and practiſe; it need but enable its profeſſors to refute error: and it is only in this ſenſe that the authority of cruſhing monſters of hereſy and impiety belong to it. If men reſiſt its light, it belongs to God to puniſh them for it, as wretches for whom no excuſe can be made; this is not the buſineſs of Religion, nor one branch of the miniſtry eſtabliſhed by Jeſus Chriſt. I will now examine the ſecond part of the anonymous Writer's reflection.

" But, not to ſoar ſo high, and to ſpeak more " humanly, I do not find any thing ſo very ſurpriſing " in the exaltation of the Roman Pontifs. By the help " of ſome paſſages of Scripture, they have perſuaded " mankind of their Divinity: but is this a new thing? " Do not men go the moſt extravagant length in " matters of Religion? Above all they love to deify " their fellow-creatures, as is manifeſt from the hea- " then ſyſtem. Now, if it be once admitted, that " the Roman Pontifs could eaſily eſtabliſh the divine " privileges of their office; was it not natural that " men ſhould declare in their favour againſt all other " powers? As to my ſelf, ſo far from being ſurprized " at their exaltation, I wonder how it was poſſible " for them to fail of univerſal monarchy. When I " conſider how many Princes have ſhook off the pa- " pal yoke, I am quite confounded; when I enquire " into the reaſon of it, I can aſcribe it to nothing but " the two general and known cauſes following, that " men do not always act agreeably to their princi- " ples; and that the preſent life makes a ſtronger " impreſſion on their minds than that to come (62)." Taking it for granted, as this ſubtle and ingenious perſon ſuppoſes, that the Popes could eaſily perſuade mankind, that they were Gods upon earth, i. e. that in quality of viſible heads of the Church, they were impowered to declare in an authoritative way, what is heretical and what is orthodox; and alſo to regulate ceremonies, and command over all the Biſhops in Chriſtendom will the conſequence of this be, that they could eaſily eſtabliſh their authority over Kings, and ſubject them to their yoke without the leaſt difficulty? It does not appear to me that this follows; on the contrary, methinks, it ſeemed probable that their ſpiritual authority ſhould be expoſed to great danger, by their ambitious deſigns of encroaching on the temporalities of Kings. Take care (was it one day ſaid to the Athenians) that your concern for heaven does not make you loſe the earth (63). On the contrary, it ſhould have been ſaid to the Roman Pontifs, take care that your paſſionate deſire for conquering the earth, does not make you loſe heaven; you will loſe the ſpiritual, ſhould you attempt to uſurp the temporal power. It is well known that the moſt orthodox Princes are more tender of their ſovereignty than of Religion, of which we have a thouſand examples both antient and modern. It therefore was not probable, that they ſhould let the Church poſſeſs itſelf of their demeſnes and rights; and it was probable, that they ſhould endeavour to increaſe their authority, in prejudice of the Church, rather than ſuffer the power of the Church to increaſe, to the prejudice of their temporal power. Princes who underſtand the art of reigning, generally have the Gentlemen and ſoldiers at their devotion; and when this part of their ſubjects are faithful to them, they ſeem not to have any cauſe to fear the enterprizes of the Clergy. Their troops will fight for them againſt all ſorts of enemies. The forces of Charles V made war againſt Clement VII; thoſe of Lewis XII of France againſt Pope Julius II; and thoſe of Lewis XIV would have fought for him with incredible bravery againſt Alexander VII, a little before the peace of Piſa (64) freed this Pope from the ſtorm which was going to break over his head. Being at Mr. Juſſel's at Paris, in 1675, a perſon affirmed that Count de Vignori, Governor of Triers, made the following anſwer to the Friars, who repreſented to him that the Convents, which he demoliſhed in order to fortify the City, had been founded by Charlemaigne; I only execute the King's orders; and ſhould he command me to raiſe a battery againſt the holy Sacrament, I would do it. Francis Mendoſa de Corduba was not quite ſo fiery in an anſwer he made to a letter of the Emperor dated the 30th of December 1598, but did not fall very ſhort of it. He obſerved to him that, although his Imperial Majeſty ſhould be with his power on one ſide, and the holy Father the Pope with his anathema on the

(60) L'Eſprit des Cours de l'Europe, Nov. 1699, pag. 663.

(61) See the remark [E] of the article XENOPHANES.

(62) L'Eſprit des cours de l'Europe, for Nov. 1699, pag. 665.

(63) See the citation from Eraſmus, in the remark [F] of the article OLYMPIAS.

(64) It was concluded in 1664.

book publiſhed a few months ſince, and entitled, The Hiſtory of the Amours of the other, commanding him once more to go, that he would not obey; ſince he had a maſter who had ordered him to perform his exploits, unleſs any one by force of arms ſhould oblige him to do otherwiſe (65). We may add that it is in the power of Emperors and Kings, to beſtow ſo many noble rewards on a great number of perſons, that is very eaſy for them to win over to their intereſt a great number of Prelates and Monks, and oblige them to write againſt the Pretenſions of the Court of Rome. This paper-war muſt, in all probability, prove fatal to ſuch Roman Pontifs as uſurp a temporal authority; for it is eaſy to ſhow, both by expreſs texts of ſcripture, by the ſpirit of the Goſpel, by antient tradition, and the practice of the primitive ages; that the Popes have no manner of ground or reaſon for their pretenſions of diſpoſing of crowns, nnd of ſharing, in ſo many particulars, the rights of ſovereignty. This may even pave the way, to the calling in queſtion their ſpiritual authority; and by putting them upon the defenſive, with reſpect to that point, how greatly does one puzzle them? To what danger would not the belief of theſe articles, which people came to ſwallow by degrees, be thereby expoſed? Farther, the Clergy, whom the Court of Rome prohibit from marrying, will in all probability be inclined to ſerve their Princes, which is no inconſiderable circumſtance. Numberleſs multitudes of them look upon the yoke of celibacy as too ſevere: the honeſt part of the Eccleſiaſtics, who cannot live in that ſtate are fondeſt of marriage; for as to thoſe who have little or no conſcience, they do not ſcruple to keep concubines. Be this as it will, celibacy is grievous to vaſt numbers of people; marriage is to them the moſt precious of all ſacraments; and whoever ſhould write a book on this ſubject, like to that on frequent Communion, would make himſelf as odious as Mr. Arnauld, when he publiſhed, under that title, but on a different ſubject, a work that has made a great deal of noiſe. One therefore ſhould have naturally thought, that the Emperors and other Princes would meet with legions of Prieſts, Canons, and Monks, ready to ſerve them, againſt the Popes, as thoſe are zealous promoters of celibacy. Now what might not theſe Princes promiſe themſelves, who beſides their great armies, can oppoſe to a Biſhop of Rome, ſo many Eccleſiaſticks, who cannot live without women, and are extremely deſirous of having wives and children?

(65) The author of the Apology for the Houſe of Naſſau, p. 184. edit. of 1664. He cites de Meteren, folio 456.

But in order to know whether thoſe who had formed ſuch conjectures, with regard to the obſtacles which the Roman Pontifs would meet with againſt their deſigns; to know, I ſay, whether ſuch conjectures would have been well grounded, we muſt have recourſe to the events themſelves, and conſult hiſtory. It will thereby appear, that they would have conjectured very right, with regard to the obſtacles; and that they could have erred, at moſt, only in pretending that thoſe obſtacles would be inſurmountable. Read du Pleſſis's work, intitled, the Myſtery of Iniquity; or the Hiſtory of the Papal See, and you will there find the progreſs and oppoſitions in every chapter. The Roman Pontifs do not advance forward, and gain ground, but by removing the obſtacles which they meet with at every ſtep. Armies, books, ſermons, libels and prophecies have been employed againſt them; in ſhort every engine has been ſet at work in order to put a ſtop to their conqueſts, and yet at laſt they all could not avail. The reaſon of this is, becauſe the Roman Pontifs uſed all the arts and means poſſible to ſucceed in their deſigns. Their fulminating anathemas have been inforced by arms, cruſades, and the tribunals of the Inquiſition; whilſt craft, violence, courage and artifice, have conſpired to protect them. Their conqueſts have coſt the lives of as many men, or almoſt as many, as thoſe of the Roman Commonwealth. Many writers apply to new Rome, what was obſerved by Virgil concerning the old.

(66) Virgil. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 5.

Multa quoque & bello paſſus, dum conderet urbem, Inferretque Deos Latio (66). . . .
\- - - - -

(67) Idem, ibid. ver. 33.

TANTÆ MOLIS ERAT ROMANAM CONDERE GENTEM (67).

" Long labours, both by ſea and land he bore;
" And in the doubtful war before he won
" The Latian realm, and built the deſtin'd town.
\- - - - - -
" Such time, ſuch toil, requir'd the Roman name,
" Such length of labour for ſo vaſt a frame.
Dryden.

Zipporah told Moſes, ſurely a bloody huſband art thou to me (68); but if the Church of Rome were the wife of Jeſus Chriſt, her huſband might tell her with more reaſon, ſurely a bloody wife art thou to me. (68) Exod. iv. 25.

What is here ſaid, methinks, is ſufficient to juſtify the propoſitions which I had laid down in the firſt edition of this Dictionary, in the remark [B] of the preſent article. I am ſtill firmly of opinion, that the exalted power to which the Popes have raiſed themſelves, is one of the greateſt prodigies in human Hiſtory, and a thing that will not happen twice. Were it to do again, I believe it would never be done. Future ages would never afford a point of time ſo favourable to this enterprize, as paſt ages; and were this great edifice deſtroyed, it would be impoſſible ever to rebuild it. All the Court of Rome can now do, though it is filled with the ableſt politicians in the world, is barely to ſupport itſelf. Its acquiſitions are now at an end (69). It does not now dare excommunicate a crowned head; and is often obliged to diſſemble its reſentment, againſt that Catholic party, who diſpute the Pope's infallibility and ſuperiority, and burn ſuch books as are moſt favourable to them. Were there now an antipapacy, I mean a ſchiſm, like to thoſe which have been ſo frequent, and created ſo much confuſion in former times, when Pope ſet up againſt Pope, and council againſt council, (69) This muſt be underſtood according to the ſchool diſtinction, intenſivè and not extenſivè.

Infeſtiſque obvia ſignis
Signa, pares aquilas, & pila minantia pilis (70).

(70) Lucan. Pharſal. lib. 1. ver. 6.

" Standards againſt Standards rais'd;
" Eagles againſt eagles, javelin againſt javelin."

it would not come off with honour, but would be quite diſconcerted, atd at its wit's end. Such a contraſt or ſtruggle, in an age like ours, would prove quite deſtructive. The reader muſt obſerve by the way, in order to form a juſt idea of the greatneſs and nature of the obſtacles ſpoken of above, that the Roman Pontifs were obliged to make themſelves maſters of ſeveral general councils. Now this was a very difficult taſk; for the more numerous a council is, the more it reſembles a ſhip toſt about by contrary winds, and buffeted by thoſe violent ſtorms of which Virgil has left the following deſcription.

Incubuêre mari, totumque à ſedibus imis
Unà Euruſque Notuſque ruunt, creberque procellis
Africus; & vaſtos volvunt ad littora fluctus.
Inſequitur clamorque virum, ſtridorque rudentum.
Eripiunt ſubitò nubes cœlumque diemque
Teucrorum ex oculis: ponto nox incubat atra,
Intonuêre poli, & crebris micat ignibus æther (71).

(71) Virg. Æn. lib. 1. ver. 84.

" The raging winds ruſh thro' the hollow wound,
" And dance aloft in air, and ſkim along the ground:
" Then ſetling on the ſea, the ſurges ſweep:
" Raiſe liquid mountains, and diſcloſe the deep.
" South, eaſt, and weſt, with mix'd confuſion roar,
" And roll the foaming billows to the ſhoar.
" The cables crack, the ſailors fearful cries
" Aſcend; and ſable night involves the ſkies;
" And Heaven itſelf is raviſh'd from their eyes.
" Loud peals of thunder from the poles inſue,
" Then flaſhing fires the tranſient light renew;
" The face of things a frightful image bears,
" And preſent death in various forms appears.
Dryden.

The utmoſt art and skill is required for ſteering ſuch a ſhip; and it is almoſt a miracle, if the moſt painful, the moſt skilful working, ſucceeds ſo happily a to bring it into the intended harbour.

of Gregory VII [T].

[T] I ſhall ſay a word or two concerning a Book entitled . . . the Hiſtory of the Amours of Gregory VII.] This is but part of the title, but here it follows compleat: The Hiſtory of the Amours of Gregory VII, of Cardinal Richelieu, of the Princeſs of Condé, and the Marchioneſs d'Urfé. By Mademoiſelle D. At Colen. Printed for Peter the younger, MDCC. Although the Author mentions the word Romance in the firſt lines of the Preface, ſhe nevertheleſs affirms, that all theſe ſtories are true; and that ſhe could have carried them to a much greater length, had ſhe employed invention. This is the higheſt pitch of boldneſs, and may be eaſily perceived, at this time, by the peruſal of the Book; but who can venture to ſay, that this will not be a difficult matter in future Ages? Let us ſuppoſe that ſuch a Book had been wrote in the time of Gregory VII; is it not very probable that Aventinus, or Flacius Illyricus, finding it in the corner of ſome Library, would have made uſe of it as a true Hiſtory? Would it not be quoted every day, as a genuine piece, in controverſial works? Who can tell how things may change between the eighteenth and twenty eighth Century? Perhaps ignorance and barbarity will return, after which polite Literature may again revive. Perhaps a thouſand valuable Books may be deſtroyed, whilſt this in queſtion may exiſt. This piece will perhaps be diſcovered by ſome curious perſon; be look'd upon as an invaluable treaſure of ſecret hiſtory, and a genuine monument of the true hiſtory of Cardinal Richelieu's amours, &c. The Public have too often been impoſed upon by ſuch pieces, and will probably be ſo in time to come. But there is no help for it.

GREGORY (PETER) a native of Toulouſe, taught the civil Law, firſt at Cahors, and afterwards in the city of his birth. He flouriſhed in the 16th Century. He was a man of very great learning, and wrote ſome books filled with a vaſt erudition [A]; but he did not appear judicious enough in the choice of things publiſhed by him. What has been ſaid of his book de Republica may be applied to all his works [B]. He was invited in a very honourable manner into Lorrain, to be Profeſſor in Civil and Canon Law at Pontamouſſon (a), where Duke Charles had lately founded an Univerſity. See the margin (b). He exerciſed this employment very gloriouſly till the year 1597, which was that of his death [C]. He was buried in the convent of the Nuns of St. Clara (c). He underſtood Hebrew [D], which had Colomeſius known, he would have mentioned him in his Gallia Orientalis.

(a) Decani titulo & cum ſumma poteſtate accitus eſt, atque in ea utrumque jus magna cum laude profeſſus. Doujat. Præn. Canon. pag. 638.

(c) Extracted from Doujat. Præn. Canon. pag. 638.

(b) Doujat fixes this to anno 1582, but Peter Gregory, in the dedication to the Syntaxis Artis mirabilis, dated at Lions the 4th of November 1574, calls himſelf Law-Profeſſor in the new Univerſity of Pontamouſſon. This Univerſity was founded anno 1573, by Cardinal Charles of Lorrain, if we may credit Baudrand, pag. 431. of vol. 2. of his Geography.

[A] He . . . wrote ſome Books, filled with a vaſt erudition.] This will appear from the peruſal of the work intitled, Syntagma Juris univerſi atque Legum pene omnium Gentium, & rerum publicarum præcipuarum, in tres partes digeſtum, in quo divini & humani juris totius, naturali ac novo methodo per gradus, ordineque, materia univerſalium & ſingularium ſimulque judicia explicantur. This is a large folio volume, which has borne ſeveral impreſſions (1). His other Works are Syntaxis Artis mirabilis. De Republica Libri XXVI. Two volumes on the Canon-Law. The firſt volume contains Partitiones totius Juris Canonici, in quinque libros digeſtæ, Scholiis & Annotationibus illuſtratæ inſtar Syntagmatis totius Juris Eccleſiaſtici, quæ à methodo Partitionum Ciceronis Oratoriarum diverſæ, ſummam potius Hoſtienſis imitantur: the other volume contains, Commentaria & Annotationes in Decretalium procœmium. Ad Tit. de ſumma Trinitate & Fide Catholica. De Conſtitutionibus. De Reſcriptis. De Electione Enarratio. Ad Cap. conquerente de officio & poteſtate Judicis Ordin. Rei beneficiariæ Eccleſiaſticæ Inſtitutiones. Ad Tit. de Sponſalibus & Matrimoniis. De Uſuris libri tres (2). He wrote againſt Charles du Moulin (α), to prove that the Council of Trent ought to be received in France.

(1) I have that before me, of Frankfort, 1599.

(2) See Doujat, Prænot. Canonic. pag. 638.

§ (α) Under the name of Ræmundus Rufus (if I miſtake not) and to ſhew that the Council of Trent ought to be received in France, againſt what the other had written to the contrary, in his Conſilium ſupra facta Concilii Tridentini. Peter Gregory's piece was inſerted in 1682, in one of the laſt Editions of the Works of Charles du Moulin, to introduce, as it were, into the world, this little piece, which was then going to appear, for the firſt time, in the Works of this Civilian. REM. CRIT.]

[B] What has been ſaid of his Book de Republica, may be applied to all his Works.] Here follows the judgment which Gabriel Naudé has formed of it. Copioſior (Nicolao Bieſio Medico Lovanienſi) extitit Gregorius Tholoſanus, at magis ex arte ſcribens, quia Juriſperitus: deſiderantur tamen in eo modus, quem ſibi præſcribere non potuit eruditione vulgari luxurians; & majeſtas, cui non magis indulſit quàm judicio, dum omnia ingerit, & pauca digerit: cæterum valde utilis eſt, & diverſa in ſe continet, propter quæ theſauri inſtar haberi poſſit, ubi meliorum auctorum gemmas ac precioſam variæ doctrinæ ſupellectilem poſſis invenire (3). i. e. "Gregory of "Toulouſe was more copious, and wrote with greater "art, as being a Civilian, than Nicholas Bieſius the "Phyſician of Louvain. Nevertheleſs, the luxuriancy "of his erudition was ſuch, that it did not permit him "to ſet bounds to his writing. This Author is like-"wiſe deficient in dignity as well as in judgment; he "crouding in every thing, and digeſting very little. "He nevertheleſs is a very uſeful Writer, and has "taken in a multitude of things, for which reaſon he "may be conſidered as a treaſure, where the moſt ex-"cellent particulars of the beſt Authors are to be "found."

(3) Naudæus, Bibliograph. Politica, pag. m. 22.

[C] The year 1597 . . was that of his death.] Doujat (4) informs me of this particular; and as he was the Author's countryman, I believe him rather than Konig, who declares that our Gregory died in 1585. The Francfort Bookſeller (5) is not accurate, when he ſays in his Dedication, dated the firſt of March 1599, that the calamities of the times had prevented his enjoying the preſence and aſſiſtance of the Author (6), when he reprinted the Syntagma Juris univerſi. Would this Author have wrote thus of our Gregory, in 1599, had he known that he died in 1597? This error could not be wholly excuſed, by ſuppoſing that the printing of this Book took up ſome years.

(4) Præn. Canon. pag. 638.

(5) Johnas Rhodius. He had removed from France to Frankfort, as he tells us in the dedication.

(6) Cum per injuriam temporis ipſius auctoris præſentia & ope frui non liceret. Johnas Rhodius, Petri Fiſcheri Bibliopolæ Francofortenſis Succeſſor, Epiſt. Dedicat. ad Archiepiſcopum Moguntinum. Cum ipſius Auctoris præſentia in hiſce deplorandis Gallicarum rerum tumultibus frui non liceret. Idem, Præfat. ad Lector.

[D] He underſtood Hebrew.] This we are told by Feltman, a Civilian of Germany; he not only calling him virum omni ſtudiorum genere excellentiſſimum (7), but alſo Hebræi Juris ac Sermonis callentiſſimum (8).

(7) Feltman. lib. 1. de Tit. Honor. cap. 13. apud Magirum, Eponymol. pag. 403.

(8) Ibid. cap. 1. num. 3. apud eundem, ibid.

☞GREGORY (JOHN), a very learned Engliſh Writer in the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Agmundeſham or Amerſham in Buckinghamſhire on the 10th of November 1607. His parents were in low circumſtances, but of ſuch noted piety and honeſty, as gained them the eſteem of perſons of the beſt Quality in that place (a); whence this their eldeſt ſon, about the fifteenth year (b) of their pious education of him, was choſen by Dr. Crook to wait upon Sir William Drake, and ſoon after on Sir Robert Crook, at Chriſt Church in Oxford, where they were put under the tuition of Dr. George Morley, afterwards Biſhop of Wincheſter (c). He ſtudied here ſixteen of every rwenty

(a) Short Account of the Life and Death of Mr. John Gregory M. A. By John Gurgany B. D. of Merton College, prefixed to Gregorii Poſthuma: or certain learned Tracts written by John Gregory, M. A.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 100. tells us, that he became a Servitor in Chriſt Church in 1624.

(c) Short Account, ubi ſupra.

twenty four hours for ſeveral years together, by which means he made a prodigious progreſs in learning (d), and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts October the 11th 1628 (e), and that of Maſter of Arts June the 22d 1631 (f). About this time Dr. Brian Duppa, Dean of Chriſt Church, made him Chaplain or Petty Canon of that Cathedral, and afterwards his domeſtic Chaplain, and Prebendary of Chicheſter and Saliſbury, when Dr. Duppa ſucceſſively ſate Biſhop of thoſe Sees (g). In 1634 he publiſhed a ſecond edition of Sir Thomas Ridley's View of the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Law with Notes [A]; in which Notes he made an early diſcovery of his Civil, Hiſtorical, Eccleſiaſtical, Ritual, and Oriental Learning, and his ſkill in the Saxon, French, Italian, Spaniſh and all the Eaſtern Languages, which he made himſelf maſter of without any guide, except Mr. John Dod the Decalogiſt (h), whoſe converſation and directions for the Hebrew tongue he enjoyed one vacation near Banbury (i). Some years before his death he was reduced to great diſtreſs, being deprived of the benefit of his two Prebends, and retired to an obſcure Ale-houſe on the Green at Kidlington near Oxford. Here he lived in great retiredneſs; and in 1646, juſt before his death, publiſhed Notes and Obſervations upon ſome paſſages of Scripture [B], in which kind of ſtudies he intended to ſpend the reſt of his life.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 240.

(f) Idem, ibid. col. 252.

(g) Short Account &c.

(i) Short Account, ubi ſupra. Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 100. ſays that his benefice was in Northamptonſhire.

(b) He was called ſo, becauſe he, with Robert Cleaver, another Puritan Miniſter, wrote An Expoſition on the ten Commandments. He was born in Cheſhire, educated in Jeſus College Cambridge, ſucceſſively Miniſter of Hanwell in Oxfordſhire, Fenny Drayton in Leiceſterſhire, Canons Aſhby and Fauſley in Northamptonſhire, though for a time ſilenced in each of them. He died at Fauſley in 1645, aged about ninety.

[A] In 1634 he publiſhed a ſecond Edition of Sir Thomas Ridley's View of the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Law, with Notes.] The title of this Edition is as follows: A View of the Civile and Eccleſiaſticall Law; and wherein the practice of them is ſtreitned and may be relieved within this Land. Written by Sir Thomas Ridley Knt. and Doctor of the Civile Law. The ſecond Edition by J. G. Mr. of Arts. Oxford 1634 in 4to. It was reprinted at Oxford 1662 in 8vo, and 1675 in 4to. Mr. Gurgany B. D. of Merton College (1) tells us, that Mr. Gregory dedicated his Edition of Ridley's View to Dr. Duppa; but we find no ſuch Dedication in the Edition of 1634 now before us; and our Author himſelf in his preface obſerves, that finding it under the protection of the high and mighty Prince James, he thought it altogether inglorious to ſeek any other Patron for this new Edition. He ſtiles this Work a learned and uſeful View of both the Laws, and remarks that it "may "now hope to conceive a more indifferent cenſure than "before (2), as being committed to a ſeaſon more ma-"ture and more perfectly diſpoſed. For howſoever, "ſays Mr. Gregory, the time, that firſt brought this "forth, could not be charged with any notable diſtem-"per; yet the Commonwealth we live in is of that "thriving nature, that however the preſent time may "ſtill be good, yet it always makes the ſucceeding "Age better than itſelf. This argues the State not "near her ruin, though ſome unruly ſpirits, led by an "irregular motion, have been bold to anticipate; as if "every one that had ſo much pity to fear, had alſo "judgment enough to foreſee the ruin of a Kingdom. "... If it needs muſt be ſuſpected, that the State is "not far from her fall, let this be the only reaſon, be-"cauſe ſhe draweth ſo near to her perfection. That "which heretofore moſt of all incumbered theſe Do-"minions, was the diſproportion of the civil power to "the eccleſiaſtical. This a great Prince abated, and "the Act was truly maſculine, yet like thoſe of the "ſtrongeſt importance, would not be perfected by the "ſame hand. Therefore it was by him ſo fully done "on one ſide, that it might be feared leſt it ſhould run "over on the other. To prevent this, the diſcretion "of theſe late diſcerning times hath warily provided, "the wiſdom of the Prince having ſo well tempered "both the Powers, that it may now be hoped, they "ſhall agree one with another, as both do in him, "by a glorious correſpondence."

(1) In his Short Account of the Life and Death of John Gregory M. A. prefixed to Gregorii Poſthuma: or certain learned Tracts written by John Gregory M. A.

(2) The firſt edition of it was printed in the reign of King James I.

Sir Thomas Ridley was educated at King's College Cambridge, afterwards Maſter of Eaton ſchool, one of the Maſters of Chancery, Chancellor of the Biſhopric of Winchester, Vicar General to Archbiſhop Abbot. He died January 23, 1628.

[B] In 1646 ... he publiſhed Notes and Obſervations upon ſome paſſages of Scripture.] The title of this work was, Notes and Obſervations upon ſome paſſages of Scripture. By J. G. Maſter of Arts of Chriſt-Church Oxon. Oxford 1646 in 4to. It was reprinted at London 1660, 1665, 1671, 1683 in 4to, and tranſlated into Latin, and inſerted in the Critici ſacri. In the preface he animadverts upon thoſe, who in explaining Scriptures made pretences to a ſpirit of interpretation. "This "indeed, ſays he, is a Spirit, that bloweth where it "liſteth, and no man can tell whence it cometh, nor "whither it will go. I would have you tell me by "this Spirit of what kind the Dial of Ahaz was; or "how the Sun could go ten degrees backwards. For "the kind I am ſure it was like none of ours in uſe; "and if the retroceſſion could be meant of the ſhadow "(and ſome men look no farther) the ſame thing may "be made to fall out every day upon an ordinary dyal, "and (notwithſtanding what a good Mathematician Pet. Nonius. "hath ſaid to the contrary) in a ſite and poſition of "the Sphere without the tropics. Therefore the going "back is to be meant of the Sun itſelf. Tell me by "the ſame Spirit how darkneſs could be upon the face "of the whole earth at the Paſſion of our Saviour, and "no Aſtronomer in the Eaſt, nor any man of all that "Hemiſphere, excepting thoſe of Jeruſalem, per-"ceive it? Make it good, if you can, out of the mouth "but of two witneſſes. What's Phlegon and Apollo-"phanes? or if the firſt be one, the notice is ſo ſingle, "that it will not ſerve to celebrate, but bring the won-"der into doubt. The Sun was not totally eclipſed to "all the world. One hemiſphere of his body ſhined "ſtill. And the face of the whole earth is to be meant "of the Land of Judea, as it is elſewhere. By the "ſame Spirit I would know why the Greek and He-"brew Scripture ſhould differ ſo vaſtly in account, and "how the Cainan Κυτρος got into Saint Luke's Goſ-"pel intolerably (Joſeph Scaliger hath ſaid more) a-"gainſt all original truſt. But I may poſſibly tell "you the manner of that hereafter, and that the "Jews did not cut off (as the Arabic Catena would "have it) but the Helleniſts or Græciſts (ſo it ought to "be read, not Grecians, Act. vi. 1.) added what is "ſupernumerary to theſe Epilogiſms. And Cainan "came in too at this back-door, as I think I ſhall be "able to ſhew you at ſome other time, and from an "inconſiderable Ground (but for this it were ſo) of the "Helleniſtical Chiliaſts. But if by this or any other "Spirit whatſoever (that of God only excepted) you "can declare what was Melchizedeck's generation, I "ſhall think you try'd here too much." Mr. Gregory afterwards obſerves, that he was aſk'd once by an able and underſtanding man, whether the Alcoran as it is in itſelf, had ſo much in it, as to work any thing upon a rational belief. He ſaid, Yes. "Thus much only, "ſays he, I require, that the believer ſhould be "brought up firſt under the engagement of that Book. "That which is every where called Religion, hath "more of intereſt and the ſtrongeſt impreſſions of e-"ducation, than perhaps we conſider of otherwiſe. For "the Book itſelf, it is taken for the greater part out "of our Scripture, and would not hear altogether ſo "ill, if it were looked upon in its own text, or thro' "a good Tranſlation. But (not to gain any thing by "this) the Alcoran is ſcarcely tranſlated yet. The "beſt diſguiſe of it is that in Arragonois by Joannes "Andreas the Moor; but the intire copy of it is not "eaſily met with." He then tells us, tho' we meet not yet with any piece of Scripture tranſlated into the China Tongue, yet there is extant even in that a very full tradition of our Goſpel, as it was found written upon a ſtone, wrought in the form of a long ſquare, and dug out of the ground at the building of a wall in Sanxuen in the year 1625. The title of the ſtone is written upon with nine characters in the Chineſe, ex-life. But his conſtitution being broken with an hereditary gout, with which he had been troubled for above twenty years, and which at laſt ſeized his ſtomach, he died at Kidlington March the 13th 1646 (l), and his body by the contribution of his friends was conveyed to Chriſt Church Oxford, and interred there (m). He was honoured by the acquaintance and favour of the greateſt men of that age; and held a correſpondence with ſeveral eminent perſons abroad, as well Jeſuits and Jews, as others (n). Beſides his Poſthumous Works publiſhed by his friend Mr. John Gurgany, B. D. of Merton College [C], and his Treatiſes abovementioned, he wrote a Tract, intitled Alkibla (o), in which he endeavoured to vindicate the antiquity of worſhipping towards the Eaſt. There is a manuſcript of his intitled, Obſervationes in loca quædam excerpta ex Johannis Malelæ chronographia, in the public Library at Oxford (p); and he intended to have publiſhed a Latin Tranſlation of that Author with Annotations (q). He tranſlated likewiſe from Greek

(l) Short Account, ubi ſupra.

(m) Wood, col. 101.

(n) Short Account, ubi ſupra.

(o) A very ingenious and learned Diſcourſe was publiſhed at London 1728 in 8vo, under this title: Alkibla: A Diſquiſition upon worſhipping towards the Eaſt. By a Maſter of Arts of the Univerſity of Oxford.

(p) Wood, Ath. Oxon. col. 101.

(q) Short Account &c.

preſſing as follows: Lapis in laudem & memoriam æternam Legis, Lucis, & Veritatis portatæ de Judæa, & in Chinâ promulgatæ, erectus. "The ſtone ſaith, that "our Saviour, aſcended up into Heaven about noon, "& relinquens ſeptem viginti tomos doctrinæ ad portam "magnæ converſionis mundi aperiundam; and left be"hind him twenty ſeven Books of Doctrine (ſo many "there are in the New Teſtament) to ſet open a gate "for the great converſion of the world. Baptiſmum inſti"tuit ex aquâ & Spiritu ad abluenda peccata, &c. Ex"citat omnes voce charitatis, reverentiam exhibere ju"bens verſus Orientem, ne pergant in viâ vitæ glorioſæ: "i. e. He inſtituted Baptiſm by Water and the Spirit "to waſh away ſins: he ſtirred all men up in the "voice of charity, and gave command that they "ſhould worſhip towards the Eaſt, that they might "go forward in the way of a glorious life." The ſtone itſelf could not ſo well be brought off from the place; but one like it was ſhewn at Rome in Bibliothecâ Domûs profeſſæ. Mr. Gregory remarks, that we muſt not think, that all, or any, of the Apocryphal Books were firſt written in Greek; that the Hebrew Edition by the Jews at Conſtantinople is the undoubted Text of Tobit, and St. Jerom ſaith the ſame of Judith; and with regard to the Wiſdom of the ſon of Sirach, it is confeſſed in the Preface to have been a Tranſlation from the Hebrew, and the Book itſelf was formerly accounted among the Hagiographa. The Wiſdom of Solomon was written in Chaldee, for Rabbi Moſes Ben Nachman quotes it ſo out of chapt. 7. v. 5. &c. and v. 17. &c. in the preface to his Comment upon the Pentateuch. "One of the Books of the Mac"chabees is known to be in Hebrew; and the worſt "of all the company, (and excepted againſt by Bel"larmin himſelf, tho' appointed to be read in our "churches,) that is, the Fourth of Eſdras, will be "clearly of another credit and reputation to you, if "you read it in the Arabic. The ſtory of the woman "taken in adultery hath met with very much adver"ſity. St. Hierom noteth it wanting in ſeveral co"pies of his time. The Paraphraſt Nonnus had no"thing to ſay to it; nor is it noted upon by Theophy"lact, &c. The Armenian Church, as one of their "Prieſts informed me, allow it not a place in the body "of the Goſpel, but reject it to the latter end as a ſuſ"pected piece. The Syriac Paraphraſt leaveth it out, "(that is, the printed Paraphraſt,) but in ſome of the "manuſcripts it is found to be, tho' not received as "the reſt of Scripture, but written upon with this "aſteriſm, רלא איתוהי בפשישא, that it is not "in the text. But the Arabic hath it; and in the "Greek manuſcripts it wanteth but in one of the ſe"venteen; ſed ita, ſaith Beza, ut mira ſit ſectionis "varietas, enough to make me (he ſaith ſo too) ut de "totius iſtius narrationis fide dubitem. But Euſebius "noted long ago, that the ſetter forth of this Hiſtory "was the ancient Papias; ἣν τὸ καθ' Ἑβραίους εὐαγγέλιον "περιέχει; and that it was to be had in the Goſpel ſe"cundum Hebræos. Et ſuſpicari merito quis poſſit (tho' "ſaith Druſius) ex Evangelio illo ad noſtra exemplaria "dimanâſſe; but I ſhall conclude from hence but as "he doth, with a nihil affirmo." Our Author obſerves then, that our account of David's Pſalms is 150; but the Arabic and ſome other Tranſlations ſet down one more. Joſephus Hypomneſticus ſaith that David made ψαλμοὺς ἀπείρους, an infinite number of Pſalms. Athanaſius ſaith, πρὸς τὸν Γολιὰθ ὁ ρνά, &c. In the Greek Pſalters it is no rare thing to meet with it in the manuſcripts: it is extant in more than one or three in the public Library at Oxford. One hath it in Magdalen College, and a third in Corpus Chriſti College given them by Claimund their firſt Preſident. In the old Editions, eſpecially that of Aldus, it is to be found; and Juſtine Decaduus, who wrote the Epiſtle to the Reader, tells us, that having gotten ſo excellent an aſſiſtant as Aldus indeed was, they were reſolved to begin to the world (printing was not very ancient then) with τὴν θεοπίνευστον Βίβλον τῶν θείων ψαλμῶν, the Book of Pſalms inſpired by God. And yet they reckon this ſupernumerary for one of the company. The Revelation of St. John, continues our Author, you know what himſelf hath ſaid of it, and how little Beza hath ſaid to that. . . . Judicious Calvin being once aſked his opinion concerning the Apocalypſe, made anſwer, ſe penitus ignorare quid velit tam obſcurus ſcriptor, qui qualiſque fuerit, nondum conſtat inter eruditos: "That for his "part he was altogether ignorant what that obſcure "Author would have: and that no body yet knew "who or what he was." For the firſt part of the anſwer, it will paſs well enough. Cajetan ſaid right, Exponat qui poteſt. The latter words (if they were his) do not become the Writer of the Revelation, or the man that ſpake them. . . . The leaving this Book out of ſome copies is juſt nothing againſt it. You may ſay as much (and as juſtly too) of the canonical Epiſtles, and there is the ſame reaſon for all. Theſe were more lately written, and therefore not ſo ſoon received into the Canon as the reſt. With regard to the conſervation and incorruption of the Text of the Scriptures, he obſerves, that "the "Alcoran itſelf hath had much better luck. That of "the Old Teſtament, how tenable ſoever it hath been "made by their encompaſſing and inacceſſible Maſora, "I do not find it ſo altogether (though wonderfully "enough) entire. But for the New, there is no pro"fane Author whatſoever, cæteris paribus, that hath "ſuffered ſo much at the hand of time. And what of "all this? Certainly the Providence was ſhewed to be "greater in theſe miſcarriages (as we take them) than "it could have been in the abſolute preſervation. God "ſuffered tares to be ſowed in the Genealogies, while "men ſlept, and in ſome elemental parts, that we "might not inſiſt upon thoſe פשברת שאלות (ſee "Ben. Bar Jonah's Itinerary) Extracta Quæſtionum, "as theſe things are called and kept by the Jews them"ſelves. It is an invincible reaſon for the Scripture's "part, that other eſcapes ſhould be ſo purpoſely and infi"nitely let paſs, and yet no ſaving or ſubſtantial part at "all ſcarce moved out of its place. To ſay the truth, "theſe varieties of readings in a few by-places do the "ſame office to the main Scripture, as the variations "of the compaſs to the whole magnet of the earth. "The Mariner knows ſo much the better for theſe to "ſteer his courſe." With reſpect to the ſtyle of the Scriptures, he tells us, that it is unſpeakably good, but not admirable in their ſenſe, who reckon the height of it from the unuſualneſs of the phraſe. The Majeſty of that Book ſits upon another Throne. He that was among the Herdſmen of Tekoah, did not write like him, that was among the Prieſts at Anathoth.

[C] His Poſthumous Works, publiſhed by his Friend Mr. John Gurgany, B. D. of Merton College.] They were printed at London 1650, 1664, 1671, and 1683 in 4to. The Edition of 1671 has the following title: Gregorii Poſthuma; or certain learned Tracts written by John Gregory, M. A. and Chaplain of Chriſt Church in Oxon. Together with a ſhort Account of the author's Life and Elegies on his much lamented death. Publiſhed by his deareſt Friend J. G. B. D. of Merton College. This vo-

MS. Arab. in Arch. Bibl. Bodl.

Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 3. fol. 32, 6.

Joſeph. Chriſtian Græc. MSS. Athanaſ. in Synop.

Greek into Latin, 1. Palladius de Gentibus Indiæ & Brachmanibus: 2. S. Ambroſius de Moribus Brachmannorum: 3. Anonymus de Brachmanibus: which Tranſlations came after his death into the hands of Mr. Edmund Chilmead, Chaplain of Chriſt Church Oxford, and then into thoſe of Edward Byſshe Eſq; who publiſhed them in his own name at London 1665 in 4to (r).

(r) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 11. col. 101, and 649.

dume contains, I, A Diſcourſe of the LXX Interpreters; the Place and Manner of their Interpretation. II. A Diſcourſe declaring what time the Nicene Creed began to be ſung in the Church. III. A Sermon upon the Reſurrection from 1 Cor. 15. verſ. 20. IV. Καινὸν δεύτερον, or, a Diſproof of him in the third of St. Luke, verſ. 36. V. Epiſcopus Puerorum in die Innocentium. VI. De Æris & Epochis, ſhewing the ſeveral accounts of time among all Nations from the creation to the preſent Age. VII. The Aſſyrian Monarchy, being a deſcription of its Riſe and Fall. VIII. The Deſcription and Uſe of the Terreſtrial Globe. H.

☞ GREGORY (JAMES), a very eminent Mathematician in the ſeventeenth Century. was born in Scotland. He had an admirable genius, and entered early into the moſt ſublime parts of the Mathematics with prodigious ſucceſs. He ſpent ſome part of his life in foreign countries, eſpecially in Italy, and afterwards was appointed Profeſſor of Mathematics at St. Andrews in Scotland. In the year 1663 he publiſhed at London his Optica promota [A]; and in 1667 at Padua his Vera Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura [B]. In the Philoſophical Tranſactions, Number XXXVI for the month of June 1668, he gave an account of the controverſy concerning the motion of the earth between Stephano de Angelis and John Baptiſta Riccioli. In the ſame Tranſactions Numb. XXXVII, for July 1668 he publiſhed an anſwer to Mr. Huygens's Animadverſions, printed in the Journal des Savans of July the 2d 1668, upon his book Vera Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura. In the ſame Tranſactions Numb. XLIV for February 166$\frac{8}{9}$ he gives ſome Conſiderations upon Mr. Huygens's Letter printed in the Journal des Savans of Nov. 2d 1668, in vindication of his Examen of our Author's Vera Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura. This Controverſy was carried on with ſome warmth, as appears by a Letter of Mr. Gregory from St. Andrews to Mr. John Collins, F. R. S. an extract of which we ſhall give the reader [C]. In 1668 our Author publiſhed his Exercitationes

[A] In the year 1663 he publiſhed at London his Optica promota.] The whole title is, Optica promota, ſeu abdita Radiorum reflexorum & refractorum myſteria, Geometricè enucleata; cui ſubnectitur Appendix, ſubtiliſſimorum Aſtronomiæ Problematôn reſolutionem exhibens. Authore Jacobo Gregorio, Abredonenſi Scoto. It contains many admirable propoſitions in Optics and Aſtronomy. In the 59th propoſition he gives the conſtruction of a reflecting Teleſcope with a perforated Object-Metal, to tranſmit the light to an eye-glaſs, placed behind it. This happy thought has given occaſion to the moſt conſiderable improvements made in Optics ſince the firſt invention of the Teleſcope; and induced Sir Iſaac Newton, as may be ſeen in the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. LXXXIII, to conſider that ſort of conſtructions and all their diſadvantages. This raiſed a very uſeful controverſy, which was carried on in the years 1672 and 1673 by the epiſtolary correſpondence of Mr. John Collins F. R. S. with Mr. Gregory and Mr. Newton; the original Letters of whom are now in the poſſeſſion of William Jones Eſq; F. R. S.

[B] His Vera Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura.] It was printed in 4to at Padua under this title: Vera circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadratura in propriâ ſuâ proportionis ſpecie inventa & demonſtrata a Jacobo Gregorio Scoto. In this Book the Author gives a new Analytical method for ſumming up of an infinite or indefinite converging ſeries, and applies his method to the ſquaring of the Circle, Ellipſis, and Hyperbola by an infinite ſeries; and gives the way of computing their dimenſions to any degree of exactneſs. And from the Areas of the Hyperbola he finds the Logarithms of Numbers with great facility and expedition. Mr. Gregory printed only 150 copies of this book for his own uſe and that of his friends; but another impreſſion of 500 copies was printed at Padua with the privilege of the State of Venice in the year 1668, to which he added another treatiſe, intitled, Geometriæ pars univerſalis, inſerviens quantitatum curvarum tranſmutationi & menſuræ. Authore Jacobo Gregorio Abredonenſi Scoto. In this book he treats of the moſt difficult ſubjects with great ſagacity and skill. He gives general methods of meaſuring moſt ſolids. All that Archimedes, Lucas Valerius, Paulus Guldinus, John de la Faille, and Andrew Tacquet have done upon that ſubject, are but as Corollaries to his method; by which he meaſures the ſurfaces of Solids and ſpiral Spaces, not attempted by the Antients, nor touched upon till very lately by any of the moderns. He determines the lengths of Curve Lines in a moſt elegant manner. Towards the latter end of the book he has ſeveral Optical Propoſitions concerning the imperfection of the eye, and the confuſion of the ſight; the apparent magnitude of the ſun low and high; the tails of Comets; what proportion the earth's illumination by the ſun bears to its illumination by the moon at full; and the like compariſon between the ſun and fixed ſtar Sirius. He ſhews that Viſion by the help of a Teleſcope or Microſcope is not deceitful; and gives an obſervation of the ſimilitude between the earth and moon. The titles of his ſeveral Heads are theſe. I. De ſiderum ſcintillatione & magnitudine apparente. II. Quod ſol ſit realiter et formaliter calidus. III. De Solit humilis & ſublimis magnitudine apparente. IV. De Viſibilium Picturâ ſub tecto obſcuro. V. De Cometarum Caudis. VI. De Stellarum fixarum diſtantiâ. VII. Quod Viſio ope Teleſcopii vel Microſcopii non ſit fallax. VII. Quod omne Viſibile in infinitum ſit diviſibile. IX. De Obſervatione ſimilitudinis inter Terram & Lunam.

[C] This controverſy was carried on with ſome warmth, as appears by a letter of Mr. Gregory from St. Andrews to Mr. John Collins F. R. S. an extract of which we ſhall give the reader.] The letter is dated January the 6th, 1670, and in it Mr. Gregory writes thus: "In April laſt I had an anſwer to Mr. "Oldenburg's queries from Mr. Bruce; but being ac- "cidentally at Edinburgh at that time, and ſeeing "the Philoſophical Tranſactions (N° XLIV.) of Fe- "bruarylaſt, I was altogether diſcouraged by the Lines "prefixed to my Anſwer to Huygens, from enter- "taining any ſuch correſpondence. I have ſince re- "ceived an anſwer to the ſame queries from one "Mr. Gordon; but am not ſo much a Chriſtian as "to help thoſe who hurt me. I do not know, (nei- "ther do I deſire to know) who calleth in that "Preface Hugenius's Animadverſions of November "the 12th 1668, judicious; but I would earneſtly "deſire, that he would particulariſe (if he be not an "ignorant) in what my Anſwer, which is contra- "dictory to Hugenius's Animadverſions is faulty; for "in Geometrical matters, if any thing be judicious, "its contradictory muſt be nonſenſe. I do not know "what Exercitationes Geometricæ [D], and in 1672 a ſmall Treatiſe in 8vo intitled, The great and new Art of weighing Vanity: or a Diſcovery of the ignorance and arrogance of the great and new Artiſt in his Pſeudo-Philoſophical Writings. To which are annexed ſome Tentamina de Motu Penduli & Projectorum. This book is pretended to be written by Mr. Patrick Mathers, Arch-Bedel of the Univerſity of St. Andrews; but it is ſufficiently known to have been written by Mr. Gregory [E]. He held a correſpondence with Mr. Collins abovementioned, who made extracts of our Author's Letters [F], which, with the original letters, came into the hands of the learned and ingenious William Jones Eſq; F. R. S. who gave theſe extracts and ſome of the letters, which related to Sir Iſaac Newton's Analytical Inventions, to be repoſited in the Archives of the Royal Society. It appears from the epiſtolary correſpondence between Mr. Collins and Mr. Vernon, then at Paris, that in the beginning of the year 1671 the Royal Academy there had ſo great an eſteem for our Author, as to reſolve to recommend him to the King of France for a penſion. And Mr. Huygens himſelf approved of it, though he ſaid, that he had reaſon to think himſelf diſobliged by Mr. Gregory on account of the controverſy then between them. Several members of the Royal Academy wrote about the affair to Mr. Oldenburg, Secretary of the Royal Society, deſiring him to acquaint the Council of that Society with it, and likewiſe that the King of France was willing

" what need there was of any apology for inſert-
" ing my anſwer, but to complement Hugenius, and " violently (if it be poſſible) to bear down the truth.
" I imagine ſuch actions below the meaneſt mem" ber of the Royal Society. However I hope I " may have permiſſion to call to an account in " print the penners of that Preface. I hope you " will excuſe my freedom in this particular, which " concerneth me ſo near. I thank you kindly for " your civil proffer of publiſhing any of my Lucu-" brations... I intreat you to advertiſe me upon
" what account my books are ſuppreſſed in Italy."

[D] His Exercitationes Geometricæ.] This book contains the following curious articles. I. Appendicula ad veram Circuli & Hyperbolæ Quadraturam. II. N. Mercatoris Quadratura Hyperbolæ Geometricè demonſtrata. III. Analogia inter Lineam Meridianam Plani-ſphærii Nautici & Tangentes Artificiales Geometricè demonſtrata; ſeu, quod Secantium Naturalium additio efficiat Tangentes Artificiales. IV. Item, quod Tangentium Naturalium Additio efficiat ſecantes Artificiales. V. Quadratura Conchoidis. VI. Quadratura Ciſſoidis. VII. Methodus facilis & accurata componendi Secantes & Tangentes Artificiales.

[E] It is ſufficiently known to have been written by Mr. Gregory.] In a letter of his to Mr. John Collins dated July the 2d 1672, he gives this account of the occaſion of writing that book. " There is one " Maſter Sinclare, that writ the Ars magna & nova, " a pitiful ignorant fellow, who hath lately written " horrid nonſenſe in Hydroſtatics, and againſt Mr. " Boyle, for weighing water in water; and hath in " print abuſed Mr. Sanders, a Maſter in the Univer- " ſity here, a perſon very knowing in the Mathema- " tics, and who is reſolved to get the Bedel of the " Univerſity to write againſt him; and upon this " account hath deſired me to write to you for Ste- " vinus's Mathematics, which I entreat you to ſend. " We reſolve to make excellent ſport with him."

[F] Extracts of our author's letters.] In his letter to Mr. Collins dated at St. Andrews January the 29th 1670 he writes thus. " I received the books you " ſent unto me, for which I render you my very " hearty thanks. Mr. Barrow in his Optics ſheweth " himſelf a moſt ſubtle Geometer, ſo that I think " him ſuperior to any that ever I looked up- " on. I long exceedingly to ſee his Geometrical " Lectures, and I intreat you to ſend them to me " preſently as they come from the preſs; for I eſteem " the author more than you can eaſily ima- " gine." Mr. Collins in a letter to our author, dated December the 24th 1670, ſends him, as a ſpecimen of what improvements had been made in England, three ſeries of Mr. Newton, viz. the Arc being given, to find the Sine, and the Coſine; and the Sine being given, to find the Arc; Mr. Gregory in his letter of February 15, 1671 returns ſeveral Series no leſs curious; as, a Series for finding the Arc, whoſe Tangent is given; another for finding the Tangent of a given Arc; and a Series for finding the Secant of a given Arc; together with Series for finding the Logarithm Tangent and Logarithm Secant of a given Arc, and vice verſâ; as alſo Series for meaſuring the Length of the Elliptic and Hyperbolic Curve. In his letter to Mr. Collins of the 9th of April 1672 from St. Andrews, he writes thus: " I am much " obliged to you for thoſe excellent improvements of " learning you advertize me of. I was exceedingly ſur- " prized with thoſe experiments of Mr. Newton. " They will cauſe great changes throughout all the " Body of Natural Philoſophy, by all appearance, " if the matter of fact be true, which I have no " ground to queſtion. I would gladly ſee what Mr. " Hook can ſay againſt the Doctrine raiſed upon them." In the ſame letter he ſends Mr. Collins the ſolution of the famous Keplerian Problem by an infinitely converging Series; " which, he ſays, in all Aſtrono- " mical uſes may be much exacter than any Table " of Sines. And farther, thoſe infinite Series have " the ſame ſucceſs in Equations, which they have in " other Problems, only this, becauſe in Equations " there are many indetermined Quantities, the Series " are exceedingly tedious; but when theſe are deter- " mined, the Series are abundantly ſimple." Moſt of the Series, which were ſent by our Author to Mr. Collins, were afterwards publiſhed by his Nephew Dr. David Gregory in his treatiſe, intitled, Exercitatio Geometrica de dimenſione Figurarum, printed at Edinburgh in the year 1684. And the Series for the Keplerian Problem was printed by him in the fourth Propoſition of the third Book of the Doctor's Elements of Aſtronomy. Mr. Gregory in his letter to Mr. Collins dated at St. Andrews May the 17th 1671 gives ſeveral inſtances of the uſe of his method of Infinite Series; as a Series for meaſuring the ſecond Segments of the Sphæroid; a Series for the Length of the Curve of the common Hyperbola, the ſame being applicable with a little alteration unto the Curve of the Ellipſis; a Series for meaſuring the length of the Logarithmic Curve; and a moſt elegant Series for meaſuring the Segments of Circles. And in anſwer to ſome inquiries of Mr. Collins in the ſame letter he obſerves, that " as to the matter of Equations, " either in taking away what terms may be taken " away, or reducing all Equations, when it is poſ- " ſible, to pure Equations; or finding their Limits; " or reducing all of them to Infinite Series, may " entertain you more at length with theſe things af- " terwards; for your intelligence ſhewing me, that ſo " many perſons of vaſt learning were upon that ſub- " ject, hath engaged me to look over my notes to " theſe purpoſes, where I find great improvements " can be made. I am now much taken up, and " have been ſo all this winter paſt, both with my public " lectures, which I have twice a week, and in re- " ſolving doubts, which ſome gentlemen and ſcho- " lars propoſe to me. This I muſt comply with: " nevertheleſs that I am often troubled with great " impertinences, all perſons here being ignorant of " theſe things to admiration; ſo that I have but lit- " tle time to ſpare on thoſe ſtudies my genius leads me " to. I reſolve, when the College riſeth, to apply " myſelf ſeriouſly to the doctrine of Equations." Mr. Collins's collection of extracts from our author's willing to allow penſions to one or two learned Engliſhmen, whom they ſhould recommend. But no anſwer was ever made to that propoſal. And upon Mr. Collins's writing to Mr. Gregory about what he had heard from Paris, he received in a letter dated the 17th of May 1671 at St. Andrews this anſwer: "I have not ſo much vanity as to perſuade myſelf, that you are ſerious, having never heard any thing relating to that before. I have had ſufficient experience of the uncertainty of things of that nature before now, which maketh me, ſince I came to Scotland, how mean and deſpicable my condition, to reſt contented, and ſatisfy myſelf with this, that I am at home in a ſettled condition, by which I can live. I have known many learned men far above me upon every account, with whom I would not change my condition." He died about the end of the year 1675, under the age of forty years.

letters was addreſſed to Mr. Oldenburg, Secretary of the Royal Society, and is intitled, Extracts from Mr. Gregory's Letters to be ſent to Mr. Leibnitz to peruſe, who is deſired to return the ſame to you (1). And Mr. Collins wrote the following letter to Mr. Oldenburg. "Sir, Foraſmuch as you have much preſſed me "yourſelf, being incited thereto by the earneſt deſires "of Mr. Leibnitz and others of the Royal Academy at Paris, to give an account of the great "pains and attainments of Mr. James Gregory deceaſed, there being a great friendſhip and frequent "correſpondence between us in his life-time; I ſhall, "for the honour I bear to his memory, impartially "give you an account of the moſt material paſſages in his letters." It appears likewiſe from Mr. Collins's letter of the 11th of Auguſt 1676 to Mr. David Gregory, the brother of the deceaſed, in anſwer to his of the 10th of June 1676 concerning ſome of his brother's letters, that Mr. Oldenburg on the 26th of June 1676 ſent the collection of extracts to Paris together with Mr. Newton's letter to him of the 13th of June 1676. T.

(1) Mr. Oldenburg.

☞GREGORY (DAVID) nephew of the preceding, was born at Aberdeen in Scotland, and educated there and at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of Maſter of Arts (a), and was Profeſſor of Mathematics (b). In 1684 he publiſhed at Edinburgh in 4to, Exercitatio Geometrica de dimenſione Figurarum] [A]. Afterwards coming to England he was incorporated in the degree of Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford February the 8th 1691; and on the 18th of the ſame month accumulated the degrees in Phyſic; and afterwards became a Maſter Commoner of Baliol College there (c). The ſame year he was choſen Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy at Oxford upon the reſignation of Mr. Edward Bernard (d). He diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage by his Aſtronomiæ Phyſicæ & Geometricæ Elementa [B], printed at Oxford 1702 in fol. and by

(a) Wood, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 225. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Vita Clariſſ. & Doctiſſ. Viri Edwardi Bernardi S. T. D. Scriptore Thomâ Smith, S. T. D. pag. 47. edit. Londini 1704, in 8vo.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(d) Smith, Vita Edward Bernardi, ubi ſupra.

[A] In 1684 he publiſhed at Edinburgh in 4*to.* Exercitatio Geometrica de dimenſione Figurarum.] The whole title is, Exercitatio Geometrica de dimenſione Figurarum; ſive Specimen Methodi generalis dimetiendi quaſvis Figuras. Authore Davide Gregorio, in Academia Edinburgenſi Matheſeos Profeſſore. There is an account of this book in the Philoſophical Tranſactions Numb. 163 for September the 20th 1684. In this treatiſe Mr. Gregory gives us a variety of examples for finding the lengths of the Curve Lines, the Surfaces of Curved Figures, and their ſolid contents. Among theſe are all the Series for that purpoſe ſent to Mr. John Collins F. R. S. by our author's uncle Mr. James Gregory. He performs theſe by a rule well known even at that time, which is, "that if "the Elements of any Magnitude be expreſſed by "a ſimple term affected by the power of ſome variable Quantity, the Magnitude itſelf is expreſſed "by the ſame term affected by the next ſuperior power "er of that variable Qantity divided by its exponent."

[B] His Aſtronomiæ Phyſicæ & Geometricæ Elementa.] There is an account of this book in the Philoſophical Tranſactions Numb. 283. It was tranſlated into Engliſh, and the ſecond edition of this tranſlation was printed at London 1726 in 8vo in two volumes under this title. The Elements of Phyſical and Geometrical Aſtronomy. By David Gregory, M. D. late Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy at Oxford, and Fellow of the Royal Society. Done into Engliſh, with Additions and Corrections. The ſecond Edition. To which is annexed Dr. Hall y's Synopſis of the Aſtronomy of Comets. The whole newly reviſed, and compared with the Latin, and corrected throughout by Edmund Stone F. R. S. In the Preface Dr. Gregory obſerves, that his deſign in this book was, "that the Celeſtial Phyſics, which "the moſt ſagacious Kepler had got the ſcent of, "but the Prince of Geometers, Sir Iſaac Newton, "brought to ſuch a pitch as ſurpriſes all the world, "might, by my care and pains in illuſtrating them, "become eaſier to ſuch as are deſirous of being acquainted with Philoſophy and Aſtronomy. The "title informs you ſufficiently, that the Arithmetical or calculatory part of Aſtronomy is here "omitted, though that perhaps may be publiſhed "hereafter in its proper place." He afterwards remarks, that we ſtill tread in the ſteps of the Antients in this Phyſical Aſtronomy, ſince they knew that the Celeſtial Bodies gravitated towards each other, and were retained in their Orbits by the force of Gravity and were alſo apprized of the law of this Gravity. For if we look back to the firſt riſe of Aſtronomy, and take a view of it in its infancy, as it were, we ſhall find nothing better approved of, nothing more univerſally entertained among the ſeveral Sects of Philoſophers, than this notion of the Gravity of the Celeſtial Bodies. That ſaying is well known, ſo often uſed by Anaxagoras, and his ſcholars, Achelaus, and Euripides, namely, "that the Sun and Stars were "fiery or red hot ſtones, and golden clods." Of the ſame mind were alſo Democritus, Metrodorus, and Diogenes. By theſe expreſſions they meant no more, than that they were heavy, denſe, and fixed Bodies (ſuch as ſtones are,) ſo as to bear a conſiderable degree of heat. And that this was really their meaning, will evidently appear, if we do but inquire more narrowly into the firſt authors of this opinion. For, as we are told by Democritus (1), theſe notions concerning the Sun and Moon are not aſcribed to Anaxagoras as their Original, for he had really borrowed them of the antients. Nor is it a difficult matter to find out who they were, of whom he borrowed them, or from whom they were handed down to him. He had them from his Maſter Anaximenes (2), whoſe opinion was, that the Stars were of a fiery nature and ſubſtance; and that there were alſo mingled with them earthly bodies, which were carried round about them, though not viſible to us; by which words he plainly meant Planets of a Terreſtrial nature, performing their revolutions in the Syſtem of every fixed Star. Theſe notions Anaximenes received from Anaximander, and Anaximander from Thales himſelf, who was Head and Founder of the Ionic Philoſophy, and ſpread this opinion of the Gravity of the fixed Stars among this ſect. Nor did his doctrine concerning the Stars ſtop here, but afterwards diffuſed itſelf through the Italic Philoſophy, the followers of which taught (3), that each Star was a world in the infinite Æthereal Space, containing Earth, Air and Æther; and that the moon was not only like our earth, but inhabited by animals of a larger ſize, and furniſhed with plants of a beautiful

(1) Diogen. Laert. in Democrito.

(2) Stob. Eclog. Phyſ. cap. 25.

(3) Plutarch. de Placit. Philoſophor. lib. 2. cap. 13.

by his other writings [C]. He died at Maidenhead in the County of Bucks on the 12th of October 1708, and was ſucceeded in his Profeſſorſhip by Dr. John Keil. He left ſeveral a beautiful appearance (4). Nor were they ſo abſurd in their conceptions about Gravity, as to think, that it was done by the virtue of any point within the earth, or of a Center, to which all heavy Bodies placed any where tended; but they thought (5) it was done by the power of the whole matter in the Terreſtrial Globe, attracting all things to itſelf; and as the power of a Loadſtone is compoſed of the powers of the ſeveral parts combined together, ſo they believed, that the Gravity towards the whole earth reſulted from the Gravity towards each ſingle part of it. Beſides they thought (6), that there was a Gravity towards the Moon and the Sun, acting in the ſame manner as it does towards the earth; and that each Planet, like a ſtone whirled in a ſling, was kept in its Orbit by the ſame principle, and for the ſame reaſon revolving always about us. From ſome things, mentioned by Diogenes Laertius (7) concerning Plato, which are alſo obſcurely hinted at in the Timæus of the latter, Dr. Gregory is apt to believe with Galileo (8), that the divine Philoſopher ſuppoſed that the Mundane Bodies, when they were firſt formed, were moved with a rectilinear motion (by means of Gravity) but after they had arrived to ſome determined places, began to revolve by degrees in a Curve, the rectilinear motion being changed into a curvilinear one. It is from this doctrine of Gravity, that all Bodies gravitate mutually to each other; it is by this, that Lucretius (9), taught by Epicurus and Democritus, labours to prove that the Univerſe has no Center or loweſt place, but that there is an infinity of worlds like ours in the immenſe Space. His argument runs thus: if the nature of things were bounded any where, then the outmoſt Bodies, ſince they have no other beyond them, towards which they may be made to tend by the force of Gravity, would not ſtand in an Æquilibrium, but move towards the inner and lower Bodies, being neceſſarily inclined that way by their Gravity; and therefore having moved towards one another, during an infinite ſpace of time, would have long ſince met, and lie in the middle of the whole, as in the loweſt place. It is evident therefore from hence, that Lucretius, and thoſe whom he followed, believed that all Bodies gravitated towards the matter placed around them; and that every ſingle Body was carried by the more prevailing Gravity towards that place, where there was moſt matter. As it is manifeſt, that the antients were appriſed of and had diſcovered the Gravity of all Bodies towards one another; ſo alſo they were not unacquainted with the law and proportion, which the action of Gravity obſerved according to the different meaſures and diſtances. For that Gravity is proportional to the Quantity of matter in the heavy Body, Lucretius ſufficiently declares (10); as alſo that what we call light Bodies, do not aſcend of their own accord, but by the action of a force underneath them, impelling them upwards, juſt as a piece of wood is in water (11); and further, that all Bodies, as well the heavy as the light, deſcend in vacuo with an equal celerity (12). It is plain likewiſe, that the famous Theorem about the proportion whereby Gravity decreaſes in receding from the Sun, was not unknown at leaſt to Pythagoras. This ſeems to be that which he and his followers intimate by the harmony of the Spheres; that is, they feigned Apollo playing upon an harp of ſeven ſtrings; by which Symbol, as is evident from Pliny (13), Macrobius (14), and Cenſorinus (15), they meant the Sun in conjunction with the ſeven Planets; for they made him the leader of that Septenary Chorus, and moderator of nature; and thought that by his attractive force, (which they called Jupiter's Priſon, becauſe it is by this force that he retains and keeps the Planets in their Orbits from flying off in right lines,) he acted upon the Planets in their Harmonical Ratio of their diſtances. For the forces, whereby equal Tenſions act upon ſtrings of different lengths (being equal in other reſpects) are reciprocally as the ſquares of the lengths of the ſtrings. For Pythagoras (6), as he was paſſing by a Smith's ſhop, obſerved, that the ſounds of the hammers were more acute or grave in proportion to the weights of the hammers. Afterwards, ſtretching ſheep's guts, and faſtening various weights to them, he learned, that here likewiſe the ſounds were proportional to the weights. Having ſatisfied himſelf of this, he inveſtigated the numbers, according to which conſonant ſounds were produced. Whether the whole of the ſtory be true, or only a fable, it is certain that Pythagoras found out the true Ratio between the ſound of the ſtrings and the weights faſtened to them. The ſame Tenſion acts upon a ſtring as ſhort again, four times more powerfully; for it produces an octave, and an octave is ſounded by a force, that is four times greater; for if a ſtring ſtretched by a given weight generates a given Tone, the ſame ſtring ſtretched by a weight four times greater will ſound an octave. Thus likewiſe the ſame Tenſion upon a ſubſeſquialteran Chord acts in a double ſeſquiquartan Ratio; for it produces a fifth or Diapente. And a ſtring, that ſounds a given note with a given weight, ought to be ſtretched by a weight that is a double ſeſquiquartan to ſound a fifth. And univerſally the weights, which produce all Tones in ſtrings equally thick, are reciprocally as the ſquares of the lengths of thoſe of equal Tenſion, producing the ſame ſound in any muſical inſtrument. Pythagoras afterwards applied the proportion, which he had thus found by experiments, to the Heavens, and from thence learned the harmony of the Spheres. And by comparing theſe weights with the weights of the Planets, and the Intervals of the Tones produced by the weights, with the Interval of the Spheres; and laſtly the lengths of the ſtring with the diſtances of the Planets from the Center of the Orbs; he diſcovered, as it were by the harmony of the Heavens, that the Gravity of the Planets towards the ſun (according to whoſe meaſures the Planets move) were reciprocally as the ſquares of their diſtances from the Sun. The Publiſher of the Engliſh tranſlation in his Preface to the Reader ſtiles this work of our author the moſt valuable and finiſhed piece of Aſtronomy now extant, and tells us, "that it is generally "reckoned to be a book, that contains not only all "the diſcoveries and Philoſophical ſentiments of the "great Kepler, , and the various Hypotheſes of the "moſt noted Aſtronomers before and ſince his time; "but is chiefly valued by the beſt judges for the large "and inſtructive comments delivered in it on the "writings of the illuſtrious Sir Iſaac Newton, as well "as on the ſeveral Aſtronomical Diſſertations of the "ſagacious Dr. Halley, which the Reader will find "here every where interſperſed."

[C] His other Writings.] They are as follow: Solutio Problematis Florentini de Teſtudine veliformi quadribili; publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. 207, for the month of January 169¾. A Letter to Sir Robert Southwell aſſerting ſome Mathematical Inventions to their true Authors, dated at Oxford November 15th, 1694, and publiſhed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. 214. Catoptricæ & Dioptricæ Sphæricæ Elementa. Oxford 1695 in 8vo. This Book is highly eſteemed by thoſe, who are converſant in Optics, being written with great accuracy and judgment. A piece addreſſed to Dr. Henry Aldrich, Dean of Chriſt-Church in Oxford, concerning the properties of the Curve-Line, called Catenaria; publiſh'd in the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. 231, for Auguſt 1697. In the ſame Tranſactions N°. 256 for September 1699 he publiſhed a Scheme of the Phaſes with his Obſervations of the Eclipſe of the Sun on the 13th of September 1699. In the ſame Tranſactions N°. 259 for December 1699 he gives in a Letter to Dr. John Wallis ſome improvements relating to the Quadrature of the Parts of the Lunula of Hippocrates Chius. In the ſame Tranſaction there is likewiſe a paper of his intitled, Reſponſio ad Animadverſionem ad Davidis Gregorii Catenariam, Act. Eruditorum Lipſiæ, Menſe Februario Ann. 1699. In the Philoſophical Tranſactions N°. 293 for September and October 1704 he publiſhed a paper De Orbitâ Caſſinianâ; and in N°. 308 another paper intitled, Vindiciæ Matheſeos univerſalis Gregorianæ contra ſecundos Abbatis Galloyſii impetus in Hiſtoriâ Acad. Scient. Ann. 1703. In 1703 Dr. Gregory publiſhed at Oxford

(4) Idem, lib. 2. cap. 30.

(5) Idem, de Facie in Orbe Lunæ.

(6) Ibid.

(7) In Platone.

(8) In his Syſtema Coſmicum.

(9) Lib. 1. ver. 986.

(10) Lib. 1. ver. 415.

(11). Lib. 2. ver. 178.

(12) Lib. 2. ver. 228.

(13) Lib. 2. cap. 22.

(14) Lib. 1. cap. 19.

(15) Cap. 11.

(16) See Macrobius, lib. 2. in Somn. Scipion. cap. 1.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Peritiſſimus & ſubtiliſſimi ingenii Mathematicus.

ſeveral children, one of whom, Dr. David Gregory, was lately Profeſſor of Modern Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Oxford, and is now Canon of Chriſt Church there. Dr. Thomas Smith (e) ſtiles our Author a very able Mathematician, and of a moſt ſubtle genius (f); and Sir Iſaac Newton had a great eſteem for him [D].

ford in fol. a beautiful edit. of Euclid's Works in Greek and Latin, with a very learned and inſtructive Preface. This Edition contains the following diſtinct Works of Euclid. 1. Elementorum Libri XV. 2. Data, cum Præfatione Marini. 3. Introductio Harmonica. 4. Sectio Canonis. 5. Phænomena. 6. Optica. 7. Catoptrica. 8. De Diviſionibus Liber. 9. De Levi & Ponderoſo Fragmentum. In the Sixth volume of the Abridgment of the Philoſophical Tranſactions by Mr. John Eames, F. R. S. and John Martyn F. R. S. in the chapter of Mechanics, there is publiſhed a piece of our Author intitled, E Prælectionibus de Motu a Davide Gregorio in Acad. Edinburg. Matheſeos Profeſſore dictatis Anno Dom. 1686. Dr. Gregory left unpubliſhed ſeveral valuable Manuſcripts upon various parts of the Mathematics, as a Treatiſe of Trigonometry plain and ſphærical; a Treatiſe of Mechanics and Hydroſtatics; and another of Fluxions; with a large Commentary upon Sir Iſaac Newton's Principia.

[D] Sir Iſaac Newton had a great eſteem for him.] That great Man's opinion of him will appear from the following original Letter of Sir Iſaac to Mr. John Flamſteed, the Royal Aſtronomer.

London, Auguſt 10th 1691.

(*) Maſter of the Royal Mathematical ſchool in Chriſt's Hoſpital London.

" Sir,

" 'Tis almoſt a fortnight ſince I intended with Mr. " Paget (*) and another friend or two to have given " you a viſit at Greenwich; but ſending to the Tem- " ple Coffee-houſe, I underſtood you had not been in " London of two or three weeks before, which made " me think you were retired to your living for a time. " The bearer hereof Mr. Gregory, Mathematic Profeſ- " ſor of Edinburgh-College in Scotland, intended to " have given you a viſit with us. You will find him " a very ingenious perſon, and good Mathematician " worth your acquaintance. I hope it will not be " very long before you publiſh your Catalogue of the " fixt Stars. In my opinion it will be better to pub- " liſh thoſe of the firſt ſix magnitudes obſerved by o- " thers, and afterwards by way of an Appendix to " publiſh the new ones obſerved by your ſelf alone, than " to let the former ſtay too long for the latter. I " would willingly have your obſervations of Jupiter " and Saturn, for the four or five next years at leaſt, " before I think farther of their Theory. But I had " rather have them for the next twelve or fifteen years. " If you and I live not long enough, Mr. Gregory and " Mr. Halley are young men. When you obſerve the " Eclipſes of Jupiter's Satellits, I ſhould be glad to " know, if in long Teleſcopes the light of the Satellit, " immediately before it diſappears, incline either to " red or blue, or become more ruddy, or more pale " than before. Sir, I am " Your moſt humble Servant,

" Iſ. Newton."

T.

GRENAILLE (FRANCIS DE) born at Uzerche in Limouſin anno 1516, wrote a great number of very indifferent French books [A]. He had aſſumed a religious habit at Bourdeaux, and afterwards thrown it off at Agen (a). He was appointed Hiſtorio- grapher to the Duke of Orleans. See the Sorberiana [B]. He prefixed to his works a copper plate, repreſenting himſelf, with a haughty inſcription [C]. He tells us in a Preface (b), that he was impeached of high treaſon, and had like to have ſuffered death.

(a) See Guerre des Auteurs, pag. m. 169. and the remark [C].

(b) That of tom. 2. of the Sage reſolu contre la Fortune.

[A] He wrote a great number of French Books.] He publiſhed the following one upon another. L'honnête Fille; l'honnête Garçon; l'honnête Veuve; l'honnête Marriage; l'honnête Maitreſſe; la Bibliotheque des Dames; le Plaiſir des Dames; le Sage reſolu contre la Fortune (1); La Revolution du Portugal; Le Théatre du Monde; la Mode ou le Caractere de la Religion.

(1) This is a verſion of Petrarch. See the remark [C].

[B] See the Sorberiana.] We there find the following words (2). " There was at Paris about this time, " one Grenailles, Sieur de Chatonnieres (*), born in " Limouſin, and twenty ſix years of age, who, on a " ſudden, publiſhed a prodigious number of Books, " ſome of which he entitled, l'honnête Fille, l'honnête " Veuve, l'honnête Garçon; and others, La Bibliotheque " des Dames. What appeared to me commendable, " in his Book entitled les Plaiſirs des Dames, was that " this young man, in all probability, had confined " himſelf to his cloſet, in order to compoſe ſeveral " Books, and thereby had kept from indulging him- " ſelf in riot and debauchery; but with regard to the " work itſelf, there are very few good things in it, and " what are good, had been ſaid ſo often, that he would " not expect to gain much glory by repeating them. " The ſtyle was ſo flat and inſipid, that the Reader " would naturally ſuppoſe he wrote merely for the ſake " of writing. His Book entitled Des Plaiſirs des Dames " (of the Pleaſures of the Ladies) is divided into five " parts, Du Bouquet, du Bal, du Cours, du Concert, de " la Collation; i. e. " Of the Noſegay, the Ball, the " Ring, the Concert, the Collation." He firſt exa- " mines the queſtion, viz. whether it is the Bouquet (the " noſegay) that adorns the boſom, or the boſom the " noſegay? and he determines in favour of the latter; " he being of opinion, that from the hemiſpheres of " a Lady a certain influence proceeds, which enlivens " and revives the noſegay, and gives it not only a " greater beauty, but makes it more laſting."

(2) Pag. 105.

* It ſhould be Chateaunieres.

[C] He prefixed to his Works a copper plate, repreſenting himſelf, with a haughty inſcription.] Sorbiere proceeds as follows: " It is from theſe fine thoughts that " he flatters himſelf with the hopes of Immortality; " and this is the ſenſe in which he would have the fol- " lowing motto, under the Print before his Works, be " underſtood; hac mortales evadimus immortales." Gueret cenſures him ſtill more. I will ſpare, ſays he to him (3), Sage reſolu (reſolute Sage), for the ſake of Petrarch whom I honour; and I alſo will ſpare your Relation of the revolution of Portugal, upon condition that you take away your picture from it, the Inſcription of which is too vain-glorious for a Writer of your ſtamp. Had you only mentioned your native place there, and barely added that you had turned Monk in Bourdeaux, and afterwards thrown off the habit at Agen, this might have been borne with. But as you add, that you made yourſelf immortal in Paris, this is an untruth; and therefore, with Apollo's good leave, it ſhall be erazed.

(3) Guerre des Auteurs, pag. 168, 169, Dutch edit.

GRENVILLE (DENIS), Greenville, or Granville, was a younger ſon of the moſt loyal and valiant (a) Sir Bevil Greenville of Kilhampton in Cornwall Knt. and brother to Sir John Greenville firſt Earl of Bath of his name, was born in Cornwall, admitted Gentleman Commoner of Exeter College September 22, 1657, actually created in Convocation Maſter of Arts September the 28th 1660, and about that time married Anne the daughter of Dr. Coſin Biſhop of Durham, who conferred ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical preferments on him, as the Rectories of (b) Eaſington and Elwick in the County Palatine of Durham; the Archdeaconry of Durham, to which he was collated on the death

(a) Wood. Ath. Oxon. edit. 1721.

(b) At the Revolution he held the Rectories of Eaſington and Sedgefield, the latter being reckoned the beſt Living in the Biſhoprick.

death of Dr. Gabriel Clarke September the 16th 1662, and to the firſt Stall of Prebendaries of the Church of Durham September the 24th 1662, from whence he was removed to the ſecond April the 16th 1668 (c). On December the 20th 1670, he was created Doctor of Divinity, being then one of the Chaplains in ordinary to King Charles II. And on the 14th of December 1684, he was inſtalled Dean of Durham in the place of Dr. John Sudbury deceaſed. In the Regiſter of Eton College we find that immediately after the Reſtoration Dr. Greenville was recommended in very ſtrong terms to the Maſter and Fellows for a Fellowſhip, by three ſeveral Letters from the King, but for what reaſon this recommendation did not take effect, does not appear; probably he might wave his intereſt on account of other preferment which was more acceptable to him. (d) On the firſt of February 1690, he was deprived of all his preferments upon his refuſal to comply with the new Oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to the Prince of Orange then in poſſeſſion of the Throne. Soon after the Prince of Orange's landing he left [A] Durham in order to retire into France; and ſometimes lived at Corbeil (from whence it is ſuppoſed his family originally ſprung) but more frequently at (e) Paris and St. Germains, where he was very civilly treated and much countenanced by the Queen-mother, as we find in ſeveral of his own Letters, notwithſtanding what has been falſely aſſerted by one Mackay in an account of the Court of St. Germains. He owns he was ſometimes attacked by the Prieſts, but with much good manners and civility. Mr. Wood ſays, that during his retirement, he was, on the death of Doctor Lamplugh, nominated to the See of York, by King James the Second, tho' never conſecrated: but we are apt to doubt very much Mr. Wood's authority in this particular, there appearing to us many very ſtrong reaſons for believing the contrary. In April 1695 he came incognito into England; but ſoon returned. For ſome time before his death he enjoyed but a very indifferent ſtate of health, having been much troubled with a Sciatica, and other infirmities [B]. He (c) Idem.

(d) Idem.

(e) Not at Rouen, as Mr. Wood ſays, for he lived but a ſmall time there, and that immediately after his firſt arrival in France.

[A] Left Durham in order to retire into France.] He ſays in his (1) Letter to his brother the Earl of Bath, that having done all in his power by the moſt vigorous endeavours towards the ſupport of the Crown and the Ch. of England, and ſeeing himſelf incapable of doing any thing farther for his Majeſty's ſervice, after earneſt prayer to God to direct him .... (2) he bethought himſelf of flying away ſecretly to the King, to own his cauſe when he could not otherwiſe ſerve him: the defection being already become general, and he not likely to do ſervice either by ſermons or example — (3). On Dec. 11, at midnight, by the help of two faithful ſervants, which he did dare truſt, he got his horſes prepared, and was conducted by one of them that night to (4) Heſcam, where he procured an honeſt guide to Carliſle the neareſt of the King's Garriſons. — Where he was kindly received by Mr. Howard the Governor,— who being a Roman Catholic, he adviſed him, as being moſt prudent, and not diſpleaſing to his Majeſty, to retire, and leave the Government to the old Governor Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave; who came into the town accordingly, and entered on the Government (5). He goes on, and ſays that he viſited the Biſhop of Carliſle at Roſe Caſtle, craved his benediction, and he depoſited with his Lordſhip ſome ſolemn aſſurances of living and dying in the Right Church of England Religion? — He departed from Carliſle on Wedneſday 19th towards Scotland with a ſingle ſervant, a Scotſman, whom he had entertained to conduct him to Edinburgh, hoping at Leith or ſome other Sea-port to procure ſhipping for France. But reſting a day or two at a place called Aliſonbank upon the Borders, to confer with an honeſt loyal Gentleman, he fell into the hands of the rabble, who were then raging up and down, believing the reports of the Landing of Iriſh Papiſts, Burning of towns, and Maſſacring of people wherever they came. Here he was ſeized by one Palmer, a notorious rogue, for a Popiſh Prieſt, about eleven at night, pulled out of his bed, his pockets rifled, his horſes (two geldings worth 40 l.) and Portmantua carried away, himſelf being mounted on a little jade not worth forty ſhillings. Being thus diſgracefully conducted to a poor little alehouſe on the Engliſh ſide, where they ſearched his portmantua and plundered him of a bag of money and ſome ſmall pieces of plate, they left him in the hands of the Watch and a Conſtable, who led him away on foot, in a ſevere cold froſty night, with a heavy riding-coat and great boots (ill accoutrements, ſays he, for walking) to Carliſle to be examined before one Capt. Bull and other Officers then in the Garriſon, by whom they hoped to have been rewarded. But being well known in the city, and travelling with the Governor Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave's paſs, they miſſed of their expectation and received a rebuke. He had his horſes and part of his money reſtored; but the fellows were let go without any further notice (6). Being now at liberty a ſecond time (he ſays by a happy providence to go where he pleaſed) and promiſed a paſs if he would go home to Durham, he thought it moſt prudent to continue a while in that city, to remove the ſuſpicion of his pretended flight out of England; and accordingly lived unconcernedly there for fourteen or fifteen days, conſtantly attending God's public ſervice and preaching in the Cathedral on Chriſtmaſs-Day, whereby (he ſays) he hoped, he convinced the people that he was no Popiſh Prieſt or Jeſuit. — The Country being more quiet and no more noiſe of Iriſh Papiſts, he adds (7): He left the town and ventured back towards Durham, as far as Hexam, but with no intention to go home; deſigning after he had ſhifted off his guide and ſome ſervants who were ſent with Letters to him, to ſtrike out of the road by Berwick towards Scotland; and on the 26th of January arrived ſafe at Edinburgh; endeavouring as ſoon as he could get admittance into the Caſtle, to wait on the Duke of Gordon, to whom he communicated his deſign of going to the King; and by whom he was informed of a veſſel then in the road ready to depart for France. Which opportunity he made uſe of, and was after many tempeſts and a tedious voyage ſafely landed at Honfleur on the 19th of March, the very day after the King's departure from Breſt for Ireland. Which miſſing of the King, he ſays, was matter of great mortification to him.

(1) Let. pag. 9.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Perhaps Hexam.

(3) Let. pag. 10.

(6) Ibid. pag. 11.

(7) Ibid.

[B] He died at Paris ... and was buried &c.] Dr. Taylor, a deprived Clergyman, who performed the office at his funeral, gives the following account of it to a friend June 19th 1713. "Dr. Granville ſickened "on Thurſday the 12th of April 1703. N. S. contiued ill that night, and the next day (at Corbeil ſeven leagues from Paris upon the Seine, in the way "to Fountainbleau, where he commonly reſided and "was much delighted with the place, and the rather "becauſe he there diſcovered the original of his anceſtors.) On Saturday the fourteenth finding himſelf "ſomething better, he went to his lodging at Paris, "upon the Foſſée St. Victor. On Sunday the 15th the "ague or fever returned, continued the 16th and 17th, "and on Wedneſday the 18th he died at ſix in the "morning, and was privately buried in conſecrated "ground, within the city of Paris, either that or next "night; attended by Mr. Thomas Higgons his nephew and ſome few of his acquaintance of the "Church of England."

[C] He printed ſeveral ſmall Tracts &c.] The titles of the pieces which he publiſhed before the Revolution are as follow: 1. The compleat Conformiſt: or ſeaſonable advice concerning ſtrict Conformity and frequent Celebration

(g) Dr. Taylor says the 18th. See the note [B].

He died at Paris, after a ſeries of many ſufferings, on April (g) the 7th 1703, N. S. and was buried at the lower end of the Holy Innocents Church in that City. He printed ſeveral ſmall Tracts, an account whereof we ſhall give in the Note [C]. Much more might be ſaid of this eminent perſon with regard to his noble and diſtinguiſhing perſonal virtues, but we chooſe to conclude the preſent account with a character given of him by the late Lord Lanſdown in a (b) Letter to a nephew of his who was going to enter into Holy Orders, which is as follows: "You had an uncle whoſe memory I ſhall ever "revere: make him your example. Sanctity ſate ſo eaſy, ſo unaffected, and ſo grace- "ful upon him, that in him we beheld the very beauty of holineſs. He was as chear- "ful, as familiar, as condeſcending in his converſation, as he was ſtrict, regular, and "exemplary in his piety; as well bred and accompliſhed as a Courtier, and as reverend "and venerable as an Apoſtle. He was indeed Apoſtolical in every thing, for he aban- "doned all to follow his Lord and Maſter." bration of the Holy Communion, preached on the 7th of January, being the firſt Sunday after the Epiphany 1682, in the Cathedral Church of Durham, on John i. 29. Lond. 1684 in 4to. To which is added Advice: or a Letter written to the Clergy of the Archdeaconry of Durham to the ſame purpoſe. 2. A Sermon preached in the Cathedral Church of Durham, upon the revival of the ancient and laudable practice of that and ſome other Cathedrals, in having Sermons on Wedneſdays and Fridays during Advent and Lent, on Rom. xiii. 11. Lond. 1686 4to. This Sermon was preached on the 2d of December 1685. being the firſt Wedneſday in Advent. 3. Counſels and Directions divine and moral: in plain and familiar Letters of Advice to a (*) young Gentleman his nephew, ſoon after his admiſſion into a College in Oxford. Lond. 1685 8vo. Beſides theſe pieces which we have juſt mentioned, our Author, immediately after his retiring into France, publiſhed ſome ſmall Tracts at Roüen, which are very ſcarce and not very correctly printed; and indeed it is pretty remarkable that ſuch an unuſual favour ſhould be permitted in a Popiſh Country to a dignified Clergyman of the Church of England. The titles of the pieces printed at Roüen are, viz. 1. The reſigned and reſolved Chriſtian and faithfull and undaunted Loyaliſt: In two plaine Farewell-Sermons, and a loyal Farewell-Viſitation-Speech. Both delivered amidſt the lamentable confuſions occaſioned by the late Foreign Invasion and Home-Defection of his Majeſties Subjects in England. By Denis Granville D. D. Deane and Archdeacon of Durham, now in exile, Chaplaine in Ordinary to his Majeſtie. . . . Whereunto are added certaine Letters to his Relations and Friends in England, ſhewing the reaſons and manner of his withdrawing out of the Kingdom. 1. A Letter to his Brother the Earl of Bathe. 2. A Letter to his Biſhop the Bishop of Durham. 3. A Letter to his Brethren the Prebendaries. 4. A Letter to the Clergy of his Archdeaconry. 5. A Letter to his Curates, at Easington and Sedgefield. Printed at Roüen by William Machuel ruë S. Lo, near the Palace, for John Baptiste Besongue, ruë Eſcayer, at the Royal Sun, and are to be ſold by Augustin Besongue in the great Hall of the Palace at Paris. In the yeare of our Lord God M. DC. LXXXIX. II. The chiefeſt matters contained in ſundry Diſcourſes made to the Clergy of the Archdeaconry of Durham, ſince his Majeſties coming to the Crown Summed up and ſeaſonably brought again to their view in a loyal Farewell-Viſitation-Speech on the 13th of November laſt 88. being ten days after the Landing of the Prince of Orange. By Denis Granville D. D. &c. . . . This is dated from his ſtudy at Roüen Nov. 15. 1689. With a Preface to the Reader and an Advertiſement. III. A copy of paper penned at Durham, by the Author, Aug. 27. 1688, by way of reflection on the then diſmal prognoſtics of the time. — Things which portend very fatally to the Government and Church of England. In one of the articles of the above mentioned paper the Dean obſerves that "moſt men, "even Divines, manifeſting an exceſſive fear that Popery "will come in, and yet all the while neglect to betake "themſelves to the moſt aſſured means to keep it out; "to wit, Amendment of life, and exact Conformity "to the Churches Rules, and training up the young "generation by the due exerciſe of Cathechiſme. . . . "Too many flying to unjuſtifiable means to preſerve their "Religion . . . are reſolved to rebell rather than let it "go." IV. Directions which Dr. Granville, Archdeacon of Durham, Rector of Sedgefield and Eaſington, enjoins to be obſerved by the Curates of thoſe his Pariſhes, given them in charge at Eaſter-Viſitation held at Sedgefield, in the year 1669. — We have ſeen a very curious Print of Dean Granville, graved by the famous Edelink: The Painter's name is Beaupoille. Impenſis Thomæ (*) Hacquet, Rotomagenſis Hoſpitis ſui Anno Dom. 1693. Round the Print is this Inſcription, Dionysius Granville Decanus Dunelmensis. Æt. SUÆ 54. At the bottom the Arms of his Family are placed; one ſide whereof is inſcribed, Sereniſſimum Dominum Jacobum Magnæ Britanniæ Regem ſecutus eſt in Galliam Anno 1688. On the other, Propter fidelitatem ſuam Domino Regi, Principe Arauſiacenſi Coronam Angliæ Uſurpante, deprivatus fuit Anno 1691. W.

(b) Publiſhed in the preface to a Pamphlet intitled, An Enquiry whether the Chriſtian Religion is of any benefit &c. 8vo, Lond. 1732, printed for Weaver Bickerton.

(*) Thomas, a younger ſon of Sir Thomas Higgons Knt. by Bridget his ſecond wife, ſiſter to Dr. Granville.

(*) Mr. Hacket was an Engliſh Merchant; at whoſe houſe the Dean lodged, while he ſtaid at Rouen; and of whom he ſpeaks very handſomely in ſeveral of his Letters.

☞GRENVILLE, or GRANVILLE (GEORGE), Lord Lanſdown. See LANSDOWN.

(a) Indignatus ille eſt ubi reſciuit, monuitque tum demum illos ſuam imaginem habituros ſi pictum in tabulæ aſinum haberent. Sotuel, Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 369.

GRETSERUS (JAMES) a very learned man, born at Marcdorf in Germany, entred among the Jeſuits at ſeventeen years of age, in 1577. He was Profeſſor a great many years in the Univerſity of Ingolſtad [A]. It is related, that notwithſtanding his cloſe application to his ſtudies, he nevertheleſs was very conſtant at prayers; and that his great erudition was attended with a ſurpriſing modeſty. The inhabitants of Marcdorf were deſirous of having his picture to hang it up in their town-houſe; but the inſtant Gretſer was informed of the earneſt application they had made to his ſuperiors for that purpoſe, he was vexed; and told them, that if they wanted his picture, they need but draw that of an aſs. To make themſelves amends, they purchaſed all his works, and devoted them to the uſe of the Public. He would never employ his credit and intereſt, to procure ſome mark of diſtinction for his nephew who was a ſtudent. He died at Ingolſtad the 29th of January 1625 (b). He ſpent his whole life in writing againſt Proteſtant Authors, and in defending the Order to which he belonged. He wrote ſomewhat ſharply againſt them, and was anſwered in the ſame ſtrain. He tranſlated or compoſed a prodigious number of books [B]. Some Authors have beſtowed very great encomiums

(b) Extracted from Nat. Sotuel. ibid.

(1) Natan. Sot. Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 369.

[A] He was profeſſor a great many years at Ingolſtad.] He taught Philoſophy there three years, morality ſeven, and School-Divinity fourteen years. (1).

[B] He compoſed a prodigious number of books] The catalogue of them was publiſhed at Munich, 1674, in 4to, by George Heſerus the Jeſuit. This is a very accurate catalogue, and was publiſhed from the author's original (2). [This catalogue conſiſts of near 153 articles, as given by father Niceron, which he tells us was copied by him from the propoſals or plan, publiſhed encomiums on him (c). Cardinal du Perron acknowledged, that he was a man of wit and ſenſe; but added a very unmannerly particular, ſince it reflected on a very illuſtrious and very learned Nation [C]. A modern Author carried this impiety ſtill farther than the Cardinal, but was cenſured very juſtly for it (d).

(2) Ex Natan. Sotuelo, Biblioth. Script. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 372.

(c) In the Remark [B].

(d) In the Remark [C].

publiſhed in 1733, for printing an edition of all Gretſer's works at Ratiſbon, in 17 volumes folio. Father Niceron obſerves, that this is a very exact catalogue. Add. by the Tranſl *.] I ſhall give a catalogue of but part of his works. De Sancta cruce, Tom. III. [This is a collection of ſeveral treatiſes on the croſs, written by Greek Authors, the greateſt part of which had not been publiſhed till then, or had been printed only in Greek or Latin ſeparately. Add. by the Tranſl †.] De ſacris Peregrinationibus, Libri IV. Three apologies for the founder of the Jeſuits. The refutation of the hiſtory of the Jeſuits. This hiſtory was written by one Haſenmullerus. [This Haſenmullerus, who had been a Jeſuit, had left his ſociety and turned Lutheran. Being then deſirous, according to the practice of proſelytes, to ſignalize his zeal for the religion he had embraced, by ſlandering thoſe he had left; he wrote, in very ſharp terms, a work againſt them, intitled Hiſtoria Jeſuitici Ordinis; but died before it was put to preſs. Add. by the Tranſl §.] De Jure & More prohibendi Libros noxios Libri II. [Gretſer compoſed this work, which is curious enough, on occaſion of the Index Expurgatorius, drawn up by the command of Philip II King of Spain, and printed at Antwerp in 1571. Add. by the Tranſl.] Controverſiam Roberti Bellarmini Defenſio, Tom II. in folio. Baſilicon doron, ſeu Commentarius exegeticus in Sereniſſimi Magni Britanniæ Regis Jacobi Præfationem monitoriam; & in Apologiam pro juramento fidelitatis. Many books againſt Goldaſt, and one among the reſt intitled, Arnoldi Brixienſis in Melchiore Goldaſto Calviniſta redivivi vera Deſcriptio & Imago (3). Notes on Thuanus's Hiſtory. [The title of this work is, In Jacobi Auguſti Thuani Hiſtoriarum libros Notationes. Authore Joanne Baptiſto Gallo J. C. Ingolſtadii 1614, 4*to*. The vehemence and fire with which this work is written (very much in Gretſer's manner) might induce the public to believe that it was compoſed by him; and the authors of the Bibliotheque of the Jeſuits, ſeem to favour this belief, by inſerting the title of this book in the catalogue of his works. But it may be pronounced that this is a miſtake, ſince Southwell declares in the article of John de Mauchault, a Jeſuit of Paris, that he wrote the remarks publiſhed under the name of John Baptiſt Gallus. Add. by the Tranſl §.] A treatiſe on the Compelle intrare, an Heterodoxi ad fidem cogendi ſint. An anſwer to du Pleſſis Mornai's book, intitled le Myſtere d' Iniquité. This anſwer is cloſer and leſs inſtructive than that of Coeffeteau; but it was eaſier to anſwer Coeffeteau than James Gretſer. The latter has examined in a moſt unmerciful manner the quotations, and the ſmalleſt chronological errors. I have taken notice elſewhere of what he wrote in favour of Gregory VII (4). Some Romiſh authors have called him the ſcourge of heretics, and the terror of the ſlanderers of the Jeſuits. Magnus Lutheranorum domitor, ac malleus Hæreticorum, & calumniatorum Societatis terror (5). He was very well verſed in the Greek tongue, and publiſhed ſome grammatical pieces in that language, together with notes on ſome Greek authors, as George Codinus, Curopalata, on John Cantacuzenus &c. I muſt not omit that he procured the impreſſion of a conſiderable number of manuſcripts. [Dupin ſays of Gretſer, "that he was certainly a "man of vaſt abilities, and had wrote a great deal "on antiquity both ſacred and profane. It is pity "he was not a better critick, and that he adopted "pieces and incidents which were either ſpurious or "doubtful. It is pity too, as Gretſer was ſo able to "treat of matters thoroughly, that controverſies ſhould "have engaged him in perſonal and particular diſ-"putes. It nevertheleſs may be affirmed that he was "one of the ableſt controverſial writers of his age. "He had a great facility in writing, and refuted his "adverſaries with a vaſt vehemence. The circum-"ſtance which ought to be moſt eſteemed in his "works, is the prodigious variety that is found in "them, and the accuracy with which he collected, "on each ſubject, whatever bears any relation to it. To "conclude, it may be affirmed that his Books will fur-"niſh very good materials to thoſe who would write on "the ſame ſubjects as Gretſer has treated." Father Niceron ſays, "It were to be wiſhed that Gretſer had "ſhewed greater moderation in his controverſial Wri-"tings; that he could have therein reſtrained his na-"tural impetuoſity; and that his ſtyle had been not "ſo ſharp and vehement. (Addit. by the Tranſl. *)

(*) Hommes illuſtres, vol. 28. pag. 45, 46.

(†) Ibid. pag. 9.

(§) Ibid. pag. 5.

(3) See the title of a little work, againſt Mr. Arnauld quoted in citation (40) of the article ARNAULD (Anthony) Doctor of the Sorbonne.

§ Hommes Illuſtres, vol. 28. pag. 45.

(4) In the Article of this Pope, remark [R].

(5) Nat. Sotuel, Bibliotb. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 368.

[C] Cardinal du Perron acknowledged that he was a man of wit; . . but added a very unmannerly particular, ſince it reflected on a . . Nation.] Gretſer is greatly to be applauded; he has a great deal of wit for a German (6) (a). Theſe are Cardinal du Perron's words. Father Bouhours enforced his aſſertions with this teſtimony, when he called in queſtion the wit of the Germans. But there aroſe a Frenchman who took the part of the injured nation. Here follows the manner in which he criticiſed father Bouhours. "It is in the ſame "dialogue that this author aſks, whether it be poſſible for a German to be a wit? In my opinion, the "poſſibility of this was never doubted before; and "this author in all probability is the firſt who ever "ſtarted this queſtion. He anſwers it, by ſaying, "that it is a kind of prodigy, for a German to be "a very witty man; and he cites Cardinal du Per-"ron on this occaſion . . . But it does not follow "from all this, that he ſhould have carried the "matter ſo far as to make it a queſtion, whether it "be poſſible for a German to be a wit; and it is "the way to draw a great many injurious expreſſions "upon himſelf from the Germans (7)." In another place (8) he ſpeaks as follows: "This is no very "great ornament, any more than his queſtion whe-"ther it be poſſible for a German to be a wit? I "can aſſure you, Sir, that this queſtion has diſpleaſed "many prudent perſons, who obſerved to me, that "were the author of the Entretiens more judicious, "he would ſhow greater reſpect to a nation who "have a ſtrong propenſion to, and love for letters "and arms; who have made wonderful diſcoveries "in arts and ſciences, as artillery, printing and the "ſector; and the greateſt part of whom are our "friends, our allies and neighbours." Cleanthe was thought to have not ſufficiently revenged the Germans: Mr. Cramer has made a noble apology for his countrymen in this particular, in a book (9) that was publiſhed laſt year, and of which an extract was given by Mr. Beauval (10).

(*) Hommes illuſtres, vol. 28. pag. 2. 3.

(6) Perroniana, pag. m. 163.

(7) Barbier Dancour, Sentimens de Cleanthe ſur les Entretiens d'Ariſte & d'Eugene, pag. 91, 92. Bruſſels edit.

(8) Ibid. pag. 78.

(9) Intitled, Vindiciæ Nominis Germanici contra quoſdam Obtrectatores Gallos, Amſterdam 1694.

§ (a) I dare almoſt affirm, that this expreſſion of Cardinal du Perron is not ſo unmannerly as our Mr. Bayle imagined it to be. What the French call de l'Eſprit (wit) is a certain talent for trifling things, or at moſt a certain vivacity which, in general, ſuits very little the German gravity, and the ſerious turn of mind of that nation. When therefore this Cardinal ſaid of father Gretſer, that he had a great deal of Eſprit for a German, he ſeems to have meant only, that a German has ſeldom ſo much of the French vivacity as father Gretſer, although the latter Jeſuit was a German. I ſay the ſame with regard to the queſtion, viz. if a German can be a wit. No one denies the German nation to be maſters of the moſt refined good ſenſe, the moſt delicate ſagacity, and the nobleſt ſallies of wit and genius; and ſatisfied with theſe qualities they do not look upon the French fire and vivacity as a great prerogative. REM. CRIT.

(10) In July 1694, pag. 499, & ſeq.

☞ GREVIL (FULKE or FOULK) Lord Brook, was deſcended from an antient family, and ſon of Sir Fulke Grevil of Beauchamp Court in Warwickſhire (a), where he was born in the year 1554, and ſpent ſome time as a Gentleman Commoner in Oxford, either before he went to Trinity College in Cambridge, or at his return from

(a) Fuller's Worthies, in Warwickſhire, and David Lloyd's State Worthies, pag. 727. 2d edit. London 1670.

from thence. After he had left the Univerſity, he travelled, and, upon his return, being well accompliſhed, was introduced to the Court by his uncle Robert Grevil, ſervant to Queen Elizabeth, where he was univerſally eſteemed on account of his excellent parts and learning (b). He obtained an honourable office under her Majeſty (c), and became one of her principal favourites, which he held for no ſhort time, "but had the longeſt "leaſe, the ſmootheſt time, without rubs of any (d)." In the beginning of 1588 he, among other perſons of honour and quality, was created Maſter of Arts in the Univerſity of Oxford (e). In 1603 he was made Knight of the Bath at the Coronation of King James I, and ſoon after obtained the grant of the ruinous caſtle of Warwick. In the 12th year of that King's reign, being conſtituted Under-Treaſurer and Chancellor of the Exchequer, he was appointed one of his Majeſty's Privy Council. And having diſcharged theſe places with great fidelity, he was advanced, by Letters Patents dated the 9th of January 1620, to the dignity of a Baron of this Realm, by the title of Lord Brook of Beauchamps-Court (f). In September 1621 he was made one of the Gentlemen of the King's Bed-Chamber; whereupon reſigning his Chancellorſhip of the Exchequer, he was ſucceeded in it by Richard Weſton (g), afterwards Earl of Portland. He wrote ſeveral works both in Proſe and Verſe [A]. At length neglecting to reward one Haywood, who had ſpent the greateſt and chiefeſt part of his time in his perſonal ſervice, for which he expoſtulated with his maſter, but was ſharply rebuked, the ſaid Haywood being alone with him in his bed-chamber at Brook-Houſe in Holbourn, gave him a mortal ſtab in the back, of which he died in September 1628 [B], aged ſeventy four. The aſſaſſin immediately locked himſelf into another room, where he killed himſelf with his ſword (h). His Lordſhip was interred on the 27th of October following in the Collegiate Church at Warwick (i), wherein he had in his life-time erected a monument

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 521. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Fragmenta Regalia, written by Sir Robert Naunton, Maſter of the Court of Wards. pag. 36. edit. 1641.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(f) Dugdale's Baronage of England, tom. 2. pag. 442, b.

(g) Camdeni Annales Regis Jacobi I. pag. 74. ſubjoined to G. Camdeni & illuſtrium Virorum ad G. Camdeni Epiſtolæ, edit. London 1691, in 4to.

(h) Fuller, ubi ſupra, and Lloyd, pag. 728. and Wood, col. 522.

(i) Wood, ibid.

[A] He wrote ſeveral Works both in Verſe and Proſe.] He wrote two Tragedies, viz. Alaham and Muſtapha. The former ſeems to be an imitation of the ancients. The Prologue is ſpoken by a Ghoſt, one of the Old Kings of Ormus, an Iſland ſituated at the entrance of the Perſian Gulf, where the Scene of the Drama lies. This ſpectre gives an account of each character; which perhaps was done in imitation of Euripides, who uſually introduces one of the chief Actors as the Prologue, whoſe buſineſs was to explain all thoſe circumſtances, which preceded the opening of the Stage. Our Author has been ſo careful in obſerving the rules of Ariſtotle and Horace, that whereas Horace ſays (1),

(1) De Arte Poeticâ.

——— nec quarta loqui perſona laboret, he has in no Scene introduced above two Speakers, except in the Chorus between each Act; and even there he obſerves all the rules laid down by that great Maſter in the Art of Poetry, part of whoſe directions to the Chorus are as follow (2);

(2) Ibid.

Ille dapes laudet menſæ brevis, ille ſalubrem
Juſtitiam, legeſque & apertis otia portis.

The Tragedy of Muſtapha is written upon the ſame model of the ancients. An imperfect copy of this Play appeared in print at London 1609 in 4to, tho' probably without the Author's knowledge, ſince it may rather be ſtiled a Fragment than a Tragedy (3). Both theſe Tragedies were printed together at London 1633 in fol. with ſeveral Poems, as A Treatiſe of human learning; An Inquiſition upon Fame and Honour; A Treatiſe of Wars; all which poems are written in ſtanza's of ſix lines, four interwoven, and a couplet in baſe, which the Italians called Seſtine (4). This volume contains likewiſe Cælica conſiſting of one hundred and nine ſonnets of different meaſures on different ſubjects; a Letter to an honourable Lady, the ſubject of which is how to behave herſelf in a married ſtate; and another Letter written to his couſin Grevil Verney, then in France, containing directions for travel. Beſides theſe works he wrote, The five Yeares of King James; or the Condition of the State of England and the relation it had to other Provinces. Written by Sir Foulk Grevill, late Lord Brook. London 1643 in 4to. This is principally an Hiſtory from the year 1611 to 1616, and contains chiefly an account of matters relating to Sir Robert Carr Earl of Somerſet; the divorce of Frances Howard from Robert Earl of Eſſex, and her marriage to the Earl of Somerſet; the poiſoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, and the execution and ſequeſtration of thoſe, who were concerned in that affair. This Book was reprinted in 1651 in 4to with this title; The narrative Hiſtory of King James for the firſt fourteen years, in four Parts, &c. with Sir Thomas Overbury's picture before it. To which are added, Truth brought to light by time, the Proceedings touching the Divorce between Frances Howard and Robert Earl of Eſſex, &c. with the Pictures of the Earl of Somerſet and the ſaid Frances. 2. The Speech of Sir Francis Bacon at the Arraignment of the Earl of Somerſet, which is likewiſe inſerted in the ſaid Five Years of King James. 3. An Abſtract or brief Declaration of the preſent ſtate of his Majeſty's Revenues, &c. 4. A true Relation of Commiſſions and Warrants for the condemnation and burning of Bartholomew Legatt and Thomas Withman, the one in Weſt-Smithfield, the other in Litchfield 1611, &c. whereunto are added the Pardons of Theophilus Hyggens Clerk, and Sir Euſtace Hart Knt. The Lord Brooke wrote alſo The Life of the renowned Sir Philip Sidney, with the true Intereſt of England, as it then ſtood in relation to all foreign Princes, &c. publiſh'd by P. B. at London 1652 in 8vo. to which is added A ſhort Account of the Maxims and Politics uſed by Queen Elizabeth in her Government. In 1670 there was printed at London in 8vo, The Remains of Sir Fulk Grevill Lord Brooke; being Poems of Monarchy and Religion; never before printed. In the Advertiſement by Henry Herringham the Bookſeller we are informed, that "the Author dedicated all "his Monuments to the memory of Sir Philip Sidney, "whoſe Life he did write as an intended Preface to "theſe: and when he grew old he reviſed the Poems "and Treatiſes he had wrote long before, and at his "death committed them to his friend Mr. Michael "Malet, an aged Gentleman, in whom he moſt con-"fided, who intended, what the Author purpoſed, to "have had them printed all together; but by copies of "ſome parts of them, which happened into other "hands, ſome of them came firſt abroad, each of his "Works having had their fate, as they ſingly merit "particular eſteem, ſo to come into the world at ſe-"veral times. He, to whom they were firſt deliver-"ed, being dead, the moſt of theſe remaining pieces "devolved on Sir J. M. who hath given me the li-"cenſed copy of them." Mr. Edward Philips (5), and Mr. William Winſtanley (6) aſcribe to our Author a Tragedy intitled, Marcus Tullius Cicero. But Mr. Langbaine (7) conceives this to be a miſtake, and tells us, that "this Play was not written, at leaſt not print-"ed, till long after his Lordſhip's death."

(3) Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets. By Gerard Langbaine, pag. 38, 39. edit. Oxford 1691, in 8vo.

(4) Idem, ibid. pag. 40, 41.

(5) Theatrum Poetarum. Modern Poets, pag. 46. edit. London 1675.

(6) Lives of the moſt famous Engliſh Poets, pag. 87. edit. London 1687.

[B] Of which he died in Sept. 1628.] Wood tells us (8), that he died on the 30th of that month. But Mr. Richard Smith in his Obituary publiſhed by Francis Peck M. A. (9), obſerves, that it was on the firſt of that month he was ſtabbed to death with a knife by his ſervant Ralph Hayward, who with the ſame knife ſtabbed himſelf.

(7) Ubi ſupra.

(8) Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 522.

(9) Deſiderata Curioſa, vol. 2. lib. 14. pag. 12.

ment with an epitaph, in which he is ſtiled, Servant to Queen Elizabeth, Counſellor to King James, and Friend to Sir Philip Sidney (k). He was ſucceeded in his honour by his kinſman Robert Grevil [C]. He was never married, though a conſtant courtier of the Ladies (l); and purſued his ſtudies rather than his ambition, being more contemplative than active. One great argument of his merit was his regard to that of others, deſiring to be known to poſterity under no other character than that of Shakeſpear's and Ben Johnſon's Maſter, Lord Chancellor Egerton's, and Biſhop Overal's Patron, and Sir Philip Sidney's Friend (m).

(k) Fuller, ubi ſupra.

(l) Naunton, ubi ſupra.

(m) Lloyd, pag. 728.

[C] Succeeded in his honour by his kinſman Robert Grevil.] He was then one and twenty years of age, and was educated at Cambridge. He adhered to the Parliament during the civil wars, and was appointed by them Lieutenant of Warwickſhire, and a Colonel and Commander in their Army (10). He was killed by a ſhot in the left eye in attacking the Church cloſe at Lichfield on Tueſday March 2d 164$\frac{2}{3}$ (11). He wrote, I. The Nature of Truth, its union and unity with the ſoul, which is one in its eſſence, faculties, acts, one with truth. London 1640 in 12mo, written by way of Letter to a private friend J. S. by whom it was publiſhed with a Preface. This Book was animadverted upon by Mr. John Wallis, a Miniſter in London, afterwards Profeſſor of Geometry at Oxford, in a Book intitled, Truth tried; or Animadverſions on the Lord Brooke's Treatiſe called, The Nature of Truth. London 1643 in 4to. II. A Diſcourſe opening the Nature of that Epiſcopacie, which is exerciſed in England, wherein with all humility are repreſented ſome conſiderations tending to the much deſired peace and long expected Reformation of this our Mother-Church. By the Right Honourable Robert Lord Brooke. London 1641 in 4to. Dedicated to the moſt noble Lords, with the honourable Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes now aſſembled in Parliament. In this Diſcourſe he obſerves (12), that he aims not at words, but things; and it is not the look, much leſs the name of a Biſhop that he fears or quarrels with; "it is his nature, his office, that diſpleaſeth "me. Nor yet his nature or office in general, but "ſuch and ſo cloathed, or rather veiled, with ſuch "and ſuch adjuncts. For to me the word Biſhop ſig-"nifies, either one that is to preach, adminiſter the "Sacraments, exhort, reprove, convince, excommu-"nicate, &c. not only in ſome one diſtinct congrega-"tion, his own Pariſh, but in many ſeveral Congre-"gations crowded up together in one ſtrange (and for "long unknown) word, a Dioceſe. Or one who hath "to all this added not only the name of a Civil Lord, "(with which bare name or ſhadow I fight not,) but "alſo a vaſt unwieldy (I had almoſt ſaid unlimited) "power in Civil Government, which muſt needs draw "on a mighty train, and cloath itſelf with glorious "robes of long extended and magnifique ſtiles, ſcarce "to be marſhalled by a better Herald than Elihu, who "could give no titles. Or in the laſt place (which "ſhould be the firſt) a true faithful Overſeer, that over "one ſingle Congregation hath a joint care with the "Elders, Deacons, and the reſt of the Aſſembly, who "are all fellow-helpers, yea ſervants to each other's "faith. This laſt is a Biſhop of the firſt Inſtitution, "of Chriſt's allowance, ſettled in divers Churches, "even in the Apoſtles times. The firſt is of the ſe-"cond Century, when doctrine, diſcipline, and all "Religion began to waine. For even then myſteri-"ous Antichriſt was not only conceived, but began to "quicken. The ſecond roſe laſt, (though firſt intend-"ed by the Church's enemy) riſing up while the "world was buſy, looking all one way, as amazed at "the new beaſt, ſucceſſor to the dragon. This is "now our adverſary; one monſtrouſly compounded "of different, yea oppoſite offices, and thoſe the great-"eſt, both eccleſiaſtic and civil; for which he ſeems "no way able, no way fit, and that for many reaſons, "which may be brought from Scripture, Church-Anti-"quity, State-Policy." I ſhall begin with the laſt, as that I now aim at moſt. Here let us view our Biſhop a while as a private man, before his office. Next as a Lord over Church and State, in his office. Then with ſome neceſſary conſequents to his office, as now it is exerciſed in this Kingdom. Thus ſhall we quickly judge how ſuitable to true Policy of State are either antecedents, concomitants, or conſequents of this too officious two-headed Biſhop. Antecedents to his office are his birth, education, election, ordination, &c. Concomitants (or rather ingredients) we may call that almoſt unlimited power, both intenſive, in ſole ordination; Juriſdiction directive, by Injunctions, Canons, &c. corrective by Excommunication, Suſpenſion, Deprivation, &c; as alſo extenſive over ſo vaſt a Dioceſe. Hither alſo we may refer his Power Juridical or Legiſlative in Parliament, judicial in many great, yea civil Tribunals; and (of all monſters moſt ugly) his power delegative; than which this Sun hath ſeen nothing more monſtrous, at leaſt, as of late it hath been exerciſed. By conſequents I mean his relations, acquired by his office, both upward to his ſovereign, Creator, benefactors; as downward to his own family, creatures, and hang-by dependants. This is the ſubject of the firſt Section; and in the ſecond he conſiders how conſonant ſuch Epiſcopacy is either to ſound Antiquity or Scripture. III. Two Speeches ſpoken in Guild-Hall in London concerning his Majeſty's Refuſal of a Treaty of Peace. London 1642 in 4to. IV. An Anſwer to the Speech of Philip Earl of Pembroke concerning Accommodation; which Anſwer was ſpoke in the Houſe of Lords Dec. 19. 1642, and printed in one ſheet in 4to by order of the Houſe. V. A Speech at the Election of his Captains and Commanders at Warwick Caſtle. London 1643 in 4to. T.

(10) Wood, col. 522, 523.

(11) See the Diary of Archbiſhop Laud, and Lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion, vol. 2. Part 1. B. 6. pag. 148, 149. edit. Oxon 1707 in 8vo.

(12) Pag. 1, 2.

GREVIUS (JOHN) an Arminian Miniſter, and born in the Dutchy of Cleves, was depoſed and baniſhed for refuſing to ſubſcribe the Canons of the Synod of Dort; and becauſe he did not continue in his exile, he was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment [A]. He eſcaped from priſon in 1621. He had begun a work which he publiſhed afterwards [B], and wherein he condemns the cuſtom of putting perſons impeached of crimes

[A] He was . . . baniſhed . . . and becauſe he did not continue in his exile, he was ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment.] He declared, that tho' his baniſhment ſeparated him from his flock, he nevertheleſs took care of it; and that as his flock had deſired him to give them ſpiritual food, he thought himſelf obliged to labour at their ſalvation, rather than obey the ſentence of the Magiſtrates, which forbid his return. He accordingly came back into Holland, and held private Aſſemblies in Campen, for the inſtruction of his flock, which being made public, he was ſeized and ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment. In this manner he himſelf relates theſe particulars (1), which is all I know of the matter; but this I am ſure of, that Grevius ought, on this account, to be conſidered as a perfectly honeſt man who diſcharged the duties of his functions. I appeal to thoſe who maintain, that ſuch Miniſters as return to France, in order to inſtruct the Proteſtants in private, in oppoſition to the Edicts of the Sovereign, perform a very glorious action. It may be obſerved, by the way, that the principle of perſecution is inconſiſtent with the maxim, Do as you would be done by, Quod tibi fieri non vis alteri ne feceris. You puniſh a man, and at the ſame time blame thoſe who act in the ſame manner.

(1) In the preface to his Treatiſe de Tortura.

Revius, in his Hiſtory of Deventer, obſerves that our Grevius had diſcharged the ſacerdotal functions in Heuſden, and came to Campen in Nov. 1619, and preached eleven times there in the houſes of the Remonſtrants (2).

(2) Revius, Daventriæ illuſtratæ lib. 6. pag. 626.

[B] He had begun a Work which he publiſhed afterwards.] Here follows the title of it. Tribunal reformatum crimes to the torture. He pretends that reaſon ſpeaks in his favour [C], though the moſt general practice is otherwiſe. He gives an account of his deliverance in his Letter to Vorſtius (a). He continued in priſon a year and half (b). He had been admitted to the miniſterial functions the 10th of May 1605, and preached his firſt ſermon that very day in the Church of Arnheim. This particular I read in a Letter written by him in 1620 to Balthaſar Brantius (c), who had ſtrongly exhorted him to leave the Remonſtrants.

(a) It is the CDV among the Letters of the Arminians.

(b) Præfat. diſſert. de Tortura.

(c) It is the CCCLXXVI among thoſe of the Arminians, edit. of 1684.

matum, in quo ſanioris & tutioris juſtitiæ via judici Chriſtiano in proceſſu criminali commonſtratur, rejecta & fugata TORTURA, cujus iniquitatem, multiplicem fallaciam, atque illicitum inter Chriſtianos uſum libera & neceſſaria Diſſertatione aperuit JOANNES GREVIUS Clivenſ. quam captivus ſcripſit in Ergaſtulo Amſterodamenſi. This Work was publiſhed at Hamburg in 1624 (3). It is upon a very nice and delicate ſubject, where, as one would imagine, there is no declaring for the negative, without condemning a practice authorized by the Laws of the State. Perſons impeached of crimes are put to the torture in moſt countries of the world. But it is to be particularly obſerved, that ſuch Sovereigns as authorize it, and even ordain it to form a conſiderable part of criminal proſecutions, do not impoſe upon their ſubjects a neceſſity of believing that it is agreeable to the dictates of juſtice. There have been found in all ages and countries, ſeveral learned men who have taken the freedom to cenſure the abuſes and injuſtice of it. Our Grevius is one of theſe, and his Treatiſe is worthy of our peruſal. This ought to teach certain perſecuting ſpirits, that they have no right to perſecute their enemies, upon pretence that they do not approve all the uſages and cuſtoms of their country, or all the principles of thoſe who preſide in the Government. Subjects are indeed bound to obey the Magiſtrates, but not to believe that they always act in conformity to the rules of juſtice; and that of two practices or uſages, they may not ſometimes have choſen the worſt. A ſubject may even be allowed to write, and exhibit in a reſpectful manner the ſeveral abuſes, which he takes notice of, in order to prompt the Sovereign to reform them.

(3) Konig is in an error in ſaying, Grævius (Joh.) JCtus de Tortura quædam meditatus eſt ann. 1635. Beſides, Grevius was not a Civilian. See his preface.

[C] He pretends that . . . in cenſuring the cuſtom of putting perſons impeached of crimes to the torture, reaſon ſpeaks in his favour.] The Author of the Philoſophical Commentary (4) cites a very beautiful paſſage from Montagne, wherein the two inconveniencies or difficulties of putting people to the torture are taken notice of; the one, that thoſe who have ſtrength enough to bear up under torments, do not declare the truth; the other, that thoſe who are too ſenſibly affected with pain, confeſs things that are falſe. This paſſage of Montagne deſerves to be all tranſcribed here, but nevertheleſs I ſhall only hint at it (5). The ſame Commentator obſerves, that Saintmars, who was beheaded at Lions for high-treaſon, anno 1642, died with great reſolution, and diſcovered the utmoſt contempt for life, and yet dreaded the rack ſo much, that he very probably would have confeſſed all they were deſirous of extorting from him, had he been put to the torture. It would be an eaſy matter to collect many authorities and examples, to ſhew the injuſtice of putting perſons accuſed of crimes to the torture: many moderns having publiſhed Collections on this ſubject. See, among others, Ramirez de Prado, in chapter IX of the Pentecontarchos, Segla in the 36th Annotation on an Arreſt of Parliament of Toulouſe, and Rupert on chapter IV and VII of Valerius Maximus. I omit thoſe Civilians who have wrote profeſſedly on this ſubject. There is no one but will call to mind, on this occcaſion, a paſſage in St. Auſtin (6), where the injuſtice of putting perſons to the torture is, at one and the ſame time, ſtrongly repreſented and faintly excuſed. Ludovicus Vives, in his Commentary on this paſſage, declares ſtrongly againſt the practices of racking people; but Leonard Coquæus, in his Commentary on the ſame words of St. Auſtin, condemns this opinion of Ludovicus Vives; and declares that the Fathers of the Canon Law approve torture to be employed, in order to extort words from perſons accuſed. Nor are the following words of Quintilian forgot (7). Sicut in tormentis quoque, qui eſt locus frequentiſſimus, cùm pars altera quæſtionem, vera fatendi neceſſitatem vocet, altera ſæpe etiam cauſam falſa dicendi, quod aliis patientia facile mendacium faciat, aliis infirmitas neceſſarium. i. e. "As alſo in the caſe "of giving the torture, which is a very common topic, "when one party calls the putting on the rack a neceſſity "laid on the perſon impeached of confeſſing the truth; "the other party, the occaſion likewiſe of often ex- "torting untruths; becauſe patience makes ſome eaſily "utter falſhoods, and infirmity makes it neceſſary to "others." Nor that of Ulpian the Civilian (8). Statutum eſt non ſemper fidem tormentis, nec tamen nunquam adhibendam fore. Etenim res eſt fragilis (quæſtio) & periculoſa, & quæ veritatem fallat: nam plerique patientiâ, ſive duritiâ tormentorum ita tormenta contemnant, ut exprimi eis veritas nullo modo poſſit; alii tantâ ſunt impatientiâ, ut quævis mentiri, quàm pati tormenta velint. Ita fit, ut etiam vario modo fateantur, ut non tantùm ſe, verùm etiam alios criminentur. i. e. "It is "agreed, that we muſt not always give credit to what "is forced out by torture; nor always diſbelieve what "is extorted that way. Racking is an uncertain and "dangerous practice, and ſometimes does not diſcover "the truth; for multitudes are ſo hardned againſt pain, "that they contemn the rack, and the truth can never "be extorted from them: whilſt others are ſo little "proof againſt torments, that they will tell any falſ- "hoods rather than ſubmit to them. There it is, that "they firſt ſay one thing and then another, and not "only accuſe themſelves, but other people alſo." I have ſpoke elſewhere (9) of the great ſtrength of mind with which the Cappadocians could ſubmit to torments, and the ſame has been obſerved of the Egyptians (10) and Spaniards (11). It is to be obſerved, that no perſons impeached are put to the torture in England, not even thoſe charged with high treaſon. Barclay has made this obſervation in the 4th chapter of his Icon Animorum. I conclude that Grevius had a noble field to range in, and that as he had a great variety of materials, he made a very good uſe of them.

(4) Comment. Philoſophique ſur contrain les d'entrer, tom. 2. pag. 251, 252.

(5) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 2. chap. 5. pag. m. 61. See alſo the Menagiana, pag. 374, 375. the firſt Dutch edition.

(6) Auguſtin. de Civitat. Dei, lib. 19. cap. 4.

(7) Quintil. Inſtit. Orat. lib. 5. cap. 4.

(8) Ulpian. in l. 1. §. Quæſt. de Quæſt.

(9) Citation (19) of the article CAPPADOCIA.

(10) Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. 7. cap. 18. Ammian. Marcell. lib. 22.

(11) See Rupert. in Valer. Max. lib. 3. cap. 3. pag. 218.

☞ GREW (NEHEMIAH), a learned Engliſh Writer and Phyſician in the ſeventeenth Century, was ſon of Obadiah Grew, D. D. [A], Miniſter of St. Michael's in Coventry. He took the degree of Doctor of Phyſic in one of the foreign Univerſities, and was admitted Honorary Fellow of the College of Phyſicians in London September the 30th 1680 (a). He had a very conſiderable practice in London, where he died ſuddenly March the 25th 1711. He wrote ſeveral works, which are greatly eſteemed.

(a) From the Regiſter of the College of Phyſicians in London.

[A] Son of Obadiah Grew, D. D.] The Doctor was born at Atherſton in the pariſh of Manceter in Warwickſhire in November 1607, and admitted a Student of Baliol College in 1624, where he took the degrees of Bachelor and Maſter of Arts, and was ordained at twenty eight years of age by Dr. Robert Wright, Biſhop of Coventry and Lichfield. In the beginning of the civil wars he adhered to the intereſt of the Parliament, and took the Covenant, and became Miniſter of St. Michael's in the City of Coventry (1). October the 10th 1651, he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity (2). He died October the 22d 1689 (3), and was interred in the Chancel of the ſaid Church of St. Michael (4). He wrote, I. A Sinner's Juſtification by Chriſt: or the Lord Jeſus Chriſt our Righteouſneſs: delivered in ſeveral Sermons on Jer. xxiii. 6. London 1670 in 8vo. II. Meditations upon our Saviour's parable of the prodigal ſon, being ſeveral Sermons on the 15*th chapter of St. Luke's Goſpel.* London 1678 in 4to.

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 837. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 96.

(3) Calamy's Abridgment of Mr. Baxter's Hiſtory of his own times, pag. 360. edit. London 1702.

(4) Wood, Ath. Oxon. col. 838.

eſteemed [B]. He was a Fellow of the Royal Society; and upon the death of Henry Oldenburg Eſq; Secretary of that Society in Auguſt 1678, he continued the publication

[B] He wrote ſeveral works, which are greatly eſteemed. I. Muſæum Regalis Societatis: or a Deſcription of the natural and artificial rarities, belonging to the Royal Society, and preſerved at Greſham College. London 1681 in fol. II. The Comparative Anatomy of Stomachs and Guts begun by Nehemiah Grew, M. D. Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the College of Phyſicians, London 1681 in fol. III. The Anatomy of Plants: with an idea of a Philoſophical Hiſtory of Plants, and ſeveral other Lectures. London 1682 in fol. IV. Obſervations touching the Nature of Snow: printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, Num. 92. pag. 5193. V. The Deſcription and Uſe of the Pores in the Skin of the Hands and Feet: printed in the Philoſophical Tranſactions, Num. 159. pag. 566. for May 1684. VI. Tractatus de Salis Cathartici amari in agris Ebaſhamenſibus & hujuſmodi aliis contenti Naturâ & Uſu. London 1695 in 12°. VII. Coſmologia ſacra: Or a Diſcourſe of the Univerſe as it is the Creature and Kingdom of God: chiefly written to demonſtrate the truth and excellency of the Bible, which contains the Laws of his Kingdom in this lower world. In five books. London 1701 in fol. In the firſt book, which is divided into five chapters, Dr. Grew propoſes to ſhew that God made the corporeal world. In the firſt of theſe chapters he treats of God, whom he defines to be "a neceſſary ſelf-exiſtent, eternal, immenſe, omnipotent, omniſcient, and beſt being; and therefore alſo a being, who is and ought to be eſteemed moſt ſacred and holy; and that as ſuch he is of neceſſity eternally and omnipotently energetic, ſo as to beget the divine images of himſelf, and by theſe to make the world." From the contemplation of God he leads us on to that of the corporeal world, of which he ſays, "That though the world being made, cannot be ſelf-exiſtent, nor therefore eternal, nor any other way infinite; yet being made by God, we are to look upon it in every way of made perfection to be indefinite, ſince we can never define the utmoſt or anſwerable effect of an infinite cauſe." That the world is in this ſenſe made perfect in the whole or in its extent, he tells us, appears partly from the diſtance of the viſible fixed Stars, and partly from the diſtance of thoſe which are viſible only with the help of glaſſes. From this vaſt, and to us unlimited extent of the Univerſe he concludes it to be indefinite; and though it has bounds, as not being infinite, yet thoſe bounds to us are undefinable. He further obſerves, that the world is no more admirable in the whole, than in its parts, and in thoſe innumerable relations which they have to each other, whether thoſe parts are great or little. He treats of the greater bodies, the Planets, in the ſecond chapter; and from the regularity of their motions and their great variety, from the ſubſtance and ſplendor of the Sun, from the command it has over all the primary Planets, and the command theſe have over their Satellites, with ſeveral other noble conſiderations, he infers the unſearchableneſs of the wiſdom of God in this admirable contrivance and furniſhing of the world with ſo many large bodies, the nature of which, with their motions and rotations, we are in a great meaſure ſtrangers to, and cannot fully comprehend. He then proceeds to conſider the leſſer parts of the world, and in the beginning of the third chapter, wherein he treats of the principles of bodies, he ſays, That as there is no Maximum, whereunto we can go, but only God; ſo there is no Minimum, but a point, which hath no dimenſions, but only a Whereneſs, and is next to nothing. For as the whole is extenſible, ſo far the parts are alſo diviſible, both indefinitely, or, as the Mathematicians ſpeak, infinitely, that is, beyond any human obſervation or conception. To prove the infinite diviſibility of matter he produces ſeveral inſtances out of the Mathematics; and then tells us, that the conſideration thereof will enable us to think as we ought of the principles of bodies; which, as they muſt of neceſſity have their dimenſions, and therefore their ſolid figures, ſo withall they may be infinitely ſmall, not only beyond all naked or aſſiſted ſenſe, but beyond all Arithmetical operation or conception. He proceeds next to prove the principles of bodies to be unalterable both in thoſe, which are conſiſtent, and thoſe which are fluid; and alſo regular, which he likewiſe proves in fluids and conſiſtents. And as the principles of bodies taken ſingly are regular, ſo he remarks in his fourth chapter, that in the compoſition of them there is an extraordinary regularity. In the laſt chapter of the firſt book he treats of the uſe of compounded or organized bodies. In the ſecond book, which is divided into eight chapters, he undertakes to ſhew, that there is a vital world, which God hath made, and what it is. In the firſt chapter he treats of Life, and ſhews that there is a Vital Subſtance in nature, diſtinct from a body. He then conſiders the ſeveral ſpecies of life, as they are reducible to three heads, viz. Vegetable Life, Senſe, and Thought. On the firſt of theſe, which is the loweſt ſpecies of life, he beſtows the remaining part of the firſt chapter, and ſhews, that it is that, by which all bodies have their radiations and mutual inclinations, and are in a ſort animated ſo as to make one moiety of the Univerſe. He obſerves, that this is more remarkable in Plants and Animals in their generation and nutrition, and in ſundry of their motions. The next ſpecies of life above the Vegetable is that of Senſe, treated of in the ſecond chapter, where he tells us, "That all ſenſe is "a certain mode of life in a vital ſubſtance anſwer"able to a certain mode of motion in a body; and "that the difference between vegetable and ſenſible "life ſeemeth to be this, that in the former the im"preſſion ariſing from the motion is entirely reflected "and loſt in an inſtant; in the latter it is immerſed "and retained." He remarks further, "that the "modes of motion, on which the modes of ſenſe de"pend, are ſimple or compounded. That the ſimple "are two in general, Magnitude and Celerity, that is, "as any one motion is made in more or leſs ſpace, "or in more or leſs time. That the compounded are "likewiſe two in general, either as one mode of mo"tion is repeated over again, or as ſeveral modes of "magnitude, celerity, or both, are mixed together. "Laſtly, that every motion ſtrong enough to affect "the organ produceth ſome ſenſe; but that all ſenſe, "ſo far as it is grateful, dependeth upon the equality "or the proportionality of the motion or impreſſion "which is made." In the next chapter he obſerves, that the vital principle, which we call Mind, is that which hath the power of thought, diſtinct from ſenſe and above it; and that the two general ſpecies of it are Fantaſtic and Intellectual. Of the former he diſcourſes at large in the whole third chapter, in which he takes notice of the power and uſe of Fancy, which he ſays is great even in brute-animals, in which it is their chief faculty; but ſhews, that the actions, paſſions, and operations in them do not amount to Intellection. He then paſſes on to the Human Fancy; and in this reſpect obſerves, that fancy ſtrictly taken is mind immediately occupied about ſenſible things, and its own ideas of thoſe things. Intellection he defines to be, The operation of the mind about inſenſible things and its own ideas of theſe things. After he has treated of the intellectual mind in general, with its ſeveral acts and the modes of them, he proceeds to an account of the endowments of it, viz. Science, Wiſdom, and Virtue. The third book is divided into ſix chapters, wherein he undertakes to ſhew, that God governs the Univerſe, which he hath made, and in what manner; and in order to this treats, in the firſt chapter, of the nature of God's government, or of Providence. In the ſecond, of the ends of Providence. In the third, of Providence over public States. In the fourth, of the Celeſtial Life. In the fifth, of the Rules of Providence, and firſt of the Law of Nature. In the ſixth, of the poſitive Law. The fourth book is divided into eight chapters, in which he treats, 1. Of the integrity of the Hebrew Code. 2. Of the Truth and Excellency of it, as they appear from foreign proof. 3. As they appear in itſelf. 4. Of the Contents of it, and firſt of the Hiſtory. 5. Of the Miracles. 6. Of the Prophecies. 7. Of the Laws; and firſt of thoſe given to Adam and Noah. 8. Of the Moſaick Law. In the fifth book divided into ſix chapters, he ſhews, that the New Teſtament is likewiſe God's poſitive Law.

T

lication of the Philoſophical Tranſactions from January following, beginning with Number 137, and ending with Number 142 incluſive. Monſieur Le Clerc has given an Abridgment of his Coſmologia ſacra in the Bibliotheque Choiſie (b); and defended ſome of our Author's principles againſt Mr. Bayle (c).

(b) Tome 1. pag. 228, & ſeqq. Tome 2. pag. 352, & ſeqq. and Tome 3. pag. 278, & ſeqq.

(c) Ibid. tome 3. pag. 283, & ſeqq.

GRIBALDUS (MATTHEW), a learned Civilian of Padua, left Italy in the 16th Century, in order to make a public profeſſion of the Proteſtant Religion; but, like ſome other Italians who turned Proteſtants, he imbibed the hereſy of the Anti-trinitarians. After having been Profeſſor of the Civil Law in Tubingen for ſome time, he quitted the employment, in order to eſcape the puniſhment he would have incurred, had he been convicted of his errors. He was ſeized in Berne, where he would have met with very ſevere treatment, had he not feigned to renounce his opinions; and as he relapſed again, and openly favoured the heretics who had been drove from Geneva, and particularly Gentilis, whom he harboured at a country ſeat he poſſeſſed in the neighbourhood (a), he would certainly have been put to death [A], had not the plague, which ſnatched him away in September 1564, ſecured him from being proſecuted for hereſy. In a journey he made to Geneva, during the trial of Servetus, he deſired to have a conference with Calvin, but was not allowed that advantage. Some time after Calvin ſent him word that he would admit him to a conference, at which his collegues, together with three antients of the conſiſtory ſhould aſſiſt. Gribaldus came to the place appointed, but left it abruptly, when he found that Calvin refuſed to give him his hand. He would not hear the excuſes which were made to him, viz. that Calvin could not give him his hand in an amicable way, till after they ſhould be agreed (b) on the principles of faith, viz. the Trinity, and the Divinity of Chriſt (c). He was cited to appear before the Magiſtrates, in order to give an account of his faith; and as his anſwers were not found agreeable, he was commanded to leave the City. This may be inferred from the letter I now quote (d). He wrote ſeveral works which are eſteemed by the Public [B].

(a) Erat Fargiarum Dominus. Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1555, & Bibliotth. Antitrinit. pag. 17.

(b) Confer quæ Sylla erga Mithridatem, apud Plutarchum in Sylla, pag. 467.

(c) See the remark [C].

(d) It is the 238th of Calvin's Letters. It is dated the 2d of May 1557.

[A] He would certainly have been put to death.] I only ſpeak this after Beza, whoſe words, which prove ſeveral of the aſſertions I have here advanced, are as follow. Domi verò Serveti cineres pullulare cœperunt; cujus blaſphemiis favere deprehenſus Matthæus Gribaldus, non incelebris juriſconſultus, quum Genevam fortè veniſſet .... deductus ad Calvinum à quibuſdam Italis, quos Patavii docuerat, recuſante Calvino dextram illi porrigere, niſi prius de primario Chriſtianæ fidei articulo, id eſt de ſacra Triade & Deitate Chriſti inter eos conveniret, nullum poſtea locum ullis admonitionibus vel argumentis reliquit. Itaque quod ei jam tum prædixit Calvinus, grave nimirum Dei judicium pertinaci ipſius impietati imminere, hoc reipſa poſtea expertus eſt, Tubinga primum profugus, quò fuerat Vergerii favore introductus: Bernæ poſtea captus, ſimulatâque abnegatione liberatus, ad ingenium poſtea rediens, & Gentilis illius de quo mox dicemus fautor & hoſpes, ſuperveniente demum peſte correptus, paratum ſibi in terris ſupplicium antevertit (1). i. e. "The aſhes of Servetus began to "riſe up again, at home: for Matthew Gribaldus, an "eminent Civilian, who was found to favour the blaſ"phemous tenets of that man, arriving accidentally "at Geneva ... was introduced to Calvin by ſome "Italian Gentlemen who had been his pupils in Pa"dua; but upon Calvin's refuſing to put forth his "hand to him in an amicable way, till they ſhould "be firſt agreed on the chief article of the Chriſtian "Faith, the holy Trinity and Divinity of Chriſt, he "left no farther room for admonitions or arguments. "Gribaldus afterwards, as Calvin then foretold him, "experienced the judgment of God on his obſtinate "impiety, being drove firſt out of Tubingen, where "he had been introduced by the favour of Vergerius; "being afterwards ſeized in Berne, he was releaſed on "a pretended recantation, but returning to the ſame "opinions, and patronizing and entertaining Gentilis, "of whom I ſhall ſoon ſpeak, he was infected with "the plague, and by that means prevented the pu"niſhment which was prepared for him in this world." We don't here find the year in which Gribaldus died, but it is known that he was dead when Valentinus Gentilis went to viſit him in the territories of the Canton of Berne, anno 1566 (2), and there are proofs that he died in September 1564 (3). See a paſſage of Languet at the end of the remark [E] of the Article GOVEA.

(1) Beza, in Vita Calvini, ad ann. 1555, pag. m. 378. See alſo Calvin's 238th Letrer, pag. m. 440.

(2) Veluti tradente illum ad pœnam ipſius Chriſti manu in Sabaudiam ad ſuum Gribaldum venit (Gentilis.) At illam peſtem altera jam peſtis ſuſtulerat. Idem, ibid. pag. 308.

[B] Gribaldus wrote ſeveral Works.] Their titles are as follow: Commentarii in legem de rerum miſtura, & de jure fiſci. Theſe were printed in Italy (4). Commentarii in Pandectas Juris, printed at Lions. Commentarii in aliquot præcipuos Digeſti, Infortiati novi, & Codicis Juſtiniani titulos atque leges utiliſſimis concluſionibus illuſtrati, at Frankfort 1577 in folio. Hiſtoria Franciſci Spiræ (cui anno 1548 familiaris aderat) ſecundum quæ ipſe vidit & audivit, Baſil 1550. De omni genere homicidii, at Spire 1583, 8vo. De methodo ac ratione ſtudendi in jure civili libri tres, Lions 1544 and 1556. It is very probable in this laſt piece that he aſſerted, that a Civilian ought to be ſkilled in Hiſtory; and pointed out the errors which ſome Civilians have committed thro' ignorance (5). He wrote this Book in a week (6).

(3) Beza's preface prefixed to Calvin's Commentary on Joſhua, pag. m. 24.

(4) See the Bibliotheca Antitrinitariorum, pag. 18. and the Bodleian Catalogue.

(5) See Albricus Gentilis, de Juris Interpretibus, folio 54 verſo.

It is to be obſerved that Sleidan declares, that Gribaldus was a ſpectator of the ſad condition of Spira, and that he wrote and publiſh'd an account of it. Multi præterea Spiram in eo ſtatu viderunt, magni nominis viri, & in his, Matthæus Gribaldus, Jureconſultus Patavinus, qui & rem omnem, quam ipſe coram vidit & audivit, ſcripto complexus, in lucem edidit (7).

(6) Idem, ibid. folio 65.

(7) Sleidan. lib. 11. fol. m. 590.

GRILLON, a Gentleman of Provence, one of the moſt valiant men of his age, in the reign of Henry III and Henry IV. See his hiſtory in Varillas's Preface to the Life of Henry III. This Hiſtorian always calls him Crillon, which is the true orthography of his name, although unknown to moſt authors (α).

§ (α) This Gentleman uſed to ſign his name Crillon, agreeably to the orthography of the antient records of his family; but he probably called himſelf Grillon, in like manner as, notwithſtanding the etymology, we pronounce gril, grotte, migraine. REM. CRIT.

☞GRINDAL (EDMUND), Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the ſixteenth Century, was born about the year 1519 in a little angle of the County of Cumberland, called Cowpland or Copland, in the pariſh of St. Beghs. Having paſſed through his grammar ſtudies, he was ſent to the Univerſity of Cambridge, where he was firſt entered into Magdalen

Magdalen College, and afterwards became a member of Chriſt's College, and thence was removed to Pembroke Hall, of which he was choſen Fellow in 1538. In 1541 he took the degree of Maſter of Arts, and in 1548 was declared Proctor of the Univerſity (a). Before he was taken notice of in the Church, he made a figure in the Univerſity, as one of the ripeſt wits and learnedſt men there (b) [A]. In 1549, being now Bachelor of Divinity, he was admitted the Lady Margaret's public Preacher in Cambridge. In 1550 he became Chaplain to Dr. Ridley, Biſhop of London; and on the 24th of Auguſt 1551 was collated to the Chantorſhip of the Cathedral of St. Paul's. In December the ſame year he was appointed one of the King's Chaplains [B]. In July 1552 he had a grant of a Prebend of Weſtminſter for life (c). In November following he was nominated for a Biſhopric in the North, but did not obtain it [C]. Upon the death of King Edward VI in 1553 he retired into Germany, to avoid the perſecution under Queen Mary, and ſettled at Straſburg, and applied himſelf to learn the German language, in order that he might preach in the Churches there. In 1554 he was engaged in the diſputes amongſt the Engliſh at Francfort concerning a new model and form of worſhip, varying from the laſt corrected Liturgy under King Edward VI. He was employed likewiſe in collecting the writings and accounts of the ſufferers in England for the Proteſtant Religion, and aſſiſting Mr. John Fox in his Martyrology (d). Upon the death of Queen Mary in 1558 he returned to England, and was employed in the Reformation of Religion, and in a public diſputation againſt the Popiſh Prelates. He was likewiſe one of her Majeſty's Commiſſioners in the North for the Royal Viſitation to require the oath of ſupremacy, to inſpect Cathedrals and the manners of the Clergy, &c. In 1559 he was made Maſter of Pembroke Hall in Cambridge; and the ſame year he was nominated to the Biſhopric of London; but labouring under ſome ſcruples with regard to the habits and certain ceremonies required to be uſed by ſuch as were Biſhops, he conſulted Peter Martyr, then Profeſſor of Divinity at Zurich in Swiſſerland [D]; and at (a) Life of Archbiſhop Grindal, by John Strype, M. A. pag. 1-4. edit. London 1710, in fol.

(b) Idem, pag. 308.

(c) Idem, pag. 5, 6, 7.

(d) Idem, pag. 7-22.

[A] Before he was taken notice of in the Church, he made a figure in the Univerſity as one of the ripeſt Wits and learnedeſt Men there.] When an extraordinary Act was commenced in the year 1549 for the entertainment of King Edward VI's viſitors there, viz. Goodrich Biſhop of Ely, Ridley Biſhop of Rocheſter, Sir William Paget, Sir Thomas Smith, Sir John Cheke, Dr. Mey, and Dr. Wendey, all very learned Men, and the queſtions to be diſputed were, "Whether Tranſubſtantiation could be proved by plain and manifeſt words of Scripture: And, Whether it might be collected and confirmed by the conſent of Fathers for theſe thouſand years paſt (1):" at this diſputation one of the four ſelected out of the whole Univerſity, who aſſerted the negative, was our Grindal, then Fellow of Pembroke Hall; the other three Diſputants being Pern, Gueſt, and Pilkington (2).

(1) Fuller's Hiſtory of the Univerſity of Cambridge, pag. 127. Mr. Strype, who miſtakes in quoting Fuller's Church Hiſtory for this paſſage, thinks theſe laſt words ſhould rather be, for a thouſand years after Chriſt. See Strype's Life of Grindal, pag. 5.

[B] In December the ſame year he was appointed one of the King's Chaplains.] A reſolution was taken by the King's Council, that the King ſhould retain ſix Chaplains, whoſe employment was thus fixed. Two of them were always to be with his Majeſty in waiting; and the other four to be ſent over the Kingdom, eſpecially the remoter Counties, to preach to the common people, and to inſtruct them in the principles of true Religion and Obedience to their Prince. Theſe ſix were afterwards reduced to four; and Grindal was one of theſe, the others being Dr. Bill, Dr. Harley, afterwards Biſhop of Hereford, and Dr. Pern. Their annual ſalaries were 40 l. each (3).

(2) Fuller, ubi ſupra, and Strype, pag. 5.

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 7.

[C] In November following he was nominated for a Biſhopric in the North, but did not obtain it.] What this Northern Biſhopric was, we are left to conjecture. It was concluded in the year 1552 by the King and his Council, that the Biſhopric of Durham, then void by the deprivation of Dr. Cuthbert Tonſtal, ſhould be divided into two. And conſideration was now had of placing fit men in them, as appears by the King's Memorial publiſhed by Mr. Strype in the Life of Archbiſhop Cranmer (4). It is very probable, that Mr. Grindal being a North-Countryman, was pitched upon for one of theſe Biſhops. The date likewiſe agrees very well with this ſuppoſition; for the King's Memorial was written in October 1552, and Biſhop Ridley's Letter to Sir John Gate, Vice-Chamberlain, and Sir William Cecil, Secretary of State, wherein is mentioned this nomination of Mr. Grindal to a Northern Biſhopric, was dated juſt the month after. "But all this, ſays Mr. Strype (5), came to nothing, there being then a great topping Courtier, that put an end to this pious purpoſe of ſupplying thoſe parts, where ignorance and ſuperſtition moſt prevailed, with two Biſhops. For by his ſway he got the whole Biſhopric diſſolved, and ſettled as a temporal eſtate upon himſelf."

(4) Lib. 2. cap. 3.

(5) Life of Archbiſhop Grindal, pag. 8.

[D] Labouring under ſome ſcruples with regard to the habits and certain ceremonies required to be uſed by ſuch as were Biſhops, he conſulted Peter Martyr, then Profeſſor of Divinity at Zurich in Swiſſerland.] He wrote a Letter to Martyr in Auguſt 1559, which came to his hands in October following. In that Letter Grindal communicated to his friend his doubts, deſiring his ſpeedy reſolution of them, that he might, according to the light which he ſhould give him, accept the Epiſcopal Office, or refuſe it. One of theſe doubts was concerning Impropriations, which were to be annexed to Biſhoprics. For the Queen now, chiefly to gratify ſome of her Courtiers, made exchanges with her Biſhops, by the authority of a late Act of Parliament, taking to herſelf their antient good Manours and Lordſhips, and making over to them in exchange Tithes and Impropriations. This was extremely regretted by thoſe firſt Biſhops, who ſcrupled whether they ſhould comply in a point ſo injurious to the revenue of their reſpective Sees, which muſt ſuffer conſiderably by theſe exchanges, and by which all hope would be cut off of reſtoring the Tithes ſo long unjuſtly detained from the reſpective Churches, for the maintenance of the incumbents. Another point, at which Grindal ſtuck, was wearing certain peculiar garments, whether extra ſacra, or in ſacris. Peter Martyr in the beginning of November wrote him an Anſwer. And firſt with regard to Impropriations, he thought that Grindal had no occaſion to be ſollicitous; ſince it was a thing not in his power, whence or how the Queen thought proper to provide a ſupport for her Biſhops and the Pariſh Miniſters. With reſpect to wearing a cap whether round or ſquare, and a gown upon ordinary occaſions, when they were not employed about holy things, his judgment was, that they ſhould not diſpute more than was neceſſary about them, ſince ſuperſtition ſeemed not properly concerned in them. But as for the habits to be uſed in the Miniſtry of holy things, ſince they carried an appearance of the Maſs, and were mere remains of Popery, he obſerved, that it was the opinion of Bullinger, the chief Miniſter of Zurich, that they were to be refrained from by Grindal, leſt by his example a thing, which was ſcandalous, ſhould be confirmed. But Martyr ſaid, that tho' he was always againſt the uſe of ſuch ornaments, yet he ſaw the preſent danger, leſt they ſhould be excluded the office of preaching; and that perhaps there might be ſome hopes, that as altars and images were already taken away, ſo thoſe appearances of the Maſs at last accepted of the See of London, to which he was consecrated December the 21st 1559 (e). In 1560 he was made one of the Queen's Ecclesiastical Commissioners (f). In August the same year he received an order from Archbishop Parker to forbear ordaining any more artificers, and others, who had been in secular employments, and were unlearned; which the Bishops had been obliged to do at first, when these persons were qualified with sobriety and religion and skill in reading, for the supply of the vacant Churches (g). The same year he in conjunction with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishop of Ely, wrote a letter to the Queen to persuade her to marry (h). In 1561 he held his primary visitation of his Diocese (i). In 1563 he assisted the English Merchants in their settlement at Embden in East-Frizeland (k). The same year he wrote Animadversions upon Justus Velsius's Christiani Hominis Norma [E]. In 1564 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity at Cambridge (l); and the same year, agreeably to the Queen's letter to him, he began to press the Clergy to Uniformity [F]. October the 3d the same year he

(e) Idem, pag. 22-23.

(f) Idem, pag. 39.

(g) Idem, pag. 40.

(h) Idem, pag. 41.

(i) Idem, pag. 58, & seqq.

(k) Idem, pag. 86, 87, 88, 89.

(l) Idem, pag. 94, 95.

might in time be likewise removed, if Mr. Grindal and others, who had taken upon them Episcopacy, would use their endeavours. But notwithstanding if it came not to good effect, yet, if he should decline the office, another might succeed in his place, who would not care to have those relicks rejected, but perhaps would rather defend, cherish, and maintain them. He was therefore, he said, more backward to advise him rather to refuse the Bishopric than to submit to the use of the vestments. But because he saw that scandals of that kind were by all means to be avoided, he more easily had yielded to Bullinger's opinion abovementioned. But if altars and images had been continued and preserved, then he plainly thought, as he had written in other Letters, that Grindal ought not by any means to engage in the Episcopal Office. In general he advised him to do nothing against his conscience. He acknowledged the questions, which he sent him, had difficulty in them; and therefore excused himself, that he had no sooner imparted his Counsel, since it could not so easily be given. He added, that when he was at Oxford, though he was a Canon, he would never wear a surplice in the Choir. He knew that his example was no just confirmation of Grindal; but that which moved him then, and still did, might perhaps have some force with him, viz. that that was not to be done, which might confirm the practice of what his conscience did not approve. The same year in October and November Mr. Grindal wrote other Letters to Martyr for his advice. One of his questions was, Whether seeing he was not left at liberty with regard to the vestments, he shonld accept of the Episcopal Function offered him, because of the imposition of the matters abovementioned? Martyr's Answer came too late; for Grindal had accepted of the Bishopric before he received it. But Martyr's advice was agreeable to what Grindal had done, that he should not decline it, because of the great want of Ministers (6).

(6) Ibid. pag. 28, 29, 30.

[E] He wrote Animadversions upon Justus Velsius's Christiani Hominis Norma.] This Velsius was of the Hague in Holland, a man of learning, but enthusiastical, and held some peculiar opinions, and had several followers and admirers. He drew up at London a Summary of his Religion under this title, Christiani Hominis Norma, ad quam se explorare perpetuo quivis debet: i. e. "The Rule of a Christian Man, according to which every one ought continually to try "himself." It was composed by way of question and answer. The first question was, What is a Christian? The answer to which was, One, who by participation and grace is rendered, and to be rendered, that which Christ was, and is, of himself, and by nature. The next question was, What Christ was and is of himself and by nature? To which is answered, God in Man, and afterwards Man-God. Velsius affirmed likewise in this piece, that while the Word was made flesh and dwelt in us, he brought down God from Heaven to us, joined and united him to our passible nature. And that by his glorious Resurrection the Flesh was made the Word, and dwelt in God, and lifted up man to God. He spoke of a double Regeneration, one of the internal man, and the other of the external; and asserted, that the one made Christians God in Man in this world, and the other made them Men-Gods in the world to come. Mr. Strype has published this piece in the Appendix N°. VIII. to the first Book of his Life of Grindal. In March Velsius wrote bold Letters to Sir William Cecil the Secretary, and to the Queen herself, sending likewise his Norma to them; which he had also done two months before to our Bishop; who thought fit, upon the Secretary's advice to write animadversions upon that piece, extant in the Paper-Office, and published by Mr. Strype in the Appendix N°. IX. to the first Book of his Life of our Bishop. Velsius fancied himself endued with the Spirit of Prophecy, and that Christ dwelt in him. By this authority he took upon him to denounce judgments upon persons and places, and particularly upon the Queen and the Kingdom in his Letter to her, unless she and her subjects received his doctrine. He solemnly by a writing excommunicated Peter Delæne, Minister of the Dutch Congregation in London, and delivered him up to Satan, because he would not allow of a challenge to a public disputation, which he made to one Nicholas a Preacher there. Velsius being cited before the Ecclesiastical Commission, Bishop Grindal, the Bishop of Winchester, and the Dean of St. Paul's, represented to him the erroneous doctrine of his Norma, which he obstinately defending, they at last charged him in the Queen's name to depart the Kingdom. This he complained of in very rude terms to the Queen, telling her, that he could not obey their order, pretending some miracle from God to confirm his doctrine (7).

(7) Ibid. pag. 91, 92, 93, 94.

[F] Agreeably to the Queen's Letter to him, he began to press the Clergy to Uniformity.] Hitherto an Agreement and Uniformity among the Clergy in wearing the same habits, and using the same Rites in divine service, was neglected, especially in London, not a few rejecting the orders of the Book of Common Prayer. And the plague of late spreading itself in London and other places, the Bishops could not take that cognizance, and exercise the discipline requisite for this purpose. But towards the latter end of this year by a peremptory command from the Queen to the Archbishop of Canterbury, uniformity in the habits and ceremonies were required of the Clergy; whereas many hitherto, she said, had taken a liberty of varying from her injunctions in this regard. The Archbishop therefore having this order, immediately dispatched his Letter to our Bishop to signify the Queen's mind and resolution to the rest of the Bishops of the Province; and that they should see the Laws and Ordinances already established, set forth and complied with every where, and to send up those of their Clergy, who were incompliant. The greatest difficulty was to correct these neglects in London, where there were many, who wore neither surplice, tippet, nor square cap, and did not use the other ceremonies prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. This work was incumbent upon our Bishop, who found great difficulty in redressing these matters among the City Ministers, after whose example the Clergy in the other parts of the Nation would be apt to govern themselves. So that throughout this and some part of the next year Bishop Grindal frequently sate in Ecclesiastical Commission with the Archbishop and other Commissioners, for the regulating the City Clergy, and trying by all gentle methods to bring them to conformity. The Bishop reduced many to compliance, but some were deprived. "A work in truth, says Mr. "Strype (8), this was, the Bishop went tenderly about, "knowing the scarcity of Ministers at that time; "and therefore used all gentleness and meekness with "them. But afterwards observing the ignorance and "obstinacy of some, and the dangerous principles of "others, striking at the very Ecclesiastical Order it-"self; he proceeded with more resolution." In the beginning

(8) Ibid. pag. 97.

he preached at St. Paul's at the celebration of the Emperor Ferdinand's funeral, and his ſermon was afterwards printed (m). In 1566 he again urged his Clergy to Conformity, and wrote to Bullinger and Jerom Zanchy upon this matter. In 1567 he convented ſome Separatiſts before him [G]; and prohibited unlicenſed Preachers (n). In beginning of this work the Archbiſhop of Canterbury thought fit to excite and quicken our Biſhop now and then, to ſet diligently upon reforming his London Clergy, as he was otherwiſe ſlow in his proceedings againſt them. And by the Secretary's means the Archbiſhop procured a ſpecial Letter from the Queen to him to look particularly after Uniformity in thoſe under his charge in London; which accordingly, ſeeing the neceſſity of it, he did. In January the plague abating, Archdeacon Mullins, by the Biſhop's Commiſſion, viſited at Sepulchre's Church; whither the Miniſters being cited and appearing, he ſignified to them the Queen's pleaſure, which was, that all perſons in holy Orders ſhould wear the ſquare cap, ſurplice, and gown; and required them to ſubſcribe their hands, that they would obſerve thoſe directions. Accordingly an hundred and one, all Miniſters of London, ſubſcribed, and eight only refuſed. On the 24th of March following this reformation in Miniſters habits began, when the uſe of the ſcholars gown and cap were enjoined from that day forward; and the ſurplice to be worn at all divine Adminiſtrations, and the Book of Common-Prayer to be obſerved, agreeably to the Statute and the Rubric of the ſaid Book. And ſubſcription of all this was required; or elſe a ſequeſtration was immediately to follow, and after three months refuſal, deprivation ipſo facto. Many upon this were ſequeſtered, and afterwards ſome depoſed and deprived. Among theſe the principal were Dr. Turner Dean of Wells, who had revived the conteſt by a Book written, and copied, and diſperſed abroad; Mr. Whitehead, Mr. Brakelſby, Mr. Allen, and Mr. Wyburn. Mr. Whittenham or Whittingham, and Mr. Becon refuſed at firſt, but afterwards ſubſcribed, and were preferred; as were others, who did the like. The number of thoſe, who appeared at Lambeth on the 24th of March before the Archbiſhop, the Biſhop of London, and others of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion, were one hundred and forty, of whom thirty did not ſubſcribe. But ſeveral of them afterwards complied and ſubſcribed. Many of thoſe, who were ſuſpended and deprived, were ſuch as had wives and children, who, upon theſe cenſures, laboured under great poverty. Some of thoſe, who were deprived, betook themſelves to ſecular employments, as did one Sheriff; ſome to huſbandry, as Allen and Wyburn. Some went beyond Sea; and theſe were Papiſts chiefly, for among theſe non-ſubſcribers were ſome Papiſts. Some had favour ſhewn them upon the requeſts of noble and eminent perſons. And ſome were afterwards put into priſons for their diſobedience (9). In 1566 the London Clergy, tho' they had been before ſo vigorouſly excited to conformity, were, many of them, ſtill backward towards it; ſo that the Archbiſhop warned our Biſhop in this matter, and giving him notice of a ſeſſion of the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion at Lambeth, adviſed him to be there, and the rather, in order to the dealing with ſome Miniſters of his own Dioceſe. The Biſhop ſoon after ſitting in Commiſſion at Lambeth with the Archbiſhop and others, all the London Miniſters, who had been cited before, now made their perſonal appearance, and were aſked, whether they would conform themſelves to the Eccleſiaſtical Orders preſcribed. Sixty one promiſed; and thirty ſeven denied, who were immediately ſequeſtered and ſuſpended ab officio, and within three months after to be actually deprived, unleſs they would comply. Within that time many ſubmitted, but ſome were deprived. The Archbiſhop now ſupported this attempt for Conformity by a Book, called, The Book of Advertiſements, which conſiſted of divers articles, which the Clergy ſhould be obliged to obſerve, by virtue of a Letter from the Queen. Theſe articles were, for their doctrine and preaching, for adminiſtration of Prayers and Sacraments, for certain Orders in Eccleſiaſtical Policy, for outward apparel of Perſons Eccleſiaſtical; with a proteſtation to be made, promiſed, and preſcribed by the ſaid perſons, as not to preach without licence, to uſe ſobriety in apparel according to order; and to obſerve and keep order and uniformity in all external policy, rites, and ceremonies of the Church, as by laws and good uſages were already provided and eſtabliſhed.

(m) Idem, pag. 99-106.

(n) Idem, pag. 120, 121.

(9) Ibid. pag. 98, 99.

This Book of Advertiſements the Archbiſhop ſent to Biſhop Grindal, that copies thereof might be diſperſed and conveyed to all Biſhops, to ſee them duly executed. He likewiſe required the Biſhop to be diligent in puniſhing all Recuſants in his Dioceſe by cenſures eccleſiaſtical, ſince the Biſhops had power and authority by Act of Parliament to uſe them. And this the Archbiſhop required and charged him to do, as he would anſwer it to God. The Archbiſhop, ſays Mr. Strype (10), thought fit now and then thus to call upon our Biſhop, who was not forward to uſe extremities. And becauſe of this the Puritan party confided much in him, and gave out, that my Lord of London was their own, and all that he did was upon a force and unwillingly, as they flattered themſelves. However Biſhop Grindal was not wanting in his endeavours to bring over the Nonconformiſts to be ſatisfied with what was enjoined. And among other means he publiſhed a Letter of Henry Bullinger, the chief Miniſter in Swiſſerland, addreſſed to him and two other Biſhops, viz. Dr. Horn of Wincheſter, and Dr. Parkhurſt of Norwich, concerning the lawfulneſs of wearing the habits; but drawn up for the ſatisfaction of Samſon and Humfrey, two Oxford Divines of great eminence, the former Dean of Chriſt Church, and the latter Preſident of Magdalen College. "The letter was written with ſuch a clearneſs "of reaſon, ſuch evidence from Scripture, and in "ſuch a fatherly compaſſionate ſtyle; that it had a "very good effect upon many, that before were "ready to leave their miniſtry; but having read it, "were ſatisfied (11)." This Mr. Strype collects from a letter of Biſhop Grindal to Bullinger, written in Auguſt 1566, the original of which is ſtill extant at Zurich with many others from our Biſhop in thoſe times ſent to the learned men there. In this letter the Biſhop related, "How ſome Miniſters, as "Samſon and Humfrey, continued incompliant, and "that the Queen was highly offended with them. "But that if they ſhould comply, it would be eaſy "to reconcile them to her. But otherwiſe they, the "Biſhops, could prevail little with her to give them "countenance. That many of the common ſort had "taken up reſolutions to ſeparate from the national "Church, and had ſet up meetings diſtinct by themſelves. But that now of late the greater part were "come to a better mind, to which his (Bullinger's) "letter had greatly contributed. He added, that "when the Biſhops, who had been exiles in Germany, "could not perſuade the Queen and Parliament to "remove theſe habits out of the Church, though they "had long endeavoured it, by common conſent they "thought it beſt not to leave the Church for ſome "rites, which were not many, nor in themſelves "wicked; eſpecially ſince the purity of the Goſpel "remained ſafe and free to them. Nor had they to "this preſent time repented themſelves of this counſel. "For their Churches, God giving the increaſe, were "augmented much, which otherwiſe had been a prey "to Lutherans and Semi-Papiſts.

(10) Pag. 105.

(11) Ibid. pag. 105.

(12) Pag. 114.

[G] In 1565 he convented ſome Separatiſts before him.] Mr. Strype obſerves (12), that the refuſers of the orders of the Church, who by this time were commonly called Puritans, were now grown into two factions. The one was of a more quiet and peaceable demeanor, who indeed would not uſe the habits, nor ſubſcribe to the ceremonies enjoined, as kneeling at the Sacrament, the Croſs in Baptiſm, the Ring in Marriage; but held the communion of the Church, and willingly and devoutly joined with the common prayers. But another ſort there was, who diſliked the whole conſtitution of the Church lately reformed, charging upon it many groſs remainders of Popery, and that it was ſtill full of corruptions not to be tolerated, and Antichriſtian; and eſpecially the habits, which the Clergy were enjoined to uſe upon ordinary occaſions and in their miniſtration. Theſe latter ſeparated themſelves into private aſſemblies, meeting together not in Churches, but in private houſes, where they had Miniſters of their own. At theſe meetings they rejecting wholly the Book of Com-

(o) Idem, pag. 120, 121.
(p) Idem, pag. 135, 136.
(q) Idem, pag. 161.
(r) Idem, pag. 165, & ſeqq.
(s) Idem, pag. 181, 182.
(t) Idem, pag. 190-193.
(u) Idem, pag. 193, & ſeqq.
(w) Idem, pag. 211, & ſeqq.
(x) Idem, pag. 217.

In 1568 he made ſearch for ſtrangers, eſpecially thoſe who maintained Anabaptiſtical principles, againſt whom a proclamation was publiſhed by her Majeſty, forbidding all ſecret congregations (o). In 1569 he procured the liberty of ſeveral Puritan Separatiſts, who had been in priſon (p). The ſame year he was complained of to the Privy Council by the Separatiſts in London; which occaſioned him to write a vindication of himſelf to the Council [H]. May the 1ſt 1570 he was tranſlated to the Archbiſhoprick of York (q); and May the 15th 1571 began his Metropolitical Viſitation, and gave forth his own injunctions to the Clergy and Laity, conſiſting of twenty five articles, in which he ſhewed a great zeal for the diſcipline and good government of the Church (r). In 1572 he wrote to the Queen for the renewing the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſion (s); and in 1573 he interceded for the Clergy oppreſſed by concealments [I]. In May 1574 he rejected a Clerk, who came for inſtitution, on account of his ignorance [K]. Upon the death of Dr. Matthew Parker in 1575 he was advanced to the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, in which he was confirmed February the 15th (t). The ſame year a Convocation of the Province of Canterbury was held under him (u). May the 16th 1576 he began his Metropolitical Viſitation (w), and applied himſelf to the Reformation of his Courts (x). The ſame year he fell under her Majeſty's diſpleaſure, on account of his favouring the Exerciſes or Propheſyings [L]; upon which he was ſequeſtered from his office.

mon Prayer, uſed a book of prayers framed at Geneva for the congregation of Engliſh Exiles lately ſojourning there. This book had been reviſed and allowed by Calvin and the reſt of the Divines there, and indeed was for the moſt part taken out of the Geneva form. At theſe private congregations they had not only Prayers and Sermons, but the Lord's Supper likewiſe ſometimes adminiſtred. This gave great offence to the Queen, who iſſued out her letters to the Eccleſiaſtical Commiſſioners, which letters were ſubſcribed by the Privy Council, and were to this effect; that they ſhould move theſe Nonconformiſts by gentle means to conformity, or elſe for their firſt puniſhment to loſe their freedom of the City, and afterwards to ſuffer what would follow. About an hundred of theſe Separatiſts having hired Plummers Hall, upon pretence of keeping a wedding there, but in reality for a religious meeting, on the 19th of June, they were diſturbed by the Sheriffs, and about fourteen or fifteen of the chief of them ſeized, and examined the next day before the Lord Mayor, the Biſhop of London, and others of the Queen's Commiſſioners. The Biſhop argued with them with great mildneſs, but was treated by ſome of them with reproaches and rude language; inſomuch, ſays Mr. Strype (13), that much notice was taken of it; and finding them ſo irreclaimable, it abated much of the favour, which he was inclinable to ſhew them. Beza, the chief Miniſter of Geneva, otherwiſe a great favourer of this ſort of men, liked not of their behaviour, and ſignified his diſallowance of it in an Epiſtle to this our Biſhop, wherein he commended his lenity and his patience. They were very ſevere upon him afterwards in their prints by ſtandering of him in a moſt high manner. And therefore it is the leſs wonder, that this mild and patient man was ſome years after provoked (obſerving alſo their unquiet diſpoſition) to expreſs himſelf ſomewhat ſeverely againſt them.

(13) Pag. 119.

[H] The ſame year he was complained of to the Privy Council by the Separatiſts in London, which occaſioned him to write a Vindication of himſelf to the Council.] In his Letter to the Council, dated January the 4th 1569, he writes thus: "Mine opinion is, "that all the heads of this unhappy faction ſhould "be with all expedition ſeverely puniſhed to the ex"ample of others, as people phanatical and incura"ble; which puniſhment, if it proceed by order of "your Lordſhips, ſhall breed the greater terror. "And becauſe all priſoners for any colour of any Re"ligion, be it never ſo wicked, find great ſupporta"tion and comfort in London, in my opinion (under "your Lordſhips correction) it were not amiſs, that "ſix of the moſt deſperate of them ſhould be ſent to "the common goal of Cambridge, and ſix likewiſe to "Oxford, and ſome other of them to other goals near "hereabouts, as to your wiſdoms ſhall be thought ex"pedient."

[I] In 1573 he interceded for the Clergy oppreſſed by concealments.] He had obſerved great abuſes offered to the Clergy of his dioceſe by a company of neceſſitous unjuſt men, who pretended commiſſions from the Queen to recover from them penalties incurred. Her Majeſty had indeed by her Letters Patents to her Gentlemen Penſioners granted the penalties forfeited by the Clergy, under pretence of concealment of lands and rents given for ſuperſtitious uſes, belonging now by Act of Parliament to the Crown. Upon this they ſent Deputies through the Kingdom, who being indigent men uſed great extortion, and extremely oppreſſed the Clergy. This occaſioned our Archbiſhop to make complaint thereof to the Lord Treaſurer; who, though he approved not of the thing it ſelf, yet the Letters Patents being paſſed, wrote back to the Archbiſhop, that the Gentlemen Penſioners might enjoy the penalties forfeited by the Clergy, ſince it was ſo appointed by the Queen, and beſtowed upon them. The Archbiſhop then ſhewed his Lordſhip, that he intended not that they ſhould be abridged of it, but that he found fault with their manner of proceeding, which was troubleſome, chargeable, and diſhonourable, ſince they ſummoned all the Clergy as well innocent as faulty, as others of good reputation, to appear before them, as the Queen's Commiſſioners, whereas they had no ſuch Commiſſion; and that they compounded with the Clergy for offences paſt and to come; which tended not to the reſtraint of abuſes, but was rather a means to encreaſe them. And laſtly, that they were men noted formerly for evil dealing and bribery. He deſired therefore, that for the preventing of theſe troubles, the Gentlemen Penſioners would ſend him down in articles a form of proceeding to be obſerved by their Deputies, by which the inconveniences abovementioned might be avoided (14).

(14) Idem, pag. 182, 183.

[K] In May 1574 he rejected a Clerk, who came for inſtitution, on account of his ignorance.] Mr. Strype mentions this ſtory (15), to ſhew what groſs ignorance ſometimes ſuch as pretended to ſerve God in his Church, were in theſe times guilty of. One William Ireland was preſented to the Rectory of Harthil, who coming to the Archbiſhop, was examined by the Archbiſhop's Chaplain. In his preſentation were theſe words, Veſtri humiles & obedientes, which the Chaplain requiring him to tranſlate, in order to know how well he was ſkilled in Latin, he expounded them, Your Holineſs and Obedience. The Chaplain aſked him again, who brought up the people of Iſrael out of Egypt? He anſwered, King Saul. And being aſked, who was firſt circumciſed, he could not anſwer. Upon this the Archbiſhop rejected him; and one Hugh Caſſon was preſented to and obtained the benefice of Harthil, and lived to the year 1624, and ſo was Rector there fifty years.

(15) Ibid. pag. 188.

[L] The ſame year he fell under her Majeſty's diſpleaſure, on account of his favouring the Exerciſes or Propheſyings.] The method of theſe Propheſyings was thus. The Miniſters of a particular diviſion at a ſet time met together in ſome Church belonging to a market-town, or other large town; and there each in their order explained, according to their ability, ſome office. In 1579 we find him at Croyden, where he conſecrated Dr. John Wolton Biſhop of Exeter; ſo that either his confinement was taken off, or elſe he had leave for the ſake of his health to retire to his houſe there (y). In 1580 he conſecrated Dr. John Watſon and Dr. Will. Overton to the Sees of Wincheſter and Coventry and Lichfield (z). The Convocation held this year petitioned her Majeſty in favour of the Archbiſhop; but in vain (aa). In 1582 his ſequeſtration appears to be taken off, which probably might be occaſioned by a ſubmiſſion made by him (bb). In the latter end of the ſame year he loſt all hopes of recovering his ſight, which had failed before; upon which, at his deſire, the Queen gave him leave to reſign his See, granting him a penſion for life. He died July the 6th 1583, aged ſixty three (cc), and was interred in the Chancel of the Church

(y) Idem, pag. 242.

(z) Idem, pag. 256.

(aa) Idem, pag. 257.

(bb) Idem, pag. 269, 270.

(cc) Idem, pag. 289.

ſome particular portion of Scripture allotted them before. And after all of them had done, a moderator, who was one of the graveſt and beſt learned amongſt them, made his obſervations upon what the reſt had ſaid, and determined the true ſenſe of the place. All this was to be diſpatched within ſuch a ſpace of time. At theſe Aſſemblies there was commonly a great conflux of people to hear and learn; and by this means the Miniſters and Curates were obliged to read Authors, and conſult Expoſitors and Commentators, and to follow their ſtudies, that they might ſpeak to the purpoſe, when they were to appear in public; and thus they conſiderably profited themſelves in the knowledge of the Scripture. But the inconvenience was, that at theſe meetings there happened at length confuſion and diſturbances, ſome affecting to ſhew their parts, and to confute others, who ſpake not ſo appoſitely as perhaps themſelves. They would likewiſe ſometimes advance heterodox opinions; and ſome, who had been ſilenced from their preaching for their incompliance with the eſtabliſhed worſhip, would intrude themſelves here, and declaim againſt the Liturgy and Hierarchy; and ſome would ſpeak againſt States and particular perſons. The people alſo fell to arguing and diſputing much about Religion; and ſometimes a layman would take upon him to ſpeak. In ſhort the Exerciſes degenerated into factions, diviſions, and cenſurings. Hence they began to be diſliked by ſome (16). Our Archbiſhop upon this laboured to redreſs theſe irregularities by ſetting down rules and orders for the more uſeful management of theſe Exerciſes, which are extant in the Cotton Library, and publiſhed by Mr. Strype (17). However the Queen ſtill diſapproved of the Exerciſes, and would not have them continued, as ſeeing probably how very apt they were to be abuſed. She did not like, that the Laity ſhould neglect their ſecular affairs by repairing to theſe meetings; which ſhe likewiſe thought might fill their heads with notions, and ſo occaſion diſſenſions and diſputes, and perhaps ſeditions in the State. And the Archbiſhop being at Court, ſhe particularly declared herſelf offended at the number of preachers as well as at the Exerciſes; and ordered him to redreſs both, urging, that it was good for the Church to have few Preachers; that three or four might ſuffice for a county; and that the reading of the Homilies to the people was ſufficient. In ſhort ſhe required him to do theſe two things, viz. to abridge the number of Preachers, and to put down the religious Exerciſes. This did not a little afflict the Archbiſhop, who thought the Queen made ſome infringement upon his office, to whom the higheſt truſt in the Church of England, next to herſelf, was committed; and therefore that ſhe was ſomewhat too peremptory to require this to be done without adviſing at all with him, in a matter ſo directly regarding Religion. Nor could he in conſcience comply with her commands. When he came home therefore, he reſolved to write at large his mind to her, which he did in a letter dated December the 20th 1576, publiſhed by Mr. Strype in the Appendix Num. VIII. of the ſecond book of his Life of Archbiſhop Grindal. In this letter he expoſtulates with her about keeping in the Church but a few Preachers; ſhewing her, "that nothing was more plain in the Scriptures, than that the Goſpel of Chriſt ſhould be "plentifully preached, and that plenty of labourers "ſhould be ſent into the Lord's Harveſt. That public and continual preaching of God's Word was "the ordinary means and inſtrument for the reconciliation of men unto God. That by preaching, "due obedience to Chriſtian Princes and Magiſtrates "was planted in the hearts of ſubjects. For obedience, he ſaid, proceeded from conſcience, and conſcience was grounded upon the Word of God; and "the Word of God wrought its effect by preaching. "That if her Majeſty came to the City of London "ever ſo often, what gratulation, what joy, what "concourſe of people was there to be ſeen? Yea, "what acclamations and prayers to God for her long "life? Whence comes this, Madam, ſays he, but of "the continual preaching of God's Word in that "City, whereby that people have been plentifully "inſtructed in their duty towards God and you? On "the contrary, what bred the rebellions in the "North? Was it not Papiſtry and ignorance of "God's Word, through want of often preaching? "And whereas it was thought, that the reading of "the godly Homilies might ſuffice; he acknowledged "it had its uſe, but was nothing comparable to the "office of preaching. That the Preacher could apply his ſpeech according to the difference of times, "places, and hearers, which could not be done in "Homilies. That exhortations, reprehenſions, and "perſuaſions were uttered with more affection to the "moving of the hearers in Sermons than in Homilies. Beſides the Homilies were deviſed in King "Edward's time only to ſupply neceſſity for want of "Preachers, and were by his ſtatute not to be preferred, but to give place to Sermons, whenever "they might be had. And laſtly, that they never "were thought in themſelves alone to contain ſufficient inſtruction for the Church of England." With regard to the ſecond point, concerning learned exerciſes and conferences amongſt the Miniſters, he wrote to her Majeſty, "that he had conferred with "divers of his brethren, the Biſhops, by letters, who "thought as he did, that it was a thing profitable to "the Church, and therefore expedient to be continued. And he hoped, that her Majeſty would alſo "think the ſame, when ſhe ſhould be informed of "the manner and order thereof, and what authority "they had from the Scripture; what uſe they were "of; and what inconveniences would follow, if they "ſhould be abſolutely taken away." Then he proceeded to give her an account of theſe Exerciſes, and obſerved, that many Biſhops, as of London, Wincheſter, Bath and Wells, Lichfield, Glouceſter, London, Chicheſter, Exeter, St. David's, had ſignified by letters to him the profit and advantage, which had accrued by theſe Exerciſes: particularly, "that the "Miniſters of the Church became more ſkilful and "ready in the Scriptures. That it reſtrained them "from idleneſs; and that ſome ſuſpected in doctrine "were brought to open confeſſion of the truth. That "ignorant Miniſters were induced to ſtudy, if not "for conſcience, yet for ſhame. That the opinion of "the Laymen concerning the ignorance of the Clergy "was removed. That nothing was ſo ſucceſsful in "demoliſhing of Popery. That where before there "were not three able Preachers, there were now "thirty qualified to preach at Paul's Croſs, and forty "or fifty beſides capable of inſtructing their own "Cures. That only men backward in Religion and "contemners of Learning ſet themſelves againſt thoſe "Exerciſes. That the diſſolution of them would occaſion the adverſary to triumph. That abuſes "might be reformed, and what was good be retained. That with regard to the inconvenience urged "by ſome, that one and the ſame place of Scripture "had divers ſenſes put upon it according to the various "underſtandings of the Miniſters; this appeared "worſe than it really was, if all the ſenſes were agreeable to the analogy of faith; ſince the antient

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 219, 220.

(17) Ibid. pag. 220.

Church of Croyden, where a monument was erected to him. He left ſeveral charitable legacies [M]. He lived and died unmarried. He had a brother, whoſe name was Robert, and who, with his wife Elizabeth, and Edmund his only ſon, died, in 1567, leaving four daughters orphans; the ſecond of whom, Anne, married Will. Dacres, ſon of Richard Dacres Gent. (dd). The Archbiſhop had likewiſe ſeveral nieces by his ſiſter Elizabeth Woodhal. We ſhall give his character in the note [N]. He wrote A Dialogue between Cuſtom and Truth, printed in Mr. Fox's Acts and Monuments (ee); and "written, ſays Mr. Strype (ff), in a clear method and with much rational evidence, "againſt the Real, that is, the groſs and corporal preſence in the Sacrament." Mr. Fox conceals his name, and only ſignifies, "that it was written by a certain learned and "reverend perſon of this Realm, and who under the perſons of Cuſtom and Verity mani-"feſtly laid open before our eyes, and taught all men, not to meaſure Religion by "cuſtom, but to try cuſtom by truth and the word of God. For elſe cuſtom may ſoon "deceive, but the word of God abideth for ever." Our Author wrote this piece ſoon after (dd) Idem, pag. 3.

(ee) Pag. 1263.

(ff) Pag. 313.

"Fathers and Doctors of the Church did the ſame, "and commonly expounded one text of Scripture di-"verſly, yet all to the good of the Church. That "he could not with a ſafe conſcience, and without "the offence of the Majeſty of God, give his aſſent "to the ſuppreſſing of theſe Exerciſes; much leſs "could he ſend out any injunction for the utter and "univerſal ſubverſion of the ſame." He then recommends to her Majeſty the two following petitions: "Firſt, that ſhe would refer all theſe Eccleſiaſtical "matters, which touched Religion, or the Doctrine "and Diſcipline of the Church, unto the Biſhops "and Divines of the Realm, according to the ex-"ample of all godly Chriſtian Emperors and Princes "of all ages. Secondly, that when ſhe dealt in mat-"ters of Faith and Religion, or that touch the "Church of Chriſt, which is his ſpouſe, bought with "ſo dear a price, ſhe would not pronounce ſo reſo-"lutely and peremptorily, quaſi ex authoritate, as "ſhe might do in civil and external matters; but al-"ways remember, that in God's cauſes the will of "God, and not the will of any earthly creature, is "to take place." Fuller has publiſhed this letter (18), but very incorrectly and imperfectly; and is miſtaken in aſſigning the time when it was written, which he is confident to have been in 1580, whereas it appears to have been written four years before, viz. in December 1576. And here we may correct him in one error more, which is, that he affirms, that about the time of writing of this letter, the Earl of Leiceſter took occaſion to quarrel with the Archbiſhop, and would have gotten Lambeth Houſe from him; and that this was indeed the reaſon of the Queen's diſpleaſure, the Earl having ſecretly exaſperated her Majeſty againſt him. But it appears that the Earl and Archbiſhop were then good friends, ſince the Archbiſhop made him deliverer of his letter to the Queen. However there was a conjecture, which was current ſince that time, that the Queen was provoked againſt our Prelate by that Earl, who had taken offence at him for denying to give a favourable ſentence in behalf of one Dr. Julio, the Earl's Phyſician, who had married another man's wife. This is related by Camden (19); who ſeems, ſays Mr. Strype (20) too lightly to have taken it up from the malicious Author of Leiceſter's Commonwealth, who ſays, that "this Archbiſhop's overthrow "was principally wrought by this Tyrant for contra-"rying his will in ſo baſe a command." In May 1577 the Queen ſent her Letters to the Biſhops to do what the Archbiſhop could not be perſuaded to do, viz. to forbid all Exerciſes and Propheſyings, and all Preachers and Teachers not lawfully called, of which there was no ſmall number. In June the Archbiſhop refuſing any compliance, which the Queen and ſeveral of the Lords in the Star-Chamber had required of him, the ſaid Lords confined him to his houſe, and ſequeſter'd him for ſix months. In the latter end of November the Lord Treaſurer wrote to him about making his ſubmiſſion, which he did not think fit to comply with; ſo that his ſequeſtration was continued; and in January following there were thoughts of depriving him; but this deſign was laid aſide (21).

(18) Church Hiſtory of Britain, B. 9. pag. 123.

(19) Hiſtory of Queen Elizabeth, pag. 287. edit. 1675.

(20) Ubi ſupra, pag. 224.

(21) Idem, ibid. pag. 230-239.

[M] He left ſeveral charitable Legacies.] He left by his laſt Will 30 l. per ann. for the maintenance of a free Grammar School at St. Beghes in Cumberland, where he was born. To Pembroke Hall in Cambridge 22 l. per ann. To Queen's College in Oxford 26 l. 13 s. 4 d. per ann. To Magdalen College in Cambridge for the maintenance of one Scholar 100 l. For the building and furniſhing of St. Beghes School 366 l. 13 s. 4 d. For the purchaſe of lands and other profits for the relief of the poor Alms-houſes in Croydon 50 l. For reparations of the Pariſh-Church there 5 l. (22).

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 287, 288.

[N] We ſhall give his character in the Note.] Mr. Strype tells us (23), that he was of a mild and affable temper; a ſincere lover of Religion; a great Preacher; and zealous againſt Popery; that he provided the Church with Preachers, and endeavoured to make a learned Clergy. That he was a man of great firmneſs and reſolution, and not at all elated by his preferments. That his zeal and affection to the State of the Reformed Church of England ſhewed itſelf, as upon every occaſion, ſo particularly in endeavouring to reclaim thoſe they ſtiled Preciſians and Puritans, who for ſome few ceremonies made a breach in Chriſtian Communion. For tho' his ſpirit was eaſy and complaiſant, and liked not rigour; yet when he ſaw that no other means would bring them to obedience, he approved of reſtraint, eſpecially of the Heads of the Faction, whom he ſtiled fanatical and incurable (24). Camden ſtiles him an excellent Divine (25). Hollinſhed obſerves (26), that "this good man in his "life-time was ſo ſtudious, that his Book was his bride, "and his ſtudy his bride-chamber, whereupon he ſpent "both his eye-ſight, his ſtrength, and his health &c. "Of whom much might be ſpoken for others imita-"tion; but this ſhall ſuffice, that as his learning and "virtues were inſeparable companions, ſo the reward "of both is the good name, that he had left behind "him, as a monument perpetual." Mr. Thomas Rogers Chaplain to Archbiſhop Bancroft, in the Preface to his Book intitled, The Faith, Doctrine, and Religion profeſſed and protected in the Realm, printed in 1607, ſtiles Archbiſhop Grindal a zealous Confeſſor and tried Soldier, and right famous and worthy Prelate; and obſerves, that his care was great to further the glory of God; but that thro' the envy and malice of his ill-willers his power was but ſmall; his place high, but himſelf made low through ſome diſgrace brought upon him by his potent adverſaries, which he meekly and patiently endured. He remarks, that there were two inconveniencies, which our Archbiſhop's troubles and ſequeſtration occaſioned; the one, the flocking of Jeſuits into the Kingdom; the other, the inſolence and boldneſs of the Home-Faction; by which Mr. Rogers means the Puritans. Sir John Harington, who lived in theſe times of Queen Elizabeth, undertakes to give ſome ſtrictures of her Biſhops; but they are commonly, ſays Mr. Strype (27), but light rumours of Court, and often idle and trifling. Yet what Sir John ſays of Archbiſhop Grindal (28) points not to any miſgovernment of the Church; but whereas it was commonly ſaid, that he was blind ſome years before his death, Sir John would make a myſtery of it, telling us, that he was not blind, but that when Queen Elizabeth enjoined him to keep his houſe, his friends gave out that he was blind, and that he kept at home the better to conceal his puniſhment, which the Queen had laid upon him. "Very "likely, ſays Mr. Strype (29), had the report of his "blindneſs happened at the time that the Queen had "commanded his confinement; but he was not blind "till five years after at leaſt. And that he was then "blind, I have ſeen the ſubſcription of his name, that "evidently ſhews it to be written by a blind man.

(23) Ibid. pag. 255, & ſeqq.

(24) Ibid. pag. 302.

(25) Ubi ſupra, pag. 30. edit. 1675.

(26) Chron. pag. 1354, a.

(27) Pag. 306.

(28) Brief View of the State of the Church of England, as it ſtood in Q. Elizabeth's and K. James's Reign, to the year 1608, edit. London 1653.

(29) Pag. 306.

"Some

after his return to England; and after he has explained thoſe words of Chriſt, This is my Body, he proceeds to produce divers paſſages out of the antient Biſhops and Doctors of the Church to confirm his interpretation.

" Some other paſſages he ventures to write of the " Archbiſhop ſo ſlight and improbable, that I ſhall " not repeat them. But this Author writes not one " word of his remiſsneſs in government or countenance " towards ſuch as oppoſed the conſtitutions of the " Church." Mr. Fuller appears to have been the firſt, who vented this notion concerning our Prelate. His accounts ſeem to be rather hear-ſays, than built upon any good authority, either of Records or Manuſcripts. He tells us (30), that Grindal was generally condemned for remiſsneſs in parting with more from the See, than ever his ſucceſſors thanked him for. Mr. Strype obſerves (31), that this is an hard charge, but ſpoken in general terms; and that if Fuller means exchanges with the Queen, Grindal and all the reſt of the Biſhops were obliged to make theſe exchanges by an Act, which paſt for that purpoſe in the beginning of her reign; but that he and two or three others of the firſt Elects wrote a private Letter to her Majeſty, and made a voluntary proffer of a large yearly equivalent to forbear making uſe of that power, which the Parliament had before given her. Fuller likewiſe ſpeaks (32) of ſome, " who ſtrained a parallel between Eli " and Grindal, in reſpect of his being guilty of dan- " gerous indulgence to offenders; and as a Father of " the Church, he was accuſed of too much conniving " at the factious diſturbers thereof." Mr. Strype vindicates the Archbiſhop from this charge (33). Dr. Heylin (34) ſpeaking of thoſe Engliſh Proteſtants, who in the beginning of our Reformation ſtood affected to the diſcipline of Geneva, writes, that they made uſe of Biſhop Grindal to bring about their purpoſes, by making him inſtrumental to the ſetting up of a Church in London for the French Proteſtant Refugees to worſhip God, according to the manner uſed in their own Reformed Churches at home. Dr. Heylin obſerves, that Calvin wrote a Letter of Thanks to Grindal for his favour in this point. There is a Letter indeed among Calvin's Epiſtles (35), whence Dr. Heylin took his account, dated May 15th 1560, the import of which is only this, that Calvin returned our Biſhop thanks for his care of the poor French Proteſtants, who had ſettled in London, by his obtaining for them a liberty from the Queen of worſhipping God purely, [i. e. without the ſuperſtitions of the Romiſh Church,] and that they might have a faithful Miniſter of their own to preach God's word, and perform other miniſterial offices among them. And it appears, that to this civil Letter of Calvin the Biſhop wrote as reſpectful an Anſwer; and deſired him to recommend ſome fit Miniſter to that Congregation. And not long after Calvin ſent, by conſent, Nicholas Galaſius, to ſupply that place. T.

(30) Church Hiſtory, B. 9. pag. 130.

(31) Pag. 306.

(32) B. 9. pag. 163.

(33) Life of Grindal, pag. 306, 307.

(34) Hiſtory of the Reformation, pag. 305.

(35) Epiſt. Calvini 295.

☞GRONOVIUS (JOHN FREDERIC), a very learned Critic in the ſeventeenth Century, was born at Hamburg in the year 1613 [A], and having travelled through Germany, Italy, and France, was made Profeſſor of polite Learning at Daventer, and afterwards at Leyden, whither he removed in 1658. He publiſhed ſeveral works [B], and died at Leyden in December 1671. He had two ſons, both eminent in the Republic of Letters, JAMES GRONOVIUS, of whom we ſhall treat in the following article; and

[A] Born . . . about the year 1613.] We are informed by Jo. Klefeker (1), that he was twenty four years of age, when he publiſhed his Diatribe in Statii Poetæ Sylvas in 1637.

(1) Bibliotheca Eruditorum Præcocium, ſive ad ſcripta hujus Argumenti Spicilegium & Acceſſiones, pag. 111. edit. Hamburgi 1717.

[B] He publiſhed ſeveral Works.] Beſides his Edition of Caſaubon's Epiſtles, printed at the Hague 1638 in 4to, he publiſhed the following Works. I. Diatribe in Statii Poetæ Sylvas. Hague 1637 in 8vo. This being attacked by Emeric Crucæus, who under the name of Mercurius Frondator publiſh'd an Anti-Diatribe at Paris 1639 in 24°, Gronovius publiſh'd, II. Elenchus Anti-Diatribes Mercurii Frondatoris ad Statii Sylvas. Paris 1640 in 8vo. To which he added a Letter of Salmaſius. This occaſioned Crucæus to publiſh Muſcarium ad Statii Sylvas, Paris 1640 in 8vo. III. De Seſtertiis, ſive ſubſecivorum Pecuniæ veteris Græcæ & Romanæ Libri IV. Acceſſerunt Lucius Voluſius Mæcianus, J. C. & Balbus Menſor de Aſſe. &c. Daventer 1643 in 8vo. Amſterdam 1656 in 8vo, and Leyden 1691 in 4to, in which laſt Edition, publiſhed by his ſon James Gronovius, are added Paſchaſii Groſippi (i. e. Caſparis Schioppii) Tabulæ Numerariæ; Johannis Freder. Gronovii Mantiſſa pecuniæ veteris, & tres Ἀντιξηγήσεις de Fœnere Unciario & centeſimis Uſuris; item de Hyperpyro; Salmaſii Epiſtola & ad eam Reſponſio; & Λογαριϰὴ Παλαιὰ ϰ᾽ Νέα, Græcè & Latinè. IV. Notæ in Senecam Philoſophum & Rhetorem; firſt printed ſeparately at Leyden 1649 in 12mo, and afterwards reprinted in the Elzevir Edition of Seneca cum Notis Variorum, 1673, in three volumes in 8vo. V. Monobiblos Eccleſiaſticarum Obſervationum, 1651 in 12mo. VI. Obſervationum Lib. IV. Daventer 1652 in 12mo. VII. Statius ex recenſione J. F. Gronovii, cum ejuſdem Notis. Amſterdam 1653. Thomas Reineſius in a Letter to Chriſtian Daumius (2) ſpeaks thus of this Edition: Valde me delectarunt Notæ tam accuratæ & in pondere non magno ſatis ponderoſæ viri ad reſtituendum genuinum auctoris ſenſum peculiari quopiam genio nati, a Charitibuſque educati. Our Author's Notes were reprinted in the Edition of Statius publiſhed cum Notis Variorum by John Veenhuſius at Leyden 1671 in 8°. And Statius as reviſed by him was publiſhed by Chriſtian Daumius with the Commentaries of Barthius in 2 vol. in 4°, at Zwickaw in 1664. VIII. Senecæ Tragœdiæ cum Notis Johannis Frederici Gronovii & variis aliorum. Leyden 1661 in 8vo. His Notes were reprinted with improvements in the Edition of Seneca's Tragedies publiſhed by his ſon James Gronovius at Amſterdam 1682 in 8vo, under the following title: L. Annæi Senecæ Tragœdiæ cum Notis Joh. Frederici Gronovii, auctis ex Chirographo ejus & variis aliorum. IX. Obſervationum Libri tres. Leyden 1662 in 8vo. X. Plautus ex recenſione Joh. Fred. Gronovii, cum Notis Variorum. Leyden 1664 and 1684 in 8vo. Dr. Richard Bentley in his Emendationes in Menandri Reliquias (3) obſerves, that our Author did not ſufficiently underſtand the meaſures of Verſus ſenarii. XI. Titus Livius ex recenſione & cum Notis Joh. Frid. Gronovii, additis integris Caroli Sigonii & ſelectis Variorum Notis. Amſterdam 1665 and 1679 in 8vo, three volumes; which laſt Edition of 1679 is preferable to the former, on account of the Notes of Henry Valeſius and James Gronovius, which were added to it. Our Author had publiſhed an Edition of Livy reviſed by him at Leyden 1645 and 1654 in three volumes in 12mo, and in 1661 and 1678 in one volume in 12mo. His Notes upon Livy were printed ſeparately at Leyden 1645 in 12mo, which Reineſius having read, wrote thus to Rupertus (4): Ut ad ſolem luna, ſic ad Gronovium Sigonius viſus eſt diſparere. But ſeveral things in his Notes in this Edition of 1645 are omitted in the larger Editions of 1675 and 1679. XII. Plinii Hiſtoria Naturalis ex recenſione Johannis Frederici Gronovii, & cum ejuſdem & Variorum Commentariis & Annotationibus. Leyden 1669 in 8vo three volumes. Father Harduin ſays of our Author's Notes that " he could not wiſh " his own conjectures and emendations happier than " thoſe of Gronovius." XIII. Tacitus ex recenſione & cum Notis Johannis Frederici Gronovii & Variorum. Amſterdam 1673, two volumes in 8vo. This edition was reprinted at Amſterdam 1685, in two volumes in 8vo, under the following title: C. Cornelii Taciti Opera, quæ extant, integris J. Lipſii, Rhenani, Urſini, Mureti, Pichenæ, Merceri, Gruteri, Acidalii, Grotii, Freinſhemii, & ſelectis aliorum Commentariis illuſtrata. Joh. Fred. Gronovius recenſuit, & ſuas Notas paſſim adjecit. Accedunt Jacobi Gronovii Excerpta ex variis Lectionibus MS. Oxonienſis. XIV. Notæ in Hugonis Grotii Libros tres de Jure Belli & Pacis. Amſterdam 1680 in 8vo.

(2) Pag. 152.

(3) Pag. 54.

(4) Reineſii Epiſt. pag. 604.

and LAURENCE THEODORE GRONOVIUS, who died young, and publiſhed Emendationes Pandectarum juxta Florentinum Exemplar examinatarum, Leyden 1685 in 8vo. And wrote a Vindication of the Marble Baſe of the Coloſſus erected in honour of Tiberius Cæſar, printed at Leyden 1697 in fol. and reprinted in James Gronovius's Theſaurus Antiquitatum Græcarum, Tome 7.

Theſe Notes were reprinted afterwards in ſeveral of Grotius's Work. XV. Obſervationes ad Bened. Paulini Petrocorii de Vitâ B. Martini Carminum Libros ſex, publiſhed in Chriſtian Daumius's Edition of Petrocorius with his own Notes and thoſe of Francis Juretus and Caſpar Barthius, at Leipſic 1682 in 8vo. XVI. Auli Gellii Noctes Atticæ cum Notis & Emendationibus Joannis Frederici Gronovii. Leyden 1687 in 8vo. His Notes are reprinted in his ſon's Edition of Gellius cum Notis variorum, at Leyden 1706. XVII. Notæ in Phædri Fabulas, publiſhed by his ſon James in the Edition of Phædrus printed at Leyden 1703 in 8vo, under the following title; Phædri Fabulæ cum Joan. Fred. Gronovii & Jacobi Gronovii Notis & Nicolai Diſpontini collectaneis. XVIII. De Muſæo Alexandrino Diſſertatio, inſerted in the Theſaurus Antiquitatum Græcarum, by James Gronovius. XIX. Oratio de Lege regiâ, pro Concione quum Faſces Academicos ſecundum deponeret, recitata die ſolenni VIII Feb. MDCLXXI. Leyden 1678. A Tranſlation of this in French was publiſhed by Monſr. Barbeyrac with Noodt's Treatiſe upon Liberty of Conſcience, at Amſterdam 1714 in 8vo. A great many of his Letters are publiſhed by Burman in the Sylloge Epiſtolarum, printed at Leyden in five volumes in 4to. T.

☞GRONOVIUS (JAMES), one of the moſt learned men of his age [A], and ſon of the preceding, was born October the 20th 1645 at Daventer in the Province of Overiſſel, where he learned the elements of the Latin tongue. His father removing to Leyden

[A] One of the moſt learned men of his age.] This appears from his writtings, a Catalogue of which is as follows: I. Macrobius cum ſuis & Variorum Notis. Leyden 1670 in 8vo. London 1694 in 8vo. II. Polybius cum ſuis ac ineditis Caſauboni, utriuſq; Valeſii & Palmerii Notis, Græce & Latine. Amſterdam 1670 two Volumes in 8vo. III. Cornelius Tacitus cum ſuis & Variorum Notis. Amſterdam 1672 in 8vo. two Volumes. Editio ſecunda, Amſterdam 1685 in 8vo. Editio tertia, Utrecht 1721 in 4to. two Volumes. This laſt edition is greatly enlarged by Abraham Gronovius, ſon of our Author, with his own notes as well as thoſe left him by his father. IV. Supplementa Lacunarum in Æneâ Tactico, Dione Caſſio, & Arriano. Leyden 1675 in 8vo. V. Diſſertationes Epiſtolicæ. Amſterdam 1678 in 8vo. This work turns upon the criticiſm and correction of Authors, which was the peculiar talent of Gronovius. What he ſaid relating to Livy occaſioned a warm conteſt between him and Raphael Fabretti, who having attacked ſome of his corrections in his book De Aquis & Aquæductibus veteris Romæ, printed at Rome in 1680, Gronovius anſwered him in a book intituled, VI. Reſponſio ad Cavillationes Raphaelis Fabretti. Leyden 1685 in 8vo. Fabretti is treated in this piece with great ſeverity; but he made repriſals in a defence of himſelf, which he publiſhed under the name of Jaſitheus; Jaſithei ad Gronovium Apologema, in ejuſque Titivilitia ſeu de Tito Livio ſomnia Animadverſiones. Naples 1686 in 4to. VII. Fragmentum Stephani Byzantini Grammatici de Dodone, cum triplici nuperâ Latinâ verſione & Academicis Exercitationibus Jacobi Gronovii. Leyden 1681 in 4to. VIII. Henrici Valeſii Notæ & Animadverſiones in Harpocrationem & Philippi Mauſſaci Notas. Ex Bibliotheca Guilielmi Pruſteau, Anteceſſoris Aurelianenſis. Leyden 1682 in 4to. Gronovius publiſhed theſe Notes of Valeſius, which were reprinted the year following in Harpocrationis Lexicon decem Oratorum, cum Latinâ verſione, & Philippi Jacobi Mauſſaci ac Henrici Valeſii Notis editum a Nicolao Blancardo. Leyden 1683 in 4to. IX. L. Annæi Senecæ Tragœdiæ cum Notis Johannis Frederici Gronovii, auctis ex Chirographo ejus, & variis aliorum. Amſterdam 1682 in 12mo. John Frederic Gronovius had publiſhed an edition of Seneca in 1661, and was preparing a ſecond edition when he died; upon which his ſon James Gronovius ſupplied what was wanting, and publiſhed that edition. X. Jacobi Gronovii Exercitationes Academicæ de Pernicie & Caſu Judæ τῦ Προδότυ. Leyden 1683 in 4to. Our Author endeavouring to reconcile the accounts of St. Matthew and St. Luke concerning the death of Judas, is of opinion, that Judas ſtrangled himſelf, and afterwards being caſt into the Place, which was the receptacle of the Faith, and falling upon the points of the Rocks there, burſt aſunder. This Tract was attacked by Joachim Feller, who being diſpleaſed to ſee ſo many learned men treated with contempt by our Author, publiſhed under the name of Francis Dermaſius a Letter entitled, De intolerabili Faſtu quorundam Criticorum, ſpeciatim Jacobi Gronovii. Leipſic 1687 in 4to. Gronovius in a ſecond edition of his Tract printed at Leyden in 1702 in 4to defended himſelf againſt Feller in a manner which ſhewed his impatience of contradiction, and at the ſame time fell upon James Perizonius, who in his notes upon Ælian's Varia Hiſtoria, printed at Leyden 1701 in 8vo, had given a Greek word a ſenſe, which did not favour what he had aſſerted concerning Judas. Perizonius returning an anſwer under the title of Diſſertatio de Morte Judæ & verbo ἀπάγχεσθαι, in quâ explicantur & conciliantur loca Matt. xxvii. 5. & Lucæ Actor. I. 18. ac vindicantur quæ ad Æliani variam Hiſtoriam 5. 8. erant notata. Leyden 1702 in 8vo. Gronovius publiſhed, XI. Notitia & Illuſtratio Diſſertationis nuperæ de morte Judæ & verbo ἀπάγχεσθαι. Leyden, 1703 in 4to. Perizonius upon this publiſhed Reſponſio ad nuperam Notitiam de variis Æliani aliorumque Auctorum locis, Leyden, 1703 in 8vo. and Reſponſio ſecunda ad Notitiam ſecundam de Lucæ Actorum I. 18. & variis Æliani aliorumque Auctorum locis. Leyden 1703 in 8vo. This diſpute growing very ſharp, tho' upon no very important ſubject, the Curators of the Univerſity of Leyden interpoſed, and commanded both Parties to put an end to it. XII. Caſtigationes ad Paraphraſim Græcam Enchiridii Epicteti ex Codice Mediceo. Delft 1683 in 8vo. XIII. Diſſertatio de Origine Romuli recitata 23 die Octobris, cum alterum ſtationis ſuæ quinquennium commendaret, Leyden 1684 in 8vo. In this oration he treats as fabulous what is commonly ſaid concerning the origin of Romulus and Remus, and the Wolf which nurſed them. XIV. Gemmæ & ſculpturæ antiquæ depictæ a Leonardo Auguſtino Senenſi, additâ earum Enarratione, in Latinum verſa a J. Gronovio. Amſterdam 1685 in 4to. Franeker 1694 in 4to. Leonardus Auguſtinus of Sienna wrote a deſcription of theſe Antiquities in Italian, which Gronovius has here tranſlated into Latin, and prefixed a very learned Preface. XV. Pomponii Melæ Libri III. de ſitu Orbis, recenſiti & illuſtrati. Leyden 1685 in 8vo. Gronovius ſeems to have publiſhed this work, to which he has not prefixed his name, merely to fall upon Iſaac Voſſius, and attack his obſervations on that Author, which had been printed at the Hague in 1658. Voſſius having vindicated himſelf in an Appendix to his Obſervationes ad Melam, printed at London 1686 in 4to, Gronovius wrote a reply under the title of, XVI. Epiſtola de Argutiolis Iſaaci Voſſii. 1687 in 8vo. We may imagine, that he did not ſpare his Antagoniſt in this Letter. But this is nothing in compariſon of the fury with which he attacked him in a new edition, which he publiſhed of Pomponius Mela in 1696 at Leyden in 8vo. This edition, beſides the Extracts of the Coſmography of Julius and Honorius, Leyden in 1658, our Author profecuted his ſtudies in that Univerſity, and made a prodigious progreſs in polite Literature. He applied himſelf likewiſe to the ſtudy of the Civil Law. About the year 1670 he went over to England, and viſited the Univerſities of Honorius, and that aſcribed to Æthicus, which were inſerted in the former edition, contains the anonymous Geographer of Ravenna. XVII. Epiſtola ad Johannem Georgium Græviuм V. Cl. de Pallacopâ, ubi Deſcriptio ejus ab Arriano facta liberatur ab Iſaaci Voſſii fruſtrationibus. Leyden 1686 in 8vo. XVIII. Notæ ad Lucianum, printed in Grævius's edition of Lucian in two Volumes. Amſterdam 1686 in 8vo. XIX. Variæ Lectiones & Notæ in Stephanum Byzantinum de Urbibus : inſerted in the edition of that Author publiſhed by Abraham Berkelius at Leyden 1688 in fol. XX. Cebetis Thebani Tabula Græcè & Latinè multis in locis reſtituta ex MSS. Codicibus, unde etiam Græca in fine repoſita ab Jacobo Gronovio, cujus accedunt Notæ & Emendationes. Amſterdam 1689 in 8vo. XXI. Auli Gellii Noctes Atticæ cum Notis & Emendationibus Johannis Fredericii Gronovii. Leyden 1687, 8vo, 1706 in 4to. John Frederic Gronovius had publiſhed an edition of this Author in 1651. His ſon James added ſome remarks in the edition of 1687. But that of 1706 is much larger and more beautiful. XXII. M. T. Ciceronis Opera quæ extant omnia, cum integris Notis Jani Gruteri, ex recenſione Jacobi Gronovii adjectis ejuſdem Notis. Leyden 1692, four volumes in 4to, and eleven in 12mo. XXIII. Ammiani Marcellini Rerum geſtarum, qui de XXXI. ſuperſunt Libri XVIII. ope MSS. Codicum ab Frederico Lindenbrogio & Henrico Valeſio, cum eorundem integris obſervationibus & annotationibus. Item Excerpta vetera de Geſtis Conſtantini & Regum Italiæ. Omnia nunc recognita ab Jacobo Gronovio. Leyden, 1693 in fol. & 4to. XXIV. Johannis Frederici Gronovii de Seſtertiis ſeu ſubſicivarum Pecuniæ veteris Græcæ & Romanæ Libri IV. &c. Leyden 1691 in 4to. James Gronovius publiſhed this work of his Father, and made ſeveral additions to it. XXV. De Icunculâ Smetianâ quâ Harpocratem indigitarunt. Leyden 1693 in 4to. XXVI. Memoria Coſſoniana id eſt, Danielis Coſſonii Vita breviter deſcripta, cui annexa nova Editio veteris Monumenti Ancyrani emendatior & auctior cum Notis J. Gronovii, & inſcriptionibus nonnullis ab eodem Coſſonio collectis, Leyden 1695 in 4to. XXVII. Abrahami Gorlæi Dactylotheca cum Explicationibus Jacobi Gronovii. Leyden 1695 in 4to. XXVIII. Harpocrationis de Vocibus Liber, cum notis & obſervationibus Jacobi Gronovii. Accedit Diatribe Henrici Stephani ad locos Iſocrateos. Leyden 1696 in 4to. XXIX. Oratio de primis Incrementis Urbis Lugduni & appellatione ejuſdem, habita die 14 Novembris 1696, notis quibuſdam illuſtrata. Leyden 1696 in 4to. XXX. Theſaurus Græcarum Antiquitatum. Leyden thirteen volumes in fol. 1697 &c. This Collection is very curious, tho' all the pieces inſerted in it are not equally valuable. Gronovius cannot be ſufficiently commended for having undertaken this work after the example of Grævius, who publiſhed a Body of the Roman Antiquities. Laurent Beger having found ſome things to object to in the three firſt volumes of this Work publiſhed at Berlin 1702 in fol. Colloquii quorundam de tribus primis Theſauri Antiquitatum Græcarum voluminibus ad eorum Auctorem Relatio, amico Dulodori (1) calamo eum in finem ſcripta & publicata, ut juſtæ defenſioni locus detur, tantique operis dignitas diſcuſſis utrinque dubiorum nebulis eo clarius pateſcat. XXXI. Geographica antiqua, hoc eſt, Scylacis Periplus Maris Mediterranei ; Anonymi Periplus Mæotidis Paludis & Ponti Euxini ; Agathemeri Hypotypoſis Geographiæ. Omnia Græco-Latina. Anonymi Expoſitio totius Mundi Latina. Cum Notis Iſaaci Voſſii, Jacobi Palmerii, Samuelis Tennulii. Edente Jacobo Gronovio, cujus accedunt Emendationes. Leyden 1697 in 4to. XXXII. Appendix ad Geographiam antiquam, quâ continetur Examen Diſſertationis Dodwellianæ de Scylacis Ætate, & excerptum ex Ephoro, antiquo Hiſtoriarum Scriptore. Leyden 1699 in 4to. XXXIII. Manethonis Apoteleſmaticorum Libri ſex, nunc primum ex Bibliothecâ Mediceâ eruti, curâ Jacobi Gronovii, qui etiam Latinè vertit ac notas adjecit. Leyden 1698 in 4to. Manetho the Egyptian in this Greek Poem treats of the influence, which the Stars preſiding at the birth of men have upon their actions. It is addreſſed to Ptolemy King of Egypt. XXXIV. De duobus Lapidibus in agro Duyvenvoordienſi repertis. Leyden 1696 in 4to. XXXV. Rycquius de Capitolio Romano, cum Notis Gronovii. Leyden 1696 in 8vo. XXXVI. Q. Curtius cum Gronovii & Variorum Notis. Amſterdam 1696 in 8vo. XXXVII. Suetonius a Salmaſio recenſitus cum Emendationibus J. Gronovii. Leyden 1698 in 12mo. XXXVIII. Phædri Fabulæ cum Joan. Fred. Gronovii & Jac. Gronovii Notis & Nicolai Diſpontini collectaneis. Leyden 1703 in 8vo. James Gronovius having treated M. Gudius with great ſeverity in this Edition, John Chriſtopher Wolfius vindicated him in his Edition of Phædrus printed in 1709. XXXIX. Arriani Nicomedienſis Expeditionis Alexandri Libri ſeptem, & Hiſtoria Indica. Operâ Jacobi Gronovii. Leyden 1704 in fol. This Edition is a very beautiful one ; and Gronovius diſplays in it the ſame extent of learning, which he does in all his other Writings. But he is very ſevere upon all the men of learning, who are not of his opinion. XL. Minutii Felicis Octavius cum integris Variorum Notis ex recenſione Jac. Gronovii. Accedunt Cæcilius Cyprianus de Idolorum Vanitate, & Julius Firmicus Maternus de Errore profanarum Religionum. Leyden 1709 in 8vo. XLI. Infamia Emendationum in Menandri Reliquias nuper editarum. Trajecti ad Rhenum, auctore Phileleuthero Lipſienſi. Accedit Reſponſio M. Lucilii Profuturi ad Epiſtolam Caii Veracii Philellenis, quæ extat parte IX Bibliothecæ ſelectæ Jo. Clerici. Leyden 1710 in 12mo. In this Book he attacks Dr. Richard Bentley, who had aſſumed the name of Phileleutherus Lipſienſis, and Monſr. le Clerc, who had publiſh'd an Edition of the Fragments of Menander and Philander, and to whom he aſcribes the Letter inſerted in the Bibliotheque choiſie, which he animadverts upon. XLII. Decreta Romana & Aſiatica pro Judæis ad cultum divinum per Aſiæ Minoris urbes ſecure obeundum, a Joſepho collecta in Libro XIV Archæologiæ, ſed male interverſa & expuncta, in publicam lucem reſtituta. Accedunt Suidæ aliquot loca a vitiis purgata a J. Gronovio. Leyden 1711 in 8vo. The Notes on Suidas are levelled againſt Ludolfus Kuſter, who had publiſhed an Edition of Suidas at Cambridge 1705 in three volumes in fol. and who wrote in vindication of himſelf. Diatriba L. K. in quâ Editio Suidæ Cantabrigienſis contra Cavillationes Jacobi Gronovii Ariſtarchi Leydenſis defenditur : inſerted in the 24th Tome of the Bibliotheque choiſie, p. 49, and printed ſeparately in 12mo. There was likewiſe a new Edition with Additions publiſhed at Amſterdam 1712 in 8vo under the title of Diatriba Anti-Gronoviana. XLIII. Ludibria malevola Clerici, vel Proſcriptio pravæ Mercis ac Mentis praviſſimæ, quam exponit in Minutio Felice Joannes Clericus Tom. 24. Bibliothecæ ſelectæ. Leyden 1712 in 8vo. XLIV. Recenſio brevis Mutilationum, quas patitur Suidas in Editione nuperâ Cantabrigiæ anni 1705, ubi varia ejus Auctoris loca perperam intellecta illuſtrantur, emendantur, & ſupplentur. Leyden 1713 in 8vo. XLV. Severi Sancti, id eſt, Endeleichii Rhetoris de Mortibus Boum Carmen ab Eliâ Vineto & Petro Pithœo ſervatum, cum Notis Job. Weitzii & Wolfgangi Seberi. Leyden 1715 in 8vo. Our Author publiſhed this Work, and added a Preface, tho' without his name. XLV. Herodoti Halicarnaſſei Hiſtoriarum Libri IX. Græcè & Latinè cum Interpretatione Laurentii Vallæ ex Codice Mediceo, cum Notis Jac. Gronovii. Leyden 1715 in fol. This Edition had not the general approbation of learned men, who diſcovered very groſs errors in it. The Reader may ſee upon this ſubject a piece of Kuſter, intitled, Examen Criticum Editionis noviſſimæ Herodoti Gronovianæ, inſerted in the 5th tome of Monſr. le Clerc's Bibliotheque ancienne & moderne, p. 383. and another of Stephen Bergler in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic for the year 1716 p. 201, 337, and 417. Gronovius in this Edition has attacked in the moſt furious manner ſeveral of the greateſt men in the Republic of Letters, particularly Laurentius Valla, Æmilius Portus, Henry Stephens, Holſtenius, Dr. Thomas Gale, Ezechiel Spanheim, Salmaſius, Iſaac Voſſius, Tanaquil Faber, John le Clerc, Kuſter, Bochart, Grævius, &c. He had a very extenſive correſpondence with the men of learning in Europe. The following Letter of his to Dr. Thomas Gale was communicated by the very learned Roger Gale Eſq;.

" Galeo ſuo Gronovius S. P. & Officia,
" Nihil jucundius, nihil gratius mihi ad Aures acci-
" dere poſſit quam de te aliquid, præſertim ſi fauſtum

(1) This is the name, which Beger aſſumed.

of Oxford and Cambridge, conſulting the curious manuſcripts, and forming an acquaintance with ſeveral great men there, particularly Dr. Pocock, Dr. John Pearſon, and Dr. Meric Caſaubon, who died in his arms. After ſome months ſtay in England, he returned to Leyden, and began to prepare an edition of Polybius. In 1670 the City of Deventer offered him the place of Profeſſor Hogerſius, which he refuſed, though Hogerſius, in order to engage him to accept it, offered to continue in his poſt, till Gronovius had finiſhed his travels. In his journey to France he viſited the principal Cities of Brabant and Flanders. Upon his arrival at Paris, the reputation of his father and his own merit ſoon made him known, and he contracted a friendſhip with Monſieur Chapelain, d'Herbelot, Thevenot, and ſeveral other learned men. But the pleaſure which he enjoyed at Paris, was interrupted by the death of his father, which happened in December 1671. He went from thence in the ſpring of the year 1672 to attend Mr. Paets, Embaſſador Extraordinary from the States General to the Court of Spain. From that Kingdom he went to Italy, and ſtopped in Tuſcany, where the Grand Duke received him with great civility. Among other marks of eſteem, that Prince choſe him to one of the vacant Profeſſorſhips at Piſa, vacant by the death of the learned Chimentel, with a very conſiderable ſtipend. Gronovius had there for his collegue Henry Noris, who was afterwards Cardinal. From Piſa he frequently went to Florence to viſit Magliabecchi, to whom he owed his poſt, and to conſult the Manuſcripts in the Medicean Library. After he had reſided two years in Tuſcany, he departed to Venice and Padua; and having paſſed through Germany arrived ſafe at Leyden, from whence he went ro Deventer, in order to take poſſeſſion of an eſtate left him by James Tennuil, his mother's father, and to apply himſelf intirely to his ſtudies. He was engaged in reviſing Livy, when in the year 1679 he was invited by the Curators of Leyden to a Profeſſorſhip in that Univerſity; which he accepted. His inaugural Oration was ſo highly approved of, that the Curators immediately, with an unanimous conſent, added four hundred florins to his ſtipend; and this augmentation continued to his death. The Univerſity of Padua ſoon after offered him the place of Ottavio Ferrari; but he was too much attached to his country to accept of it. In 1696 he was invited to Kiel in the Duchy of Holſtein, by Prince Frederic Duke of Sleſwic, who offered him a very conſiderable ſtipend; but he excuſed himſelf from accepting of it. In 1698 the Embaſſadors of Venice at the Hague made him noble offers to engage him to remove to Padua; but he could not be induced to quit Leyden. In 1702 he was appointed Geographer of that Univerſity, and his ſalary was augmented as it had been done to Philip Cluverius. He was engaged in a new edition of Tacitus, when he loſt the youngeſt of his daughters September the 12th 1716. This loſs touched him ſo ſenſibly, that a few days after he fell ſick with regret, and died October the 21ſt following, after eleven days illneſs, being ſeventy one years of age (a). He left two ſons, the elder of whom is a Phyſician, and the younger, whoſe name is Abraham, is Profeſſor of Hiſtory at Utrecht, and eminent for his Learning. The ſeverity with which our Author treated other great men, who differed from him, expoſed him to the juſt cenſure of all perſons of humane and generous minds, and occaſioned him to be compared to Schioppius for the virulency of his ſtyle (b).

(a) See Acta Eruditorum, Anni MDCCXVII, pag. 189, 190. Nouvelles Liter. du 21 Novemb. 1716. Hiſt. Critique de la Republique des Lettres, tom. 13. pag. 391.

(b) See Joann. Kleſtkeri Bibliotheca Eruditorum præcocium, ſive ad ſcripta hujus argumenta ſpicilegium & acceſſiones, pag. 116. edit. Hamburgi 1717. Menckenius de Charlatana Eruditorum, pag. 40. and Acta Eruditorum Anni 1703, pag. 15.

GROPPER

" ac venuſtum ſit, audire; nec ſi quid te mihi impo-
" natur, onus illud, ſed debitum tibi, & honorem me-
" um me interpretari, & voluptati eſſe non modicæ,
" ſicubi notitiæ noſtræ aliquid præſtandi detur mihi
" opportunitas, ſemper teſtatus ſum; & ſi in eo adhuc
" confirmari deberes, nunc multis facerem, niſi diſceſ-
" ſionis prohiberet anguſtia. Quin ſolus id fatebitur
" Jamblichus (de hoc enim maximè agatur) quem ſi-
" mul ac regalium librorum copia mihi data eſſet, " meis omnibus relictis, ut diligentiſſimè potui in illis
" locis quos nominâras, & inſpexi, & ubi partem ali-
" quam ſuppleſſem, tibi tranſmiſi, quam & te accepiſ-
" ſe jam mihi ſignificas. Neque ſanè hunc tuis uti-
" litatibus ſerviendi curſum interrupiſſem, ſi quid a-
" liud illic expediendum aut præſenti mandaviſſes, aut
" ita vigilare voluiſſes, ut poſt acceptas Jamblichi la-
" cunas, mihi id literæ ſtatim tuæ indicarent, quod
" quidem, niſi fallor, tum à te petii, & facilè factum
" fuerit, quum jam tres menſes ab eo tempore præ-
" terierint, & manſionem meam tibi diſtinctiſſimè
" ſignificarim. Poſtquam in hoc voluntati tuæ ſatis à
" me factum putarem, volui Plauudis verſionem Græ-
" cam commenti Macrobiani in Somnium Scipionis, quod
" mihi forte occurrebat, raptim deſcribere; non quod
" eam labore hoc dignum putarem, quippe in quâ
" nihil ſingularis doctrinæ abſconditum facilè ſcirem,
" ſed ut mihi placerem volenti noſſe quî loca ea, quæ
" nuper notâram, Planudis tempore fuiſſent lecta.
" Vix unum Libro iſto diem uſus ſum, quum Præfec-
" tus negavit licere ullo extraneo librum MS. qui nun-
" quam impreſſus fuerit, deſcribere, & ſic ejus ulterio-
" rem uſum mihi adimit. Nolo apud te in hunc ho-
" minem invehere; tantum ſcias ex eo die non modo
" fugi, vitavique conſpectum ac memoriam hominis
" ejus ac loci, ſed ſimul omnium quæcunque in hac
" urbe prius me demerebantur, odium me ac faſtidium
" cepit vehementiſſimum; & nunc nihil aliud quam à
" Patre meo contendo, ne hanc hyemem me hic facere
" faciat. Tu exiſtimes quod libet; ego inter maxi-
" mas ægritudines meas numerabo tam pulchro me tibi
" approbandi tempore non licere mihi frui, vel ob ſi-
" lentium tuum diuturnum, vel ob inſcitiam imperiti
" cuſtodis. Quippe quum negaret integri deſcribendi
" facultatem, conferendi alicujus moleſtiam nolui pro
" me ſuſcipere, ſatius exiſtimans aut plenum accipere
" beneficium, aut ob excerptam aliquam diverſam lec-
" tionem homini huic me non obligare. Nihil igitur
" ſecus de me cogites obteſtor. Hæc ſcripſi quum eſ-
" ſem in ſumma expectatione Parentis mei Literarum,
" ut, ubi mihi eſſet hyemandum, ſcirem. Quouſque
" in locis Jamblichi ſupplendis venerim oblitus ſum;
" propterea a principio omnes hic Emendationes ſub-
" notavi. Vale, obſervande Gali, & Συνθιασώτας tuos,
" ac imprimis longe mihi reverendiſſimum D. Pearſo-
" num peramenter à me ſaluta. Pariſiis die XII Sep-
" tembris 1671.

" Noſtin' à Scutellio hanc ipſam Jamblichi operam
" Latinè verſam prodiiſſe Venetiis anno 1546? Id
" mihi Bullialdus dixit. Si ad hæc mihi aliquid ſigni-
" ficare velis, inſcribe literas tuas eodem modo quo
" nunc; licet abſim, benè curabuntur.

" Hoc ipſum Jamblichi opus jam longè ante de-
" ſcripſerat ſibi Iſmael Bullialdus. Id quum viderem,
" rogavi illum, nihilne ſciret de Porphyrii Epiſtola,
" aut de Teſtimonii Scriptore? Sed reſpondit, planè
" nihil. Tenulium audio in Angliam tranſiiſſe paulo
" ante Ferias Caniculares: an tibi non adfuit?"

T.

GROPPER (JOHN) Archdeacon of Colen in the ſixteenth Century, and created Cardinal by Pope Paul IV. See his Article in Moreri, and add, that he was greatly offended at Sleidan, for endeavouring to bring him under a ſuſpicion of favouring the Lutheran principles [A].

[A] He was greatly offended at Sleidan, for endeavouring to bring him under a ſuſpicion of favouring the Lutheran Principles.] Sleidan affirms (1), that Gropper had always recommended in the ſtrongeſt terms Martin Bucer to Herman de Wida Archbiſhop of Cologne, who made uſe of Bucer for eſtabliſhing of the reformation in his Dominions, Anno 1543. But as Gropper threw obſtacles in the way of it, Sleidan endeavours to make him paſs for a Deſerter, who after having carried on an amicable correſpondence with that Miniſter, had oppoſed him very ſtrongly. Hujus libri (2) fuit author, ut aiunt, & architectus, Gropperus. Nam is, etſi Bucero fuerat admodum familiaris ante biennium in commitio Ratisbonæ, quamquam inde domum reverſus, vehementer eum non Archiepiſcopo tantùm, ſed paſſim apud omnes prædicaverat, licet crebras ad eum dediſſet & amiciſſimas literas: tamen, quum res in eum eſſet deducta caſum, ab ejus amicitia ſe totum avertit, & principe relicto, cui fortunam omnem debebat, in adverſariorum caſtra tranſiit (3). I ſhall now cite a Copiſt of Surius, to ſhew Gropper's Reſentment, " Sleidan — would make us believe that ... " John Gropper was a Heretic, and had ever greatly " commended and eſteemed Martin Bucer. But this " very laudable man ſhowed plainly, that what was " ſaid of him was mere Calumny, in a book dedicated " by him to the Emperor Charles V. And he likewiſe " declares in another place, that Sleidan, whom he " repreſents as maliciouſly ignorant of the affairs of the " Empire, has told a falſhood in his Hiſtory ſtuffed " with lies, when he affirmed that particular of him; " and that Bucer inſinuated himſelf by inſenſible de- " grees into the Dioceſe of Cologne, not only un- " known to him, and to all good Catholicks, but " even in deſpite of them; and at the ſame time he " expreſly calls Bucer a very deteſtable wretch. 'Tis " certain, that Sleidan would not have been allowed " to advance ſuch a thing uncenſured, had he not died " before Gropper could anſwer him, as he had re- " ſolved to do." (4).

Maimbourg does not deny but that Gropper, who was one of the three Catholic Doctors that conferred with Bucer and two other Proteſtants in the Conference of Ratisbon, Anno 1541, had correſponded after that time with Bucer; but the reaſon of this added he (5), is, this preacher of Strasburg, convinced by the reaſon which this excellent man gave in the Conference, gave him occaſion to believe by the Letters he wrote to him, that he was preparing to renounce Luther, as he had already done Zwinglius, and to return into the boſom of the Catholick Church. Be this as it will, the Copiſt of Surius obſerves that Gropper, at his return from the Conference of Ratisbon, caſt his eye on Bucer's Books; and to examine the conſtancy of the man, compared them with the articles which had been agreed upon in the ſaid Conference. He then found a numberleſs multitude of Points directly repugnant to thoſe which Bucer had admitted and approved in this Conference: And he took notice of ſome horrid Inconſiſtencies of the ſaid Bucer, and ſuch notorious errors, lies, and blaſphemies, that the Manichees never uttered the like. That if any Perſon deſires to be more particularly informed in this matter, he may read what the learned Everard de Billy (6) has written, in defence of the judgment of the univerſity and clergy of Cologne (Colen), in oppoſition to the calumnies of Melanchthon, Bucer, and others, where he will find this Subject treated at large (7). This is alledged by Surius and his Copiſt in order to have an opportunity of aſſerting that Sleidan was a liar. They exclaim very furiouſly againſt him, in this and an hundred other places.

(1) Sleidan, lib. 15. fol. m. 367.

(2) i. e. the Antidagma, which I mentioned in the remark [C] of the article WIDA.

(3) Sleidan, lib. 15. folio 367, verſo.

(4) Du Preau, Hiſt. de l'Egliſe, tom. 2. fol. 475. See Surius, ad ann. 1543, m. 384.

(5) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Luther. tom. 1. pag. 269, Dutch edit.

(6) Everardus Billicus, or rather Billichius. He was a Carmelite.

(7) Du Preau, verſo.

GROTIUS (CORNELIUS) in Flemiſh de Groot, i. e. the Great, was born the 25th of July 1544, at Delft, where his family had made a very conſpicuous figure for four hundred years [A]. He went through his firſt ſtudies in that City, and was afterwards ſent to Louvain, where he ſtudied Philoſophy four years. He applied himſelf chiefly to that of Plato [B]. He alſo learned the Greek and Hebrew tongues, and even the Mathematics. At twenty years of age he went to Paris, and there continued the ſtudy of polite Literature and Philoſophy, and was extremely well beloved by John Daurat, the Regius Profeſſor. He afterwards went to Orleans to learn the Civil Law; and when the Profeſſors judged him qualified for his Doctor's degree, he only took that of a Licentiate, and would never paſs higher. Being returned to his native country he devoted himſelf to the Bar. The City of Delft appointed him Counſellor and Echevin at the ſame time; and as he gave many ſhining proofs of his virtue, integrity and erudition, Prince William created him Maſter of the Requeſts. He diſcharged the functions of this employment in the moſt laudable manner, till that, in 1575, he was invited to others, he being then appointed Profeſſor in the Univerſity, newly eſtabliſhed in Leyden. He there taught Philoſophy for ſome years, and afterwards the Civil Law. He was ſo well pleaſed with this employment, that he could not be prevailed upon to quit

[A] Was born ... at Delft, where his family had made a very conſpicuous Figure for four hundred years.] Here follow the words of the Author whom I have cited in the Text of this Article. Patrem habuit Hugonem Grotium virum antiqua virtute & opibus pollentem, ex patricia Grotiorum familia, quæ in repub. Delphenſi totis quadringentis annis continuis illuſtris, etiam hucuſque conſulatibus & ſummis reipub. honoribus decoratur (1). i. e. " Hugo Grotius was his father, a man " of great virtue and riches, ſprung from the illu- " ſtrious family of the Grotii, which having been " renown'd for four hundred years in the republic " of Delft, ſtill continues to fill the moſt exalted em- " ployments in the Commonwealth." This Author is not accurate, and wants to be explained. Theſe words evidently import, that the antient family of De Groot continued in the male line till our Cornelius Grotius; but this is a falſity; for about the year 1430, DIEDERIC de GROOT, Burgomaſter of Delft, and illuſtrious for many deputations in which he was engaged, had but one daughter, who marrying Cornelius Cornetz, ſtipulated, that the children who ſhould be born from her, ſhould aſſume the name of Groot, which accordingly began in the perſon of Hugo de Groot, father of Cornelius. The Cornetz were deſcended from a French Gentleman who ſettled in the Low-Countries in the time of the Dukes of Burgundy. See the paſſage I quote in the Remark (E).

(1) Academia Leidenſis, p. 76.

[B] He applied himſelf chiefly ... to the Philoſophy ... of Plato.] The Author of his Elogium ſpeaks as follows of him (2). Philoſophiam Platonicam, quippe, quam ſolam inter humanæ ſapientiæ ſectas magis divinam (ut revera eſt) judicavit, adeo avide amplexus eſt, ut omnia Platonicorum ſcripta perſcrutatus fuerit, memoriæ infixerit, ac per totam vitam manu ac mente volutaverit. i. e. " He was ſo fond of the Platonic " Philoſophy, which he judged (as it really is) the moſt " divine among the Sects of Philoſophy, that he care- " fully ſtudied all the writings of the Platoniſts, got " them almoſt by heart, and meditated upon them ſo " long as he lived."

(2) Academia Leidenſis, p. 77.

quit it for that of Counſellor of the Supreme Council, which was offered him ſeveral times. He died in 1601, without iſſue. He left behind him ſome Manuſcripts on the Civil Law, which have not been printed yet (a) [C]. He had a brother named JOHN DE GROOT [D], the father of Hugo Grotius, of whom I ſhall now ſpeak. They both were ſons of HUGO DE GROOT, the firſt of that family who went by this name [E], and who died in 1567 (b), being the fifth time Burgomaſter of Delft.

(a) Extracted from a book intitled, Illuſtrium Hollandiæ & Weſt-Friſiæ Ordinum Alma Academia Leidenſis, Printed at Leyden anno 1614.

(b) Ibid. in Jano Grotio.

[C] He left behind him ſome manuſcripts in the Civil Law which have not been printed yet.] The ſame Author goes on as follows, "Libros nullos edidit, ſed "elaboratos quoſdam commentarios ad diverſas Juris "partes conſcripſit. Inter quos Abſolutiſſimum Com- "mentarium ad quatuor libros Inſtitutionum juris "civilis. Ad omnes titulos quatuor primorum libro- "rum digeſtorum. Duos Tomos Commentariorum "& Obſervationum feudalium. Singularem Tracta- "tum continentem quinquaginta differentias feudorum, "à feudis Hollandicis." i. e. "He did not publiſh "any Books, but wrote ſome elaborate Commenta- "ries on various parts of the Law, among which one "entitled by him, Abſolutiſſimus Commentarius ad "quatuor Libros Inſtitutionum, &c." Konig did not take notice of this; he ſaying that moſt of theſe works were publiſhed by the Anthor of them (3), and cites for this purpoſe Swertius and Meurſius who ſay no ſuch thing (4).

(3) Edidit Comm. ad 4 Libros Inſtitutionum Juris Civilis; item 2 tomos Obſervationum feudalium. Konig. Bibliotb. vet. & nova, pag. 366.

(4) Swertius ſays expreſly, Libros nullos edidit, ſed elaboratos ... conſcripſit. Meurſius does not ſpeak of books either publiſhed or written.

[D] He had a brother named John de GROOT.] Who, after having gone through his ſchool-learning at Delft, compleated his ſtudy of Philoſophy and the Civil Law in Doway. He returned into Holland as ſoon as the Univerſity of Leyden had been founded; and lived, till the year 1582, with his brother Cornelius de Groot, Law-Profeſſor in that Univerſity. He afterwards was raiſed ſucceſſively to the employments of Echevin (a ſort of Sheriff) and Burgomaſter of Delft, and that of Curator of the Univerſity of Leyden (5); and did not ſcruple to take his Doctor's degree in Law after his being Curator (6). According to Moreri, Some of his works, written in a very polite ſtyle and manner, are publiſhed; but Moreri is miſtaken, he enlarging too much on a particular which had already been a little too much amplified by Meurſius (7), whoſe words are as follow: Pater (Hugonis) erat Joannes Grotius, cujus extant carmina, & Lipſii ad ipſum literæ, Douſæque verſus, nec pauca aliorum monumenta ipſius inſcripta nomini. Theſe words ſignify evidently, that John Grotius had compoſed Verſes which had been printed. But as the whole paſſage of Meurſius, except the following words cujus extant carmina (8), is found in the Life of Grotius, it is highly probable that Meurſius was miſtaken in that article. Beſides, it is very certain that John Grotius was a judge of Poetry, as is evident from Lipſius. Negas agnoſcere te Deas, idque carmine quod agnoſcant ipſæ Deæ .... Carmen totum approbum, nec critica illi à me nota (9). i. e. "You deny your own- "ing that there are Goddeſſes, and this in a Poem "which the Goddeſſes themſelves might own. .... "The whole Poem is very fine, nor will I preſume to "criticize upon it."

(5) He was Burgomaſter four times ſucceſſively, before he was appointed Curator of the Univerſity. Academ. Leidenſ.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Athen. Batav. pag. 205.

(8) Patrem habuit Joannem de Groot .. ad quem extant Lipſii epiſtolæ, illuſtris viri Jani Douzæ verſus, & non pauca aliorum monumenta ejus nomini inſcripta. Vita Grotii init. apud Bateſium, pag. 420.

(9) Lipſ. Epiſt. 17. Cent. 1. Miſcell.

[E] HUGO DE GROOT .. was the firſt of his family who went by this name.] This we find in the Life of Grotius prefixed to his Works, and among the Lives collected by Dr. Bates. The whole paſſage deſerves to be tranſcribed, Avus ei fuit ille Hugo de Groot, qui ex illuſtri Cornetziorum gente prognatus, primus Grotianum nomen in familiam ſuam tranſtulit. Quippe cùm circa annum trigeſimum ſæculi decimi quinti in Diderico de Groot ejuſdem itidem civitatis conſule, & non paucis deputationibus ſatis claro, defeciſſet ſtirps maſculina, filia ejus Ermgarda de Groot, domûs ſatis opulentæ hæres, viro nobiliſſimo Cornelio Cornetzio, qui genus ſuum ex ea Cornetziorum proſapia ducebat, qui ſub Ducibus Burgundiæ ex Gallia in Belgium migraverant, nuptura, matrimonium non iniit, niſi factâ conditione, ne, qui ex eo naſcerentur maſculini ſexus liberi, alio quam Grotiano nomine nuncuparentur; ita natus Hugo de Groot, ejus Hugonis, de quo loquimur, avus, vir ſupra quam ea tempora ferebant, Latinarum, Græcarum, & Hebræarum quoque literarum ſciens. We find, by the ſequel of this paſſage, that this Hugo was Burgomaſter of Delft, and that he married Elſelinge Heemſkerk, a maiden of very noble extraction.

GROTIUS (HUGO) one of the greateſt men in Europe, was born in Delft the 10th of April 1583. He made ſo rapid a progreſs in his ſtudies, that he compoſed verſes before he was nine years old; and, at fifteen, had attained a very great ſkill in Philoſophy, Divinity and the Civil Law. He had made a ſtill greater proficiency in polite Literature, as appeared from the Commentary he made at that age on a very difficult Author (a). He accompanied, in 1598, the Dutch Embaſſador (b) into France, and was there honoured with ſeveral marks of the eſteem of Henry IV. He alſo took his degree of Doctor of Laws in that Kingdom, and at his return to his native country he devoted himſelf to the Bar, and pleaded before he was ſeventeen years of age. He was not twenty four years of age when he was appointed Attorney-General. He ſettled in Rotterdam in 1613, and was nominated Syndic of that City (c), but did not accept of that employment till a promiſe was made him that he ſhould not be removed from it. He acted thus prudently, becauſe he foreſaw that the quarrels of the Divines, on the doctrine of Grace, which had already given riſe to a thouſand factions in the State, would occaſion many revolutions in the chief Cities. The ſame year he was ſent into England, on account of the diviſions that reigned between the traders of the two Nations, on which he had written a Treatiſe [A]. He had ſo great a concern in the affairs which proved the ruin of Barnevelt, that he was ſeized in Auguſt 1618, and ſentenced to perpetual impriſonment the 18th of May 1619, and to forfeit all his goods and chattels. He was confined in the caſtle of Louveſtein the 6th of July of the ſame year. Every one knows the manner in which he made his eſcape [B], after having been treated with (a) Martianus Capella. See Baillet, Enfans celebres, pag. 232, & ſeq. where the reader will find every particular relating to the books of Grotius's learning, before he was twenty.

(b) This was the famous Barnevelt.

(c) The Dutch give the name of Penſionaries to thoſe who exerciſe this employment.

[A] On which he had written a Treatiſe.] I ſhall employ Meurſius's words. Cum intelligeret navigationem in Indiam fœderaque ejus orbis ingentia eſſe præſidia patriæ ſuæ, quo magis populares ſuos excitaret ad eas res magno animo ſuſcipiendas, de Jure Commercii Indicani libellum compoſuit (1). i. e. "Knowing the "navigation to India, and the alliances with that part "of the world to be the higheſt advantage to his na- "tive Country; to excite his countrymen to engage "in theſe things with the greater ſpirit and vigour, he "compoſed a Book concerning the Right of Commerce "to India." This piece was entitled, Mare Liberum, ſive de Jure quod Batavis competit ad Indicana Commercia Diſſertatio, and was printed in 1609. See Colomeſius's Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 157.

(1) Meurſius, Athen. Batav. pag. 206.

[B] Every one knows the manner in which he made his eſcape.] "It was by the advice and artifice of "Mary de Regelſberg (2) his wife, who obſerving that "his

(2) Her true name was Mary Reygersbergen.

with great rigour for above a year and half in this caſtle (d). He retired into France, and there met with a gracious reception from that Court, who ſettled a penſion upon him. It was to no purpoſe the the Dutch Embaſſadors endeavoured to prejudice the King againſt him; this Prince refuſing to liſten to their artifices, gave a glorious teſtimony to the virtue of this illuſtrious refugee [C]. Grotius applied himſelf very aſſiduouſly to his ſtudies, and to writing of books. The firſt he publiſhed, after his being ſettled in France, was an apology for thoſe Magiſtrates of Holland who had been removed from their employments [D]. He left France after having reſided eleven years in that Kingdom, and returned to Holland, where he flattered himſelf with mighty matters, upon his having received a very kind letter from Prince Frederic Henry; but his enemies prevented all the happy effects which might otherwiſe have reſulted from it [E]. He therefore was obliged to leave his native country once more, and reſolved to go to Hamburgh, [C] Lewis XIII . . . . gave a glorious teſtimony to the virtue of this illuſtrious Refugee.] Grotius, tho' he had met with ſuch ill treatment from his native Country, could not forbear loving it, nor obliterate it from his remembrance. This Lewis XIII admired; and it doubtleſs was one of the reaſons which prompted him to reject the evil Counſels of the Miniſters of the Republic, the particular enemies of Grotius, who endeavoured to make him odious to the Court of France. Semper intentus patriæ & popularibus ſuis, ubi quid negotii illis apud aulam eam eſſet, conſilio, operâ, & quâ pollebat apud nonnullos Miniſtros regios gratiâ inſervire ac prodeſſe; quamvis non ignoraret, eos, qui ibi res fœderatorum curabant, nihil intentatum relinquere, quo Regis animum ipſi infeſtum redderent, ſed fruſtra laborabant apud Principem nihil ignorantem eorum, quæ annis cIↃ IↃC XVIII and cIc IↃC XIX. in Hollandia acta erant; quin dixiſſe non ſemel fertur, mirari ſe virtutem hominis, qui tam malè in patria habitus, non deſineret tamen ei, ſubditiſque ejus bene velle, imò quocunque etiam poſſet modo benefacere (5). i. e. "For ever ready to aſſiſt his "countrymen, who had affairs at that Court, by his "counſel and the credit he had with ſome of the "French King's Miniſters; altho' he was not ignorant, that the Envoys of the United Provinces in "the Court of France, ſet every engine at work to "alienate the King from him. But they had to do "with a Monarch, who was informed of every thing "that had been tranſacted in Holland, in the years "1618 and 1619: nay his Majeſty was heard to ſay "more than once, that he admired the virtue of the "man, who, tho' he had met with ſuch ill treatment "in his native country, and from his countrymen, did "yet wiſh them well, and endeavoured to ſerve them "on all occaſions." Grotius ſhewed by this conduct, that he had made a good uſe of the illuſtrious examples he had read in antient Roman Authors (6). Read what I have obſerved with regard to Camillus (7).

(d) Ubi poſtquam ultra ſeſquiannum ſuſtentatus bonis uxoris, aſpernantis judicum largitionem, qui vicenos & quatuor in diem aſſes captivo totique ipſius familiæ aſſignaverant, ſtudiis præcipuè impendiſſet, plurimaſque ab iis qui cuſtodiæ ejus præerant injurias perpeſſus fuiſſet, &c. Vita Grotii, apud Bateſium, pag. 423.

(3) Du Maurier, Memoires de Hollande, pag. m. 404. See the Letters Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, pag. 654, & ſeq.

(4) Eorumque (novem menſium) ſex elapſi eſſent in conquirendo infenſiſſimos quoſque, quibus judicum munus tuto committerent. i. e. "And ſix of the "nine months "had been em- "ployed in "ſearching for "his moſt inve- "terate enemies, "whom they "might with "ſafety appoint "his judges. Vita Grotii, pag. 423. See in the remark [F] of the article GRANDIER, what Menage ſays on ſentences paſt by ſelect commiſſioners.

(5) Vita Grotii, apud Bateſium, pag. 423.

(6) See the Letter he wrote to Erycius Puteanus. It is the 388th among the Epiſt. Eccleſiaſtic. & Theolog. in folio.

(7) See the article CAMILLUS, in the text, between the citations (d) and (e).

[D] The firſt Book he publiſhed, after his being ſetled in France, was an apology for thoſe Magiſtrates of Holland, who had been removed from their employments.] This Book greatly diſpleaſed thoſe of the contrary party. They imagined that Grotius made it appear, that they had violated the Laws, and therefore ſet new engines at work to ruin him; but the protection of the Court of France ſhielded him from their attempts. I only tranſlate into Engliſh the ſubſtance of the following Latin (8). Primum operum, quod poſt receptam libertatem edidit, fuit Apologeticus ſive Defenſio, non tam ſua, qui non potuerat peccare in exequendis iis, quæ ſibi à ſuperioribus ſuis mandata erant, quam eorum, qui legitimo modo creati, legitimo jure Reip. Hollandiæ annis decimo octavo & nono præfuerant. Quo comperto Fœderatorum Delegati, neque ignorantes ſuas in eo libro artes, illatamque Hollandiæ vim (9) detegi, cum nihil haberent, quo expreſſam in eo veritatem redarguere aut refutare poſſent, uſitatâ jamdiu violentiâ utentes, proſcriptionibus eum perſecuti ſunt: quod brutum fulmen, cùm per Chriſtianiſſimi Regis tutelam, qui eum in fidem ſuam receperat, evanuiſſet, nihil aliud eo actum eſt, quam quod &c. i. e. "The firſt Book publiſhed by him, "after his being reſtored to his liberty, was an apo- "logy or defence, not ſo much of himſelf, who could "not offend in the execution of thoſe affairs which his "Superiors had commanded him to do; as of thoſe "who being created legally, ſuperintended legally the "Republic of Holland, in the years eighteen and "nineteen. This being diſcovered, the Delegates or "Commiſſioners of the States, being ſenſible that their "artifices, and the violence offered to Holland were "laid open in that Book; and not being able to re- "fute the truths advanced by him, employed the "uſual violence, and endeavoured to get him attainted; which impotent malice being defeated by the "protection indulged him by the moſt Chriſtian King, "nothing farther was done except that &c.

(8) Vita Grotii, pag. 424.

(9) We are told pag. 423. what this violence was: Delegatos illis judices dare, illegitimo modo accuſare, indefenſos damnare; Oldenbarneveldium ſeptuageſimum ſecundum ætatis annum agentem capitali ſupplicio plectere, reliquos duos ad perpetuos carceres mittere, & omnia eorum bona publicare: nitentibus contra & vim auctoritati ſuæ inferri fruſtra clamantibus ipſis Hollandiæ Ordinibus, donec optimis quibuſque à muneribus ſuis dimotis, noviſque in eorum loca contra leges impoſitis, omnia pro libidine eorum agi cœpêre qui iſtius novitatis auctores erant.

[E] His enemies prevented all the happy effects, which might otherwiſe have reſulted from it.] The Letter which Prince Frederic Henry wrote to Grotius in 1622, is filled with the higheſt offers of ſervice. It has been printed at the cloſe of Grotius's Life; and it is very probable that this Prince would have thought it glorious to reſtore ſo great a man, had it not been repreſented to him that this might be of dangerous conſequence. The following Latin paſſage explains the whole affair. Mortuo Mauritio Arauſionenſium principe, frater ejus Fredericus Henricus ad gubernaculum Reipublicæ admotus, non mitioris tantùm regiminis, ſed & priſtinæ in adminiſtranda Republica libertatis ſpem dederat, ipſique jam pridem Grotio animi ſui affectum per literas teſtatus erat, credebaturque à non paucis, quæſiturus ſibi gloriam ex tanti viri tam injuſtè damnati in integrum reſtitutione; ſed ut plerumque apud animos eorum, qui Principum conſiliis præſunt, utilia honeſtis prævalent, neque deeſſent qui ipſi ante oculos ponerent, quam periculoſum rebus ſuis foret, hominem tam pertinaciter libertatis ac patriæ ſuæ amantem iterum ad rempublicam admittere, potentiæ ſuæ quàm exiſtimationi conſulere maluit, & proceribus ſuper manſione Grotii, in Hollandiam reverſi circa finem anni cIc IↃCXXXII deliberantibus, iis acceſſit, qui interdicendam illi in patria habitationem opinabantur (10). i. e. "Maurice Prince of Orange being dead, Frede- "ric Henry his brother preſiding at the helm of affairs "in the Commonwealth, gave hopes, not only of a "milder adminiſtration, but likewiſe of reſtoring the "antient liberty in the Government, and ſoon diſco- "vered his affection for Grotius by a letter. It was "judged by many, that he was ambitious of the glory

(10) Vita Grotii, pag. 424.

Hamburgh, where he ſtaid till he accepted of the offers which were made him by the Crown of Sweden, anno 1634. Queen Chriſtina appointed him one of her Counſellors, and ſent him in quality of Embaſſador of France to Lewis XIII. After having diſcharged the duties of this employment about eleven years, he left France, in order to give an account to the Queen Chriſtina of his Embaſſy. He took Holland in his way, and received many honours in Amſterdam. He was introduced to her Swediſh Majeſty at Stockholm, and after having diſcourſed with her about the affairs which he was to negotiate, he moſt humbly beſought her to grant him his diſmiſſion. It was with difficulty that he obtained it, and this Princeſs gave Grotius many teſtimonies of the high eſteem ſhe had for him. He had a great many enemies in this Court [F]. The ſhip on which he embarked was beaten ſo prodigiouſly by a ſtorm, that he was caſt away on the coaſt of Pomerania. Grotius, who was now ſick and uneaſy in his mind, continued his journey by land; but his indiſpoſition forced him to ſtop in Roſtock, where he died in a few days, on the 28th of Auguſt 1645. His body was carried to Delft, and interred in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors (e). Notwithſtanding the Embaſſy in which he was employed, he yet compoſed many books on various ſubjects [G]. He drew himſelf into an unpleaſing

(e) Extracted from his Life, prefixed to his Theological Works, printed in Amſterdam anno 1679; and in the Collection printed in London anno 1681, intitled, Vitæ ſelectorum aliquot Virorum.

" of reſtoring ſo great a man who had been ſo unjuſtly " condemned; but as moſt of thoſe who preſide over " the affairs of Princes, pay a greater regard to profit " than honour; and as there were not wanting ſome " who repreſented to him the danger he would run, " ſhould he admit again into the Republic a man to " whom liberty and his conſcience were ſo dear, he " conſulted his power and intereſt rather than his re- " putation; and when it was debated whether Grotius, " who was returned to Holland about the cloſe of " 1632, ſhould be permitted to continue in it, the " Prince joined with thoſe who voted for the nega- " tive."

[F] He had a great many enemies in the Court of Sweden.] The Queen did not give him a poſitive anſwer, when he deſired leave to retire from buſineſs, which gave umbrage to ſome of the Grandees, they being afraid that ſhe would keep him in her Council. Grotius perceived their diſguſt, and therefore was ſo earneſt to have his diſmiſſion, that it was granted him at laſt. Neque dubitavit hoc unum ſufficere ad irritandam invidiam illam, quàm à principio adventûs ſui in nonnullis Regni proceribus animadverterat. Quare, cùm nihil minùs propoſitum ei eſſet, quàm in ea terrarum parte habitationis ſuæ ſedem figere, ubi non minus cum ingeniis hominum tam malè ſibi volentium, quàm cum aëris inclementia luctandum quotidie foret, non deſtitit coram Regina, quoties ad eam accederet, dimiſſionem ſuam & veniam ad ſuos revertendi efflagitare (11). i. e. " Nor " did he doubt but that this ſingle circumſtance would " inflame that envy, which he had perceived in ſome " of the Nobles upon his firſt arrival in this Kingdom. " As he therefore intended nothing leſs than to fix his " abode in it, ſince he muſt have been for ever " ſtruggling, not only with the tempers and humours " of a ſett of men to whom he was ſo obnoxious, " but likewiſe with the inclemencies of the air; he " never failed, whenever he approached the Queen, to " ſue for his diſmiſſion, and to deſire leave to retire " into his native Country." Du Maurier relates (12), that Chancellor Oxenſtern would have got Grotius diveſted ſooner of his character of Embaſſador of Sweden, had he not kept him in on purpoſe to diſoblige Cardinal Richelieu. This Cardinal (13) had ſtruck off the penſion of three thouſand livres which had been paid Grotius for ten years together, which obliged that illuſtrious Refugee to leave France. The French Miniſter abovementioned who put this affront on Grotius, hearing that he was returning to France with a noble character, was extremely vexed at it; and earneſtly and frequently deſired the Court of Sweden to recal an Embaſſador who did not love him, and whom he did not love. Oxenſtern being determined to mortify the Cardinal, would never indulge him that favour; but as ſoon as the Cardinal was dead, he was no longer deſirous of protecting the Embaſſador, but, on the contrary, treated him with ſo much unkindneſs, that Grotius was forced to deſire leave to retire, and he accordingly was taken at his word. Du Maurier adds (14) that Grotius, " finding he was no ways eſteemed in " Sweden, left Stockholm, without taking leave of " the Queen or any of her Miniſters, and was arrived " at the Dalles to take ſhipping; but the Queen hav- " ing ſent for him back, gave him twelve thouſand " rixdollars by way of preſent." This does not agree with the Life of Grotius. I ſhall here quote ſome particulars from the Menagiana (15) Arnauld gives us a Letter, in which it is ſaid, that Grotius " being greatly " diſſatisfied with the Swediſh Court, tho' very well " pleaſed with the Queen, left it, to return to France, " where he was to reſide as Embaſſador from the King " of Poland; but that before he had advanced far in " his journey, the Queen had ſollicited him to come " back, in order to have one conference more with " him. That he obeyed; and having ſet out a- " gain &c (16)."

[G] Notwithſtanding the embaſſy in which he was employed, he yet compoſed Books on various Subjects.] I will here ſpeak of the works of this Author, in whatever time they were writ or publiſhed.

During his abode in Paris, before he had the character there of Embaſſador from Sweden, he tranſlated into Latin Proſe his work on the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion, which he had compoſed in Flemiſh Verſe for the uſe of the Sailors who go to India, in order to divert them by ſinging ſo pious a Poem. Thus du Maurier ſpeaks (17); and he is very much to blame for giving the publick ſo mean an Idea of the Author's deſign, Grotius having a much nobler object in view, which was, to furniſh ſuch Dutchmen as ſail into India with a piece that might be of Service for converting the Heathens. Propoſitum enim mihi erat omnibus quidem civibus meis, ſed præcipuè navigantibus, operam navare utilem, ut in longo illo marino otio impenderent potiùs tempus, quàm, quod nimium multi faciant, fallerent. Itaque ſumto exordio à laude noſtræ gentis, quæ navigandi ſolertia cæteras facilè vincat, excitavi eos, ut hac arte, tanquam divino beneficio, non ad ſuum tantùm quæſtum, ſed & ad veræ, hoc eſt Chriſtianæ religionis propagationem, uterentur (18). i. e. " My intention was, to write a " work, which might be of Service to my Country- " men in general, and particularly to our Sailors; in " order that, during the long leiſure they have at " Sea, they might employ their time in a proper man- " ner, rather than miſpend it as too many of them " do. Beginning therefore with an encomium on our " Nation, which ſurpaſſes all other in the art of Na- " vigation; I exhorted them to employ this art, as a " Bleſſing from Heaven, not only to their own imme- " diate Profit, but to the propagation of the true, that " is the Chriſtian Religion." This is a moſt excellent work. The Notes with which it is illuſtrated are extreamly learned. It has been tranſlated into Engliſh, French, Flemiſh, German, Greek, Perſian, and Arabic; but I know not whether all theſe Tranſlations have been publiſhed. The Greek verſion was not publiſhed in 1637 (19). Grotius ſpeaks the year following of the Perſian tranſlation only as a piece which was preparing by the Pope's Miſſionaries. Liber meus de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ .... qui Socinianus eſt Voetianis, adeo hic pro tali non habetur, ut ſtudio Religioſorum Pontificiorum vertatur in ſermonem Perſicum ad convertendos, ſi Deus cæpto annuat, ejus imperii Mahumetiſtas (20). i. e. " My Book of the Truth of the Chri- " ſtian Religion, is ſo far from being conſidered as a " Socinian piece, that the Romiſh Monks are tranſlating " it into Perſian, to convert, if Heaven ſhall pleaſe to fa- " vour their Endeavours, the Mahometans of that Em- " pire,

(11) Ibid. pag. 420.

(12) Mémoires pour ſervir à l'Hiſt. du Hollande, pag. 412, & ſeq.

(13) Ibid. pag. 409.

(14) Ibid. pag. 430.

(15) It is ſurprizing that Queen Chriſtina, who had ſo publickly declared herſelf the Patroneſs of learned men, ſhould have begun her reign by recalling Grotius, at that time Embaſſador of Sweden to the French Court, and by removing him from his employment: ſhe was an ungrateful woman, and the moſt a woman of any of her ſex. Menagiana, pag. m. 404.

(16) Calviniſme convaincu de nouveau, pag. 146.

(17) Memoires de Hollande, pag. 408.

(18) Grotius, de verit. Religionis Chriſtianæ, pag. 3. edit. Par. 1640 in 12mo.

(19) Etiam Græcè verſus eſt, ſed nondum editus. Grot. Epiſt. 411. Part 2. pag. 872.

(20) Grot. Epiſt. 444. pag. 881.

unpleaſing diſpute, by his endeavouring to reconcile theological controverſies. A Divine of Leyden (f), born in France, oppoſed him on that account; and ſet every engine at work in order to make the Proteſtants ſuſpect him, and exaſperate the crown of Sweden. This diſpute verified the following maxim, that a man's good nature may miſlead his underſtanding. Grotius having wiſhed for a reunion among Chriſtians imagined it to be poſſible; the earneſt deſire he had on this occaſion did not ſuffer him to ſee the unſurmountable obſtacles, which the obſtinacy of ſome private perſons would not fail to raiſe, though there had been none in the cauſes of the diviſion. The calumnies which his enemies ſpread concerning his death, are invincibly refuted by the relation that was given of it by the Proteſtant Miniſter who prepared him for death [H]. Theſe falſe reports are (f) Andrew Rivet.

" pire." In 1641 an Engliſhman who had tranſlated this Book into Arabick, was deſirous of having his verſion printed in England. Fuit apud me his diebus Anglus vir doctiſſimus, qui diu in Turcico vixit imperio & meum librum de Veritate Religionis Chriſtianæ in Arabicum vertit ſermonem; curabitque, ſi poteſt, typis in Anglia edi. Is nullum librum putat eſſe utiliorem aut inſtruendis illarum partium Chriſtianis, aut etiam convertendis Mahumetiſtis, qui ſunt in Turcico imperio aut Perſico, aut Tartarico, aut Punico, aut Indiano (21) i. e. " I was viſited not long ſince by a very learned Engliſhman, who had reſided many years in the Turkiſh " Empire, and tranſlated into Arabic my Book concerning the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion; and he " intends, if poſſible, to get it printed in England. " In the opinion of this Gentleman, no work is more " uſeful, either for inſtructing the Chriſtians in thoſe " parts of the world, or even for converting the Mahometans of Turky, Perſia, Tartary, Barbary, or " India." This Verſion, made by the famous Dr. Edward Pocock, was printed at London Anno 1660, in 8vo. The Reader will find in the Article HENICHIUS, that Grotius was accuſed of being a Plagiary. There are three German Tranſlations of this work (22), two in Proſe, and the other in Verſe; and two French Tranſlations in Proſe. The laſt was compoſed and publiſhed at Utrecht in 1692 (23); and the other had been publiſhed long before. I have ſeen two editions of it, the one in 12mo, printed in the uſual Letter; and the other in 8vo, in a Character like that of a Writing-maſter: and therefore it is ſaid in the Title, that it was performed at Paris in the Printing Houſe of the new ſort of types invented by Peter Moreau Writing-maſter in Paris. I do not find any Date either in the Title page, or at the end of the Epiſtle dedicatory. The Author of this verſion dedicated it to Mr. Bignon, Counſeller of State, and only ſubſcribed an M to denote his name. I have been told that his name is Mr. de Courcelles.

(21) Idem, ibid. Epiſt. 534. pag. 914.

(22) Scheffer. in Suecia Literata, pag. 301. ſays that the German verſion of this piece by Valentinus Muſculus, was printed at Stockholm in 1651.

(23) By a French Refugee named le Jeune. He died in Utrecht ſome time after.

The incomparable work de Jure Belli & Pacis, was publiſhed at Paris in 1625 (24), of which I ſhall make large mention in the Remark (O).

(24) See Grotius Epiſt. 534. Part 2. ad fin.

With regard to the Commentary de Imperio ſummarum Poteſtatum circa Sacra (25); the Treatiſe de Satisfactione Chriſti contra Fauſtum Socinum (26); Notes on the Goſpels (27); Pietas Ordinum Hollandiæ (28); the Deſcription entitled de Cœnæ Adminiſtratione ubi Paſtores non ſunt, & an ſemper communicandum per Symbola (29); Epiſtolæ ad Gallos (30); I refer my reader to a book of Colomeſius, (quoted by me in the margin) where they will meet with ſome curious Particulars. With regard to the folio Edition of the Letters, conſult Vol. I. of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, and Morhofius's Polyhiſtor (31). As to the Hiſtoria Belgica, I refer you to the Remark (P). 'Tis to be obſerved, that we meet in Vol. IV. of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle (32) a large Extract of the Treatiſe de Cœnæ Adminiſtratione ubi Paſtores non ſunt, &c. which was reprinted with other pieces at London in 1686.

(25) See Colomeſius's Biblioth. Choiſie, pag. 23.

(26) Ibid. pag. 160.

(27) Ibid. pag. 76.

(28) Ibid. pag. 117.

(29) Ibid. pag. 182.

(30) Ibid. pag. 186.

(31) Pag. 294.

(32) Pag. 93, & ſeq.

There are ſeveral Miſtakes in the following words of du Maurier. " Grotius during his long embaſſy " of twelve years continuance, compoſed ſeveral " works, and among others a Latin Diſpenſation " againſt the Sieur de la Perrere (33), who had written " a Treatiſe on the Preadamites. This Diſſertation is " entitled, de Origine Gentium Americanarum Diſſertatio, in which he ſays, that the People of America " are not of very great Antiquity; and that they " came from Europe, by land, or were driven " upon it by ſome Storm: Niſi, ſays he, quis Præ- " adamitas eſſe dixerit, ut nuper quidam in Gallia ſomniavit. But one Laetius, a Doctor in the Low- " Countries, having writ againſt him, he compoſed a " ſecond Diſſertation entitled, De Origine Gentium " Americanarum Diſſertatio altera, in which he amply " refutes Laetius (34)." 'Tis certain that Grotius did not write the Diſſertation de Origine Gentium Americanarum againſt the Sieur de la Peyrere, and the Treatiſe concerning the Preadamites was not then publiſhed. The words cited by du Maurier are not found in this Diſſertation, but the following Paſſage is found in de Layet's Reply, Cui conſequens eſt ut credantur . . . aut aliquos ante Adamum fuiſſe conditos homines, ut nuper quis in Gallia ſomniavit. i. e. " Whence we conſe- " quently muſt believe . . . or that men were created " before Adam, as a man in France lately ſuppoſed." I indeed believe that la Peyrere is hinted at in theſe words; but I perſiſt in aſſerting, that the piece on the Preadamites was not then printed (35). Grotius knew the opinions of this writer, which made him juſt glance at 'em occaſionally, but we do not call this refuting an Author's work.

(33) It ſhould be La Peyrere.

(34) Du Maurier, Mem. de Hollande, pag. 417.

(35) See Sarrau's 52d Letter, pag. 50. edit. 1697.

[H] The Calumnies which his Enemies ſpread concerning his Death, are invincibly refuted by the relation that was given by the Proteſtant Miniſter who prepared him for Death.] This Miniſter whoſe name was John Quiſtorpius was Divinity-Profeſſor in Roſtoch. According to the relation (36) he gives, he waited upon Grotius, who had ſent for him, and was then almoſt in his expiring moments; that he exhorted him to prepare for Death, that he might go to the enjoyment of a more happy Life; to confeſs his Sins, and repent of 'em; that having mentioned the Publican who acknowledged himſelf to be a Sinner, and who begged Mercy from God, Grotius anſwered, I am that Publican (37); that he went on, and ſaid that he muſt have recourſe to Jeſus Chriſt, without whom there is no Salvation; and that Grotius replied (38), I place all my hopes in Jeſus Chriſt only; that he began to repeat aloud in German, the Prayer that begins thus; Heer Jeſu, wahrer Menſch und Gott, &c. (39), and that the dying Grotius repeated ſoftly after him, his hands being claſped; that having ended, he asked Grotius whether he underſtood him, to which he anſwered, I underſtood you very well (40); that he continued to repeat to him thoſe paſſages of Scripture, which dying Perſons are commonly put in mind of, and to ask, do you underſtand me; and that Grotius replied, I hear your Voice, but do not underſtand all you ſay (41); that Grotius after making this Anſwer, was ſpeechleſs, and expired a little after.

(36) It was printed among the Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, pag. 828. of the folio edit. 1684.

(37) Ego ille ſum publicanus.

(38) In ſolo Chriſto omnis ſpes mea eſt repoſita.

(39) i. e. Lord Jeſus, true Man and God.

(40) Probe intellexi.

(41) Vocem tuam audio, ſed quæ ſingula dicas difficulter intelligo.

'Twould be ridiculous in any man to doubt of Quiſtorpius's Sincerity. He could not be prompted by intereſt to tell a Falſhood; and 'tis well known, that the Lutheran Miniſters were as much diſſatisfied at the particular Opinions of Grotius, as the Calviniſts (42). The Teſtimony of the Profeſſor of Roſtock is therefore an authentick Proof; and if ſuch a Proof is not allowed of in facts or incidents, it would be opening a door to Scepticiſm, and it would almoſt be impoſſible to prove any thing. Let us therefore look upon it as indiſputably true; I. that Grotius, in his expiring moments was in the ſame frame of mind as the Publican in the Goſpel. He confeſſed his Sins, repented of them, and had recourſe to the Almighty's mercy. 2. That he placed all his hopes in Jeſus Chriſt only. 3. That his laſt thoughts were thoſe contained in the Prayers of dying Perſons, according to the ritual of the Lutherans (43). Now 'tis my opinion, that there cannot be found a Prayer that includes more pious Thoughts, ſuch as a true Chriſtian ought to have, when he is preparing to appear before the tribunal of God, than the Prayer in Queſtion.

From what is here ſaid, it reſults manifeſtly; I. That

(42) Patin, Letter 7. pag. 31. of vol. 2. ſays, that the Lutherans were ſuſpected to have poiſoned Grotius, on account of what he has wrote concerning Antichriſt, in the Pope's favour.

(43) This is tranſlated into French in the Book intitled, Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande ſur l'Hiſtoire Critique du Pere Simon, pag. 397.

are nevertheleſs revived from time to time ; but no one has carried this accuſation to ſuch violent lengths as the Author of L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnaud [I]. This Writer has preſumed to publiſh, that Grotius died in atheiſtical ſentiments. Many perſons have been ſurprized at his grandſons, becauſe they did not demand ſatisfaction for this injurious report ; and for not ſhewing as much reſentment on that account, as the relations of Janſenius (g) did, for a ſlander infinitely leſs heinous: but ſome perſons of great wiſdom highly approve of their having waved all judicial proſecution [K]. A very ſolid anſwer that thoſe who declare Grotius to have died a Socinian (44), would be too gently treated, ſhould they be only told, that they are guilty of having pronounced a raſh Judgment; ſuch Perſons deſerve to be called Calumniators. II. That the following Story related by Du Maurier is intirely fabulous (45) ; I have been told, ſays he, that during his Sickneſs, a Romiſh Prieſt and ſeveral Lutheran, Calviniſt, Socinian, and Anabaptiſt Miniſters came to viſit him, in order to perſuade him to die in their reſpective Perſuaſions; but whilſt they were entertaining him with controverted points, and each endeavoured to prove his Religion to be the beſt, he made no other anſwer but this, non intelligo, and when they had done ſpeaking, he ſaid to them, hortare me ut Chriſtianum morientem decet, (exhort me as a dying Chriſtian ought to be exhorted) III. That the following report, which was ſpread immediately after his Death, is alſo fabulous, viz. that he had refuſed to hear a Miniſter who would have ſpoke with him (46). IV. That 'tis a falſity to aſſert, That a Lutheran Miniſter having begun to entertain him with religious Subjects . . . . the dying Grotius anſwered him only by theſe words, non intelligo, intimating thereby, that his preaching and exhortations were no ways grateful to him, and that accordingly the Miniſter withdrew (47). V. That there is a Falſity in a little Engliſh Book(48), where 'tis aſſerted, that Grotius ſaid as he was dying, multa agendo, nihil egi, i. e. Tho' I attempted ſo many things, I yet profited nothing. VI. That thoſe who a little after the Death of this great man . . . ſpread a report that he was killed with a thunderbolt (49), aſſerted a falſity that was more ſtupid than malicious.

(g) See the beginning of the remark [K].

(44) See Patin's Letter 7. pag. 31 of vol. 1.

(45) Du Maurier, Mémoires, . . de Hollande, pag. 431.

(46) See Arnauld's Calviniſme convaincu de nouveau, pag. 145.

(47) Ibid. pag. 146.

(48) It contains a collection of ſeveral ſtories. See Sentimens de quelques Théologiens de Hollande, pag. 402.

(49) See ibid.

I conclude this Remark with a Paſſage in which Andrew Rivetus, one of the moſt violent Adverſaries of Grotius, is concerned. He publiſhed that Grotius died venting nothing but menaces ; fired with paſſion and bitter gall, without giving a ſingle Mark of Repentance. However, added he, we will not judge another's Servant. Theſe laſt words include a caution that appeared ridiculous to an Arminian Profeſſor, becauſe good ſenſe will not ſuffer a principle to be admitted, without admitting the conſequences which reſult neceſſarily from it : now eternal Damnation is an infallible conſequence of final Impenitence ; ſo that it can be nothing but a groſs Artifice, to ſay ſuch a man died without repenting of his enormous Crimes, and yet I will not pretend to pronounce what was his fate. In this light the Profeſſor in queſtion has taken the thing, (50), and I ſhan't examine whether he was in the right for ſo doing, but here follows the Paſſage I promiſed ; Paulo apertius egit A. Rivetus, de illuſtri viro Hugone Grotio loquens : ἐμπνέων ἀπειλῆς, inquit, & totus in fermento jacens, imo in felle amaritudinis, videtur ad plures abiiſſe, nullo pœnitentiæ, quod ſciamus, ſigno exhibito, &c. Ubi nihil aliud ſuperfuit, niſi ut adderet, Actum eſt de ejus ſalute. Licet ad emolliendum tam inclementem ſententiam, ita concludat: Sed tamen non judicamus ſervum alienum, qui Domino ſuo ſtetit & cecidit. Sed quorſum moderationis ſpeciem præ ſe ferre circa conſequens, cum tota difficultas ſit in antecedente ? Ego contra, ſi mihi conſtaret, vel Grotium, vel Blondellum, in aliquo gravi delicto ſine pœnitentia obiiſſe, non verever, etſi dolens, dicere, Damnatus eſt. Non enim ipſe ſententiam ferrem, ſed Deus in verbo ſuo, quod cælo & terra firmius eſt. i. e. Andrew Rivetus " acted a little more openly, for ſpeaking of the illuſtrious Hugo Grotius, breathing Menaces, ſays he, " and being in a violent paſſion, and even in the " gall of bitterneſs, he ſeemed to many to have died " without the leaſt ſigns of Repentance that we know " of, &c. to which he had nothing to add, but that " he deſpaired of his Salvation, altho' to mollify ſo " harſh a Sentence, he concludes thus: yet we judge " not another man's Servant ; to his Maſter he ſtandeth " or falleth. But why is there this ſpecious ſhow of " moderation as to the conſequent, when the whole " difficulty lies in the antecedent ? On the con- " trary, were I ſure that Grotius or Blondel had " died impenitent in ſome enormous Sin, I ſhould " not ſcruple, tho' with grief, to pronounce that he " is damned. For 'tis not I who paſs Sentence, but " the word of God, which is more immoveable than " Heaven and Earth." I have read in Arnaud a like cenſure againſt the caution with which Daillé behaved towards St. Ambroſe (51). But this is foreign to my Purpoſe. I ſhall only obſerve, that Rivetus advances an aſſertion, on the pretended Impenitence of Grotius, which is abſolutely contradicted by the Lutheran Miniſter's relation. Mareſius, who refuted the Paſſage I have quoted, does not diſapprove in any manner of Rivetus's conduct.

(50) Stephanus Curcellæus, in Præfat. Apologetica præfixa Anacriſi Davidis Blondelli de Johanna Papiſſa, apud Mareſium in Johanna Papiſſa reſtituta, pag. 329.

(51) See vol. 1. of la Pérpetuité défendue, pag. m. 128, & ſeq. Arnauld wonders at Daillé's extraordinary civility, and exceſſive moderation with regard to St. Ambroſe, of whom he only ſays, that he was cunning or ſagacious ; after having laid down principles, according to which he ought to have called him, a cheat, an impoſtor and ſeducer.

[I] No one has carried this accuſation to ſuch violent lengths, as the Author of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld.] He was not content himſelf with ſaying, that Grotius is a violent Arminian, a Socinian, a Papiſt (52), things which are inconſiſtent in the ſame perſon ; he adds (53) that Grotius died " without profeſſing any Religion ; " and made no other anſwer to the perſon who exhort- " ed him to die in a Chriſtian manner than non intelligo, " (I don't underſtand you) (54) turning his back to " him." The only teſtimony and proof he produces on this occaſion is Mr. Arnaud, that is, from a man whom he draws in ſuch monſtrous colours in the ſame work, that there is no equitable Court of Juſtice would ſo much as fine a man, who ſhould be accuſed of murther by twenty witneſſes of a character like to that which he gives of Mr. Arnauld. Now can there be a more unaccountable blindneſs ? Muſt we not confeſs, that, of all paſſions, a deſire of ſlandering is moſt apt to blot out the ideas of ſenſe and reaſon ? But, to wave ſuch moral reflections, I ſhall content myſelf with the following remark, viz. that Mr. Arnauld was firmly perſuaded, that Grotius was juſtly accuſed of dying an Atheiſt. To reject every Religion on one's death-bed, to die without profeſſing any kind of Religion, or to die an Atheiſt, are three ſynonymous propoſitions : So that, were the accuſer to be proſecuted, the whole affair muſt be reduced to the following determinate queſtion, DID GROTIUS DIE AN ATHEIST ? This charge the accuſer aſſerts clearly and expreſly, he therefore muſt prove it ; and it would be to no purpoſe for him to demonſtrate, that Grotius was neither a Lutheran, a Calviniſt, a Papiſt, or an Arminian. Now is it not a dreadful thing, to hear that a man, who died in the manner publiſhed by Quiſtorpius, ſhould be accuſed of dying an Atheiſt? Is not the impudence of ſuch a ſlanderer monſtrous ? Can any perſon who peruſes his book believe it, without calling to mind the prodigious corruption of the human heart, and firmly believing theſe words of Scripture, the heart of man is deſperately wicked (55) ? I before obſerved (56), that we have no reaſon to doubt of Quiſtorpius's ſincerity ; and I here add, that the incident, the truth of which he affirms, is of ſuch a nature that he could not be miſtaken in it. He heard the anſwers which Grotius made to him, and he ſaw his penitent move his hands and lips, all the time he was repeating an excellent prayer. The eye and ear are authentic witneſſes in an incident of this nature. I confeſs that he did not know whether Grotius might not repeat to himſelf, particulars different from thoſe which he (Quiſtorpius) ſpoke aloud. Now Mr. Arnauld did not bluſh to ſtart ſuch an objection (57) ; but it is unworthy of the leaſt anſwer ; ſince, at this rate, we might doubt of the faith of all dying perſons ?

(52) Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld, tom. 2. pag. 307.

(53) Ibid. pag. 308.

(54) This is not found in the letter given by Mr. Arnauld, pag. 145. of Calviniſme convaincu ; but is a ſpurious addition made by the author of L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld.

(55) Jer. xvii. 9.

(56) The remark [H] above.

(57) Calviniſme convaincu, pag. 147

[K] Some perſons of great wiſdom, highly approve of their having waved all judicial proſecution.] The examples of Janſenius's relations, which ſome perſons would ſwer has been publiſhed to this paſſage of L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld [L], to which, as no reply has ever been made, it is manifeſt that the accuſer is conſcious of his having been convicted of calumny. Now hence ariſes a double ſcandal; ſince, on one ſide, the writer in queſtion has not made the leaſt ſtep in order to atone for ſo heinous an injury; and, on the other ſide, his eccleſiaſtical ſuperiors have never cenſured him for venting would have had Grotius's family follow, is one of the circumſtances that can beſt juſtify their behaviour in deſpiſing calumny. The Janſeniſts had flattered themſelves with the hopes of mortifying Father Hazart a famous Jeſuit, who had aſſerted in one of his books, that Janſenius's father had been a Proteſtant, and that Janſenius himſelf had lived a profeſſed Catholic till he was come to a certain age. Very fine caſes were publiſhed (58), to ſhew that this Jeſuit was a notorious ſlanderer; and he was ſummoned with the uſual formalities, to atone for that injurious treatment, by a ſolemn recantation. They had recourſe to the Tribunals whoſe right it was to judge of this diſpute; but after writing a multitude of things, and making a mighty buſtle, they had the diſſatisfaction to ſee the affair come to nothing; for Father Hazart had ſo much credit, and invented ſo many chicanes, that he quite defeated all the attempts of the complainants. This example ſhews, that Grotius's aſcendants may think themſelves happy, for not having ſollicited, in a legal way, for a reparation from the Author of the calumny; for the Author of L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld, would have invented as many chicaneries as Father Hazart, and would have found as many Protectors, to ſcreen himſelf from the puniſhment he deſerved. He might have been proſecuted in the ſecular Courts, by the law ſi quis famoſum; and likewiſe in the eccleſiaſtical Courts. But he would have met with ſuch powerful Protectors, and ſo ſtrong an intereſt in the ſecular Courts, that the whole would have come to nothing. It would have been much worſe had they complained in the Eccleſiaſtical Courts, for there his chicanes are an eternal labyrinth, whence he could never be drawn; and where his friends invent every kind of artifice to ſcreen him from cenſure of every kind. Could the Author of the Thoughts on Comets obtain any ſatisfaction, for a ſlander reſembling that which was levelled againſt Grotius? Did not the accuſer, by a continual ſeries of frauds, for ever elude the juſt demands, made by the party accuſed, before thoſe who were the proper judges of them? What ſucceſs had thoſe judges who charged this Author with falſe doctrine? Have they not found him out of the reach of the laws of diſcipline and order, notwithſtanding the great pains they took, and tho' they proved his errors ſo evidently? This is another reaſon why Grotius's relations ought to think themſelves happy, for not proſecuting him.

(58) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, 1686, pag. 68, 209, 502, and 1314. Theſe Factums have been reprinted in the 8th volume of the Morale pratique des Jeſuites.

[L] A very ſolid anſwer has been publiſhed, to this paſſage of l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld.] The apologiſt begins thus. "But, Sir, all that this Author and Father Simon relate of Grotius, is nothing in compariſon of what the anonymous Author of a ſcandalous libel entitled, l'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld, ſays of him. It is true indeed that he ſlanders every body in this book; and that the palpable falſhoods which are found in it, ought to invalidate the credit of all the reſt. But becauſe ſome people are ſo weak, as to be impoſed upon by the bold way in which he delivers himſelf; and that ſome of thoſe to whom you communicate my Letters, entertain an ill opinion of Grotius from what he ſays of them, you will give me leave to undeceive them here. They perhaps will not be diſpleaſed to find an inſtance of the moſt horrid calumny that ever was known, in an Author whom they ſo highly eſteem. This will ſhew them, that they ought to guard againſt thoſe who diſplay ſo much zeal for the truth; and that this zeal, upon the ſpecious pretence of defending the Church of God, ſometimes conceals ſuch a malicious and calumniating turn of mind as is ſurprizing (59)." After this the Apologiſt examines the four accuſations one after another. I ſhall not take notice of what he ſays on the firſt head (60); but he obſerves, on the ſecond, as follows (61). "Grotius, ſays our ſatyrical Author, is in the ſecond place a Socinian, becauſe it is plain he weakens all the proofs of the Divinity of Chriſt Jeſus. Deſire your friends, Sir, to read Grotius's Annotations on thoſe paſſages of St. Mark and St. John which I pointed out to you; and if they then don't ſay that this is a moſt abominable ſlander, I myſelf will be contented to paſs for the moſt wicked ſlanderer that ever lived. See alſo Letter DXLVIII, in the Eccleſiaſtical and theological Letters of ſome great men (62)." It would carry me too far, ſhould I relate what he ſays on the third head, as well againſt the Author of L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld as Mr. Arnauld himſelf, and therefore ſhall only extract the following paſſage from it. "Whenever Mr. Arnauld advances any thing injurious againſt the Proteſtants, the Author of the Libel inveighs ſtrongly againſt him, and Mr. Arnauld is an inſincere man, an unjuſt accuſer, and an infamous ſlanderer; but when he ſays any thing, which this ſatyrical Writer may make a handle of in order to inveigh againſt any perſon who has not the good fortune to pleaſe him; then all things go right, and this ſerves to ſwell his Book, and prevent his being rank'd in the claſs of inconſiderable Authors (63)."

(59) Sentimens de quelques Théologiens de Hollande, pag. 390.

(60) Viz. that Grotius was a violent Arminian.

(61) Sentim. de quelques Théolog. de Hollande, pag. 392.

(62) Epiſt. præſtant. Viror. pag. 797.

(63) Sentimens de quelques Theolog. de Hollande, pag. 395.

I muſt not omit that Arnauld blames the Lutheran Miniſter, for not aſking Grotius what Communion he deſired to die in (64). This, ſays Arnauld, is a material queſtion, with reſpect to a man, who, for a long time, was known to have refuſed all communion with any Proteſtant Church, and to have refuted, in the laſt books he wrote, moſt of the Tenets that are common to them. The Apologiſt ſays on this occaſion (65) that the circumſtance which miſleads Arnauld, and the Author of his Eſprit, is, "their imagining that that man has no Religion, who is not in one of thoſe factions which condemn all mankind, and every one of which pretends ſingly to be the true Church of Jeſus Chriſt. Grotius abſtained from communicating with either the Proteſtants or Romaniſts, becauſe that the Communion eſtabliſhed by Chriſt as a ſymbol of the peace and concord, in which he will have his Diſciples live, is conſidered in thoſe Societies as a ſign or indication of diſcord and diviſion . . . (66). Quiſtorpius acted very prudently, in not aſking in what Communion he deſired to die, ſince he ſaw him die in the Communion of Chriſt Jeſus, by vertue of which only we are ſaved; and not by vertue of that which we may have with the Biſhop of Rome, or the various Societies of Proteſtants."

(64) Arnauld, Calviniſme convaincu, pag. 147.

(65) Sentim. de quelques Theolog. de Hollande, pag. 398.

(66) Idem, ibid. pag. 393.

Without examining whether Quiſtorpius acted right or wrong in refraining from aſking him this queſtion, I ſhall obſerve, that a man, who is perſuaded of the truth of the fundamental points of the Chriſtian Religion, but abſtains from receiving the Communion becauſe he looks upon this action as a ſign that one damns the other Sects of Chriſtians, cannot be look'd upon as an Atheiſt, by any one but an old dotard, who has forgot not only the ideas of things but the definition of words. I go farther, and aſſert that ſuch a man cannot be denied the name of Chriſtian. I will admit that his opinion, viz. that ſalvation is allowed to all Communions who admit the Goſpel, to be heretical, and dangerous; but can it therefore be ſaid, that thoſe who believe Jeſus Chriſt to be the eternal Son of God, co-eſſential and con-ſubſtantial with the Father; that he died for us; is riſen from the dead, and ſits at the right hand of God the Father; that it is by faith in his death, and by his interceſſion that we are ſaved; that we muſt obey his precepts, and repent of our ſins &c; can it, I ſay, be therefore aſſerted, that ſuch men are not Chriſtians? No man of good ſenſe can pretend this; but no one would be more ridiculous in aſſerting this, than the Author of the Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld; ſince he has compoſed another work (67), in which he ſhews, that all thoſe who believe in the fundamental Articles, belong to the true Church, in whatever Sect they may live. I omit ſeveral other maxims laid down by him, the conſequence of which are, that men may be ſaved in all Religions, as an anonymous Writer (68) has proved to him demonſtratively. I ſpeak only of ſuch doctrines as he cannot deny, and according to which he ought to acknowledge that Grotius, by only approv-

(67) Intitled, Le vrai ſyſtême de l'Egliſe.

(68) Carus Larebonius, in Janua Cœlorum reſerata.

venting ſo palpable a ſlander, nor ever intimated to him, that they did not approve of his publiſhing ſuch works as L'Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld. A very copious and inſtructive life of Grotius is now compoſing (b), but it is pity it is not wrote in a language that is more univerſally underſtood than the Flemiſh. The Author of this Life will not omit to applaud Grotius for his memory, which was ſo prodigious, that being preſent at the review of ſome regiments, he remembred the name of every individual ſoldier (i). A few days ſince a Letter of Salmaſius was publiſhed, in which Grotius is treated very ill [M]. He left three ſons and a daughter [N]. The eldeſt ſon of one of his ſons is Droſſart (k) of Bergopzom.

(b) I wrote this in 1695, but Gaſpar Brand, an Arminian Miniſter of Amſterdam, who was writing this work, is ſince dead.

(i) Borremans, Var. Lect. cap. 3. apud Crenium, Animaaverſ Philolog. & Hiſt. Part 1. pag. 19.

(k) A conſiderable employment in Holland.

As the work de Jure Belli & Pacis is a maſter piece, and has been received by the Public with peculiar honour, I ought to enlarge a little more upon it [O]. I ſhall approving the fundamental tenets, that he did not in all things approve of the principles of the Calviniſts, Papiſts &c. was a member of the true Church.

By the way, it would have been very extraordinary, had Grotius eſcaped a Writer, whoſe work has been look'd upon as a Satyr on all mankind. Homo iſte procaciſſimus in illo ſuo ARNALDI SPIRITU, univerſum genus humanum impetit, nec ſacris parcens nec profanis, nec Eccleſiaſtico, nec Civili Statui, Regem ſuum, Regem Chriſtianiſſimum, ſingula Regiæ familiæ capita, familiares Miniſtroſque Regis tam fœdè, tam impudenter carpit; ut vel in ſuo Hollandiæ aſylo vix tutus ipſe (69), tutum præſtare id libri monſtrum nequiverit (70). i. e. "This domineering Writer, in his Eſprit de Mr. Arnauld, attacks all mankind; ſparing neither things "ſacred nor prophane, neither the Church nor the "State. He inveighs with ſo much inſolence and "baſeneſs againſt his King, the moſt Chriſtian Monarch, againſt every part of the royal Family and "the King's favourites and miniſters, that he would "ſcarce be permitted to publiſh ſo monſtrous a work "as this is, with impunity, even in Holland which "he made his aſylum." See the margin (71), and judge whether Grotius could eſcape ſuch a Writer, there being ſome particular reaſons which exaſperated him againſt that man. Thoſe who are well acquainted with Rotterdam know my meaning.

(69) This is falſe.

(70) See the book intitled, Catholica Querimonia, pag. 9.

(71) See Citation (59) above, where it is affirmed that this author ſlanders the whole world. Another expreſſes himſelf thus: This Satyr is not abominable, chiefly becauſe the author of it, like the evil ſpirit, goeth about ſeeking whom he may devour, but &c. See the Preface to Chimere de la Cabale de Rotterdam démontrée, pag. 173. See likewiſe La Cabale Chimerique, pag. 281.

[M] A Letter of Salmaſius was publiſhed, in which Grotius is treated very ill.] Crenius publiſh'd this Letter, in Part I of his Animadverſiones Philologicæ & Hiſtoricæ, printed at Rotterdam in 1695. Salmaſius wrote it to Sarrau the 20th of November 1645. He is not ſatisfied with preferring Voſſius to Grotius, but goes much farther, leſſening as much as poſſible the merits of the latter; he ſcarce allows him to be indifferently ſkilled in Philoſophy; and declares him to be inferior to every one, in ſtrength of reaſoning. In Philoſophicis, ſi diſputandi ſolertia ſpectetur, vix mediocribus par eſt; nec unquam vidi qui minore cum vi ratiocinetur. A Profeſſor of Tranſylvania, adds he, who is writing againſt the De jure Belli & Pacis, pretends to point out groſs errors in every page of it, adfirmavit ſe oſtenſurum eſſe nullam paginam vacare inſignibus erratis. Grotius, continues he, is a poor critic; ſeveral of his Notes on the New Teſtament are quite infantine: I would not put my name to ſuch a work. Scimus etiam in Critica quam infelix fuerit & ἀλόχῳ vir alioquin ſummus Grotius. . . Nollem meum nomen adſcriptum eſſe adnotatis in Vetus T. nihil his in multis puerilius invenio, & tanto nomine indignius. Now how ſhall we reconcile this with the Letters which Salmaſius wrote to Grotius? In one of them he gives him the title Supereminentiſſimus; and declares at the ſame time, that he would chooſe to reſemble him, rather than enjoy all the honours and riches of the ſacred College: Non ſolum Cardinalibus, ſed etiam mihi rem minime gratam facis, qui me dones eo titulo, quo tu dignior, ſupereminentiſſime Groti. Quid enim te non ſic appellem, cujus me multo ſimilem eſſe malim, quàm omnes purpurati illius gregis divitias & honores poſſidere (72)? See in the margin the paſſage from Juſtus Pacius. A perſon aſked me the other day, whether the letters which great men write to an Author, are in the ſame ſtrain with the expreſſions they employ, when they write concerning that Author to other people? I anſwered, that they ſeldom expreſſed themſelves in the ſame manner, in thoſe two kinds of Letters. When they write to the Author they applaud his work; but when they write to others, they are very ſparing of their applauſes and ſometimes cenſure him. Were they to publiſh their own Letters, they would endeavour to ſuppreſs thoſe which would ſhew their double-dealing; but they generally never appear in print till after their death. Had Salmaſius himſelf publiſhed his Letter dated the 20th of November 1645, he would have ſuppreſſed the reſt, in which he beſtows ſuch high Elogiums on Grotius. He was not his friend in any manner; as he plainly ſhewed when he maſked himſelf, (in order to write againſt Grotius) under the name of Simplicius Verinus (73).

(72) Epiſt. Salmaſii 21. lib. 1. pag. 45.

(73) Grotius was then dead. See the book in anſwer to this work of Salmaſius. See, I ſay, Juſti Pacii Reviſionem Judicii: Salmaſius is there reproached with fickleneſs: Illum phœnicem ſui ſeculi in tuis literis prædicares; quid te igitur modo impulit virum adeo in te benignum canino dente perſtringere. p. 3. i. e. "What "could prompt "you to attack "ſo ſeverely, "one who had "been ſo gracious to you; "and whom you "had applauded "in your letters "as the Phœnix "of the age?"

[N] He had three ſons and a daughter.] The latter was married to a French Gentleman, Mr. Mombas by name, who was very much talk'd of, on account of a troubleſome affair in which he was involved, a little after the French King had croſſed the Rhine in 1672. The eldeſt and youngeſt embraced a military life, and died unmarried. The ſecond, named PETER DE GROOT, became very illuſtrious by his Embaſſies. The Elector Palatine, being reſtored by the Peace of Munſter, appointed him his Reſident to the States General. He was made Penſionary of the city of Amſterdam in 1660, and diſcharged the functions of that employment with great ability, for ſeven years. He was ſent Embaſſador to the Northern Crowns in 1668. The year after he was nominated Embaſſador to the French Court, which employment he diſcharged with great wiſdom and addreſs. Upon the breaking out of the war in 1672, he returned to his native Country, and was removed from being penſionary of the city of Rotterdam, which he enjoyed ſince his return from his embaſſy to Sweden; he was, I ſay, removed from it, during the popular emotions, which occaſioned ſo many changes in the cities of Holland. He withdrew to Antwerp and afterwards to Colen, whilſt the Treaty of Peace was negotiating in that city, and exerted himſelf to the utmoſt for the good of his country. He nevertheleſs was impeached of high-treaſon at his return to Holland; and being tried, he was found innocent. He then retired to a country-ſeat, and died there at ſeventy years of age (74). See his Elogium in Wicquefort (75).

(74) Extracted from Hugo Grotius's Life.

[O] I ought to enlarge a little more . . . upon the Work de Jure Belli & Pacis.] It was printed at Paris in 1625 and dedicated to Lewis XIII. "Guſtavus Adolphus "King of Sweden having read and admired it, reſolv- "ed to employ the Author; judging from this work, "that he was a great Politician; and Chancellor "Oxenſtern, prime Miniſter of this triumphant Mo- "narch, confirmed him in his deſign, he having a won- "derful eſteem for his work entitled De Jure Pacis & "Belli, which he was for ever peruſing. But this "Prince having been killed in the battle of Lutzen, "anno 1632, Chancellor Oxenſtern, agreeably to "his own inclination, and the deſign of the late King "Guſtavus, nominated him Embaſſador to France (76)." Colomeſius affirms (77), that it is pretended Grotius exhauſted all his genius and talents in this work; and that he might ſay of it, as Caſaubon did of his Commentary on Perſius, in a Letter to Mr. Perillau his kinſman, which has not been yet printed: In Perſio omnem ingenii conatum effudimus. Grotius's Work is indeed excellent; and I don't wonder that it has been explained and illuſtrated in ſome Univerſities of Germany. Here follows the judgment which Mr. Bignon, that irreproachable Magiſtrate, formed of this work, in a Letter to Grotius dated the 5th of March 1632. I forgot, ſays he, to thank you for your treatiſe de Jure Belli, which is as finely printed as the ſubject deſerves. I have been told that an Auguſt Monarch uſed to have it lying always open before him; and am firmly perſuaded that this is true, becauſe it muſt be productive of infinite advantage; this work ſhewing that there is reaſon and juſtice in a ſubject, which was thought to conſiſt shall take some notice of Grotius's book concerning the History of the Low Countries.

(75) Traité de l'Ambaſſadeur, liv. 2. pag. 454. See alſo pag. 411.

(76) Du Maurier, Memoires . . de Hollande, pag. 410.

(77) Colomiés, Biblioth. Choiſie, pag. 128.

consist wholly of confusion and injustice. Those who delight in this study, will there find the true maxims of Christian policy, which are the solid foundations of all Government. I have read it a second time with wonderful pleasure. A very different judgment of it was formed at Rome, it being there inserted in the Index Expurgatorius, the 4th of February 1627.

(78) In his Journal des Savans, written in Berlin, pag. 220, & seq. in 1696.

The Memoir which Chauvin has given us (78) on the fate and importance of this work is so beautiful and curious, that I cannot forbear copying many particulars from it. We are there told, that Grotius undertook this work at the sollicitation of the famous Peiresc. He himself declared this, in the Letter which he sent him, together with a copy of the work, by way of present. "The subject he treats upon has been thought so important, and so very useful, that occasion has been "taken from thence, for making a particular science "of it, for the explaining of which Professorships have "been purposely established in the Universities." The Elector Palatine Charles Lewis "had so high an esteem "for this work, that he thought proper to make it "serve as the text to the Lectures on the Law of Nature and Nations; and, in order for the expounding it, he appointed, as Professor, in his University of Heidelberg, Mr. Puffendorf, who first exercised "that employment; and, in imitation of this Prince, "the like Professorships have been since established in "several other Universities.... I don't find that any "person attempted to criticize this Book, or write "against the author in his life-time. Some indeed are "of opinion, that Selden wrote his treatise de Jure Naturali & Gentium juxta disciplinam Ebræorum "out of emulation to Grotius's work.... The first "author who attempted to criticize it, was Joannes à Felden, Doctor of the Civil Law, and Professor of "Mathematics in Helmstadt. He follows close the "three Books of Grotius, and expatiates on such subjects as relate to Civil Law and Morality.... He "contradicts him every where. His Book was published in 1653, and was refuted the year following "by Theodorus Graswinckel." In 1663 "were published Boeclerus's Commentaries on the first Book of "Grotius, which he continued afterwards on the seven "first chapters of the second Book; and has also published five different important subjects of the same "work... He does not follow every where the sentiments of his author, but differs from him entirely "on several subjects.... In 1674, John Philip Mullerus a Civilian reduced Grotius's three Books into Tables... In 1665 Ianus Klencklius (79) published his "Institutions de Jure Naturali & Gentium, drawn from "Grotius's work. In 1666 Gaspar Zeigler Professor "of Law in Wittemberg, published his Notes on the "three books of Grotius... He does not seem to have "been actuated by a spirit of contradiction; but he "nevertheless deviates from Grotius's opinion in a "multitude of places." Grotius's younger brother (80) published in 1667 Enchiridion de Principiis Juris naturalis. This piece is properly an introduction to the work de Jure Belli & Pacis, and was illustrated with Notes, in 1675, by John George Simon, Professor of the Civil Law at Jena (81). About the year 1668, David Mevius, Vice-President of the supreme Court of Wismar, undertook to compose a just System of the Doctrine concerning the Law of Nature and Nations; and published an introduction to it, consisting of nine considerations. He bestows very high encomiums, in his Preface, on Grotius; and ascribes to him the glory, of having first guided to the study of the Law of Nations, and that he had explained it with greater solidity and erudition than any person before him. His voluminous work was to consist of three parts, two of which were finished, and ready for the press; but he did not know whether his advanced age, and the multiplicity of business in which he was engaged, would give him an opportunity to complete the third. John Adam Osiander, Divinity-Professor in the University of Tubingen, published observations on Grotius's work an. 1671, and he affected to criticize him on almost every occasion. The year following Puffendorf published his work De Jure Naturæ & Gentium. He therein has thoroughly treated all such particulars as had been omitted, or but lightly touched upon by Grotius; and some persons look upon his work as an ample Supplement to Grotius; and others as a continued Commentary on Grotius. [Mr. Barbeyrac has made the following comparison between Grotius's work and that of Puffendorf. "Grotius's stile, says he, is better than "that of Puffendorf, who was much inferior in erudition to Grotius; but if Grotius is more elegant, "he is more obscure, because of the conciseness of his "stile; and therefore Puffendorf in that respect is "is more adapted to all capacities. The great oeconomy of the work of the latter is much better than "that of the former; but in the particular disposition of the materials which compose every chapter, "he sometimes shows an irregularity that is not to "be found in Grotius. In fine, Grotius's system is "not near so compleat and full as that of Puffendorf, "since in writing a system of natural Law, an "author ought necessarily to introduce the knowledge of the principles of morality, of the different "qualities of human actions, and whence it is "that they may be ascribed to good or evil; of the "nature of the Laws in general, and the different "kinds of them. It is this composes Puffendorf's first "book, on which Grotius is wholly silent: but if we "were to judge of the work of the latter from his Prolegomena and the title itself, we should plainly see, "that he did not intend to treat of the Law of Nature "in a compleat and systematic manner; but only to "give a short idea of it." The most correct edition of this work of Grotius, is that published by Mr. Barbeyrac, at Amsterdam, anno 1720, in 8vo, with Gronovius's notes, and some by himself. Addit. by the Transl.] In 1673 was published Henry Heniges's Commentaries on Grotius. He adheres to the opinions of this author, and supports them against those who have opposed them. About the same time John George Simon reprinted Grotius's work with notes, relating particularly to the Civil Law, and that of nations. He sometimes takes part with John a Felden against him. In 1676 Samuel Rachelius published his treatise de Jure Naturæ & Gentium, and Valentinus Velthem, published his introduction to Grotius's work in three volumes. John George Kulpis published likewise his remarks on the same work of Grotius anno 1682, and Gronovius enriched it with learned notes in 1680. M. le Courtin translated it into French in 1687. [This is a very bad version, but a beautiful one was given by Barbeyrac, and published at Amsterdam anno 1724, in two volumes 4to. Addit. by the Transl.] Becman published it in 1691 cum Notis Variorum; that is, he extracted them from the most celebrated authors who had wrote on this subject, as Boeclerus, Osiander, Puffendorf, Simon, Gronovius, and some others. It is added in Chauvin's memoir, that there was published in 1696, a new edition of this work of Grotius in folio, with Commentaries by Vandemeulen (82). It is to be observed, that this memoir serves as an introduction to the extract which Chauvin has published of a commentary of Joh. Tesmarius in Hugonis Grotii de Jure Belli ac Pacis libros III published at Francfort in folio anno 1696, with the notes of Ulric Obrecht on the same work of Grotius. Mr. Tesmar, who died in 1693, had employed twenty years in writing this Commentary (83). The work of Mr. Becman abovementioned was reprinted at Francfort on the Oder anno 1699 in 4to, under the following title. Hugonis Grotii de Jure Belli & Pacis libri tres, in quibus Jus Naturæ & Gentium, item Juris publici præcipua explicantur cum Annotatis Autoris ex postrema ejus ante obitum cura. Accesserunt excerpta Annotationum variorum virorum insignium in totum opus. Edente Joh. Christoph. Becmanno. Thus Grotius, fifty years after his death obtained an honour which the antients did not receive till many ages after they had left the world, I mean, that he has been published cum Notis Variorum. I just now read in a work of Crenius (84), that Theodore Graswinckel wrote the original of this work of Grotius, he writing whilst the author dictated, ex ore dictantis Grotii se excepisse, eosque in ordinem demum redegisse. Christopher Arnoldus was told this particular by Graswinckel himself, and inserted it in a letter which was printed with those of Richterus. [Grotius began this celebrated work anno 1623, (79) See the Journal des Savans, of Jan. 25, 1666, pag. m. 80.

(80) William Grotius.

(81) He is Professor in the new University of Hall, anno 1696.

(82) It should be Vander Meulen. See the Extract of his book, in l'Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans, Nov. 1695. pag. 123, & seq.

(83) Chauvin, Journal des Savans de Berlin, pag. 316, 317.

(84) Thomas Crenius, Anim. Part 5. pag. 204.

Countries [P]. He compoſed it in his youth, in imitation of Tacitus's Laconic ſtyle.

☞ We ſhall add ſome particulars (many of which, as well as thoſe additional ones given in the Notes, are from Gaſpar Brandt) to this Life of Hugo Grotius by Mr. Bayle [Q].

GRUTER

during his abode in France, and made choice of an agreeable retirement to compoſe it in. The Preſident John James de Meſmes had offered him his country-ſeat, called Balagni, near Senlis, whither he went in the beginning of June. As Grotius wanted to recover his health, (he having been afflicted with a fit of ſickneſs) he worked but ſlowly at firſt; but nevertheleſs he made advantage even of his airings, between which and his ſtudies he then divided his whole time. He did not leave Balagni till Auguſt, which he did upon hearing that Mr. de Meſmes was coming to reſide there; and therefore he left it for fear of incommoding him, and removed to Senlis, where he continued his work all that ſummer; and returning to Paris the 21ſt of October, finiſhed it in that city. In June, of the following year 1624, he was employed in tranſcribing his book for the preſs, on which occaſion he made uſe of Theodorus Granſwinckel his friend and countryman. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

[P] I ſhall take ſome notice of Grotius's book concerning the Hiſtory of the Low Countries.] It contains the tranſactions that happened there, from the departure of Philip II till the year 1608. It is divided into Annals and Hiſtory. The Annals contain V Books, the Hiſtory XVIII, and begin at the year 1588. Caſaubon, who had read ſome part of it as early as the year 1613, ſpeaks advantageouſly of it, in a letter written by him, from London, to Thuanus (85). He obſerves, that there were XXI Books in this work. However, he had not computed juſtly; but perhaps the two laſt Books were added ſince. The author had not publiſhed this Hiſtory, he having ſhewn it only in manuſcript to Caſaubon. It was not publiſhed till after the author's death, Grotius having particular reaſons not to let the manuſcript go out of his hands till after his death ... (86). Madam Grotius refuſed to let Mr. Sarrau have the manuſcript of this Hiſtory, though he offered two thouſand livres (87). It was printed at Amſterdam, by John Bleau, anno 1657, in folio, and anno 1658, in 12mo (88). It was tranſlated into French by l'Heritier (89). A new edition of the French Tranſlation was made at Paris, Anno 1672 in folio. See the extract which Mr. Denys gave of it, in his ſeventh Memoir concerning Arts and Sciences (90). Here follows the judgment of the Author of Parrhaſiana. "We may join to Polybius "a famous modern Hiſtorian, who, tho' he had ſuffered great hardſhips by the injuſtice of a great "Prince, has nevertheleſs related his Actions as "carefully as any indifferent Hiſtorian could have done, "and drawn him every where in ſuch a light, as his "exalted qualities deſerved; without letting one word "eſcape him, which might ſhew that he had juſt "reaſon to complain of his ill treatment, The Per"ſon I ſpeak of is the imcomparable Hugo Grotius, "who in his Hiſtory of the Low-Countries, ſpeaks of "Prince Maurice of Naſſau, as tho' he had never "been uſed ill by him. This is a remarkable Inſtance "of impartiality and diſintereſtedneſs; and ſhews that "'tis not impoſſible for a man to conquer his Paſſion and "ſpeak well of his Enemies, as many People imagine "who form a judgment of others from themſelves "(91)." The Author, who has applauded this excellent Circumſtance in Grotius's work, did not do it out of Flattery; he cenſuring him a little afterwards for a thing which deſerves Cenſure. I mean Grotius's Style, which ſhews the goodneſs of his Taſte. "None of thoſe, ſays he 92), who ſpoke with beauty "and propriety at Athens or Rome, expreſſed "themſelves ſo obſcurely in Converſation, as Thucy"dides and Tacitus did in their writings. 'Twas "doubtleſs from an endeavour to raiſe themſelves a"bove the uſual Forms of expreſſion, that they fell "into that obſcurity which has been juſtly cenſured in "their Style. It cannot be denied but that this is an "affected Style, and that thoſe authors thought to give "a merit to their Hiſtories, by a manly eloquence as "it were, in which the writer ſeems to expreſs ma"ny ideas in a few words, and in ſuch a manner, as "is above the capacity of the vulgar. I cannot ap"prehend why ſome learned men propoſed to imitate "them, and could approve of their Style, as Hugo "Grotius, and Dionyſius Voſſius, in his Tranſlation "of Rheide's Hiſtory. For certainly there is no "occaſion that thoughts ſhould be obſcure, in order "for their appearing beautiful to ſuch as are judges of "Diction; and a Reader, who is interrupted every "inſtant, in order to ſeek for the Hiſtorian's mean"ing, does not think himſelf in the leaſt obliged to "him for giving him this trouble. Hence it is, that "many Hiſtories, tho' excellent as to the materials, "are read by few; whereas did ſuch Hiſtorians intend "to write for the inſtruction of thoſe, who are ſuffi"ciently skilled in the Latin Tongue, to read an Hi"ſtorian with Pleaſure; they ſhould endeavour to "make themſelves be eaſily underſtood by ſuch "Perſons: and to make their work uſeful to as ma"ny People as poſſible. The more a Hiſtory is "worthy of being read, on account of the Tranſla"tion contained in it, the more general it ought to "be made. The Authority of the Antients, who "neglected perſpicuity of Style, cannot juſtify ſuch "moderns as imitated them, contrary to the reaſons I "have mentioned, or rather contrary to good ſenſe. There is nothing in Tacitus's writings that deſerve leſs to be imitated than the too Laconick, and conſequently obſcure diction of Tacitus; and yet 'tis in this particular that this great Hiſtorian has been moſtly imitated. I am very ſorry that Grotius did not endeavour to ſhun this fault. The great Mr. Bignon who diſapproved of this too conciſe Style, perſuaded the Author to alter it. Amavit (Grotius) ubique orationem preſſam, & quadam dignitate gravem, a qua nec in hiſtoria ſibi temperavit. Satis conſtat, virum noſtri ſæculi ſummum, omniſque doctrinæ & auctorem & cenſorem graviſſimum, Hieronymum Bignonium, cum ineditas adhuc Grotii Hiſtorias & Annales legiſſet, non probaſſe brevitatem orationis, obſcuritati obnoxiam, in illo genere ſcripturæ quod à perſpicua venuſtate potiſſimum commendationem caperet; peneque Grotio perſuaſiſſe, ut reſcriberet (93), i. e. "Grotius was every where fond "of a Laconic and majeſtick diction, which he "could not refrain from employing in Hiſtory. 'Tis "well known, that one of the greateſt and moſt "learned men of our age, Jerom Bignon, having per"uſed Grotius's Hiſtories and Annals in manuſcript, "did not approve of the conciſeneſs of the Style; "whereby it was rendered obſcure, in a Species of "writing, whoſe chief beauty and recommendation "are Perſpicuity; and that he had almoſt prevailed "with Grotius to write it anew." Neufville, in the Preface to his Hiſtory of Holland, aſſerts that Grotius had begun to mould his work anew. [Abbé Langlet gives the following character of Grotius's work. This able Hiſtorian (ſays he) has more experience than any of thoſe who have writ the Hiſtory of Holland, and few Authors were more capable of writing on ſo great a Subject. As he imitates Tacitus, he is ſometimes obſcure, and requires a Reader who has ſome Knowledge in this Hiſtory. ADD. REM.

[Q] We ſhall add ſome particulars to this Life of Hugo Grotius.] His mother was named Alide d'Overſchies, and was born of a conſiderable Family (*). Henry IV. of France was ſo well pleaſed with Grotius, that he preſented him with a gold chain, and a medal with his Picture; at which Grotius was ſo overjoy'd, that he cauſed his own head to be engraved, with theſe Ornaments under it (†). At his return from France to his native Country, his Father fearing leſt the ſtrong Propenſion he ſhewed for polite Literature, ſhould cauſe in him a Diſinclination to Buſineſs, prevailed with his Son to devote himſelf to the Bar (‡). Being appointed Attorney-general of Holland, Zeland, and Weſt-Friezland at but twenty four years of Age, he diſcharged the Function of his employment with (85) Colomiés, Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 24. edit. 1699.

(86) Idem, ibid.

(87) Idem, ibid. pag. 25.

(88) There is alſo an edition in 8vo. The 12mo edition is full of typographical errors.

(89) Colomiés, Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 25.

(90) Pag. 85. of the Mem. of Mr. Denys, edit. de Paris 1672.

(91) Parrhaſiana, pag. 160.

(92) Ibid. pag. 179.

(93) Boecler. Præfat. Commentar. in Grotium, de Jure Belli & Pacis, pag. m. 30.

(*) Niceron, Hommes illuſtres, vol. 19. pag. 315. Paris 1732.

(†) Ibid. pag. 317.

(‡) Idem, ibid.

GRUTER (PETER) was born in the Palatinate. Thomas Gruter his father, who had fled thither (a) on account of the perſecution raiſed againſt the Proteſtants in the Low-Countries, was Profeſſor at Duiſburg [A], and had three or four ſons who were all ſcholars [B]. Peter Gruter, of whom I now write, practiſed Phyſic in ſeveral cities of Flanders, in Dixmuid, Oſtend, &c. and was not very well pleaſed with the Flemings (b). He publiſhed at Leyden, in 1609, a Century of Latin Epiſtles, which met with very ill treatment both from the Printers and Criticks [C]. He affected, in thoſe Epiſtles, a ſtyle that was diſguiſed by old words and antiquated phraſes. He left Oſtend in 1620, and withdrew to Middleburg. I know not whether he made a long ſtay in this city; but I believe he endeavoured to make his fortune in ſeveral places, before he ſettled in Amſterdam, where the Magiſtrates were very kind to him (c). He there publiſhed a new Century of Epiſtles in 1629 [D], and died in that place anno 1634 (d). Swertius (e) declares that he was born in Ziriczée in Zeland, and reſided ſome years in Italy.

(a) Valer. And. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 741.

(b) See the 2d Century of his Letters.

(c) See the Dedication to the 2d Century of his Letters.

(d) Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 741.

(e) Ath. Belg. pag. 618.

GRUTER

with ſo much wiſdom and integrity, that the penſion annexed to that office was increaſed in his favour, and he was promiſed a Senator's place in the Dutch wars (‡). Upon his accepting the Poſt of Syndic of Rotterdam, he took the utmoſt care not to offend either Party; but endeavoured to behave ſo well towards both, that no one might have a juſt occaſion to cenſure his conduct; in which he ſeems to have been ſucceſsful at firſt, as he ſome time after was admitted a member of the States of Holland (). His negotiation with the Engliſh Merchants about the trade to the Eaſt-Indies, proved of advantage to the Dutch, and he had the pleaſure to receive ſome marks of the benevolence and eſteem of King James I. and to contract an intimate Friendſhip with Iſaac Caſaubon, with whom he had correſponded before (). During his Impriſonment the only conſolation allowed him was his Wife's company, and the Books which his Friends were permitted to lend him. Theſe generally uſed to ſend him a large trunk full at a time, which he ſtudied day and night, and afterwards returned them; and 'twas during his Impriſonment that he tranſlated Stobæus (†). The reaſons commonly given for Grotius's leaving France, are either, that his enemies had prevailed with Cardinal Richelieu to cut off his penſion, or that the ſtate of the French King's Treaſury made it neceſſary for him to retrench his Liberalities (‖). During his ſtay in Hambourg, the Kings of Denmark, Poland, and Spain, invited him into their reſpective Dominions; but not thinking that the propoſals they made, ſuited him, he perſiſted in his firſt deſign of ſerving the crown of Sweden (§). Cardinal Richelieu was ſo much diſguſted to ſee Grotius come embaſſador into a Kingdom where he had been refuſed Subſiſtence, that he obliged him to ſtop at St. Denys, till the return of a courier from Sweden, in order to know the final Reſolution of the Chancellor Oxenſtern; but this Miniſter continuing inexorable, the French were obliged to receive Grotius; who accordingly made his entry into Paris (‡). At his return from his embaſſy at the Court of France, great honours were paid him in Holland, in his Journey through it to Sweden; becauſe the face of Affairs was greatly changed in the United Provinces; moſt of his enemies being dead, and many of thoſe reſtored to their employments, who had been removed from them. Hugo Grotius's eldeſt ſon, Cornelius by name, was for ſome time attach'd to the ſervice of Chancellor Oxenſtern. He was a pretty good Latin Poet, but indolent and fond of pleaſure. The ſecond named Dieteric, had been page to Duke Bernard de Weymard; was afterwards his Aid de Camp, and was aſſaſſinated by his Footman in an inn (†) 'Tis to be obſerved that Peter, whom Mr. Bayle declares to have been the ſecond Son of Hugo Grotius, is called his third Son in Father Niceron (*). The husband of Grotius's daughter, Cornelia, owed his ruin to the de Wits (‖).]

(‡) Ibid. pag. 318.

(*) Ibid. pag. 318, 319.

(*) Ibid. pag.

(†) Ibid. pag. 320.

(‖) Ibid. pag. 323.

(§) Ibid. pag. 324.

(‡) Ibid. pag. 326.

(‖) Hommes illuſtres, ubi ſupra.

(*) Ibid. pag. 331.

(†) Ibid. pag. 331.

[A] Thomas Gruterus his father . . . was Profeſſor at Duiſburg (1).] We are informed of this particular by ſome Letters which were printed at the end of the 2d Century of Peter Gruterus his ſon, ſome of which were wrote by that Thomas Gruterus. He had compoſed ſeveral works (2); and, among others, the Hiſtory of David George, and a confutation of his heretical tenets.

(1) In 1560 and 1561. Cent. 2. Epiſt. Petri Gruteri, pag. 197, 198.

(2) They were never printed. A liſt of them is found in Cent. 2. Epiſt. Petri Gruteri, pag. 200.

[B] . . . and had three or four ſons who were all Scholars.] JAMES GRUTER, ſon to Thomas, was Hiſtory Profeſſor in the illuſtrious School of Middleburg, anno 1604. Some of his Letters have been printed at the end of the ſecond Century of Peter Gruter his brother, with the catalogue of ſome books, which had been written by him, but were never printed. REINIER GRUTER, ſon to Thomas, was Principal of Caſimir-College in Heidelberg. Some Letters which he had wrote to his brother Peter, are annexed to the ſecond Century abovementioned. The catalogue of his manuſcript compoſitions are not omitted in it. John Gruter, another ſon to Thomas, left his ſtudies, and took a journey into Italy which proved unfortunate; for having been ſo imprudent as to diſpute on the Euchariſt, he was forced to fly, to prevent his falling into the hands of the Inquiſition. He fled in the night to Naples, and ſet out a little after to return into his native Country; but died of ſickneſs before he had ended his journey (3). Some of his Letters have been publiſhed with thoſe of his brothers.

(3) Petri Gruteri, Epiſt. Cent. 2. pag. 234.

[C] His Latin Epiſtles met with very ill treatment, both from the Printers and Criticks.] Here follows the complaint made by him in the beginning of the ſecond Century (4): Externa quoque fata ſæpe eas involvunt; Typographo alibi ſtertente, & correctoris ignaviâ vacillante; quæ ſors meas certe obruit, nuſquam prælo magis famæ autoris invidente, quibus ſi deſidiam illius aſſocio, cujus fidei typorum curam adſcripſeram, omnem excuſationis cumulum confeci. i. e. "They likewiſe often in-"fluenced by outward accidents; as thro' the indo-"lence and ſupineneſs of the printer and corrector. "This certainly was the fate of my Epiſtles, no wri-"ter's reputation having ſuffered more by the preſs. "If I add to this the negligence of the perſon whom "I truſted with the impreſſion, I ſhall have apologiz-"ed ſufficiently for my ſelf." The ſame complaint is found in an hundred other places in this work. His reſentment againſt thoſe who cenſured the firſt Century, appears as often, and is no leſs vehement. His ſon hopes, that the ſecond Century will meet with a more favourable reception. Vario fato prima Centuria fluctuavit, iniqui ſubinde cenſoris aciem experta, prout rudi manu libram hanc vitio-creti judices verſarunt. Sed qui felices adoleſcentiæ tuæ primitias non benignè ventilarunt, fœcundæ virilitatis meſſem admirari diſcant (5). i. e. "The firſt Century of Epiſtles met with a various "fate, meeting ſometimes with unjuſt criticks, as it "happened to be read by ill judges. But let thoſe "who criticized the happy firſt fruits of your youth, "learn to admire the harveſt of your fruitful man-"hood." The truth is, thoſe Epiſtles were very juſtly ridiculed; and nevertheleſs a great many people ſent the author very fine encomiums upon his work, all which he publiſhed at the head of his ſecond Century. This ſhews, that whoever writes to a vain author, whoſe compoſitions are bad, ought to weigh well his expreſſions. One might juſtly fear, that ſuch a man would publiſh the applauſes that are beſtowed upon him, in caſe he has the originals in his own hands. Peter Gruter foreſaw, that his affecting an antiquated ſtyle would not pleaſe; for which reaſon he made an apology beforehand, and printed it with the firſt Epiſtles (6).

(4) Pag. 4.

(5) P. Gruteri, Epiſt. Cent. 2. pag. 184.

(6) Centuria Epiſtolarum & Apologia pro eadem, quâ inſtituti ſui & ſtyli ab uſu & Latiniſmi puritate abhorrentis rationem reddit. Val. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 742.

[D] He publiſhed a new Century of Epiſtles.] Valerius Andreas is miſtaken, in ſaying that Iſaac Gruter, the author's ſon, publiſhed it. It appears evidently, both by the Dedication and Preface, and a Letter of Giles Snouck, at the head of the reſt, that Peter Gruter put out the ſecond Century. This appears even by a Letter of his ſon Iſaac, printed at the end of the Book with a Carmen gratulatorium compoſed by him on that edition, and with ſome other Letters written by him to various perſons.

GRUTER (JANUS) a learned Philologer, and one of the moſt laborious writers of his age, was born at Antwerp the 3d of December 1560. He was but a child, when his father (a) and mother, being perſecuted for the Proteſtant Religion by the Ducheſs of Parma, Governeſs of the Netherlands, carried him into England. His mother, who was a learned woman, was his chief tutor [A]. He ſpent ſome years in the Univerſity of Cambridge, after which he came to that of Leyden [B], to ſtudy the Civil Law. He there took his Doctor's degree, but afterwards applied himſelf wholly to polite Literature, and ſoon publiſhed ſome critical works [C]. Though it is known, in general, that he travelled, it is not poſſible to deſcribe the circumſtances and order of his travels. He was in Pruſſia, when Chriſtian Duke of Saxony offered him the Chair of Hiſtory-Profeſſor in the Univerſity of Wittemberg. He accepted it, but enjoyed it but few months, on account of the demiſe of Chriſtian which happened a little after; and becauſe thoſe who ſucceeded him in the Government, obliged all the Profeſſors to ſubſcribe a formulary, or reſign their employments; but Gruter choſe to reſign his employment, rather than ſubſcribe any confeſſion of faith againſt his conſcience [D]. I find that he read public

(a) I ſpeak of him towards the cloſe of the remark [B].

[A] His mother, ... was a learned woman.] She was an Engliſh woman (1), named Catherine Tiſhem (2). She was ſo well verſed in the Greek language that ſhe could read Galen in that tongue, which very few Phyſicians are able to do. Is ſicut rebus duris conſtantiæ doctores utrumque parentem, ita matrem præcipuè ſtudiorum magiſtram, votum ſimul Agaſiclis conſecutus eſt, ut eorum diſcipulus diceretur, quorum & filius eſſet. Mater enim præter Gallicam, Italicam, Britannicam linguam, Latinas literas optimè, Græcas ita callebat, ut & Galenum, quod milleſimus Medicus vix ſolet, linguâ Galeni legerit. i. e. "Gruter was taught, by both his "parents, to bear adverſity with patience; and his "mother was his chief Inſtructor, whereby he had "what Agaſicles wiſhed for, viz. the having a parent "for his tutor; for his mother, beſides French, Ita-"lian and Engliſh, was ſo exceedingly well ſkilled in "the Latin tongue &c." I am afraid that thoſe who have publiſhed catalogues of learned women, have omitted Catherine Tiſhem too often.

(1) Fridericus Hermannus Flayderus, in Vita & Morte Jani Gruteri.

(2) Balthaſar Venator, in Panegyrico Gruteri, apud Henning. Witte, Memor. Philoſophorum, Oratorum &c. pag. 227.

[B] He ſpent ſome years in the Univerſity of Cambridge, after which he came to that of Leyden.] He ſtudied there ſeven years, if we may credit Valerius Andreas (3), who cites a preface of Gruter himſelf, and adds that Gruter had lived in England from the age of four years to nineteen; and that being deſirous of ſettling in his native country, after taking his Degree of Doctor of Laws, he left it immediately, upon advice being brought that it was going to be beſieged by the Duke of Parma. His father, who was a conſiderable man, and poſſeſſed employments in that city during the ſiege, being unwilling that his ſon ſhould ſtay in it, and partake in the inconveniencies of a ſiege, ſent him to France. Theſe computations are far from exact; for they ſuppoſe that the Duke of Parma beſieged Antwerp in 1586, which is not true. He beſieged it in 1584; ſo that if Gruter had left Leyden to retire to Antwerp before the ſiege; he could not have ſtudied in England till nineteen years of age, and afterwards ſeven years in Leyden. By the way, our Gruter's father's name was Gualtherus, and was a Burgomaſter of Antwerp (4). He ſigned the famous petition which was preſented to the Ducheſs of Parma, and whence the word Gueux (beggars) aroſe. After being proſcribed, he ſuffered many hardſhips before he got to Norwich in England, where he made a conſiderable ſtay. He afterwards came to Middlebourg, whence he went to Antwerp when the States had poſſeſſed themſelves of it. He deſired the Senate to grant him an exemption from all offices, which were allowed him till the City was threatned with a ſiege; for then he was not only Captain of his diſtrict or ward, but alſo one of the four Intendants of the proviſions. Gualtherus vici ſui magiſter delectus eſt; cui muneri minùs gravi ſucceſſit deinde gravius, cum Parmenſis obſidionem feciſſet. Rei namque frumentariæ quatuorvir, collegis Aldegondio, Leſdale, & Roſa, adſcitus in partem gloriæ illius mittendus eſt, quod annonæ conſcientiam ſic inter paucos ſeptam tenuiſſent, ut citra deditionem nec civi, nec hoſti conſtare poſſet, tantum tridui frumentum ſuperfuiſſe (5).

(3) In Biblioth. Belg. pag. 438.

(4) Flayderus, in Vita & Morte J. Gruteri.

(5) Venator, in Panegyrico Gruteri, pag. 224.

[C] He ſoon publiſhed ſome critical works.] The firſt pieces he publiſhed were Latin Verſes. He was then about twenty. Famæ ſuæ immortalis januam circa annum vigeſimum aperiebat verſibus, quos Ocellos vocabat (6). He afterwards publiſhed at Wittemberg in 1591, Suſpicionum Libri IX, in quibus varia Scriptorum loca emendata & explicata; and then he publiſhed, ſucceſſively, Notes on moſt of the authors of antient Rome; on the two Senecas, Martial, Tully, Livy, Florus, Velleius Paterculus &c.

(6) Flayderus, in Vita & Morte Gruteri.

[D] He choſe to reſign his employment, rather than ſubſcribe any confeſſion of faith againſt his conſcience.] He was required to ſign the book of Concord; but he anſwered, that he did not know this Book; had never ſeen nor read it; and that it would be the greateſt raſhneſs in him to approve a book he had never examined. Gruterus, cùm Librum Concordiæ nec vidiſſet nec legiſſet unquam abſtinuit à ſubſcriptione, quod temerarium eſſet & fatuum judicare de re, quam non videris, approbare Librum, quem non legeris, firmare ſententiam quam non conſideraveris, ſubſcribere divinis quæ cum divinis nondum contuleris. Miſſionem igitur prætulit (7). He therefore was removed with two other perſons who refuſed to ſubſcribe; but they came off much cheaper than he; half a year's ſalary being paid them by way of gratification, as is practiſed in thoſe countries with regard to ſuch perſons as are diſcharged honourably; but as to Gruter, ſo far from having this preſent made him, they did not defray even ſo much as the expences of his journey. He was the worſt courtier in the world, thought of nothing but his books, and did not loſe his time in endeavouring to gain the protection of favourites by ſubmiſſions and cringing viſits; and he judged, that all things duly conſidered, it would be more advantageous to him to give up all thoughts of that preſent, than to trifle away his time in tedious ſollicitations. Causâ ſuperius indicatâ, quod purpuras Aulicas adorare neſcierat, Principi verò tormentum, aut ſupplicationis continuæ fidiculas adhibere ſibi interdixerat. Minus enim moleſtiæ ineſſe videbatur diſpendio expedito, quàm ſtipendio aut præmio intricato (8). This is the genuine character of a true lover of ſtudy. But I know not whether we may not think it ſtrange, that a man who had read ſuch a multitude of books, ſhould be abſolutely unacquainted with that of The Concord. I am of opinion that Gruter was not a man of vaſt genius; but his extraordinary application, his boundleſs deſire to inform his mind with a numberleſs multitude of particulars, and the prodigious induſtry he employed in making collections, gained him a univerſality which nature had denied him. But then, why did he neglect to inform himſelf of a thing, which divided the Churches, and made ſo much noiſe among Divines? Probably he had no manner of inclination to ſtudies relating to controverſy. To ſpeak in a more poſitive way; he did not approve in any manner the diſputes which were carried on between Divines. Erat noſter alienus ab iſtis velitationibus, quas nec in aliis probavit (9). He would never concern himſelf with them; he never quarrelled with the Romaniſts about Religion, and on that account was ſuſpected of being inclined to change his Religion. Venator, his Panegyriſt, exclaims a little againſt thoſe who harboured ſuch ſuſpicions, he employing the following terms on that occaſion (10). Huc accedit quædam alia dementia, quæ frigere eos dicit in Religione, quos in contentiones non vident ardeſcere. Pontificio non oblocutus es? Ponficius haberis. Lutherano non reluctatus? Lutheranus audis. Calviniſtæ non inſultaſti? Calviniſta es. Iſtis enim nominibus invicem diſcedimus. Novi qui de

(7) Venator, in Panegyr. Gruteri, pag. 244.

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Idem, pag. 269.

(10) Ibid.

public Lectures in the Univerſity of Roſtock (b); but I know not when, nor in what manner he left it. The place where he made the moſt conſpicuous figure as Profeſſor, was the Univerſity of Heidelberg, where he alſo had the direction of that famous Library (c) which was carried to Rome ſome time after. This employment ſuited him wonderfully well, and enabled him to publiſh a great number of Commentaries. One of the moſt uſeful works publiſhed by him, is a large collection of inſcriptions [E]. Nothing could be (b) See the remark [D] citation (10).

(c) He began to have it about anno 1602.

GRUTERO propter hanc ipſam cauſam Tranſitionem ſparſerant. Sicut & David Chytræus, quod in Academia Roſtochiana GRUTERO, qui tunc ibidem Suetonium legebat, conjunctior erat, & ſtudium rixandi averſabatur, Calviniani nominis invidiam ſuſtinuit. i. e. "We may join another piece of madneſs to this, "viz. the calling thoſe cold in matters of religion, "who are not inflamed with a ſpirit of controverſy. "Have you never railed againſt Papiſts? Immediately you are looked upon as a Papiſt. Have "you never had any conteſt with a Lutheran? You "are called a Lutheran. Did you never inſult a "Calviniſt? You are a Calviniſt; for ſuch are the "names that, by turns, divide us. I am acquainted "with ſome perſons, who, on this very account, "ſpread a report that Gruter was gone over. In "the ſame manner David Chytræus, becauſe he was "very familiar, in the Univerſity of Roſtoch, with "Gruter, who at that time read lectures on Suetonius "there, and abhorred ſtrife, was ſtigmatized with "the name of Calviniſt." The Panegyriſt had juſt before ſpoken very judiciouſly againſt ſuch as are fond of diſputing, and on the evil effects which ariſe from controverſies. A man, ſays the author, does not grow better, but is thereby more inflamed againſt his neighbour. Certamina talia ſemper feré iſtis eventibus finiuntur, ut acerbius fiat odium inter partes, & nemo per illa melior. Mira res eſt, quod commiſſionibus factionum, argumentorum verſutiis, clamoribus, convitiis, mutuis execrationibus Deo nos gratiores fieri putamus, cum amor, & pax, & manſuetudo, & præcedentum mater Fides nobis rem conficiant, quorum tamen poſtrema cura habetur, & inter diſceptandum nulla. Hæreſes odiſti? Dicam quæ maxima ſit, Hypocriſis. Hanc prius exuamus. Quotus enim quiſque de gloria Dei priùs cogitat, quam de ſua? Quotuſquiſque melius vivit, quàm diſputat (11)! i. e. "It is ſurpriſing, that we "ſhould think to make our ſelves more acceptable to the "divine Being, by factious controverſies, by clamours, "by railing, and by reciprocal execrations, when "love, peace, mildneſs, and faith, the parent of "them all, are enough for our purpoſes, and ne"vertheleſs are taken care of the laſt of all, and "not the leaſt in diſpute. Do you hate hereſies? "I will tell you which is the greateſt of all He"reſies; it is Hypocriſy. Let us firſt root this out of "our minds; for who among us conſiders God's Glo"ry ſooner than his own? How many live better "than they diſpute?" I muſt inform my Readers, that they muſt not too highly credit what Venator advances on this head; for he appears too much exaſperated againſt Divines, and draws them in too odious colours. We ought therefore to read the following words with great caution (12). Multas inauſpicatas, inimicas & arcentes aves mortales illi ubique fere nanciſcuntur, nullas tamen infeſtiores hodie, quam quæ de ſuggeſtu diris omnibus regnant, & populares animos odiis aſperant, quos vetus Augurum diſciplina ignoravit, niſi, quia de ſummo vocem mittunt, Supervaganeas cum antiquis appelles, aut picarum generi adſcribas quodam collegio naturæ, quoniam utriſque par inſolentia, quam illis fabulæ tribuunt, par conviciandi & obtrectandi libido,

(11) Ibid.

(12) Ibid. pag. 222.

THE character which Venator gives of Divines.

Raucaque garrulitas, ſtudiumque immane loquendi.

Dicam clariùs. Sunt nonnulli (abſit enim ut omnes eadem cenſura vexem) & in ipſa matre noſtra Germania de ſacro ordine homines ſacerrimi, qui velut divinarum & humanarum rerum, judices atque arbitri tanta confidentia partem illam, quam neſcio quis optimam & peſſimam dixit, exercent, ut quidvis in quoſvis, nullâ curâ verum an falſum, intemperanter effundant, aureſque & fidem Vulgi ignobiliſſima captivitate damnent & ſervitute. Aliquis ipſis non dedit? Avaritia: non ſcrupuloſe ſatis honoravit? Arrogantia: non laudavit? Ambitio: non rudis eſt? Invidia: non aſſentitur? Inimicitia: malum morem tangit, tum vero capitale odium eos facit diſertos. i. e. "Theſe men get, in almoſt all places, many in"auſpicious, envious Birds, yet none more pernicious "at this time, than thoſe which triumph from the "Pulpit with curſes of every kind, and inflame the "minds of the vulgar; ſuch as the antient diſcipline "of the Augurs was wholly ignorant of, except that, "becauſe they declaim from on high, you will de"nominate them, with the antients, Supervaganeæ; or "place them among the Magpies, from a certain ſi"militude in their natures, becauſe both have the "ſame inſolence which are aſcribed to them in Fa"ble the like luſt of ſlander and detraction;

"A hoarſe garrulity, and boundleſs thirſt
"Of ſpeaking. ———

"To be plainer. There are ſome, (Heaven forbid "that I ſhould cenſure them all in the ſame manner) "even in our own country (Germany), perſons of the "moſt ſacred character, who, as if they were the only "judges and arbiters of both divine and human "things, act in ſo confident a manner that part, which "ſome one has called the beſt and worſt; that they "publiſh any thing of any perſon without the leaſt "guard or caution, whether it be right or wrong; "and captivate in a moſt ignoble manner the ears "and faith of the vulgar. Does any one refuſe to "be liberal to them? They cry, he is covetous: "does not he pay them ſufficient honour? He is ar"rogant: has he not applauded them? He is ambi"tious: is he not ill bred? He is envious: does he "not aſſent to them? He is their enemy: but if he "blames them for their bad morals, ſo capital an "offence makes them then eloquent." This is ſufficient on this ſubject: but the author ſays much more, which the reader may have recourſe to, in caſe he is deſirous of knowing it.

[E] One of the moſt uſeful works publiſhed by him, is a large collection of Inſcriptions.] Here follows the Hiſtory of this work (13). Martin Smetius, a native of Bruges, ſpent ſix years in travelling through every part of Italy, in order to collect Inſcriptions; and having added them to thoſe which were communicated to him by ſome learned men, he digeſted them in very good order. Marcus Laurinus, Lord of Watervliet, a great lover of antiquity, deſired from him a copy of thoſe Inſcriptions, promiſing to reward him in a proper manner for his pains. Whilſt Smetius was engaged in this work, his houſe was ſet on fire, which conſumed all his furniture, as alſo his Inſcriptions, about fifty leaves excepted, which he had laid by, in a cloſet. Laurinus, by entreaties and promiſes, encouraged him to reſtore that work in its firſt perfection, which was accordingly done; after which this noble collection was put into the hands of Laurinus, who, after preparing to retire into France, to ſhun the dire effects of a civil war, took with him his Inſcriptions, and the treaſure of antient Medals which Hubert Goltzius had collected with numberleſs difficulties, and at a prodigious expence. But he was plundered of the whole by the Engliſh garriſon at Oſtend. He could not have recourſe to Smetius a ſecond time; for he being a Proteſtant Miniſter in Bruſſels, had been hanged there by the ſoldiers. Goltzius married his widow. During this interval Janus Douza, being ſent into England by order of the States, purchaſed the manuſcript Inſcriptions of an Engliſh Soldier, and gave it to Lipſius, who printed it with ſome ſupplements. Gruter took theſe Inſcriptions, and adding to them all thoſe which he had been able to collect with inexpreſſible pains, digeſted them; publiſhed them in Heidelburg anno 1601; and was ſo happy as to prevail with Joſeph Scaliger to draw up 24 Indexes, upon which that great man beſtowed ten months. Hoc Gruterus tandem noſter aſinino prorſus labore ex lateritio marmoreum, imo aureum fecit, nam & illas pauciores primo ſervavit, & omnes be more affecting to a perſon of his caſt of mind, than the deſtruction of his fine Library which was plundered [F] with the city of Heidelberg in 1622. He had left this city before it was taken, and had retired to his ſon-in-law's at Bretten, from whence he went to Tubingen. He returned to Bretten when the affairs of the Palatinate were a little quieted; but being moleſted by the Roman Catholics [G], he retired to a country houſe which he bought near Heidelberg. He uſed to go, by intervals, to that city; and was come from it the day he ſickened of the diſtemper of which he died. He ſet out from it the 10th of September 1627, to go to Berkhelden (d), where he expired in ten days. He was buried at Heidelberg in St. Peter's Church. Juſt as he was dying, news came that he was invited by the Univerſity of Groningen, to be Profeſſor of Hiſtory and the Greek tongue (e). He had received invitations from ſeveral other places [H]. No man was (d) A country ſeat belonging to Oſwaldus Smendius, his ſon-in-law, at a league's diſtance from Heidelberg. Moreri ſhould not have aſſerted that he died in Heidelberg.

(13) Extracted from Flayder's Life of Gruter.

(e) Extracted either from Balthaſar Venator, in Gruter's Panegyric, or from Frederic Herman Flayder, de Vita & Morte Gruteri.

quotquot unquam in toto orbe ſuperfuerant collegit inſcriptiones, & eaſdem in ordinem coëgit, & denique Cæſari Rudolpho parenti publico perpetuoque Auguſto dedicatum publicavit. Cui ipſemet Joſephus Scaliger in ſenecta ætate, ſolo amore atque ſtudio quo Gruterum proſequebatur compulſus, viginti quatuor Indices decem menſibus continuo illis inſudando adjecit (14). The Emperor beſtowed great encomiums on this work, and gave Gruter the choice with regard to the recompence he deſired. The author anſwered, that he would leave it to the Emperor's wiſdom and diſcretion, provided the reward was not to be pecuniary: and upon hearing that there was a deſign to give him a coat of arms, in order to raiſe the dignity of his extraction in the Empire, he declared, that, ſo far from deſiring a new coat of arms, he was too much burthened with thoſe which had devolved to him from his anceſtors. His Imperial Majeſty was then deſired to grant him a licence for all the books he ſhould publiſh (15). This the Prince conſented to. and would alſo have Gruter inveſted with a character, which might enable him to grant privileges (16). He intended to create him Count of the ſacred Palace; but that Monarch dying before he had ſigned the patent, this affair came to nothing. Gruter was too haſty in making his acknowledgment. Decreta res apud Principem, approbata in Senatu Auguſto, relata ad Principem iterum, ut ſubſcribendo firmaret, quod præſcripſerat communicando. Sed Cæſarem occupavit morbus, deinde fatum, quod bonas actiones plerumque cum authoribus finit. Literæ itaque, quibus ſuperiora Privilegia continebantur, ſicut ejus generis mille alia, more quodam differendi, relictæ ſunt abſque manu Imperatoris, abſque ſignatione, nec poſtea unquam productæ, quia nova poteſtas facilius ſua beneficia orditur, quàm aliena abſolvit, & novis curis occupata rarò ſuccedit in obligationem veteris promiſſi. Itaque GRUTERUS luculentiſſimum munus nunquam accepit, & laudes Cæſaris optimi ſic celebravit, quaſi integrum accepiſſet (17). i. e. "The affair was agreed to "by his Imperial Majeſty, approved by the Imperial "council, and brought back to the Emperor, that he "might ratify by his ſign manual, what he had been "pleaſed to order. But his Imperial Majeſty was "ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs, and died; a circum"ſtance which commonly puts a period to good "actions with their authors. Therefore the patent "which contained the privileges abovementioned, "like a thouſand more of the ſame kind, by being "delay'd, § was left without his Imperial Majeſty's "ſignature, nor ever after produced; for a new "Monarch is more diſpoſed to begin with beſtowing "his own favours, than to compleat thoſe of his "predeceſſors; and being buſied in new cares, ſel"dom imagines himſelf obliged to make good for"mer promiſes. Thus GRUTER never received this "very conſiderable privilege: and nevertheleſs he "beſtowed the ſame encomiums on the good Em"peror, as he would have done had he enjoyed it "fully."

§ This affair muſt have been long delay'd, ſince the Emperor Rodolphus II, who is here ſpoken of, did not die till the 23d of January 1612, that is, eleven years after the publication of Gruter's book. "[This "edition of the Inſcriptions, is infinitely exceeded by "that which J. G. Grævius, publiſhed under the fol"lowing title, which expreſſes the contents of it: "Inſcriptiones antiquæ totius orbis Romani in abſolutiſſi"mum corpus redactæ olim auſpiciis Joſephi Scaligeri "& Marci Velſeri, induſtria autem & diligentia Jani "Gruteri, nunc curis ſecundis ejuſdem Gruteri & notis "Marquardi Gudii emendatæ, & tabulis æneis à "Boiſſardo confectis illuſtratæ, denuò cura J. G. "Grævii recenſitæ. Accedunt Adnotationum Appendix & "Indices XXV emendati & locupletati, ut & Tyronis "liber & Senecæ notæ. Amſtelodami 1707 in fol. 4 "vol. This is a moſt ſplendid edition in all reſ"pects." Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(14) Flayder, in Vita Gruteri.

(15) Venator, in Panegyr. Gruteri, pag. 241, & ſeq.

(16) Annuit igitur Cæſar de privilegio, & in ipſo privilegio de privilegiis ultro cogitavit. Non tantum illis quæ GRUTERO, ſed & quæ concederet. GRUTERUS Comitem enim S. Palatii deſignavit. Idem, ibid. pag. 243.

(17) Ibid.

[F] His fine library was plundered.] It had coſt him twelve thouſand crowns (18). Oſwald Smendius, his ſon-in-law, endeavoured to ſave it, but in vain. He wrote for this purpoſe to one of the great officers of the Duke of Bavaria's troops, but the wild licentiouſneſs of the ſoldiers prevailed over the good intention of this officer. Smendius hearing that Gruter's houſe had been plundered, went to Heidelberg, and ſaw the wild havock that had been made of his books. He endeavoured to ſave, at leaſt, thoſe which Gruter's Amanuenſis had lodged in the Elector's library, and beſought the Pope's Commiſſioner to give him leave to remove them. It was anſwered him that, as to the manuſcripts, the Pope had ordered them all to be ſought for carefully, and be carried to Rome; but that, with regard to the printed books, leave would be given for them to be reſtored to Gruter, provided that Tilly approved it, by a note ſigned by him. However, this pretended courteſy proved of no effect, becauſe Tilly could not be ſpoke with (19).

(18) Flayder. in Vita Gruteri.

(19) Extracted from Venator, in Panegyr. Gruteri, pag. 265.

[G] He was ... moleſted by the Roman Catholics.] I already obſerved (20) that he never loved controverſy, or religious diſputes; therefore, upon his being very much troubled and importuned by ſome young Jeſuits, who were mightily for diſputing, he ſoon left Bretten. The firſt time he anſwered them with great mildneſs, and ſet them right with regard to ſome Paſſages in St. Auſtin which they had miſquoted; but when they renewed the attacks he began to be angry; called them a parcel of preſumptuous young fellows; and told them how civilly he was treated by Andrew Schottus and James Sirmond. Ipſum quoque juvenes quidam ex familia Jeſuitarum diſputando ſolicitabant, quibus ille primum placidè reſpondit, & ſemel etiam ſententiam Auguſtini, quam non ſatis memoriter ipſi meminerant, ex libro præſenti oſtendit, docuitque aliis verbis, & alio loco extare, quod ab illis & pro illis fuerat allatum. Deinde cùm nec dum deſiſterent, quin ipſum talibus obtunderent, libertate reſumta, mirari ſe dixit, ubi frontem reliquiſſent ſemibarbatuli juvenes, ut ſperent docere ſenem ſexagenarium, qui plures Patres in vita legerit, quàm ipſi ſaltem vidiſſent. Jeſuitas ſenes & primarios (SCHOTTUM nominabat & SIRMONDUM) ſibi mutuo honore litterarumque commercio coli: nullam tamen ab iſtis de Religione ſibi moleſtiam exhiberi. Erat enim noſter alienus ab iſtis velitationibus, quas nec in aliis probavit (21). 'Twas not the buſineſs of a critic like Gruter, to diſpute about controverted points with young Jeſuits brought up in ſubtleties of the Schools; and he did not find any other way to rid himſelf of their importunities than to go and live at a diſtance from them.

(20) The remark [D] above.

(21) Venator, in Panegyr. Gruteri, pag. 268, 269.

[H] He had received Invitations from ſeveral other Places.] The moſt remarkable was that made by the univerſity of Padua. He (22) was there offered the Profeſſorſhip which was vacant by the death of Riccoboni. The ſalary was very conſiderable, and they offered him liberty of conſcience; but he refuſed all theſe advantages, notwithſtanding the ſolicitations of Pinellus and Velſerus. He was afraid, in caſe he ſhould accept of ſo profitable and honourable an employment, that it would expoſe him to the attacks of envy; and he would not deprive himſelf of the publick exerciſe of his Religion. Erat ei religioni religio, ſed was ever so laborious as Gruter, as I have already observed in the beginning [I]. He possessed a quality that is seldom found, I mean a disregard for wealth. He was not desirous of enlarging his fortune, bestowed alms with a very liberal hand, and used to lend money without making much enquiry whether the borrower would be able to pay him [K]. He sed & erat religioni ipsa pecuniæ summa, quæ cæteroqui paucis nimia est, & multis oportuna ad impietatem merces. . . . Cultus enim divini libertatem publicam (quamvis privatim recepturus) pro quibuscunque divitiis sibi negabat esse venalem ; præterea tam humanum sciebat esse invidere alienæ felicitati, quàm alienæ virtuti, & hanc quidem propter invidiam non esse deserendam ; illum verò feliciorem esse, qui non sit infelix, quam qui cum invidia felicissimus (23). i. e. "Gruter made a conscience " of religion, and did the same of the money (salary), " which, to a few, is too great, and to many is an " opportune occasion of Impiety . . . . for he declared " that all the riches in the world should not bribe him " to leave the publick exercise of the religion he " professed, notwithstanding that he should be permit- " ed in private ; besides, he knew men are apt to " envy another's felicity, as well as virtue ; and that " the latter ought not to be forsaken on account of " envy ; but that he is more happy who is not un- " happy, than he who is most happy with envy." This is more meritorious in a critic than it would be in many others. I find that Gruter was invited to Denmark ; that constable d'Esdiguieres invited him by letter into his service ; and that Claude d'Expilli and Charles Perinet, Lord of Maugarniac, exhorted him to comply with the Constable's desire (24). The Curators of the University of Franeker offered him, in 1624, the Professorship in History (25).

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 239.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Idem, ibid. pag. 275.

(25) Gruter. Epist. ad Hofmannum inter Richterianas, pag. 549.

[I] No man was ever so laborious as Gruter] How many very learned men might be called indolent, if their labours should be compared with that of Gruter? Cum quo etiam doctissimi hujus ævi, si laboris emensi respectu comparentur, desidiosissimi vocabuntur (26). Spizelius, who says this, had borrowed it from Flayder, who adds : Cum etiam illi qui tota sua vita literis assident huic collati, quasi sommo & inertiæ dediti erubescere cogantur, nisi Gruteri labores callidius dissimulare velint, quam candidius æstimare. i. e. "When even such as " pass all their lives in study, if put in comparison " with Gruter, are forced to blush as tho' they were " devoted to sleep and idleness ; unless they more " artfully dissemble, than ingenuously enumerate the " Labours of Gruter." The abovementioned Spizelius observes, that Gruter published a book almost every month. Nullus ferè author sive Græcus sive Latinus extabat ex antiquis, quem non notis ac commentariis suis aut illustravit, aut illustrare potuerat ; nemo plura veterum recensuit monumenta & restituit ; imò singulos suæ vitæ annos, ac propemodum menses, libris singulis à se editis distinxit. i. e. There was hard- " ly any Greek or Latin Author among the an- " tients, whom he did not illustrate with notes and " commentaries, or could have done it ; no man ever " revised and restored a greater number of antient " Monuments, insomuch, that he distinguished " each year, and almost each month of his life by " the Treatises he published." He used to study all day, and a great part of the night, and always standing : Die toto, maximam sæpe noctium partem stans literis operam navabat . . . stans scribebat, stans legebat, stans studebat (27). The reader will believe this extraordinary application of Gruter to be true, when he considers the number of books he either wrote or collected into a Body. His Thesaurus Criticus (28) is of the latter sort, wherein he collected, in six thick Octavo Volumes, a vast number of Treatises written by the most excellent Criticks, which it would have been extreamly difficult to find, had he not collected them. [In 1623, Daniel Paræus added a 7th Volume, which is far inferior to the rest. Addit. by the Transl.] He did the same service to many modern Poets whose works he has collected under the title of Deliciæ Poetarum Gallorum, Italorum, Belgarum, in nine Volumes (29). He assumed, in that compilation, the name of Ranutius Gerus, the anagram of his own (a). He published two Florilegia. The first in three volumes 8vo, contains a large collection of proverbs of almost all Nations, with Notes. The second is a continuation of Langius's Polyanthea. The first volume of this Continuation was printed in Strasburg anno 1624 in folio. Composuit (30) quoque Polyantheæ tomum tertium & quartum, nondum tamen editos, qui si referantur ad Langianum sunt Oceanus ad guttulas. i. e. " He also " drew up the third and fourth volume of the Poly- " anthea, not yet published, which, when put in com- " parison with that of Langius, are like an Ocean " to some drops of water." He published a Chronicon Ecclesiasticum & Politicum, in four thick volumes in 8vo, at Frankfort anno 1614, where, instead of his own name, he put that of Joannes Gualterus, in remembrance of his father (31). [Among other pieces pieces of Gruter, (the complete catalogue of which is found in vol. 9th of Father Niceron's Hommes illustres) is the following, Christophori Pflugii Epistola monitoria novæ editioni Plauti quæ modò adornatur præfigenda, in qua fatuitas Apologiæ Joannis Philippi Paræi contra Janum Gruterum detegitur. Wittebergæ 1620 in 8*vo.* Gruter, who did not love Pareus, having attacked the explications he had given of some passages of Plautus, who was his favourite Author ; the latter defended himself, and this defence drew upon him this Work of Gruter, the title of which shews the spleen with which it is written. And indeed Gruter attacks him with the most opprobrious expressions, he calling him an ass, a packhorse, a hog, a goat, an owl, a distracted wretch, &c. Gretser, for his amusement, collected from this work, 136 equally injurious invectives, which hurt the author more than the person to whom they are addressed. Pareus answered by a book intitled Provocatio ad Senatum Criticum pro Plauto & Electis Plautinis, 1620, and employed the like virulent terms against Gruter, who wrote another piece against Pareus. Addit. by the Transl.] Gruter was too passionately desirous of writing a great number of Books, for which reason they are not so perfect as one could wish, with regard to choice and judgment. Non curat, said Scaliger (32), utrum charta sit cacata, modo libros multos excudat . . . quod fecit Gruterus in Senecam, is a School-boy or a Printer's work. Amelot de la Houssaye (33) has spoke with great contempt of this critick's performance on Tacitus, and Baudius had, long before, passed the same judgment on it. Vidi quæ J. Gruterus ad eum auctorem annotavit. Diligentiam ejus in colligendis varie sententiis improbare nefas sit. Sed (quod libere liceat) commissiones meræ sunt, &, ut flagitiosissimi Caligulæ non absonum dictum in re simili usurpem, arena sine calce. Videtur sibi proposuisse ad imitandum rationem illam, quam secutus est Lipsius in admirabili & præstantissimo opere De civili Doctrina. Sed Dii boni ! quam longo intervallo, quam non passibus æquis vestigia sectatur (34). i. e. "I have seen Janus Gruter's annotations " on that Author. It would be unjust to discommend " the diligence he has employed in collecting the opi- " nions of various writers. But I cannot forbear ob- " serving, that they are a mere medley ; and, to em- " ploy an apt expression of the most wicked Caligula " on the like occasion, they are sand without lime. " Gruter seems to have proposed for his imitation, the " manner and method which Lipsius observed in his " admirable and most excellent work entitled De ci- " vili Doctrina. But Heavens ! how wide a difference " is there between the two Authors." The Reader will find another passage of the same Author in the remark [M].

(26) Spizelius, in Felice Literato, pag. 1042.

(27) Flayder. in Vita Gruteri.

(28) It is intitled, Lampas sive Fax Artium liberalium, hoc est Thesaurus Criticus.

(29) Printed anno 1608, 1609, 1614.

(30) These words are in the Catalogue of Gruter's Works, at the end of his Life, written by Flayder.

(31) Flayder, ubi supra.

(32) Scaligerana, pag. m. 100, 101.

(33) Preface to his Translation of Tacitus.

(34) Baudius, Epist. 13. Cent. 2. pag. m. 171.

(a) Mr. Bayle should have said Gherus ; for thus it is written in the titles of the Books in question. Father Vavasseur has writ with an h, but erroneously, Grutherus, pag. 209, de Epigrammate Liber & Epigrammatum Libri tres, Parisiis 1669 in 8vo. REM. CRIT.

Gruter's excessive application to Books, might probably occasion some wild flights in him, which made Commelinus say, that Gruter was a perfect madman : When he meets with something he does not understand, he frets and fumes, and throws his book upon the floor (35).

(35) Scaligerana, pag. 101.

[K] He used to lend money, without making much enquiry whether the borrower would be able to pay him.] Tho' he had been cheated on these occasions, he nevertheless would lend with great pleasure, and thought it

He ſubmitted with patience to adverſe fortune; and though he was not inſenſible at the death of his four wives, it was however obſerved, that it was not extremely difficult to comfort him on thoſe occaſions [L]. The moſt violent Literary quarrel in which he was engaged was with Philip Pareus, which I have ſpoken of elſewhere (f). That which he had with Dionyſius Godofredus was like a flood [M]; violent, but of ſhort continuance.

(f) In the remark [C] of the article PAREUS (PHILIP).

it a happineſs that he was not a woman; for then, would he ſay jokingly, I ſhould not have denied any body. Et egenis benignè dedit, & indigis prompte credidit; utrumque virtute indolis, cum tam crudele putaret non dare eſurienti, quam inhumanum negare mutuanti. Et quamquam ipſius argentum non ſemel in mala nomina inciderat, & obliviosam fidem, facientibus ex commodato donum, quibus dignum erat ultra ſortem etiam uſuræ loco reddere gratias. Non tamen deſiſtebat ille, quoties rogaretur, pecunias promere auxiliares, cum interim ſubinde confiteretur damnoſam facilitatem ſuam, dicere per jocum ſolitus; Bene ſecum actum, quod puella non eſſet natus, haud dubiè enim nemini ſe fuiſſe negaturum (36). i. e. "He relieved the poor in a kind manner, and readily "lent to thoſe who wanted to borrow; on both theſe "occaſions he followed his natural propenſion, he "judging it as barbarous not to feed the hungry, as "inhuman to refuſe one who wants to borrow. And "notwithſtanding that he often truſted his money in "bad hands, thoſe whom he favoured on ſuch occa"ſions looking on the monies he lent them as a gift; "whereas they ought, over and above the principal, "to have returned him thanks by way of intereſt; "yet Gruter did not leave off lending money, as of"ten as he was deſired to do it; declaring always at "the ſame time, that his too eaſy temper was preju"dicial to him; and ſaying jokingly of himſelf, that "it was happy for him he was not of the fair ſex, "for then he certainly could not have refuſed any per"ſon." Neither the ingratitude or improbity of ſome of his debtors, made him more aware of others, and require from them a ſecurity or bond. He neglected thoſe formalities in law, even when he paid his daughters portions. In ſe itaque potius facetè luſit, quam ingratos aſperè perſtrinxit, aut propter hos inhumaniter alios rejecit, aut eoſdem ſponſoribus, teſtibus aut ſcriptis publicis ſtipavit, ut & ipſi in ære eſſent, & fides in cuſtodia. Quem morem vulgò receptum noſter ne tunc quidem adhibuit, cùm majoris etiam momenti pacta forent condenda, cum filiabus generos daret, & dotem, nulla teſtium conſcientia, nulla Formulariorum curioſitate, nullâ cerâ, quam ſocerì generique opus eſſe cenſebat (37). i. e. "He therefore rather joked upon himſelf, than "exclaimed againſt the ingratitude of his creditors; "or inhumanly refuſed others becauſe of the ill-uſage "he had met with, or even required ſuch ſecurity "from them as might prevent his loſing the money. "This common form of proceeding he even neglected, "when he was to engage in contracts of much greater "moment, viz. when he was to beſtow his daughters "in marriage and give them portions; he imagining "that there was no occaſion of witneſſes, deeds, ſign"ing and ſealing between father and ſon in law."

(36) Venator, in Panegyr. Gruteri, pag. 254.

(37) Idem, ibid.

[L] It was not extremely difficult to comfort him on thoſe occaſions, (the death of his wives.)] This we may gather from the words of his Panegyriſt, who probably did not reveal all he knew on that head; he not looking upon inſenſibility as a commendable quality. He tells us, that one of Gruter's four wives came to a fatal end, for ſhe fell from the top of the houſe and was killed; nevertheleſs her huſband ſupported courageouſly this diſaſter, which the circumſtances of it ſhould naturally have made more grievous; he not afflicting himſelf as men commonly do on thoſe occaſions. Doluit ille quidem magnopere morte uxoris, doluit ipſâ ſpecie mortis, doluit inopinâ viduitate, ſed poſt amiſſionem tamen uxoris multum abfuit ab amiſſione ſui, multum ab impatientia vulgari, quæ plerumque cùm corrigere non poſſit mala ſua, corrigere vult Deum (38). i. e. "He indeed was "greatly afflicted for the death of his wife, as well "as for the particular circumſtances of it, and his ſud"den widowhood; but tho' he loſt his wife he yet "was not loſt as to himſelf; nor did he diſcover that "uſual impatience, which, when it cannot remedy its "own evils, is apt to quarrel with Heaven itſelf."

(38) Ibid. pag. 256.

[M] The quarrel he had with Dionyſius Godofredus was like a flood.] This learned Civilian had corrected ſome places in Seneca in a different manner from him, upon which Gruter immediately publiſhed the following piece againſt it, Confirmatio ſuſpicionum extraordinariarum contra Dionyſii Godofredi conjecturas & varias Lectiones in Senecam Philoſophum. He publiſhed it at Frankfort in 1591. The fire of youth carried Gruter too far; and he afterwards heartily repented of what he had done on this occaſion, when Godofredus became his collegue (39), and they were reconciled. The Panegyriſt pretends, that this diſpute is of ſuch a nature, that, conſidering the learning it contains, it would have been a pity had not theſe two criticks quarrelled; and, that, on the other ſide, one would have wiſhed they had never fallen out, on account of the paſſion and fury that appear in it. The turn of Venator's Latin is more happy than the above tranſlation, as the learned Reader will here ſee. Quod certamen inter ipſos certatum vix poſſis nolle, quin velis, vix velle, quin nolis. Adeò multum excidebat inter diſceptandum humanioris doctrinæ, adeò multum rurſus inhumanioris cenſuræ. Gruterus ipſe calorem illum juventutis ſæpe poſtea deteſtatus eſt. Cum enim optimus & doctiſſimus ille, quem Gruterus paulò vehementiùs antea tetigerat, Heidelbergam ipſe quoque docendi cauſa veniſſet, reconciliatio primùm inter ipſos facta eſt, deinde ſecuta propior notitia, & tandem apud Gruterum pœnitentia ſcriptionis, ut ita loquar, piperatæ. Nam ſi mihi conſtitiſſet, inquiebat noſter, Dionyſium virum eſſe tam bonum, nunquam quicquam mihi tanti fuiſſet, ut contra illum manum tam ſeriò miſiſſem (40).

(39) He was Law Profeſſor in Heidelberg.

(40) Venator, in Panegyr. Gruteri, pag. 261.

To prove that he was ſincerely reconciled to Godofredus, I ſhall mention a circumſtance which I find in Baudius's letters. The latter had deſired him to give his ſervice to that Civilian; but Gruter did not perform the commiſſion, becauſe Baudius, in his opinion, had not given Godofredus ſufficient encomiums; and he therefore obſerved to him, by letter, that it was not enough to give ſuch a man the title of laborious, and applaud him as having done no little ſervice to the Civil Law; but that he ought to praiſe him as one from whom that ſcience had received important ſervices; or rather employ more emphatical expreſſions. Baudius was diſpleaſed at this hint, and ſpoke in very unhandſome terms of Gruter, in a letter he wrote to a learned man of Hamburg. Quemadmodum Grutero non fuit animus ſalutandi meo nomine Dionyſium Godofredum, quia nimis parca manu laudes & virtutes ejus eram perſecutus: quod & ſignificavit per literas adjuncto noſtro elogio, ſi forte me ratio fugiſſet. Erat autem tale, vir laborioſus, & non male de jure meritus. Dicere debueras, inquit, optime, aut ſi quid aliud efficacius. Vide quid oneris nobis injungatur, ut faſces ſubmittamus ſcilicet iis, quibus οὐκ ἐστι νὲς ἀρτίφρων. Omnes hominis dotes abunde complexus eſſe videor, ſi dicam Sarcinatorem eſſe probum fuere centones optime. Ego malim in æternum ejerare omnem ſcribendi copiam, quam tali pacto me poſteritati æſtimandum proponere, etſi hæc via & ad opes & ad æſtimationem ducit, ἀλλὰ μᾶλλον αἰχύνομαι ἢ ἐμαυτὸν, καὶ τὰς τῶν ἐπομένων δόξας. Quamquam bonum illum Gruterum (eſt enim vir minime malus, imo vix capax malitiæ) prorſus habeo excuſatum, ſi id ætatis homo non poteſt ablegare vaniſſimam illam gloriæ cupiditatem, quæ nunquam ſeneſcit, & (uti incomparabilis meus Tacitus ait) ſapientiam profeſſis, noviſſima exuitur (41). i. e. "In the ſame manner as Gruter "did not care to make my compliments to Denys "Godofredus, becauſe I had beſtowed too little en"comiums on his virtues; which he likewiſe ſig"nified by letter, adding the elogium I gave, for fear "it ſhould have ſlipt my memory. It was in the "following terms: A laborious man, and who did not "deſerve ill of the Law. You ought, ſays he, to "have ſaid, One who was moſt deſerving, &c. or any "ſtronger expreſſion. What a fine taſk he impoſes "upon me, to pay obedience to perſons who are not "fit judges? Methinks I expreſs ſufficiently all the "qualifications of the man, If I declare, that he is "a good compiler, and patches up Cento's admirably "well. With regard to my ſelf, I would ſwear ne-

(41) Baudius, Epiſt. 9. Cent. 2. pag. m. 164, 165.

ance. He made a very good uſe of the misfortunes which he met with in the latter part of his life, as appears by the moral Reflections he publiſhed (g). His curioſity, though exceedingly great, had no other object but erudition; he not amuſing himſelf with town news, as ſo many other Literati do [N], who never go to bed till they have heard all the flying ſtories. Nor did he trouble himſelf about controverſies (h); and this doubtleſs was one of the motives which prompted an adverſary of his to charge him with profeſſing no Religion: and yet he gave ſo many proofs of his attachment to the Proteſtant Church, that many paſſionate and ſlanderous controverſial Writers have not piety enough to give the like [O].

(g) Intitled, Bibliotheca Exulum, ſive Enchiridion divinæ humanæque Prudentiæ.

(h) See the remarks [D] and [G].

" ver to take up the pen ſo long as I live, rather than " have my character tranſmitted to poſterity in ſuch " a light, notwithſtanding that this is the path both " to fame and wealth. Though I excuſe in every " reſpect Gruter, (who is a good ſort of a man " enough) if, though he be ſo far advanced in years, " he cannot eradicate from his mind that moſt empty " thirſt of glory, which never decays; and, as Ta- " citus moſt happily expreſſes it, is the laſt paſſion of " which a Philoſopher diveſts himſelf." I preſume that none of my readers will be diſpleaſed to know on what occaſion Baudius wrote this, " Should any " one aſk after me, (he had ſaid a little before) " be ſo good as to give my ſervice to ſuch a per- " ſon, though I ſhould not have made any men- " tion of him; for I don't think that people are ſo " very miſtruſtful of you; or are ſo very ſilly in your " country, as to believe nothing but what they read." Quæſo te quoties in quempiam incideris cui veniat in mentem noſtri, ne graveris eum verbis noſtris impartiri ſalute, tametſi nihil ea de re nominatim caveam. Non enim arbitror aut tibi tam parum eſſe fidei, aut veſtros homines adeo ineptire, ut nihil niſi inſpectis ſignis & tabellis credere ſuſtineant (42). He then relates, how Gruter had refuſed to give his ſervice to Godofredus; not being willing to do it without ſhewing Baudius's own words. Now ſuch a ſervitude as this is never found among learned men who have the leaſt honour or politeneſs.

(42) Idem, ibid. pag. 164.

[N] He not amuſing himſelf with town-news, as ſo many other Literati do.] The author whom I quote, cenſures ſuch learned men as have ſuch a curioſity. In his opinion, men of that caſt muſt be fond of hearing a thouſand calumnies; of knowing the evil deſigns of ſtep-mothers, and the temptations of widows; temptations did I ſay; it ſhould be big-bellies, as the Latin expreſſes it. Nec prius in dulcem declinent lumina ſomnum, niſi exactiſſime à ſui ſimilibus congerronibus cognôrint, Quid toto fiat in orbe, Quid Seres, quid Thraces agant, ſecreta novercæ Et pueri, quis amet, quis decipiatur adulter? Imo quis viduam prægnantem fecerit & quo Menſe (43) Gruter was praiſeworthy for not loving ſuch ſort of news (44). Quamquam in omni artium ac ſcientiarum indagine curioſiſſimum ſemper ſe exhibuerat, alieniſſimus tamen fuerit ab omni reliqua curioſitate, ſive πολυπραγμοσύνη, quæ haud raro doctiſſimis quibuſdam nimis eſt familiaris ac domeſtica, ut ubique tibi obvii, nil niſi novitates aut rumuſculos aniles ad innocentium ac ſimplicium, ut vocant, mortalium vitam macula inurendam fabrefactos, aucupentur, & impetuoſorum inſtar ventorum atque turbinum, non modo veſtes hominum, ſed ædium quoque parietes atque facta intima ſupinent, nec prius in dulcem &c. (45). See the reſt of this paſſage above.) i. e. " Al- " though he had always diſcovered a very great cu- " rioſity for ſearching into arts and ſciences, he ne- " vertheleſs was void of every other kind of curioſity, " as that impertinent one, which is too frequently " ſeen in moſt learned men, who go in queſt of " news and ſilly rumours, forged purpoſely to preju- " dice the characters of harmleſs and innocent per- " ſons; and like impetuous blaſts or whirlwinds, lay " open and uncover, not only men's garments, but " alſo the walls of their houſes, and moſt ſecret " actions; nor can go to ſleep till &c."

(43) Flayder, in Vita Gruteri. See Juvenal. Sat. 6. ver. 400.

(44) See the remark [H] of the article ALTING (JAMES).

(45) Flayder, in Vita Gruteri.

[O] He was charged ... with profeſſing no religion: and yet he gave ſo many proofs of his attachment to the Proteſtant Church, that many paſſionate and controverſial writers have not piety enough to give the like.] It is ſaid that Philip Pareus accuſed him of having a greater eſteem for one ſentence of Apuleius or Petronius, than for all the precepts of Jeſus Chriſt: his atheiſm, added he, is known, and his indifference with reſpect to religion. Unum Apuleii aut Petronii effatum pluris facit quam infinita ſervatoris noſtri παραγγέλματα. Notus quippe eſt ejus ἀθυσμὸς, & in ſacra religione ψυχρότης frigus (46). I have not now an opportunity of examining whether James Gretſer the Jeſuit, who is quoted for this purpoſe, copies exactly the words of Philip Pareus; but I am ſure that the following words are found in the Index of one of Pareus's books (47). Gruterus ſcurriliter illudit religioſiſſimis Salvatoris myſteriis; and this other, Gruterus ἄθεος & Theologiæ ſacræ ignarus. The reader is referred to page 334, in which the following words are found: Abi, Grutere; & Theologica mitte, quæ nihil ad Criticum tuum umbonem. Tuum eſt, conflictari cum blattis ac tineis, non ſcrutari myſteria ſacra, quæ nunquam didiciſti; immò quæ adſpernari ſolitus es, Critico planè & aſinino ſupercilio. i. e. " Go, go, Gruter, and med- " dle not with divinity, which has nothing to do with " your critical ſkirmiſhes. It is your buſineſs to fight " with moths and worms, and not to dive into ſacred " myſteries, which you never learnt; nay, which " you were wont to contemn, with the ſupercilious " ſneer of a ſtupid critic." Thoſe perſons who ſhall be informed that Gruter, for conſcience ſake, refuſed to ſubſcribe a formulary (48), at a time when his refuſal loſt him his employment; and that he rejected a Profeſſor's chair in the Univerſity of Padua (49), becauſe he could not profeſs his religion publickly there; what I ſay, will ſuch perſons think of that man's boldneſs, who dared to charge him with atheiſm? What will they think when they find, that this pretended atheiſt made the following anſwer to thoſe who aſſured him, that he muſt change his religion, or leave the country; I will ſooner do the latter than the former: in caſe I am not permitted to ſpend my days in cities, I will paſs them in the fields or groves; the Almighty will there provide for me ſome herbs or roots, to ſupport me during the few years I have to live. Cum juberetur ad aliam Religionem tranſire, aut exire foras, hoc malo, inquit, quàm illud. Si non licebit vivere in urbe, licebit in agris aut in ſilvis. Aliquid ſemper Deus ſuppeditabit radicis aut herbæ, quod ſpiritum hunc alat, non diu moraturum (50). Are theſe indications of atheiſm, or indifference with reſpect to religion? Are they not rather ſo many proofs of a genuine and ſincere zeal, that ought to be much ſooner credited than all the reports and clamours of controverſial writers, who damn all other communions?

(46) Philipp. Pareus, teſte Jacobo Gretſero. See Part 4. of Crenius's Animadverſiones, pag. 142.

(47) Intitled, Analecta Plantina. It was printed at Frankfort in 1623.

(48) See the remark [D].

(49) See the remark [H].

(50) Venator, in Paneg. Gruteri, pag. 272.

(a) I know not why Moreri calls him GRINER.

GRYNÆUS (a) (SIMON), ſon to a peaſant of Suabia, was born at Veringen in the county of Hohenzollern anno 1493. He purſued his ſtudies in Pfortſheim at the ſame time with Melanchthon, which gave riſe to a friendſhip between them that was of long continuance. He continued his ſtudies at Vienna in Auſtria, and there took his degree of Maſter of Philoſophy, and was appointed Greek Profeſſor. Having embraced the Proteſtant Religion, he was thereby expoſed to many dangers, and particularly in Baden, where he was ſome years Rector of the School. He was thrown into priſon at the inſtigation of the Friars; but at the ſollicitation of the Nobles of Hungary he was ſet at liberty, and retired to Wittemberg, where he ſaw Luther and Melanchthon, and had a conference with them. Being returned to his native country, he was invited to Heidelberg, to be Greek Profeſſor in that city anno 1523. He exerciſed this employment till the year 1529, when he was invited to Baſil to teach publickly in that city. He explained ſeveral authors there, and even the epiſtle of the Romans. He was employed, in conjunction with ſome other perſons, anno 1534, in reforming the Church and School of Tubingen. He returned to Baſil in 1536, and was there appointed, anno 1540, to go to the Conferences of Worms with Melanchthon, Capito, Bucer, Calvin, &c. He died of the plague in Baſil the 1ſt of Auguſt 1541 (b). He had taken a journey into England in 1531, and received the higheſt civilities from the Lord Chancellor Sir Thomas More [A], to whom Eraſmus had recommended him. He was a learned and laborious man, and did great ſervice to the Commonwealth of Learning [B]. See his Elogium in Verheiden's Collection (c), and in Joachim Camerarius's Preface to Theophraſtus. SAMUEL GRYNÆUS his ſon, born at Baſil in 1539, was there appointed Profeſſor of Eloquence at twenty five years of age, and had afterwards the Profeſſorſhip of Civil Law. He died the third of April 1599 (d).

(b) Extracted from Melchior Adamus, in Vit. Philoſoph. pag. 118, & ſeq.

(c) Verheiden, Elogiis præſtant. aliquot Theolog. pag. 61.

(d) Melch. Adam. in Vitis Juriſconſ. pag. 338, & ſeq.

[A] He received the higheſt civilities, from the Lord Chancellor Sir Thomas More.] This particular is not found in Melchior Adamus, for which reaſon I am the more careful in relating it. It is extracted from the dedication to Plato's work, printed in Greek at Baſil, apud Joannem Valderum anno 1534 in folio. It is there that Grynæus, as a teſtimony of his gratitude, addreſſes John More the Chancellor's ſon as follows (1). Annus eſt (ut noſti) tertius jam, cum in Angliam . . . veniens ac Eraſmi noſtri commendatione velut vento ſecundo ad illas muſis totas ſacras ædes veſtras delatus, humanitate mira acciperer, majori tractarer, maxima dimitterer. Non ſolum enim ampliſſimus vir pater tuus ac tum quidem conditione, per cætera vero rebus omnibus egregiis facile toto regno princeps, privatum hominem ignotumque me, literarum tanto ergo, ad colloquium inter tot publica privataque negotia admiſit: menſæ ſuæ ſceptra regni gerens adpoſuit; in aulam abiens rediens ſecum traxit: laterique adjunxit ſuo, ſed omnem meam de religione ſententiam locis non paucis diverſam ab ipſius eſſe haud difficulter præſentiens, placide benigneque cognovit: ac cum ab illa non parum tum diſcreparet opera conſilioque ſic juvit nos tamen, ut omne mihi negotium ſumptibus etiam ſuis confecerit. Nam & itineri comitem Harriſium doctum juvenem addidit, & Oxonienſis Gymnaſii Proceribus ſic literis inſinuavit, ut ad earum conſpectum omnes nobis collegiorum omnium non ſolum bibliothecæ, ſed ſtudioſorum etiam animi velut mercuriali quadam virgula tacti pateſcerent. i. e. " It is three years " ſince (as you may remember) that arriving in England, " and being recommended moſt auſpiciouſly by my " friend Eraſmus to your houſe, the ſacred ſeat of the " muſes, I there met with a very humane treatment, " was entertained with greater, and diſmiſſed with " the greateſt of all. For that great and excellent " man your father, who was ſo conſpicuous for his " exalted rank and noble talents, not only allowed " me, a private and obſcure perſon, (ſo fond was he " of Literature) to the honour of converſing with him " in the midſt of ſo many public and private affairs; " gave me a place at his table, though he was the " greateſt man in England; took me with him when " he went to Court or returned from it, and had me " ever by his ſide; but alſo, with the utmoſt gen- " tleneſs and candor, enquired, in what particulars " my religious principles differed from his; and " though he found them to vary greatly, he yet was " ſo kind as to aſſiſt me in every reſpect, and even " defrayed all my expences. He likewiſe ſent me to " Oxford with one Mr. Harris a learned young Gen- " tleman, and favoured me with ſo advantageous a " recommendation to the Heads of that Univerſity, " that at the ſight of his letters, I was admitted into " the Libraries of the ſeveral colleges, and to the " moſt intimate familiarity (as though a magical " wand had been employed on this occaſion) of the " Students." Some manuſcripts of Proclus were ſhewn him in Oxford; and he was allowed to take them with him, which favour was heightened by Sir Thomas More, he making him a preſent of them (2). The paſſage of Eraſmus I am now going to quote, mentions the abovementioned journey of Grynæus.

(1) Simon Grynæus, Epiſtola ad Jo. Morum Operibus Platonis præfixa.

(2) Quibus de velut theſauro invento gratulantem pater tuus donatum liberaliter ac beneficiis ſuis plane cumulatum in patriam remiſit. S. Grynæus, Epiſt ad J. Morum Operibus Platonis præfixa.

[B] He was a learned . . . man, and did great ſervices to the commonwealth of Letters.] Eraſmus gave the following teſtimony of his merit, in 1531. Simon Grinæus . . . . . eſt homo Latinè Græcèque ad unguem doctus, in Philoſophia & Mathematicis diſciplinis diligenter verſatus; nullo ſupercilio, pudore penè immodico. Pertraxit hominem iſthuc Britanniæ viſendæ cupiditas, ſed præcipuè bibliothecarum veſtrarum amor (3). i. e. " Simon Grynæus, . . . is perfectly well ſkilled in the " Latin and Greek tongues, and is a good Philoſo- " pher and Mathematician; no ways proud, and " modeſt almoſt to a fault. A deſire of ſeeing Eng- " land brought him thither, but principally for the " ſake of their Libraries." We are obliged to him for the editions of ſeveral ancient authors. He was the firſt who publiſhed the Almageſt of Ptolemy in Greek (4), to which he added a preface, concerning the uſe of that author's doctrine. He alſo publiſhed a Greek Euclid with a preface (5), and Plato's works with ſome Commentaries of Proclus (6). He corrected, in ſome places, Marſilius Ficinus's Latin verſion of Plato. See the edition of Plato 1539, at Baſil apud Froben. Thoſe who deſire to know the particulars of his verſions, prefaces, and other writings, may conſult the Abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, pag. 755, and 756, printed at Zurich anno 1583.

(3) Eraſmus, Epiſt. 39. lib. 26. pag. 1464. C.

(4) At Baſil, apud Jo. Valderum, 1538.

(5) At Baſil, apud Hervagium, 1533.

(6) At Baſil, for John Valderus, anno 1534.

The Bodleian Catalogue aſcribes ſome works to him which muſt certainly be of other authors, de Cometa qui fulſit annis 1577-78. De inuſitata magnitudine & figura Veneris annis 1578-79. We have ſhewn that he died in 1541. I don't doubt but that the Treatiſe de ignitis Meteoris & de Cometarum cauſis ac ſignificationibus, which is aſcribed to him in the abovementioned Catalogue, is, as well as the other two, the compoſition of SIMON GRYNÆUS, Phyſician and Mathematician in Heidelberg, and ſon of one THOMAS GRYNÆUS, who was nephew to the perſon whoſe article we are now writing. The reſt of the works which the Bodleian Catalogue aſcribes to Simon Grynæus, really belong to the Grynæus of the preſent article.

GRYNÆUS (THOMAS) nephew of the foregoing, was born in Veringen in Suabia about the year 1512. He ſtudied under his uncle in Heidelberg and Baſil, and taught the Latin and Greek tongues eleven years in the city of Berne; after which, a love of tranquillity, and an averſion to diſputes prompted him to quit that employment, becauſe he was drawn into the Controverſies in which the Miniſters were engaged. He returned to Baſil, where he was made one of the Profeſſors in 1547. He read public Lectures, and uſed to preach ſometimes in the villages. The Marquiſs of Baden having introduced the Proteſtant Religion in his dominions, appointed him Miniſter of Rotelen (a). He diſcharged worthily the duties of his function, for eight years, till his death, that is, till the 2d of Auguſt 1564. He left four ſons, viz. THEOPHILUS, SIMON (b), JOHN JAMES, and TOBIAS, who were all famous for their erudition (c).

(a) In the Upper Marquiſate of Baden, within a mile of Baſil.

(b) See the cloſe of the remark [B] of the preceding article.

(c) Extracted from Melchior Adamus, in Vitis Theolog. pag. 398.

GRYPHIANDER (JOHN) born in the territory of Oldemburg, was Profeſſor of Poetry and Hiſtory in the Univerſity of Jena after Reuſnerus, who died in 1612. He took his degree of Doctor of Laws in the ſame Univerſity, anno 1614; and returned four years after into his country, there to exerciſe a poſt of Judicature. He died in December 1652 (a). Some of his compoſitions are extant [A].

(a) Extracted from P. Freherus's Theatrum, pag. 1130.

[A] Some of his Compoſitions are extant] A Treatiſe concerning Iſlands, the compleat Title of which is as follows: Joannis Gryphiandri ICti de INSULIS Tractatus ex ICtis, Politicis, Hiſtoricis, & Philologis collectus, ut omnibus hiſce uſui eſſe poſſit, in quo plurimæ cognatæ quæſtiones de mari, fluminibus, lacubus, littoribus, portubus, aquæ ductibus, aggeribus, navigationibus, alluvionis, alveique incremento &c. excutiuntur. It was printed at Frankfort in 4to Anno. 1624. Nothing can be more inſtructive than a particular Treatiſe on a certain queſtion, when it is undertaken by a learned man, who propoſes to exhauſt it. There are a numberleſs multitude of Quotations in this work of Gryphiander. He wrote one on the Phœnix in 1618. That which he publiſhed in 1625, is very curious, the ſubject whereof is, a certain right belonging to ſome cities of Saxony, viz. the ſetting up in them coloſſal Statues of Roland. Here follows the title of the Book: Commentarius de Weichbildis Saxonicis, ſive Coloſſis Rulandinis urbium quarundam Saxonicarum. Konig aſcribes to Gryphiander a Treatiſe de œconomia legali, which is not mentioned by Freherus.

GRYPHIUS (SEBASTIAN) a famous Printer of Lyons in the ſixteenth Century, was a German. He performed the duties of his profeſſion with ſo much honour, that he was publickly applauded for it by ſeveral very learned men; and among the reſt Julius Cæſar Scaliger, and Conrad Geſner, the latter of whom dedicated one of his books to him [A]. It is pretended that the former inſcribed his work, De Cauſis Linguæ Latinæ, but it is a miſtake [B]. One of his moſt beautiful editions is a Latin Bible. He publiſhed it in two volumes folio, anno 1550, and employed the largeſt types that had been ſeen till then (a). It does not yield in beauty to any Bible, that excepted which was printed at the Louvre anno 1642 in nine volumes folio (b). The great number of books printed by him are valued by thoſe who are judges of the art and perfection of printing. He dealt very fairly with regard to his Errata [C], and employed able correctors [D]. He likewiſe printed the Hebrew in the utmoſt perfection (c) [E]. I muſt not omit obſerving that (a) Majoribus & auguſtioribus typis. Gryphius in præfat. apud Chevillier, Origine de Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 150.

(b) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 151.

(c) Idem, ibid.

[A] Conrad Geſner dedicated one of his books to him.] The twelfth of his Pandects, on which occaſion he beſtows the following Elogium upon him. Tu inter primos, humaniſſime Gryphi, minime prætereundus in mentem mihi veniſti πολλῶν ἀνταξιος ἄλλων, cui non poſtremus inter eximios ætatis noſtræ chalcographos locus deberetur: idque eò magis, quoniam non ſolum inter externos in Gallia innumeris optimis libris optima fide ſummaque diligentia elegantiaque procuſis, maximam tibi gloriam peperiſti: ſed noſtras etiamnum eſſe videris, qui Germanus in Galliam veneris (1). i. e. "You, moſt humane Gryphius, were one of the firſt who came into my "mind; you who merit not the laſt place among "the moſt celebrated Printers of our age; and eſpecially on this account, becauſe you have not only "gained greater fame than any Foreigner in France, "by the vaſt number of the moſt excellent works, "printed by you with the greateſt beauty and accuracy; but becauſe you ſeem to be one of our countrymen, tho' a German, by your coming to reſide "among us." To this Dedication is annexed a catalogue of the Books which Gryphius had printed.

(1) Geſner, in Pandectis, folio 117.

"[B] But it is a miſtake] Julius Scaliger did not "dedicate his Books De Cauſis Linguæ Latinæ to Sebaſtian Gryphius, printer in Lyons. He only wrote "a Letter to him concerning this Book which he "was to print, on which occaſion he ſays to him, "Tuam vero, mi Gryphi, veram pietatem, excellentem eruditionem, inſignem humanitatem, his noſtris lucubratiunculis & præeſſe volui, & moderari, ſi id tibi ita collibuiſſet: ut poſteri intillegerent, ejus frugis proventum, ſi qua ad eorum commoda per nos exculta eſſet, à nobis tantùm commendari, quantùm ex diligentia tua, atque auctoritate gratiæ conſequi potuiſſet. "i. e. I was deſirous, my Gryphius, that a perſon "of ſuch unfeigned Piety, excellent Erudition, and "remarkable Humanity, ſhould ſuperintend and direct my works, in caſe you are inclined to this: in "order to inform Poſterity, that I tranſmit my compoſitions to you, (in caſe they can be of any ſervice) recommended by your care and authority." Now can this be called a dedication? Julius Scaliger wrote likewiſe a Letter to Vaſcoſan the Printer, to recommend to him the printing of his Book De Subtilitate. Not to mention that Julius Scaliger was too proud to dedicate a Book of his compoſing to a Printer; he particularly would not have dedicated his Books De Cauſis Linguæ Latinæ to Gryphius, becauſe he inſcribed them before to Silvius Cæſar Scaliger his eldeſt ſon, to whom he alſo addreſs'd his Ars Poetica. Julius Scaliger wrote his to Sebaſtian Gryphius in the ſame manner as Quintillian wrote to Trypho, the Bookſeller, to recommend to him his Inſtitutiones Oratoriæ, which he had dedicated to Marcellus; and in the ſame manner as Scævola Sammarthanus addreſſed ſome Hendécaſyllabic Verſes to Mamert Patiſſon, to deſire him to be careful in printing his works (2). This is what Menage has obſerved, in a Book printed Anno 1688. Had that judicious enquirer Mr. Chevillier known this, he would not have aſſerted that Julius Cæſar Scaliger dedicated to Gryphius (3), "his Treatiſe De Cauſis Linguæ Latinæ printed Anno 1540. in 4to. in which he makes "him the following Compliment, that if his works "have met with a favourable Reception from the "Learned, 'twas owing as much to the beauty and "magnificence of the impreſſion, as to their own "merit; Cum plerique librorum meorum .... tuis opibus atque apparatibus ea gratia effecti (4) ſint, ut "non minus tuum ob beneficium quam propter ſuum meritum eos doctiſſimus quiſque exceperit & probarit." The fault cenſured by Menage might be very eaſily committed; for Scaliger's Letter to Gryphius is at the head of the work. The ſame fault is committed in the ſupplement to Moreri.

(2) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 55, 56.

(3) Chevillier, Origine de l'Imprimerie de Paris, pag. 151.

(4) In my edition in 8vo, apud Santandreanum 1597, it is affecti.

[C] He dealt very fairly with regard to his Errata.] "To ſhew that his Bible was correct, and ſhew his "probity at the ſame time, he did a remarkable thing. "Printers uſed commonly to place the errata in the "leaſt viſible part of the work, whereas Gryphius "printed them in the moſt obvious place; for the "firſt page contains the title of the work, the Printer's "mark, and the date of the impreſſion; the ſecond "page includes the errata, and the third the dedication (5)."

(5) Chevillier, Orig. de l'Imprim. de Paris, pag. 151.

[D] .... and employed able Correctors.] Here follows a proof of their accuracy. The Errata of Stephen Doletus's Commentarii de Lingua Latina conſiſts but of eight miſtakes, tho' this work is two volumes in folio. Since there were ſo very few typographical errors, Gryphius might aſſert very juſtly, that the utmoſt care had been taken in correcting the proofs. Erratis & mendis in opere tam vario tamque ſpiſſo carere omnino non potuimus, tametſi omni diligentia & cura quanta maxima potuit adhibita (6). Adam Knouf, a Phyſician of Colen, was one of his Correctors (7).

(6) Apud Chevillier, ibid.

(7) Jacobus Zuinger, in Auctario Theatri Vitæ Humanæ, pag. 1712, edit. 1604, apud Chevillier, ibid.

[E] He likewiſe printed the Hebrew in the utmoſt perfection.] Chevillier adds, There is in the Library of the Sorbonne Pagninus's Theſaurus Linguæ ſanctæ, printed by Gryphius, which is a very beautiful edition, and printed in folio, anno 1529 (8).

(8) Ibid.

(d) Inventaire de l'Hiſtoire Journaliere, by T. G. P. fol. 190 verſo edit. de Paris 1599.

that he was a learned man [F]. He died the 7th of September 1556 (d). ANTHONY GRYPHIUS, his ſon, exerciſed honourably the ſame profeſſion as his father in the ſame city. Both have been applauded by Verdier Vau-Privas [G]. There was a Printer at Venice in 1557, whoſe name was JOHN GRYPHIUS.

[F] I muſt not omit obſerving, that he was a learned man.] " (9) Majoragius calls him an eminent and " learned man, vir inſignis ac literatus . . . (10), and " John Vulteius of Reims ſays, in one of the epi- " grams of his firſt Book, that Robert Stephens was " a very good corrector, (a) Colinæus a very good " Printer; but that Gryphius was both an able Printer " and Corrector.

" Inter tot nôrunt libros qui cudere, tres ſunt
" Inſignes; languet cætera turba fame.
" Caſtigat Stephanus, ſculpit Colinæus, utrumque
" Gryphius edocta mente manuque facit."

See the Letter which Sadolet wrote to him (11).

§ (a) His name was Simon de Colines, in Latin Colinæus. La Croix du Maine always calls him ſo; and he calls himſelf thus in all the French Books I have ſeen of his printing. CRIT. REM.]

[G] Sebaſtian and Anthony Gryphius . . . have been applauded by Verdier Vau Privas.] " Sebaſtian Gry- " phius, ſays he (12), a native of Suabia near Auſburg, " has reſtored the Art of Printing, which before was " corrupted, in Lyons: has reſtored it entirely, and " adorned it with new and very beautiful Hebrew, " Greek and Latin types, in which languages he is " exceedingly well verſed. The Poets of his time cal- " led him the excellent Trypho of our age, of whom " Martial makes mention. His houſe was greatly " frequented by the Literati. He was diligent and " curious in ſearching every where for ſuch Books as " were well nigh loſt, and in order to reſtore them, " that poſterity may enjoy ſo valuable a treaſure, a " great part of which Anthony Gryphius his ſon has " ſtill in his hands to be printed. And as his father " exerted himſelf in all reſpects, in order to recover, " and afterwards print them faithfully; ſo his ſon is " not ſparing of his expence or labour to make them " public. He died at 63 years of age, in 1556."

(9) Menage, Anti-Baillet, tom. 1. pag. 57.

(10) In his Apology for changing the name of Antonius Marius Comes, to that of Marcus Antonius Majoragius, cited by Menage, ibid.

(11) It is the 16th of Book 5. pag. m. 184.

(12) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Proſopographie, pag. 497 (the ſecond time this page is thus numbred) edit. 1573, 4to.

GUADAGNOLO (PHILIP) Reader of Arabic and Chaldee in the College della Sapienza, at Rome, in the ſeventeenth Century, was one of the firſt who was employed in tranſlating the Scriptures into Arabic; after the Congregation de propaganda fide reſolved to comply with the deſires of ſome Eaſtern Prelates, who had preſented a petition to Pope Urban VIII for this purpoſe, about 1624. The Archbiſhop of Damaſcus, and father Guadagnolo were ordered to undertake this Tranſlation; but, ſome time after, the latter only continued this weighty taſk. He was very much eaſed in the Pontificate of Innocent X, he then being employed only in correcting the Tranſlation. He died at Rome the 27th of March 1650 (a). A Treatiſe he publiſhed againſt a Mahometan Doctor is highly eſteemed [A].

(a) Extracted from the Giornale de' Letterati, of Jan. 29, 1672, where mention is made of this tranſlation of the Bible, which at laſt was publiſhed at Rome in 1671, in three vol. folio.

[A] A Treatiſe he publiſhed againſt a Mahometan Doctor is highly eſteemed.] It is an apology for the Chriſtian Religion, in oppoſition to the objections of Ahmed Ben Zin Alabedin. He publiſhed it in Latin, at Rome, anno 1631; and afterwards in Arabic anno 1637. Theodore Hackſpan declares (1), that he never met with a better Book againſt the Mahometan Religion. It is to be obſerved, that Father Guadagnolo publiſhed Linguæ Arabicæ Inſtitutiones, in folio, anno 1642.

(1) In Tractatu ad Librum Nizachon R. Lipmanni adjecto, pag. 343. apud Crenium, de Philologia, pag. 221.

☞ It will be very neceſſary to add a ſupplement to this article of Mr. Bayle's [A].

[A] It will be neceſſary to add a Supplement to this Article of Mr. Bayle's.] Philip Guadagnolo (*) was born about the year 1596, at Magliano, in the farther Abruzzo. After going thro' his ſtudies, he entred among the Clerici regulares Minores, and made his profeſſion at Rome, in the Church di San Lorenzo in Lucina, the 13th of May 1612. His genius prompted him to the ſtudy of languages, to which he devoted himſelf entirely; ſo that he acquired the Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Perſian and Arabic Languages, but excelled chiefly in the laſt of them (†). He ſpent the greateſt part of his life in tranſlating books from that language, and in writing works in it, to facilitate the learning of it to others. He was ſo perfect a maſter of it, that he ſpoke, the 14th of Jan 1656, an Oration in Arabic in preſence of the Queen of Sweden (‡). He began his Arabic Tranſlation of the Bible in 1622 (4), and it was not finiſhed till after 27 years cloſe application, that is, till 1649. During the time that he was employed in it, he gave an account, twice a week, of what progreſs he had made, to a congregation aſſembled for that purpoſe. Guadagnoli publiſhed alſo, Breves Inſtitutiones Linguæ Arabicæ. Romæ 1642, folio. This is a very methodical Grammar. He had alſo compiled a Dictionary in that language, but the publication of it was prevented by his death. The manuſcript is preſerved in the Convent of San Lorenzo in Lucina. The occaſion of Guadagnoli's writing his Apologia pro Religione Chriſtiana &c. was this. A Spaniard had publiſhed a religious Book entitled The true Looking-Glaſs, which falling into the hands of a learned Perſian, he wrote an anſwer to it in his native tongue, and entitled it, the Poliſher of the Looking-Glaſs (Politor Speculi;) and added theſe words to the end of his Book; let the Pope anſwer it. This Book being brought to Rome in 1625, Pope Urban VIII ordered Guadagnoli to refute it. He accordingly did this with ſo much ſucceſs, that the Perſian, to whom it was ſent, was ſo thoroughly convinced of the truth of the Chriſtian Religion, that he renounced the Mahometan Faith, and became a zealous Defender of the principles which he had before oppoſed to the utmoſt of his abilities (*). Our Author wrote another work in Arabic, entitled, Conſiderations againſt the Mahometan Religion, which was printed at Rome in 1649. Guadagnoli ſhews in this work, that the Koran is a mere rhapſody of impoſtures and falſities (§).

(*) Or Guadagnoli.

(†) Hommes illuſtres de P. Niceron. tom. 7. pag. 274.

(‡) Idem, ibid.

(4) Conſequently the Eaſtern Biſhops muſt have preſented their petition to Pope Urban VIII, ſooner than 1624, as is ſaid in Mr. Bayle's text.

(*) Hommes Illuſtres, tom. 7. pag. 276, 277.

(§) Ibid. pag. 276.

GUAGNINI (ALEXANDER) a native of Verona, and naturalized in Poland, made himſelf famous both by his ſword and pen. He had conſiderable employments in the Poliſh armies; and having diſplayed his valour in the wars of Livonia and Moldavia, as well as thoſe of Muſcovy, was not only honoured with the Indeginate (a), in the reign of Sigiſmund Auguſtus, but alſo made Governor of the Fortreſs of Witebſk, where he commanded fourteen years. He at laſt devoted himſelf to Literature, and drew up a Hiſtory of Poland [A]. He died at Cracow in 1614, aged ſeventy ſix years,

(a) That is the privilege of being reputed a noble Pole.

[A] He . . . drew up a hiſtory of Poland.] Here follows the title of it, according to the Frankfort Edition of it 1584 in 8vo, for John Wechel: Rerum Polonicarum Tomi tres: quorum primus omnium Poloniæ Regum, years, and was never married. His titles were Comes Palatii Lateranenſis, & Eques auratus (b).

(b) Extracted from Starovolſcius, pag. 101, 102. Ἑκατοντάδος Scriptorum Polonicorum.

gum, à Lecho primo gentis Duce, ad Stephanum Bathoreum, etiamnum regem: tum Principum Lituaniæ, chronologicam recenſionem, ac ſingulorum res geſtas complectitur: adjecta recens Hiſtoriarum in noſtram ætatem incidentium continua narratione. II. Provinciarum, quæ uno Sarmatiæ Europææ nomine vulgo veniunt, chorographicam deſcriptionem continet. III. Res ſingulariter à Polonis in Valachia geſtas, Orationes item & Epiſtolas ſceptri Polonici negocia concernentes habet. Alexandro Guagnino, equite aurato peditumque præfecto authore. Sigiſmund Feyerabenius the Bookſeller, who was at the expence of the impreſſion, dedicated the work to Mark Fugger, Lord of Kirchberg and Weiſſenhorn; and there mentions the great ſervices which Anthony Fugger his father, and John James and George Fugger his uncles had done to the Imperial City of Auſburg, when Charles V was going to puniſh the inhabitants of it on account of their inſurrection. Starovolſcius obſerves that Guagnini wrote this Chronicle of Poland in very pure Latin, puro & nitido ſermone Latino, anno 1578, and got it tranſlated into Poliſh by Martin Paſcowſki, in 1611 (1).

(1) Strarovolf. Ἑκατ. Script. Polon. pag. 102.

GUALDRADA, a Florentine Lady, conſpicuous for her chaſtity, of which ſhe gave ſo ſeaſonable a proof before the Emperor Otho IV (a), that ſhe was rewarded for it, by having the ſatisfaction to be inſtantly married to very great advantage [A], as will be ſeen below. Dante makes mention of her in a very glorious manner; for ſpeaking of a famous warrior [B], he denotes him by ſaying that he was nepote di Gualdrade (Gualdrada's grandſon).

(a) He reigned about the beginning of the 13th Century.

[A] She was rewarded for it, by having the ſatisfaction to be inſtantly married to very great advantage.] As an illuſtration of this, I ſhall make uſe of an old French Commentator upon Dante. "This Lady, ſays he (1), "in her bloom of life, was very handſome and graceful, daughter of Meſſire Bellincione Barti de Ravignani, an ancient family of Florence, and one of the branches of that of the Ademari. It happened one day that as the Emperor Otho IV was at Florence in an aſſembly of Ladies, which was held on account of the feſtival of St. John Baptiſt, that he was ſtruck in a ſurprizing manner with the beauty of this maiden; and aſking whoſe daughter ſhe was, Bellincione her father happening to ſtand near the ſaid Emperor, replied before the whole aſſembly, that ſhe was daughter to a man who had a ſtrong deſire to have her kiſs him. The maiden hearing what her father ſaid, and being ſtruck with a baſhful modeſty, roſe up pleaſantly and cried, Father, I beſeech you not to make ſo free with aſking wherein I am ſo nearly concerned; for you'll let me take the liberty to aſſure you, that no man ſhall kiſs me unleſs he be my lawful huſband. The Emperor was ſurprized to hear ſo chaſte and prudent an anſwer, in ſo young a Lady; and thereupon immediately ſent for one of his Barons, Guido by name, and commanded him to marry her forthwith; giving her, as a portion, the Caſſentin and part of Romagna; and beſtowed the title of Count upon her huſband, from whom the Counts Guidos are deſcended. The ſaid Gualdrada brought Count Guido two ſons viz. William and Ruggier."

(1) Grangier, Commentaire, ſur le Chant 16 de l'Enfer de Dante, pag. 182.

[B] Dante . . ſpeaking of a famous Warrior, denotes him by ſaying that he was nepote di Gualdrade.] It is in the XVIth Canto of his Inferno, where we find the following words:

Queſto, lorme di mi peſtar cui vedi,
Tutto che nudo, e dipelato vada
Fu di grado maggior, che tu non credi:
Nepote fu della buona Gualdrada;
Guidoguerra hebbe nome; e in ſua vita
Fece col ſenno aſſai, e con la ſpada.

The ſenſe is:

"This ſhade whoſe footſteps you ſee me follow, tho' "it be naked and ſtript of its ſkin, was of a greater "rank than you imagine. He was grandſon of the "gentle Gualdrada, and named Guidoguerra; being "famous, in his life-time, for his wiſdom and valour."

The French Tranſlator (2) of Dante, ſays in his Commentary on this Italian Poet, that Ruggier Guidoguerra, nephew to the fair Gualdrada, "was a vali- "ant Knight, and a man of great prudence; inſomuch "that in the battle of Benevento between Charles I "and Manfredo, he was thought to be the chief in- "ſtrument of the victory which the ſaid Charles won, "by his happening to be Colonel there of CCCC Flo- "rentine Knights, who had been baniſhed for being "Gulfes, who ſome time after returned to Florence, "and, with the aſſiſtance of Charles, drove the Ghi- "belins from the ſaid city." It muſt be obſerved that Grangier contradicts himſelf, when he explains this degree of kindred in the following page. "From the ſaid Guido and Gualdrada ſprung "two ſons, William and Ruggier; and, from Rug- "gier Guidoguerra, who therefore is Gualdrada's ne- "phew (3)." How is it poſſible for a Writer to be ſo groſly miſtaken? Is it not plain that the ſon of Gualdrada's ſon, is grandſon to that Lady, and not her nephew? I am of opinion that the word Nepote, employed by Dante on this occaſion, ought to be taken in the ſame ſenſe as Nepos in good Latin Authors. Father Paul (4) and Cardinal Pallavicini (5) employ it to denote the grandſons of Paul III. It may therefore be affirmed, that nepote or nipote, ſignifies ſometimes a grandſon in Italian; a circumſtance which Franceſco Alunno ought to have obſerved in his Dictionary of the words and expreſſions employed by Dante, Petrarch, Boccace, &c (6).

(2) Grangier, Commentaire, ſur le Chant 16. de l'Enfer de Dante, pag. 181.

(3) Ibid. pag. 182.

(4) Hiſtoria del Concilio Tridentino, lib. 1. pag. m. 75.

(5) Iſtoria del Concilio di Trento, lib. 3. cap. 17. num. 5. pag. m. 346.

(6) It is intitled, Della Fabrica del Mondo. The word Nepote is mentioned, num. 1529.

GUARINO, a native of Verona, and diſciple of Emanuel Chryſoloras, was one of the firſt who revived polite Literature in Italy in the fifteenth Century [A]: he was well

[A] He was one of the firſt who revived polite Literature in Italy in the XVth Century.] This is the elogium beſtowed on him by Leandro Alberti (1); and here follows a paſſage from Paulus Jovius which may ſerve as a ſecond teſtimony: ab hoc inſigni viro, Græcæ Latinæque literæ obſcuris illis temporibus antiqui ſeculi normam, quadratæ que ſtructuræ ordinem & diu quæſitum decus receperunt (2). i. e. "In thoſe dark times, the "Greek and Latin Tongues received from this emi- "nent man the long ſought for graces and ornaments "of antiquity." Poggius declares that the Italians had very great obligations to our Guarino: Vir doctiſſimus, ſays he (3), ſpeaking of him, atque humaniſſimus, cujus ſtudia & præſtans doctrina plurimum Italis profuerunt. i. e. "A man of the greateſt erudition and "humanity, whoſe ſtudies and excellent learning were "of very great advantage to the Italians." Laurentius Valla (4) calls Guarino and Leonardo Aretino the moſt learned men of their age. Philelphus (5) beſtows the elogium of very eloquent on Guarino.

(1) In Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. m. 722.

(2) Jovius in Elogiis, cap. 110.

(3) Poggius, II in Philelphum Invectiva.

Gabriel Naudé furniſhes me with a very good addition. He tells us (6) that "Boccace, in his endeavours "to revive polite Literature, made ſo happy a progreſs "therein, that dying in 1375, he was ſucceeded, in "that deſign, by one John of Ravenna, who began "firſt to open and re-eſtabliſh the Schools at Venice, "out of which came Gaſparinus who did the ſame "in Milan, and Guarinus Veronenſis,

Qui niſi proſtratas relevaſſet funditus artes,
Priſcorum vanus ſtaret labor (†):

That is,

"Who, had he not reſtor'd the fallen arts,
"The labours of the antients had been vain.

(4) Apud Poggium, I in Vallam Invectiva. See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 585.

(5) Epiſt. ad Flavium Blondum, anno 1450, apud Voſſium, ibid.

(6) Naudé, Addit. à l'Hiſtoire de Louis XI. pag. 179.

(†) Janus Pannonius, in ejus Paneg.

well ſkilled in the Latin and Greek tongues, and taught them very ſucceſsfully, firſt in Venice, and afterwards in Ferrara (a). Pope Nicholas V commanded him to tranſlate Strabo (b) [B]. This was a good verſion, conſidering the age in which it was compoſed; and the ſame may be ſaid of Guarino's other Tranſlations, which conſiſt of ſome Lives and Tracts from Plutarch. He died in Ferrara the 14th of December 1460 (c). There are other pieces of his beſides Tranſlations [C].

(a) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 584.

(b) Geſner, in Biblioth. folio 285.

(c) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 584.

" For it was Guarino, ſtrictly ſpeaking, who began " to bring eloquence and philoſophy in vogue, as well " by his journies to Conſtantinople, where he learnt " the Greek Tongue, as by his precepts of Rhetoric, " verſions and other compoſitions; but eſpecially by " the great number of his diſciples, who ſpread them- " ſelves from Ferrara (where he taught) over all Italy, " in order to denounce war againſt the fooleries and " chimæras of old times, and to acquaint youth with Senſa tot auctorum mille indeprenſa per annos (‡).

(‡) Idem.

That is,

" The compoſitions of unnumbred authors,
" Which, for a thouſand years had lain conceal'd.

What he ſays afterwards is no leſs remarkable (7).

(7) Naudé, Addit. à l'Hiſt. de Louis XI, pag. 181.

" Whoever had been at Conſtantinople, to learn the " Greek language, returned from thence as in triumph, " and was look'd upon as a kind of new prodigy, as " appears from what Joannes Ungheretus or Pannonius " Biſhop of Quinque Eccleſiæ (†), of this Guarino of " Verona's return into Europe,

—— —— Vagus omnia rumor
Gymnaſia Italiæ centeno murmure complet,
Affulſiſſe virum gemina qui Pallade ſolus
Polleat, & duplicem præſtet ſitientibus hauſtum (†).

(†) In Panegyrico citato.

(†) A City in the Lower Hungary.

That is,

" Fame's thouſand tongues to Italy declare,
" The man's approach, whom bright Minerva loves,
" And who can ſatiate twice the thirſt for learning."

[B] Pope Nicholas V. commanded him to tranſlate Strabo.] Others ſay, that Guarino was prompted to this from a ſpirit of Emulation, viz. from his being unwilling to be thought inferior to Gregory Tiphurnas, who had tranſlated Strabo's Deſcription of Aſia, and for which reaſon he gave a Verſion of that Geographer's Europe (8).

(8) See Voſſius, de Hiſt. Latin. pag. 585.

[C] There are other pieces of his beſides Tranſlations.] He publiſhed ſome Treatiſes on Grammar, ſome Letters, Orations, and verſes (91).

(9) Geſner in Biblioth. folio 285.

☞ We ſhall make a few Additions to this Article [A].

[A] We ſhall make a few Additions to this Article.] Guarini was of the illuſtrious family of that name. He ſtudied in his younger days, five years under Emmanuel Chryſoloras in Conſtantinople. An odd incident is related of Guarini, by Ponticus Virunnius, which has very much the Air of a Fiction, and accordingly it is not mentioned either by Paulus Jovius, or James Pannonius, one of his moſt learned Diſciples. The Story is as follows. Guarini having purchaſed two large cheſts of Greek Manuſcripts (of which there were no other copies) put them on board two different Ships. He arrived ſafe in Italy with one of them, but the other was loſt in the Voyage; which afflicted him to ſuch a degree, that his hair turned white in one night. Guarini was the firſt of the Italians who taught the Greek tongue to his Countrymen, after the fall of the Roman Empire. Beſides Venice and Ferrara he taught likewiſe in Verona and Florence. Guarini was invited to Ferrara by Nicholas III. Marqueſs of Eſte, where he was honourably married, and had twelve children at leaſt; and his Poſterity ſubſiſt there to this day. The following Epitaph was written in his Praiſe, by Baptiſt Guarino, whoſe Article comes here under his ſon.

Quæ per te vixit Muſarum cura, Guarine,
Græca, Latina ſimul, te moriente dolet.
Quam Superis tua caſta fides, moreſque placerent,
Luſtra tibi vitæ nona bis aucta probant.
Quod Verona dedit, rapuit mors improba corpus:
Quod virtus peperit, reſtat in orbe decus.

Guarino had another Son, named Jerome, who made himſelf famous both by his Learning and Valour. In Thuanus's Hiſtory is a manuſcript written by his Father, and inſcribed to Jerome, viz. Guarini Veronenſis Inſtitutio ad Hieronymum filium. There are ſome Letters and Speeches of his in the Library of Baliol College in Oxford. There alſo is extant an Oration of his ſpoken in Padua, Anno 1445, at the nuptials of Nicholas Cavalli and Orſolina Buzzacarini.

With regard to the works of Guarino Guarini it may be obſerved, that he tranſlated into Latin the ſeventeen Books of Strabo, and not the firſt ten Books only as Voſſius has erroneouſly aſſerted. He intended to dedicate his verſion of Strabo to Pope Nicholas V. but dying before it was finiſhed, he was obliged to inſcribe it to Jacomo, Antonio Marcello, a Venetian Senator. It was firſt printed in Rome about Anno 1470, in folio, by the care of Joanne Andrea, Biſhop of Aleria, who dedicated it to Pope Paul II. A new Edition of it was made at Venice by Vindelinus of Spire, Anno 1472. Fabricius has omitted theſe two editions in his Bibliotheca Græca. It may not be improper to obſerve, that the life of Evagoras which Guarino tranſlated, was not written by Plutarch, but by Iſocrates; and that the life of Homer, which Guarino likewiſe tranſlated, was very probably not written by Plutarch, tho' aſcribed to him. Among other pieces of Guarino, is Eromata Guarini cum multis additamentis. Ferrariæ, 1509 in 8vo. This is an abrigment of Chryſoloras's Greek Grammar, made by Guarino, and is extremely ſcarce. Several of Guarino's works were never publiſhed. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

GUARINO (BAPTIST) ſon of the preceding, walked in his father's footſteps, and gained great glory by his ſkill in the learned Languages. He taught them a long time in Ferrara with great applauſe, and publiſhed ſome books which anſwered well enough the reputation he had acquired [A].

He was living in 1494, at which time he had enjoyed thirty three years the Profeſſorſhip of polite Literature, in which he ſucceeded his father (a). Henry Stephens did not rightly underſtand that paſſage of Geſner, in which this particular is related [B]. [Baptiſt

(a) See the remark [B].

[A] He publiſhed ſome Books which anſwered well enough the Reputation he had acquired.] A Treatiſe de Secta Epicuri, another de Ordine docendi (1), another de Regno adminiſtrando, Notes on Ovid's Faſti and on Catullus. Orations, Letters, Verſes, and a Tranſlation of ſome of Demoſthenes's Orations, and of St. Gregory Nazianzen, &c. (2).

(1) We are told in the Memoirs de Trevoux, for Sept. 1704, p. 1643, that Struvius has cauſed this treatiſe to be reprinted, corrected from a manuſcript, with a preface concerning the writers of ſuch Methods.

(2) Geſner, in Biblioth. folio 130.

[B] Henry Stephens did not rightly underſtand that paſſage of Geſner in which this particular is related.] We will compare his words with thoſe of Geſner: Memini me in Bibliothecographia Geſneri legere, Guarinum patrem nam fuit & Baptiſta Guarinus ejus filius, quam Geſnerus, etiamnum ſe de illo ſcribente, claruiſſe Ferrariæ ait, ubi patris ſucceſſor jam per annos tres & triginta triginta linguam utramque florentiſſime doceret) ſcripſiſſe canoniſmata in lingua Græca. (3), i. e. "I remember "to have read in Geſner's Bibliotheque, that Guarinus the Father, (for there likewiſe was Baptiſt "Guarinus his ſon whom Geſner, at the time he was "writing, declares to have flouriſhed in Ferrara; in "which city, being his father's ſucceſſor, he had taught "very ſucceſsfully both Languages for thirty three "years) that Guarinus the father, I ſay, had "writ rules for the Greek Language." This is what is related by Henry Stephens, and what follows is found in Geſner's Bibliotheque. Claret uſque hodie Ferrariæ, ubi patri ſuccedens, jam per annos tres & triginta utramque linguam florentiſſime docet & varia conſcribit (4). i. e. "He is eminent to this "day in Ferrara, in which city ſucceeding his Fa-"ther, he has already taught both Languages very "ſucceſsfully for thirty three years, and writes upon "various Subjects." The reader will probably ask, whether it be poſſible to find two paſſages that agree better than theſe? To this I anſwer, yes; for the words employed by Geſner are Trithemius's: it is not Geſner who ſays Claret uſque hodie; and yet Henry Stephens imagined it was him, in which he was groſly miſtaken. He ſhould have referred the word Hodie to the year 1494, which Geſner put in the margin of his Book in that place. Our Guarino was certainly not living in 1545, in which year Geſner's Bibliotheque was printed.

[Baptiſt Guarini firſt publiſhed Servius's Commentary on Virgil, at Ratiſbon, anno 1471, in folio. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(3) Henricus Stephanus, in Dialogo de bene inſtituendis Græcæ Linguæ Studiis, pag. 116.

(4) Geſner, Bibliotb. folio 130.

GUARINI (BATTISTA) was born in Ferrara anno 1538. He is more known by his Tragi-Comedy intitled Paſtor Fido, than by all the reſt of his works, and the honourable employments [A] which the Duke his maſter beſtowed on him. This was his favourite work, as he plainly ſhewed by the ſtrong reſentment with which he was fired againſt a Critic [B], who had cenſured it only in an indirect manner. He has therein painted the myſteries of love in ſuch glowing colours, that it is thought the peruſal of it has been of fatal conſequence to the chaſtity of many maidens. This ſeems to combat very ſtrongly a maxim of de la Fontaine [C]. I cannot tell if Guarini would have employed

[A] And the honourable Employment.] See Moreri's Dictionary; and add that Guarini being ſent by Alphonſo II. Duke of Ferrara to Venice, made a Speech before the Senate, which was admired; and that after Duke Alphonſo's Death, he was ſent by the City of Ferrara to congratulate Paul V. on his acceſſion to the Pontificate (1).

(1) Nicius Erythræus, Pinacoth. I. pag. 96.

[B] The ſtrong Reſentment with which he was fired againſt a Critic.] Jaſon Denores (2) born in the Iſland of Cyprus, deſcended from a Norman Gentleman, and profeſſor of Morallty in (*) Ferrara, wrote a Treatiſe on Poetry, in which he exclaimed againſt a Species of dramatick Poetry that was become greatly in vogue, I mean paſtoral Tragi-comedies (3). He aſſerted that they were monſters, produced by people who had no knowledge of antiquity, and contrary to the rules of ancient Poetry. Guarini was perſuaded, that this critique was levelled at him; and therefore wrote a defence of his work. Denores replied, and died whilſt Guarini was writing an anſwer, which was ſo exceedingly ſevere, that it is thought it would have occaſioned the death of the Cenſor of Paſtorals. Here follows what Thuanus ſays on this Subject: Baptiſta Guarinus lectiſſimus eques Ferrarienſis, qui ſub id Paſtorem fidum magno plauſu ubique in Italia exceptum ediderat, eum ſermonem ad injuriam ſuam pertinere exiſtimans, defenſionem ſub nomine Verati publicavit, quam apologia contraria ſtatim Denores, refutavit. Sed dum alteram defenſionem meditatur Guarinus, morte minime fatali Denores conceſſit, quæ niſi dilectiſſimi filii calamitate fuiſſet præcipitata, alterius Verati lectione accelerari potuiſſe credita eſt. Tanta ſiquidem vi eloquentiæ ſimul & aſperitate ac verborum amaritudine in Jaſonem invectus eſt Guarinus, ut Archilochum ipſum in Lycamben iambos ſtringentem eo ſcripto ſuperaſſe paſſim jactaretur (4).

(2) Thuan. lib. 99 pag. 379. ad ann. 1590.

(*) [This is an error, it ſhould be Padua.] Remark by the Tranſl. N. B. The Paſtor Fido had not been printed yet.

(3) Inter alia quæ ſcripſit cum de Poetica diſſerens Tragicomœdias Paſtorales quæ hodie inter Italos uſurpantur, tanquam monſtra quædam & nullo veterum exemplo, contraque Poeticæ priſcæ leges ab imperitis rei antiquariæ introducta exagitaſſet &c. Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, ibid.

[C] This ſeems to combat very ſtrongly a maxim of de la Fontaine.] Nicius Erythræus having ſaid that the Paſtor Fido is reprinted almoſt every year; and that all nations how barbarous ſoever, have tranſlated it into their reſpective languages, adds that this Poem may very poſſibly be prejudicial to the purity of manners (5), and that for the following reaſon: Etenim in ejus dulcedine ſuavitateque tanquam in infeſto Sirenis mari in quo etiam Ulyſſes erravit, virgines nuptæque complures pudicitiæ naufragium feciſſe dicuntur. i. e. "For it is "related that many virgins and married women have "had their chaſtity ſhipwrecked by its ſweets and al-"lurements, like as Ulyſſes was led aſtray in a ſea "infeſted with Syrens." Let us now ſee la Fontaine's maxim (6).

(5) Morum forteſſe integritati non utilis. Nic. Erythræus, Pinacoth. I. p. 96.

(6) It is in one of his Tales.

Iroit-il après tout s'allarmer ſans raiſon
Pour un peu de plaiſanterie?
Je craindrois bien plûtôt que la cajoleris
Ne mît le feu dans la maiſon.
Chaſſez les Soupirans, Belles, prenez mon Livre
Je répons de vous corps pour corps.

The ſenſe is,

"After all, is there any reaſon why he ſhould be a-"larmed at a little facetiouſneſs? I ſhould much rather "fear, that the ſoft and inſinuating addreſſes of a "lover would ſet fire to the houſe. But ye lovely "fair ones, baniſh your ſuitors, and peruſe my "work; I myſelf will anſwer for you body for "body."

In this manner does the author in queſtion extricate himſelf from a very great difficulty. People complained, that his tales were fit for nothing but to excite a thouſand looſe deſires in the minds of his readers; La Fontaine anſwers, that if the women who read his book, do not ſuffer the approaches of any Gallant, they will not loſe their honour. But there is ſophiſtry in this anſwer, for it requires a condition, the practice whereof is rendred very difficult, by the very book that is complained againſt. You require us (will it be objected to la Fontaine) to read your book, and baniſh our lovers; this is a very unjuſt demand, becauſe your Poems deprive us of the power of baniſhing our lovers. They fill us with love, they heat, they fire us, and make us languiſh ardently for the preſence of thoſe gentlemen: with what face can you ſay, after this, that no evil will enſue with regard to us, provided we do but baniſh them? Another objection may be raiſed againſt la Fontaine, which is this, that though young women ſhould baniſh their lovers, they yet would be expoſed to many leud paſſions, which the peruſal of his tales would excite, and this is not a ſmall miſchief. The only way to make a juſt apology for this author, would be to ſuppoſe, that his book cannot be of prejudice to chaſtity; and that nothing can hurt that virtue, but the ſight of amiable objects, and actual courtſhip. But this cannot be ſuppoſed, if it be true, as many pretend, that the peruſal of the Paſtor Fido has undone many maidens and married women. Thus have I given a ſufficient commentary on my text.

Though what is related concerning the pernicious effects of that Poem ſhould be falſe, it would nevertheleſs be true, that the peruſal of certain books is of the moſt pernicious conſequence to young perſons of both ſexes. Some Phyſicians have preſcribed the diligent reading of the Priapeia and ſuch like Poems to thoſe, who cannot be raiſed to acts of venery without great difficulty. Medici, in his Paulus Ægineta, diſertis verbis ad excitandam languentem Venerem vel præcipuum remedium præſcribunt Priapeorum & ſimilis poëſeos infamis aſſiduam lectionem (7); and I have obſerved that the Emperor Ælius Verus, a Prince who employed ſuch a maxim in his own vindication, and whether he would not have thought it a ſhorter way, to have recourſe to a much more common reflection [D]. In my opinion no part of his Poem is ſo ſtrong and remarkable, as the ſcene which has been ſo happily tranſlated was wholly immerſed in venereal delights, was for ever reading Ovid's amorous Poems in his bed, and had a great eſteem for Martial's Epigrams. Idem Ovidii libros amorum in lecto ſemper habuiſſe: idem Martialem Epigrammaticum Poetam Virgilium ſuum dixiſſe (8). I remember to have read in Taſſoni, that ſtudy excites looſe deſires; and this, among other reaſons, becauſe it acquaints readers with a thouſand laſcivious things which are found in books. From thence he explains the reaſon, why ſeveral learned women among the antients were very luſtful. Here follow his words (9). Che ſimilmente le lettere ſieno cagioni d' eccitar la libidine, e di parturire molti atti oſceni, non è da dubitarne; poſciache col leggere accidenti, e ſtratagemi amoroſi, e libri laſcivi, e particularmente nelle ſolitudini, e ne gli ozi, che richieggono le lettere, s'appreſentano fantaſmi oſceni, e penſieri, e voglie di coſe illecite ſotto apparenza di guſto, e di diletto; e l'ingegno ſagace vi s'abbandonna ſopra. E quindi è (cred'io) che in Euripide, e Giuvenale (10) leggiamo notate d'impudizia le donne di lettere antiche, le quali leggendo libri di coſe laſcive, e converſando ſotto quel preteſto di lettere più liberamente con gli huomini, che ſi conveniva alla debolezza del ſeſſo, ſi fecero ardite, e la libidine loro s'infervorò nell'ozio, e la ſagacità dell'ingegno s'offerſe di ricoprire gli eccеſſi. i. e. "In like manner there is "no doubt, but that ſtudy is an occaſion of exciting "luſt, and of giving riſe to many obſcene actions; "becauſe, together with the reading of amorous adventures and ſtratagems in looſe books, and eſpecially in the ſolitude and leiſure which ſtudy requires; obſcene images preſent themſelves, with "unchaſte thoughts and deſires, under the appearance "of pleaſure and delight, to which the inquiſitive "mind abandons itſelf. Hence as I ſuppoſe, it is, "that we find, in Euripides and Juvenal, that the "learned women of antiquity were accuſed of immodeſty, who, by peruſing looſe books, and converſing, upon the ſpecious pretence of learning, "more freely with men than was proper for the weakneſs of their ſex, grew bold; ſo that their luſt became inflamed by Idleneſs, and the utmoſt ſagacity of "their wit was employed to apologize for their libidinous conduct."

(7) Caſaubonus, in hæc verba, Perſii Sat. 1. ver. 19. Cum Carmina lumbum Intrant, & tremulo ſcalpuntur ubi intima verſu. i. e. "When "unchaſte verſes raiſe impure deſires."

(8) Spartian, in Ælio Vero, cap. 5.

(9) Penſieri diverſi di Aleſſandro Taſſoni, lib. 7. cap. 11. pag. 227.

(10) Euripides and Juvenal do not charge them with that vice. Juvenal adviſes a man not to marry a learned woman, but does not give any reaſon for this caution. The reaſon Euripides gives is, that Venus makes them more artful and ſubtle. See Muret. Variar. Lect. lib. 8. cap. 21.

[D] And whether he would not have thought it a ſhorter way, to have had recourſe to a much more common reflection.] He might have ſaid, that his Paſtoral did not inform his readers of any thing they did not know before; or that in caſe young people met with ſome particulars that were new to them in it, they would have found them in other books; ſo that it would have been to no purpoſe not to publiſh the Paſtor Fido. One of la Fontaine's friends has touched upon this kind of juſtification with very great delicacy. "It will, ſays he (11), be prudent in perſons entruſted "with the education of children, not only to forbid "the peruſal of thoſe pieces (12), but alſo to prevent "their learning much more by frequenting ill company. "Books do not always teach thoſe things which mankind ought to be ignorant of." This is inſinuating very evidently, that ſuch are the manners and behaviour of the world, that thoſe who would not learn, by the peruſal of la Fontaine's Tales, particulars with which they ought not to be acquainted, would learn it a hundred other ways. A like reflection was employ'd (13), to refute the unjuſt complaints of thoſe, who would not allow all the looſe paſſages to be caſtrated in Juvenal and Martial. This kind of apology is better than la Fontaine's maxim, and yet it is not a good one; for in ſhort, how unavoidable ſoever obſcene irregularities may be, (even when we ourſelves do not contribute to them) every man ought to chuſe to wiſh that others might have a hand in them, rather than himſelf. It is to be obſerved, that what is ſaid here relates to thoſe who invent obſcene ſtories, or tranſlate them with new embelliſhments; and not to ſuch as quote a paſſage of Martial &c. as a proof of ſome incident, which they are obliged to mention, either from the nature of their work, or their character of Hiſtorian, Commentator, &c. Upon the whole, it muſt be owned, that the moſt obſcene particulars that may be learnt in certain books, are communicated, by converſation, without the aſſiſtance of books. It is ſurprizing how many things of this kind are known by very young perſons, and who even cannot read. The progreſs that is made in this ſcience is aſtoniſhing, and does not require a great number of years. Let us hear Montagne (14). "When women will diſpenſe "a little with the uſual ceremonies, and expreſs themſelves with freedom in diſcourſe, we are but babies "to them in the knowledge of this ſcience. When "they talk of our addreſſes and converſations, they "plainly ſhow that we teach them nothing but what "they had known and digeſted before. Shall we ſay, "with Plato, that they had formerly been rakiſh "boys? I happened to be at a place, where I could overhear, unſuſpected, all the diſcourſe of ſome women. "Why am I not allow'd to relate all I heard! faith, ſays "I to my ſelf, let us now go and learn phraſes from "Amadis, and ſtudy Boccace and Aretine, to qualify "ourſelves for their converſation: there is not a word, an "example, or a ſingle ſtep, but is better known to "them, than the authors who have writ on that ſubject. This is a ſcience that ſprings up in their very "veins, Venus herſelf inſpiring their minds with it. "Et mentem ipſa Venus dedit; Nature, youth and "health, (three excellent preceptors) are infuſing it "perpetually into their ſouls: they need not learn it, "for it is engendred in them.

(11) Preface to the Amſterdam edit. of La Fontaine's Tales. Printed in 1685.

(12) That is, La Fontaine's Tales.

(13) See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Octob. 1684, Article 5. pag. 792, 793.

(14) Eſſays, Book 3. chap. 5. pag. m. 125, 126.

"Nec tantum niveo gaviſa eſt ulla columbo
"Compar, vel ſi quid dicitur improbius.
"Oſcula mordenti ſemper decerpere roſtro:
"Quantum præcipue multivola eſt mulier (*).

(*) Cat. 109.

"No Dove, tho' e'er ſo eager in her billing,
"Is ſo laſcivious, as a wanton woman."

They learn theſe things of one another: The old women teach the young ones; and if ſuch of them as are ignorant are paſſionately fond of knowledge, the learned are no leſs deſirous of communicating what they know. One would imagine that they look upon the following axiom as canonical, viz. that knowledge is of no uſe unleſs it be communicated to others (15): and therefore in the Italian education, the great care that is taken from keeping girls from the company of boys, does not remove the evil. Beſides women, in thoſe countries where they are reſtrained, are allowed to be promiſcuouſly mixed with the other ſex at weddings: Now can there be a more ſcandalous ſchool for lewdneſs, than the aſſemblies, diverſions and feaſtings at weddings? Are not a numberleſs multitude of ridiculous and obſcene things ſaid at them (16)? St. Cyprian had juſt reaſon to forbid virgins frequenting them, he aſſuring them that their virginity will be tainted at their return from thoſe feſtivities (17). Quoſdam non pudet nubentibus intereſſe, & in illa laſcivientium libertate ſermonum colloquia inceſta miſcere; audire quod non licet dicere; obſervare & eſſe præſentes inter verba turpia & temulenta convivia, quibus libidinum fomes accenditur. Sponſa ad patientiam ſtupri, ad audaciam ſponſus animatur. Quid illic diſcitur? quid videtur? Quantum à propoſito ſuo virgo defecit, quando, pudica quæ venerat, impudica diſcedit? Corpore licet virgo ac mente permaneat; oculis, auribus, lingua, minuit illa quæ habebat (18). i. e. "Some women do not bluſh to be preſent "at weddings, and to intermix chaſte words with the "looſe converſations uſual at ſuch times; to hear what "I dare not repeat; to obſerve and be preſent at the "obſcene diſcourſes and drunken revellings, by which "the fire and luſt is raiſed, which animate the bride "to ſubmit to the loſing of her virginity, and invigorate the huſband to attack it. What is learnt, as "well as ſeen there? How greatly does a virgin fail "in her purpoſe, when ſhe returns immodeſt from "thence, tho' ſhe was modeſt when ſhe went? For "tho' ſhe is ſtill a virgin with reſpect to her body and "mind; nevertheleſs, by her eyes, ears and tongue, "ſhe has been partly deſpoiled of what ſhe brought "with her to thoſe entertainments." See what is ſaid in the remark [G] of the article Lycurgus, and call to mind

(15) Uſque adeone Scire tuum nihil eſt, niſi te ſcire hoc ſciat alter? Perſ. Sat. 1. ver. 25.

(16) See the following paſſage from St. Cyprian.

(17) Cyprianus, de diſciplina & habitu Virginum, cap. 14.

(18) Barthius, in Claudian, pag. 766, has a good note on this occaſion. Ita etiam, ſays he, ultimo edita ſunt ſancti viri verba; ſcripſiſſe tamen arbitror, Corpore licet virgo permaneat: at mente, oculis, auribus, lingua, minuit illa quæ habebat. Sanè niſi mens tangeretur per ſenſus, minime minuerentur poſſeſſa.

translated into French by the Counteſs de la Suze, wherein he treats of one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries of nature [E]. There have been a numberleſs multitude of editions and tranſlations (a) of the Paſtor Fido (b). Guarino died at Venice in an Inn, anno 1613 [F]. His funeral, ſolemnized by the Academy de gli Humoriſti, is a proof that Guarini was held in high eſteem (c).

(a) Nic. Erythræus, Pinacoth. 1. pag. 96.

(b) Ludovico Zuccolo beſtows very great encomiums on the Paſtor Fido, in his treatiſe della Eminenza Paſtorala, pag. 25.

(c) Nic. Eryth. Pinacoth. 1. pag. 97.

He was great grandſon to Guarino of Verona, and taught moral Philoſophy in the Univerſity of Ferrara. Notwithſtanding the exalted reputation he had gained by the Poem abovementioned, he yet could not endure the name and title of Poet; he imagining that this title does not reflect the leaſt honour on thoſe who bear it; but, on the contrary, expoſes them to contempt. The reader, in peruſing his verſes, fancies that they did not give the leaſt trouble in the writing; but this is a great miſtake, they coſting Guarini great pains and ſweat [G], he making a great number of alterations and raſures on mind Xenophon's maxim. He would have a bride brought to her huſband's houſe in ſuch a manner, that ſhe may ſee and hear as little as poſſible. Ὁ Ξενοφῶν εἴρηται δεῖν ἐλάχιστα τὴν νύμφην ἰδεῖσαν, ἐλάχιστα δὲ ἀκούσασαν εἰς ἄνδρὸς βαδίζειν. Xenophon cenſet ſponſam ita debere in mariti domum venire ut quam minimum viderit, quam minimum audiverit (19).

(19) Plut. de Pythiæ Orat. pag. 405. C.

[E] He treats of one of the moſt incomprehenſible myſteries of nature.] He introduces a maiden (Amaryllis), who being a prey to the arbitrary will of two tyrants who hate one another (20), envies the happineſs of the brute creation, who are guided by no other rule in love, than love itſelf. She cannot conceive the oppoſition that is found between nature and law. The former annexes an exquiſite pleaſure to certain things, and the latter annexes a ſecure puniſhment to it, from which ſhe draws the following concluſion.

(20) Love and Honour. See the Sonnet of the immature Child.

S'el pecar' è ſi dolce,
E'l non peccar ſi neceſſario; ò troppo
Imperfetta natura,
Che repugni à la legge;
O troppo dura legge,
Che la natura offendi (*).

(*) Il Paſtor Fido. Atto 3. Sc. 4.

Sans doute ou la nature eſt imparfaite en ſoi
Qui nous donne un panchant que condamne la loi.
Ou la loi doit paſſer pour une loi trop dure
Qui condamne un panchant que donne la nature.

That is,

" O why, if love be ſuch a natural
" And mighty paſſion, was it capital!
" Nature too frail, that doſt with law contend!
" Law too ſevere, that nature doſt offend (†)!"

(†) Sir Richard Fanſhaw's tranſlation, a little altered, of Paſtor Fido, pag. 81. London 1647, 4to. The two laſt lines ſeem the moſt happily tranſlated in the whole Poem.

It would be impoſſible, were it not for the revelation we have received from Moſes, to comprehend any thing in this; and I am greatly ſurprized that the antient Philoſophers have attended ſo little to it. I ſpeak of ſuch Philoſophers only as have known the unity of God; for thoſe who, according to the eſtabliſhed Religion of their Country, admitted a plurality of Gods, could not find any difficulty in this matter. They needed but ſuppoſe, that one God is the cauſe of the impulſe of nature; and that other Deities impreſſed the inſtincts of conſcience, and the ideas of honour. The difficulty related to ſuch only as were perſuaded that the univerſe is the work of an infinitely holy God. How can it poſſibly come to paſs that, under ſuch a principle or being, mankind ſhould be drawn to evil, by an almoſt inſurmountable bait, I mean by the ſenſation of pleaſure; and ſhould be diverted or deterred from it by the fear of remorſe, or that of infamy and ſeveral other puniſhments; and ſhould ſpend their whole lives in this contraſt or ſtruggle of paſſions, dragged ſometimes one way, ſometimes another; one time overcome by pleaſure; at another by the dread of the conſequences. In all probability the Manichee Syſtem ſprung from a deep meditation on this deplorable ſtate of man.

[F] Guarini died at Venice in an Inn.] He had been at Venice on account of a law-ſuit, and died of grief and old age. If we may credit the author I am going to cite, the malice of his enemies, (he obſerving that it was impoſſible but ſo great a man muſt have ſome) had rendred every part of his life unhappy. Semper cum adverſa fortuna iniquorum odio conflictatus (non enim malevoli tanto viro deeſſe poterant) demum cum Venetias litium quarundam cauſa veniſſet, & ad caupoem divertiſſet, ibi ſenio curiſque confectus, exceſſit è vita (21). I ſhall quote another who is greatly miſtaken with regard to the year in which our Guarini died, he placing it at 1590 (22).

(21) Nic. Eryth. Pinacoth. 1. pag. 97.

(22) Aubert. Miræus, in Scriptor. Sæc. 16. pag. 177.

[G] His verſes . . coſting . . Guarini . . great pains and ſweat.] Let us firſt hear Imperialis. Inſuper mirandum etiam, quod licet expedita illa carminum pangendorum ubertas, illaborata penitus, & ſponte fuſa videatur; tamen ab ipſo anxiè affectatam ac diutino quæſitam ſtudio ipſimet (familiares) aſſerunt, præmonſtrantes extrarias quaſdam carminum ſuorum ſchedulas, frequentiſſimis expunctas ac immutatas locis, ex quibus herculè peracris quidam, ac implexus ſcribendi arguitur labos (23). i. e. " What moreover is to be wondred at, is, that " notwithſtanding his numbers ſeemed to be unlabour- " ed and to flow ſpontaneouſly and with the greateſt " eaſe; yet his friends declare, that they coſt him the " greateſt pains and ſtudy; they ſhewing ſome rough " ſheets of his compoſitions, which were corrected and " blotted in a numberleſs multitude of places, a proof " of the great pains he employed in writing." We are informed of two things by this paſſage; firſt, that Guarini's verſes coſt him the greateſt labour, and ſecondly that they ſeem nevertheleſs to have been compoſed with the utmoſt facility. Thoſe who ſhould declare theſe two things to be incompatible would be little acquainted with the difference there is in the characters of the mind of man; but muſt fancy, that no compoſitions are laborious and painful, except thoſe of which the reader forms the ſame judgment as was paſſed on the Orations of Demoſthenes, olent lucernam, (they ſmell of the lamp) (24). But ſuch perſons muſt know, that there is a ſtill much greater diverſity or variety in the minds of men. One author ſhall make his reader ſenſible of the great pains he employed in the writing; and if he corrects three or four times a certain place, with ſuch a ſtretch of thought as makes him almoſt ſweat, the reader perceives that ſuch paſſage denotes a much greater labour employed in it, than another which was corrected but two or three times. But there are other authors, whoſe labour and pains make every thing they write appear extremely eaſy and natural; ſo that the more they retouch their work, the leſs it ſeems to have been laboured and retouched. Such was the character of Guarini (25). His taſte made him conclude, that the perfection of a piece of Poetry conſiſted in the unaffected beauties of nature, and an eaſy, flowing turn. By this he endeavoured to merit the approbation of the public; and was very happy in diſcovering, whether there was ſtill any thing forced and conſtrained in his work; in which caſe he would employ his pains to expunge thoſe faults, and give the whole an eaſy air. Thus it was by retouching and poliſhing his numbers that he gave them that eaſy and natural flow. There are other writers of a quite different taſte; theſe make the whole perfection of writing to conſiſt, in thinking and expreſſing themſelves in a manner that is affected, inflated, and which ſhews the author's mind was upon the rack. Such authors would fancy they had not expreſſed themſelves happily and ingeniouſly, could they be underſtood without employing the ſtrongeſt attention, and being maſter of great wit and penetration (26); and are never ſatisfied, till they have fully expunged from their compoſitions whatever might appear ſimple, natural and common; and therefore, the more theſe correct their works, the more they diſcover to their readers the pains they have employed. This doubtleſs is very great, but it ſometimes is not ſo great as that which thoſe take, who would give an air of the greateſt eaſe to every part of their work. I have been aſſured by

(23) Imperialis in Muſæo Hiſtor. pag. 129.

A COLLECTION of paſſages, with regard to the apparent or real facility of compoſing or writing.

(24) Plut. in Demoſth. p. 849.

(25) That is, if we are to judge of him from the words of Imperialis quoted above.

(26) Quid, quod nihil jam proprium placet, dum parum creditur diſſertum quod & alius dixiſſet? . . . tum demum ingenioſi ſcilicet ſi ad intelligendos nos opus ſit ingenio. Quint. lib. 8. in Proœm. pag. m. 354.

on thoſe occaſions. He was not fond of riches, but loving pomp and ſhow, he did not find, when fortune frowned upon him, thoſe advantages and conveniencies he would have enjoyed, had he been a good œconomiſt; and been leſs profuſe of the monies which Alphonſo II his maſter had beſtowed upon him. This Prince diſcontinued his favour and by ſome perſons, who declare they had it from very good hands, and I myſelf read it the other day in a printed work (27), that Voiture employed the utmoſt pains and labour on his Poems and Verſes, before he could bring them to the eaſy perfection in which we now ſee them. His apologiſt does not ſay this; but he inſinuates nevertheleſs, that it coſt this witty Writer a vaſt deal of pains, to diffuſe that air of prodigious eaſe which is ſo viſible in his productions. I hope the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee an extract of that apology here. It is curious enough to deſerve to be here exhibited with the judgments of ſome good judges. " Above all things Mr. de Voiture ſought for that kind " of negligence which ſo well becomes beautiful per- " ſons; which ſo happily ſets off the advantages of " their birth; and which, after having charmed the " eyes, leaves the imagination the pleaſure of figur- " ing to themſelves, what the graces of art would have " added to thoſe of nature. In all his compoſitions, " there appears ſomething ſo eaſy and natural, that " every one fancies, at firſt ſight, he could write as " happily; and it is not, till after long and uſeleſs " endeavours, that he cries, Queſto facile, quanto è dif- " ficile! (How difficult it is to write with this eaſe.) " I remember that he was not diſpleaſed at my be- " ſtowing that encomium upon him which Taſſo gives " one of his Heroines,

Non ſo ben dire, s'adorna, o' ſe negletta,
Se caſo od arte, il bel volto compoſe;
Di natura, d'amor, del cielo, amici
Le negligenze ſue ſono artefici.

That is,

" Whether her charms ſhe heightens or neglects;
" If 'tis or art or chance, I cannot ſay.
" But heaven, and love, and nature are her friends;
" And even her negligence diſcovers art."

" and indeed, that which ſeems as negligence in him " is a hidden artifice, which diſguiſes itſelf under the " image of its contrary, in order to act with the " greater addreſs and certainty. And as nature is " never more wonderful, than when ſhe ſeems to have " copied the works of Art, and is deſirous of becoming " her Scholar's diſciple, and to imitate her uſual imi- " tator; ſo art, on the other ſide, is never perfect, un- " leſs it imitates nature, and covers with a ſpecious " appearance of eaſe, its labours, meditations, and " violent efforts. The Grecian painters uſed to re- " preſent the Graces without robes or head-dreſſes; " and if they ſometimes painted them with the former, " they were never bound with Girdles, doubtleſs to " denote that ſuch Beauties as charm the moſt, are " not the effect of artful and viſible Ornament; " and eſpecially, that whoever hopes to pleaſe, ſhould " avoid the very ſhadow of conſtraint. The natural " love we all have for liberty, extends even to the pro- " ductions of Genius; and we are naturally ſo hate- " ful of Subjection and Slavery, that any thing, how " beautiful ſoever, loſes all its Graces, the moment " it ſeems forced. No perſon was ever more ſenſible " of this truth than Mr. de Voiture; or more indu- " ſtriouſly ſought to conceal the art he employed, to " draw from his Imagination the beautiful Produc- " tions he has left us. One would conclude that " Flowers ſpring up at every ſtep he takes; or that he " meets with them, wherever he puts forth his hand; " that the fineſt ſtrokes in his writings did not coſt him " the leaſt pains; that all ſuch things fell fortuitouſly " on his paper, and dropt from his Pen without the " leaſt effort; that all this, I ſay, flowed ſpontane- " ouſly from a ſpirituous, fruitful, and inexhauſtible " Spring (28)."

Peliſſon, who was ſo good a judge of all ſorts of works of Wit and Genius, was ſtrongly perſua- ded, that frequently nothing coſts an Author more pains, than to make it ſeem as tho' his work had coſt him but little (29). " Two things eſpecially, ſays " he, (30), make Poetry wonderful; Invention, " whence it derives its name, and eaſe or facility, " which is extremely neceſſary to it. I don't mean " eaſe with regard to compoſing; this may ſome- " times be happy, but ought always to be ſuſpected. " What I mean is, an eaſe which readers find in " a compoſition, which often put the Author's Ima- " gination to the rack, ſo that it may be compared to " Teraſſes in ſome Gardens, the expence of which is " concealed; and which, after having coſt millions, " ſeem to be the pure effect of chance and nature." What he had juſt before ſaid, with regard to the eaſe which appeared in good poets, is admirable. One would imagine that they could not have expreſſed themſelves in a different manner from what they have done, tho' they had endeavoured to do it, there is ſo much eaſe in all their expreſſions. Theſe words ſeem to have dropt ſpontaneouſly from the Pen, and each fell naturally into into its proper place. Greater miracles ſeem not to have been wrought by Amphion's Lyre, when the Stones, attracted by his Harmony, fix'd themſelves, ſpon- taneouſly, one upon another to build up the famous walls of Thebes (31).

This is the judgment which the Reader forms of ſuch ſtrokes; but the Author knows the contrary, and remembers that the Verſes which ſeemed the moſt eaſy and flowing, are thoſe which forced him the moſt to ſcratch his head and bite his nails (32). He re- members that it was in compoſing thoſe Verſes he followed Horace's Precept (35) moſt carefully; and that he reſembled moſt thoſe antient Philoſophers, who were put beſides themſelves, by the depth of their me- ditations,

Obſtipo capite, & figentes lumine terram
Murmura cum ſecum, & rabioſa ſilentia rodunt,
Atque exporrecto trutinantur verba labello,
Ægroti veteris meditantes ſomnia, Gigni
De nihilo nihil, in nihilum nil poſſe reverti (34.

That is,

" Wry-neck'd they walk, with ever down-caſt eyes,
" Muttering, and weighing words with trembling lips;
" And old wives Fables in their minds revolving;
" That nought produces nought; that nothing which " Has once exiſted, can to nothing turn.

There are however exceptions to all that has been here ſaid. Ovid among the antients, and Moliere among the moderns, wrote verſes with the utmoſt eaſe, which is immediately perceived by their Rea- ders.

It is to be obſerved, that Peliſſon declares, that this kind of Facility may ſometimes be happy, but ought al- ways to be ſuſpected (35); which brings to my mind a thought of Mr. Godeau. " A facility in writing " ſays he, (36), ſeems to be an advantage; but it is " a kind of Defect, becauſe it prevents the mind " which is naturally averſe to pain, from carrying " things to that perfection it might otherwiſe do. " And indeed the correction which improves the firſt " Productions, is more troubleſome to thoſe who have " that facility, than to ſuch as finiſh things as they " compoſe them, and who write more from art than " nature." This ſquares pretty well with Quinti- lian's way of thinking. This great maſter adviſes Students to begin by compoſing ſlowly; by this means they will attain to the art of writing well, after which they will be able to write ſwiftly. But thoſe who are haſty in their writing, or which is the ſame, write with great facility, will never attain the art of good writing. Hanc moram & ſolicitudinem initiis im- pero .... cito ſcribendo non fit ut bene ſcribatur: bene ſcribendo, fit ut cito (37). But tho' we allow this faci- lity to be a defect, an Author had doubtleſs better be ſubject to it, than not to be able to bring forth one's ideas without inſupportable pains; and that writer is much more unhappy who can never put an end to his (27) In the Melanges d'Hiſtoire & de Literature, de Mr. de Vigneul Marville, pag. 223. Roan edit.

(28) Coſtar, Defence des Ouvrages de Mr. de Voiture, pag. 16, 17.

(29) Vincta quædam quaſi ſolvenda de induſtria ſunt, illa quidem maximi laboris, ne laborata videantur. Quintil. lib. 9. cap. 4. pag. m. 457.

(30) Péliſſon, Preface des Ouvres de Sarraſſin, pag. 30.

(31) Ibid. pag. 28.

(32) Et in verſu faciendo Sæpe caput ſcaberet, vivos & roderet ungues. Horat. Sat. 10. lib. 1. ver. 70. Conſer quæ, Perſ. Sat. 1. ver. 106. Nec pluteum cædit, nec demorſos ſapit ungues. i. e. " Nor ſtrikes his " deſk, nor bites " his nails."

(33) Ludentis ſpeciem dabit & torquebitur. Hor. Epiſt. 2. lib. 2. ver. 124. i. e. " His mind is " rack'd, altho' " he ſeems to " ſport."

(34) Perſius, Sat. 3. ver. 80.

(35) Redeamus ad judicium & retractemus ſuſpectam facilitatem. Quint. lib. 10. cap. 3. pag. 483.

(36) Godeau, Preface to the verſion of the Pſalms. Conſer quæ Quint. lib. 10. cap. 3. pag. m. 485.

(37) Quint. lib. 10. cap. 3. pag. 484. See the citation (1) of the article ORICELLARIUS.

and indulgence to him, upon which Guarini devoted himself successively to Vincenzio de Gonzaga, to Ferdinand de Medicis, Grand Duke of Florence, and to Francis Maria de Feltri Duke of Urbino; but the only advantage he reaped under these various masters was, great encomiums on his wit and compositions. He withdrew at last into his native country, where he was consulted like an Oracle, on the means of bringing peace to Italy (d).

(d) Extracted from John Imperialis, in Musæo Histor. pag. 129, 130.

his corrections, than to end them a little too soon. Balzac has been ranked among those Authors who make themselves unhappy by the too great difficulty and delicacy of their taste. Read the following words of Costar (38). In Balzac's writings, nothing is flowing and natural. "His labour is so "visible, that those delicate Readers who peruse his "works are tired with them; in the same manner as "that famous Syberite who was in a strong sweat, "upon seeing the prodigious pains which a poor labourer took; and indeed Balzac himself confessed sometimes that when he took up the Pen to write, he "suffered as much as a Galley-slave at the oar. Not "but that he had such a sublimity and beauty of "Genius as was wonderful; but then he found it as "difficult a matter to content himself, as that excellent man, of whom the late Mr. de Lizieux used to "say, the beautiful Pieces with which he favours the "Publick put him to such exquisite Pains, that were I "in his Place, I would make choice of some other imployment to serve my fellow Creatures; and should not "think that God required this from me." It is justly asserted that the Readers soon perceive, that the Compositions of this famous writer were very painful to him; and are far from imagining, that they could easily write in his manner. It is only in reading an Author whose thoughts and expressions have an air of ease, that we imagine it would be in our power to do the same; but we find ourselves greatly mistaken when we come to make a trial; and prove by experience, that nothing is more difficult than to imitate what appears so easy.

(38) Costar, Apolog. pag. 37. See also Pieces pour la Défense de la Reine Mere, tom. 1. pag. m. 471, 472. where it is asserted, that all Balzac could do was, to polish a period in one day, and that he would spend a whole day in placing a conjunction or preposition.

Ex noto fictum carmen sequar, ut sibi quivis
Speret idem, sudet multum, frustraque laboret
Ausus idem (39).

(39) Horat. de Arte Poetic. ver. 240.

That is,'

"I'll take a common Theme, and yet excel,
"Tho' any man may hope to write as well;
"Yet let him try, and he shall sweat in vain,
"Idle his Labour, fruitless prove the Pain."

CREECH.

This Judgment of Horace, agrees with that which Cicero has made, where he speaks of certain Orators, Summissus est & humilis, consuetudinem imitans, ab indisertis re plus quàm opinione differens. Itaque eum qui audiunt, quamvis ipsi infantes sint, tamen illo modo confidunt se posse dicere. Nam orationis subtilitas imitabilis quidem illa videtur esse existimanti, sed nihil est experienti minus (40). i. e. "His Style is familiar "and humble, differing more in the reality than in o-"pinion from the expressions of those who do not speak "or write eloquently. His hearers, therefore tho' infants, "are yet confident they can speak like him: for this "delicate and artful kind of Eloquence appears to "those who judge of it, easy to be imitated; but no-"thing is found more difficult to such as attempt a "tryal of it." It is to be observed, that writers have asserted, that this sort of Orators only could justly be called Attick (41). I shall here add, that Ovid is one of those inimitable Poets, who appears, at first Sight, so extreamly easy to be imitated (42).

(40) Cicer. in Oratore, folio 120, C. See also Isocrates, in Panathenaico.

(41) Quem solum quidam vocant Atticum, Cicero, ibid.

(42) Dictionem Ovidii, quæ non nemini tanquam in triviis inveniendæ vilesceret, esse nimirum ex eo genere rerum, quas omnes inventant inventas. Fam. Strada, Prolus. 6. lib. 2. pag. m. 380.

☞Mr. Bayle having, for want of seeing Battista Guarini's Letters, as we may suppose, been misled in some particulars, and omitted many, relating to that eminent man; it would be unpardonable not to supply his defects on this occasion. Battista Guarini, born in 1537, was son to Francis Guarini, great grandson to the famous Guarino Guarini of Verona abovementioned; and of Orsolina, daughter of Count Balthasar Macchiavelli of Ferrara. We have no account in what manner he spent his youth [A]. He afterwards married [B]. It would be pretty difficult to point out exactly and regularly the employments he enjoyed; as well because of their variety, as because of the little care that was taken to preserve such notices; however here follows some account of them below [C]. He

[A] We have no account in what manner he spent his youth.] It appears however, by some of his manuscript poems, that he studied some time in Pisa; though he declares in the dedication of his Secretario, to Cardinal Colonna, that he went very young to Rome. His name is inserted in the register of the university of Padua (1), in which it is observed, that the Rector having an esteem for Guarini, because he he studied in that city obliged the Governor of Monselice to restore certain things that were sent to him, [and of which he had been dispossessed. He was forced to go to law with his father, who had married a second wife for the estates left by Alphonso Guarini his grandfather, and Alexander Guarini his uncle. But Hercules Duke of Ferrara interesting himself in that affair, it was ended amicably.

(1) Tomasini, Gymn. Patav. pag. 274.

[B] He married afterwards.] His wife was Thaddea, daughter of Nicholas Bendecci, and of Alexandra Rossetti, descended from a noble family in Ferrara (2).

(2) Hommes Illustres du Pere Niceron, vol. 25. pag. 173.

[C] Here follows some account ... of the employments he enjoyed.] He was first sent, by Alphonso II, Duke of Ferrara, on an embassy to Venice, and afterwards to Piedmont, where he resided five years. During his stay in Turin, he, upon the nuptials of Charles Duke of Savoy with the Princess Catherine, sister to Philip III King of Spain, presented that Prince with his Pastor Fido, which was then exhibited for the first time, before Guarini, with the greatest magnificence, as it was afterwards in other parts of Italy (3). He went afterwards to Rome (4), to congratulate, in the Duke of Ferrara's name, Pope Gregory XIII on his accession to the Pontificate. It is falsely asserted by some writers, that this Pope employed Guarini in several affairs of importance. Being in Ferrara, he spoke an oration in praise of the Emperor Maximilian, and of Lewis Cardinal of Este, at their funeral service which was solemnized in that city. He went into Germany, and there waited on the Emperor; after which he went to (5) Poland, to compliment (in the name of his Prince) Henry de Valois, on his election. At his return to Italy, he was appointed Secretary of State, and Counsellor of the Duke of Ferrara. Charles IX King of France dying the 30th of May 1574, and Henry de Valois having left the throne of Poland, to take possession of that of France, Alphonso Duke of Ferrara sent Guarini a second time into Poland, in company with Gualengui, to make interest for that crown. His Deputies conducted themselves with great prudence on this occasion, but their designs were defeated by a variety of obstacles (6). Guarini was afflicted with a very dangerous fit of sickness during this journey, of which he has given a very moving description in a letter to his wife, dated the 25th of November 1575; he complaining of the violence of his fever, the scarcity of Physic and Physicians, and the badness of Inns, provisions &c. Quel ch'io patissi il lascio pensare, à voi, febbre continoua, stalentaggine, & sete grandissima; rimedi scarsi, medici rari, allogiamenti cativi, il più di loro lontani, & molte volte ammorbati; cibi ch' à sani muovon lo stomacho; letti, ch' affogano nella piuma; in somma niuna di quelle commodità

(3) Lettere del Cavalier Battista Guarini Nobile Farrarese, pag. 18, & seq. Venetia Pr. G. B. Ciotti 1615, 8vo.

(4) In 1571.

(5) Lettere del Signor. C. Battista Guarini, pag. 5.

(6) Hommes illustres, ibid. pag. 174, 175.

He discharged his several employments with great wisdom and integrity. He had many enemies in the Duke of Ferrara's Court, who, being jealous of his great talents and abilities, rendred them of prejudice to him, by sending him at a distance from Court; and by causing him to be entrusted with negotiations of a most delicate nature, in hopes that the ill success of them might at last lose him the favour of his Prince. The fear he was under lest this should happen, made his continual journies very disagreeable to him; not to mention that they impoverished him; though he was a good œconomist enough. He himself has expressed his uneasiness with regard to his circumstances in a letter to his wife [D]. He afterwards withdrew from Court [E], and returned to it three years after [F], but left it again, his tranquillity being interrupted by some uneasinesses which broke out in his family [G], in 1588 he went to the Court of Savoy, and was immediately employed; however, he did not continue long there, occasioned, as it is supposed, by the ill offices which were done him by the Duke of Ferrara, who could not bear that a subject of his, of Guarini's merit, should serve other Princes. He then went to Padua, where he had the affliction to lose his wife in 1590 [H]. Two years after he was invited into the service of the Duke of Mantua, and being sent by him to Inspruck (a), to negotiate secure them from those who had done him the worst of injuries; and above all things, to inform them of every thing relating to their father, except his fortune. Voi ad ogni fortuna preparate l'animo vestro: E' cosa de Donniciola vilmente piagnere la morte di marito che non tema il morire. Lasciate pur, che gli altri m'honorino con le lagrine, voi honorate mi col valore. Vi raccommando i communi figliuoli, aiquali, se io morissi, bisegnerebbe che fosse non meno padre che madre. Vesti teui di pensiero & di fortezza virile: guardandoli da coloro, che hanno me riddotto à tal termine; & sopra tutto insegnando loro del patre ogni cosa, che la fortuna (11). It is very probable that he shadowed himself, in the first Scene of Act V of his Pastor Fido, under the name of Carino, which differs but little from his own (12).

(a) Lettres de Sign. Cav. Battista Guarini, pag. 305. In Venetia, Pr. G. B. Ciotti, 1615, 8vo.

(11) Idem, ibid.

(12) This also is the opinion of Sir R. Fanshaw, in his Dedication of his translation of Pastor Fido. London printed 1647, 4to.

[E] He afterwards withdrew from Court.] Being disgusted at it, Guarini, in 1582, desired the Duke to give him leave to retire, upon pretence of pursuing his law-affairs, which was a mere feint, his true reason being, as he himself declares in one of his Letters, because he did not meet with the return which he thought his services deserved (13). After this retreat, he spent the winters in Padua, and the summers at a delightful country-seat of his called la Guarina, situated in Polesine de Rovigo (14) which Duke Borso had presented to Battista Guarini his grandfather, as a reward for his services performed in France, where he had been his envoy.

(13) Lettre del Sig. Cav. Guarini, pag. 72.

(14) Idem, ibid.

[F] He returned to Court in three years.] He was recalled by Alphonso Duke of Ferrara, and restored to his employment of Secretary of State, after which he was employed in various negotiations in Umbria, Milan &c. But he soon met with the same vexations as formerly, and therefore again quitted his service (15).

(15) Ibid. pag. 48, 49.

[G] Some uneasinesses which broke out in his family.] Alessandro Guarini his eldest son, who had married in 1587 a rich heiress, Virginia Panciroli by name, niece to Cardinal Canani (16), weary of being under the subjection of his father, with whom he lived; and disgusted at the imperious treatment he met with from him, resolved to leave his house, and live apart with his wife (17). Battista Guarini was so highly offended at their departure, that he immediately seized on their income, upon pretence of their being indebted to him for monies he had expended at their marriage, for clothes &c. His son after having been deprived of his income for nine months, at last humbly besought the Duke of Ferrara to interpose his authority, which the Duke did; when commanding his chief judge to take cognizance of that affair, he immediately decided in favour of Alessandro Guarini. This decision exasperated the father still more, so that looking upon it as a proof that the Duke had no regard for him, he wrote a letter to him, whereby he desired, in the most respectful but strongest terms, to be dismiss'd his service, which the Duke granted; but at the same time seemed displeased at Guarini, for shewing so little regard to the favours he indulged him.

(16) Ibid. pag. 365.

(17) Hommes illustres, vol. 25. pag. 177, 178. I do not find any marks of Guarini's severity to his children, in running over his letters.

[H] He had the affliction to lose his wife in 1590.] Her death inspired him with very different thoughts from those he had hitherto entertained; and it is presumed by his Letters, that he designed to go to Rome, and turn Ecclesiastic. However, he was diverted from this resolution by the honourable invitation he received from the Duke of Mantua (18).

(18) Ibid. pag. 179.

(7) Lettere del Sign. Caval. Battista Guarini Nobile Ferrarese, pag. 66. In Venetia, pr. G. B. Ciotta, 1615, 8vo.

di que vezzi, che sono si necessari à poncri amalati (7). He then declares that he had been brought very near his end. Il male ogni di s'auvanzava, le forze veniuan meno, il gusto abborriua ogni causa, se non il vino: di sorte che pocha speranza mi restaua di vita, & quella poca ancora m'era odiosa (8). He then gives an account of the extremely dangerous passage he had had along the Danube, which nevertheless the violence of his sickness had made him almost insensible of. His next words show with what fidelity and pains he served his Prince. " You will observe, says he to his wife, " that when I found myself so very sick in Vienna, " I ought to have stopt there, and not proceed in " my journey towards Poland, but have had a pro- " per care of my life which was then in such imminent " danger. The same counsel, continues he, was sug- " gested to me by my judgment, my distemper, the " desire which creatures naturally have for life, and the " wants of my family and children; but then my " honour commanded me to act otherwise, and whis- " pered that since I was at the head of this embassy, " and bore the whole burden of so important a ne- " gotiation on my shoulders, I therefore ought to pre- " fer my master's service to life &c. Voi mi potreste dire tu tè douuevi fermare (in Vienna) & hauer cura della tua vita. Il medissimo conseglio mi daua altressi il senso, la malatia, le forse, il naturale desiderio di viue, l'amore delle mie creature, il bisogno della mia casa, & di miei figliuoli: ma il mio honore mi commendaua allo'n contro, chi essend'io capo di questa ambasceria, & reggendosi tutto su le mie spalle, il peso di si grande & importante negozio antiponessi il seruizio del mio signore alla vita, & procedessi di modo, che'l Regno di Polonia potesse argomentar più tosto dalla mia morte la fede del mio principe, che dalla vita sospettare ch'io ni infingessi, per non andar più innanzi, ad essequire quelle promesse, che con grandissimo desiderio, & forse bisogne qui sattenda nano; la qual credenza in animi come questi cupidi, & sospettosi non era altro, che torre tutto'l credito alle facende, & levar al mio Principe la Corona che noi cerchiamo di porli in Capo (9). He goes on with relating the very great hardships he suffered in the remaining part of his journey to Warsaw; the danger he run of being robbed and murdered by the Cossacks, and the vexations he met with when he was arrived in the last mentioned city . . . With what a warmth does he afterwards express himself! " O did I but suffer " these fatigues and torments for the love and glory " of God, I should be a martyr! but perhaps that " man is not unworthy of the name, who serves with- " out any hopes of a recompence!" O se que ste fatiche, & questi tormenti sofferessi io per amore & gloria di Dio, ferrei martire: ma non é forse indegno di cotal nome, chi serue senza speranza di guiderdone (10).

(8) Idem, ibid.

(9) Ibid. pag. 67.

(10) Ibid. pag. 69 though it is erroneously paged 96.

[D] In a Letter to his wife.] It is the same from which I have given the extract above. He therein expresses himself like a man of true honour, and with the tenderness of a good husband and kind father. He exhorts his wife to fortify her mind against the worst accidents that may happen; and observes, that it would be mean in a wife to bewail a husband who was not afraid of dying. He tells her, that others may honour him by their tears, but that she ought to honour him by her fortitude. He recommends their children to her care, observing that, in case of his death, she must be both father and mother to them. He desires her to tiate ſome affairs at the Arch-duke's Court, he was afterwards diſmiſſed the Duke of Mantua's ſervice by the powerful ſollicitations of Duke Alphonſo; upon which he went to Rome, but returned in 1595 to Ferrara [I], where he was again reconciled to the Duke. Alphonſo dying in 1597, great changes enſued in Ferrara, and Guarini, not thinking himſelf rewarded in a ſuitable manner, left Ferrara in 1599, and entred into the ſervice of Ferdinand de Medicis, Grand Duke of Tuſcany, who diſcovered a great eſteem for him, and would in all probability have been very liberal to him, had it not been for an unlucky affair [K]. He came again to Ferrara, whence he went to the Prince of Urbino but continued only a year in his ſervice; and returned again in 1604 to Ferrara, whence the Magiſtrates of the City ſent him to Rome, to congratulate Pope Paul V on his acceſſion to the Pontificate. This ſeems to have been his laſt public negotiation. He lived in Ferrara till the year 1609; going, at intervals, to Venice to carry on his law-ſuits. In 1610 he went to Rome, on account of two law-ſuits which he gained. Returning at laſt to his native country, and paſſing by Venice, he was ſeized with the diſtemper of which he died, in October 1612, aged ſeventy five years. He was a Member of ſeveral Academies, and many others, thoſe of the Ricovrati of Padua, the Intrepidi of Ferrara, and the Umoriſti of Rome. Guarini was not a Knight either of the Order of St. Stephen of Ferrara, or that of St. Michael of France; he having been created ſimply a Knight, either by Duke Alphonſo, or ſome other Prince he ſerved, or at whoſe Court he was Embaſſador (b). Battiſta Guarini left three ſons [L]. An ample catalogue of his works is found in the Hommes Illuſtres, vol. 25. of Father Niceron. Our author has united, in his (c) Paſtor Fido, the moſt exquiſite beauties of the Italian tongue, and every thing that is ſoft, charming and graceful in the paſſion of love; whence many perſons look upon it as no ways fit for the peruſal of young perſons. A new Engliſh Tranſlation of this famous Paſtoral is very much wanted; that of Sir R. Fanſhaw, being very flat and inharmonious, notwithſtanding the applauſes beſtowed upon it by Sir John Denham, who was certainly too great a judge of Poetry not to perceive its defects; but he doubtleſs was prompted only by friendſhip on that occaſion. The Earl of Roſcommon has given ſo beautiful a verſion of part of one of the ſcenes, that we cannot but regret his not undertaking the whole. I muſt not omit a very pleaſant miſtake of Aubertus Miræus [M].

(b) Hommes Illuſtres. vol. 15. pag. 194. But this ſeems to be a miſtake, Guarini hinting in one of his Letters, that he was a Knight of St. Stephen, non ni haverebbe per degno ſuo ſervidore, & degno Cavaliere di Santo Stephano &c. Lettere de Battiſta Guarini, pag. 312.

(c) One of the ſcarceſt and moſt valuable editions of this Poem, is that of Venice in 4to, printed for Gio. Battiſta Ciotti, 1602, con le annotazioni e con il compendio tratto da due Verati. Haym. in his Notizia, p. 168. calls this the 20th edition, but I have it now before me, and it is expreſſed the 27th. Father Niceron, vol. 25. pag. 187. hath falſely dated this edition 1502. The moſt ſplendid edition of this fine Poem is that in 4to at London, by the ingenious Signior Paolo Rolli.

[I] He returned in 1595 to Ferrara.] This was brought about by his ſon Aleſſandro, who was very much beloved at that Court; but freſh quarrels ſoon broke out again between Battiſta Guarini and his laſt mentioned ſon, which were afterwards carried to a great height (19).

(19) Ibid. pag. 180.

[K] Had it not been for an unlucky affair.] It was this. Our Guarini had carried with him to Florence Guarino Guarini his third ſon, then but fifteen years of age; and ſent him to Piſa to complete his ſtudies in that city. There the youth fell in love with a noble, but poor widow, named Caſſandra Pontaderi, and married her whilſt his father was in Piſa with the Grand Duke. Guarini no ſooner heard of this, but ſuſpecting that the Grand Duke knew of their marriage, and even promoted it; he left his ſervice abruptly, and returned to Ferrara. Guarino Guarini's wife dying after his father, he married very happily and advantageouſly Giulia Arioſti, a Lady of one of the beſt families in Ferrara, and had by her a ſon named Joſeph, who was father of Aleſſandro, to whom the public is obliged for the beſt life extant of our author (20).

(20) Ibid. pag. 181.

[L] Left three ſons.] Theſe were Aleſſandro, Jeromo and Guarino. The firſt was employed by the Duke of Ferrara, and by him ſent Embaſſador into Tuſcany. He afterwards was in the ſervice of the Dukes of Modena and Mantua, both of whom ſent him upon ſeveral foreign negotiations. He alſo was privy Chamberlain and Secretary of State to thoſe Princes. He had no children. There are three pieces of his extant. Jeromo, Battiſta Guarini's ſecond ſon, was a man of wit and genius, but very irregular in his conduct, which gave his father great uneaſineſs; and particularly his marrying 'againſt his conſent a woman of inferiour birth to his own. He died without iſſue in Milan, anno 1611. His third ſon has been already mentioned (21).

(21) In the note [K] above.

[M] I muſt not omit a very pleaſant miſtake of Aubertus Miræus.] He has ranked our Guarini among the eccleſiaſtical Authors, in his Bibliotheca Eccleſiaſtica, on account of his Paſtor Fido, which he imagined to be a book of devotion, ſhewing the duty of Paſtors. I GUARINI or GUARINIO, a Theatine Friar and Mathematician to the Duke of Savoy, was born in Modena, and flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth Century. His Placita Philoſophica was printed at Paris in 1666, and his Cæleſtis Mathematica at Milan [A] in 1683, at which time he was dead.

[A] His Placita Philoſophica and Cœleſtis mathematica . . . were printed] Both theſe works are in folio. The former is a body of Philoſophy, in which the author treats chiefly of Phyſic, and deviates very much from the common opinion of the ſchools. See the Journal des Savans of Nov. 29th 1666. With regard to the other work, I refer thoſe who have it not by them, to the Acta Eruditorum Lipſienſium (1).

(1) For June 1684, pag. 259.

GUEBRIANT (RENATA DU BEC), wife of Marſhal de Guebriant, was daughter of Renatus du Bec Marquis de Vardes [A], and ſiſter of Renatus du Bec, who married the Counteſs de Moret, miſtreſs to Henry the Great. Her elder brother was killed by [A] Renatus du Bec, Marquis de Vardes.] I add that he was Knight of the King's Orders, Governor of la Capelle and of the Territory of Tieraſche; and that his ſon, who married the Counteſs of Moret, had by her the Marquis de Vardes, who has been ſo long in diſgrace, on account of ſome intrigues, mentioned in the book intitled les Amours du Palais Royal. This diſgrace did not continue till the death of the Marquis du Vardes, but was not many years ſhort of it. The Counteſs of Moret's huſband was Governor of la Capelle, and even outlawed and ſentenced to die, for having ſurrendred up that place too ſoon to the Spaniards anno 1636 (1). However, he was pronounced innocent by an Arret of the Parliament of Paris, after the death of Cardinal Richelieu.

(1) The Mercure Francois of 1636 calls him only Baron du Bec.

by ſome Banditti in Italy [B]. This Lady was appointed to conduct, to the King of Poland, the Princeſs Mary de Gonzaga, whom he had married at Paris by proxy; on which occaſion ſhe was inveſted with a new character (a), that of Embaſſadreſs Extraordinary. Le Laboureur, in his account of this journey, does not ſeem to have related faithfully the reſult of the French Embaſſador's quarrel [C]; nor has de Wicquefort given an accurate relation of it [D], and ſays, without any foundation, that our Madam de

(a) See the remark [E] citation (16).

[B] Her elder brother was killed by ſome Banditti in Italy.] This is generally aſſerted in thoſe books which contain a genealogical account of the anceſtors of the Marquis du Vardes (2). But in the collection of pieces annexed to the Journal of Henry III, there are ſome obſervations on the amours of Henry IV, in which it is aſſerted, that de Guebriant's brother was killed by a peaſant whom he was going to beat; and that "his father, a venerable old man who had about "fifty or ſixty thouſand livres a year, in order to con- "ceal this unhappy murther, cauſed his ſon's retinue, "after his death, to take the road towards Lyons and "Italy; a few days after which, he cauſed ſome let- "ters to be written to himſelf, declaring that he had "died ſuddenly on the road." He who gives this account does it on the following occaſion. He ſays that one Villeneuve, a Gentleman of Guienne, married in that part of France called le Vexin, aſſembled ſeveral Gentlemen at Saucour (3), near Giſors in the year 1622, in order to aſk their opinion concerning the following caſe of conſcience. A Gentleman (probably he who wanted the advice) had gone unaccompanied into the houſe of a peaſant, in order to chaſtize him. The peaſant collar'd him, threw him under him, and had ſwore to murther him, unleſs he would promiſe and ſwear to never revenge himſelf either directly or indirectly. This was ſworn by the Gentleman; and the query he wanted to aſk, was, whether he ought to keep his word with the peaſant. The author of the Obſervations adds, that "the aſſembly of Gentlemen in "queſtion, conſiſting of ten or twelve Gentlemen, "were unanimouſly for the affirmative; and a reſo- "lution paſſed, that no Gentleman ſhould ever attack "a peaſant, except he was ſure of getting the better of "him; and they mentioned, continues this writer, "the recent and more fatal example of a certain "Marquis &c." this is the adventure I juſt now mentioned, concerning the eldeſt brother of Marquis de Vardes, and Marſhal de Guebriant's Lady.

(2) See Father Anſelme, tom. 2. pag. 626. Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, tom. 2. pag. 500.

(3) I believe it ſhould be Sancoar.

This ſtory is related ſo very circumſtantially, that it might eaſily paſs for truth, and nevertheleſs we have reaſon to doubt the genuineneſs of it; and may even look upon it as falſe, when we examine other circumſtances. We find, in le Laboureur's (4) relation of the Queen of Poland's journey, that Marſhal de Guebriant's Lady, in her way thro' Genoa, cauſed a monument to be erected to the memory of her brother, who had been killed by Banditti in this country. But I had better relate the whole paſſage of Mr. le Laboureur; this containing many circumſtances, which give an air of improbability to the aſſembly of Saucour. This Writer ſays therefore (after obſerving that the Princes of Monaco, and the Lords of Bec-Creſpin in Normandy, deſcend from the ſame anceſtors) that "it was this "prompted the late Meſſire John du Bec, Marquis de "la Boſſe (5), eldeſt ſon of Renatus du Bec, Marquis "de Vardes, and Knight of the King's Orders; paſ- "ſing thro' Italy in 1616, with the deſign of going "to Genoa to viſit the Lord Grimaldi his relations; "and having been murthered in the road by Banditti, "they revenged his death by an exemplary puniſh- "ment, and depoſited his body in St. Francis's church, "the burying-place of many of their family, where "it lay till the year 1646, when Marſhal de Gue- "briant's Lady his ſiſter, and Meſſieurs Grimaldi cauſ- "ed it to be removed to Our Lady of Conſolation with- "out Genoa, where a monument was ſet up to him, "the epitaph of which I wrote."

(4) Third part, pag. 353.

(5) Moreri, in the article of Bec-Creſpin, has, once, put La Broſſe, inſtead of de la Boſſe. He had read or been told, ſomething concerning the other manner in which this murther is related, as appears from the following words: others ſay, that he was murthered by ſome Norman Peaſants in Budavid; which makes a new diverſity.

Can any one believe, that the farce ſhould have been carried ſo far, merely to conceal the advantage which a peaſant had gained over a young Marquis? Would ſuch an unhappy accident have reflected diſhonour on a family; and was there no other way to conceal it, but by having recourſe to Italian Banditti? We ought not to accuſtom people to add more credit to ſtories told in converſation, rather than to monuments of hiſtory, ſuch as thoſe related by le Laboureur; for this would be ſetting a bad example, and be pernicious in its conſequences.

[C] Le Laboureur . . does not ſeem to have related faithfully the reſult of the French Embaſſador's Quarrel.] How deſirous ſoever I may be, to be tender of a man whoſe merit is ſo great, I yet cannot forbear obſerving that he has not given an impartial relation of the French Embaſſador's quarrel, and that he endeavours to conceal the ill ſucceſs of his pretenſions. After having exhibited, page 137 and 138, the moſt ſolid arguments of the Poles, he does not inform his readers, either what reply was made to them, nor the final reſolutions on that occaſion. In page 151, he ſeats Mr. de Bregi, at table, below Prince Charles (6), without telling us how, and why this Embaſſador relinquiſh'd his pretenſions. He ſeats him ſtill below the Prince in page 194, but adds, that this Prince repreſented the Emperor's Embaſſador extraordinary. By this he inſinuates, that Mr. de Bregi had all the advantage he could deſire in the quarrel, ſince they were forced to inveſt Prince Charles with a character, to which all the Embaſſadors of crowned Heads were to yield the precedency. But the reader is deſired in the Errata, to blot out, pag. 194, who repreſented the perſon of the Emperor. It is ſtrange that the perſon who drew up the Errata, ſhould have been ſo negligent, as not to expreſs the error in the very words in which it had been printed. But this palpable artifice is much leſs excuſable, when we conſider that few people mind the Errata of a Book (7). The reader is alſo deſired to ſtrike out in the ſame page 194, what is there ſaid, viz. that the Pope's Nuncio would abſolutely ſeat himſelf at the nuptial feaſt, below the Marſhal's Lady. However, theſe two corrections do not well anſwer the expectation which had been raiſed in the reader (8), by the cenſure that had been paſſed on Renaudot's Gazettes, on another relation that had been given of this feaſt, and on the following words of le Laboureur himſelf. "Perhaps "more credit will be given to me, with regard to the "perſons who were ſeated at the table of their Maje- "ſties, and the order in which they were placed, ſince "the Queen of Poland ordered me to be preſent on "that occaſion." Since ſo many falſities were ſpread in the city of Paris, about things relating to the ceremonial; what credit could be given to news, relating to particulars that were ſtill more difficult to be known? Such multitudes ſend accounts of ſolemnities of this kind, that the whole makes a moſt unaccountable confuſion. Le Laboureur informs us, that ſeveral footmen pretended to draw up relations of it; and that the Baker was making one, in which he took particular care, to ſpecify the price and goodneſs of the meal (9).

PRETENSIONS of Mr. de Bregi, Embaſſador of France in Poland.

(6) He was the King of Poland's brother.

(7) See ſomething of the ſame kind, in the Nouvelles de la Rép. des Lettres, for June 1686, article 3.

(8) Page 194.

(9) Ibid.

[D] De Wicquefort . . . has not . . . given an accurate relation of it.] "The Embaſſador, ſays he (10), "who ſcrupled to yield the precedency to the heredi- "tary Prince of Sweden, brother to the King of Po- "land; and Marſhal de Guebriant's Lady, who inſiſt- "ed upon having the ſame honours paid to her, as "formerly to the Arch-Ducheſs of Tirol, were guilty "of an impardonable impertinence, and were the "cauſe that their Sovereign received an affront." The Embaſſador hinted at by him, is the perſon whom he calls Viſcount de Bregi, in page 593 of the firſt Book; where, after having called his pretenſion an extravagant one, he adds, that the pretenſion of Marſhal de Guebriant's Lady was as ridiculous, ſince ſhe inſiſted upon having the ſame rank, and the ſame honours paid her as to the Archducheſs, when ſhe brought the Queen her daughter from Poland. It is ſaid in the Index (referring the reader to the ſame page 593), that Marſhal de Guebriant's Lady pretended to take the upper hand of the Archducheſs; but no ſuch particular is mentioned in the page we are referred to.

(10) Traité de l'Embaſſadeur, lib. 2. pag. m. 200.

I will not contradict Mr. de Wicquefort in what he ſays concerning thoſe pretenſions, this not being a fact. I only de Guebriant was concerned in it. She ſuſtained her character very worthily. She was a woman of intrigue, and endowed with very great qualities [E]. Priolo does not give a juſt account of her negotiation at Briſac [F]; but this is not the only error he has committed

I only obſerve, that he has no reaſon to aſſert, that Bregi and Marſhal de Guebriant's Lady cauſed their Sovereign to receive an affront, by their pretenſions. This is true, at moſt, only with regard to Mr. Bregi; for we don't find by le Laboureur's relation, tho' ſo circumſtantiated, that the Lady Guebriant had any diſpute. We find indeed (11), that there was a ſtrong conteſt at two different times with reſpect to the pretenſions of the French Embaſſador; but we there find that the Lady in queſtion, ſo far from being obliged to engage in any diſpute, was deſired by the Queen of Poland (the very day that Mr. le Bregi began to have a diſpute), not to concern herſelf in any manner with it; and that Count Honoſt, with the Embaſſadors and great men of Poland, declared to her, that ſhe ſhould be paid the honours due to her, not only of embaſſadreſs extraordinary, but alſo ſuperintendant of her Majeſty's conduct, purſuant to the ſeveral precedents, AND PARTICULARLY THAT OF THE ARCHDUCHESS OF INSPRUCK, when ſhe conducted the deceaſed Queen. The author informs us in another place (12), that the King had declared to all the Grandees of his Kingdom, that it was his intention that ſhe ſhould receive all the honours, which a Lady of her quality, and of the character with which ſhe was inveſted, could deſerve; AND THE SAME WITH THOSE WHICH HAD BEEN PAID TO THE ARCHDUCHESS OF INSPRUCK, the grand Duke of Tuſcany's ſiſter, who had conducted the late Queen. It will not be neceſſary after this, in order to refute de Wicquefort, to alledge the following paſſage of the relation (13). The Lady Guebriant, coming down the ſtair-caſe of the palace to go into her coach (14), the Biſhop of Poſnania, cloathed in his pontifical veſtments, gave her his bleſſing. This honour, which is never done to any except crowned Heads and Princes, the King would have beſtowed upon her, as a ſtronger mark of the eſteem he had for this illuſtrious Lady.

(11) Pag. 137. of Part 1.

(12) Pag. 203. of Part 1.

(13) Pag. 3. of Part 3.

(14) It was the day ſhe left Poland.

[E] She was . . . endowed with very great qualities.] In my opinion, the beſt way to form a juſt judgment of Madam de Guebriant's merit, is to take a middle courſe between the encomiums which le Laboureur laviſhes upon her, and the diſadvantageous things which are ſpoke of her by other writers. But however this be, when we conſider the employments ſhe filled, it cannot poſſibly be denied, but that ſhe was poſſeſſed of a great genius, and was miſtreſs of many of thoſe exalted talents, which enable a Lady to maintain and diſtinguiſh herſelf to very great advantage, in the moſt ſhining court-employments. People may rail as much as they pleaſe at thoſe who beſtow employments, and may charge them as long as they pleaſe with not encouraging merit; yet the judicious part of mankind will never be perſuaded, that the Queen-Mother and Cardinal Mazarine would have appointed the Lady Guebriant to ſuperintend the conduct of the Queen of Poland (15), and have made her embaſſadreſs extraordinary, had they not believed that ſhe would have done honour to France in the Poliſh Court, and keep up the new character with which ſhe was inveſted (16), with the requiſite wit, prudence and grandeur. The Letters which were wrote to her by the King, the Queen-Mother, and the Cardinal, when ſhe was nominated for this employment; and thoſe which the King of Poland wrote to the King and Queen-Mother when ſhe returned to Paris, agree in beſtowing the higheſt elogiums upon her; and it is certain that ſhe diſcovered the greateſt abilities in the diſcharge of thoſe employments. The Letters in queſtion are inſerted in Le Laboureur's relation.

I before obſerved, that the encomiums he gives muſt not be taken in their full latitude. In his opinion, "their moſt Chriſtian Majeſties, by this choice, "acted conformably to the wiſhes of the whole French "nation, and of the chief perſons of the Court in "particular. He ſays, that the thing was made public before it was reſolved upon, and that no one "was leſs acquainted with it than thoſe who ſhould "have known it; that this illuſtrious widow lived "a recluſe life; that her huſband revived every day "in her memory, in order to die in her heart, which "again mourned for him; that ſhe daily ſacrificed "ſome paſſion or other to him; that the paſſion for "Court Places, and for the Court itſelf was dead "in her." In fine, that the ſole reaſon of her not accepting that employment was, becauſe ſhe could not refuſe to obey the commands of her Sovereign, after having been bound to him "by ſo many obligations; "and particularly for the honours which were paid "the Marſhal her huſband, at his interment, by his "Majeſty's order." Thus he writes in part I, pag. 9 of his relation. He obſerves, in vol. II of his additions to the memoirs of Caſtelnau, page 499, "that "ſhe kept up the fame and remembrance of Marſhal "de Guebriant, by ſo long a ſeries of ſervices, and "glorious labours, that the King, by appointing her "Lady of Honour to the future Queen, not only "pleaſed all his ſubjects, but alſo gratified the wiſhes "and eſteem of all nations, where her merit diſ-"played itſelf, during her embaſſy extraordinary, "to conduct the Queen of Poland into her dominions." There doubtleſs are too many rhetorical flouriſhes and poetical thoughts in what I have quoted above, eſpecially for a writer, who in ſo many places of his additions to the memoirs of Caſtelnau, has delivered himſelf with great freedom and boldneſs againſt the abuſes of the age; and whoſe metaphorical exploſions are very much like thoſe of Count de Lude, of whom he ſays, that "though he fired, from a great diſtance, at the "government, yet all his ſhots were not loſt; ſome "of them inflicting deſperate wounds." It is in page 767 of his additions, that he has delivered himſelf in this manner. I ſhall quote Patin by and by, who does not ſay, that the whole French nation were earneſtly deſirous of having that heroine raiſed to great honours. I have juſt now read in a modern Hiſtorian, that ſhe was fired with an inſatiable ambition; and that to this was owing the magnificent obſequies with which the Marſhal her huſband was honoured. Guebriantii exſequiæ non vulgari pompa celebratæ. Corpus illatum Fano Deiparæ Virginis, qui honos infrequens non tam conceſſus Viri meritis, quàm uxoris Renatæ Bekiæ flagitatione extortus; fœmina impotens, gloriæ potius quàm luctus immodica, juſta marito perſoluta in ſui oſtentationem trahere (17). i. e. Marſhal de Guebriant's funeral was "ſolemnized with no ordinary pomp. The body was "carried to the Church of Notre Dame; an unuſual "honour that was not granted ſo much to the "Marſhal's deſerts, as extorted by the importunity "of Renata du Bec, his wife; a woman of very "ſtrong paſſions, who was prompted to pay theſe "unuſual funeral honours, not ſo much from affliction, "as out of pride and oſtentation." To ſpeak my opinion freely, I do not believe that ſhe accepted of the embaſſy extraordinary to Poland, merely out of a holy principle of obedience; or that this employment was beſtowed without her ſuing for it. We have juſt reaſon to ſuſpect the oratorical flouriſhes of a Panegyriſt.

(15) Louiſa Maria de Gonzaga, daughter of a Duke de Nevers, who was afterwards Duke of Mantua, married to Uladiſlaus IV King of Poland in 1645. See Memoires de Marolles, pag. 162.

(16) Rex atque Regina mater Renatam Dubecam Vardiam mulierem viduam genere atque probitate inſignem, ubi cum Sponſa in Poloniam ire juſſere, quæ hanc vice ſua Uladiſlao Regi traderet, Dubecam ea cauſa novo, ut opinor, exemplo atque apud omnes gentes inaudito Legati, ſeu, ſi fas eſt dicere, Legatæ titulo ornavere. Labardæus (Mr. de la Barde) Hiſt. de Reb. Gallic. lib. 3. pag. 176. The Lady Guebriant was the firſt woman, and the only one, if I miſtake not, who ever had the title of Embaſſadreſs in her own right, and will very poſſibly be the laſt. Wicquefort, liv. 1. de l'Ambaſſ. pag. 15.

(17) Benjamin. Priolus, de Rebus Gall. Hiſt. lib. 2. cap. 6. pag. m. 41, 42.

[F] Priolo does not give a juſt account of her negotiation at Briſac.] This Hiſtorian (18) relates a particular, which is not very honourable to the Lady in queſtion. He ſays that during the laſt troubles, Charlevois who had commanded in Briſac, quarrelled with the Governor whom the Court had ſent thither, (this was Mr. de Tilladet) and that he purſued his point with ſo much vigour, that the Governor was obliged to yield to him. That upon this, the Lady Guebriant, prompted either by avarice or ambition, reſolved if poſſible to make herſelf neceſſary; and being deſirous to have the Court think ſhe had preſerved that important town, ſhe formed an intrigue in order to ruin Charlevois. That, for this purpoſe, ſhe took with her to Briſac a girl whom he loved; and that Charlevois being ſo imprudent as to leave the fortreſs to viſit this young woman in queſtion, he was taken and carried priſoner to Philipſburg. Imponit hamo eſcam, quàm ſciebat appetiturum Charlovoium: puella amata illicium fuit, cui inviſendæ miſer arce exit (19). That the Lady Guebriant was ſo much ſtigmatiſed on that account, that ſhe was forced to retire to Baſil with all the ſpeed poſſible; and that Charlevois held a ſecret intelligence with Count de Harcourt, who was diſguſted at the government, and made his peace upon advantageous conditions; ſo that the Lady in queſtion ſeeing herſelf hated by both parties, died of grief (20). We

(18) De Reb. Gall. lib. 8.

(19) Idem, lib. 8. cap. 8.

(20) Guebriantiæ utrimque exoſa, tædio & mœrore vitam inquietam finivit.

committed with regard to this Lady, which may ſerve to remove ſome ſuſpicions concerning her [G]. We muſt not credit too lightly all that Guy Patin ſays of her [H]. This

We have here an inſtance of what commonly happens to thoſe who give abridgments; they omit ſeveral circumſtances, without which an incident is a ſmall ununiformed and ſhapeleſs maſs, as thoſe find by experience, who, after having read it with all its circumſtances in a hiſtory at large, compare the idea they then have of it with that which they had formed to themſelves of it from an epitome. Thoſe who ſhall read in Labardæus's Hiſtory this intrigue of the Lady Guebriant, will verify my preſent aſſertion. But, not to mention Priolo's omiſſions, it is certain that there are two falſities in his relation.

The firſt is, his ſaying, that Charlevois came out of Briſac, in order to ſee the miſtreſs whom the Lady Guebriant brought him. Now nothing can be falſer than this, Charlevois not being obliged to leave the abovementioned town, becauſe ſhe was in the Lady Guebriant's train. Beſides, the reader may very juſtly wonder that this Lady ſhould be in Briſac; and that Charlevois's miſtreſs, who was to inſnare him, is not with the Lady who carries on the intrigue, and who makes ſo good a uſe of the ſtratagems of Catherine de Medicis (21). It is certain ſhe was there, and that the artifice employed to entrap Charlevois, was the accuſtoming him to go and take the air in a coach, at a conſiderable diſtance from the city, in company with Lady Guebriant and his miſtreſs in queſtion. But on the day he was taken, the Lady Guebriant, deſirous of being in Briſac when the firſt news ſhould be brought of it, pretended I know not what buſineſs that kept her from taking the air; and yet deſired that all her retinue ſhould go. The ſecond falſity relates to the death of this Lady. Priolo makes her die of grief, at a time when the civil war was not yet ended; but it is certain (22) that ſhe was not diſturbed at the ill ſucceſs of her enterprize at Briſac; and that ſhe carried on her intrigues even in Baſil itſelf, and revolved mighty deſigns in her mind, in order to ingratiate herſelf with the Queen-mother and Cardinal Mazarine; in a word, that her death did not happen till the year 1659, after her having made ſo great a figure at Court, that ſhe was to be firſt Lady of Honour to Queen Maria Thereſa. How was it poſſible for an Hiſtorian of Priolo's character, who had been ſo very converſant with great people and with public affairs, and who publiſhed his Hiſtory but a few years after that Lady's death, could fix the date of it ſo erroneouſly, as to bereave her of five or ſix years of the moſt ſhining proſperity? But perhaps he thereby did her a good office.

(21) Hiſtorians relate, that ſhe made the beauty of her maids of honour ſubſervient to her deſigns, when ſhe wanted to ruin any great man; which conduct her daughter imitated. See Mezerai, under the year 1579.

(22) Labardæus, Hiſt. de Rebus Gallic. l. 9. pag. 737. ad an. 1652.

Labardæus obſerves that this Lady, not contented with the character of Embaſſadreſs Extraordinary with which ſhe had been inveſted, deſired, in order to throw a ſtill greater glory round her, to concern herſelf in a war-intrigue (23). It was even ſaid that ſhe aſpired to the government of Briſac, and to poſſeſs herſelf of the territories belonging to the King of Alſatia. Had ſhe ſucceeded in this, ſhe would have recovered the monies which his Majeſty owed her, and formed a ſmall principality in that frontier country. Eâ tempeſtate vulgatum Dubecam non modò Briſiacum expetere ſibi, cui Præfecta eſſet, ſed & prædia quæ Rex in Alſatia poſſidet omnia, quibus huic permiſſis ære ſe alieno liberaret, quo ſatis grandi Dubecæ obſtrictus erat: ita mulier nihil niſi ingens animo volvere ſolita, ſibi ſpeciem Principatûs aliquam in hac ab Aula remota regione fingebat. Legati . . . perſonam ſuſtinuerat, quod tametſi amplum ipſi magnificumque viſum, tamen magis ſuprà fœminam eſſe videbatur, quidpiam quod ad militiam pertineret, attingere, cujus ſibi facultatem dari in Charlevoſii negotio eſt arbitrata. (23).

(23) Legati . . . perſonam ſuſtinuerat, quod tametſi amplum ipſi, magnificumque viſum, tamen magis ſuprà fœminam eſſe videbatur, quidpiam quod ad militiam pertineret, attingere, cujus ſibi facultatem dari in Charlevoſii negotio eſt arbitrata. Labard. pag. 620.

(24) Idem, ibid.

[G] This may ſerve to remove ſome ſuſpicions concerning her.] I juſt now obſerved, that perhaps Priolo did her a good office. By this I mean, that had not this author ſaid, that the Lady Guebriant died before the troubles were ended, he might have raiſed a ſuſpicion in many of his readers, that ſhe was one of the four women of whom he gives a very ill character. He declares, that four women lighted up a civil war in every part of France; that they had more genius than virtue; but that failing in their projects, they turned devotees, which, ſays he, is a very common thing with the female ſex, when their glaſs informs them, that they are no longer able to charm their beholders. Tunc quatuor non quidem abſurdæ ingenio, ſed quæ plus moribus nocebant quàm ingenio proderant, omnem Galliam commiſerunt . . Ipſæ poſtea improſperis, ut fit, rebus ſe prædamnantes Numini fidem obligarunt per religionis mendacem ſimulationem & fucoſa ſuperſtitione: effætis vitiis januâ clauſâ, cum ſpeculo damnante, ſe putris ſenectus, præciſâ ejus ſententiâ reformidat (25). Ad arbitrium quatuor fœminarum noſtra diu recta. Illæ neque Regno neque ſibi felicis uteri dum ſuâ magnitudine peccandi licentiam metiuntur, Galliam omnem in ſummum diſcrimen vocavere, &c (26). That my readers may the better know, how greatly the Lady in queſtion is obliged to Priolo, for not ranking her with theſe four women, it muſt be remembred, that he repreſents them as barren (27), and proportioning their wickedneſs to the greatneſs of their ſtations; that they were for ever revolving mighty deſigns; that they applied themſelves ſecretly to the Cardinal by the mediation of their Gallants, and betrayed one another; ſo that his Eminence was not the judge between three, but of four wanton Goddeſſes. Sic Mazarinus non trium, ſed quatuor Dearum libidinantium judex fuit. Whilſt theſe ingaged in his intereſt, others oppoſed it ſtrongly; and would not ſcruple to attempt any thing, provided they could but puſh themſelves into the ſecret of intrigues. They proſtituted themſelves (28), which thoſe women can hardly forbear, who are determined to concern themſelves with civil wars. They ſtand in need of the confidence of party-leaders, and want to be aided by their ſwords as well as politicks; but theſe will not indulge their favours to the Ladies gratis, they know how to make proper uſe of the critical minute. The obligations to which they bind themſelves, are ſure to become, at laſt, bodily ones, and which they are never allowed to diſcharge any other way. Their creditors will not ſuffer themſelves to be impoſed upon, but immediately ſeize. Such is the condition of a Lady, who has the ambition to preſide over a ſtate-revolution. Marſhal de Turenne, though ſo wiſe a General, could not (as we are told) reſiſt the impetuoſity of the ſtream; and alſo required to be indulged in the perſonal returns here hinted at, for the ſervices he did during the civil wars. I imagined that he never concerned himſelf with the affairs of gallantry only this time; but I have been aſſured by a perſon, who had an opportunity of knowing this matter, that he frequently acted in this manner. Notwithſtanding the age of Lady Guebriant, yet ſome readers might ſuppoſe her to be one of the four hinted at above, had not the Hiſtorian prevented it by the method he took, much better than by the characteriſticks whereby they are diſtinguiſhed, moſt of which ſuit her; her age, I ſay, would ſignify nothing; for not to go ſo far back as Aſpaſia, Lamia, and even the Ducheſs of Valentinois; do not we find, about the time that Priolo is ſpeaking of, that a Ducheſs who was pretty far advanced in years (29) atchieved great conqueſts in love? Labardæus, whom I now cite, agrees with Priolo on this article, viz. that women during the ſtorms which diſturbed the laſt minority, would frequently concern themſelves with the helm of government. The author of the Thoughts on Comets, might have added this citation to thoſe of his CCXXXVIth article; and not this alone, but a numberleſs multitude more which we meet with in books.

(25) Priol. lib. 2. num. 43.

(26) Idem, lib. 8. num. 10.

(27) See the cloſe of this remark.

(28) Pars ſui cupiam facere ut aulæ arcanum quodlibet rimarentur. Priolo, lib. 2. num. 42.

(29) Huic erat noverca Maria Avancuria (d'Avaugour) quam Herculeo Robanus Mombaſonus pater dudum uxorem duxerat eximia per adoleſcentiam pulchritudine; tantaque vis boni in ipſa erat forma ut ne hanc quidem ætas extingueret, quæ fiebat uti multi domum ejus frequentarent mulieris amore capti, atque inter hos Henricus Guiſius vir è Lotharingica gente Princeps. Prius Henricus Aurelius Longovilla apud hanc multus fuerat frequenſque. Labardæus, lib. 2. pag. 72. ad ann. 1644.

Take notice, that when I ſaid, that the Hiſtorian repreſented thoſe four Ladies, whoſe credit and intereſt were ſo great as barren, I ſaid this only with reſpect to the major part of my readers; for thoſe who know that the following words of Priolo, neque regno, neque ſibi felicis uteri, allude to a thing which Paterculus has ſaid of Julia daughter of Auguſtus will not take it for a mark of barrenneſs (30).

(30) Here follow Paterculus's words, lib. 2. cap. 93. Filiam Cæſaris Juliam . . feminam neque ſibi neque reip. felicis uteri.

[H] We muſt not credit too lightly all that Guy Patin ſays of her.] Here follow two paſſages from his letters. The Lady de Guebriant, ſays he, in a letter dated September 9. 1659. is dead in Perigueux: ſhe was ill but thirteen hours, and left the world without confeſſing herſelf; ſhe was the Partiſan in that part of France, and her Memory is had in the utmoſt Deteſtation. Ten days after

(31) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, tom. 2. pag. 626; and after him, Moreri's Dictionary, under Marſhal de Guebriant's article, fix his death to the 28th of Sept. 1659.

SLANDERS publiſhed by Priolo concerning ſome Ladies.

This furniſhes us with a remark, in which we ſhall find the time when ſhe died. The reader will ſee, in another remark, the error of a German writer [I], who wrote notes on Priolo. I muſt not omit, that this Lady, imagining herſelf not well matched, though the huſband ſhe had been obliged to marry was very rich, cauſed her marriage to be annulled [K], and married (b) Count de Guebriant a younger brother of an antient family of Brittany. She contributed very much to his obtaining the Batoon of Marſhal [L].

(b) Anno 1632.

after he ſpoke as follows of her. News is come, that Lady Guebriant, who was following the Court, is dead. She was aunt to the Marquis of Vardes, and never had any Children. I believe ſhe has left a good eſtate behind her. She died in four days, and did not confeſs herſelf. We may ſay of her what Eraſmus ſaid jokingly of a Franciſcan, who died ſuddenly, obiit ſine crux, ſine lux, ſine Deus (a). It is ſaid that ſhe was very much in debt; but then the Queen ows her 40000 Piſtoles, which ſhe had lent her during the Siege of Paris.

§ (a) This ſaying is found in the Facetiæ of Bebelius, folio 56. of the edition of 1542; and Luther has alſo employed it in his Table Talk, Tom. I. folio 86. Omnes, ſays he ſpeaking of a conſiderable number of his Adverſaries, mortui ſunt ſine crux, & ſine lux. REM. CRIT.

As Patin has inſerted in his letters, a great many Stories, which were told him when he went his rounds to viſit his Patients (32), I would not depend on all I have here borrowed from him. I can eaſily believe that this Lady was a great Party-woman, and that her very profuſe diſpoſition and her inclination which was naturally turned to Buſineſs, prompted her to engage in Parties, becauſe of the riches that were gained by it; and therefore that ſhe was deteſted in thoſe places where ſhe put her Art in practice; but I am of opinion that ſhe never did this in Perigord (33). She doubtleſs died as ſhe was paſſing through that Province, during the Progreſs of the Court into Guienne, at the time when ſhe expected to be firſt Lady of honour to the Queen; for at that time no one doubted of the King's marriage with the Infanta of Spain.

(32) See the Menagian. pag. 279. firſt Dutch edit.

(33) Take notice, that ſince the printing of this in my Plan, I have ſeen the enquiries with reſpect to the interment of Marſhal de Guebriant (cited by Le Laboureur in the Hiſtory of that Marſhal) where he is called Count of Guebriant and of Perigueux.

In caſe Patin's Letters ſhould be reprinted, his Errors ought to be corrected by Notes, and a good Index will be wanted. But before I leave his Letters, I ſhall extract from one I have already cited, ſome particulars relating to the Guebriant family. It is he ſays that the Counteſs of Moret, Miſtreſs to Henry IV. "is celebrated in Barclay's Euphormion, under "the Name of Cafina; that it is in the place where "ſhe was married to Count de Ceſi-Sancy, who af-"terwards was ſent Ambaſſador to Conſtantinople; "and that it is there we have the Deſcription of a "contract of Marriage, of a Husband who is wil-"ling to be a cuckold, and who promiſes and obliges "himſelf to ſubmit to that Character; that about the "year 1618, ſhe married the Marquis de Vardes, "ſon to the worthy Governor of la Chapelle, &c." He ſhould have ſaid la Capelle (34). He who married the Counteſs of Moret, was alſo Governor of this place. It might be added, that Henry IV. ſtipulated with Count de Ceſi, that he ſhould leave this Counteſs the very Evening of the wedding, which he did accordingly (35).

(34) Moreri ſays alſo Chapelle, in the article of Du Bec.

(35) Hiſt. des Amours d'Alcandre, num. 70. We are told in the notes, that this Count was called Philip de Harlai, and that he died in May 1652, aged 71 years.

The Count does not make ſuch a promiſe in the Euphormio: but he promiſes in the Contract not to meddle with the Bride. Patin ought not to have omitted this Circumſtance. By the way, the Perſon who gave a key to the Euphormio (36), is miſtaken, in ſuppoſing Olympion, who ſubmits to theſe conditions of marriage, to be Count de Moret.

(36) See the Leyden edit. apud Hackium, 1674 8vo.

[I] The Reader will ſee . . . the error of a German Writer.] Priolo's Hiſtory was printed a ſecond time at Leipſic, Anno 1686. To this edition was added, the Notes of a Profeſſor named Franckenſtein, which though they are not quite free from errors, nevertheleſs ſhew, that the Author of them was very well acquainted with his Subject, conſidering he was a Foreigner. This profeſſor having obſerved, that Priolo often accuſes the Lady Guebriant of being too ambitious (37), adds, that ſhe gave a remarkable proof of it, when ſhe inſiſted at the King of Poland's Court, to have the ſame honours which had been paid to the Archdutcheſs of Auſtria there, when ſhe conducted her daughter who was betrothed to the King. He cites de Wickefort's Embaſſador, Book II. Sect. VIII. page 134; but beſides that he ſhould have quoted pag. 200, inſtead of 134, he alſo ſhould have cited pag. 594 of Book I. where this Archdutcheſs is ſtiled mother to the Queen of Poland whom ſhe conducted. But they both are miſtaken with regard to the quality of this Archdutcheſs, ſhe not being Mother of the future Queen of Poland, whom ſhe was conducting; the future Queen in queſtion being daughter to the Emperor Ferdinand II. and Siſter to the Emperor Ferdinand III. Had this future Queen of Poland been conducted by her Mother, this muſt have been the Empreſs, and not the Archdutcheſs of Auſtria. Beſides that Author ſhould have ſaid the Archdutcheſs of Inſpruck, and not the Archdutcheſs of Auſtria. To conclude, I don't find that La Laboureur hints, that the Lady de Guebriant demanded the ſame honours as the Archdutcheſs had received. He only ſays, that the King of Poland would have thoſe honours paid her. But this belongs more to de Wicquefort, than the Profeſſor at Leipſic. See what I have ſaid on this Subject in the remark (D).

(37) I have not obſerved that he charges him with it in more than two places; and but one of them is taken notice of in the very copious Index of Franckenſtein.

THE author of the notes on Priolo ſuppoſes a Lady to be daughter of the Archduchеſs, who was really not ſo.

[K] She cauſed her marriage to be annulled.] No Circumſtance ſhews her ambition more. Count de Guebriant was a promiſing Nobleman; he was greatly eſteemed at Court; and his martial Talents ſeemed to promiſe him the higheſt Employment. Our Renata du Bec found that this Count ſuited her purpoſe; ſhe foreſaw (38) that he would be advanced; and that ſhe would have an Opportunity of engaging in State-Intrigues, whilſt he ſhould be employed at the head of the Army; and therefore, tho' he had but a ſmall Eſtate, ſhe was reſolved to be his Wife, and for that purpoſe, cauſed her Marriage to be annulled. Labardæus relates this particular in good Latin: Hæc mulier animo ſuprà ſexum valido eſt, cui videlicet nec prima, nec magna uſquè fuit, ſicuti vulgo mulierum ſolet, rei familiaris cura; primas, quia imparem animo, ſicuti reputabatur, virum nacta erat, nuptias dedignata eſt, atque infirmas eſſe contendit, maluitque ſe I. Budæ Guebriani virtutis, quàm alterius amplioris rei, cujus rationem, ut ferè fit, filiam collocando parentes habuerant, ſociam eſſe. Ex illâ ſecum, atque ex gloriâ viri poſtillâ multis rebus præclarè geſtis celeberrimi communicatâ ita crevere mulieri animi, uti magna, atque inſolita moliretur (39).

(38) This Lady, who had great abilities, received him with ſo much the greater pleaſure, as ſhe knew his noble extraction; and foreſaw that the exalted talents he poſſeſſed, would ſoon raiſe him to the chief employments in the State. Le Laboureur, Hiſt. du Marechal de Guebriant, liv. 1. chap. 7. pag. 12.

(39) Labardæus, de Reb. Gall. lib. 9. pag. 619. ad ann. 1651.

[L] She contributed very much to his obtaining the Batoon of Marſhal.] We have juſt now ſeen, from Mr. de la Barde (Labardæus) that this Lady, like moſt of her Sex, did not take much care about her Domeſtick Concerns, but delighted greatly in Court Tranſactions. Le Laboureur ſays, (40), "that he himſelf "was a witneſs to the uncommon pains ſhe took, in "addreſſing the Miniſters, in order that the Army "which her Husband commanded might have pro-"per Supplies; and I can affirm, adds he, that the "title of Marſhaleſs of France belongs to her "on a double account; as well becauſe her Husband "is a Marſhal of France, as on account of the ſhare "ſhe had in the happy ſucceſs of his Arms.

(40) Hiſt. du Maréchal de Guebr. pag. 12.

GUESCLIN (a) (BERTRAND DU) Conſtable of France, was one of the greateſt Captains of the age in which he lived. We nevertheleſs muſt not give credit to all that the old chronicles relate concerning him; for the authors of that kind of works, had not yet quite left off that romantic way of writing which aroſe from the hiſtories of Roland, Ogier the Dane, and ſuch like. Our du Gueſclin was of Britany, and did very important ſervices to France during the impriſonment of King John, and under the reign of Charles V. Going into Spain to ſuccour Henry King of Caſtile, he performed very extraordinary extraordinary atchievements there. He returned to France, when the crown had been ſecured to Henry, by the death of Don Pedro the Cruel, his competitor; and he was wonderfully ſucceſsful in retaking ſeveral territories from the Engliſh. He died in 1380, aged threeſcore and ſix years or thereabouts (b). He was a little man, and very ugly [A]. Conſult his Life publiſhed by Mr. du Chatelet [B].

(a) This name is wrote fourteen different ways in French Authors. Guido Ludovicus Longolius, in Genealogia Longoliorum, apud Menagium in Vita Petri Ærodii, pag. 6.

(b) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 37.

It is preferable to that which was printed anno 1618, in very old French, and from which I ſhall quote a very ſingular paſſage, which has been made uſe of by ſome controverſial writers [C], to prove that Laymen have a right to adminiſter the Sacraments in certain caſes of neceſſity. [Some account is given of this Conſtable's victories in Rapin's Hiſtory of England, under Edward III. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

[A] He was a little man, and very ugly.] "The "ſhortneſs of ſtature, and uglineſs of Bertrand de "Gueſclin, were no obſtacles to his being made Con"ſtable of France, nor was he ever the leſs eſteemed "on thoſe accounts. It has, on the contrary, been "ſaid in his favour, that nature ſeemed to have formed "him in that manner, leſt he ſhould have ſomething "in common with the other ſex. And had he ſpent "every morning in adorning his head with a peruke, "he having very little hair, he would not have me"rited the ever-burning lamp; nor to be interred in "St. Denys's church, as he was at the King's feet, by "his command (1)."

(1) La Mothe le Vayer, Letter 114. tom. 12. pag. 15.

[B] Conſult his Life publiſhed by Mr. du Chatelet.] Menard publiſhed an ancient Hiſtory of this Hero in 1618, which was wrote as early as 1387; but it is not to this I muſt refer my readers, but to that, an extract of which is given in the Journal des Savans of June 21, 1666. It had been publiſhed in folio, at Paris, a little before, by Meſſire Paul Hai, Lord of Chatelet (2): It is drawn up in a much better order than the other; its ſtile is infinitely more pure and elegant, and it is likewiſe illuſtrated with a great number of proofs (3).

(2) In this manner we muſt explain the letters P, H, and D, C, in the title.

(3) Journal des Savans, of June 21, 1666.

[C] I ſhall quote a very ſingular paſſage, which has been made uſe of by ſome controverſial Writers.] Read the following words of Mr. Drelincourt (4). "We "have a very remarkable inſtance, in our Hiſtories of "France (*), of this lay-communion, and a very ma"niſeſt proof that it was long practiſed. For Bertrand "du Gueſclin, Conſtable of France, who lived under "John and Charles V, Kings of France, giving an "account of the battle of Pontvalin, in which he "gained a ſignal victory over the Engliſh, informs us, "that his ſoldiers, before the battle, confeſſed their "ſins, and gave the Sacrament to one another. But "it would be better to give this incident in the Au"thor's own words, and the language of the Age, in "which it was wrote." Et en icelle place ſe desjunerent de pain & de vin qu'ils avoyent apporté avec eux. Et prenoyent les aucuns d'iceux du pain, & le ſeignoyent ou nom du Sainct Sacrement. Et apres ce qu'ils eſtoyent confeſſez l'un à l'autre de leurs pechiez, le uſoyent en lieu d'Eſcommiclement (α). Apres dirent mainte oroiſon en depriant à Dieu qu'il les gardaſt de mort, de mahaing, & de priſon. i. e. "In that place they broke their "faſt with bread and wine which they had brought "with them; and ſome of them took bread, and "ſigned it with the ſign of the Croſs in the name of "the Bleſſed Sacrament; and having confeſſed their "ſins to one another, they employed it inſtead of the "Communion. They afterwards ſaid many prayers; "imploring the Almighty to preſerve them from death, "maiming, and impriſonment." Grotius employed the ſame paſſage, in a Diſſertation printed anno 1638, and entitled de Cœnæ Adminiſtratione ubi Paſtores non ſunt. See the Bibliotheque univerſelle Vol. IV, pag. 115, 116.

(4) Drelincourt, Triomphe de l'Egliſe, Part 2. pag. 320, 321.

(*) This Hiſtory of Meſſire Bertrand de Gueſclin, Conſtable of France, was printed at Paris, for Sebaſtian Cramoiſi, an. 1618.

§ (α) The true term is accomichement, which word, as Borel informs us, is found in Froiſſard, and comes from adcommunicare. We find ſome footſteps of theſe Communions of a ſtill much more antient date, in our old romances; and, among others, in chapter 36 of Galien reſtauré, where Roland, mortally wounded, and lying in a field of corn, eſcommichés or adminiſters the Communion to himſelf, with three ears of corn, in the name of the three Perſons of the Bleſſed Trinity. REM. CRIT.]

GUEVARA (ANTHONY of) Preacher and Hiſtoriographer to the Emperor Charles V, was born in the Province of Alaba in Spain. He was brought up at Court; but after the death of Queen Iſabella of Caſtile, he aſſumed a religious habit among the Franciſcans, and had very honourable employments in that Order. Having afterwards made himſelf known at Court, he was appointed Preacher to Charles V, and was prodigiouſly eſteemed for his politeneſs, his eloquence and genius (a). He ſhould have been contented with the glory which his haranguing gained him; for, by his attempting to write books, he made himſelf ridiculous to good judges. His inflated and figurative ſtyle, crowded with antitheſes [A], is not the greateſt defect in his compoſitions. He was led to this way of writing by a bad taſte, a falſe idea he had formed to himſelf of eloquence; but this was nothing when compared to his romantic way of writing hiſtory.

(a) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Script. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 98.

[A] His inflated and figurative ſtyle, crowded with Antitheſes.] Here follows the judgment which a learned Jeſuit has made of it. Scripſit vernaculo ſermone, in quo affectaſſe nimium ſchemata viſus, pompa quadam tumens, & antithetis putide nimium iteratis lectorem enecat: quin, & ut Poetæ verbis utar, projicit ampullas & ſeſquipedalia verba (1). i. e. "He wrote in his na"tive language, in which he ſeems to have affected "too much a figurative ſtyle, and an inflated way of "expreſſion; fatigues the reader with crouded anti"theſes; and to uſe the Poet's words, he throws out "high-flown, many-footed words." The following judgment of Matamorus, a Spaniſh author, is not more advantageous to Guevara, than that of the Flemiſh Jeſuit. I quote it after Nicholas Antonio, who writes as follows (2): "Quantumvis ſtylus hominis non uſque"quaque placeat, neque in gymnaſio rhetorum ſolidam "reportaverit eloquentiæ laudem. Cum præcipue Al"phonſo Garſiæ Matamoro & Andreæ Scoto (qualis ju"dicii & doctrinæ viris!) affectata nimium ab eo anti"thetorum ſibi mutuo reſpondentium perpetua cura diſ"pliceat maxime. Horum enim prior Matamorus in de "Academiis & doctis viris Hiſpaniæ Libello ingenue exi"ſtimat virum fuiſſe miræ facundiæ & incredibilis uber"tatis naturæ, ſed omnium rerum momenta (ait) quod "Poetis objecit Perſius, raris librat in antithetis doc"tas poſuiſſe figuras laudari contentus. Fulgurat in"terdum & tonat, ſed non totam (ut olim Pericles A"thenienſis) dicendo commovet civitatem, ut dum "nihil vult, niſi culte & ſplendide dicere, ſæpe inci"dit in ea quæ deriſum effugere non poſſunt. Qui ſi "illam [(ſubjungit) extra ripas effluentem verborum "copiam artificio dicendi repreſſiſſet, & graviorum ar"tium inſtrumento locupletaſſet, dubito quidem an "parem in eo eloquentiæ genere in Hiſpania eſſet in"venturus." i. e. "However, this author's ſtyle "does not pleaſe in every reſpect, nor would gain true "applauſe in the ſchools of the Rhetoricians: eſpeci"ally when Alphonſus Garſias Matamorus, and Andrew "Schottus (men of vaſt learning and judgment) are "greatly diſpleaſed at his affecting ſo many antitheſes. "Matamorus (the firſt of theſe writers) in his treatiſe "de hiſtory [B]. He violated the moſt ſacred and moſt fundamental laws of it, in ſo audacious a manner as merits the utmoſt indignation of his readers; and ſhewed, that no man was ever ſo unworthy the character with which he was inveſted, viz. that of Hiſtoriographer to the Emperor Charles V. The excuſe made by him, when he found himſelf cenſured on that account [C], is very trifling; he aſſerting that all Hiſtories, the ſacred

(1) And. Schottus, Biblioth. Hiſpan, page 250.

(2) Nic. Anton. Biblioth. Script. Hiſp. tom. 1. pag. 98.

" de Academiis & doctis viris Hiſpaniæ, confeſſes him " to have been maſter of a wonderful eloquence, and " a ſurprizingly fruitful genius; but, (adds this wri- " ter) he every inſtant falls into that which Perſius " objects to the Poets, of playing continually with " antitheſes, and other rhetorical flouriſhes. He " ſometimes thunders and lightens; but does not, as " antiently Pericles the Athenian, ſhake a City with " his eloquence: on the contrary, by his aiming to " expreſs every thing with elegance, he often falls in- " to thoſe things which excite laughter and deriſion. " He continues: Had Guevara reſtrained this exuberant " flow according to the rules of Rhetoric, and enrich- " ed it with the more ſolid arts, I queſtion whether " Spain could have produced a man to be compared " with him in that ſpecies of eloquence." It is to no purpoſe, and merely from a blind conceitedneſs, that Wadding (3) charges Father Schottus with writing this out of envy.

(3) An Iriſh Cordelier, in his work De Scriptoribus Ordinis Minorum, apud Nicol. Anton. ibid.

[B] His romantic way of writing Hiſtory.] The ſtrange liberty he took to falſify any fact at pleaſure, and to publiſh as true incidents ſuch as were the mere invention of his ſhallow brain, reſembles that of Romance writers. The latter don't miſlead or impoſe on any perſon; for they don't deſire to have all the particulars they write to be look'd upon as true; all the glory they aſpire at is, to have their fictions approved, as being ingeniouſly invented; but as for Guevara, he deſired to have every thing he wrote to be taken as hiſtorical relations, that were grounded on good authorities. He conſequently was a public poiſoner and a ſeducer; and, in the tribunal of the Commonwealth of Letters, deſerved the puniſhment inflicted on profane and ſacrilegious wretches; he violating the moſt ſacred Laws of Hiſtory. Nicholas Antonio uſes him with too much indulgence. Illud, ſays he (4), commiſeratione potius quam excuſatione indiget, talis famæ virum putaſſe licere ſibi ad inventiones proprii ingenii pro antiquorum proponere & commendare, fœtus ſuos aliis ſupponere, ac denique de univerſa omnium temporum Hiſtoria, tanquam de Æſopi fabulis, portentoſiſve Luciani narrationibus ludere. i. e. " It deſerves our commiſeration " rather than cenſure, that ſo celebrated a writer ſhould " think himſelf allowed to put off his own fictions as ſo " many antient incidents; and to ſport with the hiſto- " ries of all ages and nations as tho' they were Eſop's " fables, or Lucian's monſtrous ſtories." See, in the article RUA, the whole extent of his hiſtorical impoſitions. I have alſo taken ſome notice of them in other places (5).

(4) Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 99.

(5) In the articles LAIS, remark [U], and LAMIA the curtezan, remark [I] He is author of the fables which Brantome relates in the article of the ſecond FLORA, remark [F].

[C] He found himſelf cenſured.] Peter Rua, Profeſſor in Soria, did not ſuffer this author's boldneſs to go unpuniſhed; he writing in very ſtrong terms againſt him, as will be ſeen in his article. Here follows the judgment of Voſſius on this pretended life of Marcus Aurelius, written by Guevara: Vita illa M. Aurelii Antonini, quæ ab Antonio Guevara, Mendonenſi Epiſcopo, & Cæſari Carolo V à conſiliis, Hiſpanicè edita eſt, eaque è lingua in alias permultas tranſlata fuit, nihil Antonini habet; ſed tota eſt ſuppoſititia, ac genuinus Guevaræ ipſius fœtus; qui turpiter os oblevit lectori, planè contra officium hominis candidi, maximè epiſcopi. Habet interim plurima lectu nec inutilia nec injucunda; imprimis viro principi: unde & Horologium principum inſcribitur (6). i. e. " That Life of Marcus Aurelius " Antoninus, written in the Spaniſh tongue by An- " thony Guevara, Biſhop of Mondonedo, and Privy " Counſellor to the Emperor Charles V, and tranſlat- " ed into ſo many languages, has nothing of Anto- " ninus in it; but the whole is ſuppoſititious, and " the true offspring of Guevara himſelf, who im- " poſes upon the reader in a ſhameful manner, directly " contrary to the duty of an honeſt man, and eſpeci- " ally of a Biſhop. However many particulars in it " are neither uſeleſs nor unpleaſant, eſpecially to a " Prince, for which reaſon it is entitled, the Dial of " Princes." I cite Martin Schoockius (7) in the margin, who was ſenſible of the faults of the Spaniard in queſtion; but as he grounds what he ſays on the authority of Rupertus, it may not be improper to tranſcribe more at length the words of this learned German (8). Eandem quoque impoſturam notaram in eodem Guevara, quem ob id tanta Imperatoris ſui, tanta noſtrorum hominum benevolentia prorſus indignum ſtudioſæ juventutis manibus excuſſum ibam. Refert Lib. I. Horologii Principum, c. 1. gentem apud Romanos fuiſſe Clavillam magno in honore, quæ ſe originem ducere glorietur à Camillo ducum Romanorum celeberrimo, viros ex ea Camillos, fœminas Clavillas in memoriam filiæ Camillæ, quæ abhorrens nuptias in Virginum veſtalium numerum cooptari voluerit. Mortuam divinis honoribus cultam, ejuſque monumento inſcriptos fuiſſe hos verſiculos:

(6) Voſſius, De Hiſtor. Græcis, pag. 226.

(7) Quod ſpecialim quoque de Guevara . . . vocato etiam ad ſuffragium Reineſio . . . docet Cl. Rupertus ad Florum Lib. 2. cap. 17. §. 17. quo loco ubi ſpecimen impoſturarum ipſius propoſuiſſet, hæc ſubjecit: Taceo innumeras alias fraudes, quibus mendatiorum auctori ſtrenue litat, & id maxime agit, ne ab Hiſpanica vanitate deſiſcere videatur. Martin. Schoockius, de Fabula Hamletenſi, pag. 87.

(8) Rupert. ad Florum, lib. 2. cap. 17. §. 17.

Unica ſub tumulo jacet hoc Clavilla Camilli,
Nata quater denos & ſex quæ maluit annos
Vivere Veſtales inter concluſa ſorores
Magno Trinacriæ quam nubere libera Regi.
Quam miſerum! extinctæ nunc artus rodere vermes,
Artus qui vitam puri effulſere per omnem.

Hoc Epitaphium addit è Græco tranſlatum eſſe, & paullo poſt, multa refert de Camillorum prærogativis, de perſecutionibus eorundem ſub Sylla, quæ omnia putida, vana & falſa, nec cuiquam Hiſtoricorum veterum tradita, quamvis ille Cinnam & Pollionem laudet ſcriptores, quos tot anni & profunda ſeculorum oblivio fere cogitationibus hominum & memoriæ, nedum oculis exemit. i. e. " I had taken notice of the like fraud in the ſame " Guevara, whom I therefore endeavoured to take " out of the hands of our Students, as being quite un- " worthy of the favour of his Sovereign the Emperor, " and of our countrymen. He tells us, Book I, " Chap. 1, of his Dial of Princes, that there was in " Rome a family called Clavilli, who were had in " great honour in that city; and pretended to deſcend " from the renowned Roman General, Camillus; that " the males of the family in queſtion were called Ca- " milli, and the females Clavillæ, in remembrance " of his daughter Clavilla, who hating a married life, " entred among the Veſtal Virgins; that dying, di- " vine honours were paid her; and that the following " verſes were engraved on her tomb:

" Beneath this monument, Clavilla lies,
" The only daughter of renown'd Camillus.
" Forty ſix years ſhe choſe to live amid
" Th' impriſon'd Veſtals, rather than eſpouſe
" Sicilia's King, and live in mighty ſplendor.
" Sad fate! the worms now prey upon her limbs,
" Which, while ſhe liv'd, were bright and undefil'd.

" Guevara adds, that this Epitaph was tranſlated out " of Greek; and a little after, he relates many par- " ticulars concerning the privileges of the Camilli, " and their ſufferings under Sylla; every circumſtance " of which is abſurd, falſe and trifling, and not men- " tioned by one antient Hiſtorian; notwithſtanding " that he appeals to the teſtimony of two authors, Cin- " na and Pollio; authors who were never thought of " during ſo long a ſeries of ages." I thought proper to give this paſſage at full length, becauſe we may, from this ſpecimen, form a much better judgment of Guevara's aſſurance, than by what I have ſaid of it in general. The learned Antonius Auguſtinus has given a juſt deſcription of the faults of the writer in queſtion. Antonius Guevara, ſays he (9), qui ſcire antiqua Romanaſque Hiſtorias fingit, eaque comminiſcitur quæ nec viſa nec audita mortalibus, nemo ut divinare queat in quos ille libros inciderit. Nova itaque nomina ſcriptorum excogitavit, ſomniaque venditat obtruditque, quæ apud nullum reperias auctorem. i. e. " Anthony Gue- " vara, who pretends to be well ſkilled in antiquity and " the Roman hiſtory, and invents ſuch incidents as " were never heard of or ſeen by mortals, ſo that no " one can poſſibly gueſs what authors he had them " from. He even invents the names of writers who " never sacred writings excepted, are so uncertain [D], that they don't deserve credit. He had an opportunity of seeing a great part of Europe (b), by his attending on his Sovereign; and was appointed Bishop of Guadix in the Kingdom of Grenada, and afterwards Bishop of Mondonedo in Gallicia (c). He died the 10th of April 1544, after having enjoyed that See some years (d). It is false to assert that he was beatified by the Court of Rome [E]. One cannot enough admire the eagerness with which foreigners translated, into various languages, some works of Guevara [F]. I shall

(9) Anton. Auguſt. Dial. X. pag. m. 152. See alſo pag. 159.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Vankelius, præfat. Versionis Horolog. Principum, not knowing that Guevara possessed both those Bishoprics, did not know how to reconcile those who call him Bishop of Guadix, with those who give him the title of Bishop of Mondonedo.

(d) Qua dignitate aliquot annis gesta obiit. Nic. Ant. Biblioth. Hispan. tom. 1. pag. 98. Therefore Moreri should not have said that he enjoyed that See but a little time.

" never existed; and publishes and forces upon the " world chimæras that are not to be met with in any " author."

[D] He asserted . . . that all Histories . . . are so uncertain.] He made this an excuse, when he found himself conquered by the learned Peter Rua. Adeo in lubrico esse omnem veterem factorum fidem causabatur, ut non aliis diceret quam sacrorum Bibliorum Historiis præstandam; nempe hoc velamenti genus sibi à tam parum æquo de præstantissima arte judicio tunc quæsivit, cùm è Sorbensis Scholæ cathedra vir eximiæ eruditionis Petrus Rua eum de fide in historiis præstanda non semel datis admonuit expostulatoriis literis (10). This was a very lame excuse, and like covering his nakedness with fig-leaves; for altho' Scepticism, with respect to history, should be so well grounded as some imagine; yet an author would not be allowed to advance, that Cicero or Cæsar had said, or done, a thing which he himself had invented. Every author would be obliged to ascribe no more to them than what is found in ancient monuments. An author must not go by particular rules of his own contriving, but follow those which are already established, or the public rules. Now with regard to those public rules or laws of history, whatever is proved by the testimony of grave authors is admitted and look'd upon as good; and we reject as fabulous, whatever a modern relates concerning antiquity, unless he borrowed it from authentic historians. Hence, in what light soever Guevara might consider antient history, whether he look'd upon it as true, false or doubtful, he ought to have quoted it as he found it, and quote no more; and deserves to be look'd upon as a public seducer for not doing this. But Rua would not let this subterfuge serve his turn; but wrote against him in vindication of the certainty of history. Another author (11) attacked Guevara's principles. Cujus rei etiam nomine doctissimus ille Theologicorum locorum scriptor libri secundi sexto capite in Guevaræ hoc, indignum eo, ac dignitate ejus, sive judicium, sive, quod magis credere est, ingenii luxuriantis licentiam, acri, quod decuit, oratione invehitur. Præsertim cum Chronographi munus regio beneficio apud Carolum exerceret, neutiquam debuit eam qua ornabatur historiarum professionem sic deprimere, ut propria confessione sibi ipsi quoque & monumentis suis fidem apud posteros derogaret (12). i. e. " On which account " also the most learned writer of the Theological common places, in Book II, Chap. 6, exclaims strongly " against this opinion; or, which is more probable, " this luxuriant fancy of Guevara, as unworthy both " of his person and character. But as Charles V had " raised him to the honourable employment of his " Historiographer, he ought particularly not to have " so far dishonoured history, of which he was a pro- " fessed writer, as, by his own confession, to take a- " way (with respect to posterity) all credit from him- " self and his writings."

(10) Nicol. Anton. Biblioth. Hispan. tom. 1. pag. 99.

(11) Melchior Canus.

(12) Nic. Anton. Biblioth. Hispan. tom. 1. pag. 99.

Mention is made in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (13) of a certain Triumvirate, to which Guevara might very justly be added. This Triumvirate consists, I, of Father Morin, who three years after the taking of Rochel, still asserted that it had not been taken; and that all the reports which had been spread to that purpose, were mere lies: II, of a formidable and very renowned Logician, who told a Gentleman that said he had SEEN the Duke d'Epernon at Plassac, that this was impossible . . . . and that for four indisputable reasons; and I will now make it appear, that the Duke must necessarily be in London. . . . We may believe that the eyes are more apt to be imposed upon than the understanding. . . This news you tell me, implies a moral contradiction, and perhaps a physical one: III, of a man who declared to Isaac Vossius, that he, after long and laborious meditations, had writ a Book, in which he proved to a demonstration, that whatever is related in Cæsar's Commentaries concerning the Gauls is false; and wherein he likewise fully shewed, that Cæsar had never crossed the Alps.

(13) April 1685. Art. 7. pag. 410, 411.

[E] It is false to assert, that he was beatified by the Court of Rome.] Don Nicholas Antonio cites an Author, who wrote the Martyrology of the Franciscans, and who relates that the holy See, after the necessary enquiries, declared solemnly that our Guevara is one of the Beatified, and ought to be look'd upon as such. Nescio unde Arcturus à Monasterio Franciscani Martyrologii auctor rem aliis indictam, inauditam acceperit. Antonium ut Guevaram Octobris die XXIV in albo eorum collocaret quos Apostolica Petri sedes Beatos esse atque appellari debere, acceptis prius exquisitissimis probationibus, ritè sanxit (14). This boldness exceeds even that of Guevara himself. Were there the least probability of the truth of this, would not some author have spoke of it? The silence of all others with regard to the affair in question, is demonstrative against the Author of the Martyrology.

(14) Nicol. Antonius, Biblioth. Hispan. tom. 1. pag. 99.

[F] One cannot enough admire the eagerness with which foreigners translated, into various languages, some works of Guevara.] The Dial of Princes was translated into Italian by Mambrin Rosso, in 1548, and into French by another person in 1588 (*). Frederic William Duke of Saxony caused it to be printed in Latin, with Notes and Aphorisms by John Vankelius anno 1611, folio. This Edition was reprinted at Leipsick in 1615, and in 1624, and at Frankfort in 1664 (15). Emericus Casaubonus in prologo sic feliciter Guevaræ suam contigisse fictionem confirmat, omnium sit ut hic liber ubique gentium celebratissimus, Europæique omnes suo unius cujusque idiomate loquentem thesauri ad instar habeant, mirificeque ejus possessione fruantur (16). i. e. " Meric Casaubon declares, in the Preface, that " Guevara's fiction was so successful, that that Book " was renowned in all Nations; and that all the Eu- " ropeans looking upon it as a treasure, translated it " into their respective languages." This I borrow from Nicholas Antonio: according to whom, Vankelius's edition was printed at Torga in 1611; but he should have added, that this edition of 1611 is the third. Now I believe it to be of Leipsic rather than of Torga; for the Translator opposes it to that of Torga which was the first (17), and which was published in 1601; the second appeared in 1606. The Epistles of our Guevara have been translated into Italian and French. Schottus justly laughs at the esteem in which those works were had in France. Nam Principum Horologium, (says he pag. 251 of his Bibliotheca Hispana) seu de vita M. Aurelii Imperatoris, & Faustinæ conjugis, ficta sunt, non ex historiis petita: ne quis erret, ut in Gallia, ubi cupide nimis in sinu olim nobilium, manibusque gestatum fuisse, memini; ut & Epistolas ejus nauci plenas & ineptiarum, Aurearum titulo transcribere non iidem dubitarunt (18): sed quas illi legant, per me licet, quibus meliora non suppetunt, aut capere non possunt. i. e. " For his Dial of Princes, " (says he page 215 of his Bibliotheca Hispanica) or " the Life of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius and Fau- " stina his wife, it is a mere fable, and not copied from " history: that no one may be imposed upon, as in " France, where I remember it was too much read " and esteemed by the Nobility; who did not scruple " to give a version of his flat and trifling epistles, un- " der the title of Golden. But let those read them, " who either have no better books, or know no bet- " ter." And here follows what he says in page 567. M. Aurelii Antonini vita & Faustinæ ejusdem Guevarræ, ridicula est & meræ nugæ, quam tamen Galli applausu magno exceperunt, sæpius verterunt, ediderunt que, & nobiles plerique manibus gestant: sed quid mirum quibus Amadisius Gallicus, Orlandus furiosus, cæteraque ægrorum somnia perplacent, quæ, qui sapiet, ne horas collocet male, fugiet. i. e. " Guevara's Life of Marcus " Aurelius and Faustina is trifling and ridiculous, " which

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Idem, ibid.

(17) Certa cum ipse quanto hæc editio primæ illi TORGENSI quoad typos charactasque est similior, tanto etiam fore ad lectionem frequentiorem quam secunda fuit. Vankelius, Epist. Dedicat.

(18) See Montagne, Essais, tom. 1. pag. 498.

ſhall give a catalogue of his works in the note [G].

I have ſomething to add, to what I have already ſaid concerning his Dial of Princes [H]; and will ſhew, that if the French are to blame for having ſhewn a great eſteem for ſuch a book, the Spaniards, who ſet a much higher value upon it, deſerve ſtill more to be laughed at.

" which nevertheleſs the French received with vaſt ap-
" plauſe; and frequently tranſlated and publiſhed; and " which is the delight of moſt of their Nobility:
" but who will wonder at this, ſince theſe men were " greatly pleaſed with Amadis de Gaul, Orlando Fu-
" rioſo, and ſuch like idle dreams, which every wiſe
" man, to prevent his miſemploying his time, will " avoid?"

(α) There have been two French Verſions of this Book, publiſhed within 60 years of one another. The firſt of Bernard de la Griſe in 4to, in a Gothic Letter, Anno 1531; reprinted in 1600, in a very beautiful Letter by John de Tournes, Lyons 1550. The ſecond Tranſlation by Nicholas de Herbray, Sieurs de Eſſara, reprinted ſeveral times. To theſe two different Verſions, ſeveral chapters of the laſt of which (to obſerve this by the way) are caſtrated, alludes the Sæpius verterunt of Schottus the Jeſuit, towards the end of the remark (F). REM. CRIT.]

(19) It was tranſlated into French, with this title, Reveille-matin des Courtiſans, by Alexander Hardi a Pariſian, receiver of the aſſeſſments and taxes of Mans. I make uſe of the ſecond edition, printed at Paris in 1623, 8vo.

[G] I ſhall give a Catalogue of his Works.] I have ſpoke of the moſt noted of them. The title in Spaniſh is Relox de Principes, ò Marco Aurelio. It is thought that it was firſt printed in 1529; and was followed by ſome others, before the Author himſelf publiſhed his work. He complained that his works had been ſtoln from him, and were printed imperfect without his Knowledge. His Epiſtles were firſt printed in 1539, and have been ſince printed in different places and times. His Works are Prologo ſolenne, en que el Autor toca muchas Hiſtorias. Una Decada de las Vidas de los X Ceſares Emperadores Romanos deſde Trajano à Alexandro. Del menos precio de la Corte, y alabanca de la Aldea. Aviſo de privados, y doctrina de Corteſanos (19). De los inventores del marear y de muchos trabaxos que ſe paſſan en las Galeras (20. Monte Calvario, ſive de Myſteriis Dominicæ Paſſionis ac de verbis Domini in Cruce pendentis (21). Oratorio de religioſos y exercitio de virtuoſos. He was writing an Hiſtory of Charles V. and it is related that he appointed by his Will (22), that the Penſion of a Hiſtoriographer ſhould be reſtored, which he had received for a year, during the time that he had not employed himſelf in this Hiſtory (23).

(20) It was tranſlated into French by Du Pinet.

(21) Wadding has here made two works of one; he imagining that the treatiſe, De Verbis Domini in Cruce, were different from Monte Calvario. Nic. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 99.

(22) Ægid. Gonzales Davila affirms this, where he ſpeaks of the Biſhops of Mondonedo, in his Theatrum Eccleſiaſt. apud Nic. Ant. pag. 100.

(23) Ex Nic. Antonio, Biblioth. Hiſp. tom. 1. pag. 99.

[H] I have ſomething to add, to what I have already ſaid concerning his Dial of Princes.] He aſſured the Publick, that this work (24) was a Tranſlation of the Life of Marcus Aurelius, and that the Original had been ſent him from Florence (25). He owned, that his verſion was far from being a ſervile one, and that he had added many things to it. He began this work in 1518, and ended it in 1524. " And not-" withſtanding, ſays he (26), that I kept my Book
" very ſecret during ſix Years, it nevertheleſs was di" vulged; for his Imperial Majeſty being ſick of an
" Ague, ſent to me for it, in order to amuſe him, and
" ſooth his Indiſpoſition, Accordingly, in Obedience
" to his command, I waited upon him myſelf with
" Marcus Aurelius, tho' it was not reviſed, correct-
" ed, nor perfect; moſt humbly beſeeching him, as " the only reward of my Labour, not to let it be copi-
" ed nor carried out of his royal apartment; otherwiſe
" his Majeſty would be ill ſerved to my Prejudice;
" becauſe in caſe I ſhould purſue and compleat my " Work, he would perceive that it was not my inten" tion to publiſh Marcus Aurelius as it then was, but to " add to it ſeveral remarkable Sentences. But not-" withſtanding this caution, it happened unfortunately " that the book was ſtoln; afterwards copied by ſeve-
" ral hands; and at laſt given to the Pages to tran-
" ſcribe, whereby it became every day more incor" rect and faulty, there being but one Original to cor" rect it by. Some perſons indeed brought their copies
" to me, in order to get them reviſed and corrected:
" But if they could ſpeak, they would complain more
" againſt thoſe that copied them, than I of the Thieves
" who plundered them; and what is worſe than all,
" when my Labour was near at an end, and the Fruit
" of it ready to be diſperſed, Marcus Aurelius was " printed in Sevil, and a little after in Portugal and
" the Kingdom of Arragon; ſo that if the firſt Edition
" was a bad one, the reſt were worſe." Hence the Reader may judge, whether the Spaniards do not deſerve the Taunts and Reproaches of Andrew Schottus, as much as the French. He very probably did not know, that ſome French-men deſpiſed Guevara's Epiſtles [*], of which ſays Montagne (28) thoſe form a quite different Judgment from me, who call them golden. It muſt nevertheleſs be owned, that they impoſed on a great number the French, and that the Dial of Princes had a great run in France, it having borne ſeveral Impreſſions there. I make uſe of a Lyons Edition, printed by Benedict Rigaud 1592, in 12°, and I find by the Title, that this work was tranſlated out of the Spaniſh into the French by R. B. Griſe, afterwards reviſed and corrected by N. de Herberry, Lord of Eſſars, beyond the precedent Impreſſions. The dedication to Cardinal de Vri is not ſubſcribed. I there find that the Lord des Eſſars died whilſt he was employed in that Tranſlation. " We have therefore, (continues it) only the " firſt Book of his Tranſlation, ſome Sheets at the end
" of which were ſo defaced, that it was impoſſible to " read them; and for which reaſon it was continued
" from the old Tranſlation, after having been correct-
" ed from a great number of Errors, by the Spaniſh
" Copy; and altered in ſeveral Expreſſions, that were " not proper in our tongue, which frequently obſcured
" the Author's meaning, and were ſometimes entirely
" repugnant to it."

(24) Guevara, in the prologue or preface to the Dial of Princes.

(25) He had juſt before ſaid, that there had been ſent to him, from Cologne, ten Books of the Emperor Auguſtus, intitled, Of the Cantabric War. Thus two falſities are advanced by him.

(26) Preface to the Dial of Princes.

(27) Quoted in the remark [F].

(28) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 1. chap. 48. pag. m. 498.

[*] I have an addition of theſe Letters before me. They are in two parts, and the Title of the firſt runs thus: Epiſtolas Familiares de Don Antonio de Guevara, obiſpo de Mondonnedo, Predicador, chroniſta, & del conſejo del Emperador Don Carlos: ... En las quales ay coſas notables, y razionamientos muy altos y curioſos, con expoſiciones de figuras, Authoridados, Medallas, Letretos, Epitaphios de Sepultaras: leyes y coſtumbros antiquas, doctrinas y exemplos para todo eſtado de gente, al eſtilo de Marco Aurelio, porque el Author es todo uno. Parte Primera. En Anveres, En caſa de Juan Meurcio, Anno 1648, 8vo, and conſiſts of 400 Pages in a ſmall Letter. ...The ſecond part which conſiſts of 383 pages, after expreſſing the Subject of the work, and the Author's Titles, as in the firſt part, proceeds, thus; En las quales ay cartas muy notables, razonamientos muy altos y curioſas, con expoſiciones de muchas figuras y Authoridades de la ſagrada Eſcritura, al eſtilo de Marco Aurelio, porque el Author es el miſmo. Parte ſegunda, &c. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

The Italians have alſo given more than one Tranſlation of that Work. I have mentioned Mambrin Roſeo's Tranſlation, and add, that Fauſto Longiano made another, which was printed anno 1546, in 8vo. He added ſome particulars which were not in the Spaniſh original; and reſtored thoſe which in the former Italian verſion had been ſuppreſſed. He hints in the Preface, at Guevara's boldneſs, in advancing ſome incidents for true, which were otherwiſe. His critique is juſt and learned. He promiſed a Life of Marcus Aurelius, extracted from the antient Hiſtorians, in order that it might be compared with the Life written by Guevara. He repreſents himſelf as a perſon who was employed in more grave Studies, in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, than ſuch as tranſlating a Spaniſh Book into Italian, and ſo promiſes ſome original Latin pieces of his own.

GUICCIARDINI (FRANCIS), ſprung from one of the nobleſt and moſt antient families in Florence, author of a Hiſtory that is greatly eſteemed [A], and of ſome other

[A] Author of a Hiſtory that is greatly eſteemed.] It comprehends in xx Books the Tranſactions of Italy from other works (a), was born in that city the 6th of March 1482. He was Profeſſor of the Civil Law at twenty three years of age; but he choſe rather to practiſe at the Bar, than teach the Law. He made ſo conſpicuous a figure as a Counſellor, that he was judged fit to be employed in State affairs. He was ſent Embaſſador to the Court of Ferdinand King of Arragon in January 1512. This Embaſſy laſted two years, and was very glorious to him; for at his return to Florence, he met with a very gracious reception, and was publickly applauded. He afterwards went into the ſervice of Leo X, who appointed him Governor of Modena and Reggio. He defended Parma with great ſucceſs after the death of this Pope. The two Governments abovementioned were continued to him under Adrian VI and Clement VII. He was even Governor of Romagna under Clement VII, and Lieutenant of the Army, and ſhewed that he was as well qualified for the field as for the cabinet. He was Governor of Bologna at this Pope's death; and took proper care to prevent the enemies he had made, by his exact diſtribution of juſtice, from triumphing over him, during the Interregnum. Being removed from his Government by the new Pope, he was obliged to return to Florence, and he lived there the remainder of his days. He performed very ſignal ſervices to the Houſe of Medicis, and would not liſten to the offers made him by Paul III, who wanted to engage him in his ſervice. He was married, but had no ſons; and therefore he conſidered, that he could not be raiſed to high preferments in the Church, and conſequently no children of his, as he was without male iſſue; beſides, being afraid that he could not ſerve the Pope, without ſometimes diſobliging the Duke of Florence, he choſe rather to paſs his days undiſturbed at his country ſeat, and employ himſelf in the hiſtory he had undertaken. He had made a very great progreſs in it, when he was carried off by a malignant fever in May, 1540, aged fifty five years. He gave orders that his body ſhould be buried with little funeral pomp, and would not allow of any epitaph or funeral oration to his memory (b). His Hiſtory of Italy is a very good one. Many are of opinion that he deſerved the character of an impartial hiſtorian, who flatters no man, and blames ſuch things only as are worthy of cenſure: but others think he was too partial againſt France [B]; that he would thereby have incurred the Blame and Envy of his Countrymen the Florentines. Fu da lui diſſuaſo, & eſſortato a ſcriver l'Hiſtoria de ſuoi tempi, ſi perche lo conoſceva d'ingegno, atto a condurre un' impreſa coſi fatta à perfettione; e perche anche ſapeva molto bene, ch'egli era per deſcriver la pura verità, ſenſa riſpotto di paura, ò ſperanza di premio, delle quali due corruttele par che ſieno ſtati ne' tempi paſſati, e ſieno ancor hoggi corrotti quaſi tutti gli Scrittori; ſi ancora perche fuggiſſe l'invidia de' ſuoi Cittadini, e'l biaſimo univerſale de l'haver voluto celebrare ſolamente ſe ſteſſo (8).

[It may not be improper to add, that there is a very good continuation of Guicciardini's Hiſtory, entitled, Iſtoria de' ſui tempi di Gio. Battiſta ADRIANI diviſa in Libri XXII. con i ſommari e la tavola delle coſe piu notabili. The two following Editions of this work, viz. that printed by the Giunti, Anno. 1583, in folio: and another in Venice by the Giunti anno 1587, in 3 Volumes 4to. are very ſcarce. † Add. by the Tranſl.]

[B] Others think he was too partial againſt France.] Here follows a long paſſage from Claude du Verdier (9). Guicciardinus tam frigide invituſque Gallorum victorias & gloriam narrat, quàm accuratè lubenſque, adverſa quæque, quantumvis minima, à fortunæ potentiſſimo belli numine ejaculata: quemadmodum ſarcinarum in alicujus fluminis trajectione ſubmerſionem perſequitur, atque dilatat. Dum videt Carolo VIII. totam Italiam ab Alpibus ad Neapolim nemine penitus obſiſtente occupanti, victoriam abſque ſuſpicione falſi adimi non poſſe, in Gallorum quorundam militum internecione paucorumque, quâ ſine victoria obtineri non potuit, totus eſt, magnam eam appellans ſtragem: Carolo tamen agri dominium ſuperſtitiſſe diffiteri non auſus eſt. Sed quæ de victoribus ſtrages fieri potuit? Si de ſuis ſermonem inſtituit, eis ſemper plus meritis attribuit, & regionis laudes magis, quàm ſuæ gentis res geſtas perſequitur, unde maxima laus ducenda eſt. i. e. "Guicciardini relates as coldly, and a- "gainſt his inclinations, the victories and glory of "the French, as he does exactly and willingly, any "unfortunate event, tho' ever ſo inconſiderable they "may have met with; ſuch as the loſing of their Bag- "gage in croſſing a River on which he amply expa- "tiates. When he perceives that he cannot, without "being ſuſpected of falſhood, deny the ſucceſs of Charles "VIII in ſubduing all Italy from the Alps, to Naples, "without meeting with the leaſt oppoſition; he dwells "entirely on the killing a few French Soldiers, with- "out which the Victory could not be won, calling it "a vaſt

(a) See the remark [H].

(b) Extracted from his Life, written by Father Remi of Florence. It is prefixed to Guicciardini's Hiſtory of Italy.

(1) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, tom. 1. pag. 151. ſays it begins with the entrance of Francis into Italy, anno 1490, and ends at the Pontificate of Paul III, in 1535. The French did not enter Italy till 1494.

(2) The 13th of Oct. 1534.

(3) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, tom. 1. pag. 151.

(4) Poſſevin. Bib. Select. tom. 2. lib. 16. cap. 41. pag. 337.

(5) They publiſhed two, one taken from the 3d book, and the other from the 4th, at Baſil, in Latin, Italian and French anno 1569, in 8vo; and with ſome other pieces in 1602 (the name of the place where printed, omitted) in 8vo; and at Frankfort in 4to, anno 1609. See the remark [Z] of the article JULIUS II.

(6) Printed at Amſterdam anno 1684. See the Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, for May 1684. pag. 316. 2d edit.

(7) In the remark [H].

from anno 1494, till 1532. Let us preſcribe theſe Limits to it (1), becauſe the Author of his Life will have it ſo; obſerving at the ſame time, that it goes as far backwards as the ſtate of Italy in 1490, and ends at the death of Clement VII. and the Election of Paul III (2). It is indeed very ſuccinct with reſpect to the latter Years of Clement VII. eſpecially from the year 1530. It has been tranſlated out of the Italian into ſeveral Tongues. Cælius Secundus Curio publiſhed it in Latin at Baſil, anno 1566. One Jerome Chomedey, a Pariſian, publiſhed it in France, at Paris, in 1568. There is an Engliſh Tranſlation of it, as appears from the catalogue of the Bodleian Library. The Spaniards, the Germans, and Flemings, have alſo tranſlated it into their reſpective Languages (3). The beſt Italian Edition is that which is illuſtrated with marginal notes by Thomas Porcacchi. The firſt edition of this kind is of Venice 1573 (4). [The firſt Edition of this famous Hiſtory is, Iſtoria d' Italian di Franceſco Guicciardini Gentiluomo Fiorentino (libri XVI.) In Firenze per Lorenzo Torentino 1561, in folio in 8vo. the ſame year. This is a very beautiful edition, and there are certain Paſſages in it that were retrenched in the ſucceeding ones. Addit. by the Tranſl. from Haym's Notizia de Libri rara, pag. 36.]. This Hiſtory of Guicciardine was not publiſhed till after his Death, and by Agnolo Guicciardini his nephew. The Proteſtants have preſerved thoſe paſſages which were caſtrated, and diſpleaſed the Court of Rome. They have been publiſhed ſeparately at different times (5). Heidegger has lately added that of the 4th Book to his Hiſtoria Papatus (6). [Three of theſe famous caſtrated Paſſages, are inſerted in the Thuanus reſtitutus, printed at Amſterdam in 1663, 12mo. Addit. by the Tranſl. from Haym. ibid.] Vatillas aſſerts, that Guicciardine's Heirs preſumed to publiſh contrary to his Intention the four laſt Books in the third edition. I ſhall examine this hereunder (7). I am to obſerve that Sanſovino publiſhed an epitome of this Hiſtory, and that Guicciardini, in imitation of Julius Cæſar, intended to write Memoirs of his own Life; but Jacomo Nardi, whom he conſulted with on that occaſion, adviſed him to undertake a nobler work, viz. the Hiſtory of his own times. Nardi judged him to be qualified for this work, knowing that neither hope nor fear could have power enough over Guicciardini (tho' they corrupt moſt other Writers) to make him depart from the Truth. Not to mention that, had he confined himſelf meerly to writing of his own Life,

(8) The author of Guicciardine's Life.

† Haym's Notizia &c. pag. 38.

(9) Claud. Verderius, in Cenſione Autorum, apud Pope-Blount, pag. 390.

that he expatiated too much on trifles [C]; introduced too many long ſpeeches [D]; or has too often aſcribed actions to unjuſt motives [E]. Cardinal Pallavicini is not favourable to him, and I ſhall quote what he ſays of him [F]. With regard to Guicciardini's ſtyle, his moſt unjuſt cenſors allow it to be extremely pure and correct; but they make a conſiderable difference between the firſt books and the ſucceeding ones; and for this reaſon they ſuppoſe the former were corrected by a very able hand (c).

(c) Cui etiam illi qui eidem ſunt iniquiſſimi in primis quinque Libris, quos eruditi cujuſquam viri lima perpolitos fuiſſe contendunt, omnem Florentini Sermonis elegantiam concinnitatemque concedunt: in ceteris Libris non item, quos nullius Cenſuræ, ut priores quinque, ſubjecerat. Nic. Eryth. Pin. 3. pag. 220.

Father

" a vaſt Slaughter; and yet at the ſame time does not " dare deny but that Charles remained Maſter of the " field of Battle. But what kind of havock muſt that " be which was made of Conquerors? But when he " treats of thoſe of his own Party, he always aſcribes " to them more than they merit; and rather applauds " the Country, than relates the Actions of his Coun- " trymen, whence the greateſt applauſe is to be " drawn." If this cenſure is juſt, Guicciardini deſerves to be made a laughing Stock, as much as our common News-writers. The latter afford Sport every Day; for inſtance, when the French are encamped on the other ſide of the Rhine, the oppoſite News-writers are perpetually entertaining us with the defeating of French Parties, with their being made Priſoners, and deſerting to the other ſide. But not a word of all theſe things are contained in the Papers written for the French; but on the contrary expatiate on the loſs of the allies, and the contributions they are forced to pay. When the Germans march into the French Territories, as they did in Autumn, 1694, the News-writers of the French party are ſure not to omit the number of their Parties which are defeated, or obliged to ſurrender themſelves: they ſpeak of nothing elſe. Thoſe of the Allies on the contrary, forgetting all theſe particulars, keep a very exact Regiſter of all the Villages plundered by the Germans; of the ſeveral Magazines fired; all the French Parties beat, &c. A thouſand unlucky reaſons force News-writers to publiſh ſuch falſe reports daily (10); but no excuſe could poſſibly be made for an Hiſtorian who ſhould act in this manner. It is his Duty to relate with equal fidelity, the Loſſes and Succeſſes of thoſe on whoſe ſide he writes; but where ſhall we meet with one who does this?

An obſervation on News-papers.

(10) See Critique generale de l'Hiſtoire du Calviniſme, Letter 2. pag. 27. 3d edit.

La Popeliniere is one of thoſe who accuſe Guicciardini of writing with too great partiality againſt France. " He is a free, ſays he (11), and ſincere writer; ex- " empt from paſſion, but not from hatred, which he " could not ſuppreſs or conceal with regard to the " French, the Duke of Urbino and others. He even " could not forbear reſenting the injury, which the " Italians complain continually, both in their words " and writings, of having received from the French; " when they went and interrupted the long and pro- " found repoſe of Italy, under King Charles VIII.. " which however was a very improper ſubject for " Guicciardini, and for moſt of the other Italian au- " thors to ſhew their animoſity in; and I cannot con- " ceive on what grounds he declares this King to have " been monſtrouſly ſhaped." La Popeliniere refutes theſe particulars with very tedious chit-chat; and ought to have ſaid no more but what follows. " Had King " Charles been ſuch a man, or any way like it, let " any one judge, whether the other Italians who hat- " ed the French as mortally as Guicciardini, (who has " mentioned ſuch virtues only as he could not deny " without being accuſed of falſhood,) would not have " larded their writings with it, both before and ſince " his time: but not a writer in any Chriſtian country " did ever reflect on that King, either during his reign, " or after it (12)." To prevent my deferring it to another opportunity, I ſhall here relate the other defects he finds in Guicciardini, which are the ſame that others have taken notice of, as will appear from the following remarks. " I don't find one circumſtance " (13) for which he ought to be valued above other " Hiſtorians, except for the freedom with which he " ſpeaks of great men; and the pains he takes to " ſearch into the ſprings of ſeveral actions related by " him. But then, he is ſo very prolix and diffuſive in " ſpeeches, and inconſiderable particulars not wor- " thy of being mentioned; that had ſome author " got the ſtart of him, in boldly laying open the faults " of criminal men, Guicciardini would have been lit- " tle eſteemed. But it is well known that the mind " of man is greatly affected with novelty: and in " this he has done himſelf a great deal of injury by not " keeping within due bounds; and by preferring the " regard he had to his Country, to the duty of an Hi- " ſtorian, and even of a Chriſtian and a man of ho- " nour, to whom ſuch things ought to be indifferent."

(11) La Popeliniere, Hiſt. des Hiſtoires, liv. 7. pag. 406.

(12) Ibid. pag. 410.

(13) Ibid. pag. 412.

[C] ... That he expatiated too much on trifles.] This is the judgment of Juſtus Lipſius (14). Vitia duo propria hujus ævi non effugit, quod & juſto longior eſt, & quod minutiſſima quæque narret, parum ex lege aut dignitate hiſtoriæ, quæ ut Ammianus, Lib. 26, ait Diſcurrere per negotiorum celſitudines aſſueta, non humilium minutias indagare cauſarum. i. e. " He does not " avoid the two faults peculiar to this age, viz. his be- " ing too diffuſe, and too particular, both which are " repugnant to the laws and dignity of hiſtory, which, " as Ammianus obſerves in the 26th Book, is wont to " expatiate on noble circumſtances of affairs, and not " ſtoop to a minute ſearch of the ſprings of actions of " no conſequence (*)."

(14) Lipſius, in Notis ad 1 lib. Politic. cap. 9.

(*) See the remark [N] in the additions to this article.

[D] Introduced too many long ſpeeches.] Beſides what the reader will find in the paſſage from Montagne in the following remark, here follow the words of Lipſius abovementioned (15). Sed non orationes ejus ſatis vegetæ mihi aut caſtigatæ; languent ſæpe, aut ſolute vagantur. Denique, uno verbo, inter noſtros ſummus eſt hiſtoricus, & inter veteres, mediocris. i. e. " His " ſpeeches do not appear to me to be correct or " ſprightly enough, and are ſometimes languid and " tedious. In a word, he is a capital Hiſtorian, when " compared with the moderns, and but an indifferent " one, in compariſon of the antients."

(15) Idem, ibid.

[E] ... or has too often aſcribed actions to unjuſt motives.] The Reader ſhall now ſee Montagne, who breaths a ſpirit of charity for all mankind on that occaſion. Many other people will not think, that Guicciardini deſerved any cenſure on that occaſion. But let us hear Montagne, as well on what relates immediately to the text of this article, as to the character in general of this famous Hiſtorian. " There is no reaſon to " believe, that he diſguiſed things out of hatred, fa- " vour or vanity, a proof whereof is, the freedom " with which he judges of great men; and particu- " larly of thoſe who had advanced him, and employ- " ed him in State-affairs, as Pope Clement VII. As " to thoſe parts of his hiſtory of which he ſeems the " moſt proud, viz. his digreſſions and ſpeeches, ſome " of them are valuable, and embelliſhed with fine " ſtrokes, but he is too tedious on thoſe occaſions; " for, by his endeavouring to leave nothing unſaid, " and having ſo full, ample and almoſt boundleſs a " ſubject, he grows languid, his hiſtory ſavours of " ſcholaſtic prattle. I have farther obſerved, that a- " mong ſo many minds and effects as he judges of, ſo " many movements and counſels, he never aſcribes one " of them to virtue, religion or conſcience, as though " there were no ſuch things in the world; and he im- " putes all actions, how beautiful ſoever they may be " in themſelves, to ſome vicious or profitable cauſe. " It is impoſſible however, to believe, but that amid " this numberleſs multitude of actions, ſome one of " them reſulted from a rational motive. Mankind in ge- " neral cannot be ſo corrupt, but that ſome one of them " muſt have eſcaped the infection. This may make " one fear, that his own inclinations were a little vi- " tiated, and perhaps he might have judged of others " from himſelf (16)."

(16) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. 2. chap. 10. pag. m. 153, 154. (*) Nel Libro 14.

[F] I ſhall quote what Cardinal Palavicini ... ſays of him.] He firſt aſcribes three falſities to him, and afterwards judges of him in general. The firſt of theſe three falſities relates to Adrian VI. Palavicini pretends, that Guicciardini ſhould not have ſaid (*), that the day that this Pope was elected, none of the Cardinals intended to raiſe him to the Pontificate, and that thoſe who gave him their votes in the ſcrutiny, intended only to trifle away that morning (17). I omit the reaſons cited by the Cardinal againſt this. The

(17) Quaſi le prime voci date nello Squittinio al Cardinal Adriano foſſero, non perche veruno haveſſe intenzione d'eleggerlo, ma per conſumare indarno quella matura. Palavic. Iſtor. del Concilio, lib. 2. cap. 2. num. 7. all' anno 1521.

ſecond

Father Poſſevinus blames him for aſcribing ſucceſs in wars and revolutions in Governments, to fate and fortune. He nevertheleſs would be ſo indulgent to our Author, as to believe that this way of writing does not proceed from a want of judgment in him, but that it was merely owing to cuſtom; but yet he is of opinion that it corrupts the minds of readers (d). One cannot eaſily diſcover whether he is moſt inclined to praiſe or cenſure him [G]. Varillas charges him with ſlandering Francis I, with reſpect to his ſecret correſpondence with Soliman: I ſhall examine all he ſays on this head [H]. I ſhall likewiſe ſecond falſity relates to the Elector of Saxony. Palavicini aſſerts, that Leo X did not publiſh a threatning Monitory againſt this Prince, which exaſperated him highly. Due altere abbagli piu relevati prende egli nelle principal noſtra materia. Il primo è l'affirmar che Leone ſpediſſe contra l'Elettor di Saſſonia un monitorio con minacce di gravi pene, e poro con irritazion di quel principe. Il che è un vano ſogno contrario à quanto ſi legge nelle memorie pieniſſime di que' ſucceſſi (18). The third falſity relates to Luther, who, as Guicciardini relates, was ſo terrified to find himſelf proſcribed by the Emperor, that he would ſoon have renounced his errors, had Cardinal Cajetan made him honourable offers, and not plunged him into deſpair by his inſults and threats. Now Palavicini aſſerts, that Cardinal Cajetan was returned to Rome, twenty months before Luther was proſcribed (†), and that the ſpeech he had before made to him, was in the mildeſt terms (19). Palavicini ſays on this occaſion, that Guicciardini had but a confuſed idea of ſuch things as did not relate immediately to his ſubject; and was more inclined to believe ill than good, to ſooth the natural malignity of his temper. He adds one particular, in order to make Guicciardini be very much ſuſpected with regard to ſuch things as relate to the court of Rome. His words are as follow (20). Dal che m'auveggo, che quell' Iſtorico, di ciò che non apparteneva al ſuo principal argomento, preſe notizie molto confuſe: E fu anche ſempre inclinato à credere le peggiori, come appare nella ſua ſpeſſa maldicenza di ciaſcheduno; la quale appreſſo alla volgare malignità gli hà guadagnata eſtimazion di veridico. Ma contro à Pontefici fu anchè più ſpecialmente amaro, coſi per quell' uſato rancore che i miniſtri di lungo ſervigio concepiſcono contra i padroni da cui non ottennero le mercedi ſperate; come forſe perch' egli riconoſceva da loro la perdita della libertà nella ſua Republica. i. e. "Whence "I obſerve, that this Hiſtorian had but a very confuſed notion of ſuch things as did not appertain to "his main ſubject; and, beſides, was always inclined "to believe the worſt, as is manifeſt from his ſo frequently calumniating of every one; which made "him be conſidered by the vulgar as a ſincere and "true Hiſtorian. But he was particularly bitter againſt "the Roman Pontiffs, as well becauſe of the rancour "which Miniſters who have long ſerved, harbour a-"gainſt their Patrons, from whom they do not obtain "the recompence they expected; as becauſe he aſcribed to them the loſs of liberty in the Republic under "which he was born."

(d) Poſſevin. Bibliotb. Select. tom. 2. lib. 16. cap. 41. pag. 337.

(18) Palavicin. ibid. num. 8.

(†) The 5th of September 1519, as in the Conſiſtorial Acts. Idem, ibid.

(19) E pur è certo che il Cardinal di Gaeta non parlò con Lutero nè allora, nè dipoi, nè per gran tempo addietro; eſſendo tornato in Roma venti meſi prima del Bando: E quando gli parlo, gli offerſe benignamente il perdono, ſecundo che Lutero ſteſſo racconta: E la medeſima eſibizione gli fù più volte fatta in Vormazia nella Dieta, come teſtificò Ceſare nel ſuo Bando. Idem, ibid.

(20) Idem, ibid.

[G] One cannot eaſily diſcover, whether Poſſevinus is moſt inclined to praiſe or cenſure him.] He declares him to be a man of great judgment and of great experience in affairs of State (21). He cites the advantageous character which Thomas Porcacchi gives of this hiſtory (22); but he likewiſe obſerves, that John Baptiſt Leone publiſhed (23) five Books of Conſiderations or Reflections on this work, to ſhew his errors and partiality. This critick, adds he, is in every one's hands, and therefore I need not dwell upon it. By the way, he informs us, that Clement VIII had juſt before put into the Index expurgatorius the Latin Tranſlation of Guicciardini's Hiſtory by Cœlius Velcurio (24) the heretic. He pretends that the true reaſon of it was, becauſe the Tranſlator had not given a juſt explication of the original (25); Vanozzi will tell us afterwards, that ſuch a reaſon ought not to be regarded. Had Poſſevinus intended to have raiſed, in his readers, a great eſteem for Guicciardini's Hiſtory, he would have been as careful to mention Remigius as John Baptiſt Leoni. This Remigius, a Florentine Monk, wrote a Book that was printed at Venice in 1582, and entitled Conſiderationi civili ſopra l'hiſtorie di M. Fr. Guicciardini, e d'altri Hiſtorici.

(21) Poſſevin. Bibliotb. Select. tom. 2. lib. 16. cap. 41. pag. 336.

(22) Idem, ibid. pag. 337.

(23) In Venice 1583; this work is in Italian.

(24) It ſhould be Curio.

(25) Haud omnino recte converſa eſt. Poſſevin. Bibliotb. Select. tom. 2. lib. 16. cap. 41. pag. 337.

[H] I ſhall examine all that Varillas ſays on this head.] He aſſerts (26) that Francis I and Henry VIII engaged and bound themſelves in 1532, "to defend, "without exception or reſerve, what Chriſtian State "ſoever might be invaded by the Turks... The ori-"ginal, ſays he, of this agreement (27) is ſtill lodged "in the Chamber of Accompts in Paris; and Guic-"ciardini muſt needs have known nothing of this, "ſince he declares poſitively, as moſt foreign Hiſtorians "have ſince aſſerted on his teſtimony, that the moſt "Chriſtian King, at the ſame time, ſollicited Sultan "Soliman to complete the conqueſt of Hungary; and "offered to join his forces with thoſe of the Grand Sig-"nior, in order to invade the Houſe of Auſtria. But "this is ſo groſs a calumny, that Paulus Jovius, who "wrote his Hiſtory at the ſame time with Guicciar-"dini, and in Italy alſo, took notice of it. But "Guicciardini will be found more excuſable, for miſ-"taking this for truth, if we conſider that he inſerted "this ſlander only at the latter end of his work; and "that the four laſt Books of this author are neither ſo "good nor ſo authentic as the ſixteen preceding ones: "that they are imperfect in many places; that the au-"thor did not think them worthy of being printed, and "that they were not printed till after his death, when "his heirs, contrary to his intention, preſumed to "publiſh them, in the third edition of his Hiſtory." What is here ſaid does not appear to me accurate. I find that Guicciardini ſays only this, that Francis I, in 1531, held a ſecret correſpondence with ſuch Princes of Germany, who were diſſatisfied with the Emperor, the Pope, and Sultan Soliman (28); and that the ſame Prince and Henry VIII, in 1532, projected an invaſion of the Milaneze, upon the ſuppoſition that Soliman would ſpend the winter in Hungary (29). Farther, I don't find that P. Jovius has refuted what Varillas aſcribes to Guicciardini. He relates only, as a report, the truth of which he does not pretend to warrant, that Soliman marched into Hungary, anno 1532, at the ſollicitation of the Kings of France and Poland (30). Varillas expreſſes himſelf, as though he were perſuaded that the firſt ſixteen Books of Guicciardini's Hiſtory were printed in the author's life-time. Now this is a falſity; they being publiſhed, by his nephews, anno 1561. The Dedication to Coſmo de Medicis, Grand Duke of Florence, is ſigned Agnolo Guicciardini. The editors therein promiſe the four laſt books, and at the ſame time own that they are imperfect (31). They are not inſerted in the Venice edition of 1565, in 4to, appreſſo Nicolò Bevilaqua. It was corrected in many places, augmented with ſummaries and marginal notes by Father Remi a Florentine. They alſo are not inſerted in the edition which Bevilaqua abovementioned publiſhed anno 1568 in 4to. Varillas ſhould not therefore have aſſerted, that they were printed in the third edition. It ſhould rather be aſſerted, that they were printed ſeparately at Venice appreſſo Gabriel Giolito de' Ferrari, anno 1564, in 4to. I have this edition. The author's nephews dedicated it to the abovementioned Coſmo de Medicis Duke of Florence, to whom they had dedicated the ſixteen books. Agnolo Guicciardini ſigned, in the name of them all, the Dedication dated at France the 20th of July 1564. The Pope, the Doge of Venice, and the Duke of Florence, granted privileges to Giolito the Bookſeller, which were prefixed to the work; and this doubtleſs was the reaſon why Bevilaqua the Bookſeller did not inſert thoſe four laſt Books in the edition of the ſixteen firſt.

(26) Varillas, Hiſt. de Francis I, liv. 7. pag. 220.

(27) Ibid. pag. 221.

(28) Guicciardin. lib. 20. folio m. 107.

(29) Idem ibid. fol. 108.

(30) Paul. Jovius, Hiſtoriæ, lib. 30. fol. m. 187 verſo.

(31) Laſciando queſta opera imperfetta & quattro altri ultimi libri d'eſſa piu preſto abbozzati che finiti, i quali per tale cagione non ſi mandano fuori al preſente.

The four laſt Books in queſtion were printed at Parma, appreſſo Seth Viotti anno 1567, in 4to, con l'aggiunta de' Sommarii à ciaſcun Libro, & di molte Annotationi in margine delle coſe piu notabili, DI M. PAPIRIO PICEDI.

[I] I ſhall likewiſe quote the complaints of Bonifaccio Vannozzi, which are a little too devout.] His Hiſtory, ſays he (32), is more acceptable to private perſons than to Princes; for he ſpeaks of the latter with an indecent freedom, and has ſpoke ſo ill of the Popes, that the Latin Tranſlation of his Hiſtory has been read very greedily

(32) Vannozzi, de gli Auvertimenti Politici, tom. 2. pag. 367.

wiſe quote the complaints of Bonifaccio Vanozzi, which are a little too devout [I] ; and will not omit, that the Venetians complain of a certain ſpeech which Guicciardine aſcribes to an Embaſſador, ſent by them to the Imperial Court [K]. I am alſo to obſerve, that he wrote ſome other books [L]; and that Lewis Guicciardine his nephew, made a conſiderable greedily in heretical Countries; whence it appears, ſays he, that the Italian writers may do great prejudice to the Roman Pontificate. According to Vanozzi theſe Writers ought not to diſcover their Mother's ſhame; that if they publiſh a diſgraceful truth, they offend againſt charity; and if they publiſh Falſities, they offend againſt Juſtice. This is the general meaning of his words; I ſhall tranſcribe his own words, for the Satisfaction of thoſe who deſire to know them more particularly. Si che vegga un pò chi ſcrive, con quanta facilità egli poſſa pregiudicare alla Chieſa Romana, alla Sedia Apoſtolica, & al Sommo Pontefice: & che le penne de gl' Italiani, profeſſanti il Chriſtiano, ò ſcoprano le noſtre vergogne, ſe dicono il vero, che è contro alla carità, dovuta al proſſimo; ò calunniando per odio, ò per altra paſſione, chi merita eſſer onorato; facciano da maligno, & da triſto (33). He owns that Guicciardine's Hiſtory does not give ſuch great ſcandal or offence, ſince it was corrected; he aſſerts, that the Latin verſion which was made from the firſt original (34), may offend the Devil himſelf. Ma la fatta Latina, cavata dal primo originale, & piena di maledicenze contro à Papi, & altri Eccleſiaſtici, può ſcandalizare il Diavolo ſteſſo; parlo di quel ch'io sò di propria ſcienza, & come ſi dice di veduta. Et un moderno Scrittore, parlando di queſta Storia, dice coſi per l'appunto. Il Guicciardini hà potuto per ſe ſteſſo, acquiſtar tanto d'autorità all' Iſtoria ſua, che molte indegnità, molti errori, & molte bugie, ch'ella contiene, ſono ſtate non ſolo ſopportate dal Mondo; ma approbate da molti, per eſempi, & per dogmi del vero, & perfetto viver civile. Et laſciando il reſto, ſi legge pur in eſſo, un' aperta, & faſtidioſa irreverenza, dice il medeſimo moderno Scrittore, verſo gli ſteſſi Vicari di Chriſto, con grande indegnità della Sedia Apoſtolica, & non potendoſi accuſarlo d'ignoranza, biſogna neceſſariamente confeſſarlo, per troppo appaſſionato, & commiſerare più toſto, che biaſmare una coſi bella, ma coſi difettoſa, fatica (35). i. e. " But the Latin verſion . . . . may " ſcandalize the Devil himſelf. What I ſpeak of is by " experience, and as it were by ſight; and a modern " Author, ſpeaking of this Hiſtory, ſays as follows. " Guicciardini himſelf eſtabliſhed ſo well the credit " and authority of his Hiſtory, that the many mean " particulars, the many errors, and the many lies it " contains, have not only been born with by the " Public, but approved by numbers, as examples and " rules of true and civil perfect Life. And to paſs over " other things any one who reads Guicciardini (ſays the " ſame modern writer) will find a barefaced and " haughty irreverence towards even the Vicars of " Chriſt, and the utmoſt contempt for the See of " Rome; but as we cannot charge Guicciardini with " Ignorance, we muſt be obliged to confeſs, that he is " too paſſionate a writer; and rather pity than cen- " ſure ſo beautiful, but at the ſame time ſo defective " a work." This long paſſage is not improper here, becauſe it belongs to the Hiſtory of the ſeveral Judgments which have been formed of Guicciardini.

(33) Idem, ibid.

(34) Obſerve this againſt Poſſevinus.

(35) Vannozzi, Auvertimenti Politici, tom. 2. pag. 367.

[K] I muſt not omit the Speech which Guicciardini aſcribes to a Venetian Embaſſador.] Nothing can be more groveling than this Speech. This Hiſtorian ſuppoſes it to have been made by Antonio Juſtiniani to the Emperor Maximilian, Anno 1509. Per ottener da lui con qualunque conditione la pace gli mandarono con ſomma celerità Ambaſciatore Antonio Giuſtiniano: il quale ammeſſo in publica audientia al coſpetto di Ceſare, parlò miſerabilmente e con grandiſſima ſommiſſione (36). He is not ſatisfied with giving this general idea of the too abject ſubmiſſion of the Venetians; but adds, that it will be proper to quote the whole Speech, in order that the reader may ſee the Conſternation with which they were ſeized. Accordingly, he ſets down the Ambaſſador's ſpeech at full length, without making the leaſt alteration; only he tranſlates it out of Latin into Italian. Non mi parte alieno dal noſtro propoſito, acciochè meglio s'intenda in quanta conſternatione d'animo ſuſſe ridotta quella Repub. la quale già più di dugento anni non haveva ſentito averſità pari a queſta, inſerire la propria oratione havuta da lui innanzi a Ceſare, transferendo ſolamente le parole Latine in voci volgari, lequali furono in queſto tenore (37). The Venetians aſſerts, that this Speech is merely chimerical; and, to prove it, they affirm that Franciſco Capello (38), whom they had ſent to the Emperor after they had retaken Padua, was not permitted ſo much as to ſet his Foot in the Territories of that Prince; and that Ludovico Mocenigo, and Antonio Juſtiniani whom they ſent to him ſome time after, were not admitted or heard any more than Franciſco Capello. What is certain is, that theſe Embaſſadors were order'd to make very advantagious offers to his Imperial Majeſty. The Venetian Hiſtorian whom I have cited does not deny this; and Pietro Bembo, another Venetian Hiſtorian, confeſſes it ſtill more expreſsly. Latum, ſays he (39), ut Antonius Juſtinianus . . . . ad Maximilianum rectà contenderet; & cum illo, ſi poſſet, pacem quantumvis duris conditionibus faceret: Tergeſteque oppidum, & Portum Naonis, reliquaque municipia, quæ reſp. ex ejus ditione ſuperiore anno ceperat, Senatum ei paratum eſſe reſtituere; ac quæ oppida ex Romanorum imperatorum ditione in Carnis, & Gallia, & Venetia reſp. poſſideret, ea ſe omnia illi tanquam accepta relaturum nuntiaret. i. e. " It was ordered, (ſays he) that Antonio Juſtiniani " . . . ſhould go directly to Maximilian; and, if " poſſible, conclude a peace with him, how hard " ſoever the conditions might be; and acquaint him " that the Senate would reſtore to him the city of Ter- " geſte, the port of Naon, and the other towns of " which the Republick had diſpoſſeſſed him the year " before; and to ſurrender up to him ſuch imperial " Towns as it poſſeſſed in Carniola, France, and the " Territories of Venice." It muſt be obſerved, that he aſſerts that Antonio Juſtiniani was ſent to the Emperor, the inſtant the news was heard of the victory the French had gained. How do we know but that Guicciardini might have ſeen the Copy of the ſpeech which Juſtiniani had prepared? Yet this would not excuſe him; for if the Embaſſador was not admitted to audience, his manuſcript could not juſtly be produced, as a ſpeech that had actually been delivered before the Emperor. The Hiſtorians were very bold as to the ſpeeches related by them. They invented them, and yet would have their readers believe that they had been actually ſpoke. If we read in Jovius the ſpeech which the Duke of Milan's Embaſſador made to Charles VIII., to prompt him to invade Italy, and read it in Guicciardini, theſe two pieces will be found quite different (40). The ſpeech which Loredano the Doge made to the Senate, in order to have two hundred noble Venetians ſent to the Defence of Padua, is related by Guicciardini, in a quite different manner from Mocenigo and Juſtiniani, both Venetian Hiſtorians (41).

(36) Guiccardin. lib. 8. folio 222 verſo.

(37) Idem, ibid.

(38) See the Hiſtory of Venice by Pietro Juſtiniani, Book 10. Porcacchi cites it in his preface on Guicciardini; and in his marginal notes on book 8. folio 222 verſo.

(39) Bembus. Hiſtor. Venetæ, lib. 8. circa init. folio m. 188 verſo.

(40) Porcacchi's Notes on Guicciardini, lib. 1. folio 8.

(41) Ibid. lib. 8. folio 230.

[L] Guicciardini wrote ſome other Books.] Theſe I reduce to two, the one entitled Conſigli aurei, the other Auvertimenti Politici. Ghilini ſpeaks only of theſe two (42). If we were to depend on the Catalogue of Libraries, the number would be increaſed, but ſhould aſcribe alſo to Guiccardini, Piu Conſigli e Auvertimenti in materia di re publica e di privata, printed at Paris in 1576, 4to. I precetti e Sententie in materia di Stato, printed at Antwerp in 1585, 4to. Auvertimenti Politici, printed at Venice in 1583, 4to. Hypomneſes Poëticæ. Such are the titles we meet with in the Bodleian Catalogue, without its being obſerved that theſe are only different Editions of the ſame Books. Theſe confuſions are owing to the Bookſellers by the liberty they take to give different Titles, at different times to the ſame Book. But altho' the Bodleian Catalogue aſcribes the Hypomneſes Poëticæ to our Guicciardini, the reader muſt not therefore imagine that he publiſhed Rules on the art of Poetry. This is an error of the Preſs, and it ſhould have been, Hypomneſes Politicæ, for this title the Latin Tranſlator of Guiccardini's Auvertimenti Politici was given to his verſion. I am to obſerve, that theſe works of Guicciardini, tranſlated into French by Charles de Chanticler (43), were printed at Paris Anno 1577 in 8vo. with this title, Pleuſieurs Advis & Conſeils tant pour les affaires d'eſtat que privez. There is a very groſs Error in the

(42) Si vedono anco del ſuo due componimenti che per titolo hanno &c. Ghilini, Teatr. tom. 1. pag. 59.

(43) See the Bibliotheque Françoiſe of M. Verdier, pag. 151.

cata-

a conſiderable figure in the Commonwealth of Learning [M].

catalogue of Thuanus's Library; it aſcribing (44) to Francis Guicciardini two Books that were written by Lewis Guicciardini his Nephew, and, entitled, the one Raccolta de i detti & fatti notabili coſi gravi comme piacevoli, the other Hore di Recreatione. This error implies an abſurdity; for Francis Guicciardini was ſo far from being a facetious man, that he never once broke a Jeſt, he being extremely grave and ſevere. Fuit indignationi proclivior, oriſque ductu licet ſuavi, tamen ſevero & gravi, genioque ſupra modum falſæ urbanitatis dicteriis repugnante, quorum nullum in tota vita ipſi unquam excidiſſe perhibent quidam (45). In the abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, there is aſcribed to him an Italian Hiſtory Urbis Italiæ, printed at Venice in 1569. [The true catalogue of Francis Guicciardini's works, (beſides his Hiſtory of Italy) ſeems to be as follows. 2. Piu Conſigli e Auvertimenti in materia di re publica, e di privata, Paris 1576, 4to. This Book, as Mr. Bayle obſerves above, was afterwards printed under different Titles. 3. Il ſacco di Roma. In Parigi, 1664, 12mo. 4. A Letter to Pietro Bembo, to congratulate him on his being promoted to a cardinal's hat, and inſerted in a collection entitled Lettere Volgari di diverſi nobiliſſimi uomini. Another letter to Pietro Aretino, dated Nov. 3, 1527, in the collection of letters written to that learned man, and publiſhed by Franceſco Marcolini in Venice 1551. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(44) Pag. 403. Part 2.

(45) Imperialis, in Muſæo Hiſtorico, pag. 99. See alſo Guicciardini's Life by Remigio Fiorentino.

[M] Lewis Guicciardini his nephew, made a conſiderable figure in the commonwealth of Learning.] Beſides the two books mentioned in the note above, he publiſhed Commentarii delle coſe più memorabili ſeguite in Europa, ſpecialmente in queſti Paeſi baſſi dalla pace di Cambrai del M, D. XXIX inſino a tutto l'anno M. D. L. I have the Venetian edition of it by me, appreſſo Dominico Farri 1566, 4to. This author inſcribed this work to the Grand Duke of Florence, the dedication being dated at Antwerp, January the 1ſt 1565. This Hiſtory was tranſlated into Latin (46), and was ſoon after followed by Deſcriſione di tutti i Paeſi baſſi, altrimenti detti Germania inferiore. This is a very good deſcription of the Netherlands. The Author reſided a long time in that Country; took prodigious pains in making the moſt exact reſearches into every thing, and viſited the ſeveral places whenever he had an opportunity, in order that he might not affirm any thing but with the utmoſt certainty He publiſhed three editions of this work; the laſt is dated anno 1587, and ſurpaſſes as much the ſecond, as this latter does the firſt. [The two ſcarceſt and moſt valuable editions are as follow; Ludovico Guicciardino, Deſcrizione de Paeſi baſſi. In Averſa preſſo il Plantino 1582, con le piante di 77 Città, e di altri ſuperbi edifici, in foglio; alſo reprinted in Antwerp, anno 1667, in folio. Addit. by the Tranſl.] Belleforet tranſlated this work into French; and John Brant a Senator of Antwerp, and Reignier Vitellius gave a Latin Verſion of it. John Brant ſuppreſſed this Tranſlation upon finding that others had got the ſtart of him (47). Ghilini knew ſomething of this, but the account he gives is ſtrangely confuſed. His words are as follow: Reynero Vitellio, e avanti di lui Giovanni Branzio Senatore di Anverza, che dal Vitellio fu prevenuto, la traduſſero dal Franceſe nel Latino (48). Now theſe words are very erroneous; in the firſt place they ſignify that Brant's Tranſlation was publiſhed; for when a Perſon ſpeaks of a Book, without ſaying expreſly that it was not publiſhed, he gives his Readers to underſtand that it had been publiſhed. This error is followed by a moſt unaccountable piece of Nonſence. It is affirmed that Brant's Tranſlation was prior to that of Vitellius, and that Vitellius got the ſtart of Brant. Theſe things are inconſiſtent, when an Author forgets, as Ghilini does, to diſtinguiſh the compoſition from the impreſſion. It is to be obſerved, that Valerius Andreas does not ſay that John Brant tranſlated this Book before Vitellius did the ſame; he only ſays, that he was prevented with reſpect to the Impreſſion (49). To conclude, it is not true that Vitellius and Brant tranſlated that work from the French Verſion. The latter declares in the title page of his Verſion (50), that he made it from the Italian; and Valerius Andreas aſſerts the ſame thing with reſpect to Brant. I have cited his expreſſions. Ghilini has committed all theſe errors, by his blindly following Swertius (51). Pocciantio (52) aſſerts, that Lewes Guicciardini underſtood the Latin and Greek Tongues, the Mathematics, and was a good Antiquary. Thuanus highly applauds the Hiſtory of the Netherlands, and informs us of a remarkable incident, viz. that the Duke of Alva threw Lewis Guicciardini into Priſon, for his having writ a Book, containing the reaſons why Lent ſhould be aboliſhed. This ſhews the ſavage temper, and enormous pride of this Duke; for the work in queſtion was writ by this Duke's command; but becauſe he himſelf did not preſent the Manuſcript to the Duke of Alva, and this proud Spaniard received it from another hand, he flew into a dreadful paſſion againſt the Author, and cauſed him to be ſhamely impriſoned. Guicciardini was betrayed by a man, who, hoping to ingratiate himſelf by his diligence, preſented the Manuſcript he had been intruſted with. In carcerem ignominioſum ob id conjectus, quod Albanus poſtea excuſavit, cùm diceret, non tàm ob conſilium optimo viro ſuccenſere, quam quod illud juſſu ſuo; nam fatebatur, cùm ſcriptis mandaſſet, non per ipſum ſcriptorem ſed per alias manus in ſuas præpoſtera perfidi hominis gratiam ſuam aucupantis diligentia illud perveniſſet (53). He died in Antwerp, the 22d of March 1589, aged ſixty ſix years. [Lewis Guicciardini was buried in the Cathedral at Antwerp, where the following Epitaph was inſcribed to his Memory: Ludovico Guicciardino, Florentino, nobilibus Majoribus orto, inter quos Patruum habuit Franciſcum, magni nominis Hiſtoricum, cujus famam æmulatus univerſam Belgicam eleganti ſtudio deſcripſit. Vixit anno 66. Obiit 11. Cal. April 1589. S. P. Q. Antwerp. B. M. P. C. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(46) By Peter Paul Kerckhovius. His tranſlation was printed at Antwerp anno 1566, in 8vo. Valerius Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 754.

(47) Idem, ibid. pag. 467.

(48) Ghilini, Teatro, tom. 1. pag. 150.

(49) Ex Italica Latinam factam quia in edendo ab aliis præventus premere maluit. Val. And. Bibliotb. Belgic. pag. 467.

(50) Ex idiomate Italico ad exemplar tertium ac poſtremum ab ipſo authore recognitum . . . in Latinum ſermonem converſa.

(51) See Swertius's Athenæ Belgicæ, pag. 520.

(52) Pocciantius, de Script. Florent. pag. 118.

(53) Thuan. lib. 96. ſub fin. pag. m. 315. ad ann. 1589.

☞We ſhall here add ſome other particulars to Mr. Bayle [N].

GUICHENON

[N] We ſhall here add ſome other particulars to Mr. Bayle.] At firſt his father, Peter Guicciardini, according to the received cuſtom, made our Guicciardini ſtudy the Latin and Greek tongues; but he quite neglected the latter, whether it were, that he was not pleaſed with it; or thought it of no uſe with regard to the knowledge of the Laws, which then formed his chief object. After having gone through his Philoſophy at ſixteen years of age, he ſtudied the Civil Laws three years, under Ormannozzo Deti and Philip Decius, famous Profeſſors in Italy. Guicciardini was afterwards ſent by his father, firſt to the Univerſity of Ferrara, where not being ſatisfied with the Profeſſors, he ſtaid but a twelvemonth, and removed to Padua; in which Univerſity he reſided three years. It was at his leaving this laſt mention'd place that he return'd to Florence and took his Doctor's degree in the Civil Law. In 1506, he married Maria Salviati, daughter of Alamanno Salviati, one of the moſt illuſtrious citizens of Florence. Guicciardini ſcrupled at firſt to accept of the Embaſſy to Ferdinand, King of Arragon; imagining that the (*) profeſſion he then followed was honourable and profitable enough, and that he would loſe a great many of his Clients during his abſence; but his father having repreſented, that it would not be prudent in him to refuſe an employment, which would reflect the greater honour upon him, as there was no example of its having been beſtowed on ſo young a man, he accepted of it. The King of Arragon was extremely well pleaſed with his conduct, and made him a preſent of ſome plate to the value of five hundred crowns. The inhabitants of Bologna, at the time that Guicciardini was Governor over them, were divided into very great factions. Duke Alexander of Medicis took him with him to Naples, when he went to wait upon the Emperor Charles V, and Guicciardini was of great ſervice to him in ſome affairs he then negotiated. Duke Alexander being killed in January 1537,

(*) He was a Counſellor at Law.

GUICHENON (SAMUEL) an Advocate or Counſellor at Bourg in Breſſe, deſerves an illuſtrious place among the Hiſtoriographers who flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth Century. He was born in Macon. Guichenon publiſhed, in 1650, the Hiſtory of Breſſe, after which he compiled the genealogical hiſtory of the Houſe of Savoy, and printed it at Lyons, anno 1660, in two large volumes in folio. The ſame year he publiſhed a Latin book intitled, Bibliotheca Sebuſiana [A]. Theſe three works are extremely good in their kind, and made him deſerving of the rewards which were beſtowed upon him (a). Le Laboureur owns this; but in ſuch a manner as ſeems to accuſe the Court of France of ingratitude with reſpect to their Hiſtoriographers [B]. He had been a Proteſtant, and died in the Romiſh Communion the 8th of September 1664. The reader will find him, below, charged with being a plagiary [C].

(a) His titles are Lord of Painesſuyt, Counſellor and Hiſtoriographer to the King, and to his Royal Highneſs, Count Palatine, Knight of the Empire, and of the ſacred Order of St. Maurice and St. Lazarus.

I have

1537, Guicciardini was one of the perſons who formed the ſecret council, which was then held, in order to conſider how to act in that juncture. He was buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors in Florence. He had had ſeven daughters, three of whom ſurvived him. He was of a vigorous conſtitution; but his too intenſe application to his ſtudies, in which he would frequently ſpend whole days without thinking of ſuſtenance or ſleep, together with the fatigues he underwent in public affairs, at laſt ruined his health. He poſſeſſed a very happy memory, a lively and ſagacious genius, and a ſurprizing judgment. Being eloquent from nature, he eaſily brought over people to his opinion; and always gave the moſt prudent advice whenever he was conſulted. He was a man of the greateſt integrity; a lover of juſtice; diſintereſted, and zealous for the public welfare. Among his defects, one was, his being over-haſty and choleric; but no one could be more obliging and affable when his mind was unruffled (†). It is ſurprizing that Mr. Bayle ſhould not have cited the noted jeſt of Boccalini on Guicciardini's too prolix way of writing. The jeſt is as follows. Boccalini feigns, that a Lacedæmonian having ſpoke in three words, what might have been expreſſed in two, (prolixity being conſidered as a capital crime in Sparta) was impriſoned during eight months, and afterwards ſentenced to read over, once, the war of Piſa written by Guicciardini. Con agonia, & con ſudori di morte leſſe il Laconico la prima carta: ma coſi immenſo fu il tedio, che gli apportò quella lunga diceria, che l'infelice corſe a gettarſi à piedi de medeſſimi Giudici, che l' haveano condannato: i quali inſtantiſſimo ante ſupplicò, che per tutti gl' anni della ſua vita lo condannaſſero a remare in una galea, che lo muraſſero tra due mura, che per miſerecordia fino lo ſcorticaſſere vivo, perche il legger quei diſcorſi ſenza fine, quei conſigli tanto tediosi, quelle freddiſſime concioni fatte nella preſa anco d'ogni vil colombaio, era crepacuore che ſuperava .. tutti gl' acerbi dolori delle parturienti, e tutto le più crudeli morti, che ad inſtanza de'piu ferini Tiranni giamai ſi haveſſe potuto imaginare lo ſpietato Perillo (§). i. e. "The "unhappy Lacedæmonian having been thrown into "the ſharpeſt agonies, and a deadly ſweat, at the "the reading only of the firſt page, found this tittle "tattle ſo horribly tedious, that he threw himſelf "at the feet of the Judges who had condemned him, "and moſt earneſtly beſought them to ſentence him to "the gallies during life; that they would immure him "between two walls; or, for pity's ſake, flea him "alive, he proteſting, that the reading of thoſe ever-"laſting diſcourſes, thoſe ſo tedious counſels, thoſe "flat and inſipid ſpeeches, made at the taking of "every pigeon-houſe, was a puniſhment that ſurpaſſed "all the grievous pains of child-birth; and all the "moſt cruel deaths, which, at the ſollicitation of "the moſt ſavage tyrants, were ever invented by the "mercileſs Perillus."

(†) Many of theſe particulars are extracted from Guicciardini's Life, written by Remi Nannini of Florence, and prefixed to his Hiſtory.

(§) De' Ragguagli di Parnaſo del Signior Trajano Boccalini, pag. 23. In Venetia, 1629, 8vo.

[A] He publiſhed a ... Book intitled Bibliotheca Sebuſiana.] It is in 4to, and conſiſts of 448 pages, and was printed at Lyons. In order that the reader may know all that it treats of, I need but tranſcribe the whole title. Bibliotheca Sebuſiana, ſive variarum chartarum, diplomatum, fundationum, privilegiorum, donationum & immunitatum à ſummis Pontificibus, Imperatoribus, Regibus, Ducibus, Marchionibus, Comitibus, & Proceribus, Eccleſiis, Monaſteriis & aliis locis aut perſonis conceſſarum nuſquam antea editarum, miſcellæ Centuriæ II. Ex Archivis Regiis. Monaſteriorum tabulariis & codicibus manuſcriptis ad hiſtoriæ lucem collegit, & ad locorum explicationem & familiarum illuſtrium cognitionem notis illuſtravit S. Guichenon, Dominus de Paineſſuyt, Regi à Conſiliis, Franciæ, Sabaudiæ, & Dombarum Hiſtoriographus, Eques auratus & Comes Palatinus, Sacræ Religionis S S. Mauritii & Lazari miles.

[B] Le Laboureur, ... ſeems to accuſe the Court of France of ingratitude, with reſpect to their Hiſtoriographers.] Here follow le Laboureur's words. "At the "ſame time that ſhe (1) enlarges their limits by her "victories, ſhe gives orders for writing the genealo-"gical Hiſtory of the Dukes of Savoy. It will be "ſaying ſufficient to applaud her choice, and the me-"rit of the work which is now printing (2), to name "the author of it, the Sieur Guichenon, who has al-"ready illuſtrated Breſſe, his native country, by a "moſt excellent collection of its antiquities; with the "hiſtory of its antient Lords, and all the Nobility of "that Province. Were not this Princeſs the daughter "of Henry the Great, I ſhould bluſh, for our Nati-"on's ſake, to ſay, that ſhe proved to Guichenon, by "the honours ſhe indulged him, whilſt he was writing "this work, that the generoſity and goodneſs of Princes "are not to be judged of from the extent of their "Dominions; and that there is not now in the world "any character ſo glorious and happy, as that of Hi-"ſtoriographer of Savoy (3).

(1) i. e. The Ducheſs of Savoy, ſiſter to Lewis XIII.

(2) Le Laboureur wrote in the year 1659.

(3) Le Laboureur, Addit. au Mem. de Caſtelneau, tom. I. pag. 752.

[C] He .. is charged with being a plagiary.] This accuſation is found in the following words of Varillas. "I take notice, in the eleventh book, of the Duke "of Savoy's pretenſions, and thoſe of the Biſhop of "Geneva, to the city of that name; and acknow-"ledge that Mr. Guichenon's work has been of ſervice "to me. Not but that I find this author too ſtrongly "attached to the Houſe of Savoy, whoſe ſubject he "was born: but as this attachment did not prevent "his reading all the printed books and manuſcripts "which were of uſe to his work, I have found ſome "fragments in it which I had not ſeen before. Sincerity, "however, will not permit me to omit one of his "faults, which I take to be ſo groſs, that it is ſur-"prizing no perſon has yet thought of animadvert-"ing upon it. He accuſes, in his Preface, Wil-"liam Paradin, of having extracted almoſt all "his Hiſtory of Savoy from the antient Chronicle of "that Houſe; and from Jerom Champier's Hiſtory, "without once citing either of thoſe authors; and yet "I find that Guichenon is guilty of the ſame ingra-"titude with which he reproaches Paradin. Nani's "Italian Hiſtory is well enough known; and it is "owned, that few writers in our age come near him "in politeneſs and delicacy. Any one who takes the "pains to compare it with what Guichenon relates of "the laſt Dukes of Savoy, will find, that he has in-"ſerted it literally, in his laſt volume, without doing "juſtice to the author whom he copied (4)." [The genealogical Hiſtory of the Houſe of Savoy, is wrote with great care and accuracy; and as to Varillas's accuſing Guichenon of tranſcribing word for word Nani's Italian Hiſtory, without citing him, this is a mere chimera of Varillas, "becauſe the firſt part of Nani's "Hiſtory was not printed till 1662, that is, two years "after that of Guichenon; whence it follows, that "Nani, if either of them, was the plagiary. But it "may be preſumed, that the reaſon of their ſometimes "relating the ſame incidents, is, becauſe they both bor-"rowed from the ſame authors; and it is poſſible that "neither of them copied the other (‡).". There are two other pieces of Guichenon; 1ſt Epiſcoporum Bellicenſium Series chronologica &c. Pariſ. 1642, 4to; 2dly, Projet de l'hiſtoire de Breſſe & de Bugey, 1645, in 4to (†). It may be obſerved, that an epitome of the Hiſtory of Breſſe was written by Germain Guichenon, and publiſhed in Lyons, 1709, 8vo. Addit. by the Tranſl.]

(4) Varillas, Preface du 3 Tome de l'Hiſtoire de l'Heneſie.

(‡) Hommes Illuſtres, du Pere Niceron, vol. 38 pag. 367, 368.

(†) Ibid. pag. 364.

I have been accuſed of believing, without any foundation, that he had been a Proteſtant. This criticiſm has been refuted in the Memoirs de Trevoux for January 1703 (b); but I am now going to obſerve ſome particulars which are ſtronger than any thing ſaid there. I ſhall cite a Calviniſt Miniſter, who publickly reproached Guichenon with abjuring the Proteſtant Religion. He employs very harſh expreſſions [D]; whence it may be inferred, that he knew very well that what he advanced was true.

(b) Amſterd. edit. pag. 59.

[A] A Calviniſt Miniſter . . . publickly reproached Guichenon, with abjuring the Proteſtant Religion. He employs very harſh expreſſions.] Conſider only the parentheſis of the paſſage I am going to copy. "Guichenon, .. has juſt now publiſhed a large Hiſtory in "three great volumes in folio, in which he evidently "falſifies, againſt his knowledge and conſcience, what-"ever relates to the right, innocence and conduct of "theſe Waldenſes, as well in general as in particular; "and he is not aſhamed to employ his mercenary pen "in contradicting both the truth of the maſſacres in "1655, and whatever he thinks may tend to the ju-"ſtification of thoſe good Chriſtians and in repreſent-"ing the greateſt cruelty and perfidy of their enemies, as "acts of great mildneſs and forbearance (WHICH I DO "NOT THINK STRANGE OR SURPRIZING IN A RENE-"GADO WHO HAS APOSTATIZED FROM THE KNOWN "TRUTH, TO GO OVER TO THE INTERESTS OF "LYING (5)." This is what is declared, (in his Preface) by John Leger, Miniſter and Moderator of the Church of the Valleys. We will now ſee what he ſays in the body of the Book, where he endeavours to juſtify Anthony Leger, his uncle, whom Guichenon repreſents as a factious man, and guilty of ſeveral crimes. "It would be ſufficient to refute this Guichenon, to "obſerve that he himſelf was born and brought up in "the Proteſtant Religion; and that he went through "part of his ſtudies with the ſaid Leger, whoſe familiar "companion he was, as the ſaid Sieur Leger told me "himſelf; but that ſince, in order to attain the ho-"nours he now enjoys, he turned his coat, and deni-"ed the known truth, to embrace the Romiſh Reli-"ligion; taking for his motto the following Italian "proverb, Guelfo io fui, e Gibbelin m'apello, à chi "più mi darà volterò il mantello. For no one doubts "that he who ſells his ſoul for bread, and his birth-right "for a meſs of pottage, may be eaſily prevailed upon "to let out his tongue and pen, to ſay and write any "thing which thoſe may require whoſe hireling he is. "And I know it for a truth, that he did not dare to "write a line in his book, which had not been ſifted "and reſifted in Turin; and that he could not refuſe "to foiſt in it, whatever anſwers were made by the "oracles of Marquis de Pianeſſo, and the Preſident "Truquis (6): and I have now in my hands where-"with to prove this (7)."

(5) John Leger, Hiſtoire générale des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, at the end of the preface, Leyden edit. 1669, folio.

(6) He calls him Truchis, Part 1. pag. 164.

(7) Leger, Hiſt. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, Part 2. pag. 68, 69.

He refutes him elſewhere (8) with regard to two incidents; and obſerves farther, that he is a man who betrayed his religion, and denied the known truth, for the ſake of worldly advantages.

(8) Ibid. pag. 262. See alſo pag. 111.

☞This article by Mr. Bayle being very imperfect, we ſhall here give a ſupplement to it [E].

[E] We ſhall here give a ſupplement . . to this article.] Samuel Guichenon was born the 18th of Auguſt 1607, of Gregory Guichenon a Phyſician, and of Claudina Chauſſat, as is proved by a writing in his father's hand, and which is now preſerved in his family (†). Some other original pieces preſerved alſo in this family take notice, that Gregory Guichenon his father, born at Chatillon-les-Dombes, had gone and ſettled at Bourg in Breſſe; that he married there in 1595; and that his firſt child was baptized in the church of Notre-Dame; but that having been moleſted on account of his religion in that city, where the Calviniſts were not tolerated, he removed with his family to Mâcon, where they were allowed liberty of conſcience. He afterwards went and ended his days in Châtillon-les-Dombes, leaving three ſons, Daniel who was a Counſellor, Peter a Phyſician, and Samuel whom we are now writing of (§). The laſt mentioned was born a Calviniſt, and continued ſuch till after the year 1630, when he embraced the Romiſh Religion; which he did, either in a journey he was then taking into Italy; or in Lyons, at his return; he abjuring the Proteſtant Religion before his Archbiſhop (‡). Having drawn up the plan of his Hiſtory of the Houſe of Savoy, he went to Turin, and preſented it to Chriſtina of France, mother to the Duke of Savoy, who then governed in that Court. This Princeſs gave him a conſiderable ſum of money, upon the genteel pretence of defraying the expences of his journey; and afterwards created him Hiſtoriographer of Savoy, and Knight of the Order of St. Maurice. The croſs and ring with which ſhe preſented him on this occaſion, (each valued at ſix thouſand crowns) were ſtill preſerved in his family in 1704. Beſides theſe rewards, a handſome penſion was ſettled upon him, and was paid him till he died (‡). He had married three wives. His firſt was a rich widow, which made his circumſtances extremely eaſy, and gave him an opportunity of devoting his time, undiſturbed, to his writings. He married her about the year 1615, but had no children by this wife, nor by his third. His ſecond wife, named Anne Pouillet, was daughter of the Châtelain of Bourg, a very conſiderable employment in that city (*), and he had by her one ſon and three daughters, who ſurvived him. His ſon married before he died, but had no iſſue. Two of the daughters were Nuns; and the third, who died the 24th of July 1724, was remarkable for her good ſenſe, and had been twice married. Our Guichenon died at fifty ſeven years of age, and was buried in the Dominican Church of Bourg. His picture, prefixed to his Hiſtory of Savoy, publiſhed in 1660, declares him to be but 51 years of age. But we may preſume that it had been engraved ſome time before that date; ſince he was then three and fifty (§). There have been ſome Refugees of this name, and there are ſtill ſome in Brandenbourg. They came from the neighbourhood of Chatillon-lez-Dombes (α).

(†) Hommes Illuſtres, du Pere Niceron, vol. 31. pag. 360.

(‡) Idem, ibid.

(‡) Ibid. pag. 363.

(*) Idem, ibid.

(§) Ibid. pag. 361, 362.

(§) Ibid. pag. 364. Moſt of the particulars in this note are from Mr. le Clerc, and Father Niceron.

(α) From the critical remarks added to the laſt Dutch edition of Bayle's Dictionary.

GUIGNARD (JOHN) a Jeſuit, born in Chartres (a), and Profeſſor of Divinity in the College of Clermont (b), was executed at Paris the 7th of January 1595, for high treaſon. He was found guilty of having written a book, filled with rebellion and fury againſt Henry III and Henry IV [A]; and as the juncture, at that time, required that the

(a) Thuan. lib. 112. pag. m. 653.

(b) Appendix Apologiæ Franciſci Montani pro Societate Jeſu, pag. 352.

[A] He was found guilty of having written a Book, filled with rebellion and fury, againſt Henry III and Henry IV.] Here follows the manner in which this was found out. "As the Parliament were carrying "on the proſecution againſt John Chaſtel, ſome of "them, who were deputed for that purpoſe, went to the "college of Clermont, and ſeized ſeveral papers, a-"mong which was found a book, in the hand-"writing of the ſaid Guignard the Jeſuit; contain-"ing ſeveral propoſitions and means, to prove that "it was lawful to kill the King; with ſeveral infe-"rences, to adviſe the murther of his ſucceſſor alſo. "Here follow ſome of them, extracted from the ſaid "Book, which are ſtill extant in the Records of "the Court (1)." The author of Anti-Coton gives afterwards ſome extracts from the Book in queſtion; but as Victor Cayet has given them more at large, I chooſe rather to employ his narrative. "With regard "to Guignard, he could not deny but that he had "wrote the nine propoſitions following, viz.

(1) Anti-Coton, pag. 15.

the Government ſhould puniſh with the utmoſt ſeverity, a doctrine which, not long before, had expoſed the King's life to the wicked attempt of John Chaſtel, it was not thought proper to ſhew the leaſt favour to this Jeſuit. He refuſed obſtinately to make the Amende honorable; and perſiſted till his death, in not acknowledging Henry IV for King of France [B]. He has been applauded as a martyr by the Apologiſt for John Chaſtel [C]. We ſhall ſee what the Jeſuits anſwered, when they were reproached for giving him a place in their Martyrology [D]. They declared it to be a falſe aſſertion; and " I. That in 1572, on St. Bartholomew's Day, had " the baſilical vein been opened, (the King being mur- " thered) we ſhould not have fallen out of Scylla into " Charybdis, as we find by experience has happened; " ſed quicquid delirant Reges; by being ſparing of " blood, they have involved France in fire and blood, " & in caput reciderunt mala.

" II. The cruel Nero was killed by a Clement; and " the ſimulated Monk was diſpatched by the hand of " a true Monk.

" III. Shall we call a Nero Sardanapalus of France, " a Fox of Bearne, a Lyon of Portugal, a She-wolf " of England, a Griffin of Sweden, and a Hog of " Saxony?

" IV. What a fine ſight muſt thoſe three Kings " be, (if they deſerve the name of Kings) viz. the late " Tyrant, he of Bearne, and the pretended Monarch " of Portugal Don Antonio.

" V. That the fineſt Anagram that was ever made " on the name of the deceaſed Tyrant was the follow- " ing O le vilain Herodes (the wretch of a Herod!)

" VI. That the heroic action performed by James " Clement, as a gift of the Holy Ghoſt, ſo called by " our Divines, was juſtly applauded by the late Prior " of the Dominicans, Burgoing, Confeſſor and Mar- " tyr, by ſeveral reaſons, as well in Paris which I " myſelf was an ear-witneſs to, when he taught the " Book of Judith, as before that fine Parliament of " Tours. And this the ſaid Burgoing (which is ſtill " more) ſigned with his blood, and conſecrated by his " death: and we muſt not believe what is related by " his enemies, viz. that with his laſt breath he diſal- " lowed of this action as deteſtable.

" VII. That the Crown of France might and ought " to be transferred from the Bourbon Family to ano- " ther.

" VIII. That he of Bearne, tho' now converted to " the Catholic Faith, would be treated with more gen- " tleneſs than he deſerved, ſhould he be obliged to ſub- " mit to the tonſure in ſome well-regulated Monaſtery; " there to do penance for the many calamities he has " brought upon France; and to thank God for giving " him the grace to know himſelf before his death.

" IX. That if he cannot be dethroned without a " war, let war be waged: that if war cannot be made " on him, let him be aſſaſſinated (2)."

(2) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, ad ann. 1594, folio, 435 verſo.

[B] He refuſed obſtinately to make the Amende honorable, and perſiſted till his death, in not acknowledging Henry IV for King of France.] Here follows the ſequel of Cayet's Narrative. " The Court having " ſeen theſe writings, Guignard the author being in- " terrogated concerning them, owned that he had " compoſed and written them with his own hand; and " therefore was ſentenced by the Court or Parliament " (*) to make Amende honourable, ſtript to his ſhirt, " a halter about his neck, before the chief gate of the " Church of Paris; and there, being on his knees, " holding in his hands a lighted wax-torch, weighing " two pounds, to ſay and declare, that, wickedly, " traiterouſly and falſely he had written, that the late " King had been juſtly murthered by James Clement; " and that if the now reigning Monarch ſhould not " die in the field, he ought to be put to death; of " which he repented, and aſked pardon of God, of " the King and of Juſtice. This done, to be led to " the Greve (†), there to be hanged and ſtrangled on " a gibbet erected for that purpoſe; and afterwards " his dead body to be burnt to aſhes, in a fire lighted " under the ſaid gallows. This ſentence was exe- " cuted the 7th of January, and the ſaid Guignard " was hanged and burnt at the Greve. Being, be- " fore, carried before the Church of Nôtre-Dame, there " to make the Amende honourable, being ſtript to his " ſhirt, and having the torch in his hand; he aſked " the Sieur Rapin, the Lieutenant criminal, what was " required of him. He anſwered, that he muſt beg " pardon of God and of the King, repeating after " the Regiſter. I will readily beg pardon of God, " replied he; but why of the King? I have not of- " fended him. You have offended the King, ſays Ra- " pin, by your writing againſt him. Guignard an- " ſwered; what I wrote on this ſubject, was before " Paris ſubmitted to him. What you ſay, replied " Rapin, is not true; and tho' it ſhould be ſo, you " have forfeited the pardon and general indemnity " which the King has granted to his ſubjects of Paris, " ſince their ſubmiſſion; ſince you know very well, " that the ſtricteſt orders were given, upon pain of " death, for every perſon to burn ſuch writings; but " as you kept ſuch, contrary to the tenor of theſe E- " dicts, you have offended both him and the public. " After both of them had conteſted above a quarter of " an hour, notwithſtanding all the reaſons and me- " naces of the ſaid Sieur Rapin, Guignard would not " make the Amende honorable, and was led to execution " without performing it (3). It is manifeſt that Guig- " nard, by ſaying he had not offended the King, ſup- " poſed that Henry IV was not King. We ſhall now " ſee that he is applauded for entertaining this opinion, " and never renouncing it.

(3) Cayet, Chronol. Nouvaire, ad ann. 1594, folio, 435 verſo.

(*) Sentence pronounced on Guignard.

(†) The place of execution.

[C] He has been applauded as a Martyr, by the apologiſt for John Chaſtel.] The tenth chapter of Part V of the apology for that villain, is intitled, The Martyrdom of Father Guynard juſtified in every particular. The author declares him happy in dying, " as one " who kept himſelf immoveable on the baſis and " ſolidity of the Goſpel Stone, i. e. of the obedience " and for the obedience of the Church (4). The " conſtancy of this man (†) to his laſt breath, adds " he (5), in refuſing to recognize him for King, " whom the Church has condemned; nor for law- " ful judges, thoſe who have ſeparated themſelves " from the Church, and judge contrary to the " Church; and for refuſing to repeat the words " by their ſentence, to make the amende honorable; " perſiſting in the truth, as well of what he had " preached, as of what he had writ in his Memoirs, " (for which reaſon his execution was haſtned, on the " ſpot, he being in his ſhirt, and not carried " back to priſon); all which circumſtances ſhew it " to have been a martyrdom, in as much as it had " no other foundation than a pure Catholic truth, " aſſerted and maintained till death incluſively, the " contrary of which is hereſy. This will ſerve as a " witneſs, in order for their proſecution one day; " to keep them chained hand and foot; to pronounce " their ſentence, and condemn them by a definitive " and irrevocable judgment, as this Glory is to all the " Saints (§): when he, who holds the truth eter- " nally (‡), who keeps the books of the eternal re- " giſter, in which all things are written, ſhall do " judgment to thoſe who ſuffer injuries (†)."

(4) Apologie pour Jehan Chaſtel, pag. 5. chap. 10. pag. 238.

(†) Father Guynard's conſtancy.

(5) Ibid. pag. 239.

(§) Pſalm cxlv.

(‡) Rev. xx.

(†) Pſal. cxli.

[D] We ſhall ſee what the Jeſuits anſwered, when they were reproached for giving him a place in their martyrology.] We will firſt cite a paſſage from the Anti-Coton (6). " The reader may aſk, if he pleaſes, " whether any Jeſuit ever condemned this Guignard " of treaſon and perfidy. Richeome, on the contrary, " in his apology, excuſes him as much as he can; " ſaying that Guignard treated the abovementioned " propoſitions only by way of a theological diſpute. " And in this we are agreed; for I alſo ſay, that to " kill the King, has always been one of the reſolutions " of the theology of the Jeſuits. If any Jeſuit, " through force or ſhame, condemns him, it is be- " cauſe he was not diſcreet enough; or for having " taken his time wrong, or for ſome ſuch reaſon. " This appears by the Jeſuits having ranked this " Guignard in the catalogue of their Martyrs, which " they got printed at Rome, in two ſizes, in one of " which Guignard is taken notice of, and not in the " other; in order that ſome copies of it might be " ſold and, with regard to his being executed, they had recourſe to turns of wit, endeavouring to extenuate his horrid tenets; and apologizing for him, by alledging that great numbers of people held the ſame tenets at that time [E]. It is certain that the whole Kingdom abounded

(6) Anti-Coton, pag. 18, 19.

" ſold in France without danger. Thus Bonarſcius " the Jeſuit, chapter the 8th of his Amphitheatre, " applauds this Guignard to the ſkies, although with- " out naming him, for fear of offending our King, " and yet ſo plainly as for us to diſcover him in the " following words: Shall I be ſilent of thee, O thou " ſtar ſhining both in heaven and earth; and laſt ex- " piation of the houſe which was to ſuffer nothing " more after this? No time ſhall ever expunge the " footſteps of thy death; after which he adds, all " France will joyn in my wiſhes. Tacebo ego te cla- " rum cœlo terraque ſidus, & ultimum nil amplius doli- " turæ domus innocuum piamentum. Nullus tui ſanguinis " veſtigia dies exteret, totaque in hæc vota mea ibit Gal- " lia." Now this can be applied only to Guignard who was a French Jeſuit, and who was the laſt Jeſuit executed in France. Father Coton anſwered among other things (7), that no Jeſuit had ever " diſallowed " the judgment of the Court, and that every perſon " had endeavoured to perſuade himſelf, that Guignard " had been juſtly condemned; that every particular " which is added to it is not equally certain, and " that many things muſt be aſcribed to the licentiouſ- " neſs of tongues, and the unhappineſs of the times (8); " that in caſe no Jeſuit has cenſured Guignard as " guilty of treaſon and perfidy, it is becauſe not one " of them was thoroughly acquainted with the proſe- " cution." I have ſeen, added he, ſeveral catalogues of Jeſuit-martyrs, " but not one in which Guignard is " found, though ſome of them were engraved in " Rome. But though he had been exhibited in this " manner elſewhere, who does not know the liberties " which Poets and Painters take?" He denies that the paſſage of Bonarſcius relates to Guignard; but this is denying a moſt indiſputable fact. Another apologiſt was not ſo peremptory, he only attempting to evade the queſtion. Here follows the anſwer he made the author of the Anti-Coton. " Thou art angry, that " Clarus Bonarſcius ſhould applaud this Father in " his Amphitheatrum, and call him ſhining ſtar in " heaven. How doſt thou know that he ſpeaks of " this Father, ſince he does not name him? Doſt thou " gueſs this, becauſe he was the laſt who was exe- " cuted in France! he is alſo the firſt. But ſuppoſing " thy conjecture ſhould be true, why art thou angry " at his extolling this Father as one of the bleſſed " ſouls (9)?... Now accuſe and complain of this " Clarus as much as thou pleaſeſt; but thou ſhalt " not keep me from applauding him for this praiſe; " and from praiſing, (as he does) this Father, becauſe " he was a great Divine, and did honour to France, " his native country, which thou diſhoureſt; and " I believe with the abovementioned Clarus, that " he is in heaven, if not in the rank of martyrs, " at leaſt in the number of the bleſſed; not becauſe " he was ſentenced to die, but for having forſaken " the vanities of this world in order to ſerve God " and the public, in a religious ſtate, to the utmoſt " of his power; for having lived the life of a true " Religious many years, for having taught the Ca- " tholic faith, and combatted hereſy, which thou de- " fendeſt under the cloak of the ſtate; in fine, for " having patiently ſubmitted to all the pangs and tor- " ments of death, and the ſhame of the execution, and " reſigned his ſoul as a good and zealous Catholic (10)." He had delivered himſelf thus in page 181. " Thou " art diſpleaſed at our ranking the ſaid Father in " the catalogue of Martyrs. Who told thee ſo, " except the ſpirit of lying, which directs thy pen? " For among the many thouſands of worthy people " who have peruſed this catalogue, not one of them " has found therein what thou pretendeſt to have diſ- " covered. If thou haſt ſeen this catalogue, (which " is moſt probable) why doſt thou ſpeak ſo confidently " of a thing unknown to thee? Haſt thou ſo little re- " gard to thine own honour as to take all falſe re- " ports as true; to publiſh them as matters of fact, " and thereby become thy ſelf the ſubject of laughter, " imagining to prejudice the Jeſuits?" Eudæmon Johannes the Jeſuit, in his reply to the Anti-Coton, denied that Guignard had been placed in the martyrology of the Jeſuits; and obſerves that the engraved prints of their Martyrs had been made and ſold by people, whoſe only view was profit, and who did not depend or belong in any manner to the Jeſuits (11). Verebaris nimirum, ne prolatiis Martyrum noſtrorum Catalogis, impudentiſſimi mendacii convincere, quæ te cauſa impulit, ut frigidam hanc Catalogorum varietatem dignam planè ſtupore iſto animi ſomniares. Nam neque mendacium tegis, & vecordiam tuam prodis: Martyrum enim noſtrorum effigies non à nobis, ſed ab exteris lucri ſui cauſa typis excuſæ, venales per orbem palam expoſitæ ab iis ſunt, ut in noſtra poteſtate nullo modo fuerit quis Martyrum Catalogus, aut à Gallis emeretur, aut in Galliam ab emptoribus importaretur. Neque vero ita ſtolidos quiſquam Jeſuitas exiſtimaturus eſt, ut cum rem eam aggrederentur, non viderent fieri non poſſe, ne Gignardus quoque cum cæteris martyribus vel ab amicis, vel ab inimicis in Galliam mitteretur. Mirum vero eſt, ſi cum utriſque generis Catalogi venderentur, non niſi unus in Galliam, iſque ad tuas unius manus venerit, in quo Gignardus legeretur, quem ſi apud te habes, profer ſodes, ſi non habes indica, apud quem inveniri poſſit. Nam nos quidem Romæ nunquam Gignardum adſcriptum Societatis Martyribus vidimus: numquam in Martyres retulimus. i. e. " You doubtleſs was afraid, that, ſhould we " produce our catalogue of Martyrs, you would be " found guilty of a moſt impudent lie, which made you " invent this ridiculous and ſtupid variety of cata- " logues. For you do not cloak your lie, but diſplay " your own folly. For the prints of our Martyrs, " engraved not by our ſociety, but by Foreigners " for the ſake of gain, are expoſed to ſale publicly " by them all over the world; ſo that it is no ways " in our power, what catalogue of Martyrs ſhall be " purchaſed by the French, or imported into France " by the buyers. Nor ſhould any one think the " Jeſuits ſuch fools, as to ſuppoſe they would attempt " to hinder Guignard from being ſent into France; " ſince this he would certainly be, with the reſt of " the martyrs, either by friends or enemies. It is " certainly ſtrange, that ſince both ſorts of catalogues " are ſold, one only ſhould come into France; and that " that very one ſhould fall into your hands, in which " Guignard appears. If you have it, I beg you to " produce it; but if you are not poſſeſſed of it, tell " us where it may be found: for we at Rome never " ſaw Guignard inſerted in the catalogue of Martyrs " of the ſociety, nor ever ranked him among the " Martyrs."

(11) Eudæmon Johannes, Confut. Anti-Cotoni, cap. 2. pag. 51.

(7) Réponſe Apologétique à l'Anti-Coton, pag. 42.

(8) Ibid. pag. 43.

(9) Richeome, Examen Catégorique de l'Anti-Coton, chap. 21. pag. 182.

(10) Richeome, Examen Catégorique de l'Anti-Coton, chap. 21. pag. 183.

[E] The Jeſuits... endeavouring to extenuate his horrid tenets; and apologizing for him, by alledging that great numbers of people held the ſame tenets at that time.] See Guignard's doctrine, which ſhould ſtrike every man with horror, in the remark [A]. In 1602, a book was printed, intitled The free and authentic Addreſs to the King, with regard to the re-eſtabliſhment (deſired of him) of the Jeſuits. We therein find among other particulars, " that if the Pope can " lay his hand on the SCEPTER of Kings and their " temporalties, as the Jeſuits ſay; it plainly follows " that when his Holineſs excommunicates a King, " he thereby is deprived, becomes a private perſon, " and is no longer King. And if he continues to " reign any longer, he is a tyrant. Whoever grants " the firſt propoſition, will be forced to admit the laſt. " Now the book in the hand-writing of John Guig- " nard the Jeſuit, and which he owned in full Par- " liament, the two chambers being aſſembled, contain " theſe two propoſitions, written in the moſt flagrant " and moſt outrageous ſtyle and manner; for, among " other particulars were the following, That the " Nero &c.... THAT IF HE OF BEARN CANNOT " BE DETHRONED WITHOUT A WAR, LET WAR " BE WAGED: THAT IF WAR CANNOT BE MADE " ON HIM, LET HIM BE ASSASSINATED. Your " Majeſty may ſee the original; this well deſerves " it (12)." Here follows the reply which Richeome made in the name of the Jeſuits (13). " MAY IT " PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY, I will not accuſe any " perſon

(12) Franc & veritable Diſcours pag. 31.

(13) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, pag. 135, 136.

" perſon here, nor plead for the perſon in queſtion " deceaſed; he is now out of the reach of the Par- " liament, and of proſecution of every kind; nor " ſhall I call for vengeance, any more than he does, " whom I believe to be praying in heaven for his " enemies. I obſerve only that your Majeſty had " pardoned whatever had paſſed of that kind; " and that after a prudent and royal manner, in " imitation of the Emperor Octavius (*), who cauſed " all papers relating to debts, which might occaſion " ſlanders conteſts, to be thrown into the flames; " and of the Emperor Conſtantine the Great (†), " who alſo burnt all contentious libels. And indeed, " had all thoſe of the League been proſecuted, who " wrote and ſpoke, there would never have been an " end of the troubles and enmities; and there were " thouſands of men at that time, who had worſe " pieces by them, than that which this man here " counterfeits and produces, who yet have continued " your very faithful ſervants and ſubjects: wherefore " then does he produce this writing againſt the " law of oblivion and againſt a perſon deceaſed? " If he were guilty of a fault that merited puniſh- " ment, has it not been ſufficiently expiated by " his execution? Ought he who had been execut- " ed ſo many years, to have, eight years after, his " proſecution revived, and his ſentence again paſſed " upon him? I ſay farther, that this piece (§) was " not written by this Divine, but it is a mere in- " vention of his adverſary." It is to be obſerved, that they pretend that John Guignard's piece was not ſuch as his adverſaries pretended it to be. The obſervations made by Richeome (14), in order to prove this, are extremely weak; but in caſe Henry IV, on this plea of falſification, did not demand to have a ſight of the original, and if he did not order the enemies of the Jeſuits, to prove inconteſtably, that the propoſitions which they aſcribed to Guignard were really in his book, he was guilty either of the moſt extreme negligence, or of a certain policy which might be looked upon as fear. Be this as it will, the author of the Anti-Coton, who doubtleſs was ſenſible that the Jeſuits had publicly denied what was publiſhed concerning the manuſcript of their brother, continued nevertheleſs to object the ſame propoſitions to them as the Franc & Libre Diſcours (Free and Genuine Addreſs); and to declare that they were extracted from Guignard's manuſcript, which was ſtill in the Records of the Court or Parliament (15). He was anſwered, that what he advanced is one of thoſe particulars which muſt be aſcribed to the licentiouſneſs of tongues, and the unhappineſs of the times; and that it was denied that the following words are ſtill extant in the records of the Parliament: if war cannot be made on him, let him be aſſaſſinated; in which words nevertheleſs the ſting of the ſerpent lies (16). Theſe words, replied another to him (17), contain the poiſon of thy calumny, but they are mere words and lies: for nothing like them is found in the records of the Parliament. Theſe are wretched replies; for the author of the Anti-Coton did not ſay, that theſe words were found in the regiſters of the Parliament, but in the manuſcript that was preſerved in the Rolls. In order therefore to have made a ſolid anſwer, they ſhould have aſſerted, that they were not in this manuſcript. Now this the Jeſuits who have refuted the Anti-Coton did not dare to aſſert; and therefore we may very naturally ſuppoſe, that this propoſition was in Father Guignard's writing. Several reaſons induce me to believe that it was.

I. It is declared in the Arret of Parliament (18), that conſidering the criminal Proſecution .... carried on againſt John Guignard .... for ſeveral Books which were ſeized in his Poſſeſſion, containing, among other Particulars, more than one Approbation of the moſt cruel and moſt inhuman murther of the late King, whom God abſolve, AND INFERENCES TO EXCITE TO THE MURTHER of the REIGNING MONARCH .... The Court had declared and declares the ſaid Guignard attainted, and convicted of High Treaſon; and of having compoſed and written the ſaid Books, containing ſeveral falſe and ſeditious Methods to prove, that it was lawful to commit the ſaid murther, AND THAT IT WAS PERMITTED TO KILL KING HENRY ——THE FOURTH, NOW REIGNING. We are therefore not to doubt but that the words of the Arret which are here in capitals, were grounded on thoſe, which according to the Author of the Anti-Coton, were contained in Guignard's Book.

II. Farther, who can doubt, but that Thuanus, who was preſident in the Parliament of Paris, had been poſſeſſed of this Jeſuit's Book? Now Thuanus, as well as a vaſt many more writers, declares that the words in queſtion were found in it (19).

III. The Jeſuits have never proved, that the Propoſitions which were objected to them, (as taken from this Manuſcript) were not inſerted in it. They have only denied, that the laſt was included in the Records of Parliament, which was not the thing in queſtion; and they have given only weak and ſpecious reaſons with regard to the reſt. They never boaſted their having ſeen the Book, and conſequently have only ſpoke at random of it; they did not offer the King, in imitation of their adverſaries, to ſhew him ſuch and ſuch Particulars in the Manuſcript preſerved in the Records of Parliament. Had they entertained any hopes of proving their Enemies guilty of Slander, they would have beſought the King or Parliament to ſuffer this Book to be examined before them, by any Commiſſioners they might appoint. Is it not plain, that by their not taking this ſtep, they have ſhewn to the World that they miſtruſted this Book; and that when they treated the propoſitions which their Adverſaries quoted from it as fictitious, they therein acted only as Lawyers? It is well known that pleaders treat as fictitious, ſo long as they poſſibly can, whatever makes againſt them. I know not whether the Adverſaries of the Jeſuits have taken the courſe above hinted at, viz. to pray the Parliament to appoint Commiſſioners to examine the Manuſcript in Preſence of the Parties concerned. Had Enquiries and Informations been made in a legal way, with regard to this Affair, it would have ſtruck the moſt obſtinate Caviller dumb for ever. But tho' no ſuch Enquiries have been made, we yet have reaſon to believe, that Guignard had inſerted in his treatiſe the Propoſitions laid to his charge.

This being ſo, we may juſtly be ſurprized at the falſe Idea which his Apologiſts give of it. To cite Richeome. " What was found in John Guignard's " Chamber, ſays he (20), and for which he was ſen- " tenced to die, was a queſtion he had formerly treated " on, when he read Divinity, viz. whether it be lawful " to kill a Tyrant; a queſtion which all the Canoniſts " and moral Philoſophers introduce in their diſcourſes; " and which Bodin among the moderns, has diſcuſſed " in his Republic." Richeome informs us in another place (21), that Henry IV. was ſatisfied with this Anſwer. It follows, that this Prince muſt have been ſacrificed at a very eaſy rate; this being a very bad Anſwer, ſince it gives a moſt unfaithful Character of John Guignard's Book. We have ſeen, above (22), the reflection which was made on this paſſage of Richeome, by the Author of Anti-Coton. It does not point out the Defect which is found in the words of this Jeſuit; and only endeavours to ſnatch an opportunity of laſhing the whole Society of the Jeſuits. So true it is, that ſome people had rather ſatyrize a whole Body, than refute one of the members of it in form.

The Jeſuit Eudæmon Johannes has improved on Richeome; he ſaying, that Guignard only diſputed for and againſt the Theological Queſtion, whether it be lawful to kill a Tyrant; and adds, that he did not merit Death for this, any more than thoſe Divines who exerciſe themſelves, not only on his queſtion, but alſo on that of the exiſtence of God (23). Theologica quæſtione in utramque partem ſcripta ſupplicium non magis meritus eſt, quam S. Thomas, quam reliqui Theologi, qui non modo de Tyrannorum nece, ſed de ipſa etiam Dei exiſtentia, in utramque partem diſputare ſoliti ſunt. But this ſurely is a moſt abominable miſrepreſentation of the State of things, ſince Guignard was not ſatisfied with examining a doubtful Queſtion, by producing Reaſons pro and con; but had declared for the affirmative, and expreſly approved of the Aſſaſſination of Henry III. and every the like action, which ſhould be executed on Henry IV.

Father Gretſer inſerted in one of his Books (24) an account of John Chaſtel's Tryal, in which father Guignard's Book is deſcribed, meerly as a Collection of different Paſſages, concerning the Theſis, whether it be lawful for private perſons to take away the life of a Tyrant. He adds that Guignard had mentioned the (*) Octavius Cæſar burnt all ſuch papers, as might afford matter for calumny. Suet. in Octav. c. 32.

(†) Conſtantin. Sozom. lib. 1. c. 16.

(§) Suppoſititious writing.

(14) Richeome, Plainte Apologetique, pag. 136, 137.

(15) Anti-Coton, pag. 15.

(16) Reſponce Apologétique à l'Anti-Coton, pag. m. 42, 43.

(17) Richeome, Examen Catégorique de l'Anti-Coton, pag. 181.

(18) Paſquier, Catechiſme des Jéſuites, liv. 3. chap. 18. pag. m. 447, 448.

(19) Si ſine bello deponi non poſſit, bellum cum eo gerendum. Si bellum geri non poſſit, de medio quavis ratione tollendum. Thuan. lib. 17. pag. 653. col. 2.

(20) Reſponce de René de la Fons, pour les Religieux de la Compagnie de Jeſus, chap. 14. pag. 72, 73.

(21) Examen Categor. de l'Anti-Coton, pag. 184.

(22) In the remark [D] citation (6).

(23) Eudæm. Johan. Confut. Anti-Cotoni, cap. 2. pag. 51.

(24) The Latin tranſlation of Réponſe de Richeome, diſguiſed under the name of François des Montagnes, au Plaidoié d'Antoine Arnauld.

abounded then with ſeditious preachers [F], and perſons, who, both in their writings and private converſations, hinted at the aſſaſſination of Princes like Henry IV, whom they ſuſpected the Dominican who aſſaſſinated Henry III. only in an hiſtorical way; and that he declared on the Scaffold that this was the true genius aud character of his Book; and that he had not writ a ſingle word in it that could offend the King (25), In cubiculo P. Joannis Guignardi Theologiæ Profeſſoris perbrevis Tractatus repertus eſt quem ipſe ante annos quatuor vel quinque conſcripſerat, quo illa Quæſtio continebatur à Doctoribus in Scholis paſſim tractata & agitata: Utrum Tyrannum qui ſe palàm hoſtem gerit Reipublicæ liceat privato occidere? De quâ Quæſtione Argumenta, quæ in utramque partem, ut ſolet, ad diſcutiendam diſquirendamque veritatem, à variis Auctoribus adferuntur, ibi quoque congeſta erant. Inter alia item narratione comprehenſum fuit, quid Frater Clemens Dominicanus Monachus in Henricum III. auſus fuiſſet. (26) Cum jam patibulum à longè conſpexiſſet cui appropinquabat, S. Andreæ Apoſtoli exemplo & verbis illud piè & alacriter conſalutavit; lætâ mente ac fronte ſcalas conſcendit, è quibus allocutus circumfuſam ſpectantium multitudinem: quod ſupplicii hoc genere enecaretur, aliam non ſubeſſe cauſam, quam quia ante annos quatuor vel quinque perbrevem Tractatum conſcripſiſſet, nullius injuriâ, nullius incommodo, in quem collegiſſet opiniones & ſententias Sanctorum Patrum, variorumque Auctorum, quos ipſi ante monumentis commendaverant de hac Quæſtione: Utrum liceat privato homini occidere manifeſtum Tyrannum; Tractatum illum ſe neque typis in lucem editum evulgaſſe; quin in aliorum manus eum nunquam perveniſſe. Regem ibi neque verbulo læſum aut offenſum. Quæ Patris verba omnem circumſtantem Populum in magnam commiſerationem inflexerunt. i. e. "In the Bed-chamber "of Father John Guignard, profeſſor of Divinity, a "very ſhort Treatiſe was found, which he himſelf had "wrote four or five years before; and wherein that "Queſtion was contained, which is treated and diſcuſſed by the Doctors in different Schools, viz. "Whether it be lawful for a private man to kill a "Tyrant, who is an open enemy to the State? The "arguments relating to which Queſtion, which are uſually brought by Authors on both ſides, for diſcuſſing and enquiring into the truth, were alſo there "collected. There was a narrative among other "things, concerning the attempt made by Father Clement a Dominican Friar on Henry III. When "he ſpied the Gibbet, to which he was approaching, "at a diſtance, he ſaluted it piouſly and chearfully, in "imitation of, and in the words of St. Andrew the "Apoſtle; he went up the Ladder with a joyful mind "and countenance, and from thence ſpoke to the crowd "of people who were round him. He obſerved to them "that the only cauſe of being condemned to die was, "that four or five years before he had written a very "ſhort Treatiſe, with no evil Deſign, nor to the prejudice of any Perſon; wherein he had collected "the opinions and ſentiments of the holy Fathers, "and of different Authors, with regard to the following Queſtion, Whether it be lawful for a private "perſon to kill a manifeſt Tyrant he declared that he "had neither ſent the Treatiſe in Queſtion to preſs, nor "ſuffered it to go out of his hands: that the King "was not therein offended by the leaſt word; "which Speech of this Father excited the higheſt "compaſſion in the minds of the people round "him."

(25) Appendix Apologiæ Franciſci Montani pro Societate Jeſu in Gallia, pag. 352.

(26) Idem, ibid. pag. 553.

What ſtrange diſguiſes, or rather what impoſtures! But it muſt be obſerved that Guignard, by having recourſe to an equivocation, might declare that he had not ſaid any thing which could offend the King; he not recognizing Henry IV as King.

I will now cite a very long paſſage from a Book which is rarely met with. This may apologize for the length of the quotation, not to mention that this paſſage will inform us, I, that Guignard had preached the ſame doctrine he aſſerted in the piece written by him; II, that it was pretended this doctrine was conformable to that of the antient Fathers, a deciſion of the Church, and the opinion of the whole Catholic Party. Here we have a mixture of truth and falſhood. "But the outrage, committed in the perſon of Father "Guynard, was ſo much the more cruel, as it was "altogether unjuſt; viz. for collections and memoirs, "extracted both from the Fathers and Decrees, to "ſhew that it is lawful to wage war againſt heretical "and excommunicated Princes, found in his ſtudy; "on ſpecial notice which had been given them to "ſearch it, and to make uſe of them for this purpoſe, "by a certain Miniſter, who, ſome years before, had "heard the ſaid Guynard, preaching, in Bourges "on this ſubject. For if men are to be ſentenced to "die for ſcholaſtic Collections, how injurious is this "to the holy Fathers from whence they were extracted? If theſe memoirs are damnable, why are not "thoſe from whence they were taken? And what will "become of St. Hilary, the Luminary of the French, "and Lucifer Biſhop of Sardinia, who wrote with ſo "much ſtrength in their times on this ſubject, againſt "the Emperor Conſtantius, and ſent their Books to "him? Likewiſe of St. Cyril, and St. Gregory Nazianzen, againſt Julian the Apoſtate? If theſe things "have been diſcuſſed from time immemorial, digeſted "by the conſent of the ancients, ratified by the judgment of the Church, which has the ſole right of "deciding theſe truths, and ſince received and publiſhed in the Divinity Schools; what are theſe upſtart cenſors who exclaim ſo highly againſt them? "Do they condemn the Holy Ghoſt? And do they, "who are ſtone-blind and leaders of the blind, dare "to judge of colours? And if ſuch collections are "condemned, and ſo ſeverely puniſhed, how will they "bear with thoſe of heretics? How will they endure "their books and peſtilent writings, their propoſitions and maxims, judged and condemned as they "are, as well by the Church as the Parliaments of "France? Why are their ſermons and blaſphemies a-"gainſt God and the Church, tolerated, nay even "approved by Edicts, and verified by them? And if "it is not lawful to wage war againſt an heretical "Prince, how is it lawful for a heretic to make war "on a Catholic King? And how can he be juſtified, "who, as chief or head of the hereticks, made "war all his life againſt the Catholic Kings of France? "which is all he has ſignalized himſelf by; for which "reaſon he has been condemned; and for which they "acknowledge him as their Prince? Why is it not "lawful againſt him, ſince, beſides the authority of "Decrees, he himſelf ſet the example? Add, that "this was no ways to be condemned, becauſe it was "a propoſition of the Schools, a general one, and "merely the doctrine of the Church: and, however "it be, belonging to the party in general; and conſequently covered, as well by the Edict of the treaſon of Paris, as by that which was afterwards publiſhed; ſince that, according to this way of reaſoning there was no one, not only of the ſaid ſociety; "but even no zealous Eccleſiaſtic, nay, not ſo much "as one Catholic, but ought to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment (27)."

[F] The whole Kingdom abounded at that time with ſeditious Preachers.] The abſolution which the Pope granted to King Henry IV, the 16th of September, 1595, did not put a ſtop to the evil. Read the following words of Cardinal d'Oſſat, which are extracted from a Letter wrote from Rome by him to the Duke de Villeroy, and dated the 14th of May 1601. "I "afterwards ſpoke to the Pope, of what the King deſired, viz. that his Holineſs would order his new "Nuncio to take care to oblige the Preachers in "France, to preach with the requiſite moderation and "diſcretion, without intermeddling with State-affairs, "the ſprings and motives of which were concealed "from them; nor to hold diſcourſes of a ſeditious "tendency; and I alſo left him a memorial in writing, a copy of which I now ſend incloſed. His "Holineſs anſwered, that he would order his new "Nuncio accordingly (28)." Amelot de la Houſſaie has made a moſt admirable commentary on this paſſage of Cardinal d'Oſſat. "It as ill becomes, ſays he, "Preachers, to talk about affairs of political Government, of which moſt of them are wholly ignorant; "as it does Politicians to determine in matters of "Faith and Religion. State-affairs are of ſo delicate "and tickliſh a nature, that it is almoſt always dangerous to ſpeak of them before the people, who are ſuſpected to favour the enemies of Popery. This perhaps was one of the reaſons which induced the Parliament of Paris to involve all the Jeſuits of France in the cauſe of John Chaſtel and John Guignard [G]. The Government might poſſibly hope, that, by baniſhing the Kingdom all thoſe who were looked upon as the chief authors of dangerous doctrines, the audaciouſneſs of the reſt of the Eccleſiaſtics would be reſtrained.

(27) Apologie pour Johan Chaſtel, Part 5. chap. 9. pag. 234, & ſeq.

(28) D'Oſſat, Lettre 273. pag. 369, 370. of tom. 2. Paris edit. 1698.

" ſeldom ſatisfied with a Government. Omni populo, " ſays Plutarch, ineſt malignum quiddam & querelum " in imperantes. I confeſs that all Preachers have a " worthy zeal; but as this zeal is not always accom- " panied with knowledge and prudence, it is for the " welfare of the public, that thoſe who have abilities " ſhould forbear, out of modeſty, to introduce theſe " ſubjects into their ſermons; in order to oblige others " to confine themſelves within the limits of the Chri- " ſtian doctrine, which exhorts every where to peace " and obedience. In the latter part of the reigns of " Henry III, and the former part of that of Henry " IV, the Doctors Aubry, Bouchey, Pelletier, Lince- " ſtre, Roſe, Feu-ardent, and ſeveral others of that " ſtamp, had profaned the Miniſtry of the Word to " ſuch a degree, that the pulpit, whence nothing " but truth ought to have been uttered, was become " in France the ſeat of calumny and impoſture; and " that the people, receiving infection at the ear, ador- " ed no other Croſs but that of Lorrain. It therefore " was abſolutely neceſſary, to reſtrain this phariſaical " licentiouſneſs, and to re-eſtabliſh a good diſcipline in " the ſacred Miniſtry, which the ſpirit of rebellion " had transformed into a myſtery of iniquity."

In caſe the Pope's Nuncio diſcharged the Commiſſion in a juſt and requiſite manner, he yet could not remove the irregularities and licentiouſneſs here complained of. Men ſtill preached and talk'd ſeditiouſly, and thereby gave riſe to conſpiracies againſt the life of Henry IV (29). The true Frenchmen, fautors of this independent power of the King, and attached to the monarchic maxims of the State, aſcribed to the Jeſuits in particular this republican and ultramontane ſpirit. Not that they look'd upon them as the firſt authors of it (30); they conſidering them only as its ſtrongeſt ſupport. This recalls to my remembrance a remark made in a Book printed in 1701, and entitled, The preſent State of the Faculty of Divinity of Louvain, treating of the conduct of ſome of its Divines; and of their ſentiments againſt the ſovereignty and ſecurity of Kings, and againſt the fourth Article of the Clergy of France. Theſe are three Letters written by a Canon of Tournay to a Doctor of the Sorbonne. A Letter of the Doctor in queſtion is prefixed to them, in which are the following words (31): " But whence is it, that in mentioning, " in your letters, the ſentiments of thoſe Divines, who " teach, that the ſubjects of Kings may be abſolved " from their oath of fidelity; you ſpeak only of ſome " particular Doctors of Louvain, of ſome Auguſtin " Friars, of ſome Recollects, and ſcarce any thing of " the Jeſuits? Don't you know that all theſe deteſta- " ble opinions are derived from them? It is not that " they are the firſt who maintained them; ſeveral Ca- " noniſts, ſome Divines, eſpecially the Italians, who " were ſubject to the Pope, had taught thoſe opinions " before them; but their writings were ſo very inſig- " nificant, that they fell of themſelves; and rather " diſgraced thoſe opinions than brought them into " vogue. But the Jeſuits have revived and heighten'd " them, and endeavoured to bring them into credit."

(29) See chap. 3. of the Anti-Coton.

(30) Compare the remark [S] of the article LOYOLA.

(31) Lettre d'un Docteur de Sorbonne à un Chanoine de Tournai, folio a 4.

[G] This perhaps was one of the reaſons which induced . . them . . to involve all the Jeſuits in France, in the cauſe of John Chaſtel and John Guignard.] Some people were ſurpriſed that, as there were but preſumptions, at moſt, that the Jeſuits had adviſed John Chaſtel to engage in his wicked attempt; they yet ſhould be baniſh'd the Kingdom by the ſame Arrêt which condemned the aſſaſſin. But to juſtify the conduct of the Parliament in this particular, it muſt be obſerved, that the action of that young fellow was not the foundation of the baniſhment to which the Jeſuits were ſentenced; it was only the occaſion of determining a cauſe which had been tried ſome months before; the cauſe I mean was that of the Univerſity of Paris againſt the Jeſuits. Anthony Arnauld, who pleaded for the Univerſity in queſtion, had concluded, " That the Court or Par- " liament might be pleaſed, in confirming the peti- " tion of the Univerſity, to order all the Jeſuits in " France to leave the Kingdom and all the Domini- " ons of his Majeſty, within a fortnight after notice " thereof ſhould have been given in every one of their " colleges or houſes, ſpeaking to one of them for " all the reſt. Alias; and upon their non-compliance " with this, wherever any of them ſhall be found in " France after the ſaid notice, they ſhall immediately " be condemned without any farther trial or proſecu- " tion, as guilty of high-treaſon, and attempting to " murther the King (32)." The judgment of the cauſe was referred to another time; but with regard to the affair of John Chaſtel, they complied with the petition of the Univerſity, and the methods employed by Anthony Arnauld. Some other Parliaments followed the example of that of Paris; but the Parliament of Toulouſe and that of Bourdeaux refuſed to do this (33); by which means the Jeſuits kept their ground in Languedoc and in Guyenne till their Re-call, which they did not obtain till the beginning of anno 1604.

(32) Cayet, Chronol. Novenaire, ad ann. 1594. folio 387 verſo.

(33) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 6. pag. m. 124.

(*) She is called Guillemete in French.

GUILLELMA * of Bohemia, head or chief of an infamous Sect which ſtarted up in Italy in the thirteenth Century, had impoſed ſo effectually upon the world by a ſpecious ſhew of extraordinary devotion, and played her part ſo well her whole life-time, that ſhe not only was reputed holy at her death, but alſo was revered as a Saint a conſiderable time after it. However, her frauds were at laſt diſcovered, and the deluſions ſhe had employed; and therefore her body was dug up, and burnt in 1300. She died in 1281, and had been buried in Milan, in the Church-yard of San Petro del Horto. Six months after ſhe was removed to the Convent de Caravalla (a), where a monument was erected to her memory, and the ruins of it are ſtill ſeen in the burying-place of the Friars. Puricellus and Boſſius, both learned men, have wrote upon this Sect, and are not agreed in all particulars. Boſſius was the firſt who ſtigmatized that Sect on account of the lewdneſs of its members [A]; but Puricellus has aſſerted, that the impurity had not paſſed from (a) Of the Order of the Ciſtertians, two leagues from Milan. It is erroneouſly called Claræ vallis. Mabillon, Muſæum Italic. Part 1. pag. 19.

[A] Boſſius was the firſt who ſtigmatized this Sect on account of the lewdneſs of its members.] This Sect was accuſed of a practice, wherewith many other Conventicles have been charged in various times and places. It was ſaid that the followers of Guillelma uſed to meet in a cave in the night; and that after ſaying certain prayers, they uſed to put out the candles, when the men and women uſed to couple together, as chance ordered it. Quos ipſi in quadam Synagoga ſubterranea conventibus antelucanis congregantes, cum ad modum Preſbyterorum induti certas orationes ad altare fudiſſent, extincto aut ſub modio abſcondito lumine ad fortuitos concubitus hortari conſueverant (1). It is added, that a rich Merchant, whoſe wife uſed to ſteal frequently to this cave, followed her once privately, and enjoyed her, a proof of which he gave by a ring he took from her finger; after which he informed againſt that Sect (2). We have already ſeen (3), that the like incident is related of the Fratricelli. I am of opinion that calumny has ſometimes been employed in this kind of accuſations; however, there is no doubt but that a great many lewd actions have been carried on in ſuch Conventicles. I don't at all wonder that ſo many huſbands do not approve, that their wives ſhould ſo zealouſly frequent

(1) Spondanus, ubi infra.

(2) Ex Spondano, ad ann. 1300, num. 10.

(3) Citation (12) of the article FRATRICELLI.

from their minds to their bodies; and that Guillelma and her followers were guilty of an abominable enthuſiaſm, which he proves by the judiciary enquiries of the Inquiſition (b) [B]. Guillelma's feſtival uſed to be ſolemnized three times a year at a grave, viz. on St. Bartholomew's day, which was that of her death; on the day of the removal of her body to Caravalla; and on Whitſunday (c). Her enthuſiaſtic viſions were not compleatly extirpated [C].

(b) Extracted only from the Muſeum Italic. of Father Mabillon, Part 1. pag. 19, 20.

(c) Idem, ibid.

quent certain devout aſſemblies; for Cupid never fails to get acceſs to them one time or other; and we cannot enough admire the docility of the fair-ſex, with regard to ſuch doctrines as are moſt repugnant to chaſtity (4). I do not ſo much wonder, that women ſhould have been prevailed upon to proſtitute themſelves under the Pagan Syſtem; it being, as we are told, a kind of divine worſhip, and the Goddeſs Venus was honoured after this manner. But it is amazing that, in the midſt of the Chriſtian world, after the endeavours that are uſed to check the impulſes of nature; and notwithſtanding the prudent counſels of mothers, and the pathetic exhortations of Preachers; the firſt hypocrite that comes in their way, has ſo great an aſcendant over them, as to engage them to commit a thouſand abominable actions. If he ſays to one of his female Devotees, as St. Aldhelme did (5), Come and lie down by me; I want to know whether you will be ſo powerful an inſtrument in the hands of Satan, as to compel me to yield to this temptation; ſhe obeys his command. If he ſays to her, like certain hereticks who were puniſhed by the Inquiſition of Toulouſe, Let us lie down ſtark naked one by the other; one upon the other; let us kiſs and tickle one another; we thereby ſhall give proofs of our ſpiritual ſtrength (6); he is obeyed. Can any thing be more tractable? Would not ſhe proceed farther if he were willing? Have not many women complied in polluting themſelves with the firſt who came in their way, after the lights were put out, in the Conventicles of the Brotherhood?

(4) See the article FRATRICELLI, remark [A] at the break.

(5) See the article FRANCIS of Aſſiſi, remark [C].

(6) Nonne eſt bene magnum meritum quod ſic ſtemus oſculando, amplexando, tangendo, & tamen non conſentiamus in perpetratione carnalis peccati? In the trials of the Inquiſition of Toulouſe, printed at Amſterdam in 1692, pag. 382. Erat opinio aliquorum, quod non debebat reputari homo vel mulier virtuoſus vel virtuoſa, niſi ſe poſſent ponere nudus cum nuda in uno lecto, & tamen non perficerent actum carnalem. Ibid. pag. 383.

Let us take notice of a docility or tractableneſs which, though not ſo criminal, is yet very odd. When men who are infirm want to have their natural heat reſtored, there are young women who will not ſcruple to lie with them, in order to do them that good office. A Panegyriſt of the fair ſex furniſhes me with a remarkable paſſage on this occaſion. "Phyſicians, ſays he (7), cannot deny, but that the heat of a young "woman's breaſt, applied to an old man's ſtomach, "may revive, keep up, and increaſe his natural heat. "The Royal Prophet was not ignorant of this, he "making choice (*) of the beautiful Shunamite, to "repel in that manner the frigidity of his old age. "And it is probable that, in imitation of David, "the grandfather of the laſt King of Navarre deceaſed, "called Monſieur d'Albret, being 120 years of age, "kept two handſome young women for that purpoſe. "He lived a long time on their milk only, himſelf "lying between them, and therefore were honoured "as Princeſſes in his Palace. However, I would not "adviſe every man to do the like, becauſe the ſame "might often befall them as happened to a Notary "in the Chatelet of Paris, Maſter Martin Maupin "by name. This man taking advantage of theſe "ſtories, made his jealous wife believe, that he was "often afflicted with David's diſtemper, in order "that ſhe might give him leave to make uſe of his "ſervant-maid to warm a little his ſtomach; and "the poor woman was ſometimes deceived by this." I ſhall obſerve by the way, that St. Jerom does not approve of our taking in a literal ſenſe, the incident related of the Shunamite. He explains it allegorically, and will have us underſtand thereby, that David, in the decline of life, was more intimately united to wiſdom. This great Luminary of the Church rejects the literal ſenſe with the utmoſt indignation. Nonne tibi videtur, ſi occidentem ſequaris litteram, vel figmentum eſſe de mimo, vel Attellanarum ludicra? ... Quæ eſt igitur iſta Sunamitis, uxor & virgo, tam fervens ut frigidum calefaceret, tam ſancta, ut calentem ad libidinem non provocaret? Exponat ſapientiſſimus Salomon patris ſui delicias, & pacificus bellatoris viri narret amplexus. Poſſide ſapientiam, poſſide intelligentiam &c (8), i. e. "Are you not of opinion, that by following "the letter, which kills, you make a mere farſical "fiction of it? ... What therefore is that Shunamiſh woman, both wife and virgin, ſo hot as to repel the cold; ſo holy as not to provoke him, when "heated, to luſt? Let the moſt wiſe Solomon, deſcribe his father's delights; and the pacific man relate the embraces of the warlike one: Get wiſdom, "get underſtanding &c."

(7) Billon, Fort inexpugnable de l'Honneur du Sexe feminin, folio 112.

(*) Reg. 3. cap. 1.

(8) Hieronym. Epiſt. ad Nepotianum, pag. m. 207.

[B] By the judiciary enquiries of the inquiſition.] Theſe enquiries, drawn up, in 1300, relate, that Andrew Saramita and Mayfreda Pirovana, the chief followers of Guillelma, aſſerted that ſhe was the Holy Ghoſt made fleſh in the female ſex, and born of Conſtantia, wife to the King of Bohemia; that ſhe was dead only according to the fleſh; would riſe before the general reſurrection, and aſcend to heaven in ſight of her diſciples; that ſhe had left, as her Vicar upon earth, Mayfreda Pirovana, a Nun of the Order of the Humiliatæ; that this Nun would ſing Maſs at the tomb of Guillelma; and that ſhe at laſt would poſſeſs the Holy Apoſtolical See; that ſhe would drive the Cardinals from it, and have four Doctors who would write four new Goſpels. Puricellus gives an ample account of all theſe horrid impieties: but his book was never printed, and it is not known whether it ever will. It does not appear that Guillelma boaſted this pretended incarnation; but even ſeems, from a falſe modeſty, to have affected not to own it (9).

(9) Mabill. in Muſeo Italico, Part 1. pag. 20.

[C] Her enthuſiaſtic viſions were not compleatly extirpated.] The author of the continuation of the chronicle of Nangis, ſays, in the year 1306, that one Dulcinius of Verceil, advanced the like doctrines with regard to the Holy Ghoſt (10). Poſtel and Joan his mother, gave into as wild chimæra's; and one could eaſily ſhew, that this kind of fanaticiſm revives from time to time. One would imagine, that the Devils had plotted together to bring Religion under petticoat government; and that, notwithſtanding the ill ſucceſs of ſo great a number of attempts, they renew them from time to time in different places.

(10) Idem, Mabillon, ibid.

☞GUILLIM or AGILLIAMS (JOHN), was of Welch extraction, and born in Herefordſhire, according to Dr. Fuller (a), and ſon of John Guillim of Weſtbury in Glouceſterſhire (b). He was educated in the Univerſity of Oxon; but in what College is uncertain (c). Mr. Wood informs us (d), that there was one of both his names who was a Student of Braſen-Noſe College in the year 1581, aged ſixteen, and another of Glouceſter-Hall in 1598, aged twenty five; both of whom were, according to the Matricula, born in Herefordſhire. Our author upon his leaving Oxford retired to Minſterworth in Glouceſterſhire, and was ſoon after called thence, and made one of the Society of the College of Arms in London, by the name of Portſmoutb (e); and on the 26th of February 1617 (f) was appointed Rouge Croix Purſuivant of Arms in ordinary. He publiſhed, The Diſplay of Heraldry at London 1610 in fol. [A]. He died May the 7th

(a) Worthies of England, in Herefordſhire.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 459. 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) Pat. 15. Jacob. 1. p. 10.

[A] He publiſhed the Diſplay of Heraldry at London 1510 in folio.] Mr. Wood tells us (1), that it was written moſtly (eſpecially the ſcholaſtical part) by John Barcham of Corpus Chriſti College in Oxon. And in another

(1) Ath. Ox. vol. 1. col. 459.

7th 1621; but where he was buried, unleſs at Minſterworth, is uncertain; for the Regiſter belonging to the Church of St. Bennet near Paul's Wharf in London (in which pariſh the Herald's Office is ſituated) doth not mention any thing of his burial there (g).

(g) Wood, ubi ſupra.

another place (2) he obſerves, that "this Book being "moſtly compoſed by him [Dr. Barcham] in his "younger years, he deemed it too light a ſubject for "him to own, being then, (when publiſhed) a grave "Divine, Chaplain to an Archbiſhop (3), and not "unlikely a Dean (4). Wherefore being well acquainted with John Guillim, an Officer of Arms, "he gave him the copy, who adding ſome trivial "things to it, publiſhed it with leave from the author, "under his own name, and it goeth to this day under "the name of Guillim's Heraldry." In 1660 there were publiſhed two editions of this book in folio, with many inſignificant, ſuperfluous, and needleſs additions to it, purpoſely to gain money from thoſe, whoſe coats of arms the Publiſhers added, without any conſideration had to the ſpoiling the method of the Book (5). One of theſe editions was publiſhed by Alexander Nowers, an Heraldry Painter, who was burnt in his bed in his houſe near Lothbury in London, by a fire which happened July the 25th 1670. The other edition was publiſhed by Richard Bloome, "then, ſays Mr. Wood (6), a kind of Arms-Painter, "but originally a Ruler of Books and Paper, who hath "ſince practiſed for divers years progging tricks, in "employing neceſſitous perſons to write in ſeveral "arts, and to get contributions of Noblemen to promote the work. What he hath done as to the "arms, creſts, and ſupporters of the Nobility, is moſt "egregiouſly erroneous, and falſe alſo in the quarterings. In 1679 he ſet forth the ſaid book again, "which is the fifth edition, with the pictures at "large of the Nobility, whereby the book is ſo much "diſguiſed, that I verily believe, if the author or "authors of it were living, they could ſcarce know "it." To the ſaid edition is added Analogia Honorum: Or, a Treatiſe of Honour and Nobility, &c. in two Parts: ſaid by Mr. Bloome, to be written by Captain John Logan of Idbury in Oxfordſhire. H

(2) Ibid. vol. 2. col. 19.

(3) Bancroft, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

(4) Of Bockyng in Eſſex.

(5) Wood, vol. 1. col. 459.

(6) Ibid.

GUIMENE (Princeſs of). Colomeſius ranks her among thoſe who were ſkilled in the Hebrew Language [A]. Menage informs us of a whimſical particular which bears ſome relation to this [B].

[A] Colomeſius ranks her among thoſe, who were ſkilled in the Hebrew Language.] His words are as follow: Lutetiæ apud D. Hardy hujus Principis Horas (ut vocant) vidi Hebraicè & Gallicè excuſas, unde colligo ipſam fuiſſe Hebraici idiomatis haud ignaram. Claruit circa A. 1625 (1). i. e. "I ſaw in Paris, at "Mr. Hardy's the Horæ or Prayer book of this "Princeſs, printed in Hebrew and French, whence I "ſuppoſe that ſhe underſtood Hebrew. She flouriſhed "about the year 1625."

(1) Colomeſ. Gall. Oriental. pag. 261.

[B] Menage informs us of a whimſical particular, which bears ſome relation to this.] "The Prince of "Guimené ſeeing a man (Mr. des Vallées) with ragged breeches, come every morning into the Princeſs's "chamber, aſked one day, what buſineſs he came "about. He ſhews me, replied ſhe, the Hebrew "tongue. Madam, ſays the Prince, he will ſoon ſhow "you his backſide (2)."

(2) Menagiana, pag. 189. of this 1ſt Dutch edit.

GUINDANO (SIGISMUND) a native of Cremona, having written a Poem on the actions of Charles V, preſented it to that Prince at ſuch an unlucky juncture, that he did not receive the leaſt reward for it. He did not chooſe a proper time [A]; for he paid his compliment, holding his manuſcript in his hand, at the time that Charles V was carrying on a mighty war in Germany. The Poet was ſo highly exaſperated at the unfavourable reception he met with, that he threw his Poem into the fire. It is thought that had he been in circumſtances to defray the expences of the impreſſion, he would not have been ſo cruel to the offspring of his mind; but his extreme poverty would not permit him to print his Poem; and this circumſtance, joined to his indignation, was motive ſufficient to prompt him to deſtroy it (a).

(a) Extracted from Lancellotti di Perugia in the 27th Diſingamo, tom. 1. of his Hoggidi, p. 273. He cites An. Campo, lib. 3. Aug. Ju. lib. 5.

[A] He did not chooſe a proper time.] All writers who intend to preſent works to a great man, ought to obſerve the counſel which Horace gives in the following lines.

Ut proficiſcentem docui te ſæpe diuque,
Auguſto reddes ſignata volumina, Vinni;
Si validus, ſi lætus erit, ſi denique poſcet.
Ne ſtudio noſtri pecces, odiumque libellis
Sedulus importes opera vehemente miniſter (1).

(1) Horat. Epiſt. 13. lib. 1.

"As I adviſ'd you oft before you went,
"I beg thee, Vinnius, now my books preſent
"To Cæſar, ſeal'd; when vexing cares are fled,
"If well, if merry, if he aſks to read:
"Left over-buſy in thy kind deſigns,
"You chuſe ill hours, and make him hate my lines."
Creech.

The meaning of this is, that a writer ſhould take care to avoid improper ſeaſons; for all Princes are, in this reſpect, of Auguſtus's humour; they will not be interrupted at an unſeaſonable hour.

——— Niſi dextro tempore, Flacci
Verba per attentam non ibunt Cæſaris aurem (2).

(2) Horat. Sat. 1. lib. 2. ver. 18, &c.

"Well, when occaſion ſerves, my muſe deſigns
"To try that way, but my unpoliſhed lines,
"Unleſs by chance a happy time appears,
"Will never paſs the judging Cæſar's ears."
Creech.

An author may very probably miſcarry, if he does not pitch upon the propitious minute; and what the Romans call, molles aditus, molliſſima fandi tempora. Our Guindano had this ill fortune, he chuſing an improper time; he attempting to preſent a Poem conſiſting of XII Books, to an Emperor, who was involved in a very troubleſome war (3). O eſſendo preſentati con poco garbo, ò non à tempo trovandoſi egli occupatiſſimo nelle guerre d'Allemagna, non bebbe mai niente (4).

(3) Havea queſti compoſto dodici libri de fatti di Carlo V Imperadore, intitulati Auſtriados. Lancelotti de Perugia, Hoggidi, Part 1. cap. 26. p. 273.

(4) Idem, ibid.

GUISCARD. This name the Lords of la Coſte, la Bourlie, la Laurie, &c. have given to their family, which is one of the nobleſt and moſt antient in the Province of Quercy. They made choice of this name out of reſpect to one of their anceſtors, whoſe proper name was GUISCARDUS. The cuſtom was not yet eſtabliſhed, of preſerving the inſtruments or monuments of the origin of families, for the uſe of their poſterity; but nevertheleſs, theſe Lords can produce inſtruments or writings near five hundred years old; for they prove, not only that they are poſſeſſed of lands which were never out of their family, mily, during ſo many Centuries; but alſo that their Nobility has been tranſmitted in all its ſplendor, and without interruption, to Count de GUISCARD, who treads (a) in the ſteps of his renowned anceſtors, and ſhews himſelf worthy of the glory they throw round him. BERNARD DU GUISCARD forms the firſt degree of the genealogy of this Houſe. The account which has been tranſmitted of his actions, makes it believed, that his family had ſignalized itſelf before the age in which he lived. He ſtiled himſelf Knight in all the leaſes of his lands, from the year 1247 till 1283. This is a manifeſt proof that he had ſignalized himſelf in war; and that his ſervices had procured him this title, which was then, as it was many ages afterwards, the moſt honourable reward that could be beſtowed on military valour. There are fourteen degrees, in a direct and male line, from this Bernard to Count de Guiſcard; and this ſeries of ſucceſſions exhibits ſeveral illuſtrious alliances, and many perſons of diſtinguiſhed merit [A]. But it muſt nevertheleſs be confeſſed, that theſe perſons who have reflected the greateſt luſtre on this houſe, are GEORGE DE GUISCARD Lord de la Bourlie [B], and LEWIS DE GUISCARD his eldeſt

(a) I write this in March 1700.

[A] Several alliances, and many perſons of diſtinguiſhed merit.] Here follows ſome of them. BERTRAND DE GUISCRRD Damoiſeau (1), third ſon of BERNARD (2) DE GUISCARD, left a ſon named GAILLARD DE GUISCARD, "concerning whom an "uncommon record is preſerved in the Archives. "Having been knighted, as his forefathers had been, "one Peter de la Tour, who in all probability ſerved "under him, and was upon his death-bed, having "entreated Guiſcard to honour him with the ſame "title, he accordingly beſtowed it upon him anno "1334. In infirmitate qua deceſſit, fecit ſe militem fieri "per Gaillardum Guiſcardum militem, & per eundem "Guiſcardum inſignia militaria ſibi dari. King Philip "de Valois approving this action, by his Letters Patents dated at Paris in Auguſt 1337, confirmed "that Knighthood, and ordered that the poſterity of "him on whom it had been beſtowed, ſhould enjoy, "by vertue of it, all the privileges belonging to Nobility. The abovementioned Gaillard de Guiſcard "ſerved alſo in the wars of Gaſcogne, anno 1339, "with four Eſquires; under the command of Meſſire "Peter de Marmande Senechal of Perigord, according "to an account given of that year by Bartholomew de "Drack, Treaſurer of the war. But it is not known "whether he married and left any children (3)."

(1) This title was given, by way of diſtinction, to ſuch children of good families as were not yet knighted.

(2) He was ſon to this Bernard de Guiſcard, with whom the genealogy begins.

(3) Hoſier, Genealogie de la Maiſon de Guiſcard. See citation (10).

BERNARD DE GUISCARD IV of that name, Lord de la Coſte and de la Laurie, Damoiſeau, married the 28th of April 1315, Helis de Montaigu, daughter and heireſs of Bernard de Montaigu, Lord Montcuc. "His ſeat or caſtle of la Coſte being "at that time an important fortreſs, Galois de la "Baume, Lord of Valſin, who had the conduct of "the war in Languedoc, and was born in Cahors, "gave him the government of it; and kept him in "the pay of Charles V, by Letters dated the 10th "of May 1348, with ſix men of arms, and twelve "foot Sergeants, to defend that place. There is "reaſon to believe, that he preſerved it out of intereſt "as he had promiſed to do; for he made his will "in that caſtle the 27th of April 1353 (4)."

(4) D'Hoſier, Généalogie de la Maiſon de Guiſcard.

WILLIAM BERTRAND DE GUISCARD, II of that name, married, firſt, the 5th of October, 1413, Margaret de Veirac, daughter of Guy de Veirac, Lord of Merle and of Coſſac in the Dioceſe of Tulles; and afterwards Helis de Landore, ſiſter to Bernard de Landore, Viſcount de Cadars in Roüergue. ANTHONY DE GUISCARD Lord of La Coſte and of Montcuc, married, the 16th of October 1492, Iſabella de Lomagne, daughter of John de Lomagne, Lord of Montagu in Agenois. JOHN DE GUISCARD I of that name, Gentleman in ordinary of the King's bedchamber, married the eleventh of Auguſt 1528, Souveraigne de Ricard de Genouillac, daughter of John de Ricard ſirnamed de Genouillac, Knight, Baron of Gourdon, and Lord of Genouillac, of Vaillac, and of Margaret Daubuſſon. JOHN DE GUISCARD his ſon, one of the hundred Gentlemen of the King's Houſhold (5), married, the 12th of November 1554, Frances de la Barthe, daughter to Matthew de la Barthe, Baron of Montcornel, and firſt Baron of Aſtarac, and of Catherine de Lomagne, Lady de Montarac. JOHN DE GUISCARD his ſecond ſon, Lord of Puy de Sirects, married Agnes de Temines the 5th of January 1625.

(5) This was, at that time, a company, compoſed of none but perſons of quality.

[B] GEORGE DE GUISCARD, Lord de Bourlie.] This family was divided into two branches, about the cloſe of the fifteenth Century, viz. that of the Lords of Puys de Sirects (6), and that of the Lords of Cairou and of Bourlie. The head of the firſt was ſecond ſon of John de Guiſcard II of that name. The chief of the other was GABRIEL DE GUISCARD, Lord of la Gardelle, of Cairou and of la Bourlie, third ſon of John de Guiſcard, ſecond of that name. This Gabriel de Guiſcard had eight ſons, the ſixth of which is the Count de la Bourlie, whoſe name is in the text of this remark. He was born the 19th of Auguſt 1606. "He has been ſucceſſively Captain of Foot "and of Horſe, in the regiment of Vaillac and of Coa"lin. One of his legs was ſhattered with a muſket"ball, at the deſcent into the Iſlands of St. Margaret "and St. Honorat; was run thro' the arm with a pike "at the battle of Rocroy; and having ſignalized "himſelf in that of Lens (7), at the ſiege of Arras, "and on ſeveral other occaſions, he was appointed, "(on account of his high deſerts) one of the King's "Penſioners in 1644. He was made Serjeant of Bat"tle, and Governor of Courtray, anno 1647. The "year following, the late Queen Mother thought him "worthy of the choice ſhe made of him for Sub-Go"vernor to the King. He was afterwards appointed "Counſellor of State in 1649; Marſhal de Camp in "1651; and his Majeſty was ſo well pleaſed with his "ſervices in his ſeveral employments, that he gave "him, in 1662, the command of the Sovereignties "of Sedan, Raucour and Saint Mange; and he had "the government of that important place in 1671, he "having been chief Bailiff of it. His Majeſty was of "opinion, that he could not beſtow upon a more faith"ful perſon, the command of the Cities and Citadels "of Dunkirk, Bergues, Furnes and Graveline; and "of the Troops appointed for the defence of that fron"tier, which was beſtowed upon him, with the power "of Lieütenant General anno 1672. The next year "he defeated near Furnes, with 500 troopers, upwards "of 800 of the enemy, a great part of whom were left "dead in the field, and brought 140 priſoners into "Dunkirk. Laſtly, crowned with the reputation, "which he had juſtly acquired by his wiſdom and "valour, during the ſpace of a very long life, he "died the 9th of December anno 1693, aged four "ſcore and ſeven years, and four months. He had "been married at the Royal palace, (in the preſence of "the King and the late Queen-Mother the 28th of "November 1648) to Genevieve de Longueval, Lady "of Fourdrinoy in Picardy, daughter to Anthony de "Longueval Lord of Tenelles and of Lemont, and of "Elizabeth de Margival; and left four children by "this Lady." LEWIS DE GUISCARD Count de Neuvy, of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the following remark. "JOHN GEORGE DE GUISCARD, born the 27th of "September 1657. He gave great proofs of his va"lour, when Enſign in the Colonel's Company of "the regiment of Normandy, at the defence of "Grave, where he received a muſket-ſhot in the head, "and whilſt he was Captain in the Regiment of "Guards, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery in "ſeveral battles and ſieges. He was ſhot through the "body at that of Ypres; and was afterwards Colo"nel of the regiment of Normandy, at the head of "which Count de Guiſcard his brother had ſerved "with great diſtinction. ANTHONY DE GUISCARD, "born the 27th of December anno 1658, Abbot of "Bonnecombe in Roüergue, and Prior de Dieu in

(6) It is extinct.

(7) It is to be obſerved that the battle of Lens was fought in 1648; and therefore either one name is put for another, or there is a ſmall error in the date.

eldeſt ſon [C]. Read the following remarks. The arms of this family are argent, a bend gules; the ſupporters, two golden lions; and the creſt, a lion naiſſant in like manner (b).

(b) Extracted from the genealogy of the Guiſcard family, drawn up from Records in Dec. 1696, by Mr. D'Hoſier.

" Souvienne. GENEVIEVA CATHERINA DE GUIS-
" CARD was married the 30th of October 1683, to
" Camillo Savari, Count de Breves (8)."

(8) Généalog. de la Maiſon de Guiſcard.

It is to be obſerved, that the eldeſt branch is now in the 15th degree, in the perſon of FRANCIS DE GUISCARD Lord of St. John and of la Coſte.

[C] ... LEWIS DE GUISCARD, his eldeſt ſon.] He was born the 27th of September 1651, and " ever " ſince he has been in the troops, has had uſeful and " important employments in the King's ſervice. For,
" animated by the ſame ſentiments which had gained
" Count de la Bourlie his father all the glorious re" wards with which he had honoured his courage; he " began by ſerving in the regiment des Vaiſſeaux,
" which was beſtowed upon him in 1671. He ſerv-
" ed in this quality the year following, at the ſieges
" of Orſoy, Rhimberg, Duiſburg, and Zutphen; and " at thoſe of Maeſtricht and Unna, in the country of " Marck in 1673. The King made him Colonel of " the regiment of Normandy in March anno 1674;
" immediately after which he entered Grave, which " was already inveſted, and where the ſaid regiment
" was. He forced a guard, ſixteen of whom he car" ried priſoners into the place, with thirty troopers
" belonging to the garriſon of Mazeyck, whom he " had taken for a convoy. He was dangerouſly
" wounded by a muſket-ſhot in the arm-pit, at the end " of the ſiege, when he commanded the Infantry. The " following year he was again wounded with a muſket-
" ſhot in the head, at the ſiege of Bouchain; and " having been detached, the ſame campaign, to bring
" ſix battallions to the body commanded by Mar-
" ſhal de Crequi near Thionville; he fought in the " battle of Conſarbrick, and was ſo happy as to march,
" to Metz, the ſhattered remains of the Infantry, with
" the men who ſurvived of the regiments of Nor" mandy and Bourlemont. He ſerved the following " year in Germany, and was at the ſiege of Friburg
" and Fort Khel; as likewiſe, in 1684, at the ſiege
" of Luxemburg. He ſtill ſignalized himſelf with ſo
" much bravery, in all places where he had occaſion
" to act at the head of the body in queſtion, that his
" Majeſty granted him, in 1689, a commiſſion of Bri" gadier in his Infantry; and inveſted him with the " power of commanding in Dinant, and a general
" inſpection over the troops garriſon'd in that town,
" and in thoſe of Charlemont, of Rocroy, of Beau-
" mont, and of Philippeville. Having diſcharged the " duties of that poſt with the utmoſt vigilance and ac" tivity (9), the King was pleaſed to appoint him, the " year following, Marſhal de Camp, and commander
" of Rocroy and Charlemont, with orders to throw
" himſelf into Philippeville, in caſe it ſhould be at" tacked. And, as his wiſe conduct, and his indefa" tigable application to the duties of his different
" poſts, to which his bravery had deſtined him, were
" now preparing new rewards for him; Count de la
" Bourlie having reſigned the government of Sedan,
" the King thought it was but juſtice to beſtow it on " Count de Guiſcard his Son. Accordingly it was " given him in 1692, and his Majeſty, pleaſed with
" the zeal and intrepidity with which he had executed
" his orders in all places, judged that he ought to en-
" truſt to his courage only, the guarding of the city
" and caſtle of Namur; the moſt important fortreſs in " Europe, which he had lately conquered at the head
" of his army. He there was inveſted with the power
" of commanding as governor; and this ſo glorious
" choice was accompanied with the poſt of Lieutenant-
" general, with which he was honoured the 30th of " March 1693. His Majeſty gave him the command " of a conſiderable corps, to inveſt Huy, in order to " make a diverſion, and thereby favour the ſiege of " Furnes, carrying on by Marſhal Boufflers; which " was ſucceſsful, by their keeping on that ſide part of " the enemy's troops commanded by the Earl of Ath-
" lone. He ſuſtained in Boſſu the vigorous attack
" made by the enemy on a convoy, which he was " marching from Maubeuge to Marſhal de Luxem-" burg's army, with ſuch a reſolution as was the more " extraordinary, ſince he had no more than thirteen
" ſquadrons, and Mr. du Puy, Lieutenant-general of " the Armies of Spain, having eighteen ſquadrons,
" and two thouſand four hundred foot, belonging to
" the garriſon of Charleroy, was entirely defeated and " put to flight, a great number of his ſoldiers being " ſlain and taken priſoners. He was ſo fortunate as " to be preſent at the victory of Nerwinde, he having " marched out of Huy by day-break. Marſhal de Lux-
" emburg poſted him on the left wing, where he did " great ſervice. Having gained a new acceſſion of " glory, by the defence of Namur, attacked by all the " forces of the Allies; he was honoured, by his Ma-
" jeſty, with the order of the Holy Ghoſt, to which " he was nominated the 17th of December 1695; and " he was received with the uſual Ceremonies, the 1ſt
" of January of this year 1696. He married, the " 24th of February 1677, Angelica de Langlée,
" daughter of Claudius de Langlée, Knight, Lord of " l'Epicheliere, Marſhal-general of the Camps and " Armies of the King, by Catharine Roze; and there
" ſprung from this marriage LEWIS AUGUSTUS DE
" GUISCARD, born the 20th of May 1680, and Co" lonel of the regiment of Guiſcard, &c. CATHERINE
" DE GUISCARD, born the 12th of June, anno " 1688 (10)."

(9) I have followed the original which I had by me, but it is evident the copy is incorrect in that place; and that we muſt not aſcribe to Mr. D'Hoſier, any of the errors in conſtruction that may be found in it.

(10) D'Hoſier, in the Genealogy of the Guiſcard Family, drawn up from the Records in Dec. 1696.

In this manner Mr. D'Hoſier wrote, in December 1696. He would not mention at that time, either the embaſſy of Sweden, to which Court de Guiſcard was nominated, anno 1698 (11); nor of the immature Death of this Count's only ſon. The young Lord had been brought up with wonderful care, and made a moſt happy Progreſs. Nature had indued him with the fineſt Diſpoſition; he being fond not only of military Exerciſes, but alſo the Belles Lettres and Philoſophy, in which he had made very great Advances. He had viſited the Engliſh Court in the retinue of Count Tallard, Embaſſador from the French King, anno 1698, and attended his Father to Stockholm in 1699. He was preparing to go to Rome, when being arrived at Vienna in Auſtria, he there fell ſick of the Small-Pox, which carried him off in a few days about the end of December 1699, to the great regret of all who had the honour to know him, and who might have admired his exalted Qualities. As Count de Guiſcard was ſo tenderly fond of this only ſon, he muſt have poſſeſſed a moſt ſteady and reſolute mind, otherwiſe he could never have bore up under ſo ſevere a ſhock.

(11) He has exerciſed this employment for theſe ſeven or eight months. I write this in March 1700.

GUISE (JAMES DE) a Franciſcan Friar, was born at Mons in Hainault. He was Doctor of Divinity, which he taught, as alſo Philoſophy and the Mathematics, about twenty five years in the Convents of his Order. He applied himſelf with uncommon aſſiduity to illuſtrate the antiquities and hiſtory of his native country; but he adopted fabulous traditions, he aſſerting, that the place of his birth had been founded by the Trojans. The epitome only of his chronicle of Hainault (a) has been publiſhed [A], and

(a) [Extracted from Val. And. Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 411.

[A] The Epitome only of his Chronicle of Hainault has been publiſhed.] His Epitome is not in Latin, in which tongue the Chronicle is written, but in French, and was printed, anno. 1531, in folio (α). Here follows the Title of it: Les illuſtrations de la Gaule Belgique, Antiquitez du pays de Hainault & de la grand cité des Belges, à preſent dite Bavay, dont procedent les chauſſees de Brunehaut, & de pluſieurs Princes qui ont regné, & fondé pluſieurs villes & citez audit pays, & autres choſes ſingulieres & dignes de mémoire, advenues durant leurs regnes, juſques au Duc Philippes de Bourgogne dernier decedé. Par Frere Jacquees de Guiſe Religieux l'Ordere de Saint Francois, Oeuvre diviſe en ſix Volumes, deſquels il 'ny a que les trois prémiers imprimez.

and there is no probability that the whole work will ever be printed. The author died at Valenciennes the 6th of February 1399 (b). Moreri has committed ſome errors [B].

(b) Valerius Andreas, ibid.

primeæ. i. e. " the illuſtrations of Gallia Belgica, " the antiquities of Hainault, and of the great city of " the Belgæ, now called Bavay, where the cauſeway " of Brunehault begins ; and of ſeveral Princes who " have reigned and founded many cities in the ſaid " country, and other remarkable things which hap- " pened in their reigns, till that of the late Philip " Duke of Burgundy : by Friar James de Guiſe, a " Franciſcan : a work divided into ſix volumes, the " three firſt of which only have been printed." In this manner Andrew du Cheſne gives the title of this work (1). Du Verdier does not give it ſo fully, but he has not forgot a circumſtance which du Cheſne has omitted; viz. that this book was tranſlated into French (2). La Croix du Maine falſely believed that James de Guiſe was author of that verſion (3). He adds, that the Latin Chronicle of this work is to be ſeen in manuſcript in the convent of the Friars Minors, of Valenciennes, as is declared by John le Maire in his Illuſtrations des Gaules; that it was written at the requeſt of Count William de Haynau, and that it extends to the year 1244. This laſt circumſtance does not agree with the title of the Epitome; for there was no Duke of Burgundy, named Philip, who died at that time. Philip de Rouvre, the laſt Duke of Burgundy of the firſt branch, died the 21ſt of November 1361. Valerius Andreas obſerves (4) that the Paris edition of 1531 is intitled Extraict des Chronicques de Jaques de Guiſe; and that there was, at Mr. Gevart's at Antwerp, another epitome of theſe Chronicles, drawn up by order of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy. He alſo ſays, that the manuſcript of this Chronicle of Hainault, in three volumes, was in the poſſeſſion of the Franciſcans of Mons.

(1) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. des Hiſt. de France, pag. m. 198.

(2) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Franc. pag. 608.

(3) La Croix du Maine, pag. 188.

(4) Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 411.

§ (a) The Chronique de Hainault, Paris 1531, in folio, in a Gothic letter, is only an abridgment of the Latin of James de Guiſe. See the end of the table, and the advertiſement of this Chronicle. REM. CRIT..

I was informed yeſterday (5) by Mr. le Baron le Roy, a Gentleman of great curioſity and abilities, that a little before his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty beſieged the city of Mons in 1691, he wrote a letter to the Father Guardian, or Warden of the Convent, in which that manuſcript was lodged, to deſire that he would get ſome chapters of it copied for him ; and that the Father Guardian anſwered, that having begun to copy a little of it, he had diſcontinued his work, he not being able to decypher the author's letters and abbreviations ; and that the moſt experienced Monks in his convent were no leſs puzzled than himſelf. Mr. Baron le Roi added, that during the ſiege, a Lay-brother of this convent ſet himſelf up as Gunner; and ſhowed, that he had not forgot the experience he had formerly acquired in this art. That a deſerter to the French camp, having told this, ſeveral bombs were thrown on that convent, which by that means, was ſet on fire ; ſo that the manuſcript of James de Guiſe was conſumed together with the library of the Monks.

(5) I write this in Nov. 1697.

[B] Moreri has committed ſome errors.] I. James de Guiſe was not a native of Valenciennes, but of Mons. It is to be obſerved by the way, that la Croix du Maine, who conjectured that he was born in Guiſe (6), is miſtaken ; beſides, he did not know that this Friar lived in the fourteenth century. II. He ſhould not have ſaid that he died in 1348 or 1399 ; for authors do not vary in this manner, with reſpect to the year in which James de Guiſe died. Their variations conſiſt in this, viz, that ſome begin the year in January, and others after Eaſter. According to the latter he died 1398 ; and. according to the former, in 1399 (7).

(6) La Croix du Maine, pag. 188.

(7) See Valerius Andreas, Biblioth. Belgic. page 411.

GUISE, a city of Picardy on the river Oiſe, in the dioceſe of Laon, was the antient patrimony of the younger brothers of the Houſe of Lorrain, and gave the title of Duke and Peer in January 1527 (a). It ſuffered a variety of revolutions during the wars of Francis I and Charles V. It was taken by ſtorm in 1536. As the caſtle, which could have held out, was ſurrendred in a cowardly manner, the Captains were branded with infamy on that account (b) ; but in 1543, Ferdinand de Gonzaga, who beſieged it, having early notice of the march of Francis I, raiſed the ſiege ; and was charged with ſo much vigour in his retreat, that two thouſand of his ſoldiers in the rear of his army were cut to pieces, and a great number taken priſoners (c). In 1636, the Spaniards who had made ſome conqueſts in Picardy, did not think it adviſeable to beſiege Guiſe ; they fearing that Count de Guebriant who commanded in it would make a vigorous reſiſtance (d). They could not make themſelves maſters of it in 1650, though all things ſeemed to declare in their favour. See the book intitled, Le Triomphe de la Ville de Guiſe. It was compoſed by John Baptiſt de Verdun, a Minim, and was printed at Paris anno 1687. Notice is taken of it in the Journal des Savans (e). We ſhall ſee elſewhere (f), that the Marquis de Bougi was chiefly inſtrumental in defeating this enterprize of the Spaniards.

(a) Du Cheſne, Antiq. des Villes de France, pag. m. 438.

(b) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. 595.

(c) Ibid. Hiſtoire de France, tom. 2. pag. 1021.

(d) Le Laboureur, Hiſt. du Maréchal de Guebriant.

(e) Of May 17, 1688. In the Dutch edit. put 1550 for 1650.

(f) In the remark [G] of the article REVEREND.

GUISE (CLAUDE of Lorrain Duke of) ſecond ſon to Renatus Duke of Lorrain, went and ſettled in France, after having attempted in vain, as we are told, to exclude Anthony his elder brother from ſucceeding to the honours and eſtate of their father [A]. As

[A] He attempted in vain (as we are told) to exclude Anthony his elder brother from ſucceeding to the honours and eſtate of his father.] Here follows what Thuanus informs us on this ſubject, in relating the ſpeech which it is ſuppoſed that la Renaudie made to his accomplices (1). Renatus Duke of Lorrain, marrying Margaret d' Harcourt (2) heireſs of Tancarville, obliged her, by the marriage contract, to make over to him, by deed of gift, all her poſſeſſions. But after this the ſaid Duke, upon pretence of her being ugly ; and then of her being barren, cruelly divorced her without reſtoring her poſſeſſions ; and married the Duke of Guelderland's ſiſter, in his firſt wife's life time. His ſecond wife brought him, among her children, Anthony who ſucceeded him, and the Claudius of the preſent article. The latter being born after the death of Margaret d'Harcourt, pretended that as Anthony was born in that Lady's life-time, he ought to be reputed a baſtard, and conſequently was incapable of ſucceeding his father ; ſo that he was not aſhamed to diſhonour his own mother, by making her paſs for a concubine, in order to make himſelf Duke of Lorrain, in prejudice of his elder brother. But having failed in his attempt, he left his country and retired into France. Et Claudius quidem . . Antonium fratrem, quod is viva Margarita ex Philippa natus eſſet, tanquam ex adulterio procreatum Lotaringiæ ſucceſſione dejicere voluit, ne communis quidem matris pudori parcens : quod cum fruſtra tentaſſet, & in patria amplius eſſe non poſſet, ſpes iniquas ſecum in Galliam . . . attulit. (3). I am not very ſure that this is true ; and I give little credit to all that ſpeech-makers ſay, in ſuch circumſtances as la Renaudie was in : but this I am certain of, that a man who is fired with a ſtrong thirſt of ambition, cares

(1) At the time of d'Amboiſe's conſpiracy, anno 1560.

(2) Daughter of William d'Harcourt Count of Tancarville.

(3) Thuanus, lib. 24. pag. 490, ad ann. 1560.

As he was a man of great bravery and exalted merit, he gained prodigious eſteem. He married a Princeſs of the blood (a), and was raiſed to very high employments. It was in his honour that the Earldom of Guiſe gave title to a Duke and Peer. Counties, &c. had never been honoured in this manner, except in favour of Princes of the blood. It is ſaid that Francis I was diſpleaſed with him on ſome occaſions [B], and that he did not ſuffer him to be recognized Prince [C], nor to aſſume all the marks of one. However this be, Claude of Lorrain became ſo powerful, that he founded a family which had like to have dethroned the lawful ſucceſſors. He died in 1550, leaving ſix ſons and four cares very little how much ſoever he may diſhonour his mother, provided he does but reap great advantage by it. I ſhall here cite ſome words of Thuanus that ſeem a little obſcure. Cum primo ſimulatis nuptiis Margaritam Gulielmi Haricuriani Tancarvillæ Comitis filiam, & ampliſſimorum bonorum, quæ Lotaringi hodie in Caletenſi agro poſſident, heredem duxiſſet, & tabulis dotalib. ad donationem illorum bonorum adegiſſet, poſtea deformitatem & ex deformitate ſterilitatem cauſſatus miſeram feminam repudiavit, & tamen bona retinuit (4). One would conclude that Thuanus means, that the Duke of Lorrain's two pretences were grounded on one another, i. e. that he alledged firſt, that Margaret was ugly, and ſecondly, that her uglineſs had made her barren. None but a poor naturaliſt could argue after this manner; for there is no other connexion between the uglineſs and ſterility of a woman, than what the malignity of an over-nice huſband may occaſion, by not paying his wife what we call a due benevolence. Perhaps Duke Renatus ordered matters ſo, that he might not want a pretence of barrenneſs upon occaſion; but I am perſuaded Thuanus's words ſignified only this, that after the Duke had made his Lady's uglineſs one pretence, he gave another reaſon for his divorce, viz. his wife's not bringing him any children.

(a) Antoinette de Bourbon, ſiſter to Charles Duke de Vendome, the 18th of April 1513. Anſelme, Hiſt. Genealogiq. pag. 285.

(4) Thuan. lib. 24. pag. 489, ad ann. 1560.

I know not whether Varillas had any other authority than la Renaudie's ſpeech; but, however this be, it may be proper to cite him (5). "When "Claudius of Lorrain was of age to think of his "own intereſt, he had pretended that the Dukedoms "of Lorrain and Bar belonged to him; and that his "elder brother Anthony was not legitimate becauſe he "was born during the life of their father's firſt wife (6). "The abovementioned Claudius could not forbear "ſaying this to ſome perſons who told it to Duke "Renatus; which circumſtance made their father "fear, leſt his two eldeſt ſons ſhould endeavour to "make away with each other. The beſt expedient "he could think of for this purpoſe was, to ſend "Claudius into France, and to marry him there to "Antoinette de Bourbon, eldeſt daughter to Count de "Vendome; and to beſtow on him all the lands he "poſſeſſed in that Kingdom, which were in ſuch great "numbers, that they fill two pages in the manu-"ſcript original of the contract (*); and ſo conſide-"rable, that the revenues were not inferior to thoſe "of the Dukedoms of Lorrain and Bar." Beloi ſays the very contrary; he aſſuring us, that the firſt Duke of Guiſe had but fourteen or fifteen thouſand livres a year when he married Madam Antoinette de Bourbon (7).

(5) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henry III. liv. 12. pag. m. 311, 312.

(6) Varillas calls her Joan de Harcourt-Tancarville.

(*) Among the MSS. of Lomenie.

(7) Beloi, Apologie Catholique, folio 10 verſo.

[B] Francis I was diſpleaſed with him on ſome occaſions.] This la Renaudie affirms in his ſpeech. He relates that Claudius of Lorrain having ſent, without the King's order, ſome troops out of the province of which he was governor, exaſperated his Majeſty to ſuch a degree, that his pardon could not be obtained on any other condition, than that he ſhould never appear again at court. The pretence he made uſe of, in order to draw theſe troops out of his government of Champagne was, to repulſe the Anabaptiſts who made incurſions into the Duke of Lorrain's territories (8): Antonio ab Anabaptiſtis, uti ajebat, infeſtato injuſſu regis ex præfectura ſua auxiliareis copias adduxit. Quod adeo impatienter tulit Franciſcus, qui his præludiis patientiam ſuam tentari interpretabatur, ut niſi in Joannis fratris (9) & Annæ Momorantii, qui factum excuſavit, gratiam, nunquam eam injuriam condonaturus fuiſſe credatur: quam tamen ea lege remiſit, ut Claudius in poſterum aula abſtineret, neque in ſuum conſpectum veniret. As I before obſerved, I do not much depend on la Renaudie's Speech; however, a conſiderable part of what he ſays is found in a good Hiſtorian, and this let us depend on. "The late King Francis, ſays he (10), never "had a good opinion of the father (11), after he "knew that he, during his impriſonment, had march-"ed the forces of the kingdom to Saverne, to appeaſe "the troubles of Germany, and defeat thoſe who in-"feſted the Netherlands and other hereditary countries "of the houſe of Auſtria. The ſaid King took it ſo "ill, that at his return from his impriſonment at "St. Sever, he ordered him to be thrown into priſon; "and had it not been for the interceſſion and the re-"monſtrances of the Conſtable, it would have gone "hard with him. He likewiſe was greatly blamed, "not only by the Nobility, but alſo by the King "himſelf, for his attempt on the government of Bur-"gundy, in the life-time of Philip Chabot, admiral "and governor of the ſaid country; for the doing of "an ill ſervice to the crown, and the incroaching on "the eſtate of a gentleman in his life time, are two "things which are taken notice of in France; and "theſe actions made both father and ſon ſo obnoxious "to the great King Francis, that they would never have "been advanced, had it not been for the alliance and "favour of Madame de Valentinois.." I am ſurprized that he did not add that this Prince, a little before his death, adviſed his ſucceſſor not to beſtow any employments on the Guiſes. This particular is mentioned by ſome Hiſtorians, and is not omitted by la Renaudie. Here follow his words from Thuanus. Ejus rei memoria cum tenaciſſime in Franciſci prudentiſſimi principis animo, quamdiu vixit, hæſiſſet, moriens ille inter ſalutaria præcepta, quæ de poſteritate ac regno ſolicitis Henrico F. dedit, imprimis eum monuit, ut ſibi à Guiſianorum ambitione caveret, ac proinde eos publicæ rei gubernaculis ne admoveret (12).

(8) Thuanus had ſaid a little before, that Claudius had obtained the government of Champagne and of Brie, at the ſollicitation of John his brother, the Cardinal, who had great intereſt with the King.

(9) Thuanus had ſaid a little before, that Claudius had obtained the government of Champagne and of Brie, at the ſollicitation of John his brother, the Cardinal, who had great intereſt with the King.

(10) Preſident de la Place, Commentaire de l'Eſtat de la Religion & République, liv. 2. folio m. 54 verſo, ad ann. 1560.

(11) That is, Claudius Duke of Guiſe.

(12) Thuan. lib. 24. pag. 490. See, hereafter, citation (2) of the article of the Duke de Guiſe, grandſon of this.

[C] . . . and that he did not ſuffer him to be recognized Prince.] Preſident de la Place, above cited, gives us a ſpeech that was made to Catherine de Medicis, by Lewis Regnier, Sieur de la Planche. The gentlemen of France (ſays Lewis Regnier) honour foreign Princes when they keep in due bounds; but otherwiſe they cannot bear them, much leſs recognize or acknowledge them for Princes, but only as Lords and Gentlemen. This was confirmed by the judgment of the late King Francis, when Duke d'Aumale married; for he would not permit his lady to be dreſſed as a Princeſs on her wedding-day; ſaying, that he would not beſtow on the houſe of Lorrain, thoſe honours which belong only to the Princes of the blood; and that, if they would ſet up for Princes, they might leave the kingdom, and do it elſewhere at their own expence. And the Duke de Guiſe, who had ſtrongly ſollicited the place of Grand-huntſman, which before had been exerciſed only by meer Gentlemen, was ſatisfied at his daughter-in-law's not appearing in a mantle at Fontainebleau on the day of her nuptials (13). We ſhall now ſee that Henry II did not tread in his father's ſteps, and that Francis I himſelf was not always ſo ſtrict on that occaſion. The late King Francis, ſays the Sieur de la Planche (14), was willing, merely for his pleaſure, at the entrance of Queen Eleanor, not to permit Madamoiſelle de Guiſe, who afterwards was Queen of Scotland, to be dreſſed as a Princeſs; but at her brother's nuptials, he plainly ſhewed that he would not have this made a precedent. And if the late King, at the ſolicitation of Madam de Valentinois (to whom all thoſe of the houſe of Guiſe now living owe their grandeur) changed and depraved, for its ſake, the antient cuſtom, which was, that no maiden on her bridal day ſhould be cloathed in the dreſs of a Princeſs, unleſs ſhe were a Princeſs of the blood, or married one; it is certain that had he lived, he was determined to humble them ſufficiently for it. There are two other incidents in Lewis Regnier's ſpeech that merit to be quoted. The late Mr. du Saint Paul never heard Claudius of Lorrain, Duke of Guiſe, call himſelf Prince, but ſmiling he obſerved to ſome Perſons about him, that he ſpoke German in French; and that whenever he was deſirous of

(13) Preſident de la Place, Comment. de l'eſtat de la Religion & Repub. folio 59. See alſo Hiſtoire de l'Eſtat de France ſous François II, written by Lewis Regnier Sieur de la Planche, p. 399.

(14) Preſident de la Place, ibid. and folio 60.

four daughters, the eldeſt of whom married James Stuart, the fifth of that name, King of Scotland. He had ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral remarkable occaſions, and particularly in the battle of Marignan [D]. John his brother, who went by the name of the Cardinal of Lorrain, was a great ſupport to him (b).

(b) See the marginal note (9) of the remark [B].

(15) Preſident de la Place, ibid. fol. 59 verſo.

(16) Ibid. fol. 60.

(17) Here follow the Sieur de la Planche's own words, pag. 400. of his Hiſtory under Francis II. Even in Parliament, a Counſellor pleading for the late Duke of Guiſe, and giving him the title of Prince; it was inſtantly ordered, that this title ſhould be ſtruck out; which is thought to have been partly the cauſe why the late firſt Preſident Lizet loſt his place, at the ſollicitation of the Cardinal of Lorrain, though I believe upon another pretence.

[D] He had ſignalized himſelf . . . . and particularly in the battle of Marignan.] Francis I won a victory over the Swiſs at Marignan, in 1515. "Claudius "Duke of Guiſe who commanded the Lanſquenets, "in the abſence of Charles Duke of Guelderland, his "uncle on the mother's ſide, was trampled under foot; "when a German gentleman, his 'ſquire, ſaved his "life and loſt his own, by covering him with his "body, and receiving all the ſhot and thruſts levelled "at him (18)." See Father Anſelm (19), who relates this incident more to the advantage of the Duke of Guiſe.

(18) Mezeral, Abregé Chronolog. tom. 4. pag. 480.

(19) Anſelme, Palais de la Gloire, pag. 442.

GUISE (FRANCIS of Lorrain Duke of) eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was one of the greateſt captains of his age. He did very important ſervices to the Government, by his defending Mets againſt the Emperor Charles V, by taking Calais, and on ſeveral other occaſions. However, it may be affirmed, that the evils he cauſed to France were much greater in proportion than the advantages he procured to it by his valour and conduct. His ambition and that of Cardinal Charles of Lorrain his brother, which was ſtill more exorbitant than his, brought a dreadful deſolation on the Kingdom; beſides, the bloody ſpirit with which they were animated againſt thoſe called Huguenots or Proteſtants, occaſioned the civil wars, which ſo often brought France to the brink of ruin. This hatred was at firſt a mere political handle; for could they have had a proſpect of a more exalted fortune among the Proteſtants, they doubtleſs would have engaged in their party [A]; but at laſt it roſe to a true hatred. The greateſt Panegyriſts of this Duke of Guiſe

[A] Could the Guiſes have had a proſpect of a more exalted fortune among the Proteſtants, they doubtleſs would have engaged in their party.] The Author of a little Romance (1) publiſhed in France anno 1675, introduces the Prince of Conde ſpeaking as follows to Admiral de Chatillon. "Does the religion which "you profeſs, and which I do not, becauſe the Guiſes "are of another, (for I ſhall not ſcruple to tell you, "that ſhould they take it into their heads to turn Pro"teſtants, I would turn Roman Catholic the next "day) does that religion, I ſay, forbid a man of ho"nour, and a gentleman, to love the moſt beautiful "woman that eyes ever beheld?" The application of theſe words to this Prince may be injurious to him; but it is true, generally ſpeaking, that the chiefs of great factions engage one way, merely becauſe their antagoniſts or rivals are engaged in the very oppoſite: and we are not to doubt but that the Guiſes were greatly confirmed in their religion, becauſe their moſt formidable enemies were in the other party. Had the Prince of Conde and the Chatillons diſcovered a mighty zeal for the extirpation of the Proteſtants, and had this enabled them to oppreſs the Guiſes; there is no doubt but that theſe would have left the church of Rome, to make themſelves dreaded at the head of the Proteſtants. It is ſaid that they were wavering for ſome time on this affair; but this is denied by Varillas, who pretends to have good reaſons for it. Here follow his words (2). "This is the "proper place for refuting an error, which is ſo much "the more dangerous, as it has not been always a"voided by the ableſt Hiſtorians. It is ſaid, that "the houſe of Guiſe deliberated, in the juncture in "queſtion (3), whether it would be moſt to their ad"vantage to continue ſtill in the Romiſh Religion, or "to put themſelves at the head of the Calviniſts; but "that, after duly weighing their intereſts, they pre"ferred the antient religion to the new one. The "two brothers Meſſieurs du Puys, ſo renowned for "their abilities, whiſpered this particular in the ear "of all the Literati, who uſed to viſit the King's "Library, as one of the moſt important ſecrets in "the Hiſtory of France. They aſſerted that this "ſecret was found in the book written againſt the "League of Gonzaga Duke of Nevers. They had "got this book very curiouſly bound, and kept it as "a treaſure. However, this treatiſe, after their death, "was examined with ſo much the greater care and "curioſity, becauſe ſeveral people remembred the par"ticular they had told of it, but no ſuch thing was "found in it. Farther, Marin le Roy de Gomber"ville, having engaged himſelf to print the Memoirs "of the Duke of Nevers, borrowed the book in queſ"tion; copied it; and inſerted it in the firſt volume "of his Memoirs (α); and yet not the leaſt mention "is made of this pretended deliberation of the Guiſes, "tho' Gomberville knew what Meſſieurs du Puy had "ſaid of it. In fine, all the circumſtances at that "time ſeem to prove, that this incident is wholly "chimerical; for, on one ſide, the houſe of Guiſe "could not have gained any thing by turning Calvi"niſt, but, on the other ſide, would have been totally "ruined. It would not have reaped any benefit, be"cauſe that this party, had they engaged in it, would "never have put them at the head of it, in prejudice "of the two firſt Princes of the blood; and eſpecially "of the Prince of Conde, who was too ambitious to "reſign the command to Foreigners, in a faction "which he had partly formed; and wherein he had "taken proper meaſures to tranſact every thing under "his brother's name, and to ſucceed him in caſe he "ſhould return to the pale of the Catholic Church. "Further, ſuppoſing that the Princes of the blood had "ſubmitted, on ſo very delicate a point, to the houſe "of Guiſe, the three Chaſtillons would not have done "the ſame; but would immediately have had the "direction of all the Proteſtant affairs, to which they "were afterwards ſo ſolemnly raiſed after the deſer"tion of the King of Navarre, and the Prince of "Conde's death."

(1) Intitled, The Prince of Conde.

(2) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie, liv. 23. pag. m. 131. ad ann. 1560.

(3) That is, after the death of Henry II.

§ (α) Not in the firſt volume, but the ſecond. By the way, the original of this Treaty, which conſiſts of 583 pages in 8vo, has not a word of what Varillas declares that Meſſieurs du Puy was ſo well pleaſed to have found in it. It is dated anno 1590, without the name either of the Author or Printer; but in all probability was printed by James Metayer, at Tours, whither this able Printer had followed King Henry III. REM. CRIT.

I could eaſily acquieſce with theſe reaſons of Varillas, though I am ſenſible that thoſe who publiſh Memoirs add or retrench at pleaſure (4). I do not remember any juncture, in which the Guiſes could have imagined, that their forſaking the Romiſh Religion would

(4) This the Journaliſts of Leipſic have obſerved againſt Varillas in the Acta Eruditorum for Jan. 1691, pag. 29.

Guiſe cannot clear him of a very unjuſt and very violent uſurpation; for a perſon may merit the odious name of uſurper, not only for uſurping the ſovereign authority, but for ſeizing upon the power which belongs only to the Princes of the blood; and depriving them of the ſhare which they ought to have in the Government, during the minority of a King. But this is what the Guiſes did under the reign of Francis II, who had married their niece (a), by taking advantage, in the moſt indecent manner, of the weakneſs of this Prince. It is even ſaid that they had a deſign to put to death the firſt Princes of the blood [B]. This uſurpation, joined to a horrid cruelty againſt the Proteſtants, gave riſe to would have been advantageous to them, and they never had leſs reaſon to entertain ſuch a thought, than in the reign of Francis II, what grounds would there then be for the deliberation which Meſſieurs du Puy told their common friends as a great ſecret? What ſeems very likely to me is, that had the Guiſes found that the Chaſtillons had greater intereſt with the Roman Catholic party than themſelves, they would have gone over to the Proteſtants; for there is great probability to believe, that the only motive of their adhering to the Romiſh principles was, becauſe it ſecured their temporal intereſt; and that they diſcovered an averſion to that of the Proteſtants, in no other view but to win the hearts of the populace, and the affection of the clergy. What I here ſay relates to the times, when private feuds and libels had not yet exaſperated their minds; for, at laſt, when political hatred had made them execrable to the party they perſecuted, they hated one another heartily, and yet could diſſemble very artfully, whenever political reaſons made it neceſſary. I have read in one of the pieces publiſhed at that time (5), that Cardinal Charles of Lorrain inſinuated that, by his advice, the Sieur d'Aumalle, his brother, favoured, to the utmoſt of his power, the churches of Burgundy and Champagne, purſuant to the edict; that he had cauſed to be burnt, at Châlons, in his preſence, ſuch informations as had been drawn up againſt the Proteſtants, ever ſince the declaration of the peace; that he knew Madame de Guiſe, his ſiſter, was a Proteſtant, and cauſed her ſon to be privately inſtructed in the Augsburg Confeſſion; and this, would he ſay, does not diſpleaſe me in any manner (6). It was anſwered, among other things, I am ſenſible that you make ſome German Princes believe, that you bring up your nephew in their Confeſſion); but it is only that you may get an opportunity of inveſting him with the four baronies of the Biſhopric of Metz, that he may be created a Prince of the empire. To that end, when you paid your laſt homage, you made him harangue the nobility in Germany, in order to get the love of the people of that country by inſenſible degrees. Some pages before, he was reproached, as having given, with one hand, ſome ſilver cups gilt to the German Miniſters at Saverne; and executed, with the other, the maſſacre of Vaſſy. During the maſſacre at Paris on St. Bartholomew's day, the Duke of Guiſe harboured in his palace upwards of an hundred Huguenots, in hopes of bringing them over to his party (7).

(a) Mary Stuart daughter to James V King of Scotland.

(5) Printed in 1565. It is intitled, Réponſe à l'Epiſtre de Charles de Vaudemont, Cardinal de Lorrain. This letter had been publiſhed under the name of a Gentleman of Hainault, both to excuſe the Cardinal for taking up arms, as he did in January, at Paris, in oppoſition to the King's Ordinances; and to accuſe Marſhal de Montmorency.

(6) Réponſe à l'Epitre de Charles de Vaudemont, folio Diiii.

(7) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 157.

The author of the anſwer to Cardinal de Lorrain's letter was a zealous Proteſtant. Now he makes the following confeſſion with regard to the hatred which the Proteſtants had conceived againſt the Guiſes. "It was, ſays he (8), and ever will be the unanimous "reſolution of all our Churches, to oppoſe all thoſe "whom you ſhall favour directly or indirectly; and "to join with all your enemies, of what quality or "religion ſoever they may be. I am ſurpriſed you ſhould "ſtill be ignorant of our will which is known to the "Pope, ſince he declared lately to the Biſhop of Auxerre, "that he would willingly have given an hundred thouſand crowns to make you turn Huguenot; being "firmly perſuaded, conſidering the irreconcileable enmity we bear you, that we ſhould forſake our religion were you to profeſs it. Since therefore this "unanimous reſolution which all our Churches have "to oppoſe you, cannot but reſult from the ſpecial "goodneſs of God; we certainly have reaſon to "hope, that he will preſerve us from the evil effects "of your deſigns, which you carry on by a cruel "attempt againſt our lives and fortunes."

(8) Réponſe à l'Epitre de Charles de Vaudemont, folio, Ciii.

Mark well the following words of Brantome. "Cardinal de Lorrain was very devout, and on that account, greatly hated by the Huguenots; but yet "he was looked upon as a great diſſembler and hypocrite in matters of religion; and this in order to "raiſe himſelf ſtill higher; for I have often heard "him diſcourſe of the Auſburg confeſſion; approve "it in a great meaſure, and even preach it, and all "this chiefly in the view of pleaſing ſome Germans "and for other reaſons as we are told. I heard him "talk publickly in this manner, in paſſion week, "in his mother's preſence at Rheims (9)." Add to this the remark [Q] of the article Lorrain.

(9) Brant. Eloge du Duc de Guiſe, tom. 3. of his Memoirs, pag. m. 135.

The following paſſage I ſhall here cite is no leſs remarkable. It is extracted from a piece which du Pleſſis Mornai wrote in April 1589, to juſtify Henry III, for joyning with the King of Navarre. That author's buſineſs was, to anſwer the clamours of the league with regard to this confederacy of the King with the Huguenots. Du Pleſſis alledges, not only the alliances which the King of Spain made with Proteſtant Princes. but alſo what the Guiſes had done. "We need "not go farther than our Leaguers. How often has "the Duke of Guiſe endeavoured to treat with the "King of Navarre and thoſe of his party? To how "many Huguenot Gentlemen has he wrote? Were "not his words as follow? Friend, I am no enemy "to thy religion; If thou art not ſatisfied with one "Miniſter, take two. Who does not know how "often the Vice-Seneſchal de Montelimart went, in "Duke de Mayenne's name, backward and forward "to Rochelle; the things he made him ſay; that he "would be his Servant; that he was no enemy to "his religion, his mother having brought him up in "it; that a method would be found out to accommodate matters; that, upon his word, he would "come to him with four horſes, and give his wife "and children as hoſtages. And yet, at this very "time he was returning from Caſtillon, and made a "mighty ſhew of zeal and devotion for the Church. "And indeed he did not ſcruple to make uſe of "Lutheran (*) Reiſters, who received the ſacrament "publickly. after their own way, in his army. The "letters he wrote lately to his agents may be ſeen, "that he is armed to extirpate the ſacramentarian "Huguenots, but not thoſe of the Auſburg confeſſion, "whom he loves and intends to preſerve; and yet "they have not been leſs condemned by the Pope than "the reſt: and were the firſt who roſe up againſt "the Church of Rome (10)."

(10) Memoires de Du Pleſſis Mornai, tom. 1. pag. 922, 923.

[B] It is even ſaid that they had a deſign to put to Death the firſt Princes of the Blood.] "A reader cannot peruſe without horror what was ſaid in thoſe times "(11), and has been written ſince: That the Guiſes, "fearing the reſentments of the King of Navarre, and "judging beſides that their authority would never be "unruffled and ſettled, ſo long as a Prince of the Blood "ſhould be living to conteſt it, had undertook to "make away with them; and that the method they "pitched upon was ſuch, that had it ſucceeded, the "whole royal family would have been deſtroyed. That "the King, to whom they had obſerved, that it would "be of higheſt Importance not to ſuffer any Prince of "the Blood to live, who might revenge the Prince of "Conde's Death, was to ſend for the King of Navarre "into his Chamber. That he ſhould reproach him "in the moſt ſevere terms with his Brother's Death, "and tell him that he had juſt cauſe to complain of "him alſo. That the Prince would bodly deny "this, or at leaſt would defend himſelf with too much "heat; and that thereupon he ſhould be ſtabbed by "Perſons lying in ambuſh, whom the King ſhould "make a ſign to advance forward. It is farther "ſaid, that this Prince was admoniſhed of the danger "which threatened him; and that, after having long "conſidered how it would be proper for him to act, "he reſolved to venture let what would happen; and "that as he was going into the King's Chamber, he "ſpoke to the famous conſpiracy of Amboiſe, by which their authority was the more encreaſed. They went ſuch lengths, as to cauſe the ſecond Prince of the blood to be condemned to die; and doubtleſs the ſentence would have been put in execution, and a general maſſacre made of all the Proteſtants in the Kingdom, had Francis II lived a little longer (b). After his death, the Guiſes had not authority ſufficient to prevent the Proteſtants from enjoying liberty of conſcience, by vertue of the edict of January (c): but not being powerful enough to prevent this toleration, as they had before done in the aſſembly des Notables [C] under Francis II, they found means to invalidate the effects of that edict, by the maſſacre of Vaſſi. It is to no purpoſe to ſay, that this was not a premeditated deſign, ſince the moſt flattering Hiſtorians acknowledge certain facts, which plainly ſhew it to have been ſo [D]. This maſſacre was ſoon followed by a religious war, as the Guiſes

(11) i. e. At the time that the States of the Kingdom were held in Orleans, under Francis II, anno 1560. The Prince of Conde was ſeized at his arrival; and a few days after, being tried by Commiſſioners he was ſentenced to be beheaded. The author of the Life of Francis of Lorrain Duke of Guiſe, printed at Paris anno 1681, who afterwards ſays what I have quoted in this remark.

(b) See Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, liv. 2. pag. 157, & ſeq. Dutch edit.

(c) It was made the 17th of Jan. 1562.

" as follows to one of his moſt faithful Domeſticks: " If it ſhould ſo happen, ſays he, that I ſink under " the multitude and treachery of my Enemies, take my " bloody Shirt, and carry it to my Wife and Son. " They may read in my blood what they ought to do, in " order to revenge my death. That he afterwards " went into the King's chamber, who either could not, " or did not dare to give the ſignal that was agreed " upon; and that Guiſe, vexed at the ill ſucceſs of " this attempt, cried to thoſe that were with him, " What a pitiful Prince have we got (12)!

(12) Vie du Duc de Guiſe, anno 1681, pag. 78. Dutch edit.

[C] As they had before done in the aſſembly des Notables.] It was held at Fontainebleau in Auguſt 1560 (13). The admiral there preſented a petition in the name of all the Proteſtants of France, to deſire that leave might be granted for them to have churches for the public exerciſe of their Religon. John de Monluc, Biſhop of Valence, voted in favour of the admiral; but the Duke of Guiſe, and the Cardinal his Brother, oppoſed this petition with ſo much violence, that it was rejected. They had run ſuch great lengths, as almoſt to ſettle the Inquiſiton in France (14); they employed their utmoſt endeavours for this purpoſe; and, in order to divert this, the Chancellor was forced to propoſe to his Majeſty the Edict of Romorantin, which was extreamly rigorous againſt the Proteſtants. All the calamities of the civil wars of that very time may therefore be aſcribed to theſe two Brothers. They oppoſed the allowing a Liberty of Conſcience to Proteſtants, promoted perſcution, and kept up, in the Kingdom, a ſanguinary ſpirit, in oppoſition to the moſt eſſential and moſt indefeaſible right that man can enjoy, and which Monarchs ought to conſider as the moſt inviolable.

(13) See Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, pag. 145, & ſeq.

(14) Ibid. pag. 144.

[D] The moſt flattering Hiſtorians acknowledge certain Facts, which plainly ſhew that the Maſſacre of Vaſſi had been premeditated.] Varillas owns (15), I. that the Duke of Guiſe and Cardinal Lorrain, not doubting but that the Civil Wars would break out ſoon, and that the Roman Catholic party would be victorious, provided that the Proteſtants of Germany did not engage in the Diſpute, went to Saverne, and there had a ſecret conference with the Duke of Wittemberg. II. That they uſed their utmoſt efforts to raiſe a jealouſy in the Lutherans with regard to the Progreſs of Calviniſm; and to make them believe, that the only deſign of the PERSECUTION WHICH WAS GOING TO BE RAISED AGAINST IT IN FRANCE (weigh well theſe words, they plainly ſhowing that a reſolution was formed to begin acts of hoſtility) was but to endeavour afterwards, by gentle methods, to unite the Lutherans with the See of Rome (16). III. That the German Prince having given them his word, that he would uſe his intereſt with thoſe of his party, to get their conſent, in order to prevent as much as poſſible the Principles of Calvin from taking root in France, they returned to Joinville, in order to divert themſelves there for ſome days (17). IV. That the Ducheſs Dowager of Guiſe, their Mother, who led a very ſolitary life in Joinville (18), employed all the intereſt and credit, ſhe had with them, in order that they might no longer ſuffer in their neighbourhood the Church of Vaſſi, the infection of which would ſoon reach to Joinville. V. That the Duke of Guiſe, being determined to comply with his Mother's Deſires, ſo far as lay in his Power, without infringing the Edicts, paſſed through Vaſſi accompanied by Cardinal de Guiſe his youngeſt Brother (19). VI. That he was far from intending to commit any Violence, he ſuppoſing that his bare preſence would be ſufficient to make Calviniſts break up from their worſhip wherever he ſhould come. VII. That he entered the Town of Vaſſy the firſt of March 1562; and that having been forced to interrupt his Prayers during Maſs, becauſe that the Calviniſts, whoſe Church was near the place where he was at his Devotions, were ſinging Pſalms at the ſame time . . . he ſent and deſired them to leave off for a quarter of an hour; aſſuring them, that they afterwards might go on, becauſe Maſs would be ended by that time.

(15) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, tom. 1. pag. 121, Dutch edit.

(16) Ibid. pag. 122.

(17) Ibid. pag. 124.

(18) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, tom. 1. pag. 125.

(19) Ibid. pag. 126.

I need make but two reflexions on theſe incidents. I, that they ſhew very evidently, that the Duke of Guiſe uſed his endeavours to get the Edict repealed, and was taking meaſures in order to perſecute the Huguenots; and that, beſides this general diſpoſition, he did not go through Vaſſi till after he had promiſed his mother, that he would comply with the very ſtrong deſire ſhe had, not to let the heretics preach there. It is therefore highly probable, that at his going to Vaſſi, he had before formed a reſolution to uſe forcible methods againſt the Proteſtants. My ſecond reflexion is, that Varillas could not diſguiſe matters, but by intermixing incidents that are contradictory one to the other. For firſt, how could the Duke of Guiſe have kept his word with his mother, had he intended to let the Calviniſts continue their pſalms unmoleſted, as ſoon as the maſs he was at ſhould be ended? This is a contradiction; and therefore it muſt be owned, that he never ſent a meſſage to aſſure the Calviniſts that he would not diſturb them in the exerciſes of their devotion; or that he did not go to Vaſſi, in order to content the Ducheſs Dowager of Guiſe, or that he ſent a falſe meſſage. The laſt circumſtance is ſo unworthy a man of honour, that no one who ſhould attempt to juſtify the Duke of Guiſe, could aſcribe it to him. We therefore muſt keep to the two firſt, both which contradict Varillas; ſo that it will be impoſſible to juſtify the Duke of Guiſe, without giving the lye to thoſe Hiſtorians who are moſt favourable to him. Secondly, it ſeems a direct falſhood, to aſſert, that the Duke of Guiſe ſuppoſed his preſence alone was ſufficient to make the Proteſtants, when aſſembled in their public worſhip, diſperſe. He knew but too well, that a ſet of people, ſo greedy of hearing ſermons as they were at this time, and who had ſuffered ſo many perſecutions and puniſhments in order to get liberty for that purpoſe, would not renounce their privilege on account of his preſence. Thirdly: had this Duke ſuppoſed, that his preſence would be ſufficient to make their aſſemblies break up, he could not have gone thither without infringing his Majeſty's edicts, whence it follows evidently, that he contradicts himſelf in Varillas, when he ſuppoſes that his bare preſence would make the congregation at Vaſſi diſperſe; and yet, that he will comply with his mother's deſires no farther, than that this could be done without violating the edicts. He could not poſſibly ſatisfy his mother without obliging that aſſembly to break up; and Varillas confeſſes, that at leaſt he intended to make it diſperſe by his preſence. Beſides, it was impoſſible to break it up, without infringing the laſt edict. The Duke is therefore repreſented as acting inconſiſtently. Such are the extremities to which Hiſtorians may commonly be reduced, when they attempt to throw a cloud over the moſt glaring truths.

Several particulars might be added (20), which ſhew evidently, that the Duke of Guiſe fully intended to get the edict of January annulled; but we need but weigh what he himſelf confeſſed, as related by Davila. After that the tumult of Vaſſi was appeaſed, the Duke of (20) Among others, the retreat of the Chiefs of the Roman Catholic party. Percoſſe queſt' editto i capi della parte Cattolica; nè volendo, che il mondo ſtimaſſe, che conſentiſſero alle coſe, che ſi facevano, il Duca di Guiſa, il Conteſtabile, & i Cardinali, de' quali era mancato di vita il Cardinale di Tornone, i Mareſcialli di Briſſac, e di Sant' Andrea, ſi partirono dalla Corte, machinando già di diſturbare l'editto, e d'opporſi per ogni modo alla fattione Ugonotta. Davila, lib. 2. pag. m. 79.

Guiſes had hoped. The ſucceſſes of it was fatal to both parties, and conſequently extremely pernicious to France. It was of advantage only to this family. Our Duke of Guiſe had the art of engroſſing all the fame of the battle of Dreux; and, in all probability, the taking of Orleans would have enabled him to extirpate the Proteſtant Religion, had he not been aſſaſſinated by Poltrot. He died of his wound (d) the 24th of February 1563, aged forty four years (e) [E]. It is ſaid that he proteſted on his death bed, that he had no hand in the maſſacre of Vaſſi (f); but I know not whether ſuch a proteſtation could outweigh the proofs we have of the contrary [F]. The writers of his party

(d) Poltrot ſhot him with a piſtol during the ſiege of Orleans, the 18th of Feb. 1563.

(e) He was born at the caſtle of Bar the 17th of Feb. 1519. Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 424.

(f) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de Calviniſme, liv. 4. pag. m. 259.

Guiſe ſent for the Judge or chief magiſtrate of that town; and cenſured him very ſeverely, for indulging the Huguenots in ſo pernicious a liberty of meeting together. The Judge excuſed himſelf by alledging the King's edict, which impowered them to aſſemble publicly. The Duke, being no leſs exaſperated at this anſwer than at the thing itſelf, laid his hand on his ſword, and cried, The edge of this ſword ſhall ſoon cut this ſo cloſely twiſted edict. Nature ſpoke on that occaſion; and this is not the firſt inſtance of the greateſt diſſemblers being betrayed, by a ſudden emotion of anger. Theſe words did not paſs unheeded, but were afterwards employed as a ſtrong proof of the violent deſigns, which the Duke of Guiſe entertained. This is Davila's obſervations, whoſe words are as follow. Finito il tumulto, il Duca di Guiſa, chiamato à ſe l'ufficiale del luogo, cominciò con gravi parole à riprenderlo, che permetteſſe in danno de' paſſaggieri queſta perniciosa licenza, & iſcuſando egli di non poterle impedire per la permiſſione dell' editto di Gennaio, che concedeva le radunanze publiche à gli Ugonotti, il Duca ſdegnato non meno della riſpoſta, che del fatto, meſſa la mano ſù la ſpada, replicò pieno di colera, che l'editto così ſtrettamente legato, preſto ſi troncarebbe con il filo di quella: dalle quali parole dette nell' ardore dell' ira, e non traſcurate da quelli ch'erano preſenti, molti poi l'arguirono per autore, e per machinatore delle guerre ſeguenti (21). The Proteſtant Hiſtorians afford ſeveral other circumſtances againſt the Duke of Guiſe. As for thoſe who ſhall obſerve, they may be ſuſpected becauſe they come from that quarter, what will they alledge againſt Davila?

(21) Davila, lib. 3. pag. 86.

[E] He died the 24th of February 1563, aged forty four years.] Father du Londel, notwithſtanding his great accuracy, was yet ignorant of the true date of his death; he fixing to the 26th of February (22). The error which has been continued in all the editions of Moreri's Dictionary is far greater. The death of this Duke of Guiſe is here fixed to anno 1553 (23). I am ſurpriſed how Mr. de Valincourt came to omit both the day and year of this Duke's death, as well as the year of his birth, in this Duke of Guiſe's life, publiſhed by him in 1681 (24); but I am ſtill more ſurprized at his declaring him to be fifty years of age.

(22) Du Londel, Faſtes des Rois de la Maiſon d'Orleans, pag. 71.

(23) Under the word Guiſe, but under Francis, which is not the proper place to look for the hiſtory of the Dukes of Guiſe. Moreri has fixed the true date, viz. 1563.

(24) It is that which I cite in the remark [B].

[F] I know not whether ſuch a proteſtation could outweigh the proofs we have of the contrary.] We now do not know what ſtreſs is to be laid on the proteſtations of dying perſons. The authors who have writ for and againſt the conſpiracy diſcovered, in England, by Titus Oates, exhibit perſons impeached for high treaſon, proteſting their innocence to the laſt gaſp, and witneſſes againſt them who did the ſame. It muſt neceſſarily be, either that the perſons impeached or the witneſſes made falſe proteſtations in the very article of death; ſo that we are hereby drove out of one fortreſs which we had oppoſed to ſcepticiſm, I mean the depoſition of dying people (25). The ſentence of Lucretius, viz. that mankind in their expiring moments (26), unmaſk themſelves, and appear in their genuine colours, does not hold true on all occaſions. A falſe ſhame often accompanies us to the grave, and that love of glory which the great make their idol ſo long as they live, obliges them to conceal, till they are leaving the world, whatever might tarniſh their reputation. A prevailing paſſion has ſometimes ſo very great an aſcendant, as not to be checked by the proſpect of approaching death. This was obſerved in Tiberius, with regard to diſſimulation, his darling quality. Jam Tiberium corpus, jam vires, non dum diſſimulatio deſerebat. Idem animi rigor, ſermone ac vultu intentus, quæſita interdum comitate, quamvis manifeſtam defectionem tegebat (27). i. e. "Tiberius's "bodily ſtrength began to fail him, but not his hy- "pocriſy. The ſame ſtern diſpoſition of mind, and "earneſtneſs with regard to ſpeech and countenance; "ſometimes affecting a ſpecious courteſy, which at "the ſame time covered a manifeſt decay." The hiſtory of Duke d'Epernon furniſhes us with another proof of what I ſay. He was an extremely haughty nobleman, and had made it his delight, all his life-time, to ſtamp a character of haughtineſs on all he ſaid and did. He was animated with this ſpirit on the very day he died, although he was prodigiouſly weakened by a tedious fit of ſickneſs, and his very old age. A Prieſt who was preparing him for death, having prevailed upon him to ſay, that he forgave his enemies, and all ſuch of his domeſtics as had diſpleaſed him, took it into his head to aſk, whether he did not alſo beg pardon of ſuch of his ſervants as he might have offended. The reaſon of the Prieſt's aſking him this queſtion was, becauſe the Duke a few days before, had uſed a perſon ill who lived in his family. He ſeemed diſpleaſed at this queſtion, and anſwered in an angry tone of voice, that it was enough he had forgiven thoſe who had diſpleaſed him; and that he had never heard that a maſter, in order for his dying in a Chriſtian manner, was obliged to beg pardon of his ſervants (28). The Duke of Guiſe who is charged with being the cauſe of the maſſacre of Vaſſi, having endeavoured all his life-time to conduct himſelf in ſuch a manner as might ſave appearances, and diſcover more probity and candor than the reſt of the Courtiers, had declared and proteſted a thouſand times, that he was innocent of this maſſacre; and it became him to proteſt it; becauſe, had he owned it, he would have proved himſelf to have been the firſt cauſe of the calamities with which France was afflicted, and as ſuch have been deteſted by all men. He therefore was obliged to continue his proteſtations to his death; not only to prevent his memory from being abhorred by all thoſe who had the civil wars in the utmoſt deteſtation; but alſo to keep all Europe from knowing, that he had been a liar in all the proteſtations he had made, that he had no concern in the ſlaughter committed at Vaſſi. Few ambitious men can prevail with themſelves to retract a thing, when the doing it is ſo ignominious to them.

(25) Le Grand, Defence de Sanderus, pag. 164. alledges Smeton's teſtimony againſt Anna Bullen, and puts the reader in mind, that Dr. Burnet took advantage of the like depoſition. This ſhews that oppoſite parties object to one another the teſtimonies of dying people; and either reject or adopt them, as they find them of advantage or prejudicial to them.

(26) Nam veræ voces tum demum pectore ab imo Ejiciuntur, & eripitur perſona, manet res. Lucret. lib. 3. ver. 57.

(27) Tacit. Annal. lib. 6. cap. 50.

(28) See Vie du Duc de Eperon, written by Girard.

But this is not the only thing that may be alledged againſt the proteſtations of dying people; moſt particulars that are related of them may alſo be doubted, becauſe they have no other foundation than the teſtimony of perſons who may be very much ſuſpected (29). Who can prove to us, that a dying man declared ſuch and ſuch things; and that theſe are not put into his mouth by his relations or friends, out of love for his reputation, in order to perſuade the world of his innocence? Nothing could more eaſily be done, than to publiſh, that ſuch a one, in his expiring moments, declared ſuch a thing; and this is affirmed by thoſe who ſaw him breath his laſt. If this be an affair in which the public are concerned, one hour is ſufficient to ſpread a report of it in every part of a great city; every one informs his friend of it by letter; no one examines whether it be juſtly grounded or not; it is immediately publiſhed in the News-papers; and we may be aſſured, that, ſo long as the world laſts, thoſe who ſpeak or write in favour of the dying perſon, will alledge the declaration he made in his laſt moments with as much confidence, as if it had been verified by the moſt exact enquiries of the Magiſtrates. To ſhew how little this kind of declarations ought to be depended upon, we need but conſider the manner in which that of the Duke of Guiſe is related by Maimbourg and by Varillas, two famous Hiſtorians who publiſhed their works almoſt in the ſame time. The former affirms, on the authority of Brantome, that the Duke proteſted he had no hand in that action, and yet begged pardon of God for it (30); but the other aſſerts, that he implored God to forgive him all his faults, that

(29) See the remark [N] of the article HENRY II. It is ſaid that he did not ſpeak after he was wounded, and yet authors make him ſay a thouſand things.

(30) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, pag. 259.

party applaud him prodigiouſly for a Chriſtian maxim, which it is ſaid, he alledged, againſt a Proteſtant who ſought to kill him; however, this maxim was no way graceful in his mouth [G]. It were to be wiſhed, that the Proteſtants had not printed ſo many libels and ſatyrs againſt this Duke and the Cardinal his brother [H]. In ſo doing, they did not that of Vaſſy excepted (31). Now how will it be poſſible to reconcile theſe two things? It muſt be remembred, that it was very much the intereſt of the Roman Catholics, to perſuade the world that the Duke of Guiſe had made ſuch a proteſtation on his death-bed; this giving them an opportunity to deny a thing with which the Proteſtants had ſo ſeverely upbraided them on all occaſions. What will not men do to refute ſuch reproaches, when they are fired by a religious hatred?

(31) Varillas, Vie de Charles IX. tom. 1. pag. 128.

[G] This maxim was no ways graceful in his mouth.] Here follows a reflexion of one of thoſe Proteſtant authors, who have wrote with the greateſt warmth againſt the perſecutions which the Proteſtants ſuffered in France (32). "It is related that, during the ſiege of "Roan, a Proteſtant Gentleman, who had a deſign to "kill the Duke, having been brought to him (33); "and confeſſing, that it was not out of any "hatred to his perſon, but that he thought that he "was bound to make ſuch an attempt, for the ſer-"vice of his religion; the Duke gave him his liberty, "and ſaid theſe words: Get thee gone; if thy reli-"gion commands thee to aſſaſſinate thoſe who never of-"fended thee, mine obliges me to give thee thy life, "which I may juſtly take away. Judge, from theſe "two actions, which religion is the beſt (34). This "would have been a wiſe and a Chriſtian ſpeech, had "not the Duke been a Roman Catholic, and at the "head of a perſecuting army. But when we call to "mind that the Perſon who made this ſpeech was "a perſecutor, we cannot forbear to ridicule him, as a "man who plays the comedian, and makes a farce "of religion; who, out of pride and a mere bravado, "pardons one man who deſerves death, at the ſame "time that he behaves with a moſt ſavage and moſt "deteſtable cruelty towards a whole body of innocent "people. Did not this Duke of Guiſe profeſs the "ſame religion as Francis I and Henry II? Had he "not approved and adviſed the edicts of Chateau-Bri-"ant and of Romorantin, whereby the Proteſtants "were ſentenced to death? Had he not exerted his "utmoſt endeavours in order to get the Inquiſition "eſtabliſhed in France, whereby a ſlaughter of men "would, in propriety of ſpeech, have been ſettled in "France, and a perpetual court of juſtice ſurrounded "with executioners? Was he not the chief promoter "of the deſign, which the ſudden death of Francis II "prevented, viz. of ſending troops into all the pro-"vinces, and obliging every man in France to ſub-"ſcribe a formulary; and, upon pain of refuſal, to "leave the kingdom, (which was the greateſt puniſh-"ment) and to be diſpoſſeſſed of all their goods and "chattels? But what numbers of thoſe would have "been put to death? Again, was it not the ſame "Duke, who permitted his men to murder a great "many Huguenots who were addreſſing their prayers "to God in a barn in Vaſſi? In a word, was not "the obſtinacy, with which he always declared that "thoſe unhappy people ought to be put to death, the "cauſe of all the civil wars on a religious account "with which France was afflicted, but which would "never have happened, had they been ſuffered to "worſhip God in their own way? Did he not act in "this manner out of a religious zeal, and would he "have done this had he been a Heathen? Would he "not have tolerated the Proteſtants as well as Papiſts? "Were not his actions on this occaſion approved by "the Pope and Romiſh clergy? With what face "then could he aſſert, that his religion enjoined him "to forgive thoſe who had offended him, ſince it "prompted him to inflict a variety of torments on a "numberleſs multitude of people who did not do him "the leaſt injury, and only deſired to ſerve God as "their own conſciences dictated? Such is the horrid "turpitude, and which has very much the air of a "farce, of thoſe religions which perſecute others, and "will force men to enter in. A man who profeſſes ſuch "a religion, will not make a difficulty to proteſt, that, "with regard to himſelf, he forgives a man of a dif-"ferent religion, for the injuries he may have received "from him; but he nevertheleſs does not ſcruple to "ſend him to the gallies or the gallows, upon pre-"tence of his not profeſſing the true Faith, and though "he had received kindneſſes from ſuch a man. It "is certain that the Duke did not think when he "ſpoke, ſince he preſumed to make a compariſon "between the two religions, and to give the prefe-"rence to his own in point of charity. The Gentle-"man, who had entered into a conſpiracy againſt him, "from an opinion that his death would be of ad-"vantage to the Proteſtant Religion, did not therein "follow the true doctrine of his church; for there is "no Proteſtant divine, but in his converſation, and "his Sermons, aſſerts, that it is not lawful for one "man to murder another, in order to procure advan-"tage to his religion: But the Duke, conformably "to a doctrine that was approved, and had been a "thouſand times commanded in his religion, gave his "vote in the King's counſel, for publiſhing edicts "which might ſentence to death a numberleſs mul-"titude of worthy perſons; and exerted his utmoſt "endeavours in order to extirpate the Proteſtants by "the moſt violent methods. Now, is it not all a "jeſt for a man who entertains this way of thinking, "to boaſt his profeſſing a religion which ordains its "members to forgive others? I muſt beg thoſe whoſe "buſineſs it is to make converts, to conſider this. "Their conduct is ſuch, that the moſt excellent max-"ims of Chriſtian morality become, in their mouth, "ſo many idle ſtories, farces, or nonſenſe."

(32) Commentaire Philoſophique, ſur Contrain-les d'entrer, in the preface, pag. 64, & ſeq.

(33) i. e. to the Duke of Guiſe.

(34) See Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, liv. 4. pag. m. 316.

[H] It were to be wiſhed, that the Proteſtants had not printed ſo many Libels and Satyrs againſt this Duke, and the Cardinal his Brother.] In the aſſembly des Notables, mentioned above, Cardinal de Lorrain ſays in a haughty tone, That he gloried in being the object of the hatred and fury of the Huguenots: That there had been ſpread in Paris, and from Paris into all the Provinces, a vaſt multitude of Libels filled with the moſt injurious Invectives, as well as the moſt violent threats againſt himſelf and the Duke of Guiſe his Brother; that he himſelf had two and twenty of theſe which he preſerved very carefully, and took a pleaſure in ſhowing, as ſo many moſt conſpicuous Marks of their zeal for Religion; and of their inviolable fidelity to the King, who had been pleaſed to make choice of them for his Miniſters (35). I again repeat it, it were to be wiſhed that the Proteſtants had not publiſhed ſuch a number of ſatyrical pieces; great prejudice accruing from them to this day, by the reflections they furniſh the Miſſionaries with. As for inſtance, Maimbourg did not fail to make a malicious and ſatyrical reflection, on what the Cardinal had ſaid of thoſe Libels. "And indeed it is very manifeſt, that it was com-"mon for the Huguenots at that time, to abuſe unmer-"cifully by a thouſand ſcandalous Libels and impudent "Satyrs, againſt all thoſe who did not favour them, "without ſhewing the leaſt regard to merit or quality; "or without ſparing Kings, Princes or Prelates, and "whatever is looked upon as moſt ſacred and invio-"lable among men. I myſelf have ſeen a large col-"lection in ten Volumes in folio, made up of thoſe "ſorry pieces which the Huguenots publiſhed at that "time againſt Henry II. and Francis II.; againſt "Queen Catherine, when ſhe was not diſpoſed to fa-"vour them; againſt the King of Navarre after he "had gone over to the Roman Catholicks; and par-"ticularly againſt the Duke of Guiſe and Cardinal "de Lorrain archbiſhop of Rheims; wherein they "brutally inſerted, without the leaſt wit or judgment, "the moſt injuroius reflections and calumnies (†) that "the moſt ſlanderous tongue could invent. So that "any perſon of the leaſt ſenſe or honour, who caſts "his eye but a moment on theſe ſtupid and inſolent "pieces, muſt have the utmoſt contempt and the moſt "juſt indignation againſt the impudent Authors "of them (36)." Theſe are the odious reflections made by Maimbourg. Thoſe who anſwered his hiſtory of Calviniſm did not forget to refute them. He adds (37), that Cardinal de Lorrain, "whoſe greatneſs of "ſoul

(35) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, pag. 151. Here follow his citations. Dupleix, under Francis II, pag. 619. Spond. ad ann. 1560, n. 16. Mezerai, tom. 2. pag. 785. Extracted from La Popeliniere, lib. 6. pag. 104. & de Belcar. lib. 28. pag. 946.

(†) Memoirs de Caſtelnau.

(36) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, pag. 151, 152.

(37) Ibid. pag. 153.

not act in conformity either to the rules of the Goſpel or thoſe of prudence, ſince thoſe kind of pieces only exaſperated ſtill more a very powerful enemy [I], and furniſhed him with a handle for increaſing his hatred, and heightning the perſecution [K]. It would be unjuſt to aſcribe to the whole body the impatience of ſome particular perſons, and their too violent itch of writing [L]. This Duke of Guiſe had been created Duke of Aumale, and

" ſoul equalled that of his Genius, would take no " other revenge of thoſe libellous writers, than by ge- " nerouſly deſpiſing their impotent Fury; but not- " withſtanding this, the Magiſtrates (as was their " duty) ſeized ſome of them, and made them undergo " the utmoſt ſeverity of the Law, whereby it is enact- " ed, that they ſhould be puniſhed as publick Poy- " ſoners; and accordingly two of them were hang'd †, " viz. the author (38) of one of thoſe ſorry Libels, inti- " tled, The Tyger, and the perſon who ſold it privately."

† Mem. de Caſtel. lib. 1. cap. 7. On which occaſion a Printer was taken up, for printing a work intitled, Le Tigre (the Tiger) the ſuppoſed author whereof and the book-ſeller were hanged.

[I] Thoſe kind of pieces only exaſperated ſtill more a very powerful Enemy.] Maimbourg ſhould not have aſſerted, that Cardinal de Lorrain's greatneſs of ſoul prompted him to take no other revenge of thoſe libellous writers, than by generouſly deſpiſing them; for could there poſſibly be a more unjuſt and more violent revenge than that which he employed? He indeed did not give himſelf the trouble to enquire after the particular Authors of thoſe Libels, which is all that Maimbourg can pretend to ſay; but then he did all that lay in his power to extirpate the whole Body of the Proteſtants. He was the grand promoter of all the penal Laws and capital puniſhments enacted againſt them, and endeavoured to ſet up the Inquiſition againſt them. Did he not hereby take a more cruel revenge, than that had he confin'd his indignation barely to the puniſhing the Authors of thoſe Satyrs? However, the reader will now ſee, that he did not ſtifle his reſentment with reſpect to this ſet of writers.

(38) This is a falſhood. See the ſubſequent remark.

Of the Libel intitled, The Tyger.

Caſtelnau, cited by Maimbourg (39), makes the following obſervation. The Huguenots were continually publiſhing ſome injurious Libel or other againſt the Houſe of Guiſe. Upon which a Printer was ſeized, who had printed a little Book, entitled The Tyger, for which the ſuppoſed Author and a Merchant were hanged. This relation is not accurate; he does not ſay what became of the Printer; and it is not true that the ſuppoſed Author of that Book was hanged. He ſhould have ſaid as the Sieur de la Planche has done, that the Printer and a Merchant were hanged; and neither of theſe were the ſuppoſed Author. Here follow the very words of that Hiſtorian (40): The Parliament made a ſtrict enquiry againſt thoſe, who either printed or expoſed to ſale, the pieces written againſt the Guiſes. Some days were ſpent ſo ſucceſsfully in this, that they at laſt diſcovered the printer of a certain little very ſatyrical Book entitled the Tyger, a Counſellor named du Lyon had the direction of this Affair, which he accepted very willingly, upon his being promiſed the Preſident's Seat in the Parliament of Bourdeaux, which he might ſell in caſe he thought proper. Having therefore ſent out his Spies, one Martin Hommet, a Printer, was found with thoſe Books in his cuſtody. Being asked who had given them to him, he anſwered, that they were given him by a perſon unknown; and at laſt accuſed ſeveral Perſons of having ſeen and read it, who were immediately ſought for, but they made their eſcape. As this Printer was carrying to execution, a Merchant of Roan, who was in good Circumſtances and made a handſome appearance, ſeeing the Populace of Paris greatly exaſperated againſt the Priſoner, ſpoke only theſe words to them: Friends, Is it not enough that he is going to execution? Leave him to the Hangman, would you torment him more than he is ordered to be by his Sentence? (now he did not know his Crime, and was juſt lighting from his Horſe at an Inn hard by.) Some Prieſts hearing theſe words, went up to him, calling him Huguenot, and the Priſoner's accomplice; when immediately the mob ruſhed upon him, and beat him in a moſt grievous manner. Upon this, thoſe who are called Officers of juſtice come up; and, by way of refreſhing him, carry him to goal, whither he was no ſooner come, but du Lion aſked him ſeveral particulars with regard to the book intitled, the Tyger, and the words he had ſaid to the populace: the poor merchant ſwore he knew nothing of the matter, and ſaid that he had never ſeen or heard of Meſſieurs de Guiſe; that he was a merchant, and minded nothing but his own concerns. He proteſts, that he was an entire ſtranger to the man who was leading to execution; notwithſtanding which, he had been moved to pity; and that he had deſired the populace to leave him to the Hangman. He intreated, that his life and converſation might be inquired into; and declared that he would willingly ſubmit his cauſe to the judgment of the world. Notwithſtanding this, du Lion, without making any other enquiries, gives in his report to the Parliament and to the Judges delegated by them, who ſentenced him to be hanged in Maubert Square, and in that very place where the Printer had been executed. Du Lion, ſome days after, being at ſupper with a great company, fell a joking on the poor merchant; when the injuſtice of that ſentence being proved to him by his own words: what could we do? replied he, we were obliged to give ſome ſatisfaction to the Cardinal, ſince we could not ſeize the author; otherwiſe he would never have let us be at reſt. Hence the reader may judge whether the Guiſes were unconcerned at a Satyr that had been publiſhed againſt them. Brantome ſhews in the following Paſſage, how ſtrongly they were affected on thoſe occaſions. " A great number of Libels " were publiſhed againſt thoſe who governed the King- " dom at that time (41); but none gave greater of- " fence than one entitled, The Tyger, (in imitation of " Cicero's firſt invective againſt Catiline) becauſe it " mentioned the amours of a beautiful Lady, of very " high quality, married to a Nobleman her Relation. " If the ſmart Author of it had been apprehended, tho' " he had had an hundred thouſand livers, he would have " loſt them all; for the great Man and great Lady in " queſtion were ſo exaſperated, that it almoſt di- " ſtracted them (42)." I obſerved in another place (43), that Francis Hotman was thought to be the Author of this Satyr.

(39) He quotes lib. 1. cap. 7. inſtead of lib. 2.

(40) La Planche, Hiſt. de France ſous François II, pag. m. 385.

(41) i. e. under Francis II.

(42) Brantome, Dames galantes, tom. 2. pag. m. 374.

[K] . . . and furniſhed him with a handle for increaſing his hatred, and heightening the perſecution.] How wicked ſoever we may ſuppoſe the Guiſes to have been, it is certain, that a thouſand things were laid to their charge in thoſe Libels, of which they were wholly innocent. It will inevitably happen, that all thoſe who attempt to write, without having been concerned in publick Affairs, or having conſulted good memoirs, will advance a thouſand falſhoods, when they write againſt men by whom they have been ill uſed. The writers in queſtion, are for ſatiating their vengeance, and thence are deſirous of aſperſing thoſe who perſecute them to the utmoſt of their power; ſuch being their frame of mind, they believe all they hear; and if they do not believe it, they yet think themſelves lawfully impower'd to publiſh it, becauſe it was told them. Now when the perſons who have been aſperſed in theſe libels, find that they are charged with many crimes of which they know themſelves to be wholly innocent, they look upon the authors and applauders of thoſe libels as men of no honour and conſcience; think they deſerve the utmoſt hatred; and imagine it to be no crime, to extirpate ſuch ſlanderers, or encouragers of ſlander. It is certain therefore, that the authors of ſuch defamatory pieces, either vent their ſpleen, or give a ſcope to their zeal, with very great imprudence; and the whole party pays dear for it.

(43) In the remark [N] of the article HOTMAN.

[L] It would be unjuſt to aſcribe to the whole body the impatience of ſome particular perſons, and their too violent itch of writing.] We may form a judgment of the 16th century from the preſent time (44). We know that thoſe who publiſh daily a vaſt multitude of anonymous libels, make no manner of figure in the world. They live in ſo much obſcurity, that they eſcape the ſearch of the moſt prying enquirers; and when the name of one of thoſe writers happens to be found out, he is often found to be neither a good Chriſtian nor an honeſt man. I am perſuaded that moſt of thoſe authors who wrote the great number of libels, which Maimbourg pretends to have ſeen in ten volumes in folio, were the moſt ignoble part of the Proteſtant Church in France. The greateſt part of thoſe authors were poor creatures, who were not

(44) I write this in 1695.

and Governor of Dauphiné in 1547 (g). He was Knight of the Order, Lord High-Steward, Lord High Chamberlain, and grand Huntſman of France (h). His Barony of Joinville, which was under the juriſdiction of the city of Vaſſi (i), was made a Principality anno 1552 (k), and ſome villages belonging to the ſame town were added to it (l). He married Anne of Eſte, daughter to Hercules of Eſte II, Duke of Ferrara, the 4th of December 1549 (m), and had ſeveral children by her.

If what is related in the hiſtory of the Proteſtant Churches of France be true, he hinted, a little before his death, that he did not believe that his Lady's virtue had been free from ſtains [M].

(g) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 424.

(h) Ibid. pag. 425.

(i) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. pag. 721. Book 4.

(k) Baudrand, in Geograph.

(l) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. Book 4. pag. 721.

(m) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, p. 425.

owned by the party, and it was not even neceſſary that they ſhould be very numerous. Five or ſix people of a ſatyrical turn of mind, who have no other buſineſs, and get a few pence by this ſort of writings, may, in leſs compaſs of time than thirty years, fill a large Kingdom with their libels. Now is it juſt to charge a whole body, with the faults committed by three or four people, ſuch as we have mentioned? To draw their characters in a proper manner, it is not enough to ſay that they are credulous, but it muſt be added that they are knaviſh, they publiſhing things which they know to be very falſe, and for this reaſon, becauſe they themſelves invent them. Here follows a paſſage from Mezerai with regard to ſuch frauds (4). "Some have been of opinion that thoſe memoirs (46) "were ſuppoſititious; and the moſt equitable perſons "thought that if they were really written by the "Counſellor to whom they were aſcribed, they only "flowed from his deep melancholy, occaſioned by "ſome injurious treatment he had received from the "Huguenots. Thoſe memoirs, in all probability, were "forged by the Minions, the Huguenots, or the "Queen-mother, who all were mortal enemies to "the Guiſes; and it is certain that they invented a "great many more ſlanders in order to make them "odious. However the Guiſes took care to be even "with them For theſe reaſons, little credit ought "to be given to the pieces written at that time, unleſs they are carefully examined."

(45) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 200. ad ann. 1577.

(46) i. e. thoſe of Counſellor David, with reſpect to the excluſion of the deſcendants of Hugh Capet, and the reſtoring of the Crown to the Guiſes, deſcended from Charlemagne.

[M] He did not believe that his Lady's virtue had been free from ſtains.] "With regard to the manner of his dying, Carles Biſhop of Riez, made a very impertinent diſcourſe upon it, putting into his mouth "ſeveral theological expreſſions and phraſes of the "ſcriptures which he had never once looked into. "Among other things, thinking to applaud him, he "does great injury to the Ducheſs his widow; he "making the Duke confeſs, that he had not always "been faithful to her bed, for which he intreats her "to forgive him, as he forgives her the like (47)." Theſe words are found in a work of Beza. But it is not very probable, that a Biſhop ſhould have given ſuch a turn to his Hero's laſt words, which reflect ſo great diſhonour on his wife and children. This made me almoſt diſtruſt Beza, and I endeavoured to conſult Lancelot Carles's, but not being able to procure it, I deſired Mr. de Larroque to get me ſome information about it, who was ſo kind as to ſend me the following anſwer. "There have been three editions (48) of the Letter of Carles Biſhop of Riez "to Charles IX, with regard to the expiring moments of the Duke of Guiſe. This is proved by the "Advertiſement to the Reader, prefixed to the ſecond French edition, where it is ſaid that the edition "printed before this, was but an incorrect copy, which "the author, who was preſent at that diſcourſe, wrote "down ſummarily, in order to ſerve him as a memorandum. I have not been able to find this firſt "edition, and therefore cannot ſay, whether what "you have read in another work was contained in "it. There are no ſuch words in the ſecond, the "Duke therein addreſſing his wife as follows: We "have been long united together by the holy bands of "faith and friendſhip, enjoying all things in common between us. You know that I always loved "and eſteemed you as much as any woman can be, "and that our mutual friendſhip has not been leſſened "all the time we have been married; as I have always endeavoured to convince you of this, and you have "done the like to me; we giving each other all the "reciprocal contentment in our power: I will not deny "but that the ſuggeſtions and frailties of youth have "ſometimes made me commit ſome things which you "have been offended at, and which I intreat you to forgive. I muſt needs ſay, that I am not, in this "reſpect, one of the greateſt ſinners, nor one of the "leaſt, though I am one of the guilties in the ſight "God. But you are ſenſible with how reſpectful a regard I have behaved towards you for ſome years paſt; "avoiding all occaſions of giving you the leaſt diſcontent. "Page 84, 85, 86, 87. John le Vieux has tranſlated "this paſſage into Latin, in manner following. "Nos enim arctiſſimo matrimonii vinculo conjugati & "conſociati ſumus, ut individuum non bonorum dumtaxat, "ſed etiam conſiliorum & voluntatum, ſine ulla exceptione, communitatem, ſocietatemque ſervaremus. Et "certè ut nihil mihi optabilius, aut antiquius adhuc "fuit, quàm ut nodum illum amabiliſſimum ſanctè conſtrictum tenerem: ſic me viciſſim inviolabili obſervantia & officio coluiſti. Page 30.

(47) Beze, Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes réformées, liv. 6. pag. 270.

(48) Two French and one in Latin, all three were publiſhed in 1563.

As Mr. de Larroque could not procure a copy of the firſt edition, I cannot ſay any thing for or againſt Beza. I only conjecture, that it is probable he did not ſlander the Biſhop of Riez, for the advertiſement prefixed to the ſecond edition, intimate plainly enough that the firſt was pretty much confuſed; and that many things were left out, or placed otherwiſe. Now ſince the Latin tranſlator thought it incumbent on him to leave out, in the ſecond, the paſſage which remained in it relating to the love-intrigues of the Duke of Guiſe; it is probable that Lancelot Carles had left out of the firſt, what he had therein inſerted with regard to the intrigues of the Ducheſs. This may ſhew us, how eſſential it is to preſerve the firſt editions of books, and how much we ought to ſuſpect tranſlators. Here we find that John le Viex or Jean le Vieil (42) boldly left out, all that was told in the original concerning the adulterous practices of the Duke of Guiſe, (49) La Croix du Maine, pag. 271. ſpeaks of John le Vieil, who probably might be him in queſtion.

GUISE (HENRY of Lorrain, Duke of) eldeſt ſon of the foregoing, had a certain mixture of good and bad qualities [A], which made him very fit for overthrowing a government. On one ſide, he had abilities ſufficient to find out arts for that purpoſe, and wickedneſs enough

[A] He had a certain mixture of good and bad qualities.] Let us employ the colours in which he has been painted by a modern author. "He wanted none of "thoſe things, (whether of a good or bad kind), "which could conſpire to give ſucceſs to any affair he "was fully determined to purſue . . . He was a Prince, "who . . . . poſſeſſed all ſuch perfections both of body "and mind, as were beſt adapted to win the hearts "of people; and to procure, with the greateſt eaſe, "thoſe who enjoy them, an abſolute aſcendant over "the minds of the people, whom they inchanted ſo "much, that they perfectly idolized them. For he "was tall, and admirably well proportioned, reſembling that which is aſcribed to Heroes; all the "features of his face being exquiſitely beautiful; his "eyes were piercing, and darted a certain fire that "was equally ſoft and active and ſagacious; his "forehead was large, ſmooth, and ever ſerene, with "ſuch an agreeable ſmile about his mouth, as charmed ſtill more than all the obliging words in "which enough to put them in execution. He ſuffered his aſpiring and ambitious temper to gain ſo great an aſcendant over him, that after having brought numberleſs calamities on the whole Kingdom, he himſelf was involved in its ruin. He went ſuch violent lengths, that no other expedient could be found to ſtop his attempts, than to put him to death. The manner in which Henry III got him diſpatched, and Cardinal of Guiſe in the caſtle of Blois, during the aſſembly of the States (a), is ſo univerſally known, that I ſhall not make any mention of it. I ſhall only obſerve that ſeveral Hiſtorians have advanced a falſity, in aſſerting that, a little after the Duke of Guiſe's execution, the Pope's Legate (b) ſpoke to the King with ſo much unconcern, or rather with an air of ſo much gaiety [B], that one would have concluded the King and the Court of Rome had

(a) In December 1588.

(b) His name was Morofini.

" which he addreſſed thoſe who were fond of ap" proaching him. His aſpect was lively, and his " complexion compoſed of the fineſt mixture of white
" and red. . . . . He had a grave and ſtately gait,
" but without any ſhew of pride or affectation; and
" in his whole carriage he diſcovered a certain air
" (which words can never expreſs) of heroic grandeur,
" that was made but of ſweetneſs, intrepidity, and " loftineſs, unmix'd with any thing diſagreeable; which " inſpired (at one and the ſame time) all thoſe who " ſpoke to him with love, fear, and awe. This ad" mirable advantage of outward beauties was animated
" with an interior that was ſtill more wonderful, by
" the noble qualities he poſſeſſed of a ſoul truly great,
" he being liberal and magnificent on all occaſions;
" employing his utmoſt endeavours to gain creatures;
" and to win over perſons of all conditions, eſpecially
" the nobility and officers. He was civil, obliging,
" and popular; ever ready to ſerve thoſe who begged
" his aſſiſtance; generous, magnanimous, incapable of " injuring others, even his greateſt enemies, by any " other but honourable means. He had a very per" ſuaſive tongue; diſſembling under the ſpecious ap" pearance of the greateſt candor and frankneſs; wiſe
" and prudent in his counſels; bold, ready and brave
" in the execution; bearing all the inconveniencies of " war with as much chearfulneſs as the meaneſt ſol-
" dier; expoſing himſelf on all occaſions, and con-
" temning the greateſt dangers in order to ſucceed in " any enterprize he had once undertaken . . . . . But " as there is no gold mine, in which this precious
" metal is pure and without a mixture of a great deal
" of earth; ſo the exalted natural endowments of the " Duke of Guiſe were corrupted by a mixture of " many faults and vices, the chief of which was,
" an inſatiable deſire of grandeur and glory, and a
" vaſt ambition to which he made all things ſub-
" ſervient; being, beſides, raſh, preſumptuous, fol" lowing nothing but his own opinion, and deſpiſing
" that of others, without appearing to do ſo. Re-
" ſerved, artful, inſincere, and no true friend; con-
" ſidering nothing but his own intereſt, though he " was the moſt polite and officious man of all men;
" all the good he did to others, being done in no
" other view but to compaſs more immediately his " own ends; and always covering his vaſt deſigns
" with the ſpecious pretence of the public welfare,
" and the preſervation of the true religion; he con-
" fiding too much in his own good fortune; loſing
" and blinding himſelf in proſperity, which made him
" taſte the preſent happineſs, with ſo much pleaſure,
" that he took no care for futurity. In fine, he de-
" voting himſelf too much to the love of women,
" whom nevertheleſs he artfully made uſe of, (and
" without their diverting him from his main deſign),
" to forward and promote, by their intrigues, the
" grand object he had in view, but at the ſame time
" unperceived by them (1)." The dangerous ſpirit of the Guiſes, which Francis I ſaw ſo well through, that he adviſed his ſon to guard againſt it, grew worſe and worſe by deſcent. Hoc adverterat Rex Franciſcus I, & levia licet quæ tunc ab iis cæpta, cavenda nihilominus liberis ſuis edixerat, ut parva ex queis magnarum rerum motus orirentur: nunquam ſatis fidam potentiam, ubi nimia eſt, rebus ſuis proſpicerent, nec majores domus eos crearent, quibus mos erat vim principis complecti, nomen remittere. Utinam Henricus II patris conſilium haud aſpernando liberis ſuis conſuluiſſet, nec Guiſianos rebus gerendis præfeciſſet (2). i. e. " This was ob-
" ſerved by King Francis I, and though the attempts
" then made by the Guiſes were not conſiderable, he
" yet adviſed his children to be aware of them, as " great commotions might ariſe from ſmall beginnings;
" he told them, that an over-grown power ought " never to be truſted; he adviſed them to take care of " themſelves, nor raiſe thoſe to be Major-Domo's of the " palace, whoſe cuſtom it was to exerciſe the kingly
" power without aſſuming the name of it. It were " to be wiſhed that Henry II, in conſequence of the " advice given him by his father, had conſulted his " childrens intereſt, and not have ſet the Guiſes to " preſide in the adminiſtration." What was ſaid by " an old Poet, of the whole Roman people, may be " applied by way of eminence to them (3).

Ætas parentum pejor avis tulit
Nos nequiores mox daturos
Progeniem vitioſiorem (3).

(3) Horat. Od. 6. lib. 3.

The ſenſe is,

Each generation ſtill adds crime to crime,
And ſons are found more vicious than their fathers.

(1) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, liv. 1. pag. m. 18, & ſeq.

(2) Vindic. Secundum Libertat. Eccleſ. Gallic. pag. 6, 7.

[B] Several Hiſtorians have advanced . . . that the Pope's Legate . . . . ſpoke to the King with an air of ſo much gaiety.] Few incidents are more proper than this, to confirm ſcepticiſm with regard to Hiſtory. I ſhall mention this, according to my uſual cuſtom, in the very words of the author who furniſhes me with them.

" Davila the Hiſtorian ſays that after this (4), the " King, coming down into the court, walked a con-
" ſiderable time with the Legate, to whom he gave " an account of all his reaſons, which the Hiſtorian in " queſtion ſets down very much at large, as though he " had been preſent at this long Conference, and that " he had heard, without loſing a ſingle word, all " that the King ſaid to this Cardinal, whoſe political " reflexions, and the anſwer he made to the King's " long diſcourſe, he informs us of. For he relates " that, for fear of leſſening this Prince's love to the " Holy See, he aſſured him, that the Pope . . . . He " adds, that the King promiſed him with an oath
" . . . . that he would not ſuffer in his kingdom any " religion but the Romiſh. That after this oath, the " Legate did not think it proper to proceed in this " conference; and therefore, without ſpeaking at that " time, about the Prelates who were Priſoners, he " treated with him with the ſame confidence as he " had done before. Some even ſay (†), that his free
" behaviour to the King (he ſometimes whiſpering
" him in the ear, and laughing with him) made it
" be thought that this Prince had acted in concert
" with the Pope; and they add with Davila, that this " gave the King an occaſion to go greater lengths,
" and alſo to cauſe the Cardinal of Guiſe to be made
" away with, when he found that little notice was taken
" of the impriſonment of the Cardinal. This is what
" the Authors in queſtion have writ in the moſt ſe-
" vere manner, as tho' it had been an undoubted
" truth: this conference, according to them, having " been held publickly, in the court of the Caſtle of " Blois. Nevertheleſs it is a direct falſhood; and all " that Davila ſays on this matter, is one of thoſe
" fictions which none but poets are allowed to invent.
" This can be proved in the cleareſt and moſt un-
" anſwerable manner. There are extant the printed
" memoirs of the life of Cardinal Morofini written " with great elegance and ſtrength, in Italian, by
" Monſieur Stephano Coſmi, Archbiſhop of Spalato,
" who honoured me ſo far as to ſend them me from " Venice above three years ſince, and we find by
" the Letters (*) of this cardinal Legate to Cardinal
" Moltalto, nephew of Pope Sixtus V, to whom he " gives an exact account of whatever was tranſacted
" there, the 23d of December and the following days;

(4) i. e. after he himſelf had carried the news to Catherine de Medicis of the Duke of Guiſe's death; and after having ſent Cardinal de Gondi to the Legate, to inform him of what had been done, and of the reaſons which prompted him to it, and after he had heard maſs.

(†) D'Aubigné.

(*) Memor. del vit. del Card. Moroſ. lib. 3. cap. 16, 17, 18.

" that had acted in concert. It may be affirmed, that the violent resolution which the French Court took on this occasion, was one of those master-pieces of State-policy, which can be excused upon no other account, than because they are absolutely necessary for the public welfare; for had the Duke not been killed, the States would doubtless have acted the same in his favour, which they had formerly done for Pepin and Hugh Capet [C]; but the transferring of the Crown would have been of much more fatal consequence to the whole Kingdom [D] in the sixteenth Century, than in the time of Pepin and Hugh Capet. The Duke of Guise's party was so powerful, that notwithstanding their Chief had been executed in Blois, they nevertheless supported themselves with so much vigour, that they brought the King himself to his end, and forced Henry IV to forsake his Religion. France cannot call to mind those times without blushing for shame; since there never was any democracy in which the kingly authority and majesty were more slighted, than in that Kingdom in the age we are speaking of. The Preachers inveighed against the King in a furious manner [E], and described the Duke of Guise as a martyr who deserved

" that tho' he had earnestly desired, at the request of the " Duchess of Nemours, to obtain audience of the King, " that day in the morning; he was even refused admit- " tance into the Castle, tho' he employed his utmost " endeavours for that purpose; and had not the desi- " red audience till the 26th, three days after the " Cardinal's death. What Construction after this " shall we pass on all those fine Speeches and of all " those particulars of the pretended Conference of " the twenty-third; and of the Cardinal's speaking " in so soft and easy, or rather in so pleasant a manner " in the King's ear, and laughing so heartily; which " made people think, that he acted, by the Pope's " orders, in concert with the King; who seeing him " behave in this manner, resolved to go still farther, " and also make away with the Cardinal de Guise? " This may justly be called writing a History from one's " own invention, that is, a Fiction, as has been here " done by two Protestant writers (*), d'Aubigne, and the " author of the Transactions which happened at Blois, till the Duke of Guise's death; and our Catholick Historians, by their being imposed upon by those Hugonots, have also imposed upon their readers (5)."

(*) D'Aubigne, tom. 2. liv. 2. chap. 15. Mem. de la Ligue, tom. 3. p. 161.

(5) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, pag. 279, & seq.

If Historians are so grosly misled in incidents of this Nature, how can we depend on a thousand particulars that are still more difficult to be discovered, and which Historians relate with an air of so much confidence? It is to be observed, that this falsity which Maimbourgh has refuted, is still inserted by writers; and I lately read it in a romantick History of the Duke of Guise (6).

(6) Printed anno 1694.

(7) He was threatned with this, in the following distich, which was posted up publickly: Qui dedit ante duas unam abstulit, altera nutat; Tertia tonsoris munc facienda manu This was by way of answer to the motto of the palace-clock, Qui dedit ante duas, triplicem dabit ille coronam.

[C] The States would doubtless have done the same in his favour, which they had formerly for ... Hugh Capet.] Doubtless the chiefs of the Leagues intended to divest Henry III. of the Sovereign Power; to confine him in a Monastery (7), and seat the Duke of Guise on the Throne. The Duchess of Mompensier, this Duke's Sister, made no mystery of this. She (8) one day said to several Persons, showing the golden scissars, (†) , that they should quickly clip the King's hair in order that being confined to a Monastery, he might quit the Throne of which he was unworthy, and thereby make room for a man who was better qualified to sway the Scepter and extirpate the Hereticks. This man was her Brother. Maimbourg does not deny but that the Duke in question aspired to the Crown, at least after the Death of the Valois. He joined, says he, (‡), in the League, in order to make himself the head of the Party, which after the death of the Valois, might raise him still higher. Among other things preparatory for this, a Genealogy had been published, by which the House of Lorrain was made to descend from Charlemagne (9). The aim of this was to show, that the French would only restore the Crown to the descendants of that King who had been deprived of it by Hugh Capet. The decrees of Providence will break through all obstacles, fata viam invenient; but to speak according to the course of human things, it may be said, that Henry III. shortened and made way for them, by his causing the Duke of Guise to be married; for if on one side, the King of Navarre's Situation enabled him to oppose the Usurpation with vigour; it is certain on the other, that there never was a more favourable concourse of Circumstances, than those which paved the way for the Duke of Guise to the Throne, A modern Author had reason to assert, that nothing but the power of fate could have stopped that Duke in his career. The event, says he (10), shows that this Providence, which disposes in a supreme manner of Empires, would divest the Valois of that of France, in order to transfer it to the Bourbons; and there was a necessity, that every thing which might oppose it, should at last (through its unavoidable misfortune) submit to the invincible power of this decree (11), which no Conspiracy, League, Fortune, or any earthly Power could resist. It was the King of Navarre's good Fortune, that he who was so resolute, had not resolution enough when he stood in need of it; and that he who was so weak, grew bold, when it was necessary he should be so. These two Circumstances saved his crown. Henry III. at his waking out of his Lethargy, struck a great blow; but the Duke of Guise had not resolution enough, to abandon himself to the stream of his good fortune. The heads of the League would indeed have crowned him, had he dared to compleat the guilt for which he was justly punished, as great Criminals generally are, when they want resolution. This observation is made by the Author of the romantick History of the Duke in Question. It is certain, and experience comfirms it, that the surest way of succeeding in such Attempts, is not to stop, upon pretence that it would be too great a crime (12).

(†) Thuanus, lib. 95.

(‡) Hist. du Calvin. pag. 491.

(9) See Varillas, Hist. de Henri III, liv. 7. pag. 216.

(10) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, pag. 284.

(11) Apply here what Horace, Od. 35. lib. 1. says so well of Fortune,

Te semper anteit saeva necessitas
Clavos trabales & cuneos manu
Gestans aena: nec severus
Uncus abest, liquidumque plumbum.

[D] The transferring of the crown would have been of much more fatal consequence to the whole Kingdom.] For as the Prince who was to be the lawful successor of Henry III, possessed the most exalted merit, extremely valiant, and supported, not only by those of his own religion, but even by a considerable number of Roman Catholics? the usurper would have been obliged to fight a hundred battles in order to support himself, and both parties would have fought almost to the last man. Now the reader may judge what would have become of France during the furious contest; it would have been a theatre, as it were, of the most horrid tragedies; and to compleat the scandal, religion would have been not only the handle, but likewise the most powerful engine of those bloody operations; and it might have been said more than ever, Tantum Relligio potuit suadere malorum (13)!

" Religion cou'd, such horrid acts persuade.

(12) See the remark [A] of the article EDWARD IV, at the break.

(13) Lucret. lib. 1. ver. 102.

When Pepin and Hugh Capet usurped the crown, things were in a very different situation. The lawful party was so weak, that not a soul dared to appear in their favour, whereby the revolutions were not fatal to particular persons; whence it may be concluded, that there are times, as well as countries, in which such kind of enterprizes are less criminal; because the persons, who head them, may be morally assured that little blood will be shed, since the lawful possessor will be soon abandoned by all his friends; or that so few of these will adhere to him, that he will not be capable of making a resistance, every one joyning with that party which he takes to be the strongest. I have declared more than once (14), that all things have their use in a government. The ingratitude of men of high distinction, their little fidelity, their indolence, and a hundred other defects, are sometimes of greater advantage to the public than their opposite virtues.

(14) See the text of the article DOLABELLA (PUBLIUS) between the citations (b) and (c).

[E] The Preachers inveighed against the King in a furious manner.] " They (15) changed their sermons " into ſerved to be canonized [F]. The people imitated the wild frenzy of the Preachers [G]; and the moſt aſtoniſhing circumſtance, and which the Proteſtants did not fail to make a handle of, was, that the Sorbonne, applauding the ſedition, made ſuch decrees as were entirely republican [H]. The Parliament of Paris heard the complaints of the Duke

(15) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, liv. 3. pag. m. 295, & seq.

" into invectives againſt the ſacred perſon of the King; " and deſcribed in ſo pathetic a manner, the tragical " death of the two brothers, whom they raiſed to the " ſkies as Martyrs, that they melted all their hearers " into tears, and made them vent the deepeſt ſighs (†); " and inſpired them with a ſtrong thirſt of revenge, " inſtead of propoſing St. Stephen as their example, " So that even thoſe who were not prompted to weep " or ſigh; and were offended at ſuch a way, ſo very " unworthy of ſo holy a miniſtry as that of the " word of God, were obliged to feign weeping, " for fear of being knocked down... Francis Pige- " nat... Rector of St. Nicholas des Champs,..... " preaching the Duke of Guiſe's funeral ſermon... " (*) carried his fury to ſuch lengths, as to aſk his con- " gregation, whether ſome one would not ariſe, and " attempt to revenge the Duke's murder, by killing " the tyrant. And, to ſtir up the people, he in- " troduced the Ducheſs, (the widow of the deceaſed) " and who was ready to lie in; and put the following " dreadful words, imitated from Virgil, into her " mouth:

" Exoriare aliquis noſtris ex oſſibus ultor
" Qui face Valeſios ferroque ſequare Tyrannos.

" Let ſome avenger, from my aſhes riſe,
" And on the Valeſian tyrants, dart red vengeance."

(†) Cayet, Chron. Nob. Lettere di Moroſ. Mem. del vit. del detto, lib. 3. cap. 16.

(*) Journal manuſcrit d'Antoine Loyſel.

" (16) The furious Guinceſtre ſhowing, as he was " preaching, ſome ſmall ſilver candleſticks (17), very " beautifully wrought, above an hundred years ſince, " in the form of ſatyrs carrying torches; accuſed the " King of being a wizard, declaring that thoſe were " the idols and figures of devils to whom Henry de " Valois uſed to ſacrifice in his retirement at Vin- " cennes, and who had commanded him to murder " the Duke of Guiſe, Defender of the Faith." Add to this, that (18) the " Pariſh Prieſts and Confeſſors " of the faction of the ſixteen, abuſing ſacrilegiouſly " the power with which they are inveſted by their holy " function, of binding or unbinding, refuſed abſolution " to thoſe who owned to them, in confeſſion, that they " could not help recognizing Henry III as their King.

(16) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 311, 312.

(17) They were found in the Oratories or Chapels of Henry III, at Bois de Vincennes, when the mob plundered them.

(18) M. de Nevers, Traité de la priſé des Arm. pag. 467. cited by Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 301.

[F] ... and deſcribed the Duke of Guiſe as a Martyr.] The Ducheſs of Nemours was revered, in Paris (19), " as the mother of two holy Martyrs; " and the little Feuillant, preaching one day before " her, was ſo enthuſiaſtic as to turn to her, and to " addreſs his ſpeech to the late Duke as follows. O " holy and glorious Martyr of God; bleſſed is the womb " that bore thee, and the breaſts that gave thee ſuck (‡)." Thuanus relates, that this Ducheſs (20) " having " humbly beſought Henry III to reſtore to her the " bodies of her ſons, his Majeſty was counſelled not " to do it, becauſe, as the people were ſo greatly " prejudiced in their favour, they would not fail to " make them worſhip thoſe dead bodies as relicks of " Saints, which would conſequently bring a ſtill " ſtronger odium on the King's perſon (§); and there- " fore care was taken to get the bodies in queſtion " conſumed with lime, by a precaution almoſt like " that whereby God would not permit the Jews to " know where the body of Moſes was. The event " ſhewed, that thoſe who gave this advice to the " King had great reaſon to do it; for among other " extravagant actions committed in Paris, after the " death of theſe two brothers, Thuanus obſerves, " that their effigies, as big as the life, all bloody, " and with the ghaſtly wounds like as when they " were aſſaſſinated, were carried daily to the al- " tars. His accedebant libelli ineptiſſimi de martyrio " fratrum cum imaginibus eorum inſcite pictis nec con- " tenti libris, eorundem effigies juſtâ hominis menſurâ ad " pulvinaria templorum quotidie ſiſtebant, ſanguinolentas, " & pallore violentæ mortis horridas." See the firſt paſſage cited by me in the following remark.

(19) Maimb. ibid. pag. 305.

(‡) Journal de Henri III.

(20) Critiq. Generale du Calviniſme de Maimb. Lettre 3. pag. 37.

(§) In Regis invidiam etiam tanquam beatorum felices exuvias ad adorationem vulgo expoſituros.

[G] The people imitated the wild frenzy of the preachers.] " At the ſame time, that, by vertue of this " unhappy decree (21), he was diveſted of the title of " King, and called ſimply Henry de Valois, the fu- " rious populace employed their impotent malice in " inſults of every kind; they venting their rage in " ſatyrs, invectives, libels, calumnies, and outragi- " ous expreſſions of every kind, the mildeſt of which " was tyrant and apoſtate; they fell, with the moſt " brutal fury, on his arms, ſtatues, and pictures, " which were torn, trod under foot, dragged through " the dirt, burnt, caſt into the river; loading him " with a thouſand imprecations, at the ſame time that " they revered the Duke of Guiſe and his brother as " Martyrs, ſo far as to place their pictures on the " altars (22)." The reader muſt take particular notice of what Maimbourg had ſaid juſt before; as ſoon, ſays he, as the decree of the Sorbonne was publiſhed in Paris, they proceeded on a ſudden to ſuch horrid lengths, and to ſo deteſtable an exceſs of fury, contrary to the duty which ſubjects owe their lawful Prince; that altho' they have been publiſhed by our writers, I yet think it will be better to ſuppreſs them than to profane my hiſtory with a detail which could render it diſagreeable and odious. An act (23) of the pretended parliament, ſent to all the towns which ſided with the League, increaſed the fury of the people, who committed worſe actions than before; nay ſome, by an abominable mixture of parricide, ſacrilege, and magical inchantments, placed waxen images, reſembling the King, on the altars, and pricked them in ſeveral places, uttering certain diabolical words at each of the forty maſſes, which were celebrated for them in ſeveral churches, in order to enforce their incantations, and, at the fortieth, they pierced thoſe images in the heart, as though they gave him the mortal ſtab (24).

(21) i. e. The decree of the Sorbonne.

(22) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 300.

(23) Whereby all the members of this Parliament, being an hundred and twenty ſix in number (including the Princes and Prelates, ſwore, on the crucifix, that they would never depart from their League; but would purſue, by all kinds of methods, the juſt revenge of the death of the two Guiſes, againſt all thoſe who were the authors or accomplices of it. Ibid. pag. 311.

(24) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 300.

[H] The Sorbonne ... made ſuch decrees as were entirely republican.] I took notice elſewhere (25), of the reaſons which prompted me to employ the very words of Maimbourg; and therefore I ſhall not now make any farther apology on that account, but will here cite his very words (26). " The livery-men of " the city took it into their heads to propoſe to the " Doctors of the Sorbonne, not only by word of " mouth, but alſo by an authentic inſtrument ſigned " by the magiſtrates, and ſealed with the Town-ſeal, " the two great caſes of conſcience following: (†) firſt, " whether the French were actually freed from the " oath of fidelity and obedience which they had been taken " to the King; ſecondly, whether they might take up " arms and join together; might levy money; and en- " deavour to defend and preſerve the Catholic, Apo- " ſtolical and Romiſh religion in France (‡); to oppoſe " the deteſtable deſigns and efforts of the King and of all " his adherents, ſince his having violated the public " faith at Blois, in prejudice of the Catholic religion, " the edict of the Holy Union, and the natural liberty of " the States. Whereupon the faculty (conſiſting of " ſeventy Doctors) being aſſembled the ſeventh of Ja- " nuary; after a ſolemn proceſſion, and a maſs of " the Holy Ghoſt, concluded for the affirmative, on " theſe two points, with a common conſent, and with- " out the leaſt oppoſition; theſe are the very words of " the decree; and that they ſhould ſend this reſolution " to the Pope, in order that he might approve and con- " firm it by his authority; and might be graciouſly " pleaſed to ſuccour the Gallican Church, which ſuf- " fered greatly, and was grievouſly oppreſſed. The " Sorbonne, the 5th of April of the ſame year 1589, " made another decree, by which they declare, That " Henry de Valois cannot be prayed for in any eccleſiaſti- " cal prayer, much leſs in the canon of the Maſs, " becauſe of the excommunication he has incurred; and " that the following words, pro Rege noſtro, ought to " be ſtruck out of the Canon, leſt it ſhould be thought " that he is prayed for, though the prieſt, directing his " intention to ſome other perſon, means thoſe who go- " vern, or the perſon for whom God deſigns the kingdom. " They declare that, inſtead of theſe words, three prayers, " pro Chriſtianis principibus noſtris (‡), be ſaid at " maſs out of the Canon; they were printed, and are " ſtill ſeen. Laſtly they add, that thoſe who ſhall re- " fuſe to comply with this reſolution, ſhall be deprived

(25) In the article of GREGORY I, between the citations (46) and (47). GREGORY VII, at the end of the remark [E].

(26) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 297, 298. ad ann. 1589.

(†) Mem. de Ligue, tom. 3. Mr. de Nevers, Traité de la priſe des Armes.

(‡) Mem. de la Ligue, tom. 3.

Duke of Guiſe's widow, who ſued for juſtice on Henry III, for his putting her huſband o death [I]. I ſhall cite an elogium which is found in the Entretiens of Balzac [K]. This

" of the prayers and rights of the faculty, whence they " ſhall be expelled, as excommunicated perſons; which " was unanimouſly approved by all the doctors. Theſe " republican principles ſpread ſo much among the " French divines, that Genebrard, one of the chief " Deputies of the Clergy to the States which were " held in Paris, anno 1593, preached a ſermon be- " fore the Aſſembly, in which, inſtead of exhorting, " by the word of God, the Deputies to devote their whole " thoughts to the preſervation of the government, and of " religion, which is the firmeſt ſupport of it; he en- " deavoured to prove, by very poor reaſons, that their " Aſſembly had power to change and annul the Salic " Law, which is the fundamental law of the ſtate, " and which has been always obſerved inviolably, from " the eſtabliſhment of the French Monarchy to the preſent " time (27)."

(27) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 458.

[I] The parliament of Paris heard the complaints of the Duke of Guiſe's widow, who ſued for juſtice on Henry III, for putting her huſband to death.] The particulars we read in the Critique generale du Calviniſme de Maimbourg (28), with reſpect to the proſecution carried on againſt that King, are curious enough; but here follows what is ſtill more ſo. It was communicated to me by a gentleman of great abilities (29), who has collected a numberleſs multitude of literary particulars, and who is wonderfully well ſkilled in all ſorts of books, though ever ſo ſcarce and little known. He has been ſo good as to write me word, that he is poſſeſſed of a little book, containing ſixteen pages in 8vo, the title of which is as follows. Advertiſement and firſt draughts of the proſecution for the Deputies or Repreſentatives of the kingdom of France, to the pretended States which were to aſſemble in the city of Blois, plaintiffs. The people, and the heirs of the deceaſed Duke and Cardinal of Guiſe, likewiſe plaintiffs, and joined together: Againſt Henry de Valois, third of that name, heretofore King of France and Poland, otherwiſe called the Theſſalonian, in the name and quality which he proceeds in courſe of law, defendant. With the approbation of the Doctors. Sold by Denys Binet, with permiſſion, 1589. The book begins as follows.

(28) Letter 13. pag. 228. of the 3d edit. He cites a very remarkable paſſage of Mr. de Perefixe, Hiſtoire de Henri le Grand.

(29) Mr. Bourdelot, Phyſician to Mr. Boucherat Chancellor of France, and ſince of the Ducheſs of Burgundy.

Advertiſement of the Proſecution.

" The Deputies of the kingdom of France, plain- " tiffs, purſuant to the ſummons and declaration of " Mr. Peter du Four l'Eveque, dated the 12th of Ja- " nuary 1589, on the one part, and the people and " aſſociates, alſo joined plaintiffs on the one part: " Againſt Henry de Valois, in the name and quality " in which he proceeds in courſe of law, defendant " on the other part; declare, in preſence of you the " Officers and Counſellors of the crown of France, " holding the court of parliament in Paris; that " for the cauſes, reaſons, and means hereafter ſet " forth,

" The ſaid Henry de Valois, on account of the " murder and aſſaſſination, committed in the perſon " of the moſt illuſtrious the Duke and Cardinal of " Guiſe; ſhall be ſentenced, as an atonement for the " ſaid aſſaſſination, to make amende honorable (do pe- " nance) he being ſtript to his ſhirt, bare-headed and " bare-footed, with a halter about his neck, attended " by the Executioner; carrying in his hand a burning " flambeaux weighing thirty pounds; which ſaid " Henry ſhall declare in the Aſſembly of the States, " upon both his knees, that he wrongfully, and " without cauſe, either committed, or cauſed to be " committed, the ſaid aſſaſſination in the perſons of " the ſaid Duke and Cardinal of Guiſe; for which " he ſhall beg pardon of God, of Juſtice, and of the " States: that from this time, he ſhall be depoſed as " a criminal, and declared to be ſuch, and denounced " unworthy of the crown of France, renouncing all " the rights he might claim to it; and that for the " things more fully mentioned and declared in the " proſecution, of which he ſhall be found well and " duly attainted and convicted. Farther, he ſhall " be baniſhed to, and confined for ever, in the con- " vent and monaſtery of the Hieronymites, near " the wood of Vincennes, there to live on bread and " water the remainder of his days; he likewiſe is " ſentenced to pay the coſts; and for theſe cauſes ſay, " &c. By theſe means, and others, which the Cour " de Grace may better ſupply, the plaintiffs conclude " with coſts. In the abſence of the Counſellor, " ſign'd

CHICOT.

" Arret of the Supreme Court of the Peers of France, " againſt the murderers and aſſaſſins of the Cardinal " and Duke of Guiſe. Paris, ſold by Nicholas Ni- " velle, 1589, 8vo. with permiſſion.

" The Court, all the Chambers being aſſembled, " having ſeen the petition preſented to it by the Lady " Catherine of Cleves, Ducheſs Dowager of Guiſe, " &c. and heard, at her requeſt, the Attorney-general, " and all things conſidered, has enacted, and ordained, " that the commiſſion be delivered to the ſaid petition- " er, directed to two Counſellors, to examine into the " contents of the ſaid Petition, its circumſtances and " dependencies; to the end that the enquiries being " made, reported to the ſaid court, and communicated " to the ſaid Attorney-general, they may enact as to " them ſhall ſeem fitting. Enacted in Parliament the " laſt day of January, 1589, ſign'd

BOUCHER.

" On the petition preſented this day by Lady Ca- " therine de Cleves, &c. the court, in all the Cham- " bers being aſſembled, has appointed and appoints, " Meſſieurs Peter Michon, and John Courtin, Counſel- " lors, to examine into the contents of the ſaid pe- " tition, its circumſtances and dependencies; and the " execution of the preſent arret ſhall be made by ver- " tue of the extract thereof. Enacted in parliament " the laſt day of January, 1589.

BOUCHER.

" Extracts of the Regiſters of Parliament.

" The court, all the Chambers being aſſembled, " having ſeen the petition preſented to it by Lady " Catherine of Cleves, &c. importing that in another " petition preſented by her, &c. and having heard " the Attorney-general on that ſubject, and all things " conſidered, the ſaid court has admitted and admits " the ſaid de Cleves, appellant, from the grant of " the ſaid commiſſion, the execution thereof, and " all that enſued or may enſue upon it; enacts, that " a commiſſion of the ſaid court be delivered to her, " to ſummon whomſoever it may concern on the ſaid " appeal; and, in the mean time, forbids particu- " larly commiſſioners and all others, to proceed far- " ther; or to attempt any juriſdiction or cognizance " of the fact contained in the ſaid petition, its cir- " cumſtances and dependencies, upon pain of having " their proceedings annulled. The ſaid court enacts " farther, that all ſummons made in general, and " proclaimed in the neighbouring places of ſafe " acceſs, ſhall be as good and valid, as if they were " made to the perſons, or at the habitations of thoſe " whom it will be neceſſary to ſummons. Enacted in " parliament the firſt day of February, 1589, and " ſign'd

DU TILLET.

[K] I ſhall cite an elogium which is found in the Entretiens of Balzac.] I don't doubt but it was written by Balzac, and that being ſo particularly fond of the figure called the Hyperbole, he has exaggerated greatly on this occaſion. But be this as it will, here follow his words:

" France was madly fond of this man; for it would " be too faint an expreſſion, to ſay that ſhe was in " love with him. We are not to wonder that ſhe " deviated ſo much as ſhe did from her duty. Such " a paſſion reſembled very much Idolatry. Some peo- " ple invoked him in their prayers; and others put " the copper-plate repreſenting him in their Prayer- " books.

This Duke was born the 31ſt of December 1550 (c). He married in 1570, Catherine of Cleves, ſecond daughter of Francis of Cleves Duke of Nevers, who died in Paris the 11th of May 1633, aged eighty five years (d). Varillas relates a very ſingular particular with regard to this marriage [L]. They both violated their conjugal fidelity [M]; and if this Hiſtorian may be credited, it was not the huſband who revenged himſelf on his wife's gallant; he contenting himſelf with putting her into a prodigious fright [N]. He left ſeveral children (e).

(c) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 284. ſays that he was killed at 42 years of age; but he is miſtaken in four years.

(d) Hilarion de Coſte, Elog. des Dames illuſtres, tom. 1. p. 301.

(e) He had 14 by her; not in 14 years, as Varillas aſſerts, Hiſtoire de Henry III, liv. 12. pag. 343; for he was married 18 years, and left his Lady with child.

He

" books. As to his Portrait, it was every where. " Some uſed to run after him in the ſtreets, in order to " rub their heads againſt his cloak; and one day as he " was returning from Champagne, and coming into Pa- " ris through St. Anthony's Gate, the people not only " cried to him long live Guiſe; but ſeveral ſung, Hoſan- " na to the ſon of David: (Hoſanna filio David). Some " aſſemblies, that were far from being little ones, were " inſtantly ſtruck with his good mein. No heart " could reſiſt his Face, he perſuading before he opened " his Mouth. It was impoſſible for any one to bear " him ill-will in his preſence. The firſt glance he " darted at his enemies immediately took away all " the rancour from their minds which they had enter- " tained againſt him at their coming; and produced " ſuch an emotion in their blood, and ſo great a " change in their tempers; that they after this were " forced to ſtruggle with themſelves a conſiderable time " before they could reſume the hatred which was dead " in them. So that what I heard a courtier under that " reign ſay, ſeems to me well obſerved, viz. That the " Huguenots were for the League, when they caſt their " eyes on the Duke of Guiſe. I ſhall leave to Hiſto- " rians the relating his actions; and even to extend " their curioſity to thoſe which he meditated. " I ſhall not venture to explain thoſe court-riddles; " my ſpeculations not reaching ſo far. It is enough " for me to believe, without gueſſing, that he muſt " have been a very extraordinary man, ſince his bare " name, after his death, was ſufficient to continue the " war againſt two potent Kings; and ſince the greateſt " captain in Europe, the ſecond founder of this Go- " vernment, Henry the Great, of glorious memory, " took cities and won battles, merely to deſtroy the cre- " dit of a perſon who had been dead ſome time. I " muſt not omit a ſmart ſaying which you will be " pleaſed to hear. It is not of the elogium-kind, " and is aſcribed to Marſhal de Rais's Lady. Thoſe " Lorrain Princes, would ſhe ſay, have ſo noble a mein, " that other Princes in their preſence, looked like ſo ma- " ny Plebeians. This is a pretty bold way of " ſpeaking, and a ſcrupulous Grammarian would ſay, " it was vulgar. But the court is above the Schools, " and does not recognize any more than the church, " the juriſdiction claimed by Grammar (30).

(30) Balzac, Entretien 24. pag. m. 260.

[L] Varillas relates a ſingular Particular with regard to this Marriage.] He ſays (31), that the Duke of Guiſe hearing that Charles IX. reſolved to get him aſſaſſinated, conſulted the Ducheſs of Nemours his Mother, who told him, that he could not ſhun the misfortune with which he was threatened, any otherwiſe than by marrying that very Night (32); and that ſhe undertook to procure him a wife. Accordingly ſhe ſent for the Princeſs of Porcien, who did not think it adviſeable to refuſe the match. Thus the marriage was propoſed, negotiated, concluded, conſummated, and the Ducheſs was with child of a ſon, who was afterwards the fourth Duke of Guiſe; and the whole was tranſacted in the ſpace of four hours. The King being informed of this the next Morning, annulled the order he had given to la Tour Gondy. If this incident were true, I am ſurprized it ſhould have eſcaped le Laboureur; he knowing ſeveral curious particulars relating to the Ducheſs of Guiſe. He relates (33), that the Prince of Porcien, a little before his Death, deſired his wife, whom he ſuſpected had ſome affection for the Duke of Guiſe, not to marry him. You are young, ſaid he to her, you are handſome, and likewiſe rich; all theſe circumſtances joined to that of the greatneſs of your extraction, will invite many ſuitors to you. I approve of your marrying again, and leave to yourſelf the choice of a Huſband, in any part of the Kingdom, except one man. The Perſon I mean is the Duke of Guiſe, who of all men is the moſt odious to me, and I earneſtly intreat you not to let my greateſt Enemy inherit, what I valued more than any other terreſtial Bleſſing. He died of a Fever at Paris in 1564; and ſix years after his Widow, after the comparing the memory of a deceaſed Huſband, with the preſence of ſo conſiderable an object as Henry of Lorrain Duke of Guiſe, was won by his merit, and married to him. This relation and that of Varillas, are little conſiſtent.

(31) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henry III, liv. 13. pag. 342.

(32) The reader is to know, that Charles IX would have put him to death, becauſe he imagined he entertained a paſſion for Princeſs Margaret. See the romantic hiſtory of the Duke of Guiſe, printed at Paris in 1694, where this Princeſs is repreſented ſo very fond of the Duke of Guiſe, that it exceeds all the decorum of romance, but not of veriſimilitude, except that the author ſuppoſes, that, in the moſt favourable opportunities for enjoyment, the lovers always ſeparated without &c.

(33) Le Laboureur, Addit. aux Mem. de Caſtelnau, tom. 1. pag. 390.

[M] They both violated their conjugal Fidelity.] The Duke of Guiſe's amours are pretty well known, they forming part of the picture which Maimbourg has drawn of him, as was ſeen above. " He had ſpent " the night before that in which he was aſſaſſinated " with a Lady of the Queen's houſhold, which was " the occaſion of his coming later to council; and it was " even thought that his bleeding at the Noſe in the " Council-hall, which obliged him to ask for ſome " ſweat-meats, was owing to his having exhauſted " himſelf with that Lady. If you will not take this " on my credit, at leaſt believe Thuanus, whoſe " words I cite in the margin (), and wonder at the " injuſtice of this Duke. Tho' he ſo often violated " his conjugal fidelity, he would not ſuffer his Lady " to pay him in the ſame coin; for he cauſed a hand- " ſome young Gentleman to be cruelly aſſaſſinated, one " Mr. S. Megrin, a Minion of the King's; becauſe of " certain reports which were ſpread with relation to " him and the Ducheſs of Guiſe (). With ſubmiſ- " ſion to the King of Navarre, who had his private " reaſons for approving S. Megrin's murther (34), " this action of the Duke of Guiſe was highly crimi- " nal (35)." We ſhall ſoon quote an Author who declares that the Duke of Guiſe had no hand in St. Megrin's murther. However the Court of France thought he had (36); and the King of Navarre was ſo ſtrongly perſuaded of this, that he ſaid; I am pleaſed that the Duke of Guiſe, my Couſin, could not bear that ſuch a Spark as St. Megrin ſhould cuckold him. In the ſame manner ſhould all trifling Court-ſparks be treated, who preſume to addreſs Princeſſes in an amorous way (37). But the Author I am going to cite does not deny the Ducheſs of Guiſe's intrigues. However it muſt be obſerved, that he does not pretend to warrant the truth of them.

(*) Ultimus comparuit Guiſius, quem ea nocte ſecurum Veneri furtivæ cum quadam Gynæcei matrona, quam perdite deperibat, indulſiſſe, eoque tardius ſurrexiſſe conſtans rumor fuit. Dulciaria quædam Cubicullariis regiis ad refocillandas vires petita, quod tamen ab aliis non tam pavori quàm laſſitudini ex contubernio feminæ illius cum qua concubuerat, contractæ aſſignatum eſt. Thuanus, lib. 93.

(*) Journal de Henri III, 21 July 1578.

(34) See the citation (37) below.

(35) Critique générale de l'Hiſt. du Calviniſme, Lett. 3. pag. 41.

(36) See the Journal de Henri III, pag. m. 31.

(37) Ibid.

[N] He contenting himſelf with putting his wife into a prodigious fright.] Cauſſade Saint Maigrin, a Gentleman of Bourdeaux, became the favourite of Henry III, merely on account of his beauty ... He had the impudence to affirm, that the Ducheſs of Guiſe (*) had yielded herſelf to his embraces. The Duke " of Guiſe being of all men the leaſt ſuſceptible " of jealouſy with regard to women, he was not pri- " vately told, at firſt, the ridiculous vanity of Saint " Maigrin. The Duke's neareſt relations and beſt " friends were made acquainted with it, on which " occaſion they all were ſo urgent with him, that in " order to get rid of their importunity, he promiſed to " take vengeance, firſt of his wife, and afterwards " of her pretended gallant, and accordingly he did " not lie, as his cuſtom was, with her the night " following; but the next morning he came into her " chamber, by four a clock, holding a dagger in his " right hand, and a ſilver porringer filled with a " blackiſh Liquor in his left. He then awaked the " Ducheſs out of a deep ſleep, when reproaching " her with infidelity in few words, he told her, with " an air and tone of voice which were expreſſive " of the greateſt fury and deſpair, that he gave her " the choice, either of being murthered with the " dagger, or dying with the poiſon contained in the " porringer he held (38)." The Ducheſs's intreaties not availing, ſhe took the pretended poiſon, ſwallowed it, and fell upon her Knees, before her little altar, expecting to die every moment; but as this pretended poiſon was the beſt gelly broth that could be made, ſhe received no harm; and an hour after her Husband came and informed her in what manner he had been ſollicited to make away with her; and the whimſical courſe he had taken

(*) In the Memoires of Mr. de Boiſſy. They are in Mr. de Meſme's Library.

(38) Varillas, Hiſt. de Henri III, liv. 12. pag. 343.

He was ſirnamed Gaſh-Faced [O], on account of a wound which he had received in the cheek, in a battle fought anno 1575. The Duke of Mayenne, his brother, ſet himſelf up as head or chief of the League, and in this quality he exerciſed a power which differed very little from that of Monarchs. He might have aſſumed the title of King [P]; but there doubtleſs were ſome reaſons why he contented himſelf with the title of Lieutenant General of the Eſtate and Crown of France, accompanied with an almoſt taken in order to be revenged on thoſe who had given him this advice. The Duke of Guiſe's friends and relations thinking that it would now be impoſſible for them to ſet that Nobleman againſt his Lady, after this attempt, gave it over, and bent their whole thoughts to murther St. Maigrin. Accordingly about twenty men on Horſe-back waited for him, as he was coming out of the Louvre at mid-night; and gave him thirty-three wounds, moſt of which were mortal, with their ſwords or piſtols. The King did not ſeem offended at this, becauſe it was told him, that a man was ſeen among the aſſaſſins extreamly tall, and with hands in a Shoulder of Mutton form, and who ſeemed to be the Duke of Mayenne.

I am to obſerve, that this Ducheſs of Guiſe had been a Proteſtant whilſt her firſt Husband lived; but after his death, ſhe turned Roman Catholic in the chapel of the caſtle of St. Germain en Laye, at the deſire of Queen Catherine of Medicis her Godmother (39).

(39) Hilarion de Coſte, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, tom. 1. pag. 295.

[O] He was ſirnamed Gaſh-faced.] A celebrated Hiſtorian makes a remark which appears to me not juſt. "The Duke of Guiſe, ſays he, (40), Governor "of Champagne, charged the German Horſe, and "defeated them near Chateau Thierry. He was there "wounded in the left cheek, with a Musket, the "mark (*) of which continued to his death, and which "were very glorious with reſpect to the Catholicks, and "of great advantage to him with regard to the Ladies, "who fancy that valiant men are ſo on all occaſions." There is ſome reaſon to ſuppoſe, that marks of valour are a powerful recommendation in the minds of the Fair. Mademoiſelle de Scuderi has ſaid ſomewhere (41), "that though valour is not the virtue of Women, it "is yet certain that they love it; and even ſome-"times act unjuſtly with regard to other good qua-"lities, for the ſake of this; by preferring perſons "who are only valiant, to others who poſſeſs many "virtues inſtead of one." It is certain that women deſpiſe men who are ſuſpected to be cowards (42); and that many put the courage of their Admirers to the trial; I mean that they expoſe them to quarrels, to ſee whether they are capable of behaving with courage in them. How many raſh actions were attempted in the armies of France in the XVI Century, for the love of a miſtreſs, and to gain her favour (43)? Mezerai's remarks cannot therefore be found fault with in all reſpects; but it may be aſſerted, that the reaſon on which he grounds it is not ſolid. It is granted that the Ladies love courageous men, and valiant admirers; but it's not becauſe they are brave in all reſpects; it is rather on account of the exalted fame that is inſeparable from bravery, and which reflects an honour on the miſtreſſes of thoſe who have acquired ſo great a renown. Therefore, when Women prefer Warriors to thoſe of a peaceable profeſſion, and Warriors of diſtinguiſhed bravery to thoſe who are otherwiſe, this ariſes more from pride than from lewdneſs. They think it is more glorious to captivate a man of exalted courage than to enſnare one of a pacifick diſpoſition. The advantage in this reſpect is real, but all the reſt is caſual. Some valiant men do not equal in love combats, thoſe who never ſtirred out of their houſes. Many a Roman, who had ſerved twenty glorious campaigns, and received the higheſt military rewards, was much inferior, with reſpect to the other kind of valour, to an Ovid and an Horace (44), and to an hundred finical fops, very unable to manage a ſword. I do not think that the braveſt man in France could have diſputed on this head, with Zacachriſt; nor that Marſhal de Rantzaw, who bore ſo many glorious marks of his valour, and had many more ſcars than the Duke of Guiſe, had near ſo much ſtrength as the tender Voiture.

(40) Mezerai, Abrege Chronol. tom. 5. pag. 207. ad ann. 1575.

(*) He there was called Gaſh-faced.

(41) In one of the volumes of Clelia.

(42) See the remark [B] of the article CERISANTES.

(43) Brantome ſpeaks of them in many places.

If we trace things higher, we ſhall find that the valiant Hector was not the raviſher of Helena, but the cowardly and effeminate Paris; and we ſhall find that the famous Homer, who painted all the paſſions in ſo natural and happy a manner, quotes the examples of that Poltroon, to ſtigmatize the wild impatience of thoſe who dally with their wives in the day-time. There is not one man in all his poem, who does this but Paris. It is to be obſerved, that he burns with this impatience, even in the midſt of the confuſion with which he ought to have been filled, for having fled but a moment before from a battle. Did not the poet intend thereby to denote the venereal ſtrength of cowards? Plutarch does not ſay ſo; but he perhaps might have aſſerted it with as much reaſon as he had for the following words (45): "To what purpoſe ſhall "I inſtance what Homer ſays of Paris, who, flying "from the field, goes to bed to the fair Helen; for "ſince the poet does not introduce in any other part "of his poem, any man lying with his wife in the "day time; he thereby ſhews clearly enough, that he "looks upon ſuch an incontinence as a very ſhameful "action (46)." See in the ſecond book of the Iliad, the reproaches which Hector made to this fugitive, and here follows what Helen ſaid to him.

(44) He himſelf owns Ode 7. lib. 2. that he run away in a battle; and Suetonius, in Vita Horatii, affirms that this Poet was very immoderate in venereal pleaſures; ad res venereas intemperantior traditur, nam & ſpeculato, &c.

(45) Plut. de audiendis Poetis, pag. 18, F.

(46) Οὐδένα γὰρ ἄλλων ἀνθρώπων ἡμέρας συγκοιμώμενον γυναικὶ ποιήσας ἢ τὸν ἀνόλαστον καὶ μοιχικόν, ἐν αἰσχύνῃ δῆλός ἐστι καὶ ψόγῳ τιθέμενος τὴν τοιαύτην ἀκρασίαν. Idem, ibid.

Quod bene te jactas, & fortia facta recenſes;
A verbis facies diſſidet iſta ſuis.
Apta magis Veneri, quam ſint tua Corpora Marti.
Bella gerant fortes: tu, Pari, ſemper ama.
Hectora quem laudas, pro te pugnare jubeto;
Militia eſt operis altera digna tuis (47).

(47) Ovid. Epiſt. Helen ad Paris. ver. 251. pag. m. 74.

The ſenſe is,

"Thy boaſtings, and recital of thy Deeds,
"Ill ſuit thy ſoft, and even gentle aſpect.
"For Venus thou, and not for Wars wer't born.
"Let Warriors fight, but thou for love wer't form'd.
"Bid Hector, whom thou praiſeſt, combat for thee:
"A different warfare, Paris, claims thy valour.

[P] The Duke of Mayenne . . . . exerciſed a power which differed very little from that of Monarchs. He might have aſſumed the title of King.] News being brought him, at Lyons, of the death of the Duke and Cardinal of Guiſe, his Brothers, he immediately withdrew to Burgundy, of which he was Governour (48); he there aſſembled Troops, and afterwards marched towards Paris. At his coming to Troyes, he was received with the ſame honours which are paid the King. He there acted as Sovereign, diſpatching from thence Commiſſions to the Creatures of the Duke of Guiſe, and particularly to Roan and St. Paul, whom he ordered to command in Champagne and Brie (49). "He came February 12, "1589, into Paris (), where, as tho' they had ſeen "the Duke of Guiſe riſen from the dead in this Per-"ſon, the people were ſo exceſſive in the wild tranſ-"ports of their Joy, that they even exhibited his "Portrait with a cloſe Crown to publick view, and "raiſed a royal throne to him (); and had he been "ambitious and bold enough to ſeat himſelf on it, "there would, perhaps, have been people enough to "recognize him, in order to hold under him Govern-"ments, which he would have beſtowed on them un-"der the title of Dukedoms and Counties with "homage, as Hugh Capet did (50)." But he refuſed to accept of this honour, and would not afterwards ſuffer another to poſſeſs it. He contented himſelf at firſt with eſtabliſhing his authority, by making himſelf the ſtrongeſt in the council of the League (51). "He therein ordered all things according to his will, "in ſpite of the Sixteen, and cauſed himſelf to be "inveſted with an authority which very much re-"ſembled the ſovereign power of Kings. For the "firſt thing agreed upon in this new council was, "that to denote this almoſt abſolute and ſovereign "power which they ſuffered him to aſſume, or gave "to him; he ſhould enjoy, thenceforwards, till the "holding of the States, the very extraordinary and "unparallelled quality of Lieutenant-general, not of "the King (for the League did not yet recognize any) "but of the State and Crown of France (52). He "took

(48) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 294.

(49) Ibid. pag. 315.

(*) Journal MS. de M. Loyſel.

(*) Journal de Henri III.

(50) Maimb. Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 315.

(51) Ibid. pag. 316.

(52) Ibid. pag. 317.

most despotic power that was real. He and the League laid it down as a supposition that the throne was vacant, and thereupon overturned the most solemn and most fundamental Laws of the Kingdom. I shall take notice of an act that was taken surreptitiously out of the Records of the Parliament of Paris [Q], and which will shew, that, in whatever concerns the creation of Presidents of this Parliament, he exercised all the functions of a King. He convened the Estates of the Kingdom (f), and caused them to be held at Paris in 1593. He therein created an Admiral, and four Marshals of France (g). He declared in this Assembly, that the only motive of their assembling, was, to proceed to the election of a King who should be a Catholic (h). But when he found that he took an oath for this new and odd dignity, the (‡) 13th of March, in the Parliament, who confirmed the patent sealed with new seals, that were made in lieu of those of the King which were broke; and, to begin the exercise of his employment by an act of sovereignty (*), he immediately published new laws compris'd in twenty one articles, to unite, under a like form of government, all the cities that had joined in the League, or should hereafter join, the number of which was very great in a short time (53)." He took the field, and attacked the King's army more than once. He brought Spanish forces into the kingdom; and, if he opposed the design which the Leaguers had to elect a King who should marry the Infanta; it was only because he was not to be concerned with this nomination, as he was married, and because it was calculated for the Duke of Guise his nephew. He persisted so obstinately in his rebellion, that he continued to make war on Henry IV, even after the city of Paris had submitted to this Prince, who was then turned Roman Catholic. He did not submit, till after such advantageous offers were made him by the King, that he could hardly have expected so great favours from a monarch who had the highest obligations to him (54). The edict which was enacted in his favour, was dated at Folembrai, the 11th of January 1596 (55).

(f) Maimb. Hist. de la Ligue, pag. 456.

(g) Ibid. pag. 460.

(h) Ibid. pag. 462.

(‡) Journal MS. de M. Loysel.

(*) Cayet, tom. 1.

(53) Maimb. Hist. de la Ligue, pag. 318.

(54) See Maimb. Hist. de la Ligue, pag. 518. & seq.

(55) Ibid. pag. 519.

[Q] I shall take notice of an act, that was taken surreptitiously out of the words of the Parliament of Paris.] I have a copy of it taken from the original, signed Du Tillet. The tenor of this act is as follows.

"Extract of the Registers of Parliament.

"This day the Sieur Duke of Mayenne, Lieutenant-general of the royal State and Crown of France, the chambers being assembled, and the King's Council being present; having remonstrated to the Court the causes of his coming into this city, and leaving a great army; and that since the fourteenth of the last month, the said Court did not sit (56), and there being no President now in it, he had thought it proper to come and advise with them about it, in order to appoint four Presidents, that this great Chamber, and that of the Tournelle, may not be without Heads or Chiefs; and that he may cause Letters-Patents to be issued for those who shall be elected, he not being willing to nominate any of them himself, but refers the whole to the said Court. Whereupon, having called several times upon the Court to name them, and the King's Council being heard, it has been remonstrated to him by Mr. Mathew Chartier, Dean, and the most antient Counsellor, that upon a vacation of the said States, or Offices, the Court used to nominate some of them to the King, out of whom he chose one or two who were put in possession of them. But as there is now no King, and considering the condition of the city; the said Court referred it to him, and desired him to nominate some. And at last, after many excuses he said, that since it was so desired by the Court, and pursuant to the prayer he had offered up in the morning, to Almighty God, and to his Holy Spirit, that this affair might be carried on with the requisite sincerity; he was resolved to nominate, as first President, the Sieur Chartier, eldest Counsellor, before nominated by the Court to be President, whose virtue, integrity, and abilities were universally known; and, for the second President, the Sieur Hacqueville President of the great Council; and for the office of third President, the Sieur de Nully, first President in the Court of Aids, and before invested with one of the said employments; and for the fourth President, the Sieur le Maistre, the King's Advocate he having never seen, that he remembers, the said Sieur Chartier and le Maistre, or any others whom the Court shall think fit to nominate; which nomination being approved by the said Court, the matter being debated; and notwithstanding the excuses and remonstrances of the said Sieur Chartier, on account of his great age of seventy nine years, of his known indisposition, and his being newly recovered from a grievous fit of sickness; and because so advanced age required rest rather than fatigues of such an employment, it yet has been resolved that he shall take the oath of first President in the said Court. And after having sworn that, in order to obtain that employment, he has not given, nor promised to give, or cause to be given, by himself or others, either gold, silver, or any other valuable consideration: and farther, that he will truly and faithfully exercise the said state and office of first President, he has been admitted, and made a profession of his faith to Mr. Stephen Fleury, eldest Counsellor. Enacted in Parliament the second day of December, one thousand five hundred and ninety one. Duly collated. Signed

DU TILLET.

(56) The reader is to know, that after the Sixteen had hanged President Brisson, the Parliament would not meet any more; which obliged the Duke of Mayenne to go to Paris for the affair in question.

FORMULARY of provisions in execution of the abovementioned Arret.

"CHARLES of Lorrain, Duke of Mayenne, Lieutenant General of the State and Crown of France, to all those to whom these presents shall come, greeting. The greatest sign of the authority and holy will of those who have governed States, and what they have been most esteemed for by the Nations subject to them, and, admired by foreigners, has been, when they took care to raise and maintain the two pillars, on which the preservation of all Monarchies is founded, viz. piety and justice. Wherefore, since it has pleased God to call us to the government of the affairs of this Kingdom; after having considered, to the best of our power, the regulations and provisions requisite for advancing the glory of God; our chief intent has been, to fill the posts of the chief offices of justice, with persons of such a life and integrity as was suitable to those employments which we were desirous they should fill. And it having been remonstrated to us, and we being sensible of it, that it was very necessary to fill up the States and Officers of the Presidents of the Court of the Parliament of Paris, lest for want thereof the Court of Justice should be interrupted, as it has been for some time; having resolved to appoint four of them, in order that neither the great Chamber of Pleas, nor the Tournelle may remain without heads; be it known, that after having this day communicated our desires and intentions to the Gentlemen of the said court, the chambers being assembled; and having nominated the four persons whom we judged worthy or qualified for those employments, and whom they have greatly approved, as appears by the act and decree of this day here affixed under the counter-seal; we considering the good and acceptable services which Mr. &c. For such is our desire. In witness whereof we have caused the seal of the Kingdom of France to be affixed to it. Enacted in Paris the 2d of December, 1591. Signed Charles of Lorraine; and on the fold of the Patent, by Monseigneur Pericard."

Mr. Marais a Counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, was so obliging as to send me the copy he had taken of this act. He has also favoured me with some observations on my Dictionary, which give me a high idea of his genius and erudition.

he himſelf could not be elected, for he was married, and was reſolved to make choice of a Prince, who might marry the Infanta of Spain; he artfully diverted that deſign, and ſo much the more earneſtly, becauſe he knew that the Duke of Guiſe, his nephew, was to be choſen King. He was extremely troubled at this nomination (i). His Ducheſs could not bear this, and therefore ſhe adviſed the Duke her huſband to make a peace with the King, rather than be ſo mean-ſpirited as to recognize, as his Maſter and his King, this little boy; for ſo ſhe called her nephew out of contempt. Thoſe who reflect on theſe attempts of the Guiſes, cannot conceive what James Rohault the Carteſian Philoſopher was dreaming of [R], when he wrote the dedication prefixed to his Phyſics.

(i) Ibid. pag. 479.

[R] Thoſe who reflect on thoſe attempts of the Guiſes, cannot conceive what James Rohault the Carteſian Philoſopher was dreaming of &c.] He publiſhed his Phyſics, anno 1671, and dedicated it to the Duke of Guiſe, to whom he addreſſed the following compliment. "Tho' I had been at liberty to deliberate with "regard to the choice; what other protection could "I have deſired for the natural truths I exhibit to "the public, but that of a name which has ever "been deſtined to ſupport the greateſt truths in the "world? Your anceſtors have defended, with ſuch a "piety as is ever worthy of being propoſed as an "example, the divine truths of the faith, againſt "thoſe who declared themſelves enemies to it. Theſe "illuſtrious heroes have maintained at the expence of "their blood and lives, political truths; I mean "the fundamental laws of the ſtate, and the immu-"table rights of our ſovereigns (α), againſt foreign in-"vaders, and the inteſtine fury of rebels; and it was "reſerved for YOUR HIGHNESS, over and above "all this, to be the protector of the truths of nature; "after inheriting the exalted ſentiments of your an-"ceſtors in all other reſpects. We ſhould even ſee, "in imitation of them, the ſame zeal ſhine forth in "the perſon of your Highneſs, if the want of an op-"portunity did not ſuſpend the exerciſe of it under "the glorious reign of the greateſt and wiſeſt Mo-"narch in the world (57)." Were a Poet to write ſuch things, even in very beautiful verſe, one might naturally ſuppoſe, that he had done it, for his ſins, and to expiate ſome great crime; and the following thought of Horace might be applied to him:

(57) Rohault's Dedicat. to his Phyſics.

> Nec ſatis apparet cur verſus factitet, utrum
> Minxerit in patrios cineres, an triſte bidental
> Moverit inceſtus: certe furit (68).

(58) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 470.

> "'Tis hard to ſay, whether for ſacrilege,
> "Or inceſt, or ſome more unheard of crime,
> "The rhiming fiend is ſent into theſe men;
> "But they are all moſt viſibly poſſeſt."
>
> Roſcommon.

What then are we to think of a famous Philoſopher and an able Mathematician, who commits ſuch a folly? had he not perpetrated ſome abominable action, for which he deſerved to be given over to ſo reprobate a ſenſe? To ſpeak in milder terms: has he not diſhonoured his profeſſion. by affirming ſo palpable a falſhood? Let us excuſe his Carteſianiſm to the beſt of our power. In order to this we muſt ſuppoſe, that Rohault did not write his Dedication in quality of a Philoſopher, he having quite diveſted himſelf of that character, and aſſumed that of a Panegyriſt, by the unlucky engagement with which thoſe who write Dedications bind themſelves. An excellent leſſon to divert every good Philoſopher from ſuch a deſign. To go farther, I ſay that the Philoſoper in queſtion, even when he appeared under a foreign character, did not quite ceaſe to be a Philoſopher; and that, if he publiſhed a groſs untruth, it was not through mean adulation but through ignorance. He probably was one of thoſe Philoſophers and Mathematicians, whoſe taſte is confined merely to natural Philoſophy and Euclid; and who deſpiſing all other kinds of learning, do not deign to enquire into the hiſtory of their own country. Perhaps too his application in making experiments againſt a vacuum, on the properties of the loadſtone, and the various refractions of light &c. did not allow him leiſure to read Thuanus or Mezerai; and therefore he knew no more of Meſſieurs de Guiſe's Hiſtory, than their having ſtrongly oppoſed the rebellion of the Hugenots. In this light we may conſider him, in ſome meaſure, as ſincere. But then we muſt not aſſert that his ignorance clears him; for it was not invincible, and he might eaſily have removed it. Any one of his pupils could have told him, of the attempts made by the Dukes of Guiſe againſt Henry III and Henry IV; and the meaneſt Lawyer, or Practitioner in the Law could have told him, that theſe attempts were diametrically oppoſite to the Laws of the kingdom; a total ſubverſion of the moſt eſſential principles of the French monarchy; and a perpetual ſeries of the greateſt crimes of felony and high-treaſon, that can poſſibly be committed. If therefore he was not guilty of ſpeaking againſt his conſcience, he at leaſt may be juſtly accuſed of neglecting to inſtruct himſelf in thoſe incidents which he ſpoke upon. I fancy that his fault lay only here; and I cannot think that he acted againſt his knowledge, in order to ſet up for a flatterer; for had he been but a little acquainted with the hiſtory of the ſixteenth century, and the political ſyſtem of the French, would he have preſumed to incenſe his hero in the manner he has done? Would he have preſumed to praiſe him, as being ready to imitate his anceſtors, in caſe an opportunity ſhould preſent itſelf for that purpoſe? Is not this ſaying in reality, "ſhould an occaſion offer, your Highneſs "will always be ready to raiſe a ſedition in Paris; "to carry on the barricadoes as far as the Louvre; to "force the King to fly; to expoſe him to the moſt "injurious invectives of the Preachers; to proſecute "him before the Parliament of Paris; to depoſe him; "to ſpirit up a Monk to aſſaſſinate him; to exclude "the Dauphin, and all the Princes of the blood, from "the ſucceſſion; to march an army of Spaniards into "the kingdom, in order to prevent their aſſerting their "juſt right &c." We muſt therefore conclude, that Mr. Rohault would not have expreſſed himſelf in ſuch a manner, had he known that his words really implied all propoſitions abovementioned; and therefore, if we are to excuſe this fault, it is becauſe he did not know what he ſaid.

By the way, the Proteſtants are not the only writers who have given a diſadvantageous deſcription of the actions and deſigns of the Guiſes, ſeveral good Roman Catholics having done the ſame. Read a piece that is aſcribed to Lewis Servin, Attorney-general in the Parliament of Paris (59).

(59) Intitled, Vindiciæ ſecundum Libertatem Eccleſiæ Gallicanæ, & Regii Status Gallo-Francorum. I make uſe of the edition of 1593, in 8vo.

§ (α) Baptiſt le Grain, lib. 6. of his Decad of Henry the Great, pag. 635 of the Rouen edition, printed in 1633, ſpeaking of the Duke of Mayenne, ſays expreſsly, that though this Duke was the chief of the League, he would never ſuffer any breach to be made in the fundamental laws of the government; and the edict of Folembrai, dated the 11th of January 1596 (*), applauds the Duke in queſtion, for the affection he had ſhewn, in preſerving the kingdom entire, which he would never ſuffer to be diſmembered, at the time that the proſperity of his affairs ſeemed to offer him ſome opportunity for doing it; as he has not ſince attempted after he was weakned. In all probability Mr. Rohault, being better ſkilled in Philoſophy than Genealogies, took the Duke of Guiſe to whom he dedicated his Phyſics, anno 1671, for one of the deſcendants of the Nobleman in queſtion. Rem. Crit.

(*) Mem. de la Ligue, tom. 6. pag. 376. edit. of 1599.

GUISE. (CHARLES of Lorrain, Duke of), eldeſt ſon of the preceding, was born the 20th of Auguſt 1571. He was ſeized, with many others, on the day of the execution of Blois, and continued in priſon till the month of Auguſt 1591, at which time he eſcaped eſcaped out of the caſtle of Tours (a). The partizans of the League made bonfires for joy in all parts of the Kingdom, and the Pope gave public thanks to the Almighty for it. This young Prince was received in Paris with great acclamations (b), and not only the common people, but alſo ſuch of the Nobility as were concerned in the League, flocked out to meet him. He joined in a ſtrict confederacy with the faction of the Sixteen; but this great proſperity proved the ruin of the party, by reaſon of the jealouſy which it raiſed in the Duke of Mayenne. I have ſpoke of it in the foregoing article. It is ſaid that the Ducheſs of Mompenſier fell in love with this young Duke of Guiſe, her nephew [A]. The latter deprived the League of one of its worthies; he killing the brave St. Pol with his own hand [B]. He was made Governor of Provence, when he ſubmitted to Henry IV anno 1594 (c). He held ſome employments both by ſea and land under Lewis XIII (d); but he was not ſuffered to grow too powerful, and was even forced to leave France, which was owing to the wiſe politics of Cardinal Richelieu [C]. He retired to Florence (e), and died in Cuna in the Sienneſe, the 30th of September 1640. He had married, in 1611, Henrietta Catherina de Joyeuſe, only daughter of Henry de Joyeuſe Marſhal of France, and widow of Henry of Bourbon Duke of Mompenſier (f), and had ſeveral children by her [D]. He is greatly applauded by Marſhal de Baſſompiere (g). I ſhall make a remark with regard to the Duke of Chevreuſe, brother to this Duke of Guiſe [E]. I ſhall

(a) Mezerai, Abr. Chronol. tom. 6. pag. m. 59. See in Book 14. of Paſquier's Letters, pag. 173, & ſeq. in what manner he made his eſcape.

(b) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 435. ad ann. 1592.

(c) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 427.

(d) Idem, ibid.

(e) Idem, ibid.

(f) The daughter he had by this Henry of Bourbon, was married to Gaſton of France, brother to Lewis XIII. This Henrietta Catherina de Joyeuſe, died anno 1656.

(g) In the laſt page of his Journal.

found by ſad experience, that the name of the Guiſes was very powerful, even after that the League was diſſolved. This houſe was, in ſome meaſure, a State within a State; and there was reaſon to fear, that the folly and falſe zeal of the people would idolize it, every time any wars ſhould break out on a religious account. Prudence therefore required, that this power and credit be leſſened; and this the firſt miniſter took care to do under Lewis XIII.

[A] It is ſaid that the Ducheſs of Mompenſier fell in love with this young Duke of Guiſe her nephew.] Here follows a paſſage from Menage (1). "The "Ducheſs of Mompenſier was very much in love with "her nephew the Duke of Guiſe, ſon of Henry the "Gaſh-fac'd. I have formerly ſeen ſome very paſ"ſionate letters which ſhe had wrote to him. Hence "it is that, in the Satire Menippée, when every one "is marſhalled according to his rank, the Herald "cries, Madam de Montpenſier, place your ſelf under "your Newhew." Menage did not call to mind all that the Herald ſaid, and forgot a very remarkable clauſe, there being in the Catholicon, Ducheſs Dowager of Mompenſier, as Princeſs in your own right, place yourſelf under your nephew. See the reflection which the author of the New Remarks on the Satire Menippée makes on this paſſage (2).

(1) Menagiana, Part 2. pag. m. 57.

(2) Pag. 390, 391. of the edit. of 1699.

[B] He deprived the League of one of its Worthies by killing the brave St. Pol with his own hand.] "St. "Paul, a ſoldier of fortune, who had acquired his "ſtile of nobility by his bravery aud conduct in the "army (3)," was one of the four Marſhals of France, created ſuch by the Duke of Mayenne in 1593. This Duke, "after the death of the Duke of Guiſe, whoſe "creature this Captain was, had given him the go"vernment of Champagne, where, after winning Reims, "Mezieres, and Vitry, he had the boldneſs to "ſeize in a forcible manner, on the Dukedom of "Retelois, and to poſſeſs himſelf of it in quality of "Duke, by vertue of a grant which, he declared, "the Pope had made to him of it, as the King "wrote, from the Camp before Chartres, to the Duke "of Nevers. But at laſt, his inſupportable pride, "together with the tyranny which he exerciſed in "that province, occaſioned his being killed by the "young Duke of Guiſe, who thruſt his ſword into "his heart, and by that means laid him dead at his "feet. The cauſe of it was as follows. This Prince "having deſired him, in very civil terms, to with"draw from Reims thoſe ſoldiers he had poſted in "that city, in order to ſecure it; the pretended Mar"ſhal in queſtion, who was determined to be abſolute "maſter of it in ſpite of him, had declared to him in "a haughty tone of voice, laying his hand to his "ſword, that he abſolutely would not do it (4)." It is uſual enough for courageous men, who rebel againſt their lawful Prince, to aim, in ſome meaſure, at independency: but they very often find, that the leader of the rebels, requires a greater ſubmiſſion than the lawful Sovereign. I am of opinion that Henry IV would have been more indulgent to St. Pol's rough behaviour, than the Duke of Guiſe was. It is to be obſerved, that Mezerai lays the whole blame on the Duke, who inſiſting, ſays he (5), upon the conquered poſſeſſion of that brave man, in order to make up matters, quarrelled purpoſely with him one day in the ſtreets at Reims, and run him into the belly. The ſame Hiſtorian obſerves, that Sainct Pol, the day before the barricadoes, had ſaved the Duke of Guiſe's life. How ſtrangely was this ſignal ſervice rewarded!

(3) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 460.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Mezerai, Abr. Chronol. tom. 6. pag. 124. See in the remark [G] below, what Mary de Medicis ſaid of this action of the Duke of Guiſe.

[C] He was even forced to leave France, which was owing to the wiſe politics of Cardinal Richelieu.] It was

[D] He had ſeveral children by her.] I will ſpeak only of the ſons in this place. The reader will ſee elſewhere (6) whatever relates to the daughters. The Prince of Joinville, his eldeſt ſon, died in Florence the 7th of November 1639, in the twenty eighth year of his age, and unmarried (7). The name of his ſecond ſon was Henry, of whom I ſhall ſpeak in the following article. The name of the third was CHARLES LEWIS, his title being Duke of Joyeuſe, and he died in Italy unmarried, the 15th of March 1637. Then Lewis their brother, born in 1622, aſſumed the title of Duke of Joyeuſe. He was Lord High Chamberlain of France; and married at Toulon, in November 1649, Franciſca Maria of Valois, only daughter and heireſs of Lewis Emanuel of Valois, Duke of Engoulême. He died at Paris the 27th of September 1654, of a wound he had received, in charging a party of the enemies near Arras (8). His ſon LEWIS JOSEPH of Lorrain Duke of GUISE, of Joyeuſe and Engoulême, born the 7th of Auguſt 1650, married in 1667 Elizabeth of Orleans, younger daughter of Gaſton of France Duke of Orleans, and died of the ſmall-pox at Paris, the 30th of July 1671 (9), leaving a ſon, viz. FRANCIS JOSEPH of Lorrain, Duke of Alençon, of GUISE, of Joyeuſe and Engoulême, who was born the 28th of Auguſt 1670 (10), and died the 16th of March 1675 (11). In him were extinct all the males of that famous branch of the houſe of Lorrain. There are ſtill many living of the other younger branches of that of Guiſe. See the laſt remark of the following article; and obſerve that ROGER of Lorrain, fifth ſon of our Charles Duke of Guiſe, died Knight of Malta, in Cambray, the 6th of September 1653, in the thirtieth year of his age (12).

(6) In the laſt remark of the following article.

(7) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 428.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid. pag. 459, 460.

(10) Ibid. pag. 460,

(11) Etat de la France 1680, tom. 1. pag. m. 544.

(12) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, p. 428.

[E] I ſhall make a remark with regard to the Duke of Chevreuſe, Brother to this Duke of Guiſe.] He was named Claude of Lorrain, and was ſecond ſon to Henry Duke of Guiſe. He was born the 5th of June 1578, and his firſt title was, Prince of Joinville. He ſignalized himſelf anno 1596, at the Siege of la Fere; and in 1597 at that of Amiens. The King being offended at him, on account of ſome Court-Intrigues, he was obliged to ſerve in the war of Hungary. He was created Duke of Chevreuſe and Peer of France in March 1612, and made Knight of the Holy Ghoſt, the 1ſt of January 1620. He ſerved anno 1621 at the Sieges of St. John of Angeli, of Montauban, &c. and was appointed Lord high Chamberlayn of France, and great Falconer. He was ſucceſſively Governor of the upper and lower Marches of Auvergne, Bourbonnois, and Picardy; and married in quality of proxy of the King of Great-Britain, Princeſs Henrietta Maria of France,

I ſhall make another on the Chevalier of GUISE [F], another brother of his, and who killed within a very ſhort time of one another, the Barons de Luz, father

France, anno 1625; and conducted her into England, with a magnificent retinue. He was at the Siege of Rochelle in 1628. He died at Paris of an apoplexy, the 24th of January 1657, without having any male iſſue, he having never had any but Daughters (13). He had married, anno 1622, Mary de Rohan, Widow of the Conſtable of de Luines, and eldeſt daughter of Hercules de Rohan, Duke of Mombazon (14). It is this Ducheſs of Chevreuſe, who was ſo much talked of during the Court-diſſenſions under Lewis XIII, and the Civil War of Paris under Lewis XIV. Cardinal de Richelieu cauſed her to be baniſhed, upon which ſhe fled into Lorrain, whence ſhe retired to Bruſſels. After the death of Lewis XIII. ſhe had leave to return to France, where ſhe ſoon renewed her intrigues; being ſeconded by the Ducheſs of Mombazon her Mother-in-law. We ſhall ſee proofs of this hereunder (15). She had ſtipulated, during the impriſonment of the Princeſs, that her Daughter ſhould be married to the Prince of Conti (16), but it came to nothing.

(13) Extracted from Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 458, 459.

(14) Ibid.

(15) In the remark [D] of the following article.

(16) See Priolo, lib. 5. cap. 40; & lib. 6. cap. 4.

[F] I ſhall make another Remark on the Chevalier of Guiſe.] He was a poſthumous ſon of that Duke of Guiſe, who was murthered at Blois in 1588, named FRANCIS ALEXANDER PARIS (17). He killed in the open ſtreet at Paris, the Baron de Luz the 5th of January 1613; and a month after, killed the ſon of the ſame Baron; but ſo powerful was this family, that not the leaſt notice was taken of it, even by the Court or by the Judges. This is ſtrongly expreſſed by the following Author (18). "The Chevalier of Guiſe "and the Baron de Luz met one morning in St. Ho-"nore-ſtreet; the Baron being on foot, (19), and the "Chevalier on horſeback. The latter alighted, and "bid the Baron draw his ſword, he unſheathing his at "the ſame time. The Baron did not dream of fight-"ing, and therefore was far from thinking him in "earneſt. However he drew his ſword, but to little "purpoſe. He was advanced in years, and had not "exerciſed himſelf a long time in that way, ſo that "he was no match for a young Prince, who had prac-"tiſed ſo very lately under a fencing maſter. Ac-"cordingly the Chevalier gave him but one thruſt, "which went quite through his Body, ſo that he only "ſtaggered into a Shoemaker's ſhop, and expired "there. With regard to the Chevalier, he mounted "his horſe very calmly, and rode ſlowly to the King's "Stables, as tho' nothing had been the matter. Thus "died the Baron de Luz, for having boaſted, as we "are told, his having been one of the Council of Blois, "which conſpired the death of the late Duke of Guiſe. "The Baron had a ſon of the ſame age with the Che-"valier de Guiſe, who received the News of this ſad "accident, with the grief which an only ſon ſhould "naturally feel at the death of a father .... Every "one talked differently of what he would do, were he "in his place; and every one would have been greatly "puzzled on that occaſion. He was concerned "with a Prince, whom he muſt either kill, or be kill-"ed by him. Should he kill him, he could not be "ſecure in any Chriſtian Country; and to be killed "by the man who had killed his Father, would not "ſatisfy his thirſt for vengeance. To ſeek for ſatiſ-"faction by due courſe of Law, rather than by the "ſword, was not to be ſo much as thought of. The "Chevalier was in the Hotel of Guiſe, where he had "lain, and where no one dar'd to go and ask for him. It "is a misfortune for private Gentlemen to have any "diſpute with Princes; this being like the braſs and "earthen pitchers, which if they ſtrike together, the "latter muſt break. However the King ought to do "juſtice to all his ſubjects, and no Prince whatſoever "is exempt from it (20)." The young Baron de Luz reſolved to fight a Duel with the Chevalier of Guiſe. The Challenge was carried by his Squire, who acquitted himſelf worthily of the commiſſion given him by his maſter. It was a dangerous attempt; for had he been known, and his Deſign been ever ſo little ſuſpected, he would have been thrown from the higheſt Windows of Guiſe; but he went ſo early in the morning, that no body was awake. He entered into the Chevalier's Bed-chamber before day-break, and waking him in the name of the Baron de Luz, beſought him moſt humbly &c. (21). The Chevalier went to the place appointed, killed his enemy, and returned to the hotel of Guiſe, where he was viſited by the Hectors of the Court. Several Poems were wrote on this Battle, under the names of Paris and Lucidor, becauſe the Chevalier de Guiſe's Name was Paris (22). It is to be obſerved, that the Poets declared in favour of the Conqueror; they ſaying that this Chevalier Prince,

Pouſſé d'un de vif reſſentiment
Avoit fait paſſer vaillamment
Au fil d'une juſte cholere
Celuy-là qui s'eſtoit vanté
D'avoir peu (chere vanité)
Empeſcher la mort de ſon pere (23).

The Senſe is,

"Fir'd by ſtrong Reſentment, he had courageouſly "ſacrificed to a juſt Vengeance, him, who from a "ſtrong principle of Vanity, had boaſted that the "night might have prevented his Father's death."

People did not fail to make remarks with regard to the inequality of ſucceſs in combats, where juſtice ſeemed to be equal. If the Chevalier ought to be victorious in the firſt fight, becauſe he ſought to revenge his father's blood; he ought to have been conquered in the ſecond, becauſe he was to give Satisfaction to the ſon of a man whom he had killed; and yet, fate was as propitious to him in the ſecond as in the firſt. This circumſtance ſurprized many people, and ſeveral reflections were made upon it. But ſuch quarrels, generally ſpeaking, are decided according to the greater or leſſer skill, courage, and ſtrength of the combatants, or by the concourſe of ſome fortuitous cauſes; and not according to the more or leſs juſtice. I know not whether any perſon formed two other reflections which naturally ſuggeſt themſelves. The one is, that taking things ſtrictly, the firſt combat was repugnant to the juſt Laws of Chivalry; for a young man, juſt come from the Fencing School, and prepared for fighting, to attack an old Gentleman who expects no ſuch thing; has not drawn his ſword for a great many years; has forgot all the rules of fencing; and, in a word, whoſe arms and legs are weak; is not this almoſt the ſame as if two men ſhould attack one, or if a Lad of fifteen ſhould fall upon a Boy of ten? The other reflection is, that the Guiſes were very unjuſt under King Henry IV. and Lewis XIII. to purſue with ſo inveterate a revenge the Maſſacre at Blois, on thoſe who had been any way concerned in it. Theſe people had obtained a general pardon for all their acts of rebellion, and been indulged as many favours as if theſe had been ſo many ſervices done to their Monarch. Ought they not to have been as indulgent to thoſe who had only executed the orders of Henry III. or had diſſuaded him from an atteempt which he thought very neceſſary to the preſervation of his crown? Ought they not to have included all this under the general Pardon which was ſo beneficial to them? Another reflection might be made, with regard to thoſe who ſo bitterly bewail the loſs, which, according to them, the Princes and great Lords of France have ſuffered in their authority. Power, ſay theſe, is too much concentred, and ought to be divided as formerly. But how can theſe forget the dreadful confuſions to which the Kingdom was expoſed, when the Court had little or no power, during the minority of Lewis XIII? Do they deſire a return of thoſe pretended happy times, in which a Chevalier of Guiſe killed a man of quality in the open ſtreet at Paris; and was not obliged ſo much as to make an excuſe, for that action, to his King, or the Juſtice of his Kingdom?

This Chevalier died at Beaux in Provence (24), about a year after (25). He himſelf was ſetting fire to a cannon which burſt, and carried off one half of his Body .... Being carried into the city of Arles the day after his Death, the populace, crying and groaning after a ſtrange manner, tore the nails out of his Coffin, ript open his Shroud, and finding no change in his countenance, they had his picture drawn, which was ſet up in their Town-houſe, as an exhortation for the living to regret him, and for poſterity to preſerve his memory for ever. But what is ſtill more ſurpriſing, the two chief cities of the Province, Aix & Arles, having a conteſt about his

(17) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 427.

(18) D'Audiguier, vrai & ancien Uſage des Duels, pag. 538.

(19) The Continuator of Thuanus, lib. 6. init. pag. 327; and the Mercure François, tom. 3. pag. 43. ſay he was in a coach.

(20) D'Audiguier, Uſage des Duels, pag. 540.

(21) Ibid. pag. 542.

(22) Mercure François, tom. 3. pag. 50.

(23) Ibid. pag. 48.

(24) D'Audiguier, Uſage des Duels, pag. 552.

(25) Ibid. pag. 550. Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 427. fixes his death to the 1ſt of June 1614.

father and ſon, without being called to account for it in any manner [G]. He ſignalized himſelf in the Carouzal, ſolemnized in anno 1612, and had like to have won the prize, in running for the ring [H].

GUISE

body, and each of them ſtriving to have it, in order to have the honour of burying it; this diſpute could not be ended but by the following expedient, viz. that the one ſhould have the Heart and the other the Body. He alſo was regretted at Court, not only by his relations, but likewiſe by the King and the Queen-mother, who went and viſited the Duke of Guiſe, and condoled him in his palace. But the Princeſs of Conti, his Siſter, grieved to ſuch a degree, that the fineſt writers of that time employed their Pens in comforting her (26). We here ſee ſome ſtrong remains of the idolatry of the French Roman Catholicks for the name of Guiſe. Had thoſe perſons only, who laboured with a perpetual vigilance to live after a Chriſtian manner, loved that name, ſo great a ſcourge to the Huguenots, a Philoſopher would not be ſo much ſurprized. But what ſort of people were the greateſt idolaters this way? Thoſe who were moſt addicted to the common vices, ſuch as uncleanneſs, drinking, gaming, avarice, lying, ſlander and envy. Such are the men, who, to ſupport the temporal proſperity of their religion, and to extirpate what they call hereſy, carry their zeal to moſt undue limits.

(26) D'Audiguier, Uſage des Duels, pag. 551.

[G] Without being called to account for it in any manner.] This reſults manifeſtly from the relation I have extracted from the book intitled, Of the true and antient Uſe of Duels. But I will not employ this teſtimony without examining what is found in Baſſompiere (27). "The Queen was prodigiouſly offended "at the Chevalier of Guiſe for killing the Baron de Luz. I went at the ſame time to the Louvre, where "I found her weeping, ſhe having ſent for the Prin"ces and Miniſters, to hold a council on that affair, "which ſhe laid very much to heart. She then ſaid "to me; You ſee, Baſſompiere, in what manner I "am addreſſed; and how brave an exploit it is to "kill an old Gentleman, without defence, or giving "him the leaſt warning. But theſe are the artifices "of that family. It is like the killing of St. Paul "... (21). The Council was aſſembled in the other "hall, whither I led the Queen, and I happening to "ſtand near her, heard people murmur greatly at "this action; and every one was ſhocked at word "being brought in, that a great number of the No"bility were met in the Hotel de Guiſe; and that "the Duke of Guiſe was to wait upon the Queen "with conſiderable attendance. Upon this, the Queen "was adviſed to ſend Mr. de Chaſteau-vieux to the "ſaid Duke of Guiſe, and forbid him to wait upon "her Majeſty, till ſhe ſhould ſend for him; and to "command, in her Majeſty's name, all the Nobility "who were in his palace, to retire... (29). Mr. de "Chaſteau-vieux obeyed the Queen's command, and "ſaid at his return, that ſome having ſcrupled a "little to retire, the Duke of Guiſe deſired them to "withdraw, ſince the Queen commanded it. Upon "his being aſked who thoſe Noblemen were that "ſcrupled to withdraw, he named three or four, and "among the reſt Mr. de la Rochefoucaut. Some "immediately incenſed the Queen againſt him, who, "as he was Maſter of the King's Wardrobe, ought, "for that reaſon, to have ſhewn more readineſs in "obeying the Queen's orders; and thereupon a reſo"lution was taken to forbid him the Court. They "alſo reſolved, that the Parliament ſhould take cog"nizance of, and enquire into that affair. The Queen "was in ſome meaſure pacified, by the ſpeedy obe"dience of the Duke of Guiſe; and becauſe "upon the Chevalier's coming to his Palace, after "his killing the Baron, he (the Duke of Guiſe) had "not permitted him to ſtay in it, but ſent him into "the country." Marſhal de Baſſompiere adds, that the Duke of Guiſe "ſpoke in ſo ſubmiſſive and "reſpectful a manner to her Majeſty, that ſhe ſoft"ned a little; but that Madam de Guiſe his mother "ſpoke ſo haughtily to the Queen, that ſhe exaſpe"rated her anew; that Mr. de Rochefoucaut was or"dered to leave the Court (30);" that the Duke of Guiſe joyned in the Prince of Conde's faction; and ſaid, ſpeaking of la Rochefoucaut; "yes, by God, he "ſhall come again, and I will not be obliged to the "Queen for it (31);" that the Queen was ſo alarmed at the union of the Duke of Guiſe with the Prince of Conde, that ſhe bid Baſſompiere to offer that Duke an hundred thouſand crowns in ſpecie; the general Lieutenancy of Provence for the Chevalier his brother; the reverſion of the Abbey of St. Germain for the Princeſs of Conti his ſiſter, and la Rochefoucaut's return (32); that the Duke of Guiſe accepted theſe offers, and promiſed to leave the cabal (33). I ſhall conclude with the following words of Marſhal de Baſſompiere (34). "A few days after, the young Baron "de Luz ſent a challenge to the Chevalier of Guiſe, "who killed him. I ſaw another extraordinary thing "in the changes of the Court; the Chevalier of Guiſe "having killed the Baron de Luz, her Majeſty com"manded the Parliament to take cognizance of it; "to make the neceſſary informations, and proſecute "him in due form; and yet, in leſs than a week "after, though he had alſo killed the ſon of the ſaid "Baron de Luz, the Queen ſent to enquire how he "did, after the wounds he had received in the laſt "duel (35)."

(27) Baſſomp. Memoir. tom. 1. pag. m. 274, 275.

(28) See the citation above.

(29) Baſſompiere, Mémoirs, tom. 1. pag. 276.

(30) Ibid. pag. 277.

(31) Ibid. pag. 281, 282.

(32) Ibid. pag. 284.

(33) Ibid. pag. 292.

(34) Ibid. pag. 303.

(35) Baſſomp. Memoirs, tom. 1. pag. 303.

Baſſompiere's relation ſeems contradictory to what I have ſaid in the preceding remark, ſuppoſing d'Audiguier's narrative to be juſt. For we do not here find the leaſt intimation, that the Judges took the leaſt notice of the affair in queſtion, or that the Chevalier of Guiſe was brought into the leaſt trouble: however, theſe two narratives may, in the main, be eaſily reconciled. All the inference which can be drawn from Baſſompiere's relation is, I, that the Queen's Council ordered the Parliament to take cognizance of that cauſe; II, that this order continued in force, till ſuch time as the Duke of Guiſe had gone over to the Prince's faction. But this interval was ſo ſhort, that it is very probable the Parliament had not begun the proſecution, or that it advanced ſo ſlowly, that very few perſons heard of it; ſo that d'Audiguier is very excuſable for not mentioning it. He ſuppoſes that the Chevalier did not lie out of the Hotel de Guiſe, and yet Baſſompiere aſſerts, that the Duke ſent him into the country. I am of opinion that the Duke of Guiſe aſſured the Queen, that he had taken ſuch a courſe with regard to the Chevalier; and I am at the ſame time of opinion, that d'Audiguier is not miſtaken. The Duke knew very well, that Commiſſioners would not be ſent to his houſe, to ſee whether the Chevalier was ſtill there. And it is to be obſerved that all authors agree, that young Baron de Luz's challenge was ſent to the Hotel of Guiſe, where the Chevalier was in bed. The latter therefore uſed to lie there, and his abſence would conſequently have been very ſhort, had he really been ſent into the country, as the Duke affirmed. But the circumſtance which moſt deſerves our attention is, that the relations of Baſſompiere evince ſtill more clearly than thoſe of d'Audiguier, the horrid confuſions and abominable diſorders to which France is reduced, when the Court is not powerful enough to make itſelf to be feared. This is the true way to refute thoſe republican writers, who on every occaſion are crying aloud, that thoſe happy times are paſt, in which power was divided between the King and the Great Lords. Thrice charming muſt be that golden age, in which the Chevalier of Guiſe killed, in the ſpace of a month, a Gentleman and his ſon, and nevertheleſs obtained General-Lieutenancies; and in which a perſon's joining with a Prince's faction, would at once put a ſtop to all proceedings of Kingly juſtice, and be well paid for it beſides. It is to be obſerved, that although Baſſompiere was an eye-witneſs of the tranſactions related by him, he yet does not relate the minuter circumſtances of them, more juſtly than they are told by the common Hiſtorians. He ſometimes is groſly miſtaken. Here follows an inſtance of what is here aſſerted. He declares that (36) only a week paſſed between the death of Baron de Luz and that of the Baron de Luz his ſon; and it is nevertheleſs certain that there was the interval of a month between one and the other.

(36) Ibid. pag. 303.

[H] He ſignalized himſelf in the Carouzal .. and had like to have won the prize in running for the ring.] I ſhall give a commentary on theſe words, not ſo much

GUISE (HENRY of Lorrain, Duke of), ſon to the preceding, was born the 4th of April 1614 (a), and was one of the moſt gallant and moſt accompliſhed Noblemen in all France; as being handſome in his perſon, ſkilful in exerciſes of every kind, witty and courageous. There could be no occaſion to add many fictions to the hiſtory of his life, to give it the air of a romance. He was deſigned for the Church, and a very great number of Abbies were beſtowed upon him [A], and he was even nominated to the Archbiſhopric of Rheims (b); "but having promiſed to marry Princeſs Anne of Mantua [B], . . Cardinal Richelieu found means to deprive him of all his benefices; upon which he retired "to Bruſſels, where he married the Counteſs de Boſſu [C], but left her ſoon after, and "returned to France. Falling a ſecond time in diſgrace, he withdrew to Rome, where "he

(a) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 460.

(b) Idem, ibid.

to give proofs of what I advance, as to have an opportunity to take notice of a Law which is obſerved in this kind of exerciſes. "When ſome of the Knights "or Competitors in running for the ring hit an equal "number of times, they contend for the prize among "themſelves, till ſuch time as one only is victorious. "And if, on the ſame day, their ſkill and agility "are ſo equal, that it is not poſſible to decide who "has the preference; then the whole company have "the privilege of beginning the races anew, as was "done at the grand Carouzal of the late King, in "which the Duke of Vendôme, the Counts de St. "Aignan and de Monrevel, and the Barons de la "Chaſtaigneraye and de Fontaines Chalandray were e-"qual, each having hit the ring twice in three races; for "which reaſon they were obliged to run at it again "thrice, and being ſtill equal, as, by their conquer-"ing, they had debarred others from contending for "the prize, they, by their equality loſt their preten-"ſions to it, according to the laws of thoſe races, "which, in ſuch caſes, inveſt the Lady who beſtows "the prize with the right of beſtowing it. Thus "the races being ſuſpended till another time, the "ring remained in diſpute between the Chevalier de "Guiſe, the Marquis de la Valette, and the Mar-"quiſs de Rouillac, who all hit the ring in their "ſeveral races, ſo that they were obliged to begin "again; when the Chevalier de Guiſe and the Mar-"quis de la Valette having hit the ring but twice, "the Marquis de Rouillac, who hit it every race, "won the prize (37)." The Chevalier de Guiſe belonged to the firſt band or company of aſſailants in this Carouzal, and aſſumed the name of Olivante de Laro. This band was that of the Knights of the Sun, and was headed by the Prince of Conti (38).

(37) [Meneſtrier, Traite des Tournois, Jouſtes, Carouſels, & autres Spectacles publics, pag. 304.

(38) Extracted from the Mercure François, tom. 2. pag. m. 536. ad ann. 1612.

[A] A very great number of Abbeys were beſtowed upon him.] Thoſe of "St. Denys in France, St. "Remy of Rheims, St. Nicaiſe, St. Peter of Cor-"bice, Feſcamp, Mount St. Michael, St. Martin of "Pontoiſe, Orcamp, Chambon and Montirandé (1)." He poſſeſſed benefices to the amount of five hundred thouſand livres per annum, if we may believe the author of The State of France (2), printed in 1657. It is to be obſerved that he was but a child, when an immenſe eſtate, which had been enjoyed by two rich Cardinals, fell to him. He inherited, in 1615, the eſtate of Cardinal de Joyeuſe, his mother's uncle; and in 1621, that of Cardinal de Guiſe his uncle. This particular I read in Preſident de Gramond (3), who obſerves, that Cardinal de Guiſe had an hundred thouſand crowns a year, which the King beſtowed on the young Abbot de Feſcamp.

(1) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 460.

(2) Pag. 53.

(3) Gramond, Hiſt. Galliæ, lib. 8. pag. m. 407. ad ann. 1621.

[B] Having promiſed to marry Princeſs Anne of Mantua.] We ſhall now cite an author, who, ſo far from ſaying that this promiſe was the cauſe of the Duke's being deprived of his benefices, affirms that he had reſigned them, before he had promiſed to marry the Princeſs in queſtion. "This Prince, "being the youngeſt brother, was deſigned for the "Church, and made Archbiſhop of Rheims. After "his brother's death, he gave up his benefices, and "would have married Anne de Gonzaga, ſiſter to "Princeſs Mary abovementioned. Cardinal de Richelieu "knowing that this match was diſadvantageous to the "government, employed the King's authority to put "a ſtop to it, and confined this Princeſs in a convent. "The Duke of Guiſe, exaſperated to find his paſſion "croſſed, left the Kingdom, and withdrew to Colen, "whither his miſtreſs came to him diſguiſed in man's "apparel; but he ſent her back, and went to Bruſ-"ſels, where he found the other exiles (4)."

(4) Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, tom. 2. pag. 179. edit. of 1695.

[C] He married the Counteſs de Boſſu.] The Ducheſs de Chevreuſe, who was then in Bruſſels, brought the Duke of Guiſe acquainted with that Counteſs (5), "who was a young widow, of a ſoft and gay temper. "She was brought into a company where the Duke of "Guiſe was; and ſhe made ſo many advances, that "he could not forbear anſwering them. It is true "indeed that, for fear leſt ſhe (6) ſhould form a diſ-"advantageous idea of her conduct, ſhe ſpoke to him "immediately of marriage; and the Duke ſeemed to "deſire nothing ſo much as to make her his ſpouſe, "but in ſuch terms, as ſhewed that he thought of "nothing ſo much as to divert himſelf during his "exile. Though the Counteſs ſaw through his de-"ſigns, ſhe yet did not ſeem to have diſcovered them; "hoping to win him the more eaſily by her ſimu-"lated ingenuity. She took him one day to a fine "houſe of her's, ſituated at a league from Bruſſels; "and gave him all the diverſions that could poſſibly "be enjoy'd, during that ſeaſon, which was the moſt "agreeable in the whole year. The Duke could not "forbear ſhewing his gratitude to her on that account, "and addreſſing her according to his uſual cuſtom, "in an amorous ſtrain. The Counteſs told him, that "were he really as much in love as he pretended to "be, he would diſcover a more earneſt deſire to marry "her. The Duke ſwore, that there was nothing he "ſo paſſionately deſired, as to ſpend the remainder of "his days with ſo amiable a Lady, and that ſhe "might put him to the trial whenever ſhe pleaſed. The "Counteſs taking him at his word, reply'd, that "ſhe would ſoon ſee whether his proteſtations were "ſincere, there being both a Notary and a Prieſt in "her houſe, who would marry them that moment. "The Duke was ſurprized at theſe words, but con-"cealed his thoughts; and imagined he might pro-"ceed without running any hazard, and catch the "Counteſs in her own ſnare, ſince a marriage "of this kind, devoid of all the formalities preſcribed "by the Canons, and made without the King's con-"ſent, could not ſtand. The Counteſs ſeeing the "Duke inclined to comply with her deſires, ſent for "Manſele Chaplain to the army, who gave them the "nuptial bleſſing, and diſpenſed with their publiſhing "the Bans, as though he had been inveſted with the "ſame authority as the Archbiſhop of Mechlin. The "Duke ſpent the night in that ſplendid palace with "his bride, to whom he was ſo laviſh of his careſſes, "that ſhe was extremely well ſatisfied with the happy "ſucceſs of her deſigns. The day after he returned "home; having firſt deſired the new Ducheſs to keep "their marriage ſecret, till ſuch time as he ſhould "have obtained the conſent of the Court and of his "family. But though the utmoſt care was taken to "hide it from the public, it nevertheleſs reached "the ears of Duke d'Elbeuf and the Ducheſs of "Chevreuſe, who upbraided the Duke of Guiſe with "it, as an action of the utmoſt baſeneſs. The reſ-"pect he owed to Ladies would not permit him to "quarrel with the Ducheſs, but he fell into ſuch a "paſſion with the Duke d'Elbeuf, that they would "have fought a duel, had they not been reconciled "by the Archduke. The Duke finding he had no "hopes left of taking his revenge by the ſword, "ſought other methods to vex the two perſons "who had offended him, and thought the beſt would "be, to take the Counteſs into his palace, and to treat "her publicly as his wife. He accordingly did this, "and lived in good intelligence with her, ſo long "as he continued in Bruſſels." The author, who relates theſe ſeveral particulars, ſuppoſes that the only reaſon

(5) Ibid. pag. 180.

(6) It is qu'elle (ſhe), as here, in the edition of 1694; but I am perſuaded we are to read qu'il (he).

" he endeavoured to get his marriage annulled. From thence he went to Naples, to " command the army of the people; a little after which he was taken priſoner, and " carried into Spain (c)." Theſe particulars are related of him in a book printed at Paris in 1657. This relation wants a ſupplement. It muſt be added, that the Duke of Guiſe was concerned in the treaty which the Count de Soiſſons, the Duke de Bouillon, and ſome other malecontents concluded with Spain (d); that he undertook a journey, publickly, to Bruſſels, for the greater ſecurity of this treaty; that he was proſecuted as a criminal; was condemned for non-appearance the 6th of September 1641, and that he made his peace in Auguſt 1643 (e); that ſome months after he fought a duel with Count de Coligni [D]; and that this quarrel aroſe from a diſpute in which Madam de Longueville, daughter to the Prince of Conde, was concerned. He was victorious, and did not reaſon why the Duke of Guiſe endeavoured to get his marriage annulled was, that he might be at liberty to marry Mademoiſelle de Pons. Here follows another quotation from him (7). " As it would be " impoſſible for the Duke of Guiſe to marry Made- " moiſelle de Pons, without getting his marriage with " the Counteſs of Boſſu annulled, he reſolved to go " to Rome, in order to obtain a divorce from the " tribunal of the Rota. The ſuit was already com- " menced, and the Ducheſs of Guiſe, his mother, " had ſent a Gentleman thither for that purpoſe: " but when ſhe heard that her ſon was fallen in love " with Mademoiſelle de Pons, ſhe ſent orders to her " agent to deſiſt. At laſt the Duke ſet out, and " after having undergone many dangers at ſea, he ar- " rived happily in Florence; and obliged the Grand " Duke to write in his favour to Innocent X, who " was juſt raiſed to the Pontificate. Upon this Prince's " arrival in Rome, he met with a gracious reception " from the Pope, who even, at his requeſt, preſented " Cardinal Mazarine's brother with a Cardinal's hat. " The Duke of Guiſe had flattered himſelf with the " hopes, that this ſervice would engage this firſt Mi- " niſter to favour his deſign; but ſo far from this, the " French Embaſſador was commanded to traverſe it." I am to obſerve, that the queſtion relating to the marriage of the Duke of Guiſe with the Counteſs of Boſſu was debated again not long ſince. The public News take notice, that the Rota at Rome has declared it valid (8), but that the Parliament of Paris have made a contrary deciſion. It conſequently is ſtill a ſubject for controverſy. Adhuc ſub judice lis eſt. We muſt call to mind that Marſhal Baſſompiere relates, that the Duke of Guiſe, who died in 1640, had ſuffered very much in his family by the loſs of his two children, . . . and by the ill conduct of a third, who did not live in a manner ſuitable to his profeſſion (9). He whom this Marſhal calls the third ſon of this Duke of Guiſe was the ſecond, the ſame who courted the Counteſs of Boſſu, who poſſeſſed ſo many Abbies, and led a life ſo unbecoming thoſe, who are deſigned to fill the high employments in the Church.

(c) L'Eſtat de la France, pag. 53. edit. de Paris 1657.

(d) Mem. de Montreſor, pag. 369.

(e) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 460.

(7) Intrig. Galant. de la Cour de France, tom. 2. pag. 234.

(8) See the Mercure Hiſt. for February 1700, pag. 183; but ſee eſpecially the remark [C] of the following article.

(9) Baſſompiere, Journ. de ſa Vie pag. ult.

[D] He fought a duel with Count de Coligni.] This affair made a great noiſe, and I am perſuaded that my readers will be pleaſed to read the particulars of it here. It is a remarkable inſtance of the diſorders which the jealouſy and gallantry of the fair-ſex are apt to occaſion. The reader may depend on the truth of the circumſtances there related; for though it is tranſcribed from an anonymous author, who is ſometimes miſtaken and often confounds incidents, without taking care to keep clear of anachroniſms; he yet had very good informations with regard to the incident in queſtion, and relates it in almoſt the ſame manner as Labardæus, who was a very accurate Hiſtorian (10). " (11) The Ducheſs of Chevreuſe imagining that the " Prince was the chief cauſe of Duke de Beaufort's con- " finement, and the diſgrace of Châteauneuf, reſolved " to be revenged of him. Tho' the Ladies always " flatter themſelves in point of beauty, yet her glaſs " had told her ſeveral times, that her fading Charms " ſtood in need of a younger perſon, to ſtrengthen her " intereſt; and ſhe was not obliged to look for one " out of her own family. The daughter of the Coun- " teſs de Vertus, whom the Duke de Montbaſon her " father had married, was, as I before obſerved, the " moſt beautiful woman in France; beſides, ſhe en- " tertained a ſecret averſion againſt the Prince's ſiſter, " who having married the Duke de Longueville, had " deprived her of a lover; ſo that ſhe found it no " difficult matter to bring her over to her intereſt. " The Duke of Guiſe, who, after his return, had " declared for that beautiful Ducheſs, prevailed with " all the Princes of Lorrain to ſide with him; not to " mention that they ſeemed already prompted to it, " out of reſpect to the Duke de Chevreuſe who was " of the ſame family (12). Theſe two Ladies, be- " ing ſtrictly united, reſolved to begin their vengeance " by aſperſing the reputation of Madam de Longueville. " Accordingly they publiſhed the Letters which this " Princeſs had wrote to the Duke de Beaufort, and " which he had given to the Ducheſs of Montbaſon. " They even forged others, which they aſſerted Ma- " dam de Longueville had wrote to Coligny. The " Princeſs of Conde, being told that the Ducheſs of " Montbaſon had ſpread ſuch a report, diſcovered the " greateſt reſentment on that account, and engaged " all her friends to aid her revenge on this occaſion. " This quarrel occaſioned a diviſion in the whole " Court, and made the Queen fear leſt it ſhould re- " vive the antient hatred between the houſes of Bour- " bon and Guiſe. The two parties were pretty equal; " becauſe that the Duke of Orleans, who had mar- " ried a Lady of the houſe of Lorrain, had declared " for Madam de Montbaſon, therefore this diſpute " might be attended with fatal conſequences; tho' " it was the Queen's intereſt to prevent too ſtrict an " union between the Duke of Orleans and the Prince " of Conde, for fear leſt their authority ſhould pre- " judice hers; nevertheleſs, as it would be ſtill " more dangerous, ſhould ſhe let them carry their " reſentment to extremes, ſhe employed her endea- " vours to reconcile them. Accordingly, ſhe obliged " the Princeſs of Conde and the Ducheſs of Longue- " ville, to receive ſatisfaction from Madam de Mont- " baſon; and that Ducheſs went and declared to the " two Princeſſes, in her preſence, that ſhe had been " no way concerned in ſpreading thoſe reports, and " therefore diſowned them. The two Princes declared " likewiſe, as had been agreed between them, that they " believed it, ſince Madam de Montbaſon ſaid ſo. It was " ſtipulated by the ſame agreement, that this Ducheſs " ſhould avoid all opportunities of medling with the " two Princeſſes, which however ſhe did not obſerve af- " terwards. The Ducheſs of Chevreuſe, having in- " vited the Queen to a collation, which ſhe had pre- " pared for her in Renard's houſe, near the Confe- " rence-gate, took her mother-in-law with her, in " order to aſſiſt her on that occaſion. The Queen " was accompanied by the Princeſs of Conde, who, " ſeeing the Ducheſs of Montbaſon, would have re- " tired; but the Queen detained her; and deſired " that Ducheſs, if ſhe had any affection for her, to " go and divert herſelf ſome where elſe. This the " Ducheſs did, but diſcovered ſo much unwillingneſs " on that occaſion, as highly exaſperated the Queen, " inſomuch that being come back to the Royal Pa- " lace, ſhe commanded her, by Guenegaud, Secretary " of State, to retire immediately to her ſeat in Ro- " chefort. This diſpute ſeemed to be at an end by " the removal of the Ducheſs; but Coligny, not " thinking himſelf revenged of thoſe who would have " put him at variance with the houſe of Bourbon, " to which he had the honour to be related, ſent a " challenge to the Duke of Guiſe by the Marquis " d'Eſtrades. The Duke accepted it, and took the " Marquis of Bridieu for his ſecond. This duel was " fought in the Place Royale, and the Duke of " Guiſe had the advantage in all reſpects, he diſarm- " ing his enemy, after having wounded him in a " dangerous manner; after which he went and ſe- " parated the ſeconds, who had fought with the ut-

(10) See Book 2. de Rebus Gallicis Hiſtoriarum Joannis Labardæi, pag. 71, & ſeq.

(11) Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, tom. 2. pag. 228, & ſeq.

(12) See the remark [F] of the preceding article.

not much dread the conſequences of it, altho' it was a duel in all reſpects, and had been fought in the middle of the Place Royale; and though part of the Princes of the blood were againſt him. But notwithſtanding theſe circumſtances and ſeveral others, and the enquiries which the Parliament of Paris began to make at the ſollicitation of the King's Attorney General (f); the Duke of Guiſe appeared in public, and went and made a campaign the following year (g), under the Duke of Orleans, at the ſiege of Gravelines. However, it is not to be doubted but that this duel was the chief cauſe of the journey he took, ſome time after, into Italy. He was at Rome when the Neapolitans made an inſurrection, and deſired him for their leader. He accepted of their offers, and ſet out the 13th of November 1647 (h). The obſtacles which he was forced to ſurmount, in order to get into Naples (i), were ſuch, that perhaps neither la Calprenede nor Scuderi ever invented incidents that ſuited more a hero of romance. This Duke was received by the Neapolitans with the moſt extraordinary teſtimonies of joy; and it was enacted the 17th

(f) Sarravius, Epiſt. 55. pag. m. 53.

(g) In 1644.

(h) Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, Hiſtory of the Revolutions of Naples, Book 2. pag. m. 72.

(i) Ibid. pag. 73, & ſeq.

" moſt bravery, without the leaſt advantage on either " ſide. This duel gained the Duke of Guiſe great " reputation, and would have heightned the eſteem " which his miſtreſs already entertained for him, had " he perſiſted in his love; but his heart was enflamed " for another ſoon after (13)."

(13) He means, that the Duke of Guiſe fell in love with Mademoiſelle de Pons, maid of honour to the Queen.

It is to be obſerved, that Mr. de la Barde fixes this duel at 1644, and declares that the two ſeconds wounded each other very much. Eſtrada atque Brideus, qui unà cum his alter alteri ſocius decertabant, ambo vulnerati graviter, eorum, qui his intervenere, operâ quominus alter alterum necaret, prohibiti ſunt (14). But Sarrau, in a letter wrote by him a few days after this duel, aſſerts, that d'Eſtrades was not wounded (15), and that the duel was fought the 12th of December 1643. Grotius agrees with him as to the time; for in a letter (16) which he wrote from Paris the 19th of December 1643, he declares, that it was then a week ſince the Duke of Guiſe and Count de Coligni had fought a duel. He obſerves one particular which Sarrau omitted, viz. that the Count was diſarmed. It is ſurprizing that Sarrau ſhould have omitted it. Is it poſſible that a man could write ſo conſiderable a piece of news, without taking notice of ſo very eſſential a circumſtance as this, viz. whether one of the combatants conquered the other; or whether they were parted after having fought with equal ſucceſs? We here ſee an effect of the paſſions and prejudices of men. Sarrau, being a zealous Proteſtant, was very much grieved that the Duke of Guiſe ſhould be victorious. Count de Coligni, Marſhal de Chatillon's eldeſt ſon, deſcended, in a direct line, from Admiral de Coligni. He was a Proteſtant; and his quarrel ſeemed like a revival of the antient enmity between the Guiſes and Chatillons. For theſe reaſons Sarrau wiſhed very heartily, that this Count might be victorious in this combat. It grieved him to hear of his diſadvantage; he would have hid it from himſelf; but as it was not in his power to do this, he at leaſt hid it from others. This is the reaſon why he made no mention of it in the letter he wrote to Salmaſius. Such is the diſpoſition of men's minds upon their hearing news that is diſpleaſing to them. They ſtrive not to believe it, and in caſe they have not ſtrength of mind enough to impoſe upon themſelves, nor to aſſert that it is falſe, they at leaſt ſpare themſelves the reſtraint they would be obliged to put themſelves to, in caſe they ſhould make a plain confeſſion of it, or acquaint thoſe with whom it was till then unknown. Some days after, Sarrau wrote word to his friends, that the Prince of Conde would abſolutely oblige Duke d'Enguien, who had harboured Count de Coligni in his houſe, to ſend him away; and that this unhappy Count took ſanctuary in a Miniſter's houſe (17). He died of grief (18), five months after the duel (19).

(14) Labardæus, de rebus Gallicis, pag. 74.

(15) Solus Stradius invulneratus receſſit. Sarravius, Epiſt. 55. pag. 53. edit. Ultraj. His letter is dated from Paris the 18th of Dec. 1643.

(16) Grotius, Ep. MDCXXX. Part 2. pag. 719.

(17) Sarravius, Epiſt. 57. p. 55.

(18) Collinius mœrore & tædio vitam finivit. Priolus, lib. 2. cap. 9.

(19) About the cloſe of May 1644. Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, p. 244.

Whoſoever reflects ſeriouſly on this duel, cannot but highly applaud Cardinal de Richelieu's great wiſdom, in ſending the Ducheſs of Chevreuſe out of the Kingdom. Thoſe Ladies who employ their wit and beauty, to inſinuate themſelves into ſtate intrigues, are the peſts of a Court. The ſafeſt courſe is to get rid of them as ſoon as poſſible, and ſend them to grace foreign Countries. Had the Ducheſs in Queſtion continued in Paris, after the conſpiracy of Chalais, her favourite gallant (20), ſhe herſelf would have hatched many. We find that ſhe was no ſooner returned to France, but ſhe laid the foundation of that unhappy duel which proved fatal to Count de Coligny, a young Nobleman who might have done great ſervices to the Crown; a duel in which Mr. d'Eſtrades might have loſt his life; a Gentleman whoſe genius and bravery might be of great advantage to the Kingdom, as he manifeſted afterwards both in the cabinet and the field, by his military actions, and the important embaſſies in which he was employed. If we examine into the duel of the Duke of Guiſe and Count de Coligni, we ſhall find that it aroſe from the ambition of the Ducheſs de Chevreuſe, who employed the jealouſy of another Ducheſs as an inſtrument on this occaſion (21). Theſe two Ladies, who agreed perfectly well together, tho' one was ſtep-mother to the other, contrived a ſtory, that was highly injurious to the reputation of a Princeſs of the Blood. Here follows the origin of this duel. A Plot, attended with ſuch conſequences, would, from that conſideration only, create horror. But the thing will appear in ſtill more horrid colours, if we expoſe the motives of Revenge on which it was grounded. Was it out of kindneſs for the Ducheſs of Longueville's Husband; was it to revenge an injury done to his honour, that a ſtory was ſpread to the diſadvantage of that Ducheſs? No; it was from a far different thirſt of Vengeance; the Husband's honour, ſo far from being repaired, ſuffered ſtill more. A married Lady was reſolved to be revenged of this Ducheſs, becauſe ſhe had married the Duke of Longueville, and thereby deprived her of a gallant. To revenge this offence, certain expreſſions were dropt, which, among other conſequences, occaſioned a famous Duel which hiſtory has tranſmitted to us; and ſuch was the means by which the Step-mother and the Daughter-in-law have acquired an immortal name; for their conduct will be known, ſo long as the French hiſtorians of the reign of Lewis XIV. ſhall exiſt. Some perſons are of opinion, that the true merit of a woman conſiſts in prudently concealing, under the veil of modeſty, her moſt exalted qualities, in ſuch a manner that they may not afford a Subject either for authors or converſation (22). Such a moral precept is very rigid, and perhaps too much ſo; and therefore it may not be improper to ſoften it, and to ſuffer a Lady to be inſpired with the ambition, of having her name enrolled in the Temple of Fame, and the writings of an hiſtorian. But then ſhe ſhould deſire to be mentioned only by authors, who, like Valerius Maximus, give a catalogue of the moſt ſhining examples of piety, chaſtity, conjugal love, charity, conſtancy, &c. Women might very juſtly deſire a place in ſuch a work: but when their conduct is ſuch, as muſt reflect eternal infamy on them if tranſmitted to poſterity, either in hiſtory, or in pieces written in the taſte of the new Atalantis; this deſerves all the indignation which the heart of man can poſſibly harbour.

(20) See the Miniſtre du Card. de Richelieu, tom. 1. pag. 310 and 317; and the Hiſtory of the ſame Cardinal, printed at Amſterdam 1694, tom. 1. pag. 303.

(21) Noverca, a ſtep-mother, a name that is expreſſive of ſtill greater enmity than that of Soccrus.

(22) See the remark [D] of the article JUDITH.

By the way, writers differ with reſpect to the manner in which the Court of France deſcribed its reſentment to the Ducheſs of Chevreuſe, at the time of Chalais's affair. Some ſay, that this Ducheſs was baniſhed to Lorrain; and thoſe are the very words of the Author of the hiſtory of Cardinal de Richelieu printed at Amſterſtam in 1694 (23). Preſident de Gramond ſays barely, that this Lady ſecured herſelf by flight; and yet that ſhe would have been impriſoned, had it not been on account of her ſex. He adds, that the confining of her would have proved of the greateſt benefit to the publick, both within and without the Kingdom, ſhe raiſing combuſtions in moſt of the Courts in Europe. Fuga item conſulit ſibi Duciſſa Capruſii multis rea nominibus: ſexus fragilitas, & veneratio inhibuerant nuper, quo minus & ipſa in carcerem traheretur: certe magnum

(23) Pag. 303. of tom. 1. ad ann. 1626. See alſo Miniſtere du Cardinal de Richelieu, tom. 1. pag. 319.

17th of November, that he ſhould be ſtiled Generaliſſimo of the Army, and Defender of Liberty, with the ſame honours the Prince of Orange enjoyed in Holland, under the protection of his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty (k). He ſtruggled with many difficulties whilſt he exerciſed this new employment, and exhibited many proofs of his great genius and bravery; but Fortune was his enemy. The French Court not being able, or not willing to ſuccour him, he could not ſupport himſelf, and was forced to make many dangerous attempts, which proved ſo fatal to him, that he was taken by the enemy, who carried him into Spain, where he was impriſoned a conſiderable time. He afterwards recovered his liberty in Auguſt 1652 (l), at the ſollicitation of the Prince of Conde (m); and it is thought that the Court of Spain conſented to it the more willingly, becauſe they flattered themſelves with the hopes, that the Duke of Guiſe, at his return to France, would create new diviſions and factions in that Kingdom (n). It is univerſally thought, that the reaſon why the French Court neglected to ſuccour him was, becauſe they were not deſirous that he ſhould eſtabliſh his authority in the Kingdom of Naples; and judged that it was more for their intereſt, that the inhabitants of this country ſhould be under the power of the Spaniards, than ſubject to the Houſe of Lorrain? When the Duke of Guiſe was returned to France, he did not endeavour to form cabals, in order to make up the Prince of Conde's affairs, but ſpent much more of his time in amorous intrigues; and though he undertook an expedition, in order to recover his authority in Naples [E], yet this was rather

(k) Ibid. pag. 74.

(l) Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 460.

(m) See the remark [E].

(n) See the ſame remark.

magnum erat Galliæ, magnum principibus externis ab ea detentione beneficium, auctrice paſſim in res novas intra & extra Galliam eâ fœmina, aularumqae ferme tota Europa omnium perturbatrice, quod ſuo infra loco reddemus (24). The true relation of this Affair is, that ſhe firſt was ordered to leave the Court; and that afterwards ſhe was kept in Cuſtody, notwithſtanding which ſhe found an opportunity to eſcape out of the Kingdom. Perdifficilia Reginæ tempora hanc diligentiſſimè coluerat, atque obſervaverat (Rohana Mombaſon) atque eâ cauſâ & Ludovico XIII. & Richelio inviſa, Aulâ pulſa, in cuſtodiam conjecta, poſtremò fugâ ſibi conſulere, atque in Hiſpania, & Belgio exulare coacta fuerat (25). De la Barde (whoſe words theſe are) had reaſon to obſerve, that ſhe became odious to Lewis XIII. for we read in Rochefoucaut's memoirs (26), that the reaſons why the Queen was wavering and irreſolute with reſpect to the recalling of the Ducheſs de Chevreuſe, was, a particular clauſe of the declaration, and a ſtrange averſion which the King had diſcovered againſt her in his expiring moments.

(24) Gramond, Hiſt. Galliæ, lib. 10. pag. 701. ad ann. 1626.

(25) Labardæus, Hiſt. de Rebus Gall. lib. 2. init. pag. 71.

(26) Pag. m. 14.

This Lady died in Auguſt 1679, in the 79th year of her age (27).

(27) Merc. Galant. Auguſt 1679, pag. 121. Dutch edit.

[E] He ſpent much more of his time in amorous intrigues; and undertook an expedition, in order to recover his authority in Naples.] This expedition was formed in 1654. The Duke poſſeſſed himſelf of Caſtell'a-mare, but loſt it a little after (28). Here follows a paſſage from Priolo, which ſhows that the Duke of Guiſe's releaſe from his confinement, was of no advantage either to the Spaniards or the Prince of Conde. Guiſius ante paucos annos dux electus Reipublicæ Napolitanæ, & inter ſævos tumultus captus ac deductus in Hiſpaniam, nunc libertate donatur, id maximè procurante Condæo. Iberica fuit vafrities, Guiſium Galliæ redonare, & Condæo concedere; ut qui avorum non immemor, poſſet rurſus moliri nova, & ciere turbas. At oblitus donatæ libertatis, & Condæi negligens, choreas & haſtiludia cogitavit. Rurſus ab eo tentatum iter Neapolitanum oſtentui fuit, renovaturum in animo levi ſpes acciſas per vanum ludibrium. Nullus mortalium tam vana concepit, editus atavis, qui tam grandia, tam ſolida captabant (29). i. e. "The Duke of Guiſe having been elected, a few years before, general or chief of the common-wealth of Naples, and being amid cruel tumults, taken Priſoner, and carried into Spain; is now releaſed, and that chiefly by the interpoſition of the Prince of Conde. It was Spaniſh craft to give back Guiſe to the French, and comply with the deſires of Conde; ſince by recollecting the actions of his forefathers, he might have raiſed new commotions. However, Guiſe being forgetful of the gift he had received (his Liberty) and neglecting the Prince of Conde, his thoughts were wholly employed on balls and tournaments. The expedition he afterwards attempted to Naples, was merely for oſtentation ſake; no man, deſcended from anceſtors who had attempted ſuch noble, ſuch ſolid exploits, having ever entertained ſuch vain and idle notions." Labardæus relates, "that the Queenmother

(28) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, p. 461.

(29) Priolus, lib. 8. cap. 5. pag. m. 312.

"had conſented to the exchange propoſed by the "Spaniards. They had offered to releaſe the Duke "of Guiſe, upon condition that the French ſhould re"ſtore to them all the Priſoners of their party. But "upon ſecond thoughts, they conſidered that the Duke "of Guiſe might be a powerful inſtrument in the "Prince of Conde's hand, in order to foment many "troubles in that Kingdom, and therefore releaſed him "at that Prince's requeſt. However, the inſtant "the Duke was returned to France, he declar"ed, that ſince he had been ſo ill uſed by the "Spaniards, he therefore would not do any thing in "their favour; nor would ſhow any gratitude to the "Prince, ſo long as he ſhould continue in their in"tereſt; but ſtill, that he would exert himſelf to the "utmoſt to ſerve him, provided he would break off "from it. He thought himſelf, however, greatly o"bliged to the Queen-mother, ſince ſhe had done the "Duke the honour to conſent that, in order for his "releaſe, four thouſand Spaniards (ſome of whom "were conſiderable perſonages) ſhould be delivered "up (30)." Be this as it will, the Duke ſpent more time in making love, than in war. At his return to Paris he was more paſſionately fond of Mademoiſelle Pons, than he had been before his impriſonment, and he reſolved to marry her (31); but hearing that ſhe was unfaithful to him, he gave her very ſhameful treatment. He even ſued her at Law, demanding back ear-rings, valued at fifty thouſand crowns, and a rich ſuit of hanging, both which he had given her. However, he had not the ſucceſs with which he had flattered himſelf on this occaſion; the loſs of his ſuit redoubled his anger, inſomuch that he was determined to go to her houſe, and inſult her in it (32). The Ducheſs got notice of this, and thereupon ſecured herſelf from the Affront; and ſome time after this left the Kingdom. The Duke of Guiſe hearing that ſhe was gone (53), went on board with the King's Fleet, in order to make a ſecond Voyage to Naples (34). At his return to France, he fell in love with Mademoiſelle de Gorce, who had a more ſincere affection for him: and after his death retired to a Monaſtery of Carmelites, and there took the habit (35). Theſe ſeveral particulars ſhew, that if he was a Hero, he was not one according to the notions of Corneille, but to thoſe of Racine and Quinault. He was an ever-amorous hero (36), and ſometimes reſembled him of the Æneid. He enjoyed all the privileges which appertain to a Husband; he ſuffered his miſtreſs to perſuade herſelf that ſhe was his wife; and at the ſame time never intended to marry her. Thus ſhe reſembled Dido,

Nec jam furtivum Dido meditatur amorem:
Conjugium vocat, hoc prætexit nomine culpam (37).

That is,

"The Queen, whom Senſe of Honour could not move,
"No longer made a ſecret of her love;
"But call'd it marriage, by that ſpecious name,
"To veil the crime, and ſanctify the ſhame.

DRYDEN.

(30) Extracted from Labardæus, lib. 10. pag. 756. ad ann. 1652.

(31) Intrigues Galantes de la Cour de France, pag. 251.

(32) Ibid. pag. 253.

(33) Ibid. pag. 254.

(34) It is to be obſerved that, in order to clear himſelf, he publiſhed a relation of this pitiful expedition. It is inſerted in a Recueil Hiſtorique de diverſes Pieces, printed in Holland in 12ma, anno 1666.

(35) Intrig. Gal. de la Cour de France, pag. 258.

(36) See the Life of Henriette Sylvie de Moliere, Part 1. pag. m. 55, 56. and Part 2. pag. 162, 163.

(37) Virg. Æn. lib. 4. ver. 171.

And

rather out of oſtentation, than from any hopes he had of ſucceeding in it, and accordingly it came to nothing. He was appointed Lord High Chamberlain; that poſt being vacant ſince the death of the Duke de Joyeuſe his brother (o). He was ordered in 1656 to go and meet the Queen of Sweden who was coming into France. The Court could not have made a more judicious choice; no man being better qualified to execute ſuch commiſſions, and whatever required pomp and magnificence. He made a moſt ſplendid figure in the famous Carrouſal ſolemnized in 1662. He headed the troops or band of Moors on that occaſion. Nature had formed him for ſuch ſort of ſhews and feſtivities; and no man in the world would have better ſuited the times of tournaments and knight-errants. A very remarkable particular is related, concerning the extraordinary talent he had, in order to make the Ladies fall in love with him. It is ſaid that thoſe who had a paſſion for him, could tell by a certain emotion or fluttering at the heart, and without ſeeing him, whether he was preſent [F]. He fell ſick, and died in Paris the 2d of June 1664 (p), and was carried to Joinville, in order to be buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors [G]. He left no children; all his brothers died before him; and his two ſiſters died ſince unmarried [H]. His Memoirs were publiſhed in 1668; and an elogium was made (o) He died in 1654.

(p) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grands Officiers, pag. 460.

And thus the Duke of Guiſe reſembled Æneas,

——nec conjugis unquam
Prætendi tædas, aut hæc in foedera veni (38).

That is,

" I never hoped a ſecret flight from hence;
" Much leſs pretended, to the lawful claim
" Of ſacred Nuptials, or a Husband's Name.

DRYDEN.

(38) Idem, ibid. ver. 338. See the remark [B] of the article GARNACHE, where a Duke de Nemours and a Lady de Rohan, are in circumſtances like to thoſe of the Duke of Guiſe and Counteſs de Boſſu.

But it does not follow from thence, that the Duke's adventures are of the heroic kind; here being nothing in them but what are often found among the lower ſort of Gentlemen and Tradeſmen?

[F] It is ſaid that thoſe Women who had a Paſſion for him, could tell without ſeeing him, whether he was preſent.] I do not relate this as fact, I only mentioning it as a particular I have read. Theſe two lovers, that is the Duke of Guiſe and Counteſs de Boſſu, *muſt have had a violent paſſion for each other; and I wonder how it happened that their love ended before their Life. They had a ſecret fore-knowledge, which told them of their being together in the ſame place, a long time before they ſaw one another; and do you your ſelf, Madam, judge whether this fore-knowledge was juſt. The Duke was grown jealous of Count de * * , who indeed had a ſtrong paſſion for the Counteſs, and is known to have been an extreme handſome man. However, ſhe did not love him; and notwithſtanding whatever has been ſaid to the contrary, Angelica ſwore to me, that Madam de  loved no one but the Duke of : But then, he was not ſo well perſuaded as he ought to have been of his felicity; and being told every day that his rival was very aſſiduous, and very paſſionate, he reſolved to examine unperceived, into the truth of it, and came for that purpoſe incognito to Bruſſels, where great rejoicings were made for the birth of a Prince, born in Spain, and named Balthaſar (39). .. The Duke being arrived, was " told, that ſeveral young Noblemen of that Country " made a maſquerade of Indians, in which diſguiſe he " himſelf went to the Counteſs de Cantecroix, where " was to be a very large Aſſembly. He got one of thoſe " habits brought to him, which was not a difficult " matter, there being no orders to conceal them. He " then ordered juſt ſuch a habit to be made for him-" ſelf, when going among the Masks, he entered the " Ball-room with them. He there ſaw Madame de, " who appeared more lovely in his eyes than ever, " and the Count de  near her; for he conſtantly " frequented thoſe Aſſemblies; which ſhe could not " prevent, becauſe of the reſpect which his quality " claimed. . . . The moment the Duke came in, the " Counteſs felt that certain emotion which his preſence " uſed to inſpire. She could not think this emotion " fallacious; and notwithſtanding her lover had writ " word to her, that he was going upon a Journey, " which was a fiction, ſhe yet ſought for him at-" tentively among the Masks, and at laſt diſcovered " him. This blazed their paſſion; for the Lady in " her firſt tranſports, at ſeeing him again, could not con-" ceal her thoughts; and the lover was ſo over-joyed, " that he forgot the reaſons he had ſtill to conceal his " paſſion. I have ſeen an original Letter of the Duke " on this effect of Sympathy; and that Letter ſeem-" ed to me exquiſitely well written. He therein com-" plained of the exceſs of this felicity; he confeſſing " that it was a very great one, to be thus diſcovered " by one's Miſtreſs: But he obſerved on the other " ſide, that this deprived him of the pleaſure to ſee " what paſſed in her heart, when ſhe had no mind to " let him know it. Theſe kinds of Diſcoveries were, " in his opinion, one of the moſt exquiſite joys that a " lover could taſte; and nothing appeared, to him, " more affecting, with regard to tender Souls, than " thoſe openings or diſplays of tenderneſs and ſin-" cerity, in which art and foreſight cannot be ſuſpected " to have any ſhare (40)."

(39) This chronology is erroneous; for Balthazar was born in 1629, and the Duke of Guiſe was then but 15 years of age; and it is to be obſerved that Father Anſelme, pag. 441. of his Palais de l'Honneur, ſays, that he married in Dec. 1641, Honorine de Berges, daughter of Count de Grimberghe, widow of Albert Maximilian de Hennin Count of Boſſu.

(40) Vie de Henriette Sylvie de Moliere, Part 6. pag. 151, & ſeq. Dutch ed. 1674.

[G] He ... was carried to Joinville, in order to be buried in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors.] I obſerved elſewhere (41), that the Barony of Joinville was raiſed to a Principality in 1552. It fell to the houſe of Lorrain, by the marriage of Ferri de Lorraine, firſt of that name, with Margaret de Joinville, eldeſt daughter of Henry V of that name, Count de Vaudemont, and Lord of Joinville, which Ferri was killed at the battle of Agencourt anno 1415 (42). Renatus II Duke of Lorrain left, by his laſt will dated the 25th of May 1506, to Claude his younger ſon, the eſtates of Guiſe, Elbeuf, Aumale, Mayenne, JOINVILLE, and others which he poſſeſſed in France (43). The tombs of the Dukes of Guiſe are in St. Lawrence's Church at Joinville. See the deſcription of that of Claudius in Remi Belleau (44).

(41) The citation (k) of the article (FRANCIS Duke of) Guiſe.

(42) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 455.

(43) See the Miniſtere du Cardinal de Richelieu, tom. 1. pag. m. 237.

[H] His two ſiſters died unmarried.] The name of the one was Mary, who was born the 15th of Auguſt 1615, and was known under the name of Mademoiſelle de Guiſe (45). I have read ſomewhere (46), that ſhe was upon the point of marrying Uladiſlaus, King of Poland. The other ſiſter, called Frances Renata, was born the 10th of January 1621, and was put into a Monaſtery. She was Abbeſs of St. Peter at Rheims, and afterwards of Montmarte (47). After the death of theſe two daughters, there remained neither male or female of the branch of Guiſe; and it is to be obſerved, that though the firſt four Dukes of that name had each a great number of ſons, nevertheleſs their whole poſterity is extinct, except that of Renatus de Lorrain, Marquis of Elbeuf, eighth ſon of Claudius firſt Duke of Guiſe. All the Princes of the houſe of Lorrain, now in France, deſcend from this Renatus. They are ſtill very numerous, and in a flouriſhing condition. If the title of Duke of Guiſe ſhould be beſtowed on any perſon, he will find it a very heavy burden. By the way, I know not who is now poſſeſſed of that Dukedom. I could not receive, time enough, the Memoirs I had requeſted, with regard to the conſequences of the laſt will of Mademoiſelle de Guiſe. She had enjoyed the title of Ducheſs of Guiſe for many years, and died in March 1688. She bequeathed by her laſt, the Dukedom of Guiſe, worth an hundred thouſand livres a year, to the Duke of Lorrain's younger ſon, with the principality of Joinville, worth not much leſs; and her fine hotel in Paris, upon condition that he ſhould go by that name, and live in France, with the good pleaſure of the King (48). The writer who publiſhed theſe particulars, adds the following words. " But beſides that this donation " was

(44) Folio 134. Part 1. of his works, Lyons edit. 1522.

(45) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Officiers, pag. 428.

(46) In a work intitled, L'Etat de France.

(47) Anſelme, Hiſt. des grans Offic. pag. 428.

(48) Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique, for March 1688, pag. 279.

made on them by Abbé Gallois (q). See the article CERISANTES.

(q) In the Journal des Savans of the 12th of Nov. 1668.

" was diſpleaſing to the King, the Duke of Elbeuf " pretends that it is doing him injury, he being the " next heir in the male line. He therefore has al- " ready begun a law-ſuit, in order to get it declared " void, eſpecially with reſpect to the Dukedom of " Guiſe; aſſerting that the late Ducheſs could not " diſpoſe of it in his prejudice. . . (49). The de- " ceaſed Lady is ſuſpected to have been clandeſtinely " married to the late Mr. de Montreſor, a Gentleman " of quality and merit. It was even reported that " they had ſeveral children, two of whom, girls, " ſurvived. This report prevailed eſpecially four " years ſince, when that Princeſs made a deed of gift " to the Prince of Harcourt, which however had " no effect. It was pretended, that the money he was " to give her, was to ſerve as portions for thoſe two " daughters; but whether they died ſince, or that the " whole was a mere fiction, it is certain that no " mention is made of them in her will (50)."

(49) Ibid. pag. 280.

(50) Ibid. pag. 281.

GUISE (LEWIS of Lorrain, Cardinal of). There were three Cardinals of this name, the firſt being brother to Francis of Lorrain, Duke of Guiſe; and the ſecond was ſon to the ſame Duke. Moreri has ſpoke of both theſe (a), but made no mention of the third, for which reaſon I will take notice of him only. He was ſon to Henry of Lorrain Duke of Guiſe, killed in Blois, and was born in 1575. He was of ſo martial a temper, that he breathed nothing but war, though he was an Eccleſiaſtic, a Cardinal, and Archbiſhop of Rheims. He followed the King in his expedition to Poitou in 1621; and ſignalized himſelf among the braveſt and moſt intrepid in the army, at the attack of a Suburb at the ſiege of St. John d'Angeli (b). Falling ſick ſome days after, he ordered himſelf to be carried to Saintes, and died there the 21ſt of June 1621. His law-ſuit with the Duke of Nevers, concerning a Priory, turned to a quarrel; and the Cardinal ſeemed very much inclined to draw the ſword on that occaſion. I have given ſome particulars of this affair below [A]. He declared, on his death-bed, his repentance, for the (a) Under the word Lewis.

(b) See Malingre, Hiſt. de la Rebellion, tom. 1. pag. m. 297, 298; and tom. 7. of the Mercure François, pag. 515.

[A] His law ſuit . . . turned to a quarrel . . . I have given ſome particulars of this affair below.] " (1) During " the ſiege of St. John d'Angely, Cardinal de Guiſe " died at Xainctes of a fever, which he got by over- " application. He was a Cardinal, but only a Dea- " con, and had never chaunted Maſs. He was a " Prince of a diſpoſition wholly martial, and whoſe " mind was more addicted to arms than letters. " Several have writ concerning the quarrel between " him and the Duke of Nevers, with regard to the " collation to the Priory of Charity, and of what " had been tranſacted at the houſe of the Advocate " who was to make a report of their cauſe. Thoſe " perſons who, by their writings produced in the ſuit, " put theſe two Princes at variance, were the occaſion " of their coming to blows, and their leaving Paris, " with their reſpective friends, in order to meet and ter- " minate their quarrel at the expence of their lives. " But his Majeſty having ſent his Light horſe to ſeize " upon their perſons, he who headed them, and was " expreſly ordered to arreſt the ſaid Cardinal, exe- " cuted his Majeſty's Command, and brought him " to Paris; where for fear of a ſecond ſally, be- " cauſe the Duke of Nevers was ſtill abroad, he was " carried one Evening to the Baſtile, and from thence " to Bois de Vincennes (2)." Preſident de Gramond relates ſome other curious particulars, viz. that the Cardinal of Guiſe, meeting the Duke of Nevers in the houſe of the Advocate who was to report his cauſe, immediately addreſſed him in very injurious expreſſions; that the Duke anſwered him in as ſevere terms, upon which the Cardinal ſtruck him with his fiſt, in preſence of the Advocate who was to make the report. Prince de Joinville, brother to this Cardinal, immediately drew his ſword, and ſtruck ſeveral times, with the flat ſide, Monſieur Mareſcot, Maſter of the Requeſts, who, with his Majeſty's permiſſion, managed Duke de Nevers's affairs. The King knowing that this Duke wanted to fight a duel with the Prince of Joinville, interpoſed his authority in order to reconcile them, and obliged the Cardinal to aſk the Duke's pardon. With regard to the affront which had been put upon the Maſter of Requeſts, it was atoned for as follows. The Prince of Joinville was forced to ſpeak the following words before the Umpires. Mr. Mareſcot, out of conſideration for the Duke of Nevers, I am ſorry that I beat you. I deſire you therefore to obliterate the remembrance of it, and to believe that I will be your friend, for the ſake of Duke de Nevers. Preſident de Gramond makes a very ſolid remark on the diſorders and irregularities of thoſe times, in which a Maſter of Requeſts might be caned with impunity. This diſorder was owing wholly to the diminution of the royal authority, and ceaſed the inſtant that Cardinal de Richelieu had caſt down, at the foot of the throne of Lewis XIII, all thoſe Princes and Noblemen of high diſtinction, who uſurped a very conſiderable part of the ſovereign power. Does not this ſavour very much of anarchy, viz. that in a country which bears the title of a Kingdom, thoſe perſons who have caned and abuſed a conſiderable Magiſtrate, ſhould not be obliged to ſay, that they are ſorry, on account of the quality and character of that magiſtrate, for what they have done, but only out of affection for the perſon of high quality whoſe affairs he managed? Weigh well the following words of Preſident de Gramond. Principum per ea tempora ſumma erat ratio, affectabantque diſtingui ab omni ordine, prærogativa ſanguinis. Per injuriam Joinvillius percuſſerat magiſtratum, & ait dolere ſe ex perſona Niverni, quod percuſſerit; quaſi adeo infra poſitus in quem collata offenſa, ut gratis cædi poſſet. Erat hæc labes ejus ætatis, qua à principibus Rex parum diſtinguebatur: quo jure utimur hodie, nempe anno M. DC. XLII. quo hæc ſcribo, externi principes parum à Regni primoribus, parum hi à nobilibus differunt, uno ferme ordine habemur omnes; eoque ventum ut nemo publice, nemo privatim peccare poſſit ſine ultore, quod ejus ſapientiæ & æquitati debitum, qui ætate noſtra ſummam rerum tenet in Gallia (3). i, e. " The higheſt regard " was paid to the Princes of the blood; and they af- " fected to be diſtinguiſhed from every rank and order, " by the prerogative of their birth. The Prince of " Joinville had wrongfully beat a Magiſtrate, and " ſaid that he was ſorry for it, on account of the " Duke of Nevers; if the injured Magiſtrate was ſo " greatly inferior to him, that he might be ſtruck with " impunity, it was the ſhame and reproach of that " age, in which little diſtinction was made between " the King and the Princes of the blood. But in the " year in which I now write, 1642, foreign Princes " differ little from the chief men of the Kingdom, " and theſe but little from the Nobles. We now " ſeem to conſiſt almoſt of one order; and things " are come to that pitch, that no man can offend " either publicly or privately without an avenger; " for which we are obliged to the wiſdom and equity " of that man, who now heads the adminiſtration in " France."

(1) Mercure François, tom. 7. pag. 570, 571.

(2) It is to be obſerved, that he did not continue long in it; for, a little after, the King intending to go into Poictou, ſent for him to Fontainebleau to accompany him. Ibid. pag. 571.

(3) Gramondus, Hiſt. lib. 8. in fin. pag. 408.

Abbé de Marolles will furniſh us with ſome other particulars. About the beginning of the winter in 1620, ſays he (4), the Duke of Nevers had a great quarrel with the Cardinal of Guiſe, for the Priory of Charity, dependent on the Abbey of Cluni; for, having procured it to be conferred, by the Court of Rome, on the Prince of Timeraye his ſecond ſon, on a letter or promiſe of the Cardinal of Guiſe, Abbot of Cluni; and this Cardinal wanting to go from his word, in favour of one of his ſons whom he had had by the Lady des Eſſars, it occaſioned a mighty law-ſuit, which made ſo much noiſe that it divided all the perſons of diſtinction

(4) Marolles, Memoirs, pag. 45, 46.

(c) Aulico luxu & militari licentia traduxerat vitam. Gramond, Hiſt. lib. 8. pag. m 407.

(d) Idem, ibid.

the licentious life he had led (c), and the injury he had done the Duke of Nevers (d). Preſident de Grammond cenſures our Cardinal for concerning himſelf with war, in which a man muſt imbrue his hands in blood; but ſpares him as to the article of fornication [B], which, though infinitely more common among the Clergy than the military functions, is nevertheleſs an infraction of the Canon Law.

To conclude, I believe ſome reflections have been made on this, viz. that the deſcendants of the ſame Prince of Conde, whom Francis of Lorrain, Duke of Guiſe, endeavoured to deſtroy, are become heirs to the deſcendants of that Duke [C], in at Court... It was found a very difficult matter to pacify theſe quarrels, becauſe ſome blows were ſtruck on both ſides; and the Duke of Nevers who was firſt offended, miſtruſting nothing, had no time to draw his ſword, which Fouques his Gentleman held out of the chamber of the Advocate that made the report, where he was alone.

[B] Preſident de Gramond cenſures our Cardinal for concerning himſelf with war .... but ſpares him as to the article of fornication.] He employs the antitheſis following (5): Militiam effectabat, impatiens ſui; non miles, quia Cardinalis; non item Cardinalis, quia miles erat .... Indebitum certe characteri, quod in Engeriaca obſidione ſæpe ferrum in hoſtem ſtrinxit; immemor Eccleſiam neſcire ſanguinem. i. e. "He ſeemed to be fond "of warfare from a ſort of ſelf-impatience; he not "being a ſoldier, becauſe he was a Cardinal; and "not a Cardinal, becauſe he was a ſoldier .... He "certainly did not act in character, when, at the ſiege "of St. John d'Angeli, he frequently drew his ſword "againſt the enemy; forgetting that the church is a "ſtranger to blood," Perhaps ſome one will ſay, that the only reaſon why he did not ſpeak of the amours of this Cardinal, was becauſe he knew nothing of them, but I myſelf cannot fancy that he was ignorant of them; they having been too public, and children having been got on that occaſion. The Chronique des Favoris printed anno 1622, ſuppoſes (6), that a diſpute aroſe between Cardinal of Guiſe and the Duke du Mayne, concerning who ſhould firſt ſtep into Charon's boat. The Cardinal ſaid, that he was the firſt who died, and conſequently that he ought to go into it firſt. This the Duke could not deny; but then he remonſtrated that he ought to go in firſt, becauſe he had been killed in the King's ſervice, whereas the other had died only of ſickneſs. The Cardinal replied, that he had left his wife and children for God's cauſe, of which he deſired no other witneſs but the Duke de Nevers; whereas he, the Duke du Mayne, had not left any thing of that kind. It was univerſally known at that time, that this Cardinal had cohabited with one of the miſtreſſes of Henry IV, I mean Charlotte des Eſſars. This was imprinted the ſtronger in peoples memories, becauſe this woman had been ſo fortunate as to be married to a perſon of high quality, notwithſtanding the public diſgrace ſhe had brought upon herſelf; after ſhe had had children by one of the Kings of France, and afterwards by an Archbiſhop of Reims (7). Mr. du Hallier, who perhaps would have thought it beneath him, to marry Charlotte des Eſſars at a time when her reputation was unſpotted; did not ſcruple to make her his wife, after ſhe was quite ruined in her character. He was a perſon of quality, and brother to a Marſhal of France (8). He was Knight of the order of the Holy Ghoſt, and Captain of the Life-guard; and had exhibited proofs of that military virtue, which afterwards raiſed him to the dignity of Marſhal of France. Nevertheleſs, in his marrying, he contented himſelf with the leavings of a Cardinal. The public could not forbear taking notice of this incident. There is ſuch frequent occaſion to cite examples of this kind, that this ſort of adventures are ſeldom forgot. But at a time when that in queſtion was, perhaps, very little taken notice of, there aroſe certain perſons who laid claim to Mademoiſelle de Guiſe's eſtate, which called up, in people's memories, all the particulars of that affair. Read what follows, which is extracted from the Hiſtorical and Political Mercury, for April 1688. "The Marchioneſs d'Acy, "wife to the younger brother of Count de Gamache, "Knight of the King's orders, diſputes at this time "the eſtate belonging to the houſe of Guiſe; and that "by vertue of a certain box brought her by a perſon "unknown, in which ſhe found a marriage-contract "between the Cardinal of Guiſe and Mademoiſelle "Des-Eſſars, mother to Count de Romorantin, her "father, who was always reputed that Cardinal's "baſtard. This contract is enforced with the nuptial "bleſſing, made in due form; and farther, with a "diſpenſation from the Pope, impowering that Car-"dinal to poſſeſs his benefices, notwithſtanding his "marriage. In fine, nothing ſeems wanting but a "ſupport powerful enough to be able to contend for ſo "great an eſtate with thoſe concerned in it. However, "from what quarter ſoever that box may come, it "very probably may occaſion a great deal of noiſe "in the Law Courts, eſpecially as it is in the hands "of a Lady, who has learned all the chicane of the "law, as though ſhe knew the want ſhe would one "day have of it. Since this happy diſcovery, ſhe "has taken off the bar, which was in her arms, as a "token of illegitimacy. But ſhe may juſtly fear that "ſhe will ſoon be obliged to fix it in again, ſhe being "oppoſed by the Prince of Conde, who pretends to "be the chief heir of that houſe, in right of the "Princeſs of Conde his wife; and as there is ſo "great a diſproportion between them, the box may, "in time, be found ſuppoſititious." It is to be obſerved that the author of the Mercure ſuppoſes (10), that this Cardinal of Guiſe was he who was murdered in Blois; but it is a miſtake.

[C] The Deſcendents of the ſame Prince of Conde, whom Francis of Lorrain, Duke of Guiſe, endeavoured to deſtroy, are become heirs to the deſcendents of that Duke of Guiſe.] It is here that I muſt introduce the Memoir, which I did not receive till after the page (11), where I might have inſerted it conveniently, was printed off. This Memoir will acquaint us with the law-proceedings which the marriage of the Duke of Guiſe and the Counteſs de Boſſu occaſioned, and the foundation of the pretenſions of the Prince of Conde who gain'd the ſuit.

"(12) The 16th of November 1641, there was a "marriage between the Duke of Guiſe and Honorée "de Berghes, at that time relict of Count de "Boſſu.

"The 9th of June 1666, there was a definitive "ſentence pronounced, contradictory to that of the "Rota, which declares the marriage valid ad quoſ-"cunque effectus, & dictam Comitiſſam veram & legi-"timam conjugem. Note, the Duke of Guiſe was "then dead, but then he had produced in Rome his "inſtruments and vouchers in his life-time. Note "farther, that during this time, Mademoiſelle de "Guiſe obtained certain ſentences of the Law-courts, "which annulled the proceedings of the Rota; for-"bid ſuing in that court; and all the ſerjeants in "France were forbid to preſent any ſummons for that "court, or to execute the ſentences of it. The Coun-"teſs de Boſſu acted, all the reſt of her life, as Du-"cheſs of Guiſe. She for ever aſſerted the validity "of her marriage, and always inſiſted upon the exe-"cution of it. She had flattered herſelf with the "hopes of getting it recognized in France, by the "recommendation or authority of the League, or of "the King of Spain at the Treaty of Nimeguen in "1678. But the French party was too powerful "there; and the Miniſters of France refuſed abſo-"lutely to hearken to any affairs relating to the "intereſts of private perſons. Counteſs de Boſſu "attempted this ſeveral times, but all to no purpoſe, "and died in 1679, having appointed Count de "Berghes, one of her nephews, her heir. Count "de Berghes regulated the affairs of the ſucceſſion, "and got together all the inſtruments or writings of "the marriage that were diſperſed in Rome, Paris, "Madrid, Vienna, the Netherlands, and other coun-"tries. By the favour of the truce of Luxemburg, "he came to Paris, and there put in his demand, at "the Chatelet, the 3d of Auguſt 1687, againſt Ma-"demoiſelle de Guiſe, as heireſs of her late brother, "that

(5) Gramond. Hiſt. lib. 8. pag. 407.

(6) Chronique des Favoris, pag. 14.

(7) Father Anſelme, pag. 441. of the Palais de l'Honneur, ſays that Cardinal of Guiſe left, by Charlotte des Eſſars, three ſons and two daughters; that the eldeſt of the ſons was Biſhop of Condom; the ſecond, Count de Romorantin; killed in Candia in the Venetian ſervice, and father to the Marchioneſs d'Acy. I omit what he ſays of the third ſon, and of the daughters.

(8) Of Nicholas de l'Hoſpital, Marquis, and afterwards Duke of Vitri.

(9) Mercure Hiſt. & Politique, April 1688, pag. 375, 376.

(10) Ibid. pag. 386, 387.

(11) At the cloſe of the remark [H] of the preceding Article.

(12) Memoirs, communicated to me by Mr. Dalencé.

in no longer time than about an hundred and thirty years.

" that the contract of marriage, of the 16th of November 1641, might be executed againſt her; and thence, that all the contracts and other rights reſulting from it, might be judged in his favour. Mademoiſelle de Guiſe immediately obtained an arret of the Parliament, containing the following prohibitions, viz. to proceed in the court of the Chatelet; to ſtyle the Counteſs of Boſſu, Ducheſs of Guiſe; to make any demands on account of that pretended marriage; and all Serjeants were forbid to give any ſummons for that purpoſe. March the 8th 1688, Mademoiſelle de Guiſe departed this life; after having made ſeveral wills and codicils, the laſt whereof is dated the 2d of March 1688. A war broke out during this interval, which contributed to keep things in ſuſpence. At laſt, a peace being concluded at Ryſwick, Count de Berghes returned to France, honoured with the title of Prince and Knight of the Golden Fleece. He renewed his demand the 25th of October 1698, not to the Court of the Chatelet, but directly to the Parliament. He demanded, by vertue of a commiſſion under the great Seal, to be admitted opponent to the execution of the ſentence or arret of 1687, and the other two pronounced a long time before, againſt his aunt; and that juſtice ſhould be done him on his oppoſition: together with the appeal lodged by Mademoiſelle de Guiſe and my Lords her heirs, concerning the ſolemnization of the marriage and the ſentence of the Rota, bringing his firſt demand, from the Chatelet, petitioning, that all the contracts and other rights of marriage ſhould be judged entirely in his favour. On this illuſtrious controverſy, ſentence was pronounced, the morning of Jan. 5, being Tueſday, 1700, in the great Chamber, purſuant to the concluſions of Mr. Dagueſſeau, Advocate-General, Mr. Robert, and Mr. Nouet Council for the parties, and Mr. de Harlay being Preſident; after fifteen hearings, ſeven of which were taken up by Robert, ſix by Mr. Nouet, and two by Mr. Dagueſſeau, by which, having conſidered the petition of the Prince of Berghes, the Court ordains, that the information made againſt Honorée de Berghes Counteſs of Boſſu ſhall be rejected; without regarding the oppoſition made by the Prince of Berghes to the execution of the decrees of 1665, 1666, and 1687; doing juſtice on the appeals from the Eccleſiaſtical Court, both of the celebration and procedures made at the Rota, and the ſentences there intervening; declares the marriage to have been unjuſtly ſolemnized, and therefore void. In conſequence whereof the Court rejects the demands of the Prince of Berghes, depending on the queſtion relating to the marriage; ſentences him to pay coſts; and ordains, that, with regard to other demands, he may take his courſe."

It appears evidently from the genealogical table printed during this law-ſuit, that Anne Palatine of Bavaria, conſort to the Prince of Conde, was right heireſs to Mademoiſelle de Guiſe; for ſhe deſcended from the Duke of Mayenne, ſon of Francis of Lorrain Duke of Guiſe. This Duke of Mayenne had a daughter, who married Charles Gonzaga Duke of Nevers, by whom ſhe had Anne Gonzaga, mother to the Princeſs of Conde.

☞ GUISE (WILLIAM), a very learned Engliſh Divine in the ſeventeenth Century, was deſcended of a good family at Abloads Court near Glouceſter, and ſon of John Guiſe Eſq;. He was born in the year 1653, and became a Commoner of Oriel College in the Univerſity of Oxford in 1669. He afterwards removed to All-Souls College, of which he was choſen Fellow (a). April the 4th 1674 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b); and October the 16th 1677 that of Maſter of Arts (c). He entered into holy Orders, and in 1680 reſigned his Fellowſhip, having about that time married Frances daughter of George Southcote of Devonſhire Eſq;. He died of the ſmall-pox at his houſe in St. Michael's pariſh at Oxford September the 3d 1683, and was interred in the Chancel of St. Michael's Church in that City, where a monument was erected to his memory by his widow [A]. He was very eminent for his ſkill in Oriental learning (d). After his death Dr. Edward Bernard, Savilian Profeſſor of Aſtronomy, publiſhed a book, which Mr. Guiſe tranſlated into Latin and illuſtrated with a Commentary, viz. Miſnæ pars; ordinis primi Zeraim tituli ſeptem. Latinè vertit & Commentario illuſtravit Gulielmus Guiſius. Oxford 1690 in 4to. To which is prefixed Dr. Edward Pocock's Latin Verſion of Moſes Maimonides's Præfatio in Seder Seraim. The authors of the Acta Eruditorum (e) in their account of this work ſtile our author a man of great learning, and the immortal ornament of the Univerſity of Oxford (f). And Dr. Thomas Smith (g) gives him the title of Vir longè eruditiſſimus, and obſerves, that his death in the thirty firſt year of his age was a prodigious loſs to the Republic of Letters. He was engaged in preparing for the preſs an edition of Abulfeda's Geography, when he died (b). The preſent Colonel John Guiſe, F. R. S. is his ſon.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 748. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 2. col. 195.

(c) Idem, ibid. col. 206.

(d) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(e) Menſis Junii 1691, pag. 252.

(f) Vir doctiſſimus ac Oxonienſium Academiæ immortale decus.

(g) Vita Edwardi Bernardi, pag. 50. edit. Londini 1704 in 8vo.

(b) Idem, in Vita Johannis Gravii. See likewiſe the article of ABULFEDA, vol. 1. pag. 115. remark [C].

[A] Where a monument was erected to his Memory by his Widow.] The Epitaph inſcribed on it begins thus: M. S. Gulielmi Guiſe, Equeſtri apud Gloceſtrenſes familiâ orti, è collegio Oriel. in Colleg. Omn. Animar. aſciti, Linguarum præcipuè Orientalium peritiſſimi, Critici, Rhetoris, Mathematici, Theologi, in omnibus adeo eximii, ut raro quiſquam in ſingulis, in Juventute, ut rarò quiſquam in ſenio; quem ne perfectionis humanæ apices tranſiret, &c. T

☞ GUNTER (EDMUND) an eminent Engliſh Mathematician in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in the county of Hertford (a), but deſcended originally from a family of that name at Gunterſtown in Brecknockſhire (b). He was elected from Weſtminſter-ſchool a ſtudent of Chriſt Church in Oxford in 1599, at eighteen years of age, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts December the 12th 1603 (c), and that of Maſter of Arts July 2d 1606 (d). He afterwards entered into holy Orders (e); and on the 23d of Nov. 1615 took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (f). But being peculiarly eminent for his knowledge in the Mathematics, he had been before choſen Profeſſor of Aſtronomy in Greſham College in London in the room of Mr. Edward Brerewood, who died November the 4th 1613; and he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in that ſtation by his

(a) Wood, Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 271. and Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 508. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Idem, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(c) Idem, Faſti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 165.

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 174.

(e) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(f) Idem, ibid. col. 199.

(g) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

Lectures and Writings [A]. He died at Greſham College in December 1626, and was interred on the 11th of that month in the Church of St. Peter the Poor in London (g).

[A] His writings.] I. Canon Triangulorum, ſive Tabulæ ſinuum artificialium ad radium 10000,0000, & ad ſcrupula prima quadrantis. London 1620 in 8vo. II. Of the Sector and Croſs-ſtaff, and other Inſtruments. This was publiſhed with a Tranſlation of his Canon Triangulorum in 4to, in Engliſh, by Mr. Samuel Foſter, Profeſſor of Greſham College London, formerly Member of Emanuel College, in Cambridge, and with Mr. Foſter's Tract of the uſes of the Quadrant, and printed at London 1624, 1636, 1653, &c. in 4to. The fifth edition of theſe works of Mr. Gunter was diligently corrected, and improved with many uſeful additions throughout the whole by Mr. William Leybourne, ſometime a Printer, and afterwards an eminent Mathematician. Mr. Leybourn informs us in his Preface, what theſe additions are, and takes notice of ſome Plagiaries, who had lately publiſhed ſeveral Treatiſes, extracted, or rather tranſcribed from Mr. Gunter, without the leaſt mention of the true Author. Some queſtions in Navigation are added to theſe works by Mr. Henry Bond, Teacher of the Mathematicks at Ratcliff near London; and to this edition of 1673 was added, The Deſcription and uſe of another Sector and Quadrant, both invented by Mr. Samuel Foſter abovementioned. Mr. Wood obſerves (1), that in 1624 Edmund Wingate, Eſq; carried into France the Rule of Proportion juſt before invented by Mr. Gunter, and communicated it to moſt of the principal Mathematicians at Paris; who ſeeing the great uſe of it, ſollicited him to give an account of it in French, which he publiſhed at Paris in 1624 in 8vo, and dedicated it to the Duke of Orleans, by the advice of Monſr. Alleaune, the King's chief Engineer. But nevertheleſs, ſays Mr. Wood (2) the ſaid work came forth as abortive, the publiſhing thereof being ſomewhat haſtened by reaſon an advocate of Dijon in Burgundy began to print ſome uſes thereof, which Wingate had in a friendly way communicated to him, eſpecially in regard Gunter himſelf had learnedly explained its uſe, in a far larger Volume. For albeit, it were great preſumption in Wingate to aſſume to himſelf the Reputation of having better Abilities to deſcribe any uſes thereof, yet he could aver upon his own knowledge, that he did forbear to explain its uſe, becauſe he took it for granted, none would meddle with it, but ſuch only who were already well able to underſtand how to number upon it, having beforehand acquainted themſelves with the manner of numbering upon Scales, and with the nature of Logarithms. After Wingate's return from France, where he taught the King's Daughter Henriette Maria (3), afterwards Queen of England, and her Ladies the Engliſh Tongue; he importuned Gunter to make a fuller Explanation how to number upon it, viz. the Rule of Proportion, to the end that the uſe thereof might by that means be made more publick; but his anſwer was, That it could not be expected, that the rule ſhould ſpeak; intimating thereby, that the Practitioner ſhould in that point rely upon Diſcretion, and not altogether depend upon Precepts and Examples. T

(1) Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 207.

(2) Ibid.

(3) She was daughter of Henry IV, who was killed by Ravilliac in 1610 not of Lewis XIII, who then reigned.

GUYET (FRANCIS) was a native of Angers, ſprung from a very good family [A], and one of the beſt critics in the ſeventeenth Century. He was born in 1575 [B], and loſt his father and mother when but a child. The little fortune they left him was almoſt loſt by the ill management of his guardians. However, this circumſtance, ſo far from diſcouraging him with reſpect to his ſtudies, excited him to apply himſelf to them with ſtill greater aſſiduity; and imagining, that Paris would give him an opportunity of improving his knowledge and judgment, by the converſation of learned men, he went thither in 1599. It was not long before he obtained the friendſhip of Chriſtopher and Auguſtin du Puy, the two eldeſt ſons of Claude du Puy (a), who had been the ornament and ſupport of polite Literature. The intimacy he afterwards had with Peter and James du Puy, ſons of the abovementioned Claude du Puy, contributed greatly to his advancement in the Sciences; for thoſe two brothers were frequently viſited by the moſt learned men in Paris, and a great number uſed to meet daily at Thuanus's houſe, where Meſſieurs du Puy uſed to receive the company. After Thuanus's death, theſe

(a) He died in 1594.

[A] Sprung from a very good Family.] He had two uncles, Lezin Guyet, and Martial Guyet; the former, a Counſellor in the Preſidial of Angers, has drawn a map of the Province of Anjou; and the latter has writ French Verſes (1). This is related by Portner; but I find ſome difficulty in this when I compare it with what Menage relates (2) viz. that Lezin Guyet, Counſellor to the Preſidial of Angers, and who firſt drew the Map of the Province of Anjou, was an Echevin of Angers in 1493. However this difficulty diſappears, the inſtant I conſult la Croix du Maine (3), who ſays that Lezin Guyet was born the 13th of February, anno 1515. From thence I immediately infer, either that Menage's Printer put one figure for another; or that Menage miſtook one Lezin Guyet who lived before Martial's elder brother, for him who drew the Map of Anjou; for he ſays, that Lezin Guyet had a ſon called Andrew; and he mentions two Andrews, one of whom was Mayor of Angers in 1550, and the other Echevin of the ſame city in 1519. The laſt of theſe two Andrews cannot poſſibly have been the ſon of him who drew the Map of Anjou, ſince he who delineated it was born in 1515. For the ſame reaſon, it is no ways probable that he was father to the other Andrew; but they both might be ſons of one Lezin Guyet, Echevin of Angers in 1493. Be this as it will, Menage declares this family to have been of conſiderable Antiquity; and, after mentioning ſome other Perſons of that name, he comes to our Francis Guyet, and calls him the moſt learned Angevin that he knows of.

(1) See La Croix du Maine, pag. 312.

(2) Remarques ſur la vie de Guillaume Menage, pag. 292.

(3) Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 289.

[B] He was born in 1575.] This circumſtance came to be known only by his Heirs; for he himſelf always concealed, even from his Friends, the year he was born in. He did not care to be thought ſo old as he really was (4); and as he flattered himſelf with the hopes of living much longer than he really did, he was deſirous of concealing his age. He ſeldom confided his ſecrets to any perſon, but perhaps there was none he better concealed than that in queſtion; and as he was not grown very hoary in his old age (5), and as his ſtrength was not diminiſhed in proportion to his years; he did not care to undeceive thoſe who did not take him to be as old as he was in reality. Had he intended to marry, his myſterious Taciturnity would not be ſo ſurpriſing; and as his ſight was ſo good that he could read the ſmalleſt Print (6), this circumſtance would have ſeconded wonderfully well the deceit. It is thought that the hopes he entertained of living many years longer (7), occaſioned him to neglect ſettling his affairs, either with regard to his works or his eſtate, he dying without a will. All thoſe who ſhall peruſe this remark, and have read the Letters of the Chevalier d'Her . . . will call to mind the words I ſhall here cite (8). They are in the XXXVIth of part I. See the remark (O) of the article GOMBAUD.

(4) Periander, in Vita Guyeti.

(5) Idem, ibid.

(6) Idem, ibid.

(7) Epiſt. Iſmael Bullialdi, apud Periandrum, ubi ſupra.

(8) The fair-ſex conceal their age with the utmoſt ſecrecy, and I believe it is the only one they do conceal. Several women have truſted me with their domeſtic concerns, and even their amours; but not one has told me her age. I have ſeen many reſolve upon a thing with great ſteadineſs and reſolution; but I never met with one who had the courage to tell how old ſhe was.

theſe Gentlemen continued thoſe conferences in the ſame place. Guyet uſed to attend very regularly at thoſe aſſemblies. In 1608 he went to Rome, and there applied himſelf with ſuch prodigious aſſiduity to the ſtudy of the Italian, that he at laſt was capable of compoſing ſuch verſes in that tongue, as the greateſt Poets of that Nation would not have judged unworthy of their muſe. He renewed with Regnier (b), who was then in the palace of Cardinal de Joyeuſe, the acquaintance he had already contracted with him in Paris; and he ingratiated himſelf very much into the eſteem of Cardinal du Perron, and of Gabriel de l'Aubeſpine Biſhop of Orleans, whom he aſſiſted more than once in explaining ſeveral difficult paſſages in ſacred as well as profane authors. He returned to Paris by the way of Germany; and was taken into Duke d'Epernon's family, in quality of Preceptor to Abbé de Granſelve, who was afterwards ſo well known by the name of Cardinal de la Valette (c). As he was perfectly well verſed in the Greek and Latin Authors, he made choice of ſuch particulars in them as beſt ſuited his pupil, and explained them to him, not like a ſchoolmaſter or pedant, but in a manner adapted to the uſe, which a youth deſigned for exalted employments ought to make of them. The pupil improved very much by the inſtructions of ſo learned a tutor; and had ſo great an eſteem for him, that he always entruſted him with the ſecret of his moſt important affairs. He took Guyet to Rome when he went thither after his being promoted to a Cardinal's hat, and procured him a good benefice, beſides that which he had before beſtowed upon him (d). Guyet being returned to Paris, choſe rather to live privately, than at Cardinal de la Valette's, and made choice of the College of Burgundy for his reſidence. He lived there till the time of his death, wholly devoted to his ſtudies, and contenting himſelf with paying his court to the Cardinal when in Paris; for he could never have prevailed with himſelf to follow him in the Armies and the Provinces. He every day enjoyed the converſation of Meſſieurs du Puy, who lodged in Thuanus's houſe, not far from Burgundy College; but, after Mr. Rigaut's departure, they removed to the King's Library, where their conferences were afterwards held. He employed himſelf chiefly in a work, the deſign of which was to ſhew that the Latin tongue was derived from the Greek; and that all the primitive words of the latter conſiſted but of one ſyllable. He was the firſt who formed ſuch a deſign, and therefore, was deſirous that no one ſhould have the glory of executing it but himſelf, for which reaſon he did not communicate his Eſſays to any perſon. But notwithſtanding his long and continual application to this work, it yet proved entirely uſeleſs; for, after his death, there was found nothing but a vaſt collection of Greek and Latin words (e), without order or connection, or the leaſt preface to give any inſight into his plan; ſo that one would have concluded that he had ſuſpected the paper no leſs than his friends, to whom he would never communicate his plan, his method or principles. He nevertheleſs applied himſelf to other things; the margins of his Horace, Virgil, Lucan, Plautus, Martial, Philoxenus, Heſychius &c. being quite crowded with critical remarks [C], in which he took great liberties [D], he rejecting all ſuch verſes as ſuppoſititious, as did not appear to him worthy the genius of the author. The moſt complete of his labours was his Notes on Terence; and theſe were publiſhed in the Straſburg edition, anno 1657, they having been ſent by James du Puy to the learned Boeclerus. He had the happineſs to gain the reputation of being a very learned man, though he had never printed any work; and acted prudently, in thereby avoiding the literary diſputes in which he would neceſſarily have been involved, had

(b) A famous French ſatyrical Poet.

(c) He was created Cardinal in 1621.

(d) One of theſe two benefices was the Priory of St. Andeade near Bourdeaux. See Hiſt. de l'Academie Francoiſe, pag. m. 269.

(e) It conſiſted of 25 quires of paper in folio, in a fair and very legible hand.

[C] The Margins of his Horace, Virgil, &c. ... were quite crowded with critical remarks.] Menage bought the Books, the margin of which contained the notes in queſtion, and they have not all been confined to the obſcurity of a cloſet. Thoſe which relate to Heſiod were communicated to Grævius, who inſerted them in his edition (9). Thoſe upon Stephanus Byzantinus have alſo been publiſhed (10). I ſhall only obſerve by the way, that Guyet was not one of thoſe readers who run from book to book; he applying himſelf to one, and never left it till he had peruſed it with prodigious attention. In this manner he wrote upon Terence, Heſiod, Horace and Plautus. He applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of the ancients. And beſides this he delighted only in modern Hiſtorians and Books of Travels (11). I mention theſe particulars, not only becauſe ſome perſons are curious of them, but alſo becauſe they make my readers entertain an advantageous Idea of the notes of this great critick.

(9) In 1667.

(10) Baillet, Jugemens des Savans, tom. 3. num. 518.

(11) Portner, in Vita Guyeti.

[D] ... in which he took great Liberties.] His criticiſms were ſometimes ſo very ſevere, that it was impoſſible but he muſt have been ſometimes in the wrong. Guyet had expunged a conſiderable number of Verſes from Virgil; pretending that a great many Verſes had been foiſted into the works of that famous Poet; and that his compoſitions were like our Regiments of Guards, which are never without Faggots. He therefore ſet up for a rigid Commiſſary, who never ſuffers any but true Soldiers to paſs muſter. He looked upon as ſuppoſititious all the firſt ode of Horace, and the ſecret Hiſtory of Procopius; and whenever his ear or taſte did not approve of the cadence or turn of a period, he immediately concluded it not to be genuine, tho' the ancient Grammarians and the beſt manuſcripts were againſt him. But to prove that Guyet, on ſome occaſions at leaſt, had a depraved taſte (12), and paſſed the bounds of the delicati faſtidii aſcribed to him, we need but read the Verſes, which he wrote againſt Beer, where he ſpeaks ſo contemptuouſly of all the Dutch Poets (13). Grotius anſwered him very pertinently (14).

(12) Idem.

(13) Hinc Batavi fumis cerealibus ebria turba Carmina tot Muſis inficianda vomunt.

Duræ mentis iners, merumque rus eſt,
Si quem baſia non movent Secundi,
Et quos Douſa canit parente major
Cælo ſydereos rotante curſus,
Et quæ ſpicula Baudio vibrante
Non unum ſibi deſtinant Lycamben,
Et quos dat numeros nihil vetuſtis
Cedens vatibus Heinſii Thalia.

That is,

" Dull he muſt be, and of a ſoul unmoved,
" Who is not ſtruck with fam'd Secundus' kiſſes,
" And thoſe which Douſa ſings in loftier ſounds
" Than ever ecchoed from Apollo's Lyre;
" Or thoſe which fly from Baudius' Quiver,
" Severe as fam'd Archilochus's numbers;
" Or thoſe which Heinſius ſo ſweetly warbles,
" Worthy the ages of triumphant Rome."

(14) See thoſe two little Poems in the Lettres choiſies de Balzac, pag. 313. Dutch edit.

had he not kept his compoſitions always by him in manuſcript [E]. He ſeldom retracted any thing he had advanced. He diſputed with great warmth whenever he was oppoſed, and would be very witty on thoſe occaſions. He had a very happy memory, and was a man of candour, ſincerity, and probity. He had been cut for the ſtone in 1636, and had ſubmitted to the pains of that operation with incredible conſtancy. If we except this, his very long life was little troubled with any illneſs, and he had the happineſs to be carried off by a catarrh, with which he was afflicted but three or four days, and not preventing the Pariſh Prieſt from performing the uſual duties. He died in the arms of James du Puy and Mr. Menage his countryman, the 12th of April 1655 (f), aged fourſcore. His life (g) has been wrote in Latin, with great judgment and politeneſs, by Mr. Portner, a Senator of Ratiſbon (h), whence I have extracted this article.

(f) Reineſius, Epiſt. ad Daunium, pag. 170. is miſtaken in ſaying 1657.

(g) It is prefixed to Guyet's Commentary on Terence, printed with that of Boeclerus, at Straſburg, anno 1657.

(h) He diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Antonius Periander Rhœtus. See Placc. de Script. Anonymis & Pſeudonym. pag. 236.

[E] He acted prudently in avoiding the literary diſputes, in which he would have been involved, had he not kept his compoſitions always by him in manuſcript.] Though he was bold in his criticiſms, and ſo intrepid in ſpeaking what he thought in converſation, he yet was very fearful with reſpect to the public. He dreaded particularly Salmaſius (15), who being at Meſſieurs Du Puys, threatened to write a book againſt him, in caſe he dared to publiſh his thoughts with regard to certain paſſages in antient authors. He would have found too formidable an antagoniſt in Salmaſius, who could have publiſhed an hundred ſheets, before Guyet would have been able to prepare four for the Printer; for Guyet could ſcarce ever write to pleaſe himſelf (16); for which reaſon he did not publiſh any thing, even when Salmaſius's death rid him of his greateſt fear. It were to be wiſhed, for the ſake of the public, that many authors had ſuch a ſcare-crow. Thoſe even whom this fear had kept from publiſhing any thing, would think themſelves happy, if they knew their own intereſt: for how many writers are are there, who verify wholly, or at leaſt the laſt part, of the following thought in Horace?

Sed tacitus paſci ſi poſſet corvus, haberet
Plus dapis & rixæ multo minus invidiæque (17).

" And could the talking crow in quiet eat,
" His envy had been leſs, but more his meat.
Creech.

Happy the Literati, who, like our Guyet, are contented with having planted the faith in the Commonwealth of Letters; I mean, in being reputed learned men on the teſtimony of others (18). This our Guyet did not want, Balzac, among others, being his trumpeter. See his Ludus Poeticus de Hypercritico Galeſo (19).

(15) Portner in Vita Guyeti.

(16) Vir enim acutiſſimi judicii non humanius de ſuis quam de alienis curis ſtatuebat, ac proinde ipſe ſibi nunquam ſatisfaciebat, in exprimendis quæ meditatus erat ſupra modum tardus, in exigendis quæ expreſſerat, ſupra fidem ſeverus. Idem, ibid.

(17) Horat. Ep. 17. lib. 1. ver. 50, &c.

(18) Nullis quoad vixit Libris à ſe editis inclaruit, notitia eorum quibus alii ingentem ſibi pepererunt famam ac eruditionis ſuæ quam in dubium nemo unquam vocare auſus eſt conſcientia contentus. Portner in Vita Guyeti.

(19) By Gateſius he underſtands Guyet.

GUYET (CHARLES) a French Jeſuit, born at Tours in 1601, entered into the Society anno 1621, and taught polite Literature five years, and moral Theology during two years in it. He afterwards exerciſed himſelf in preaching for a great many years. He attained to a perfect knowledge in the ceremonies of the Church, as is manifeſt from two pieces written by him [A]. He died in Tours the 30th of March 1664 (a).

(a) Extracted from Nat. Sot. Biblioth. Script. Societ. pag. 129.

[A] This is manifeſt from two pieces written by him.] The one is intitled Ordo generalis & perpetuus divini Officii recitandi; and the other Heortologia, ſive de Feſtis propriiis locorum, printed at Paris by Sebaſtian Cramoiſy, 1657, folio. The explication of the Feſtivals of every place, is a work of great labour, and obliges an author to be very minute and circumſtantial. This our author has done.

GYMNOSOPHISTS. Thus the Greeks have called thoſe Philoſophers, who uſed to go naked [A]. There were ſome of them in Africa; but the moſt celebrated lived in India. The Gymnoſophiſts of Africa dwelt on a mountain of Æthiopia pretty near the Nile, without either houſe or cell. They were not united into a body, nor did they offer up ſacrifices together, as thoſe of India did (a); each of them had a little habitation for himſelf, in which he ſtudied, and performed his devotions privately. They that were

(a) Philoſtratus, who ſpeaks thus in the Life of Apollonius, Book 6. differs very much from Porphyry. See the remark [B] of the article BRACHMANS

[A] Thus the Greeks have called thoſe Philoſophers, who uſed to go naked.] It would be an abſurd thing to deny that there have been Indian Philoſophers, who did not wear any clothes; but one might perhaps pretend that the Brachmans were not of that number: for beſides the vouchers I have quoted in another place (1), we may obſerve, I, that Iarchas (2) mentioned by Philoſtratus (3) undreſſed himſelf before he entered into a fountain with Apollonius. II, That another Brachman took a letter under his gown (4), a letter I ſay, which he wrote to a Dæmon, commanding him with threatnings, to go out of the body of a young man. III, That Apollonius cenſures the Gymnoſophiſts of Ethiopia for quitting entirely the habit of the Indian Gymnoſophiſts, by which they hoped to perſuade the world that they were originally from Ethiopia. There is another queſtion to propoſe, namely, whether they that went naked covered their ſecret parts? St. Auguſtin aſſerts it. Per opacas, ſays he (5), Indiæ ſolitudines quum quidam nudi philoſophentur, unde Gymnoſophiſtæ nominantur: adhibent tamen genitalibus tegumenta, quibus per cætera membrorum carent. i. e. " Though ſome " philoſophize naked through the ſhady wilderneſſes " of India, for which reaſon they are called Gymno- " ſophiſts, yet they have ſomething to cover their " ſecret parts, the reſt of their body being bare." I think St. Auguſtin is in the right; for notwithſtanding ſuch a cover, theſe Philoſophers were truly ſaid to go naked; for who would ſcruple to ſay or to write at this time, that ſome nations of the world go naked, though they wear ſomething about their waſte? When Philoſtratus mentions the Gymnoſophiſts of Africa, he ſtiles them an hundred times the naked, abſolutely and without any addition, and yet he does not repreſent them as though they had nothing at all upon their body; on the contrary, he aſſerts (5) that they are dreſſed like the harveſt-men of Athens, and he charges them with leaving the Indian dreſs, in hopes that by the Æthiopian habit they ſhould gain the reputation of being true Æthiopians. I find that Nicholas Damaſcenus and Diodorus Siculus are quoted (7) to ſupport St. Auguſtin's opinion. The former (8) relates, as an eye-witneſs, that the preſents, which the King of the Indies ſent to the Emperor Auguſtus, were carried by eight ſlaves, naked indeed, but not without regard to their privities. Lewis Vives and Pererius relate this, as though theſe eight ſlaves had been given to Auguſtus. Thus you ſee how the moſt learned men are apt to be too haſty and careleſs in their quotations. Diodorus Siculus is cited (9) as though he aſſerted that the Æthiopians went naked, but in ſuch a manner, as to wear girdles made of hair or of fox-tails. This is ſuppreſſing a part of a paſſage in favour of the cauſe one maintains. Pererius intends to ſupport St. Auguſtin's opinion, namely, that ſince our firſt parents ſinned, ſhame is become natural to all men with regard to thoſe parts which Adam and Eve could not bear

(1) In the remark [G] of the article BRACHMANS.

(2) He was at that time the Preſident of the Brachmans.

(3) In Vita Apollonii, lib. 3.

(4) Simul Epiſtolam è ſinu detractam mulieri dedit. Idem, ibid.

(5) Auguſt. de Civitate Dei, lib. 14. cap. 17.

(6) Lib. 6. pag. m. 247.

(7) Vives, in Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. 14. cap. 17. Pererius in Geneſim, cap. 3.

(8) Apud Strab. lib. 15.

(9) Perer. in Geneſim, cap. 3.

were guilty of man-ſlaughter, were obliged to preſent themſelves before them, in order to be abſolved, by ſubmitting to ſuch penances as would be enjoined them, without which they were not ſuffered to return into their native country. Theſe Philoſophers led a very frugal life, for they lived only upon ſuch fruits as the earth produces of itſelf without any tillage. If we may depend upon Philoſtratus (b), they were deſcended from the Gymnoſophiſts of India [B]. I cannot well tell whether they were really the authors of thoſe diſcoveries in Aſtronomy, of which Lucian (c) aſcribes the glory to their Nation. He pretends that the ſcience of the Stars ſprung up in Æthiopia, where men obſerving the different phaſes or appearances of the Moon, began thence to know, that it borrows all its light from the Sun. As to the Gymnoſophiſts of the Eaſt, they were divided into Brachmans (d), of whom I have given a long article, and Germans. The moſt conſiderable of the latter went under the name of Hylobians, becauſe they dwelt in woods, where they lived only upon leaves and wild fruits; they abſtained from wine and women; they anſwered the queſtions of Princes by meſſengers; and it was by them that Kings worſhiped and prayed to the Deity. Next to them the Phyſicians were eſteemed; theſe did not lead a ſedentary life like the Hylobians, and pretended, amongſt other things, to have remedies for barrenneſs [C]. People were glad to give them a lodging; this art of making men beget ſons and daughters was a good title to the privilege of hoſpitality. Some of them pretended to predictions and enchantments, and ſeemed to be very well acquainted with the ceremonies and traditions relating to the ſtate of the dead; they uſed to ramble a little. Others, much more polite than theſe, admitted nothing of all that is ſaid of the other world, but what was proper to promote holineſs and piety (e). The Gymnoſophiſts, generally ſpeaking, have been an honour to their profeſſion. The maxims which the Hiſtorians aſcribe to them (f), and the diſcourſes they are ſaid to have held, ſavour of nothing that is rude or ſavage; on the contrary, they abound with a great many very reaſonable and ſenſible obſervations, which ſhew a deep meditation. One ought not to complain, that they did not well keep up the dignity of Philoſophy; for their way was, never to go and meet any perſon whatſoever, but to put things upon this foot even with regard to Kings [D], that if any man wanted them, he was obliged to give them notice of it either by coming to them himſelf, or by ſending a meſſenger to them. It was for this reaſon that Alexander, who thought it beneath his majeſty to go to (b) In Vita Apollon. lib. 6. whence I have extracted what I have here related.

(c) De Aſtrolog.

(d) See Strabo, lib. 15. and the remark [F] of the article BRACHMANS

(e) Οὐδ' αὐτοὺς δὲ ἀπεχομένους τῶν καθ' ἅδου θρυλουμένων ὅσα δοκεῖ πρὸς εὐσέβειαν καὶ ὁσιότητα. Strabo, lib. 15. pag. 491.

(f) Strabo, ibid. Philoſtrat. in Vita Apollon. lib. 3. Plutarch. in Alexandro, Arrian. Exped. lib. 7.

bear to behold naked after they had eaten of the forbidden fruit. Had Diodorus Siculus aſſerted, that all the Æthiopians, who go naked, hide thoſe parts, his authority would be of a great weight. He was not therefore to be quoted at all, or it muſt be ſuppoſed, that he expreſſed himſelf after that manner. Yet the truth of the matter is, that he does not expreſs himſelf thus, and that he therefore hurts St. Auguſtin's cauſe more than he favours it. He mentions four ſorts of Æthiopians (10); the firſt go entirely naked; the ſecond cover their ſecret parts with the tails of ſome beaſts; the third wrap themſelves up in the ſkin of ſome animal; and the laſt twiſt ſome hair together, with which they cover themſelves down to the waſte.

(10) Diodor. Sicul. lib. 4. cap. 1.

[B] If we may depend upon Philoſtratus, they were deſcended from the Gymnoſophiſts of India.] Apollonius had converſed with the latter before he went into Æthiopia, and he was never tired with teſtifying how much he admired them. The Gymnoſophiſts of Æthiopia having got the hint of this, affected to mention thoſe of India to him in a ſcornful manner. Upon which he anſwered them with a great deal of freedom, that they ſlandered the Indians only with a deſign to make the world believe, that it was not for ſome ſhameful reaſons that they left India to go into Æthiopia, as it was reported (11). The report was as follows. It was related (12), that the Æthiopians were originally come from India; that they were antiently King Ganges's ſubjects; that they killed him; that ſince this murder they were become abominable in the ſight of the other Indians; that the earth would no longer bear them; that it would not ſuffer their harveſts to ripen, nor their pregnant women to bring their children into the world, nor their cattle to grow up; and that the ground fell in wherever they undertook to build houſes; that the ghoſt of the murdered King purſued them from place to place, and frightened them continually; and that theſe misfortunes never ceaſed till the author of that parricide had been ſwallowed up by the earth. It is pretended (13), that theſe prodigies forced thoſe men to leave the Country, and to go and ſettle in that part of Africa, which has been called Æthiopia. This tranſmigration has been mentioned by other writers, as the learned Sir John Marſham obſerves (14). He alſo proves that there have been two ſorts of Æthiopians known; ſome in Aſia, and others in Africa, and theſe were Indians; but he is in the wrong when he pretends, that by the word India, in a paſſage in Virgil, we ought to underſtand Æthiopia.

(11) Philoſtratus, in ejus Vita, lib. 6.

(12) Idem, ibid. lib. 3.

(13) Idem, ibid. lib. 6.

(14) Chron. Canon. Ægypt. Sæcul. XIII. pag. 335. edit. in 4to.

Nam qua Pellæi gens fortunata Canopi
Accolit effuſo ſtagnantem flumine Nilum,
Et circum pictis vehitur ſua rura phaſelis
Quâque pharetrata vicinia Perſidis urget,
Et viridem Ægyptum nigrâ fœcundat arenâ,
Et diverſa ruens ſeptem diſcurrit in ora,
Uſque coloratis amnis devexus ab Indis,
Omnis in hac certam regio jacit arte ſalutem (15).

(15) Virg. Georg. lib. 4. ver. 287.

" For where with ſev'nfold horns myſterious Nile
" Surrounds the ſkirts of Egypt's fruitful iſle,
" And where in pomp the ſun-burnt people ride
" On painted barges, o'er the teeming tide,
" Which pouring down from Æthiopian lands,
" Makes green the ſoil with ſlime, and black prolific ſands;
" That length of region and large tract of ground
" In this one art a ſure relief have found.

DRYDEN.

[C] They pretended, amongſt other things, to have remedies for barenneſs.] Here they boaſted of three things; firſt, that they could make a perſon have a great many children; ſecondly, to make a man beget boys; thirdly to make him beget girls. Strabo obſerves all this. Δύνασθαι δὲ καὶ πολυγόνους ποιεῖν, καὶ ἀῤῥενογόνους, καὶ θηλυγόνους, διὰ φαρμακευτικῆς (16). That is, " By their " medicines they can make a perſon beget many chil- " dren, and either boys or girls." This was a proper method to make themſelves neceſſary or acceptable to ſeveral perſons of different inclinations; for there are ſome that deſire to have a large family; others, who have only daughters, do paſſionately long for a boy; others again who have only boys, would be glad to have ſome girls. This is chiefly the mother's inclination, which indeed is not unreaſonable; for a daughter is better company and a greater help for a mother than a ſon.

(16) Strab. lib. 15. pag. 491.

[D] Even with regard to Kings.] This muſt not be underſtood of all the Gymnoſophiſts in general, for, according to Nearchus, the Brachmans went to court, and attended on Kings as their Counſellors (17).

(17) Nearchus, apud Strabonem, lib. 15. pag. 493.

to them, ſent them ſome perſons in order to ſatisfy the deſire he had of being acquainted with their character and manners (g). There is nothing more admirable than their method of educating their diſciples [E]. They uſed to aſk them every day before they ſat down to dinner how they ſpent the morning? and every pupil was obliged to ſhew either that he had done ſome good moral action, or that he had improved himſelf in the ſciences, otherwiſe he was ſent back to ſtudy without being ſuffered to eat his dinner. You may have obſerved in the article of the Brachmans, the great frugality of the Gymnoſophiſts, and their extraordinary patience in keeping themſelves for a long while in the ſame ſituation [F]. It is not improbable that the doctrine of the Metempſychoſis or Tranſmigration of the Soul obliged them to eat of nothing that had had life, and that Pythagoras borrowed this doctrine from them. But it is abſurd to make the Jewiſh Nation deſcend from them, as Ariſtotle does (b). To be ſick was a ſhameful thing amongſt them, ſo that they who would avoid this diſgrace uſed to burn themſelves (i). Thus Calanus, who followed Alexander, killed himſelf. We have obſerved in another place that the doctrine of the Tranſmigration of Souls, made the Brachmans extremely indifferent with regard to life or death [G]. Porphyry makes a very pertinent anſwer to thoſe who would propoſe this objection to them, What would become of the world, if all men were to live like the Brachmans [H]?

(g) Plut. ibid. & alii.

(b) Apud Clearchum, quoted by Joſephus, lib. 1. contra Appion.

(i) Strabo, pag. 493.

[E] There is nothing more admirable than their method of educating their diſciples,] All that Apuleius ſays of it, deſerves, in my opinion, to be tranſcribed. Eſt præterea, ſays he (18), genus apud illos (Indos) præſtabile, Gymnoſophiſtæ vocantur. Hos ego maxime admiror; quod homines ſunt periti, non propagandæ vitis, nec inoculandæ arboris, nec proſcindendi ſoli. Non illi norunt arvum colere, vel aurum colare, vel equum domare, vel taurum ſubigere, vel ovem vel capram tondere, vel paſcere. Quid igitur eſt? Unum pro his omnibus norunt. Sapientiam percolunt tam magiſtri Senes, quàm diſcipuli minores. Nec quicquam apud illos æque laudo, quam quod torporem animi & otium oderunt. Igitur ubi menſa poſita, priuſquam edulia apponantur, omnes adoleſcentes ex diverſis locis & officiis ad dapem conveniunt. Magiſtri perrogant, quod factum a lucis ortu ad illud diei bonum fecerit. Hic alius ſe commemorat inter duos arbitrum delectum, ſanata ſimultate, reconciliata gratia, purgata ſuſpicione, amicos ex infenſis reddidiſſe; inde alius, ſeſe parentibus quidpiam imperantibus obediſſe: & alius, aliquid meditatione ſua reperiſſe, vel alterius demonſtratione didiciſſe. Denique, cæteri commemorant. Qui nihil habet adferre cur prandeat, impranſus ad opus foras extruditur. That is, "There is alſo amongſt the Indians a noble ſort of men, who are called Gymnoſophiſts. I have a very great value for them, becauſe they are ſkillful men; not indeed in laying the vine, nor in grafting a tree, nor in tilling the ground. They do not know how to cultivate a piece of land, or to melt gold, or to break a horſe, or to tame a bull, or to ſhear a ſheep or a goat, or to lead them to the paſture. What is it then; Inſtead of all this, they know one thing. Both the moſt antient maſters and the youngeſt ſcholars ſtudy wiſdom. Nor is there any thing for which I commend them more than for their averſion for indolence and ſloth. When the cloth is laid, before the meat be brought upon the table, all the youths are called together from ſeveral places and offices. But they are not ſuffered to ſit down till they have anſwered the maſters, who aſk them what good they have done ſince break of day till dinner time. One will anſwer, that having been choſen arbiter between two perſons at variance, he has removed all ſubjects of hatred and ſuſpicions between them, and reconciled them together: another will ſay, that he obeyed his parents commands: a third, that he found out ſome truth by his own meditation, or learnt it from another. Thus they all give an account of the good they have done. He who has nothing to ſay why he ſhould be admitted to table, is ſent back to his work without a dinner."

(18) Apul. Floridor. lib. 1. circa init. pag. m. 343.

[F] You may have obſerved .... this extraordinary patience in keeping themſelves for a long while in the ſame ſituation.] Beſides what has been alledged upon this ſubject in the remark (A) of the article BRACHMANS, I ſhall obſerve here that this difficult practice was not unuſual with the Greek Philoſophers. Socrates put himſelf ſometimes to this Tryal (19), in order to make a good proviſion of patience for his future occaſions. We would think this a great ſilline's. I have heard it mentioned as a ſtrong proof of effeminacy and dulneſs in a King, who lived towards the beginning of the XVIIth Century, that he uſed to leave his Hat all day juſt as it was put upon his head when he was dreſſed. But let us obſerve, that there would hardly be a more unſufferable Torment, than to be condemned to keep all one's life-time in the ſame poſture. The ſituation, which ſeems the eaſieſt to us, I mean, ſitting in a commodious elbow-chair, would in time tire us moſt cruelly (20).

(19) Stare ſolitus Socrates dicitur pertinaci ſtatu perdius atque pernox, à ſummo lucis ortu ad ſolem alterum orientem inconnivens, immobilis, iiſdem in veſtigiis & ore atque oculis eumdem in locum directis cogitabundus. A. Gellius, lib. 2. cap. 1.

[G] The Doctrine of the Tranſmigration of Souls made the Brachmans extremely indifferent with regard to life or death.] To this muſt be referred what Trajan obſerves of the Getes (21), that they were the moſt valiant of all men, not only on account of the great ſtrength of their body, but alſo becauſe of the opinion which Zamolxis taught them; for as they believed that Death was nothing elſe but the changing of one's dwelling-place, they were eaſier prepared to die, than to take a journey. This ſhould over-whelm the Chriſtians with ſhame, who, generally ſpeaking, cannot be diveſted of their exceſſive fondneſs for this life, notwithſtanding the certain hope they have of enjoying heaven immediately after death.

(20) See the Commentators on theſe words of Virgil, Æneid. 6. Sedet æternumque ſedebit Infelix Theſeus. See above all Mr. Du Rondel's Diſſertation ſur le Phenix, pag. 96, &c.

(21) Apud Julianum, in Cæſar.

[H] Porphyry makes a very pertinent anſwer to thoſe who would propoſe this Objection.] What would become of the World, if all men were to live like the Brachmans? He could not but commend thoſe Indian Philoſophers in his Book of abſtinence, ſince they practiſed his Doctrine ſo well. He makes (22) a very honourable deſcription of their frugality, of their good morals, and of their contempt for this life. As for the objection of the worldlings, he refutes it after the ſame manner as Pythagoras had done. If all men, ſays he, were to become Kings, human ſociety would be in terrible confuſion. Muſt therefore the kingly Power itſelf be ſhunned? And if all men were ſtrictly virtuous, they who enjoy publick offices would never reſign them; for it ought not to be ſuffered, that they who acquit themſelves worthily of their functions, ſhould ever loſe their places, the keeping of them being the reward of their honeſty. And yet no man is ſilly enough to pretend that it is not the duty of every perſon to walk zealouſly in the paths of virtue. The law ſuffers the people to do a great many things which would be looked upon as unſufferable in a Philoſopher. The Laws do not forbid the people to divert themſelves with women of pleaſure, nor to go daily to Taverns; yet ſuch Diverſions, or ſuch a way of living would be a diſgrace, even to ſuch perſons, who are but indifferently virtuous. Thoſe things are not therefore to be allowed to perſons of ſtrict probity, which are ſuffered in the common people. A Philoſopher ought to preſcribe to himſelf thoſe holy Laws, which the Gods and the Servants of the Gods have eſtabliſhed. Theſe Maxims of Porphyry may alſo be of uſe to them, that inſiſt upon the practice of the moſt ſtrict morality, and who do ſo much preach up Celibacy. What would become of the World, is it objected to them, if every one followed your advice? They ought to anſwer, Be not uneaſy about this (23), few perſons will take us at our word. The Anabaptiſts employ the ſame anſwer with good ſucceſs, on account of their condemning

(22) Lib. 4. de Abſtin.

(23) See Mr. Baillet, in the Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, Dec. 1686, pag. 1435. We meet with another anſwer of St. Auguſtin, in the Author of the Nouvelles Lettres contra l'hiſtoire du Calviniſme de Maimbourg, pag. 767.

demning all publick offices of Magiſtracy; they know very well that Mankind will never want maſters, and that let their reproofs and exhortations be never ſo ſtrong and pathetical, there will always be more Candidates for Preferments, than there are Employments to give them. This puts me in mind of a Divine of the Church of England, whom a perſon would perſuade, that the Doctrine of paſſive obedience ought to be given up, as abſolutely inconſiſtent with the welfare of the publick; do not fear, anſwered he, that for all this the people will be more diſpoſed to ſuffer oppreſſion; and as you do not apprehend that by preaching ſtrongly againſt revenge, you will expoſe your neighbours to be inſulted; for you know very well that notwithſtanding all your Sermons, men will take care, that their not taking offence at a box on the ear, do not expoſe them to a new injury, even thus, &c. Obſerve that this maxim of Porphyry, The Laws do not forbid the people, &c. may be confirmed by the following paſſage from Tully (24), Aliter leges, aliter Philoſophi tollunt aſtutias. Leges quatenus tenere manu res poſſunt: Philoſophi quatenus ratione et intelligentia. That is, "The "Law provides againſt Frauds otherwiſe than the Phi-"lophers do; the Law in as much as things may be "regulated by force; the Philoſophers, as they can "be ordained by reaſon and wiſdom." Add to this the following paſſage from Seneca (25), Quam angusta innocentia eſt ad legem bonum eſſe? Quanto latius officiorum patet quam juris regula? Quam multa pietas, humanitas, liberalitas, juſtitia, fides, exigunt, quæ omnia extra publicas tabulas ſunt? That is, "What an "indifferent virtue is it, to be virtuous only accord-"ing to the Law? How much more extenſive is the "Rule of Morality, than that of right? How many "things do Piety, Good-nature, Generoſity, Juſtice, "Fidelity, require of us, which are not within the "cognizance of the civil Magiſtrate?" I ſhall obſerve by the by, that St. Auguſtin's thought, which I refer to in the Margin (26), calls a certain Philoſopher to mind. Your Philoſopher, ſays he, (27) does not ſhew much Wiſdom, when he deſigns to marry; that he may leave ſome of his Poſterity behind him in France. If he were deſcended from Emperors, and from Sovereign Princes, I muſt not for the World diſſuade him from his Reſolution. But what! does he fear, Sir, leſt the World be at an end? Tho' it ſhould end thus, it could not end in a more glorious manner. Let a Courtier, a Magiſtrate, a Merchant marry: I do not oppoſe it. But that a Philoſopher ſhould trouble himſelf with a Wife and Children, and a Philoſopher of the Sect of Zeno; this, Sir, is a kind of Prodigy, that requires an expiation, much more than that of the Cows that ſpoke formerly, and cried out in a dreadful manner, Rome, take care of thy ſelf.

(24) Cicero, de Offic. lib. 3. cap. 17.

(25) Seneca, de Ira, lib. 2. cap. 27.

(26) Quot. (25).

(27) Cotin, Oeuvres galantes, tom. 1. pag. m. 275.

☞ HABINGTON

H.

HABINGTON or ABINGTON (WILLIAM), an eminent Engliſh Hiſtorian in the ſeventeenth Century, was ſon of Thomas Habington of Hendlip in Worceſterſhire Eſq; [A], by Mary eldeſt daughter of Edward Lord Morley. He was born at Hendlip November the 4th or 5th 1605, and educated at St. Omers and Paris; in the firſt of which places he was ſtrongly ſollicited to enter into the Order of the Jeſuits, but by excuſes got free, and left them. After his return from Paris he was inſtructed in hiſtory by his father, and became an accompliſhed Gentleman. He married Lucia daughter of William Lord Powis (a). Mr. Wood tells us (b), that he run with the times, and was not unknown to Oliver the Uſurper. He died November the 30th 1654, and was interred in a vault under the Chancel of the Church of Hendlip. He left ſeveral manuſcripts in the hands of his ſon Thomas Habington Eſq;. His printed works are, Poems under the title of Caſtara [B]; The Queen of Arragon, a Tragi-Comedy [C]; Obſervations upon Hiſtory, printed at London 1641 in 8vo; and The Hiſtory of Edward the Fourth King of England, London 1640, in a thin folio, written and publiſhed at the deſire of King Charles I; "in which, "ſays Mr. Edward Philips (c), he hath a ſtyle ſufficiently florid, and perhaps better "becoming a poetical than hiſtorical ſubject." Archdeacon Nicholſon tells us (d), that our Author "has given us as fair a draught of Edward IV's reign as it would bear; at "leaſt he has copied this King's picture as agreeably as could be expected from one "ſtanding at ſo great a diſtance from the original." His father had a conſiderable hand in this hiſtory (e). Mr. Philips (f) ſays, that with regard to his Poems "he may "be ranked with thoſe that deſerve neither the higheſt nor the loweſt ſeat in the "theatre."

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 110. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Theatrum Poetarum; Modern Poets, pag. 192. edit. London 1675.

(d) Engliſh Hiſtorical Library, pag. 220. edit. London 1696.

(e) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(f) Ubi ſupra.

[A] Thomas Habington of Hendlip in Worceſterſhire, Eſq;] This gentleman was ſon of John Habington of Hendlip, Eſq; Cofferer to Queen Elizabeth, ſon of Richard Habington, of Brokhampton in Herefordſhire, Eſq; He was born Auguſt the 23d 1560, at Thorpe, near Chertſey in Surry, which Mannor belonged to his father. At about ſixteen years of age he became a Commoner of Lincoln-College in Oxford, where having ſpent about three years, he was ſent by his father to the univerſities of Paris and Rheims in France. After his return to England, adhering to the party of Mary Queen of Scots, his life was ſaved by Queen Elizabeth, who was his god-mother; but his younger brother Edward, who was engaged in the ſame deſigns, being a perſon of a turbulent ſpirit, was with others, executed in St. Giles's in the Fields near London, September the 20th, 1586. Mr. Thomas Habington continued a priſoner in the Tower of London ſix years, and made a greater progreſs in ſeveral kinds of learning during that time, than he had before in all his life. He afterwards retired to Hendlip, the Manor of which his father had ſettled upon him; and married Mary, eldeſt daughter of Edward Lord Morley, by Elizabeth his wife, daughter and ſole heir of Sir William Stanley, Knt. Lord Mounteagle (1). In 1606, upon the diſcovery of the Gun-powder Plot, he was condemned to die for entertaining and concealing Garnet and Alcorne, two Popiſh Prieſts, deeply engaged in that plot, at his houſe at Hendlip; but he was reprieved, and afterwards pardoned by the endeavours of William Lord Mounteagle (2), whoſe ſiſter, (who wrote the Letter to that Lord, which occaſion'd the diſcovery of that plot (3),) he had married. He wrote the Antiquities and Survey of Worceſterſhire, a large manuſcript in Folio in his own hand, but the whole ſurvey is not perfected. Some meaſures have been lately thought of for publiſhing this work. He compiled alſo an Hiſtory of the Cathedral Church and Biſhops of Worceſter, a manuſcript in a thin folio, the beginning of which is, God's eternal Empire of Heaven endureth for ever, &c. The ſucceſſion of the biſhops reacheth down to John Alcock in the copy, which Mr. Wood ſaw. He tranſlated into Engliſh, The Epiſtle of Gildas a Britain, intituled, De Excidio & Conqueſtu Britanniæ. London 1638, in 8vo; to which he prefixed a large preface written to the inhabitants of Britain. This tranſlation and preface were made during his impriſonment on account of the Gun-powder Plot. He left beſides ſeveral MSS. for the preſs, beſides thoſe abovementioned. He died at Hendlip the 8th of October 1647, and was interred by his father, in a vault under the chancel of the church there (4).

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 109, 110.

(2) Idem, ibid.

(3) So Mr. Wood was informed by Sir William Dugdale.

(4) Wood, ubi ſupra.

[B] Poems under the title of Caſtara.] The ſecond edition was publiſhed at London 1635, in 8vo, and there is another in 1640, in 8vo. They are divided into three parts, under a different title ſuitable to the ſubject. The firſt, which was written when he was a ſuitor to his wife, is uſhered in by a character in praiſe of miſtreſs; the ſecond, conſiſting of copies of verſes written to her after marriage, by a character of a wife; after which is a character of a friend prefixed to ſeveral elegies. The third part conſiſts of divine poems, ſome of which are paraphraſes on ſeveral texts in Job, and the book of Pſalms; to which is prefixed the portrait of an holy man.

[C] The Queen of Arragon, a Tragi-Comedy] It was acted at Court, and at Black-Fryars, and printed at London in 1640, in folio, without our author's name (5). Mr. Wood tells us (6), that Mr. Habington "communicating his play to Philip Earl of Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain of the Houſhold to King "Charles I, he cauſed it to be acted at court, and "afterwards to be publiſhed againſt the author's "will." T.

(5) An Account of the Engliſh Dramatic Poets. By Gerard Langbaine, pag. 244. edit. Oxford 1691 in 8vo.

(6) Ubi ſupra.

HACKER (a) (JAMES) Profeſſor of Divinity at Fribourg in the Province of Briſgaw towards the beginning of the ſeventeenth Century. I mention him only that I may have an opportunity to diſcover the true name of a Pſeudonymous Writer [A], which

(a) And not Hacber, as Konig calls him.

[A] I mention him only . . . to diſcover the true name of a Pſeudonymous Writer.] Hacker having publiſhed (1) a Diſſertation upon Predeſtination was refuted by a Monk of Mantua under the fictitious name of Daniel Neidinger. He defended himſelf, and the Title of his Reply, is as follows: De Prædeſtinationis cauſa falſo & ementito autore Dan. Neidingero, vero autem et Germano ejus Fabro Fr. And. Urciano Ord. Min. Obſ. reg. in urbe Mantuana nuper editæ, et ibidem a tredecim diverſorum Ord. Fratribus et Patribus ſuſceptæ, in quatuor ex quibus coaluit elementa, mendacia, hereſes, antilogias, ſordes Sermonis, Analyſis. Autore J. Hackero. i. e. "An "Analyſis which has not yet been made public, that I know of, in the catalogues of this kind of authors.

(1) In the year 1609, according to the Oxford Catalogue.

" Analyſis or Examination of a Diſſertation concern" ing the Cauſe of Predeſtination, written under the " falſe and fictitious name of Dan. Neidinger, but really
" compos'd by brother Andrew Uricanus a Minor Fryar,
" publiſhed at Mantua, and approved there by thirteen
" Brothers and Fathers of ſeveral orders; into the four " Elements of which it is compoſed, Falſities, He-
" reſies, Contradiction, Ill-language. By J. Hacker."
Dorſcheus, Divinity Profeſſor at Strasbourg (2) has quoted this inſtance to ſhew that the Roman Catholicks charge each other with Hereſy. He aſſerts that this Reply of Hacker was printed in the year 1618. But ſince it is ſet down in the Oxford Catalogue as printed at Fribourg in the Year 1614, I do not think that Dorſcheus knew any thing of the firſt Edition. In the ſame Catalogue are mentioned two Volumes of James Hacker upon Thomas Aquinas. They were printed at Fribourg, the firſt, in the year 1619, and the ſecond in the year 1621. Konig does not diſtinguiſh this, and ſets down the Title erroneouſly.

(2) Dorſcheus, in Hodegetico Catholico, cap. 10. pag. 868, 869.

HACKET (WILLIAM) an Engliſh Fanatick in the ſixteenth Century, was firſt ſervant to a Gentleman named Huſſei, to whom he gave a proof of his faithfulneſs by a very brutiſh action [A]. He married afterwards a rich widow, and ruined her in a ſhort time by ſquandering away her eſtate in ſenſual pleaſures. He had not ſtudied, but had a very happy memory, of which he made a very ill uſe by repeating in his cups the Sermons of the Miniſters. He did it only to ridicule them; and he never went to Church, but that he might have wherewithal to exert his memory in this impertinent exerciſe. He was prodigiouſly given to drinking, and fond of women; and he debauched a maiden, who was come to his houſe to aſk his advice (a). He even robbed upon the highway. Laſtly he ſet up for a Prophet, and proclaimed, 1. That England would be puniſhed with famine, peſtilence and war, if ſhe did not eſtabliſh the Conſiſtorial Diſcipline. 2. That there would be no more Popes for the future. He pointed out the time when this deſolation of England ſhould happen. It was, according to him, that very ſame year in which he publiſhed his threatnings. He began to prophecy at York and at Lincoln, where for his audaciouſneſs he was publicly whipped, and condemned to baniſhment. He had a wonderful readineſs in praying to God ex tempore, and with choice and very pompous expreſſions, which made the people believe, that this was an extraordinary gift of the Holy Ghoſt. He depended exceedingly upon his prayers [B]; for he uſed to ſay, that if all England ſhould pray for rain, and he ſhould pray for a drought, it would not rain at all. Edmund Coppinger and Henry Arthington, two men of ſome learning, joined with him, the former under the title of the Prophet of Mercy, the latter under the title of the Prophet of Judgment. Arthington publiſhed that they

(a) Potator ſcortatorque fuit enormis, virgineſque quæ ad eum conſilii cauſa acceſſit conſtuprator. Fitz Simon, in Britannomachia Miniſtrorum, &c. See the quotation (c).

[A] He gave a proof of his faithfulneſs to his Maſter by a very brutiſh action.] A Tradeſman of Oundle * in Northamptonſhire had done ſomething, which occaſioned a hatred between him and the Gentleman in whoſe Service Hacket was. Let us ſee how this Servant revenged his Maſter. He approached familiarly, and with friendly expreſſions the ſon (1) of that Tradeſman, and was received by him with the ſame kindneſs; then all on a ſudden he collared him, threw him down, and bit his Noſe off; and inſtead of returning it to the Chirurgeon, who took it upon him to ſet it right again, he eat it up. Eique naſum dentibus evulſit, nec chirugo volenti reſtituere tradidit, ſed (ut feriur) barbara immanitate devorarat (2). Camden does not relate this Fact with the ſame particulars. He aſſerts that Hacket embracing the Schoolmaſter for a ſign of reconciliation, bit his Noſe ſo, that he eat off a piece of it; and that it was the Schoolmaſter himſelf that deſired him to return the piece he had bit off, that it might be ſewed to his Noſe while the wound was ſtill freſh. Ad vindictam adeo efferus (Hacquetus) ut ingenuo Ludimagiſtro, dum redintegrati amoris ſpecie amplecteretur, naſum mordicus abſciderit, et coram miſero deformi ſupplicante ut redderet, quo vulnere adhuc recente aſſueretur, caninè, ut ferunt (3), devoraverit (4). The difference of theſe circumſtances is not ſo great, as to make us infer from it, that the Story is falſe; we may only obſerve in this a proof of man's Lazineſs, or of the weakneſs of his Memory. They to whom a Story is related, are uſed to mind chiefly the main fact, and the ſubſtance of it; and this is what they remember beſt. But as they have not the ſame attention for all the circumſtances, becauſe this would be too troubleſome, they forget a great many of them, nor do they take the trouble to load their Memory with them, which is not ſtrong enough to bear every part of the weight; ſo that if they have a mind to relate the ſame ſtory, after a few hours, or a few days, they are obliged to ſupply thoſe Circumſtances which they could not remember. Every one ſupplies them according to the different Characters of his genius, and hence ariſe an infinite number of variations, which paſs even into the writings of the Hiſtorians.

(1) He was the ſchool-maſter of that place.

(2) Hen. Fitz-Simon, Britan. Miniſtror, cap. 6. lib. 2. pag. 202, 203.

(3) Obſerve, that Fitz-Simon makes uſe of the ſame caution as is reported, ut fertur.

(4) Camdenus, Annal. Part 4. ad ann. 1591, pag. 618.

[B] He depended exceedingly upon his prayers.] He uſed to ſay to God, thou haſt power and I have faith; the thing will therefore certainly be done. He made imprecations againſt himſelf in his prayers, and pretended that theſe imprecations were certainly effectual. He boaſted that diſputing once with a Papiſt, he propoſed this condition to him: I conſent to eternal damnation, and to ſuffer it immediately (5); do you as much, and either you or I will change our Religion according to the unhappy or favourable ſucceſs, which will attend our imprecation. This was extreamly abſurd; for the ſucceſs of the imprecations could be but the ſudden death of either of them; and conſequently neither of them could change his Religion. He that died could not do it; and the ſurviving perſon would have been very far from forſaking his religion, to which the ill ſucceſs of his Adverſary's imprecation would have given ſo authentick a teſtimony. But we ought not to expect that ſuch ſilly Enthuſiaſts ſhould avoid contradictions. Hacket having charged two great Lords with Rebellion, propoſed to them the like form of prayer (6). This he uſed to call his oath of execration. If after taking ſuch an oath, ſaid he to them, you do not dye, I ſubmit to a retaliation. But if you refuſe to take that oath, and I take it without ſuffering the leaſt thing for it, you ſhall be condemned to be be beheaded. The Judges ſent him back like a mad-man.

By this kind of prayer he impoſed upon a great many perſons, and he made them believe, that for the ſins of the World, the Devils, and Witches had made him ſuffer during two Months, even the Hell-Torments, or very near (7). Camden relates, that by ſwearing upon his eternal Damnation he had ſeduced Coppinger and Arthington, and had purſuaded them, that he converſed often with God, and that the Devil had ſtigmatiſed him. His frequent prayers full of fervour, the appearance of a holy life, and his cuſtom of faſting every Sunday, contributed towards making men believe thoſe things (8). O the weakneſs of human underſtanding! How great are its Errors, and how powerful!

(5) Æternæ damnationi è veſtigio ſubeundæ. Fitz-Simon, Britan. Miniſtror. pag. 203.

(6) Ad ſimilem quoque (ut dicebat) orandi modum duos procerum quibus noxam perduellionis objecit provocavit. Idem, ibid. pag. 204.

(7) Idem, ibid.

(8) Camden. Annal. Part 4. pag. m. 619. ad ann. 1591.

they had an extraordinary miſſion, and that after Jeſus Chriſt no perſon in the world had a greater authority than William Hacket. The other, I mean Coppinger, declared that Hacket was the only King of all Europe. They went afterwards farther ſtill, they made him in every thing equal to Jeſus Chriſt, which Hacket did not in the leaſt endeavour to prevent; for he uſed to ſay in his prayers, Father, I know that thou loveſt me as much as thou loveſt thy ſelf (b). They would proceed to the ceremony of anointing or crowning him, but he did not ſuffer it, becauſe, ſaid he, the Holy Ghoſt had already anointed him in heaven. They aſked him laſtly what orders he had for them, and ſolemnly declared, that they would obey him in every thing without exception. He commanded them to go and proclaim through all the ſtreets of London, that Jeſus Chriſt was come to judge the world; that he lodged at ſuch an inn, and that it was not in the power of any perſon to put him to death. They made ſo much haſte to obey him, that Arthington did not give himſelf time to take his gloves. To the form which their maſter preſcribed them, they added theſe words, Repent, England, repent. They gathered by their clamours ſuch a vaſt crowd of people together, that when they came to the great place, they could not go farther, nor make themſelves be heard; but meeting with an empty cart, they got upon it, and expatiated upon William Hacket's important commiſſion [C], after which they returned to him. This happened July the 16th 1592 (c). They were ſummoned before the Judges, and tried and condemned. William Hacket was ſentenced to be hanged and quartered, July the 18th, and he was executed accordingly. Coppinger ſtarved himſelf in priſon, but Arthington was pardoned (d). The blaſphemies which Hacket uttered in his prayer at the place of execution are ſo horrid, that I ſhall relate them only in Latin (e) [D]. You will find in the remarks ſome particulars concerning his fanaticiſm mixed with rebellion. He entertained a violent hatred againſt Queen Elizabeth [E]. Though I have extracted all this from the work of a Jeſuit, yet it ought not to be called into queſtion, for Camden's Annals contain the ſame facts expreſſed in a ſtronger manner ſtill.

(b) Pater, ſcio te non minus teipſo me diligere. Idem, ibid.

(c) Camden relates this under the year 1591.

(d) See the end of the remark [D].

(e) Taken from the 6th chapter of the 2d book of the Britannomachia Miniſtrorum written by Henry Fitz-Simon, who quotes the Account which Richard Bancroft (afterwards Archbiſhop of Canterbury) publiſhed of this affair at London in the year 1592 with this title. Conſpiratio pro prætenſa Diſciplina.

[C] Coppinger and Arthington expatiated upon William Hacket's Commiſſion.] They aſſerted that he was a partaker of the nature of the glorified bodies, that he was to convert all Europe to the conſiſtorial Diſcipline, and that the office of judging had been conferred upon him. They who have a mind to ſee him, added they, will find him at ſuch an houſe, and we foretel to you, that they who refuſe to ſubmit to this King of all Europe ſhall kill each other, and that the Queen will be dethroned (9). A little before they went upon this fooliſh Errand, they had been to meet a Puritan Miniſter, named Wiggington, and had ſolemnly declared to him, that the night before Jeſus Chriſt had appeared to them, not in his body, but according to the chief Spirit by which he dwelt in William Hacket with more fulneſs than in any other perſon, and that Hacket was that very Angel who was to come before the end of the world with the Fan and Shepherd's Staff in his hand to ſeparate the Goats from the Sheep, that he would tread Satan under his Feet, and entirely overthrow the Kingdom of Antichriſt (10). On the day they went to preach this new Kingdom through the ſtreets of London, Hacket commanded them to ſay that Jeſus Chriſt was come with his Fan in his Hand to judge the World, and that this was as true, as it is, that God is in Heaven. They acquitted themſelves very exactly of that Commiſſion, and when they were upon the Cart, they declared that Hacket, being already glorified with regard to his body, was a partaker of Jeſus Chriſt by his chief Spirit, and that he was near hand with his Fan to eſtabliſh the Goſpel through all Europe.

(9) Fitz-Simon, Britannomachia Miniſtror. pag. 205.

(10) Camden, Annal. Part 4. pag. 620.

[D] He uttered Blaſphemies . . . which I ſhall relate only in Latin.] They are worſe than thoſe of Caligula (11), and yet they are the concluſion of a very devout prayer; whence we may infer, that there is no folly whatſoever, but man's mind is capable of it, "Hæc fuit "ultima ejus oratio. Deus cœli potentiſſime Jehovah, "Alpha et Omega, Domine Domine Dominorum, "Rex Regum, æterne Deus. Tu me noſti, verum "iſtum Jehovah, quem miſiſti. Miraculum aliquod "ex nubibus oſtende his infidelibus, et libera me ab "his inimicis meis. Sin minus cælos ſuccendam, "et te è throno detractum manibus meis lacerabo "(12)." That is: "His laſt prayer was this: "O God of Heaven, moſt powerful Jehovah, the Alpha and Omega (beginning and end) Lord of Lords, "King of Kings, eternal God. Thou knoweſt me for "the true Jehovah, whom thou has ſent. Shew ſome "miracle from the Skies to theſe infidels, and deliver me "from theſe my enemies. Otherwiſe, I ſhall ſet fire "to Heaven, thruſt thee down from thy Throne, and "tear thee in pieces with my own hands." Camden having related the ſame blaſphemies almoſt in the ſame words, adds, that Hacket uttered ſome others ſtill more abominable. Aliaque magis infanda. Converſus ad Carnificem laqueum admoventem, Tune ſpurie, inquit, Hackettum Regem tuum ſuſpendes? Laqueo innodatus oculis in cœlum ſublatis, Hoccine, inquit frendens, pro regno collato rependis? venio ulturus (13). That is, "Turning himſelf to the Executioner who was preparing "the rope, "How you Rogue, ſays he, will you hang "Hacket your King? When the rope was tied about "his Neck, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, he cried "out, gnaſhing his Teeth, Is it thus thou rewardeſt me for the Kingdom I procured thee? I come "to revenge my ſelf." Camden obſerves, that this Fanatick and his two Aſſociates did not take off their Hats, when they were brought before their Judges, and that they anſwered impudently, that they were above the Magiſtrates; that Hacket pleaded afterwards to his charge (14), but that he anſwered, with ſuch Blaſphemies, as ſtruck the whole Audience with horror. There was, perhaps, ſome artifice in all this, for who knows but he deſigned to make the Judges believe, that he was mad? However it be, there appeared no ſigns of madneſs in the reſt of his Behaviour, nor in his affected gravity (15). Camden relates all this. Obſerve that Arthington repented, and even publiſhed a Book, which teſtified his repentance (16).

(11) See the remark [F] of the article CALIGULA.

(12) Fitz-Simon, Britannomach. Miniſtror. pag. 205, 206.

(13) Camd. Annal. Part 4. pag. 622.

(14) Se reum agnovit. Idem, ibid.

(15) Idem, ibid.

(16) Idem, ibid. pag. 623.

[E] He entertained a violent hatred againſt Queen Elizabeth.] He would never pray for her, and his deſign was to deprive her both of her Crown and of her life, and to change intirely the Conſtitution of the Government. He uſed to hear the Sermons bare-headed, but he put on his Hat, as ſoon as he perceived that the Queen was mentioned in the prayers of the Congregation (17). He confeſſed before the Judges who tried him, that he had run a Dagger through the heart of that Queen's Picture; Julii 20 & 23 palam confeſſus eſt Hacketus Reginæ imaginem ſe transfixiſſe ad cor ſtylo ferreo, eamque pro Regina non habuiſſe (18); and that he did not hold her for his Queen. A little before he was ſtrangled he wiſhed her all ſorts of curſes (19).

(17) Fitz-Simon, Britannomach. Miniſtror. pag. 204.

(18) Idem, ibid. pag. 205.

(19) Dirîs omnibus Reginam devovit. Idem, ibid.

☞HACKET (JOHN), Biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry in the ſeventeenth Century, was born in the Strand near Exeter Houſe in the pariſh of St. Martin's in the Field, September

September the 1st 1592 (a). His father, Andrew Hacket (b), who was descended from an antient family in Scotland, being then a Senior Burgess of Westminster, and afterwards belonging to the Robes of Prince Henry. Our author was educated in the College School at Westminster, under Mr. Ireland, who finding in him a great propensity to learning, was very kind to him, as was likewise Dr. Lancelot Andrews, then Dean of Westminster, afterwards Bishop of Winchester, who, in the necessary absence of the master, being accustomed to come into the school, and examine the boys, took this youth into his particular favour, and continued it to him as long as the Bishop lived (c). In 1608 he, with Mr. George Herbert the Poet, was elected from thence into Trinity College in Cambridge, and put under the tuition of Dr. Edward Simson, author of Chronicon ab exordio Mundi (d). In the year 1612 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and was in 1614 elected Fellow of that College (f). In 1616 he took the degree of Master of Arts (g). July the 9th 1616 he was incorporated in that degree in the University of Oxford (h). About this time (i) retiring during the long vacation with one of his pupils, afterwards Lord Byron, into Nottinghamshire, he wrote a Latin Comedy, intitled, Loyola, which was twice acted before King James I, and printed at London in 1648 in 8vo. Upon his return to the College he applied himself to the study of Divinity, and in 1618 received holy Orders from Dr. John King Bishop of London, who had a great affection for him, and expressed the same on divers occasions. But above all others Dr. John Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, observing his extensive learning and skill in the Languages, appointed him his Chaplain immediately after he was made Lord Keeper of the Great Seal in 1621. Two years he spent in his Lordship's service, before his time was come to commence Bachelor of Divinity; and then he desired leave to go to Cambridge to keep the Act in 1623, which he performed with great success [A]. Upon his return to Court the Bishop of Lincoln preferred him to be Chaplain to King James I, before whom he preached several times to his Majesty's satisfaction [B]. In 1624, by the recommendation of his patron, he was presented to the Rectory of St. Andrew's Holbourn, then in the King's disposal by reason of the minority of Thomas Earl of Southampton; and soon after, by the same means, he had the Living of Cheame in Surrey conferred upon him, which was fallen likewise in his Majesty's gift by the promotion of Dr. Richard Senhouse to the Bishopric of Carlisle. In the last year of that King he was named by his Majesty to attend an Embassador into Germany; but he was dissuaded from this journey; for having written Loyola, he was told, that it would not be safe for him to go thither, even in an Embassador's retinue. In 1628 he commenced Doctor of Divinity at Cambridge, where he preached a Sermon upon Acts xii. 23. which was highly applauded by the learned Auditory there. In 1631 the Bishop of Lincoln conferred on him the Archdeaconry of Bedford, to which charge he usually went once in a year, commonly the week after Easter, and exhorted the Clergy to keep strictly to the orders of the Church [C]. Afterwards finding his Church of St. Andrew's Holbourn extremely decayed, he sollicited the Nobility and Gentry as well as his Parishioners to contribute to the rebuilding, at least the repair of it; and about the year 1639 he had obtained several thousands of pounds for that purpose. But the civil wars breaking out, the Parliament seized for their use that and all the money collected for the repair of St. Paul's. In March 1641 he was nominated, with divers eminent Bishops and Clergy, to

(a) Account of the Life and Death of Bishop Hacket. By Thomas Plume D. D. pag. 3. prefixed to the Bishop's Century of Sermons preached upon several remarkable subjects. ed. London 1675, in fol.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 1147, 2d edit. London 1721.

(c) Dr. Plume's Account, pag. 4, 5.

(d) Ibid. pag. 5, 6.

(f) Dr. Plume's Account, pag. 6.

(g) From the Register of the University.

(h) Wood, Fasti Oxon. vol. 1. col. 202.

(i) Idem, ibid.

[A] Desired leave to go to Cambridge to keep the Act there in 1623, which he performed with great success.] He maintained these two questions: I. Judicio Romanæ Ecclesiæ in sanctis canonizandis non est standum. II. Vota monastica perfectionis, quæ dicuntur, sunt illicita. The former question was given very seasonably; for the year before, Pope Gregory XV had canonized Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits, Francis Xavier, the Indian Apostle, Philip Neri, the General of the order of the Jesuits, and Theresia, a Spanish Lady, who had built twenty five Monasteries for men, and seventeen for women. He cast his thesis into three parts, and observed, I. That because the scripture saith, the memory of the just shall be blessed, all canonization of Saints is not to be accounted superstitious. But by canonization he meant only a public testimony of the Christian church, concerning any member's sanctity and glory after death. II. That this testimony ought to be given by General, or at least Provincial Councils, of their own members. III. That it is by no means to be left to the breast of the Pope and college of Cardinals; because they especially attended to false qualifications, which they made undoubted signs of saintship; and consequently had already canonized unworthy persons, not beatified in Heaven, but rather damned in Hell; and this for perverse and impious ends, which they always endeavoured to establish by their canonization. In all these respects the Pope, who is their virtual church, was evidently a most partial and unfit judge, very apt to be imposed upon himself, and likewise to impose upon others (1).

(1) Account of the Life and Death of Bishop Hacket. By Thomas Plume, D. D. pag. 7, 8. prefixed to the Bishop's Century of Sermons preached upon several remarkable subjects, edit. London 1675 in fol.

[B] Before whom he preached several times to his Majesty's satisfaction.] He preached particularly before the King on Psalm xli. 9. (2) upon the Gowry Conspiracy, for which a thanksgiving was continued all that King's reign on the 5th of August. "And tho' "some people, says Dr. Plume (3), have denied the "treason, yet our good Bishop was assured, that the "most religious Bishop Andrews once fell down upon "his knees before King James, and besought his "Majesty to spare his customary pains upon that day, "that he might not mock God, unless the thing were "true. The King replied, those people were much "to blame, who would never believe a treason unless "their Prince was actually murdered; but did assure "him in the faith of a Christian, and upon the word "of a King, their treasonable attempt against him "was true."

(2) This Sermon is printed in his Century of Sermons, pag. 731.

(3) Account, ubi supra, pag. 8.

[C] Exhorted the Clergy to keep strictly to the orders of the church.] He directed them to all regular conformity to the doctrine and discipline by law established, without under or over doing, asserting in his opinion, that Puritanism lay on both sides: whosoever did more than the church commanded, as well as less, were guilty of it; and that he only was a true son of the church, who broke not the boundals of it either way (4).

(4) Ibid. pag. 12.

to consider of what was amiss in the Liturgy, and to rectify the same [D]; but the Lords and Commons put a stop to that design by passing a Bill for taking away the government of the Church by Bishops. However, before the passing of this Act, the Clergy being allowed to speak for themselves, unanimously chose Dr. Hacket to plead their cause [E]; which he did on May the 12th with general applause, so that his speech put [D] In March 1641, he was nominated, with divers eminent Bishops and Clergy, to consider of what was amiss in the Liturgy, and to rectify the same.] The House of Lords had appointed a committee out of their own members for settling the church, and at the same time nominated a sub-committee to prepare matters for their cognizance. Dr. John Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, had the chair in both, and was authorized to call together divers Bishops and other Divines, to consult for the correction of what was exceptionable, and to settle peace. Of the sub-committee, those who appeared and consulted together in the Jerusalem-Chamber at Westminster, though others were nominated, were only these, the Bishop of Lincoln, Archbishop Usher, the Bishop of Durham, Bishop Hall, Dr. Samuel Ward, Dr. John Prideaux, Dr. William Twiss, Dr. Robert Sanderson, Dr. Daniel Featly, Dr. Ralph Brownrigg, Dr. Richard Holdsworth, Dr. John Hacket, Dr. Cornelius Burgess, Mr. Stephen Marshall, Mr. Edmund Calamy, Mr. Thomas Hill, and Mr. John White. They debated solemnly for six several days upon divers important points; but in the middle of May the bill against Deans and Chapters put an end to their consultations (5).

(5) Ibid. pag. 16. and Fuller, Church History of Britain, Book 11. pag. 174, 175, 176.

[E] Unanimously chose Dr. Hacket to plead their cause.] Mr. Fuller has given the heads of his whole speech, copied out of Dr. Hacket's papers (6). But Dr. Plume has published it at large (7), as he found it among our author's papers. He recommended cathedrals as fit to supply the defects of prayer committed by private men, the public duty whereof should be constantly performed in some principal place, in imitation of the primitive practice. And whereas some complain, that cathedral music, for a great part of it, serves rather to tickle the ear, than to affect the heart with godliness, and that what should be intended for devotion, vanished away into quavers and airs; he, with the rest of his brethren, heartily wished the amendment of it, and that it were reduced to the form, which Athanasius commends, ut legentibus sint quam cantantibus similiores. He alledged, that at the Reformation preaching began in cathedrals. And whereas some have asserted, that Lecture-preachers were a new and upstart corporation, he observed, that the local statutes of all or most cathedrals require lecture-sermons on the week-days; and in the name of his brethren requested, that the godly and profitable performance of preaching might be more exacted. He urged, that cathedrals were serviceable for the advancement of learning, and training up persons in defence of religion. He remarked, that the principal Grammar-Schools in the Kingdom were maintained by the charity of these churches, the care and discipline of them set forward by their oversight, fit masters provided for them, and their method in teaching frequently examined. That with regard to young students in Divinity, they will be more industrious, when they see rewards prepared, which may recompense the costs, which they put their friends to in their education, and make them some recompense for their great labour. "It is represented unto them, says he, how "many tedious days and nights they must devour prolix authors, that are set before them: had they not "need of encouragement to undergo it? And where "there is not a desirable prize to run for, who will "toil himself much to contend for it? Upon the fear "and jealousy, that these retributions of labour should "be taken away from industrious students, the Universities of the realm do feel a longing and a pining "away already in both their bodies. In a populous "College, I mean Trinity-College in Cambridge, "wherein seventy or eighty students were admitted "communibus annis, I have heard by two witnesses of "that society, that not above six were admitted from "Allhallows-day to Easter-eve. Let any man ask "the Booksellers of St. Paul's Church-yard and Little-"Britain, if their books, I mean grave and learned "authors, do not lie upon their hands, and are not "saleable. There is a timorous imagination abroad, "as if we were shutting up learning in a case, and "laying it quite aside. Mr. Speaker, if the bare "threatning make such a stop in all kind of literature, "what would it work, if the blow were given?" He observes then, that all that had written in defence of the Protestant religion, except a few, have been either the Professors and Commorants in the two Universities, or such as have had preferments in collegiate and cathedral churches, as I am able, says he, to shew, by a catalogue of their names and works. For such, and none but such, are furnished with the best opportunities to write books for the defence of religion. For as in the Universities the society of many learned men may be had for advice, and discourse; so when we depart from them to live abroad, we find small Academies in the company of many grounded scholars in those foundations, and it is discourse that ripens learning, as the spark of fire is struck out between the flint and the steel. There likewise we have copious and well furnished libraries to peruse learned authors of all kinds, which must be consulted in great causes. And they that have such great business in their heads, it is needful that they have otium literarium, a retirement to their studies, before they can bring that forth, which will powerfully convince gainsayers. He alledged, that the antient and genuine use of Deans and Chapters was, as Senatus Episcopi, to assist the Bishop of his jurisdiction. Now whereas some of his reverend brethren had complained, that Bishops had for many years usurped the sole jurisdiction to themselves and their consistories, the continuing of Chapters rightly used, would reduce it from one man to a plurality of assistants. He remarked, that the structures themselves should speak for the structures; not that he would draw their eyes only to behold the goodly fabrics, as the disciples did to our Saviour; but to put them in remembrance, that cathedral churches were the first monuments of Christianity in the Kingdom. From things he passed to persons, and begun with the multitude of those, who were maintained from cathedrals, some one of them having three hundred and more depending on it; so that it amounted to many thousands of persons; all of whom, by the dissolution of Deans and Chapters, might be exposed to poverty. He next instanced in Tenants, "who have prospered "better by holding Leases from Deans and Chapters, "than Farmers elsewhere do prosper under incorpo-"rations over all the Kingdom. And the Tenants, "continues he, are sensible of their own happiness "herein, and have testified it from many places by "rendering their humble petitions to this honourable "house, that they may continue, as they have done, "under their antient landlords, which, with all sub-"mission, we must humbly crave may be admitted "and perused by this honourable house. And I can-"not blame them to stir in their own case; for good "Accountants have cast it up, that if all the lands "of all cathedral and collegiate churches were cast up "into one total sum, at a reasonable and fair penny-"worth, not only in rents but in fines, the Tenants "in clear rent do enjoy six parts in seven at the least. "And we are not they that grudge them this bargain, "but are most willing, that our revenue should be dis-"persed into all the veins of the Kingdom." He then shewed, that those cities, wherein cathedrals stand, especially those cities which are not maritime, being very poor in trade, were inriched, partly by the hospitality of the clergy, partly because great numbers of the inhabitants were chosen to be officers of the cathedrals, and partly by the frequent resort unto them, especially where there are large and well furnished libraries, the great repositories of learning. He proceeded next to consider the regard due to the younger branches of the whole Kingdom. "All men, says "he, are not born elder brothers, and all elder bro-"thers are not born to be inheritors of lands. Divers "of low degree have generous spirits in them, and "would be glad to make themselves a fortune, as the

(6) Church History, B. 11. pag. 177, 178, 179.

(7) Account, pag. 18, & seqq.

put a ſtop to that Bill. However it paſt ſoon after by a new queſtion, without a ſecond hearing of the Doctor (k). March the 28th 1642 he was made Prebendary of St. Paul's (l). Afterwards being ſilenced at St. Andrews, he retired to Cheame, where he alſo uſed the Liturgy till forbidden by the Parliament. He was ſeized there by the Earl of Eſſex's army, who carried him away priſoner with them; but being at laſt releaſed, he returned to Cheame, where he continued till the Reſtoration; when he was reſtored to his preferments, and offered the Biſhopric of Glouceſter, which he refuſed (m). He afterwards accepted of the Biſhopric of Lichfield and Coventry, to which he was conſecrated December the 27th 1661 (n); and repaired to Lichfield the ſpring following, and finding the Cathedral there ruined by the civil wars, he ſet himſelf to the rebuilding of it, and finiſhed the ſame in about eight years with greater magnificence than before, at the expence of twenty thouſand pounds, a thouſand pounds of which he had from the Chapter, and the reſt was of his own charge, or procured from benefactors. He laid out likewiſe

(k) Dr. Plume's Account, pag. 7, & ſeqq.

(l) Newcourt, Repertorium Eccleſ. Parœch. Londinenſe, vol. 1. pag. 181.

(m) Plume, ubi ſupra.

(n) Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals of York, &c. pag. 394.

" phraſe is. What hopes have they to atchieve this " in a more ready way, than to propoſe unto themſelves " to lead a virtuous and induſtrious life, that they " may attain to a ſhare of the endowments of collegiate " and cathedral churches? They only are the common poſſeſſion of the realm, lying open to all that " will qualify themſelves to get a part in them. They " are not incloſed in private men's eſtates, but they " are the commons of the Kingdom." And whereas travellers inform us, that moſt ranks and degrees of people in England, Knights, Gentlemen, and Yeomen, live more plentifully and faſhionably than in any other country, he truſted that it would not be thought unreaſonable, that the clergy may in ſome ſort have a better maintenance than in the neighbouring Reformed churches, and not degenerate into ſuch Prieſts, as Jeroboam appointed, the refuſe and moſt baſe of the people, from whom nothing can be expected but ignorance, ſuperſtition, and idolatry. " Neither is our eſtate, ſays he, " better than all other Reformed churches in this caſe; " for I have heard it from them, that have diligently " travelled over all the Reformed churches in Germany, that the clergy among the Swedes have ſuch " Collegiate Chapters with means endowed to the uſe " of the government of the church, as we have. And " the Reformed in France and the Low Countries do " ſufficiently teſtify how much they deſire, that they " were partners of the like proſperity, becauſe many " of the rareſt ſcholars have found great relief and " comfort by being inſtalled Prebendaries in our Cathedral and Collegiate Churches. I will ſpeak but " of a few, whom myſelf have known. In the " reign of bleſſed Queen Elizabeth, Dr. Saravia was " maintained in theſe foundations. In the reign of the " moſt learned King James, Caſaubon, father and ſon. " O the renowned Caſaubon the father; what a miracle of learning! Add unto theſe Dr. Primroſe, " Mr. Voſſius, and the great honour of the Reformed " churches, the moſt learned Dr. Peter Moulin. . . . . " But the teſtimony of an adverſary is that, which " may moſt lawfully be uſed to advantage. The " greateſt enemy and foul-tongued reviler of the Reformed Church of England was Sanders, in his book " of The Engliſh Schiſm, as he terms it. Conſult him " in 163d page, as it is in my edition, how he " envies us, and ſnarls at us, for our proſperity of " thoſe forenamed churches. He ſays, that the royal " Queen did judge it fit for the glory of her prelacy, " for the ſplendor of her Kingdom, for the firmneſs " of her ſect, (ſo he calls our religion), that in the Cathedral and Collegiate Churches ſhe would have " Provoſts, Deans, Prebendaries, and Canons. This " was it that troubled him, that he ſaw theſe foundations conduce to the ſtability of religion; ſo that " I judge by his words, a fatter ſacrifice could not be " offered up to ſuch as himſelf, than the extirpation of " them." He then ſhewed the benefit which the King and Commonwealth reaped by ſuch Lands, ſince they paid greater ſums to the Exchequer for Firſt-fruits, Tenths, and Subſidies, according to the proportion, than any other eſtates or corporations in the Kingdom. Now as he was by the favour of that honourable houſe admitted to plead in that roof, where their worthy progenitors gave unto the clergy many charters, privileges, and immunities; ſo he truſted to find the antient juſtice of the houſe unto his brethren, who were not charged, much leſs convicted of any ſcandalous faults. At laſt he led them to the higheſt degree of all conſiderations, namely, the honour of God. " The fabricks, ſays he, that I ſpeak of, were erected " to his glory; the lands bequeathed them were dedicated to his worſhip and ſervice. And to that " end I beſeech you to let them continue for ever, " and to the maintenance of ſuch perſons, whom their " liberality did expreſsly deſtine to be relieved by " them. And withal I muſt inform you, and I dare " not conceal it from you; it is tremenda vox, which " I ſhall bring forth, that they have barred all alienations with many curſes and imprecations. It is " God's own ſentence upon the cenſers, which Core " and his complices uſed in their ſchiſm, with pretence to do God's ſervice, Num. xvi. 36. They offered them before the Lord, therefore they are hallowed. This is not ſpoken after the way of a Levitical form and nicety, for the uſing of thoſe cenſers was Anti-Levitical; but this is an abſolute theological rule out of the mouth of the Lord, " that which is offered unto the Lord is hallowed. " Again, Prov. xx. 25. It is a ſnare to the man, that devoureth that which is holy. This is a Proverbial " Divinity, every man's notion, and in every man's " mouth, πανοιμία ῥῆμα ἐν τοῖς οἴμοις λαλήμενον, Theology preached in every ſtreet of the city, and every " high-way of the field. Let me only add that " ſmart queſtion of St. Paul's, Rom. ii. 22. Thou that abhorreſt idols, doſt thou commit ſacrilege? I have " done, Mr. Speaker, if you will let me add, this " epiphonema; upon the ruins of the rewards of learning no ſtructure can be raiſed up but ignorance; and " upon the chaos of ignorance no ſtructure can be built " but prophaneneſs and confuſion." This ſpeech being ſignificant in the ſenſe, and handſomely delivered (8), made an impreſſion on the Houſe; ſo that if the alienation of thoſe Lands had been then put to the queſtion, ſome, who thought they knew the ſenſe of the Houſe, concluded, that it would have been carried in the negative by a majority of above an hundred and twenty (9). In the Afternoon Dr. Cornelius Burges, as Speaker for his Party, made a vehement invective againſt Deans and Chapters, and the unprofitableneſs of ſuch Corporations. He aggravated the Debauchery of the Singing men. But he concluded that it was abſolutely unlawful to convert ſuch Endowments to any private Perſon's profit. " So that the Doctrine, ſays " Fuller (10), was delivered by both the Doctors; only they differed in their applications; the former " being for the continuing ſuch Lands to their antient, " the latter for diverting them to other, but neither " for alienating them from publick and pious Employments. If ſince Dr. Burges hath been a large purchaſer of ſuch Lands to himſelf, if ſince * St. " Andrew the firſt converted, and St. Paul the laſt " converted Apoſtle have met in his purſe, I doubt not " but that he can give ſufficient reaſon for the ſame, both " to himſelf and any other that ſhall queſtion him " therein; the rather becauſe lately he read his learned " Lectures in St. Paul's on the Criticiſms of Conſcience, no leſs carefully than curiouſly weighing ſatisfaction to ſcruples; and if there be any fault, ſo " able a confeſſor knows how to get his Abſolution." The further debate upon this Bill was adjourned for a week, and then committed to a Committee of the whole Houſe, when two remarkable ſpeeches were made againſt theſe Foundations by Mr. Serjeant William Thomas, and Mr. Pory, Aldermen of Glouceſter; and after a long debate, the Houſe came to a reſolution for the aboliſhing of Deans and Chapters, &c. but their Votes did not then paſs into a law.

(8) Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Great Britain, Part 2. B. 9. pag. 803.

(9) Fuller's Church Hiſtory, B. 11. pag. 179.

(10) Ibid.

* Wells and London.

likewiſe a thouſand pounds in repairing the houſe of his reſidence there, the palace of his predeceſſors having been deſtroyed during the civil wars. He died October the 28th 1670, aged ſeventy eight years, and was interred in his own Cathedral, where a noble monument was erected to him by his eldeſt ſon Sir Andrew Hacket of Moxhull in Warwickſhire, ſome time one of the Maſters of Chancery. He was ſmall and ſlender of ſtature, well-ſhaped, and of a very ſerene and comely countenance, and lively eyes; and had a voice wonderfully ſweet and clear. We ſhall give his character in the note [F]. By his firſt wife, who died in 1637, he had ſeveral children, as he had likewiſe by his ſecond wife; and by both lived to ſee thirty two children and grand-children (o). Since his death there have been printed A Century of Sermons upon ſeveral remarkable ſubjects, preached by him, and publiſhed by Thomas Plume, D. D. at London 1675 in fol. and The Life of Archbiſhop Williams, printed at London 1693 in fol. of which there is an Abridgment, the ſecond edition of which was publiſhed at Cambridge 1703 in 8vo, under the title of The Life of John Williams, Lord Keeper &c. With an Appendix giving an account of his benefactions to St. John's College in Cambridge. By Ambroſe Philips, Fellow of the ſame College. In the Preface Mr. Philips obſerves, that Biſhop Hacket's "commendable gratitude to his great Patron Williams has made him ſo very ſtudious of "embelliſhments for his life, that I can liken the Lord Keeper, as repreſented by him, "to nothing ſo properly as to the ſtatue of ſome antient hero, ſo beſet with trophies and "ornaments, that the comelineſs and juſt proportion of the image underneath is ſcarce "diſcernible at firſt ſight. And Biſhop Hacket in his book has ſet out the Lord "Keeper juſt for all the world as he was when living, that is, ſurrounded with a multi-"tude of learning and all the coſtly variety of ſcience."

(o) Dr. Plume's Account, pag. 10.

[F] We ſhall give his Character in the Note.] Dr. Plume tells us (11), that he was zealous againſt Popery and all ſeparation from the Church of England. In the diſpute between the Calviniſts and the Arminians, he was ever very moderate; but bred being under Biſhop Davenant and Dr. Samuel Ward in Cambridge, adhered to their ſentiments. He was exemplary in his Behaviour, chearful in converſation, hoſpitable, humble, and affable, though ſubject to great eruptions of Anger, but at the ſame time very placable and ready to be appeas'd, and of too generous a Nature to be vindictive. When he was a Biſhop, he deſired to hold nothing in Commendam; he renewed all his leaſes for years, and not for lives, and upon very moderate fines, and ſpent a very conſiderable ſhare thereof in the repair of his Cathedrals and acts of Charity. In his younger years he had been much addicted to School Learning, which was then greatly ſtudied in the Univerſity; but he afterwards grew weary of it, and profeſſed "that he found more ſhadows and names than "ſolid juice and ſubſtance in it, and would much "diſlike their horrid and barbarous terms, more pro-"per for Incantation than Divinity; and became "perfectly of Beatus Rhenanus's mind, that the "Schoolmen were rather to be reckoned Philoſo-"phers than Divines; but if any pleaſed to account "them ſuch, he had much rather with St. John Chry-ſoſtom be ſtiled a pious Divine, than an invincible or "irrefragable one with Thomas Aquinas, or our own "Countryman Alexander Hales. For knowledge in "the Tongues, he would confeſs he could never fix "upon Arabian Learning; the place was ſiticuloſa regio, "a dry and barren Land, where no water is; and he "being diſcouraged in his younger years, by ſuch as "had plodded moſt in it; and often quarrelled with "his great Friend Salmaſius, for ſaying he accounted "no man ſolidly learned without skill in Arabick and "other eaſtern Languages. Our Biſhop declared his "mind otherwiſe, and bewailed that many good Wits "of late years proſecuted the eaſtern Languages ſo "much as to neglect the weſtern Learning and Diſ-"cretion too ſometimes. Mr. Selden and Biſhop Greitton "had both affirmed to him, that they ſhould often "read ten pages for one line of Senſe, and one word "of moment; and did confeſs there was no Learning "like to what Scholars may find in Greek Authors, "as Plato, Plutarch, &c. and himſelf could never "diſcern but that many of their quotations and proofs "from them were, in his own words, incerta, inex-plorata, ἀκατάληπτα." T.

(11) Ubi ſupra, pag. 42, & ſeqq.

In Præfat. ad Tert.

HADRIAN (PUBLIUS ÆLIUS), a Roman Emperor, would afford us matter for a very long article, if we would omit none of his chief qualities and remarkable actions. But we muſt confine ourſelves to a few, and we ſhall take care to repeat as little as it is poſſible, of what is contained in Moreri's Dictionary, where this article does not much abound with errors [A]. Hadrian born at Rome January the 24th, A. C.

[A] In Moreri.... this Article does not much abound with errors.] It is one of his beſt Articles: And yet without a compleat examination of it, I have obſerved ten or twelve particulars, which I do not believe could be well proved. I. That there was in Italy a City named Italica. II. That Hadrian rebuilt Adria. III. That on his Return from England he was acquainted in Languedoc with the Death of Plotina. IV. That he built a Temple to her at Niſmes. V. That Quadratus and Ariſtides were aſſiſted by Severus, one of the Emperor's Lieutenants, when they preſented this Book in favour of the Chriſtian Religion. VI. That Jeruſalem and Ælia were two different Cities in Judea. VII. That Plutarch was Hadrian's Tutor. VIII. That Hadrian called Epictetus, Numenius, and other learned men back to Rome. IX. That he ſent ſome other learned men to Alexandria to teach all the Sciences there, before he went thither himſelf. X. That he underſtood the Mathematicks, and had compoſed ſome Treatiſes upon thoſe Sciences. XI. That he died July the 12th in the year 138, after he had reigned twenty years, ten months, and 29 days. XII. That Phavorinus was his Secretary. You have ſeen in my Article that Hadrian died July the 10th, and that he began his Reign Auguſt the 11th. If it be true, that he died July the 12th, Moreri ought to have ſaid that he reigned twenty years, eleven months, and one day. Take notice that I do not pretend to deny that he received a Letter from Serenius Granius Proconſul of Aſia, who deſired him to treat the Chriſtians with equity, nor that he ſtudied Geometry. Spartianus aſſerts it expreſly (1); and Moreri did well to aſſert the ſame; but beſides this he mentions alſo the Mathematicks. They who miſled him did not know, that by the word Matheſis Spartianus means Aſtrology. Matheſin ſic ſcire ſibi viſus eſt, ut ſero Calendis Januariis ſcripſerit quid ei toto anno poſſet evenire. That is, "He imagined that he "was ſo well skilled in Aſtrology, that late on the firſt "of January he wrote down all that ſhould happen "to him during the whole year." I will not quarrel with Moreri for what he obſerves concerning Hadrian's

(1) This muſt be underſtood of the ſtudy of Geometry only.

A. C. 76 [B] loſt his father ten years after [C], and had for his guardians Trajan, who was his relation [D], and Cælius Tatianus a Roman Knight. He had ſuch a taſte and inclination for the ſtudy of the Greek tongue, that it expoſed him to ſome ridicule (a). He began very early to ſerve in the armies, and was Tribune of a Legion before Domitian's death. The army of lower Mœſia choſe him (b) to congratulate Trajan upon his being adopted by Nerva, and it was he that acquainted Trajan with the firſt news of Nerva's death. He regained this Emperor's favour, which he had almoſt entirely loſt by his extravagant expences, that made him run in debt. He married (c) a grand-niece (d) of this Prince [E]; the Empreſs (e) was his Patroneſs in the moſt effectual manner. The Oration he delivered before the Senate when he was Quæſtor (f) appeared ſo rough and unpolite, that he was hiſſed at; which obliged him to apply himſelf ſo diligently to the ſtudy of the Latin tongue, that he made himſelf perfectly maſter of it, and became very eloquent. He accompanied Trajan in the expedition againſt the Daci (g), and to pay his court to him he drank plentifully, for which he was nobly rewarded. He had already been a Tribune of the People (h) when he followed Trajan in the ſecond war againſt the Daci. He behaved very gallantly in that war, and received a preſent from the Emperor, which gave him ſome hopes to ſucceed him in the Empire (i). Some time after he was made Prætor, and commanded afterwards the army in lower Pannonia with ſo much prudence and conduct, that it procured him the Conſulſhip (k). The Orations he compoſed for Trajan encreaſed his credit [F]. After the ſiege of Atra in Arabia had been raiſed, Trajan being ſick, and determined to return to Rome, left him the command of the army. He had already given him the government of Syria, and finding that his death grew near, he adopted him at laſt (l). We ſhall examine

(a) Imbutuſque impenſius Græcis ſtudiis, ingenio ejus ſic ad ea declinante ut à nonnullis Græculus diceretur. Spartian. in ejus Vita.

(b) A. C. 97.

(c) A. C. 100.

(d) SABINA. See her article.

(e) See the article PLOTINA.

(f) A. D. 101.

(g) A. D. 101, or 102.

(h) A. D. 105.

(i) Adamante gemma, quam Trajanus à Nerva acceperat, donatus ad ſpem ſucceſſionis erectus eſt. Spartian. in Hadrian.

(k) A. D. 109.

(l) Ex Spartiano in Hadriano.

drian's Memory; tho' he runs upon extremes. He had, ſays he, ſo happy a memory, that he remembered the names of all the Places, Towns, and Rivers, by which he paſſed, and even of all the Soldiers of his Armies. This is more than what Aurelius Victor aſſerts in theſe words; Memor ſupra quam cuiquam credibile eſt, locos, negotia, milites abſentes quoque nominibus recenſere. i. e. "He had an incredible memo-"ry; and remembered places, affairs, and could "repeat the names even of ſuch Soldiers as were ab-"ſent." Spartianus gives us a more particular ac-"count (2), and yet he does not go ſo far as Moreri does.

(2) Nomina plurimus ſine nomenclatore reddidit quæ ſemel & congeſta ſimul audiverat, ut nomenclatores ſæpius errantes emendaverit. Dixit & veteranorum nomina quos aliquando dimiſerat: libros ſtatim lectos & ignotos quidem plurimis memoriter reddidit; uno tempore ſcripſit, dictavit, audivit, & cum amicis fabulatus eſt. Spartian. in Hadriano.

[B] Hadrian born at Rome January the 24th A. C. 76 ...] Spartianus's account of this Emperor's Family inclines me to think, that Eutropius was in the wrong to aſſert, that Hadrian was born at Italica. The former of theſe writers obſerves, that Hadrian's Anceſtors, who came originally from Adria in Italy, ſettled at Italica in Spain in the time of the Scipio's, &c. He quotes Hadrian himſelf, who had aſſerted this in the Hiſtory of his own life. Spartian had doubtleſs read in the ſame work what he adds at the ſame time, namely that Hadrian was born at Rome ix Kal. Feb. (January the 24th) when Veſpaſian was Conſul for the ſeventh time, and Titus for the fifth time.

[C] ... Loſt his Father ten years after. His name was Ælius Hadrianus Afer. It is conjectured that the ſurname of Afer was given him, becauſe he had been Governor of Africa, and that he is the ſame with the Preſident Hadrianus, who put the holy Martyr Leontius to death at Tripoli under the Emperor Veſpaſian. The Acts of this Martyr inſerted in Metaphraſtes's Collection acquaint us, that the Preſident Hadrianus, who himſelf judged Leontius, was a Senator. Now Suidas obſerves, that the Emperor Hadrian's Father was a Senator, and that he had been Prætor. Theſe reaſons of the Sieur Triſtan's (3) conjecture ſeem to be pretty ſtrong. I do not know why Caſaubon (4) cenſured theſe words of Xiphilin ἦν δὲ Ἀδριανὸς γένος μὲν Ἀδριανῦ Ἄφρου υἱός; for after all his Clamours, it muſt be confeſſed, that the ſenſe of theſe words may be, that Hadrian was the ſon of Hadrian Afer. This is certainly their true and natural meaning, as Salmaſius (5) declares. So that one would be very much in the wrong to cenſure Xiphilin, as though by abridging Dio he had altered and miſrepreſented what relates to Hadrian's Genealogy, and made an African Family out of a Spaniſh Family. It is true that Cedrenus miſtaking Xiphilin's meaning, was drawn to aſſert a groſs Falſity; for he ſays that the Emperor Hadrian was an African by extraction. Let us not forget to obſerve that Domitia Paulina, Hadrian's mother, was born at Cadiz (6).

(3) Comment. Hiſt. tom. 1. pag. 456.

(4) In Spartian. pag. m. 7.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Gadibus orta. Spartian. in Vita Adriani.

[D] Trajan was his Relation.] Hadrian's Father was Trajan's firſt Couſin; for he was the Son of Ulpia, the ſiſter of Marcus Ulpius Trajanus, the Emperor Trajan's Father. See Caſaubon in his Commentary on Spartianus. They were not ſo near relations according to Eutropius, who aſſerts that Hadrian's Mother was Trajan's Couſin (7).

(7) Eum Trajanus quamquam conſobrinæ filium noluerat adoptare. Eutrop. lib. 8. pag. m. 89. i. e. "Trajan "would not a-"dopt him, tho' "he was the ſon "of his couſin "german."

[E] He married a grand Niece of this Prince.] We ſhall relate in another place who ſhe was, and how ſhe liked the match. It will be ſufficient to obſerve here, that they who aſſert (8) that Hadrian married Trajan's Daughter, are miſtaken. It does not appear that Trajan had any Children, nor that Hadrian ever had another wife but Sabina, who was the Daughter of one of Trajan's Nieces. The Author of the Chronicle of Alexandria has related a pleaſant fancy; he pretends that Hadrian married the daughter of the ſame Aquila, who made a Tranſlation of the Bible. St. Epiphanius ſeems to have aſſerted the ſame (9). Triſtan (10) charges this Alexandrian Chronologiſt with ſaying, that according to St. Epiphanius Hadrian was by nation a Greec, and originally come from Sinope. It is abſolutely falſe that St. Epiphanus ſays this; he aſſerts it only of Aquila.

(8) Conſtantinus Manaſſes, Glycas, John Tzetzes, quoted by Triſtan, Comment. Hiſt. tom. 1. pag. 454.

(9) De Ponderib. & Menſ. cap. 14. where he ſays αὐτοῦ πενθερὸν ἦν. Upon which Petavius makes the following obſervation. Quæ vox, cum alibi à me lecta non fuerit, vel πενθερὸν ſignificat, vel πενθεροῦ filium, affinem certè, nos ſocerum reddidimus, quaſi πενθερὸν legeretur, quomodo Alexandrini Chronici ſcriptorem hic legiſſe ſuſpicor: nam pag. 598 ex hoc Epiphanii loco hiſtoriam Aquilæ Pontici referens: Ἀκύλας, inquit, ἐγνωρίζετο ὃς ἦν πενθερὸς Ἀδριανοῦ τοῦ βασιλέως.

[F] The Orations he compoſed for Trajan encreaſed his Credit.] I ſhall tranſcribe Spartian's Words. Defuncto quidem Sura, Trajani ei (Adriano) familiaritas crevit, cauſa præcipue Orationem, quas pro Imperatore dictaverat. Caſaubon refers the word dictaverat to Sura, which at firſt ſeems to make the Hiſtorian reaſon pitifully; for is there any ſence in ſaying, After Sura's Death, Hadrian's Familiarity with Trajan encreaſed, eſpecially on account of the Orations which Sura had made for the Emperor. But if you will examine this more exactly, you will find, that according to the ſenſe which Caſaubon puts upon Spartian's words, their only defect is want of clearneſs; Spartian did not pretend to aſſert, that the ſame Orations, I mean the ſame numerically, which Sura had compoſed, encreaſed Hadrian's credit; he meant only ſuch Orations as were like thoſe which Sura wrote. And thus Caſaubon's explication does not differ upon the whole from Salmaſius's, which is very good. The ſenſe of it is as follows: Hadrian inſinuated himſelf deeper into Trajan's friendſhip, becauſe he did him the ſame ſervice, which Sura had done him, by compoſing his Orations for him. I would not alter the Text as Salmaſius does, nor ſuppoſe with him, that Hadrian wanted to be ſupported by Plotina's credit, in order to obtain from the Emperor the Office of writing his Orations; this was not ſo great an honour with regard to Hadrian, but he might obtain it without any interceſſion; men that were only teachers of Rhetorick have ſometimes been employed in this; witneſs the following paſſage in Spartian (11). Ælius Orationem pulcherrimam, quæ hodieque legitur, ſive per ſe, ſive per ſcriniorum aut DICENDI MAGISTROS paraſſet. i. e. "Ælius had prepared a "beautiful

(10) Comment. Hiſt. tom. 1. pag. 455.

(11) In Vita Ælii Veri.

examine in the article of PLOTINA (m), whether this adoption was real or ſuppoſed. This however is certain, that Hadrian having received at Antioch almoſt at the ſame time the news both of his adoption and of Trajan's death, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Emperor Auguſt the 11th 117. One of the firſt things he did was to yield up almoſt all Trajan's conqueſts, being content that the river Euphrates ſhould be the boundary of the Empire [G]. He did not return to Rome till the year 118. The Senate decreed him a triumph, and honoured him with the title of Father of his Country (n); but he refuſed both, and required that Trajan's image ſhould triumph. His liberality to the people is moſt extraordinary [H]. The next year he went into Mœſia to repulſe the Sarmatæ (o). During his abſence ſeveral perſons of the greateſt merit were put to death at Rome (p); and though he ſolemnly declared that he had not given ſuch orders, yet all the blame and odium of thoſe cruel proceedings reſted on him. Never did any Prince travel ſo much as he did; there was hardly one Province in the whole Empire, but he honoured it with his preſence. And as he was very generous, and would abſolutely know every thing by his own enquiries, he left in all places proofs of his liberality, and of his diligent care in examining the conduct of the Governors. It is thought that he began his travels in the year 120. He viſited the Gauls, Germany, and Britain, in which laſt country he cauſed a wall to be built, that the Iſlanders who had ſubmitted to him might not be attacked and plundered by thoſe that had ſhaken off the Roman yoke. In the year 121 he returned into Gaul, whence he went into Spain. It is believed that he went at that time into Mauritania. His firſt journey into the Eaſt was pretty long; for he was

(m) Remark [G].

(n) He accepted of that title afterwards. See Tillemont, Notes ſur l'Hiſtoire d'Adrien.

(o) Spart. in Hadriano.

(p) Idem, ibid. Dio, lib. 69.

" beautiful Oration ſtill extant, which he either wrote " himſelf, or cauſed to be written by his Secretaries, or " by THE TEACHERS OF RHETORICK." Domitian had his Letters, Orations, and Edicts penned by others (12). Nero had not compoſed Claudius's funeral Oration which he delivered: Seneca was the Author of it (13). It is true that the old men, who are very apt to make compariſons between the preſent and paſt times, obſerved, that none of the Princes, before Nero, ever had occaſion for ſuch a borrowed eloquence. This is what Tacitus tells us in the 3d Chapter of his xiiith Annal. Adnotabant Seniores, ſays he, quibus otioſum eſt, vetera & præſentia contendere, primum ex iis qui rerum potiti eſſent, Neronem alienæ facundiæ eguiſſe. Monſieur Spanheim obſerves, that the Emperors gave their Queſtors ſometimes the Employment, not only of compoſing, but alſo of delivering their Orations for them; as Suetonius amongſt others aſſerts of Nero, and even of Auguſtus (14). Let us obſerve by the by, that if we may credit the Emperor Julian (15), it was not out of ignorance, but out of a downright lazineſs, that Trajan made uſe of Sura.

(12) Sueton. in ejus Vita, cap. 20.

(13) Tacit. Annal. lib. 13. cap. 3.

(14) Spanh. Notes ſur les Ceſars de Julien, pag. 232.

[G] He was content that the River Euphrates ſhould be the boundary of the Empire.] St. Auguſtin has quoted this action of Hadrian, in order to ridicule the Idolaters, who pretended that the God Terminus (Boundary) would not give place even to Jupiter himſelf, when the Capitol was built, and that this was an Omen, that the bounds of the Roman Empire would never move back. Your God Terminus, ſays St. Auguſtin wittily to them (16), dreaded Hadrian the King of meer Men, more than he did Jupiter the King of the Gods. Poſtea in orientalibus partibus Hadriani voluntate mutati ſunt termini imperii Romani. Ille namque tres provincias nobiles Armeniam, Meſopotamiam, Aſſyriam, Perſarum conceſſit imperio, ut Deus ille Terminus qui Romanos terminos ſecundum illos tuebatur, & per illud pulcherrimum auſpicium loco non ceſſerat Jovi, plus Hadrianum regem hominum quam regem deorum timuiſſe videatur. That is, " The Boundaries of the Ro- " man Empire were afterwards changed by Ha- " drian's command. For he gave up three noble Pro- " vinces to the Perſians, namely, Armenia, Meſopo- " tamia, and Aſſyria; ſo that the God Terminus, " who, according to them, defended the Limits of the " Roman Empire, and who by a very lucky Omen " had refuſed to yield even to Jupiter, ſeems to have " dreaded Hadrian the King of mere men, more than " he did the King of the Gods." It is not at all probable, that the yielding up of thoſe conqueſts was an effect of Hadrian's envying Trajan's glory (17). For could he do any thing more glorious to the memory of the deceaſed, than to ſhew that he could not keep up things to that high degree, to which the other had carried them? We may therefore aſſert that the impoſſibility of keeping the conquered Provinces determined Hadrian to yield them up. Omnia trans Euphratem ac Tigrim reliquit, exemplo, ut dicebat, Catonis, qui Macedonas liberos pronunciavit quia teneri non poterant (18). That is, " He gave up the Provinces beyond " the Euphrates and the Tigris, as he ſaid, after the " example of Cato, who declared the Macedonians a " free People, becauſe they could not be kept in Sub- " jection." He choſe rather to have the diſadvantage in the compariſon that would be made between his Predeceſſor and himſelf, than to expoſe the Empire to the troubles that threatened it on every ſide. Ammianus Marcellinus obſerves, that before Jovianus, no Emperor nor Conſul ever yielded one inch of Ground to the Enemy; and Valeſius (19) pretends, that he could aſſert it with reaſon, and that Caſaubon was in the wrong to cenſure him for it (20).

(15) In Cæſarib. See Mr. Spanheim's Notes.

(16) Auguſtin. de Civit. Dei, lib. 4. cap. 29.

(17) And yet Eutropius, lib. 8. pag. 90. aſſerts, Trajani gloriæ invidens, ſtatim Provincias tres reliquit quas Trajanus addiderat.

(18) Spartian. in Adriano.

(19) In Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 25. cap. 9. pag. 439.

(20) See the remark [D] of the article JOVIANUS.

[H] His liberality . . . . is moſt extraordinary.] " It " ſeems that he remitted abſolutely all that was owed " by private perſons at Rome and in Italy, and in the " Provinces all that was owed for ſixteen years; at " leaſt in the Imperial Provinces; for Spartianus and " an inſcription of this year, 118, ſeem to confine it " to theſe . . . . He burnt in Trajan's ſquare the bonds " and notes relating to thoſe things which he remitted, " that the people might not fear to be called again to " an account for them afterwards . . . This remiſſion " amounted to an immenſe ſum, and ſome learned " perſons, who have examined what the Hiſtorians " relate of it, and reduced it to the manner of reckoning money at this time, make it amount to twenty " two millions and five hundred thouſand golden " crowns. There never was an inſtance of ſuch libe- " rality before his time, the memory of it has been " tranſmitted to poſterity not only by the Hiſtorians, " but alſo in famous inſcriptions made this year or " the next, when this affair was perhaps finiſhed, and " in medals in which Hadrian is repreſented holding " a flambeaux in his hand to ſet fire to all thoſe bonds " which he had made void." I tranſcribe this from Monſieur de Tillemont (21), you may find in his remarks an examination of ſeveral difficulties concerning this; I ſhall not enter upon that ſubject; I chooſe rather to obſerve, that there is no bonfire for a city taken, or for a victory gained, that could pleaſe the Citizens more than ſuch a fire as Hadrian made. I have read ſomewhere that the Embaſſador of Venice having burnt before Henry IV the papers in which he acknowledged himſelf indebted for ſeveral ſums to that Republick, this Prince, who loved a joke, ſaid, that he never ſaw a finer fire. Ageſilaus, an Ephorus of Lacedæmon, had made uſe of the ſame thought upon the like occaſion. Καὶ τὰ παρὰ τῶν χρεωστῶν γραμματεῖα συνεισενέγκαντες εἰς ἀγορὰν, ἃ κλαρία καλοῦσι, καὶ πάντα συνδήσαντες εἰς ἓν, ἐνέπρησαν. ἀρθέντος δὲ φλογὸς, οἱ μὲν πλούσιοι καὶ δανειστικοὶ, περιπαλῶντες ἀπῆλθον, ὁ δὲ Ἀγησίλαος, ὥσπερ ἐφυβρίζων, εἶπε ἔφη λαμπρότερον ἑωρακέναι φῶς ἢ τὸν ἐπὶνῳ καθαρώτερον (22). i. e. " Having " gathered together all the bonds of the debtors, which " are called claria, and made a bundle of them, they " burnt them. When the flame broke out, the rich " and the uſurers, who were walking there, went " away; upon which Ageſilaus, as it were to ridicule " them, ſaid, that he never ſaw a clearer fire or a " brighter light than that was."

(21) Hiſtoire des Empereurs, tom. 2. pag. 408, 409. edit. of Bruſſels. He quotes Dio, lib. 69. pag. 791. Spartian. in Vita Adriani. F. Mabillon's Analecta, tom. 4. pag. 484, 486. Onuphrius in Faſtis, pag. 220. Spanheim, de Numiſmat. pag. 811.

(22) Plut. in Agide, pag. 801, B. See upon this the remark [FF] of the article CHARLES V.

was not returned into Greece before the year 125. He ſpent the winter at Athens, where he was initiated in the myſteries of Ceres. He was at Rome in the beginning of the year 129 (q), and, as ſome think, he went the ſame year into Africa; and being returned to Rome, he ſet out for another journey into the Eaſt in the year 130. Having travelled over Aſia, where ſeveral Kings came to pay their reſpects to him, he went into Egypt A. D. 132. In the year 135 he paſſed the winter at Athens, and returned to Rome the ſpring following. He adopted Lucius Aurelius Annius Ceionius Commodus Verus, who though he had already a pretty large number of names, yet added to them all that of Ælius. Hadrian having adopted him retired to Tibur, where he raiſed ſtately buildings [I], and gave himſelf over to luxury, and afterwards to cruelty; for he cauſed ſeveral perſons to be put to death, either by open violence, or by ſecret means; nor did he ſpare even his brother-in-law Servianus, who was fourſcore and ten years old. Lucius Verus dying January the 1ſt 138, Hadrian adopted Titus Antoninus, and obliged him to adopt Marcus Annius Verus, and the ſon of Lucius Verus. The dropſy, under which this Emperor laboured, tormented and vexed him to ſuch a degree, that he became almoſt raving mad [K]. All imaginable remedies were made uſe of to cure him. The eaſe which the magical art gave him, was not laſting (r). A great number of Phyſicians were ſent for, and it is to this ſome ſay he aſcribed his death [L]. To give him ſome comfort under his deſpairing condition, it was ſuppoſed that he had done miraculous cures [M]. But notwithſtanding all theſe artifices, he would have killed himſelf, had (q) Digeſt. tit. 3. l. 20. pag. 174. apud Tillemont, Hiſtoire d'Adrien.

(r) Xiphilin. in Hadriano.

[I] Hadrian having adopted L. Verus retired to Tibur, where he raiſed ſtately buildings.] Aurelius Victor (23) deſcribes in a pretty lively ſtile the effeminate life, which this Emperor led in his retirement, whilſt Lucius Ælius Cæſar governed at Rome; but he commits a very groſs blunder in Chronology. He gives us to underſtand that Hadrian indulged himſelf at that time in his abominable love for Antinous: which ſhews that this author did not know, that Antinous died before Ælius Verus was adopted. As to the buildings his words are as follow (24). Rus proprium Tibur ſeceſſit, permiſſa urbe Lucio Ælio Cæſari, ipſe, uti beatis locupletibus mos, palatia conſtruere, curare epulas, ſigna, tabulas pictas. i. e. "He retired to Tibur, his own "country ſeat, leaving the government of the "city to Lucius Ælius Cæſar; and as it is uſual "with rich people, he built palaces, gave "ſplendid entertainments, and purchaſed ſtatues and "pictures." Let us add to this a paſſage from Spartianus (25). Tiburtinam villam mire exædificavit, ita ut in ea & Provinciarum, & locorum celeberrima nomina inſcriberet, velut Lyceum, Academiam, Prytaneum, Canopum, Pœcilen, Tempe vocaret. Et ut nihil prætermitteret, etiam inferos finxit. i. e. "He added "wonderful buildings to Tibur his country ſeat, and "gave thoſe buildings the names of the moſt cele"brated provinces and places, as for inſtance, the "Lyceum, the Academy, the Prytaneum, Canopus, "the Pœcile, and Tempe. And that nothing "might be omitted, there was alſo a place called "Hell."

(23) Aurel. Victor, in Cæſaribus, pag. m. 129.

(24) Idem, ibid.

(25) Spartian. in Adriano, cap. 26. pag. m. 215.

[K] His dropſy . . . . tormented and vexed him to ſuch a degree, that he became almoſt raving mad.] To this time muſt be referred what Lampridius obſerves, namely, that Hadrian gave his name to a city which was called Oreſta, and that by this means his madneſs was a little abated. An Oracle had given him this advice. Et Oreſtam quidem urbem Hadrianus ſuo nomini vindicari juſſit eo tempore quo furore cœperit laborare, ut ex reſponſo, quum ei dictum eſſet ut in furioſi alicujus domum vel nomen irreperet. Nam ex eo emollitam inſaniam ferunt, per quam multos Senatores occidi juſſerat, quibus ſervatis Antoninus Pii nomen meruit, quod eos poſt ad Senatum adduxit, quos omnes juſſu Principis interfectos credebant (26). i. e. "When Hadrian began to la"bour under his madneſs, he ordered that the city "named Oreſta ſhould be called by his name; it "having been declared to him by an Oracle, that he "ſhould intrude himſelf into the houſe, or take the "name of ſome mad-man. For it is reported that "ſince that time his madneſs was much abated, where"as before, in his fury, he commanded a great "many Senators to be killed, whoſe life Antoninus "ſaved, whence he deſerv'd the ſirname of pious, becauſe "he conducted them afterwards to the Senate, though "all the world believed that they had been killed "by the Emperor's command." The Sieur Triſtan (27) has committed two pretty groſs blunders upon this paſſage. He makes Lampridius aſſert, that Hadrian was cured of his madneſs, after he had viſited the city Oreſta, and pretends that this happened in the beginning of Hadrian's reign. It was an eaſy matter to know, that Lampridius does not mention a journey of this Emperor, and that what he relates muſt be referred to the time when Antoninus was already adopted: Now he was adopted but a few months before this Prince's death.

(26) Lamprid. in Vita Heliogab. pag. m. 809.

(27) Comment. Hiſt. pag. 453.

[L] Some ſay he aſcribed his death to the great number of Phyſicians.] Xiphilinus relates (28) that Hadrian gave up the ghoſt crying out, the multitude of Phyſicians killed the Emperor, πολλοὶ ἰατροὶ βασιλέα ἀπώλεσαν. This Hiſtorian adds, that theſe words were a kind of proverb. Pliny aſſerts, that there was an Epitaph which contained ſuch a propoſition (29). Hinc illa infelicis monumenti inſcriptio, TURBA SE MEDICORUM PERISSE. I wonder that St. Epiphanius did not mention this circumſtance of Hadrian's laſt hours, in the paſſage where he relates that this Prince ſent for all the Phyſicians of his Empire, and laughed at them when he had found by experience how uſeleſs their preſcriptions were, and even wrote a ſatyrical Letter againſt their art and profeſſion. Οἱ δὲ πολλὰ κινμηκότις ϰ̀ μηδὲν ἀνύσαντες ἐσκώφθησαν ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, ὡς ϰ̀ ἐπιστολὴν ἀνειδιστικὴν γράψαι κατ' αὐτῶν τὴν τέχνην αὐτῶν αἰτιωμένην ὡς μηδὲν εἰδυῖαν τῆς περικειμένης αὐτῷ νόσου ἕνεκα (30). If this antient Father had not better grounds for the fact itſelf, which he aſſerts, than for the time to which he refers it, we cannot depend upon his teſtimony; for he relates, that when the Emperor had compoſed this Satire, he went from Rome into Egypt, which is falſe; it being certain that after the Phyſicians had tried in vain all poſſible means to cure him of his Dropſy, he took no other journey but one to Baiæ. It cannot be doubted but he had a great contempt for them, or a great indignation againſt them, ſince at laſt he would no longer keep a ſtrict courſe of diet, and uſed to eat of all that he liked (31).

(28) In Epit. Dion. Vit. Adriani.

(29) Plin. lib. 29. cap. 1. pag. m. 667. Upon which F. Hardouin obſerves that it is thought this was a verſe of Menander the comic Poet. Senarius eſt, ut putant, Menandri Comici πολλῶν ἰατρῶν εἷς ὅδος μ' ἀπώλεσεν.

(30) Epiphan. de Ponder. & Menſ. cap. 14. pag. 170.

(31) Xiphilin. in Epit. Dion. Vit. Adriani.

[M] It was reported that he had done miraculous cures.] Here follows what Spartianus relates. A woman came and told Hadrian, that ſhe had been commanded in a dream to repreſent to him, that ſince he was to recover, he ought to take care not to lay violent hands on himſelf; that ſhe loſt her ſight becauſe ſhe had not performed what her dream had required from her; that ſhe was a ſecond time commanded to declare the ſame things to him, being promiſed that ſhe would recover her ſight if ſhe kiſſed his knees. This woman having obeyed this order, and waſhed her eyes with the water of a certain temple, had the uſe of her eyes as before. A man born blind came from the remoteſt part of Pannonia, and touched Hadrian who had the Fever; which being done, this man was no longer blind, and Hadrian got rid of his Fever (32). Spartianus has been prudent enough to add, that according to Marius Maximus's Teſtimony, all this was nothing but an artifice. We might eaſily gueſs it, tho' we did not know what Marius Maximus ſaid of it. It is an eaſy matter to know that Antoninus, Hadrian's adoptive ſon, made uſe of this artifice in order to give him ſome hopes, and to comfort him under the melancholy had he not been preſented (s). He ſought death, and could not find it [N]. It came at laſt July the 10th 138. He died that day at Baiæ in the ſixty third year of his age, having reigned twenty one years, wanting thirty days. The Latin verſes he addreſſed to his ſoul (t), acquaint us with his uncertainty and doubts relating to the other world. He was a Prince adorned with great virtues, but which were mixed with great vices. He was generous, laborious (u), polite, and exact; he maintained order and diſcipline; he eaſed his ſubjects, he adminiſtred juſtice with a wonderful application, and puniſhed all thoſe ſeverely who did not acquit themſelves faithfully of their functions. He had a very great wit, and an extenſive memory (x); he underſtood the arts and ſciences perfectly well; and wrote ſeveral books [O]. But on the other hand he was cruel, envious, laſcivious, (s) Xiphilin, in Hadriano. Spartian. in Hadriano.

(32) Gaſpar à Reies, Quæſt. 24. num. 4. quotes Tacitus for this fact. An egregious blunder.

(t) Spartian. ibid.

(u) See the end of the remark [P].

(x) See the end of the remark [A].

melancholy that overwhelmed him. How often have theſe tricks been uſed ſince that time, in order to keep up ſuperſtition, and even cabals in the ſtate? It is lawful, ſome will ſay, to deceive children and ſick perſons. But this may be of dangerous conſequence with regard to the people, who in ſome reſpect are always in their infancy, and always ſick. But waving theſe reflections, which too many formidable perſons would think are levelled at them, let us make a grammatical obſervation againſt the great Salmaſius. He will not have us ſuppoſe that the man, who came from Pannonia, was born blind, but only that he had been ſo a long time; ſo that inſtead of natus cæcus, he reads vetus cæcus. His reaſon is, that it cannot be imagined that perſons born blind ſhould recover their ſight; but that this is leſs improbable with regard to perſons that had been blind ſeveral years. Obſerve that in the following note he refutes Caſaubon, who by the word ſimulationem underſtands a magical charm, or witchcraft. This ſenſe is unworthy of Caſaubon. Simulatio in this paſſage ſignifies only a deceit; thus Salmaſius explains it, and he is in the right; but according to this Hypotheſis, what does he mean by the difference he finds beeween a man born blind, and one who has been blind a long while? Does he not ſee, that Antoninus could as eaſily perſuade a man to pretend he was born blind, as he could one to pretend he was lately grown blind; and that it is not eaſier for a man lately grown blind, than for one who is born ſo, to recover their ſight by touching a Prince who has a Fever, and to cure him of his Fever at the ſame time? But what! He had read vetus cæcus in a Manuſcript of Heidelberg; he knew that the words veteres cæci are in Juvenal, and antiqua cæcitas in Marcellus; would you have him loſe the glory of all theſe diſcoveries only for the ſake of reaſoning right?

[N] He ſought death and could not find it.] Thus was Severianus's prayer granted which he made when he was dying. Ὅτι μὲν ὑμῖν ἀδίκῳ, ἔφη, ὑμεῖς ὦ θεοὶ ἴστε· περὶ δὲ Ἀδριανοῦ τοσοῦτον μόνον εὔχομαι, ἵνα ἐπιθυμήσας ἀποθανεῖν, μὴ δυνηθῇ (33). Immortal Gods, ſays he, who are witneſſes of my innocence, I have but one favour to beg of you. Let Hadrian earneſtly wiſh for death, without being able to die. This prayer diſcovered a ſpirit exceedingly revengeful. Never was there a more cruel imprecation than this; witneſs theſe words of the 6th verſe of the ixth chapter of St. John's Revelation. In thoſe days ſhall men ſeek death, and ſhall not find it, and ſhall deſire to die, and death ſhall flee from them. If we had the Letter in which Hadrian repreſented how deplorable a man's condition is, who cannot die, though he wiſhes it (34), we ſhould ſee ſomething very tragical and moving; for a man ſo learned and eloquent as he was, could not but deſcribe very well the misfortunes which he experienced. He promiſed a pardon, and even a reward, to whomſoever would kill him; and as he could not meet with any perſon that would do him this kindneſs, he cried like a child (35), becauſe though he could ſtill cauſe other men to be put to death, yet he could not kill himſelf (36). The vexations of his mind, and his fears, made him deſtroy a great many perſons; and it was perhaps on this occaſion, that perceiving the public did not think his fears and ſuſpicions were well grounded, he ſaid that Princes were very much to be pitied, becauſe it is never believed that any attempt is made on their lives, till they be murdered. Scis ipſe quid avus tuus Adrianus dixerit, miſera conditio imperatorum, quibus de affectata tyrannide niſi occiſis non poteſt credi. Ejus autem exemplum ponere quam Domitiani, qui hoc primus dixiſſe fertur (37), malui, tyrannorum enim etiam bona dicta non habent tantum auctoritatis quantum debent (38).

(33) Xiphilin. in Adriano, pag. m. 265.

(34) Xiphilin. ibid.

(35) Compare this with Nero's complaints in Suetonius, chap. 47, &c.

(36) Xiphilin. in Hadriano.

(37) Conditionem principum miſerrimam aiebat quibus de conjurationes comperta non crederetur niſi occiſis. Sueton. in Domit. cap. 21.

(38) Marc. Aurelius ad Verum apud Volcat. Gallicanum, in Vita Caſſii.

[O] He wrote ſeveral books.] He compoſed both in verſe and proſe. There are ſome fragments of his Latin poems extant (39), and there are ſome Greek verſes of his in the Anthology. You will find in Caſaubon, and in Salmaſius (40), the epitaph of his Hunter (41), it is in Latin verſe. The Emperor loved that horſe ſo well, that he built a tomb for it (42). Stephanus Byzantinus quotes twice a poem intituled Alexandreis, the author of which was named Adrian. It is not generally believed to be the work of our Emperor. He had made a great many verſes upon his amours (43). He had alſo wrote ſome in praiſe of Plotina his benefactreſs (44). It cannot well be determined whether there was a collection of his witty ſayings publiſhed, for Spartianus's words (45) might perhaps ſignify only, that ſeveral of his witty ſayings were remembered. But it is certain that he publiſhed ſome diſcourſes and ſome orations (46), ſeveral quotations out of them being ſtill extant. We find in Soſipater, that he had aſſerted in his diſcourſes, that Auguſtus was not very learned. Tametſi Auguſtus non pereruditus homo fuerit, ut id adverbium (obiter) ex uſu potius quàm ratione protulerit. Let us obſerve by the by, that we have here an authority in favour of thoſe who pretend that uſe ought not to go before reaſon in point of language. We have alſo here a great example for thoſe, whoſe moſt ſerious ſtudy is a particular examination of their mother-tongue. For it appears from the paſſage in Soſipater, that our Emperor was with regard to the Latin tongue, what Vaugelas was with regard to the French (47). Aulus Gellius (48) quotes the oration which Hadrian delivered before the Senate in behalf of the inhabitants of Italica, his father's native place. But this Emperor's chief work is, no doubt, his Hiſtory of his own Life. He choſe rather to publiſh it under another's name than under his own, and he did it, probably, only that he might be the more at liberty to praiſe himſelf. Phlegon, one of his freedmen, a very learned perſon, put his name to this work of his maſter (49). Hadrian compoſed ſome books in imitation of Antimachus, a Greek Poet, whom he admired very much (50). Theſe books were very dark. Spartianus had tranſmitted to us their title, but it is not known whether it has been well tranſcribed in the manuſcripts; ſo that the very title of this work is an extremely difficult taſk for the Critics. Salmaſius tried a thouſand ways to explain it, and after he had determined the reading, which he judged the only true one, he found himſelf juſt where he was before. Solam eam eſſe veram (Lectionem) mihi perſuadeo; quomodo tamen explicanda ſit, juxta cum ignariſſimis ſcio (51). If this work of Hadrian had come down to us, we had been in the right to tell the author, whilſt he was about it; You are going to prepare racks for the Salmaſius's that will come hereafter. The very title of your book will make them buckle to, and force them to ſubmit. It is not well decided, whether Hadrian wrote any thing concerning the Military Art. It is not doubted but he made very good regulations (52), and eſtabliſhed a wonderful diſcipline in his armies. Vegetius owns that he made uſe of Hadrian's regulations; but as he confeſſes the ſame with regard to thoſe of Trajan, and of Auguſtus, though one has no right to infer from thence, that theſe two Emperors wrote books upon that ſubject, it appears plainly that Geſner was in the wrong to aſſert, from this paſſage in Vegetius, that Hadrian wrote concerning the Military Art (53). Some

(39) In the Cataſecta Virgilii & aliorum, and in Spartian.

(40) Comment. in Spartian. Hadrian. pag. 189.

(41) His name was Boryſthenes.

(42) Dio, in ejus Vita.

(43) De ſuis dictis multa verſibus compoſuit. Spartian. p. 145. Apuleius, Apolog.

(44) Xiphilin. in Adriano.

(45) Joca ejus plurima extant, nam fuit etiam dicaculus, Spart. pag. 187.

(46) Photius mentions them, pag. 276.

(47) Conſult his diſpute with Phavorinus, in Spartian. pag. 150.

(48) Lib. 16. cap. 13.

(49) Spart. pag. 150.

(50) Catacrianos, libros obſcuriſſimos Antimachum imitando ſcripſit. Spartian. pag. 152.

(51) Salmaſ. in Spartian. Adrian. pag. m. 152.

(52) Dion aſſerts that they were ſtill in force. See Valerianus's Letter, apud Vopiſcum, in Probo. Caſaub. Comment. in Spart. pag. 83.

(53) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Grec. pag. 215. cenſures this blunder of Geſner.

civious, ſuperſtitious, and addicted to magic. Is there any thing more abominable than his love for Antinous (y)? I omit his exceſſive curioſity [P]. He did not publiſh any edicts againſt the Chriſtians; but it was nevertheleſs imagined that his great ſuperſtition was the reaſon why they were perſecuted. He had ſome regard for the apology which Quadratus and Ariſtides preſented to him in behalf of the Chriſtians. The Jews revolted again under his reign, and defended themſelves for three years againſt the troops he ſent into their country; but at laſt they were overcome and treated with the utmoſt ſeverity (z). They relate a ridiculous ſtory concerning a queſtion which they ſuppoſe this Emperor aſked a Rabbin, relating to the reſurrection of the dead. I mention it in the article BARCHOCHEBAS (aa), where I ſpeak alſo of what was done in Judea at that time. Several particular facts, which may ſerve to acquaint us with Hadrian's character; his jealouſy againſt thoſe that excelled in the arts, &c. will be found in divers places of this Dictionary, where the perſons concerned in theſe facts will be mentioned. The alphabetical index will refer the reader to every particular. It was only by Antoninus's tears and prayers that the Senate was prevailed upon to ſuffer that Hadrian's acts ſhould ſubſiſt (bb), for it was reſolved to make them all void; but this reſolution being once evaded, Antoninus obtained all that he could wiſh, namely, Hadrian's apotheoſis, or deification. He built a temple to him at Puteoli (now Pozzuolo) and eſtabliſhed games there with a ſociety of Prieſts, and the other things relating to a deification (cc). Hadrian had not waited till that time before he taſted divine honours, he had ſnatched the celeſtial crown with his own hands. He conſecrated an altar to himſelf in the temple of Jupiter Olympian at Athens; and as he paſſed through ſeveral cities of Aſia, he multiplied every where the temples he built to himſelf (dd): for it is not in the leaſt probable that he deſigned them for Jeſus Chriſt, nor is it known whence Lampridius borrowed what he relates upon this ſubject [Q]. It does not appear that any other author beſides himſelf was acquainted with the origin of that tradition.

(y) See the article ANTINOUS.

(z) See Tillemont, Hiſt. d'Adrien.

(aa) Remark [K].

(bb) Dio, pag. 799. Spart. ſub fin. Eutropius, lib. 8.

(cc) Spart. ibid. See alſo Capitolinus, in Antonino, pag. m. 249.

(dd) Spart. pag. m. 126.

HADRIAN,

Some (54) pretend that he wrote upon Tacticks, and that Urbicius's work upon this ſubject was Hadrian's, except only Urbicius's additions. Monſieur Rigaut has publiſhed a fragment of it.

(54) Salmaſ. in Spartian. pag. 83.

[P] I omit his exceſſive curioſity.] I might ſtile it ſuch, though he had not wiſhed and endeavoured, ſo much as he did, to diſcover future events both by Aſtrology, and by Magical Arts. Without all this he might very well paſs for too curious a man. Tertullian calls him (55) curioſitatum omnium explorator, and Ammianus Marcellinus futurorum ſciſcitationi nimium deditus. I ſhall not examine whether it became a Prince to deſire to know by his own experience thoſe things which he met with in the books he read, concerning the ſeveral countries of the world. Peregrinationis ita cupidus, ut omnia quæ legerat de locis orbis terrarum præſens vellet addiſcere (56). The journeys he took to ſatisfy himſelf in this particular, were of ſome advantage to the Provinces; let us not therefore cavil with him on this account: Let us ſuffer him to go on mount Ætna to examine whether the ſun at its riſing has the ſame colours with the rain-bow (57). Let us ſuffer him to aſcend mount Caſſius to ſee the ſame planet riſe (58). But who would forgive him his maintaining a thouſand ſpies, who acquainted him with all the ſecrets of every family; who let him know what a wife wrote to her huſband, what the huſband told his wife? Erat curioſus non ſolum Domus ſuæ, ſed etiam amicorum, ita ut per frumentarios occulta omnia exploraret, nec adverterent amici ſciri ab Imperatore ſuam vitam priuſquam ipſe hoc Imperator oſtenderet (59). i. e. "He was curious to know what paſſed not only "at his own houſe, but alſo at his friend's houſes; ſo "that by his ſpies he diſcovered all the ſecrets of fa-"milies; nor were his friends aware that the Empe-"ror was acquainted with their private life, before "he gave them the leaſt hint of it himſelf." We may be perſuaded, that the hints, which his ſpies gave him, were of great uſe to him in his love intrigues; for in this reſpect he did not ſpare his friends any more than the moſt indifferent perſons. Thus I am inclined to underſtand Spartian's words (60). Et hoc quidem vitioſiſſimum putant (he ſpeaks of the uſe of Spies) atque huic adjungunt quod de adultorum amore ac nuptarum adulteriis, quibus Adrianus laboraſſe dicitur, aſſerunt, jungentes quod ne amicis quidem ſervaverit fidem. i. e. "This indeed they think is very wicked; to "which they add the love of boys, and the adulteries "with married women, of which Hadrian is ſaid to "have been guilty; they aſſert alſo that he was not "faithful even to his friends." Sovereign Princes can make themſelves formidable by ſo many other means, that they ought to leave this to Paraſites. Scire volunt ſecreta domus, atque inde timeri (61). i. e. "They dive "into the ſecrets of families, to make themſelves be "dreaded;" and yet in every age you meet with ſome who ſpared nothing to be exactly acquainted with all that is ſaid or done in private houſes. It was owing, no doubt, to Hadrian's curioſity, that almoſt all his beſt friends, and thoſe he raiſed to the higheſt dignities, drew his indignation upon them. He ſwallowed greedily all that was reported to him concerning his friends. Facile de amicis quicquid inſuſurrabatur audivit (62). Since I have conſidered him in this remark as a curious traveller, I muſt cloſe it with obſerving that he walked on foot as a common ſoldier (63), and that he never covered his head, how bad ſoever the weather might be (64), which he had reaſon to repent at laſt (65).

(55) In Apologet. cap. 5.

(56) Spart. pag. m. 163.

(57) Ætnam montem conſcendit ut ſolis ortum videret arcus ſpecie, ut dicitur, varium. Idem, pag. 124. That is to ſay, according to Mr. de Tillemont, pag. m. 413. to ſee there, they ſay, the Sun riſe in the form of a Bow. He ſhould have ſaid of a Rainbow.

(58) Idem, Spartian. pag. 132.

(59) Idem, pag. 102.

(60) Pag. 109.

(61) Juven. Sat. 3. ver. 113.

(62) Spart. pag. 146.

(63) Idem, pag. 84. Aur. Victor, Epit. lib. 5.

(64) Spartian, pag. 163, 200.

(65) Idem, pag. 201.

[Q] It is not in the leaſt probable, that he deſigned for Jeſus Chriſt the temples he built, nor is it known whence Lampridius borrowed what he relates upon this ſubject.] However it be, here follow Lampridius's words (66), CHRISTO templum (Alexander Severus) eumque inter Deos recipere, quod & Adrianus cogitaſſe fertur, qui templa in omnibus civitatibus ſine ſimulacris juſſerat fieri, quæ hodie idcirco quia non habent numina, dicuntur Adriani, quæ ille ad hoc paraſſe dicebatur, ſed prohibitus eſt ab iis, qui conſulentes ſacra repererant omnes Chriſtianos futuros, ſi id optato eveniſſet, & templa reliqua deſerenda. i. e. "Alexander Severus deſigned to "build a temple to Chriſt, and to admit him amongſt "the Gods, of which Hadrian is alſo ſaid to have "had ſome thoughts, who built temples in every city "without placing any images in them, ſo that theſe "temples not being conſecrated to any Deity, are "called Hadrian's, who is ſaid to have deſigned them "for that purpoſe; but he was prevented by thoſe, "who taking care of the ſacred things, found, that "if Hadrian performed his deſign all men would be-"come Chriſtians, ſo that the other temples would "be left empty." Caſaubon is certainly in the right to explode all this as a mere ſtory; the only probable circumſtance I find in it is, the fear of the Heathens that their Religion would be quite forſaken if Chriſtianity were publicly tolerated. This is infinitely more honourable to the Chriſtian Faith than all the dreads which a Refugee Miniſter diſcovered in his writings (67), who refuting the toleration of Religion, ſays amongſt other things: Let a Mahometan Preacher, a Socinian, a Papiſt, and a Proteſtant teach in the ſame city, and let neither the Magiſtrate interpoſe his authority, nor God his Spirit and Miracles, and you will ſoon ſee truth abſolutely and entirely worſted. Here you have a man, who is afraid he

(66) Lamprid. in Alexand. Severo, pag. m. 993.

(67) Tableau du Socinian. pag. 519. printed in 1690. Obſerve that Monſieur Jurieu is the author of that book.

HADRIAN, Cardinal Prieſt, of the title of St. Chryſogonus (a), was a native of Cornetto in Tuſcany [A]. Innocent VIII ſent him Nuncio into Scotland [B], and afterwards into France; and after he had been Clerk and Treaſurer of the Apoſtolic Chamber, Pope Alexander VI, whoſe Secretary he had been (b), honoured him with the Cardinal's Hat (c). The life of this Cardinal was a continual ſcene of very odd alterations, the iſſue of which was very far from being honourable to him. He narrowly eſcaped death the day Alexander VI poiſoned himſelf by miſtake [C]. Afterwards he drew upon himſelf the hatred of Julius II, ſo that he was obliged to go and hide himſelf in the mountains of Trent, on account of the ſevere decrees which this Pope had thundered out againſt him (d). Having been recalled by Leo X, he was ſo ungrateful for this favour, that he engaged in a conſpiracy againſt him [D]. The Pope pardoned this fault, and ordered the letters of pardon to be drawn up (e); but Cardinal Hadrian did not truſt to this [E], or had not courage enough to overcome thoſe remorſes, which might grow ſtronger and more importunate by the preſence of the objects, that is to ſay, of the perſon whom he had offended; he made his eſcape in the night time; and it could never be known exactly what was become of him [F]. He was one of the firſt that effectually reformed the Latin ſtyle. He ſtudied Cicero with great ſucceſs, and made a great many excellent

(a) Pier. Valerian. de Literat. Infelicit.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Oldoinus, Athen. Roman. pag. 303.

(d) Acerbiſſimis percuſſus edictis annos aliquot in Germanicis Rhætorum Alpibus obſcura & ſordida peregrinatione delituit. P. Valerian. de Literat. Infelicit.

(e) Idem, ibid.

he ſhall preach in empty Churches, vox clamantis in deſerto; i. e. "the voice of one crying in the wilder-"neſs," unleſs he be alone in a city. I do not wonder that ſuch men ſhould be ſo much againſt a toleration (68).

(68) Compare this with what is obſerved in the remark [E] of the article LUBIENIETZKI.

[A] In Tuſcany.] I ſpeak thus with regard to the antient diviſion of Italy; for at preſent Cornetto is in what is called St. Peter's patrimony.

[B] He was a Nuncio in Scotland.] I do not find that he was ſent Nuncio into England, yet it is true that he was particularly beloved by Henry VIIth. Hence it happened, that he was made Biſhop of Hereford, and of Bath and Wells (1).

(1) Epiſcopus Erfordienſis, Barthonienſis & Vuellenſis, ſays F. Oldoini, who is not very exact in his ſpelling. Athen. Roman. pag. 303.

[C] He narrowly eſcaped death the day Alexander VI poiſoned himſelf.] There was ſomething very remarkable in this ſtory. One of our Hiſtorians relates it thus (2). Alexander VIth's baſtard having a mind to get Cardinal Hadrian Cornet's (3) eſtate, had made a party with the Pope to go and ſup in his vineyard, and had ſent thither ſome bottles of excellent wine, but which had been adulterated in order to poiſon their gueſt. But it happened that the father and the ſon arriving pretty ſoon, and being very thirſty, for the weather was hot, aſked for ſome drink, and whilſt the ſervant, who was in the ſecret, was gone ſome where, another gave them of that wine. The father who drank it pure, died that very day, which was Auguſt the 17*th* 1503. The ſon, who was of a ſtrong conſtitution, and had mixed water with wine, had time to make uſe of ſome remedies, and having been wrapped up in the belly of a mule, eſcaped; but he was ever after in a languiſhing ſtate of health, ſo that he could not exert himſelf, when he had the greateſt occaſion for it. It was but two or three months ſince Hadrian had been made a Cardinal. Guicciardini (4) deſerves to be read upon this death of the Pope.

(2) Mezerai, Abregé Chronol. tom. 4. pag. m. 434.

(3) It is he, who is the ſubject of this article; he was called thus, or rather of Cornetto, from his native place.

(4) Lib. 6. pag. m. 161.

[D] He engaged in a conſpiracy againſt Leo X.] It was that, at the head of which Cardinal Alphonſo Petrucci was. They deſigned to murder Leo X. Some (5) ſay, that our Hadrian engaged in it, becauſe he hoped to be choſen Pope, and that his hope was grounded on I know not what prediction, which promiſed the Papal Crown to one Hadrian, of a mean extraction, but eminent by his learning. As all this fitted Hadrian of Cornetto very well, he applied it to himſelf and loſt thereby his reputation, and all the tranquillity and comfort of his life. Let us boldly aſſert that there are not greater plagues of mankind, than thoſe perſons, who pretend to foretell future events, for they meet with but too many weak or turbulent men, whom they engage in fatal deſigns. Such perſons ſhould not be ſuffered in a well ordered ſtate, which way ſoever they might boaſt that they conſulted Heaven, either by the ſtars or by the Apocalypſe. Moſt of them are mere impoſtors, who have no other deſign, but to diſturb the public tranquillity. The perſon who impoſed upon the Cardinal of Cornetto was a Magician of the Apennine hills, according to Monſieur Varillas, who gives us a large account of this ſtory. See page 276 of his Anecdotes de Florence. But Paulus Jovius ſays it was a witch. Certam ſpem adipiſcendi Pontificatus conceperat ex oraculo fatidicæ mulieris. i. e. "He had conceived a certain hope of "getting the Pope's crown from the prediction of a Fe-"male-Fortune-teller." Thus he ſpeaks towards the beginning of the fourth book of his Hiſtory of Leo X.

(5) See Moreri in the article Caſtelleſi, thus he calls our Cardinal. Under the word Adrian of Cornetto he had referred us to Caſtelles; he had done better to keep to that. Oldoini calls him Hadrianus Caſtellenſis.

[E] Leo X ordered letters of pardon to be drawn up for Cardinal Hadrian, but he did not truſt to this.] Monſr. Varillas has obſerved, that there were two circumſtances, which raiſed Cardinal Hadrian's miſtruſt. The one was, that Cardinal Soderini and he were condemned to pay a fine of ten thouſand crowns each, though they had proſtrated themſelves at the Pope's feet, and the Pope had declared in a full Conſiſtory, that he would pardon the Cardinals that were concerned in the conſpiracy, provided they confeſſed their crime immediately, and aſked his pardon in the preſence of their brethren. The other circumſtance was the marks of indignation, which appeared on Leo Xth's face whether he would or not. See the pages 283 and 284 of the Anecdotes de Florence.

[F] It could never be known exactly what was become of him.] It will be proper to hear upon this what Pierius Valerianus ſays, who places our Cardinal almoſt at the head of his catalogue of the unfortunate learned men. Noctu clam fugam arripuit, neque quò abierit, neque ubi ſit, quatuordecim jam annorum ſpatio quiſpiam potuit explorare, i. e. "He made his eſcape "ſecretly in the night time; but whither he went, "or where he is, is what no perſon has yet been "able to diſcover during theſe fourteen years." He adds, that it was believed his footman killed him, to get ſome piſtoles, which the Cardinal had ſewed up in his waiſtcoat: Conſtans tamen opinio eſt eum inſuto in interiorem toracem auro oneratum comitis famuli perfidia oppreſſum, auroque ſurrepto cadaver in ſolitarium aliquem locum abjectum occultari: and that his corps is hid ſomewhere in a ſolitary place. Father Oldoini obſerves that Hadrian was deprived of the purple and of all his benefices; that he made his eſcape into Turkey, where he died ſecretly, no perſon knowing what day or what year (6). Leander Alberti's account agrees with this in his deſcription of Italy. Noſtra inſuper ætate, ſays he, magna illuſtrandæ patriæ principia jecerat Adrianus Cardinalis ex hac urbe (Cornetto) cum literarum ſtudio, tum cæremoniarum, ſed qui metu Leonis X Pontif. Max. clam Roma profectus, exinde nunquam apparuit. i. e. "Cardinal Hadrian of this city "(Cornetto) has in our time laid conſiderable founda-"tions towards illuſtrating his native country, both "by the ſtudy of polite literature, and by religious "ceremonies; but fearing Pope Leo X's reſentment, "he left Rome ſecretly, and was never heard of after." The author of the ſecret Hiſtory of Florence aſſerts (7), that Cardinal Hadrian went from Rome dreſſed like an harveſt-man; that he walked only in the night time till he came into his own country, where he paſt the remaining part of his life, often changing the place of his retirement, ſo ſtrongly was he ſtill perſuaded of the ſorcerer's prediction. Here are two circumſtances borrowed from Paulus Jovius (8): the reſt is perhaps of the author's own invention. Guicciardini gives us ſtill a leſs particular account than Paulus Jovius. Adriano partitoſi occultamente, quello che s'aveniſſe di lui, non fu mai piu, che ſi ſapeſſe, nè trovato nè veduto in luogo alcuno (9). i. e. "Hadrian went away ſo ſecretly, "that

(6) Sub Leone contumax ſpoliatus eſt purpura & ſacerdotiis, quare necis metu perterritus in Thraciam fugit, ibique obſcurus & latens diem clauſit extremum, incertum quo menſe vel anno. Oldoin in Athen. Rom. pag. 303.

(7) Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 284.

(8) Hadrianus, trepido ſuſpicaque ingenio vir, Leonis clementiæ diffidens, ab urbe meſſoris habitu profectus, uſque ad vitæ exitum nullo perſequente latebras mutavit. Jovius, lib. 4. Vitæ Leon. X.

(9) Guicc. lib. 13. folio m. 384 verſo.

excellent obſervations upon the propriety of the Latin tongue. The treatiſe he compoſed De Sermone Latino (of the Latin Language) during his retirement in the Alps is a proof of this. When he was about this treatiſe he interrupted a very conſiderable work, which was a Latin Tranſlation of the Old Teſtament [G]. Some reckon it amongſt the works which he wrote (f). It is alſo pretended that his treatiſe De Poetis is extant. As for the treatiſe De vera Philoſophia, i. e. "Of true Philoſophy," it is unqueſtionable that it was printed at Cologne in the year 1548. He alſo pretended to write verſes [H].

(f) Oldoinus, Athen. Roman. pag. 303.

" that it was impoſſible to know what was become " of him, nor was he ever found or ſeen in any " place." He relates this under the year 1517, whence we may infer that Pierius Valerianus's Dialogues de Infelicitate Literatorum were written in the year 1531. Moreri has placed our Hadrian's flight under the year 1518. Why did he not follow Guicciardini's Chronology? He makes this fugitive go to Venice, and to Riva in the Dioceſe of Trent. I am apt to think that he blends together the baniſhment under Julius II, with that under Leo X.

[G] He had undertaken... a Latin Tranſlation of the Old Teſtament.] Erat in animo proſequi cœptum jam pridem opus ſacros veteris inſtrumenti libros ex Hebræo ad verbum in Latinum ſermonem vertendi; ſed cum me procella temporis in Tridentinas rupes, quo Judæi ob Simonis cædem ne aſpirare quidem audent, detruſerit, atque animus inquies nihil agere non poſſet, hæc ſum adgreſſus (10). i. e. " I deſigned to continue a work " which I had begun ſome time before, namely, a " literal tranſlation of the Old Teſtament out of He- " brew into Latin. But the ſtorms of thoſe times " having driven me among the rocks of the Trentine, " where the Jews dare not ſo much as breath, on " account of Simon's murder, and as through the " vexation of my mind I could not live idle, I ſet " about writing this,"

(10) Hadrian. in Præf. ad Carolum Principem Hiſpaniæ de Serm. Latino.

[H] He pretended to write verſes.] We have a ſmall Poem of his de Venatione, and that which is intitled Iter Julii II Pontificis Romani, without reckoning his verſes to the honour of the holy Virgin, and the deſcription of the palace he built pretty near the Vatican, and which is now in the poſſeſſion of the Houſe of Colonna. It is called the Engliſh Palace, becauſe Cardinal Hadrian left it by his will to the King of England (11).

(11) See Oldoinus, Athen. Roman. pag. 303.

HADRIAN VI was born at Utrecht in the year 1459 (a) [A]. The genius which was obſerved in him from his childhood determined his father [B] to deſign him for the Sciences, though he had not wherewithal to maintain him at ſchool. But the Univerſity of Louvain ſupplied this domeſtic want. The young man got a place there in a college in which a certain number of ſcholars were maintained gratis. It is reported that he uſed to go in the night time to read by the light of the lamps [C] that were lighted in the churches or at the corners of the ſtreets. This was at once a ſign of his poverty, and of his ſtudious inclination. He made a very conſiderable progreſs in all ſorts of Sciences, and if he did not become a Poet [D] nor a good writer, it was becauſe he did not care for (a) Valer. And. Bibliotb. Belgic. pag. 19.

[A] He was born at Utrecht.] That city is called in Latin Trajectum ad Rhenum, as Maeſtricht is called Trajectum ad Moſam. Some authors (1), who ſaid only that Hadrian was Trajectenſis, have been the occaſion that others (2) have made him a native of Maeſtricht. So true it is that the leaſt inaccuracy will miſlead ſome writer or other. Father Labbe had very likely obſerved this neglect of Bellarmine, for in his Commentary on this Jeſuit's Eccleſiaſtical Writers, he does not make uſe of the word Trajectenſis, but of Ultrajectenſis. It is ſo true that Trajectum alone ſignifies Maeſtricht rather than Utrecht, that Monſieur de Marolles is inexcuſable for underſtanding (3) Utrecht by Trajectenſem urbem, in the ſecond book of Gregory of Tours. The Hiſtorian was ſpeaking of St. Servaſius Biſhop of Tongeren, which was another reaſon not to miſtake Utrecht for Maeſtricht. I do not doubt but the learned Onuphrius Panvinius took Trajectenſis here for a man born at Maeſtricht. Adrianus VI, ſays he (4), Trajectenſis, Flander vel Brabantinus. An error a thouſand times more pardonable than that of a German writer, who ſays (5), Adrianus VI, patria Derthuſienſis, Germanus. Some ſuppoſe he was born in Italy (6): ut plane ridiculi ſint, qui in ſuis ad Alphonſi Ciacconii hiſtoriam additionibus natales Adriani majoreſve Italiæ vindicant. i. e. " So that they are " to be laughed at, who in their Additions to Al- " phonſus Ciacconius's Hiſtory pretend that Hadrian " was born in Italy, or that his anceſtors were of that " country." Jerome Niger an Italian author uſed to ſay of this Pope, He ſpeaks always Latin, and pretty well too for a Spaniard (7).

(1) Bellarmin is one of them in book de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt.

(2) The Jeſuit Foreſti is one of them, in the Mappamondo Iſtorico.

(3) See his Notes upon Gregorius Turonenſis, tom. 1. pag. 75.

(4) In Chronico Rom. Pontif. ad ann. 1522.

(5) In Continuatione Chronici Euſebiani, printed at Baſil, anno 1536, ad ann. 1522. See Schoockius, de Fabula Hamelenſi, pag. 83.

(6) Valer. And. Bibliotb. Belg. pag. 19.

(7) See the Lettres des Princes, collected by Ruſcelli, folio m. 86.

[B] His father.] His name was Florent Boyens, and he got his livelihood by building of boats; Naupegus (8). Some make him a Weaver, others a Brewer. But I think that we ought to keep to the firſt opinion, ſince Valerius Andreas, who made great enquiries concerning Hadrian VI, does not ſay one word of the other trades, which his father is ſaid to have followed. As to the ſon, he was called only Hadrianus Florentius, that is to ſay Hadrian Florent's ſon; this was the cuſtom of his country, which is ſtill in uſe amongſt the common people.

(8) Val. And. Bib. Belg. p. 19.

[C] It is reported, that he uſed to go in the night time to read by the light of the lamps.] Gabriel Naudé acquaints me with this particular. Non ſecus omnino, ſays he (9), ac olim fecere maximi illi viri Euclides dum noctu Megaris Athenas proficiſceretur ad audiendum Socratem... Adrianuſque præterea ejus nominis Pontifex ſextus, & Auguſtinus Steuchus Eugubinus, quos inter luctandum cum ſtudiis & anguſtioriis vitæ miſeriis, ſæpe videre fuit ad ellychnios noctu in templis aut compitis collucentes legendi deſiderio acceſſiſſe. i. e. " The great " men, of old have done the ſame; as for inſtance, " Euclid, who uſed to go in the night time from Me- " gara to Athens, to hear Socrates... And Hadrian " the ſixth Pope of that name, and Auguſtinus Steu- " chus Eugubinus, who ſtruggling between po- " verty and a ſtrong inclination for learning, were often " obſerved reading in the night time, by the light of " the lamps either in churches, or at the corners of " the ſtreets."

(9) Naudæus, in Pentade Quæſt. Iatrophilol. pag. m. 91.

[D] If he did not become a Poet.] One of the reaſons for which the Italians deſpiſed him was, that he made no account of Poetry nor of an elegant ſtyle, two things for which a great many perſons were preferred under Leo X, and which were in the higheſt eſteem in that country for fifty or ſixty years. But Hadrian had very good reaſons for his conduct in that reſpect, for the Poets had produced the ſame bad effects in Italy, which they produced afterwards in France (10). Quod unum ei viri elegantes deſuiſſe prædicant, eloquentiæ cultioris flores, & poetarum amœnitates contemnere erat ſolitus, ſive quod putaret eas ſibi aliquid de graviſſimorum ſtudiorum autoritate detrahere, ſive quod caſtis & piis ingeniis poetarum luſus pravos mores importare & religionibus officere arbitraretur (11). i. e. " The only " fault which the men of wit found with him was, " that he uſed to deſpiſe the flowers of eloquence, and " the charms of poetry; either becauſe he imagined " that this would in ſome meaſure leſſen the dignity " of the more ſerious ſtudies, or becauſe he was of " opinion that Poetry would corrupt the morals of " modeſt and pious perſons, and be dangerous to Re- " ligion." He was ſo little inclined to do the Poets any kindneſs, that one of the reaſons why Paulus Jovius received favours from him, was that he had not ſtudied Poetry with the other parts of polite Literature. Jovium

(10) Thuan. lib. 22. ad ann. 1559. See the remark [I] of the article GERASSE, at the 1 à-linea.

(11) Jovius, in ejus Vita, pag. m. 223.

for it. He led an exemplary life, and there never was a man leſs intriguing and forward than he was. The cure that was given him in Holland [E] came to him unexpectedly. The reputation of his probity and learning was his only patron with thoſe who gave him preferments (b). He took his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Louvain June the 21ſt 1491. He was ſoon after made Canon of St. Peter's and Profeſſor of Divinity in the ſame city, and then Dean of St. Peter's, and Vice-Chancellor of the Univerſity. In the year 1507 they made him leave this academical way of living to go to Court, that he might be Tutor to the Archduke Charles who was then ſeven years old (c). This young Prince did not make any conſiderable progreſs in the Latin tongue under him [F], and ſome perſons pretend that Chievres the Prince's Governor was the cauſe of it (d). There is commonly nothing more diſagreeable to children than to ſtudy; they take a much greater delight in bodily exerciſes. It has therefore been aſſerted, that Chievres, who would be alone maſter of his pupil's mind, and have all the glory of his education, exerciſed him only in thoſe things, for which he had an inclination, and in which he was moſt capable to be improved, and did not much care whether or not the Profeſſor of Louvain's Lectures were of any advantage to him. However it be, the tutor had ſuch a noble reward for his pains, that never a man of that employment was

(b) Paulus Jovius in Vita Hadriani VI.

(c) Valer. And. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 19. and in Faſt. Acad. Lovan. pag. 96.

(d) Ferunt Carolum Cevrium . . ut integra adoleſcentis poſſeſſione frueretur, alumnum, militares jocos ſæpius offerendo ſenſim avertiſſe a literis. Jovius, in Vita Hadriani VI.

vium omnino eo . . ſacerdotio eſſe perornandum, quem audiviſſet optimis diſciplinis liberaliter eruditum, & ſcriptorem annalium valde elegantem, nec tamen eſſe poetam, ut cæteri qui cultiores literas ſectarentur (12). i. e. "He "judged that Jovius was by all means to be promoted "to the Prieſthood, becauſe he had heard, that though "he was well ſkilled in the moſt uſeful ſciences, "and a very elegant writer of annals, yet he was no "poet, like all the others who applied themſelves to "the Belles Lettres." The Heathen notions, with which the Poets interſperſed their works, were one of the chief reaſons, why this Pope looked ſo coldly upon them; for he was very ſerious upon this ſubject, nor would he upon any terms whatſoever approve their method (13). When the ſtatue of Laocoon was ſhewed him he turned his eyes from it, and ſaid, theſe were ſtatues of impiety. Ornamenta inſignis picturæ & ſtatuarum priſcæ artis nunquam magna fecit, adeo ut Vianeſio Bononienſium legato commendante ſtatuam Laocoontis, quam in Belvederii viridariis Julius ingenti pretio coemptam ad loci dignitatem collocarat, averſis ſtatim oculis tanquam impiæ gentis ſimulacra vituperaret. i. e. "He never had any regard for thoſe fine works "of antiquity, as beautiful pictures and ſtatues, ſo "that when Vianeſius, Embaſſador from Bologna, "commended to him the ſtatue of Laocoon, which "Pope Julius bought for a very great price, and "placed as an ornament in the garden of Belvedere, "he turned his eyes from it, and deſpiſed it as an "heathen and impious image." Paulus Jovius (14) relates this particular. Judge by this, whether the lovers of the liberal arts, whether the Italians who admired this maſter-piece of ſculpture, could have any eſteem for ſuch a Pope. The Poets made him ſenſible, that it had not been ſaid without reaſon, genus irritabile vatum. i. e. "The Poets are a paſſionate "kind of men." Here follows an epigram, which Sannazarius levelled at him.

(12) Jovius, in ejus Vita, p. 277.

(13) Suſpecta habebat poetarum ingenia, utpote qui minus ſincero animo de Chriſtiana Religione ſentire & damnata falſiſſimorum Deorum nomina ad veterum imitationem ſtudiosè celebrare dicerentur. Idem, ibid.

(14) In ejus Vita, pag. 283.

Claſſe, viriſque potens, domitoque Oriente ſuperbus
Barbarus in Latias dux quatit arma domos:
In Vaticano noſter latet: hunc tamen alto,
Chriſte, vides cælo, (prob dolor) & pateris.

That is,

"A ſavage General, with a large fleet and a power"ful army, and proud for his conqueſt of the Eaſt, lays
"the ſeats of Italy waſte, whilſt our General hides
"himſelf in the Vatican; you ſee this from heaven,
"O Chriſt, and (Oh misfortune!) you ſuffer it."

We ſhall relate below Pierius Valerianus's invective. There were continually ſatyrical verſes againſt Hadrian poſted up on Paſquin's ſtatue. We ſhall relate in another place (15), why he had it not deſtroyed, as he once reſolved to do.

(15) In the Diſſertation upon Libels, num. 12.

[E] The Cure that was given him in Holland.] Paulus Jovius aſſerts that (16) Margaret the Emperor Maximilian's daughter, and Governeſs of the Low Countries, procured him that living, and that ſoon after he obtained the Deanery of Louvain. He is in the wrong to ſuppoſe that this Princeſs was at that time Governeſs of the Low Countries; for ſhe did not get that Government, till after the death of the Duke of Savoy, her ſecond real Husband. I make uſe of this expreſſion, becauſe the firſt Prince (17), to whom ſhe was betrothed, ſent her back without conſummating the marriage, and becauſe I do not give any credit to them who aſſert that the Duke of Savoy never knew her (18). However it be; ſince he died in the year 1504, it is plain that Margaret of Auſtria was not Governeſs of the Low Countries, when Hadrian was made Dean of Louvain, for he was preferred to that Deanery in the year 1497. Paulus Jovius muſt have been here miſtaken, thinking that this Margaret was the ſame with the Widow of Charles the bold, the laſt Duke of Burgundy, Siſter of Edward IV. King of England; ſhe was alſo named Margaret, and ſhe paid all the charges of Hadrian's Promotion to the degree of Doctor of Divinity (20). Thoſe who acquaint us with this, tell us, that this Doctor had the Deanery of St. Peter's at Louvain, and that of our Lady at Antwerp; that he was alſo Canon and Treaſurer of St. Mary the great at Utrecht, aud Provoſt of St. Saviour in the ſame City; but they do not mention any ſpiritual living with the charge of Souls, nor any Pariſh Church. This Pariſh therefore or Cure, is perhaps another miſtake of Paulus Jovius. Cardinal Palavicini (21) does not correct this Writer's account.

(16) Margarita Maximiliani Cæſaris filia, quæ tum Belgis imperabat, ſacerdotio parochiali in Hollandia liberaliter bonejtavit.

(17) Charles VIII, King of France.

(18) Fabert, Hiſtoire des Ducs de Bourgogne, pag. 448. Heiſs, Hiſt. del'Empire, tom. 1. p. 372.

(19) Val. And. Faſt. Academ. pag. 60.

(20) Idem, pag. 95. and Bibl. Belg. pag. 19.

(21) Iſtor. del Concil. lib. 2. cap. 2.

[F] Charles V. did not make any conſiderable progreſs in the Latin Tongue under him.] All the World has heard it related, that a Latin ſpeech being once made to this Prince, of which he could hardly underſtand a word, he cried out with a ſigh, Hadrian foretold to me this. Paulus Jovius (22) mentions it as a circumſtance of which he was witneſs. Audivi ego Cæſarem, quum Genuæ Latinam orationem à quodam recitatam, nequaquam præclarè intelligeret, ſuſpirantem hæc verba ore protuliſſe; agnoſco, inquit, nunc maximè & cum dolore quidem magiſtri mei divina monita, quum hos flores & elegantias Latini ſermonis percipere nequeam, & meminerim eum ſæpè prædixiſſe, me aliquando puerilis incuriæ pœnas datarum. That is, "When the Emperor was "at Genoa, where a Latin Oration was delivered be-"fore him, which he could not well underſtand, I "heard him ſay; I find now, and confeſs it with "grief that my Maſter's advice was very good, ſince "I cannot underſtand thoſe flowers and delicacies of "the Latin Tongue; and I remember, that he often "foretold me, that I ſhould once repent of the negligence "I was guilty of in my younger Days." This Hiſtorian had related juſt before, that Hadrian not being able to cope with Chievres, told his young ſcholar only, that he would one day repent of his negligence. Hadrianum auctoritate imparem, & natura leniſſimum, officio facile deceſſiſſe, ita tamen ut diſcipulo perblande diceret, futurum aliquando ut eum præſentis negligentiæ pœniteret. That is, "Hadrian, whoſe Authority was "not ſo great as Chievres's and who was of a very "mild temper, grew eaſily remiſs in his Duty; how-"ever, he told his diſciple in a very kind manner, "that he would one day repent of his preſent negli-"gence." Charles the Vth was ſenſible of it at Genoa, and confeſſed it ſincerely. Camerarius (23) would make Hadrian anſwerable for the neceſſity under which

(22) In Vita Hadriani VI, pag. m. 227.

(23) Meditat. Hiſt. vol. 3. lib. 4. cap. 7. pag. m. 282.

was more conſiderably rewarded ; for it was Charles V's credit that raiſed him to the Papal Throne [G]. Before that time he was ſent Embaſſador into Spain to King Ferdinand, and ſome aſſert, that he managed the buſineſs with which he was charged with much more ſkill [H], than could be expected from a man, who had breathed ſo long the air of an Univerſity. He knew how to appeaſe that Monarch, who was very ill pleaſed with his ſon-in-law's behaviour towards him, and with the affection of the Nobility for the Princes of the Houſes of Auſtria. Hadrian removed all thoſe ſuſpicions, the conſequences of which might have been dangerous, and was afterwards promoted to the Biſhopric which this Emperor was to make uſe of an interpreter, whenever a Latin diſcourſe was delivered before him; as tho' Hadrian had taken more care to inſtruct him in the Catholick Religion, than to teach him the Belles Lettres ; but Charles the Vth's own confeſſion is ſufficient to clear his Tutor. Varillas (24) enters into a long controverſy with the Spaniſh Hiſtorians, in which he pretends it is falſe that Chievres was guilty of what he is charged with relating to his Pupil's ignorance in the Latin Tongue, that Charles the Vth did not underſtand that Tongue, and that he had a ſad experience of this ignorance, when he heard a Latin diſcourſe. As to this laſt fact, ſays he, which the Spaniards ſuppoſe happened in Germany, he aſſerts that it is not related by any Author of other nations. Would he have ſaid this, if he had been acquainted with the ſtory of the Oration delivered at Genoa, which Paulus Jovius mentioned ?

(24) Prattique de l'Educat. des Princes, pag. 26, &c.

[G] It was Charles the Vth's credit that raiſed him to the Papal Throne.] Paulus Jovius obſerves that Hadrian had a ſhare in the numerous promotions that were made in the year 1517 (25) being recommended by the Emperor Maximilian in his Letters to the Pope (26). He adds alſo ſome other reaſons. As to Hadran's being choſen Pope, it is a very common opinion that it was owing to the Emperor's great intereſt. Cæſare urgente Leoni demortuo abſens (raro & inuſitato ſanè exemplo) Pontifex Max. undequadraginta patrum purpuratorum ſuffragiis creatur (27). i. e. " Leo being " dead, he was by the Emperor's intereſt choſen " Pope in his abſence (which indeed is very uncom- " mon and unuſual) by the Votes of thirty-nine Car- " dinals." It is reported that Amiot owed his place of great Almoner of France to a converſation that was held at Charles IXth's Table, in which Charles Vth was mentioned. " This Emperor was commended on ſeveral " accounts, but eſpecially for making his Tutor a Pope. " . . . The merit of this action was ſo much extolled, " that it made an impreſſion on Charles the IXth's " mind, even ſo far as to make him declare that he " would do the ſame for his Tutor, if he found an " opportunity for it (28)." It is therefore a pretty general opinion, that Pope Hadrian VI. was a creature of Charles the Vth's. It ſeems however, that this Emperor procured him the papal Dignity but indirectly and by accident. Paulus Jovius, who gives us a pretty good account of the intrigues of this conclave, tells us that Juliano di Medici did not make any intereſt for Hadrian, till after he had found that he could not ſucceed for himſelf (29). It is true that Hadrian being very zealous for Charles the Vth's Intereſt, this gained him the favour of the whole Party of the Medici in this their laſt ſhift. There is an inſcription mentioned in which Hadrian owned himſelf obliged to his imperial Majeſty for all his Dignities (30). The inſcription, they ſay, was as follows : Ultrajectum plantavit, Lovanium rigavit, Cæſar verò incrementum dedit. That is to ſay, Utrecht planted, Louvain watered, and the Emperor gave increaſe. Upon which ſomebody obſerved, there is nothing to do here for God, Deo iſthic nec ſeritur, nec metitur. Notwithſtanding all this, Hadrian's exaltation was an effect of chance and ſpite. Read the following Verſes of Pierius Valerianus : they are as beautiful as they are ſatyrical (31).

(25) 31 Cardinals were made all at once.

(26) Tum præſertim Maximiliani Cæſaris literis. Jovius, pag. 230.

(27) Swertius, Athen. Belg. pag. 95.

(28) The Abbot de St. Real, De l'Uſage de l'Hiſtoire. See the remark [E] of the article AMIOT.

(29) Itaque Medices deſperato vel neglecto Pontificatu Adrianum nominat. Jovius, pag. 249.

(30) Wolfius, Lect. Memorab. tom. 2. pag. 192. ſays, that this inſcription was ſeen on a tapeſtry at Louvain, during the rejoicings that were made there for this Pope's election.

(31) The author of the notes on Sannazarius's Poems, printed at Amſterdam in the year 1689, has inſerted them in pag. 236, 237.

Cum fluctuaret cymba, quæ magnos Deos,
Romæ penates quæ vehit,
Leone adempto : providum, vigilem, parem
Optabat infelix ducem.
Dum tota is ora quæritur Liguſtica,
Totoque Tyrrheno mari,
Per Adriatici omne litus, per Padi
Ripas, Lemani per juga :
Per Celtiberos, Gaditanos, Gallici
Vaſtos per Occani ſinus,
Quaque æſtuoſum Sarmatas lambit ſalum,
Qua circuit Britannias :
Repente nobis hunc dedit vecors furor
Regione Rheni ab ultima ;
Nil tale Patribus facere ſe putantibus ;
Nihil minus volentibus
Quam quem eligebant, nil minus poſcentibus,
Quam quem vocabant : ô mare !
O terra ! votis Hadrianus omnium
Fit Pontifex ; ſed omnibus,
Quis credat ? invitis. Deûm vis hæc, Deûm,
Deûm abditum hoc arbitrium eſt.
Ut qui natantis deſpuunt regnum trabis,
Parere diſcant viperæ :
Ut invicem qui ſe oderant Patres, ducem
Inviſum haberent omnibus.
Malarum ut eſſet ſævus ultor mentium,
Acri ipſe mente in ſingulos.

That is, " Whilſt the Boat which carries the great " Gods, the houſhold Gods of Rome, was toſſed up " and down by the waves, after Leo's death, ſhe " wiſhed, unhappy, for a prudent, diligent ſteerman, " like him ſhe had loſt. Whilſt ſuch a one is ſought " for through the whole coaſt of Liguria, on the " Banks of the Tuſcan Sea, the Gulph of Venice, " and of the River Po; on the Alps; through all " Spain, on all the Coaſts of the Ocean in France, " Germany, Britain; all on a ſudden a blind fury " ſends us their Leader from the remoteſt banks of " the Rhine ; the Fathers did not imagine they were " doing ſuch a thing ; they did not deſign to elect him, " they choſe; they did not deſire him whom they call- " ed. O Heaven and Earth ! Hadrian is made Pope " by the Votes of all, and, who would believe it ? " againſt the conſent of all. This happened through " the influence of the Gods ; this was a ſecret deter- " mination of the Gods ; that they, who deſpiſe the " Government of an harmleſs Prince, ſhould learn to " obey a Tyrant : that the Fathers, who hated each " other, ſhould have a Maſter that would hate them " all ; and who being a ſevere puniſher of all wick- " ed minds, ſhould be ſeverely inclined againſt every " one of them."

Naude relates (32), that Peter Martyr, not the here- tick of Florence, but the Apoſtolical Protonotary who was born in a little Village of the Duchy of Milan, ſpeaking of Hadrian the Vth's election, has the following words : Cardinalibus hoc loco accidit quod in fabula de Pardo ac Leone ſuper agno raptando ſcribitur ; fortibus illis ſirenuè ſe dilacerantibus, quodcumque quadrupes iners aliud prædæ ſe dominum fecit. That is to ſay according to the Tranſlation of Lewis de Mai, Author of the Notes upon the Coups d'Etat, There happened to the Cardinal on this occaſion, what the Fable relates of the Leopard and the Lion concerning a Lamb they had taken. Whilſt theſe two generous animals fight valiantly for the prey, and tear each other in pieces, comes another fourlegged Beaſt, of the moſt brutiſh and cowardly kind, which ſteals the Lamb away.

(32) Naudé, Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 23.

[H] During his Embaſſy . . . he managed the Buſineſs with which he was charged, with much skill.] Monſieur Varillas is not of this opinion. According to him (33), Hadrian was proper for nothing but to teach in a College ; he did not underſtand politicks, and was not acquainted with the myſteries of State. Amongſt other Proofs of this aſſertion, he obſerves, that in his embaſſy to Aragon he did not anſwer Chievres's expectations. But who told Varillas that this is a proof of Hadrian's want of ability ? He hated Chievres for ſeveral reaſons (34), and inſtead of negotiating according to Chievres's deſigns, he did him ſecretly all the ill turns he could. This was not indeed anſwering this Lord's expectations, but it was not unskilfulneſs.

(33) See the preface to the Prattique de l'Education.

(34) Jovius, pag. 232.

ſhopric of Tortoſa [I], without ceaſing, for all that, to be Embaſſador. He continued in that ſtation till Ferdinand's death (e), after which he had a ſhare in the Regency with Cardinal Ximenes (f) [K]. It is true that his ſhare was the ſmalleſt, not to ſay any thing worſe of it (g); but there came a time when his authority was much greater. Ximenes graſped at too much power, for which reaſon Charles V ſent him home, when he went in perſon to take poſſeſſion of his Kingdoms in Spain; and ſome time after he made Hadrian Governor of that country in a very honourable manner; I mean when he went from Spain into Germany where the Imperial Crown waited for him (h). Hadrian found himſelf ſurrounded with difficulties in the government of ſo many Kingdoms, becauſe there was a dangerous ſedition raiſed, which he would never have been able to ſuppreſs, had they not aſſociated two collegues with him, namely the Conſtable, and the Admiral of Caſtile. The invaſion of Navarre by the French was another great difficulty in his adminiſtration. He extricated himſelf honourably out of it, and was enjoying the pleaſure of having recovered Navarre, when he received the news of his being choſen Pope (i). I have not yet related, that Leo X had given him the Cardinal's hat in the year 1517. After this Pope's death there were ſeveral cabals in the Conclave, which ended in the election of Hadrian (k), with which the people of Rome were very much diſpleaſed [L]. The new Pope took ſhipping in Catalonia, and arrived at Rome Auguſt

(e) Which happened Jan. 23, 1516.

(f) Jovius, in Vita Hadriani.

(g) See Varillas, Pratique de l'Education du Prince pag. 186. of the Dutch edition.

(h) Hadrianus cum imperio toti Hiſpaniæ præficitur tanta cum dignitate, ut Cæſar recuſantem & præoptantem ſequi humaniſſimis precibus ut maneret vellet exorare cogeretur, quando rege abſente in Hiſpania præſide opus foret præclaræ dignitatis & famæ, qui &c. Jovius, pag. 231.

(i) Idem, pag. 251.

(k) January 9, 1522.

[I] He was . . . promoted to the Biſhoprick of Tortoſa.] Several Authors (35), whom I have conſulted agree, that Ferdinand promoted Hadrian to that Biſhoprick; but Monſieur Varillas (36) aſſerts, that it was given him after that Prince's death, to make him amends for the power of which they deprived him. For it muſt be obſerved, that Cardinal Ximenes being named regent of the Kingdom in Ferdinand's Teſtament (3), was determined to keep that employment notwithſtanding the Commiſſion which Hadrian had brought with him from Flanders, and in which he was appointed regent of Caſtile and Aragon, in caſe Ferdinand ſhould die. Ximenes aſſerted his pretenſions with more conſtancy than Hadrian did, for the latter was prevailed upon to be ſatisfied with a ſhare in the regency, and Monſieur Varillas ſuppoſes that they gave him a Biſhoprick (38) to make him amends. I have juſt now caſt my Eyes upon a work (39), of a later date than that of Varillas, and I have ſeen there that the Author ſuppoſes Hadrian was not yet a Biſhop during the diſpute about the Regency. He ſtyles him only Dean of Louvain in his account of the particulars of this diſpute. He aſſerts (40), that Ximenes ſuppoſed, that as this Dean conſented to have but a ſecond part in the regency, and that conſidering the Dignity and Rank which he Ximenes had in Caſtile, he could not ſuffer that a mere Prieſt, as the Dean was, ſhould pretend to have the precedency over an Archbiſhop Cardinal; he was at liberty to give him but ſuch a ſhare in the regency as he pleaſed. The Biſhop of Niſmes ſays poſitively (41), that the Dean did not obtain the Biſhoprick of Tortoſa, but by Ximenes's recommendation after Ferdinand's death; and as he quotes Alvaro Gomez (42), and Peter Martyr (43), it is very likely that Paulus Jovius, and the Bibliographers of the Low Countries have been miſtaken. Ferdinand's cold reception of the Dean is not proper to make us believe, that he gave him a Biſhoprick. He had diſcovered the true deſign of his embaſſy, and looked upon him as a ſpy; and when Hadrian ſollicited for a ſecond audience, he anſwered with ſome peviſhneſs, What does he want? does he deſire to know whether I am a dying? Tell him that I am not to be ſeen to day. Ferdinand admitted him however a few days after, by his Miniſter's advice, and told him, that he was not well enough to treat of Buſineſs with him, and bad him retire to Gadaloupe into the Convent of the Monks of St. Jerome. . . . He gave him Officers, as it were to wait upon him, but in reality to keep him, and to prevent ſome ſuſpected perſons from having any correſpondence with him (44).

(35) Jovius, ibid. pag. 228. Swertius, Ath. Belg. pag. 95. Val. And. Bibl. Belg. pag. 20.

(36) Preface to the Pratique. See alſo, p. 190.

(37) Prat. de l'Educ. pag. 183.

(38) Obſerve that Hadrian after his promotion to the Cardinalſhip, was called the Cardinal of Tortoſa.

(39) L'Hiſtoire du Miniſtére du Cardinal Ximenes, by Monſ. Marſolier.

(40) Pag. 372. of the Dutch edition.

(41) Flechier, Hiſt. du Cardin. Ximenes, liv. 4. pag. 633. Dutch edition.

(42) De Rebus geſtis Ximen. lib. 6.

(43) Epiſt. 576. lib. 29.

[K] He had a ſhare in the regency with Cardinal Ximenes.] One of the Circumſtances which Monſieur Varillas relates, is very probable. He obſerves (45), that one of the arguments urged to the Dean of Utrecht (46) was, "that if he pretended to inſiſt upon the "Commiſſion he had brought from Flanders, he would "raiſe a civil war in Spain, and be anſwerable before "God for all the murthers and other crimes, it would "occaſion; this, they ſay, he had himſelf confeſſed "beforehand in his excellent Commentary on the "Maſter of the Sentences, in which he maintains, "that a man who raiſes commotions in any ſtate, "when he could prevent them without expoſing "either his conſcience or his reputation, is anſwer-"able for all the evils that attend them. We have "obſerved above, that the Dean was an honeſt man, "and that he was not ſufficiently skilled in the Buſineſs "he had undertaken. He was ſo well pleaſed with the "reſpect that was ſhewed him by referring to him-"ſelf the determination of an Affair in which he "was a party concerned, and with the honour they "did him to quote the lectures he had formerly "read in the Univerſity of Louvain, and afterwards "publiſhed, that he promiſed to ſubmit to whatever "the Council of Spain would determine, provided ſome "expedient were found, by which his reputation might "be ſecured, and the Archduke's commiſſion not ex-"poſed to be ridiculed." This was juſt the fable of the Raven and the Fox, with this difference only, that the Raven loſt his prey by the praiſes that were given to his future ſinging, whereas honeſt Hadrian loſt his by the praiſes that were given to his former ſinging.

(44) Flechier, Hiſt. du Cardinal Ximen. lib. 3. pag. 492. under the year 1515.

(45) Page 185.

(46) Thus Doctor Hadrian Florent was called in Spain.

[L] The people of Rome were very much diſpleaſed with his election.] That, which in the conclave is called being elected by inſpiration, contributed very much to Hadrian's good fortune. Cardinal de Medicis at the head of all the young Cardinals, a faction more powerful ſtill than that, which has ſometimes been called the flying ſquadron, being determined to have the Cardinal of Tortoſa choſen, made all his partizans promiſe that they would give him their votes all at once and together. This was done accordingly. It appeared at the opening of the billets, that a perſon was propoſed, who was qualified to be choſen, and who, it ſeems, had not yet been thought of; this cauſed a great ſurprize. Cardinal Cajetan influenced the election ſtill more, for he exhorted them that were near him, to go over to Hadrian's party, ſince it was acceptable, ſaid he, both to God and to men (47). Hereupon ſeveral Cardinals declared very civilly for him, by I know not what religious principle; others, who did not ſo much as know the name of the Cardinal of Tortoſa, were uncertain what to do, and yet voted with the majority; the torrent of inſpiration carried them away, and made them act againſt their own intereſt. Cardinal Urſini alone oppoſed this inſpiration of the conclave. Julian de Medicis was overjoyed; but all the others were in the utmoſt concern; and the inhabitants were ſo angry with their choice, that they loaded them with injuries, when they came out of the conclave. Id populus adeò indignanter tulit, ut quum patefacto Conclavi Cardinales domum redirent, paſſim maledictis inceſſerentur, quod infamibus comitiis non modo urbem Romam ſua antiſtite orbatam prodidiſſent, ſed quod inſaniæ proximum videretur, Italiam etiam Pontificatus honore ſpoliaſſent (48). i. e. "The people "loaded them with injuries, not only becauſe they "had betrayed the city of Rome at the time when ſhe "had no Pope at her head, but alſo, which ſeemed "almoſt a perfect madneſs, had robbed Italy of "the honour of the Pontificate." One of the Cardinals gave the people thanks, becauſe he thought they got off very cheap, ſince the people gave them only ill-language,

(47) Poſtquam Diis ac hominibus placet. Jov. pag. 250.

(48) Idem, ibid.

Auguſt the 30th [M]. He would not change his name; and in every thing he ſhewed a great diſlike for all oſtentation and ſenſual pleaſures, though ſuch an averſion had been long ago out of date. His Pontificate laſted only till the 14th of Sept. 1523. He was very partial to Charles V, and did not enjoy much tranquillity of mind under the triple crown [N]. It was perhaps his diſcontentment that gave riſe to thoſe manners, which made him paſs for a Miſanthrope [O] or a Man-hater. The Italians have publiſhed very outrageous ſlanders againſt him [P]; and even thoſe, who far from expoſing him on ill-language, and did not offer to ſtone them, as they deſerved. Adaperto conclavi quum globus Cardinalium Hadriani pontem eſſet prætervectus, & opifices puerique minacibus oculis voceque & manibus obſtreperent, nec à fœdiſſimis probris abſtinerent, Sigiſmundus Gonzaga Cardinalis renidenti vultu his egit gratias, quod adverſus extrema ſupplicia meritos contumeliis eſſent contenti nec lapidibus publicam injuriam vindicarent (49). The people's indignation was owing to this; that the Cardinals had had no regard for the blemiſh of original ſin, and the Romans feared leſt the new Pope ſhould not keep his ſee at Rome.

(49) Jovius, pag. 251.

[M] He arrived at Rome Auguſt the 30th.] Francis Swertius (50) aſſerts, that Didacus Stunica has given an account of this journey. I do very much doubt of it, for Nicholas Antonio does not mention it, though he ſpeaks of another account of a journey written by this Author, and much leſs conſiderable than this would be. Swertius has probably miſtaken the one for the other. The account mentioned by Nicholas Antonio, is that of Stunica's journey to Rome in the year 1520, and which Schottus has inſerted at the end of his Bibliotheca Hiſpanica. Inſtead of Didacus Stunica, Swertius ſhould have mentioned Blaſius Ortiz, for he did really write an account of Hadrian the ſixth's journey. It was printed at Toledo, in the year 1548. The author of it went from Spain to Rome with this Pope (51).

(50) Athen. Belg. pag. 95.

(51) Nic. Ant. Bibliotb. Hiſpan. tom. 1. pag. 179.

[N] He did not enjoy much tranquillity of mind under the tripple crown.] This appears from the inſcription, which he ordered to be ingraved on his tomb. Adrianus VI hic ſitus eſt, qui nihil ſibi infelicius in vita duxit quam quod imperaret. i. e. "Here lieth Hadrian VI, "who eſteemed the ſovereign power the greateſt miſ-"fortune of his life." Father Labbe (52) aſſerts, that this epitaph was ingraved on Hadrian's tomb in the church of St. Mary dell' anima; but he is miſtaken: the Cardinal, who erected a monument to him in that church, cauſed a much longer and more pompous inſcription to be ingraved upon it. It may be read in a great many authors. As for the other it was only ingraved on the tomb in which his corps was depoſited only for a time, in the church of St. Peter. See Paulus Jovius, towards the end of this Pope's life. We ought not to wonder that Hadrian found the papal crown very heavy upon his head; for under his reign the general affairs of Chriſtendom were in a very great confuſion, and he was not well enough acquainted with the genius of the Italians, not to diſpleaſe them on a thouſand occaſions. The news he received daily of the great ſucceſs, and of the threatnings of the Turks, and his want of experience in the affairs of Italy, puzzled his brain to ſuch a degree, that he dropped the following expreſſions, namely, that he took more pleaſure in the government of a College at Louvain, than in the government of the whole Chriſtian Church. Neceſſe erat Pontificem rerum Italicarum penitus ignarum, & tum primum urbium ſuarum & provinciarum regulorumque nomina perdiſcentem, in omnibus conſiliis vehementiſſime conturbari, adeo ut quum his curarum fluctibus jactaretur, aliquando diceret, ſibi fuiſſe jucundius Lovanii gymnaſium cum ſtudiorum laude moderari, quam Romæ pontificia in ſede Chriſtianam rempublicam adminiſtrare (53). If he had not been capable of knowing by himſelf, that his continual irreſolution and ſlowneſs was of a dangerous conſequence, and made the public murmur againſt him, he might have known it by the diſcourſe of Ferdinand's Embaſſador, who charged him with it to his face beginning his oration thus. Fabius Maximus, Sanctiſſime pater, rem Romanam cunctando reſtituit; tu vero pariter cunctando rem Romanam ſimulque Europam perdere contendis. i. e. "Moſt holy Father, Fabius Maximus retrieved the "affairs of Rome by his delays; but by your delays "you labour to ruin the affairs of Rome, and even "all Europe." This beginning put the Pope ſo much out of countenance, that as the Cardinals did not love him, they were very near breaking out into laughter (54).

(52) De Script. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 415.

(53) Jovius, pag. 262.

(54) Idem, pag. 276.

[O] His manners . . . . made him paſs for a miſanthrope.] Pierius Valerianus (55) repreſents him as a perſon who ſhunned the converſation of men, and who in the cavalcades retired as far as he could from the courtiers; he ſpurred his horſe as ſoon as he perceived any perſon coming up to him. To ſee this anthor's ſatire in its full length, you muſt take care what edition you read; for there are ſome in which this paſſage is left out. That of Baſil 1575, is not of this number, as Father Theophilus Raynaud (56) has obſerved, who endeavours to defend this Pope againſt the humaniſts of thoſe times.

(55) Hieroglyph. lib. 19.

(56) Hoplotbec. pag. 346.

I do not mention Bernia's Capitolo againſt this Pope: I ſhall only obſerve, that we ought not to take the following paſſage in a ſtrict and literal ſenſe.

Baſta ch'egli hanno fatto un Papa ſanto,
Che dice ogni mattina la ſua Meſſa,
E non s'el tocca mai ſe non col guanto.
That is,

"They have indeed made a very holy Pope, who "ſays his prayers every morning, and never touches "himſelf but with a glove on his hand."

This is a burleſque, familiar, and even proverbial hyperbole amongſt the Italians. Gli ipocriti, ſays Aretin, Giorn. I. della II Parte (in the firſt journey of the ſecond part) che non ſel toccano mai ſe non col guanto. i. e. "The hypocrites never touch themſelves but with "a glove on." I am obliged for this obſervation to Monſieur de la Monnoie.

[P] The Italians have publiſhed very outrageous ſlanders againſt him.] They have not only charged him with a prodigious covetouſneſs, but they have alſo publiſhed, (57), that it had at laſt been found out, why he uſed every day to retire into a ſecret place of the Vatican, where he would not ſuffer any perſon to come; it was not with a deſign to learn from heaven, like Numa, the art of government, but to careſs a beautiful woman: ſhe was his nymph Egeria. It was added, that the diſtemper of which he died, was owing to his indulging himſelf too much in the pleaſures of love (58), and that it was not enough for him to divert himſelf with women, but that he alſo loved beautiful boys. Datum eſt hoc inſuper crimini quod puerorum amoribus delectaretur, quia inter cæteros Miniſtros nonnullos tenellæ ætatis & eximiæ formæ habebat (59). i. e. "He has alſo been charged with "the love of boys, becauſe amongſt his ſervants, "he had ſome very young and beautiful." This was not all; they publiſhed alſo that he had been a Magician, and that when his friends would evade the proofs that were urged againſt him, from a great number of magical inſtruments, that had been found in his chamber after his death, they ſaid that he endeavoured to find the Philoſopher's Stone. As it could not be denied, but he was, as to outward appearances, an honeſt man, a lover of juſtice and ſtrict morals, they evaded it by ſaying that he was a mere Tartuffe, and that hypocriſy was a crime more common in Germany, than people imagined. See upon all this, Chriſtopher Battus's letter to Jerome Saulius, in Wolfius's ſecond volume. It has been aſſerted in the ſupplement to the Abbot of Urſperg's Chronicle (61), that they found amongſt the ſecret papers of this Pope, ſome books of Magic, and that ſome perſons pretend he obtained the tripple crown by this wicked art.

(57) Poſtea compertum eſt illic mulierem formæ egregiæ clam habuiſſe, cujus amoris causâ eò tam frequenter itaſſe creditur, ejus amplexa frui ſolitum. Battus, apud Wolfium, Lect. Memorab. tom. 2. pag. 192.

(58) Laboravit permultum antiquam è vita excederet, & ſtranguria & tormentibus, in quas ægritudines plerumque incidere ſolent, qui coitu immodico utuntur. Ibid.

(59) Ibid.

Take notice, that Gerard Moringus obſerves, that this honeſt Pope, knowing the Italians had ſuſpicions againſt him, becauſe he had brought ſome young men from Spain with him, ſent them all back. Si quando antea, tum maxime ſpeciem omnem impudicitiæ amovit. Eoque cum adoleſcentes aliquot honeſtæ tum indoliæ on account of his morals, confeſſed that he was a virtuous and zealous man, do yet aſſert that he was not proper to be a Pope [Q]. His very temperance has been ridiculed [R]. People's dolis tum ſtirpis in gratiam parentum in familiam aſcitos, ex Hiſpaniis ſecum in urbem duxiſſet, intellexiſſetque Italos ex convictu illorum, neſcio quæ abominanda, noſtratibus inuſitata ſuſpicari, ſtatim in Hiſpaniam remiſit, in academia Salmanticenſi plenius literis imbuendos quibus antea domi ipſius a pio ſimul & erudito viro Theodorico Hezio ſecretario ipſius utcumque imbuti fuerant eo jubente (61). i. e. "If at any time he endeavoured to avoid all ſuſ- "picions of lewdneſs, it was when he was Pope. "And it was for this reaſon, that he ſent back to "Spain, ſome youths of an honeſt mind, and of good "families, whom for their parents's ſake he had "taken with him to Rome. As ſoon as he heard, that "his converſation with them gave the Italians room "to ſuſpect ſomething abominable, which is unheard "of amongſt our countrymen, he ſent them to the "Univerſity of Salamanca to continue their ſtudies "of polite literature, which they had in ſome man- "ner begun by his command under the learned and "pious Theodoric Hezius, his Secretary." The ſame writer ſhows a very great indignation againſt the author of a Letter, ſome parts of which I have quoted, and which Wolfius has inſerted in the ſecond volume of his memorable Lectures. Battus quidam Parmenſis quandam de ejus defuncti relicta fama epiſtolam edidit, Latinam quidem illam ac terſam, ſed adeo impudenter mendacem, ut ipſa mentiendi impudentia, dicam an inſcitia, vel apud malevolos fidem ſibi abroget. Quid os impurum eo impulerit, nihil eſſe aliud reor, quam id quod Comicus habet, Mala mens, malus animus (62), i. e. "Battus of Parma has publiſhed a "Letter concerning the reputation which the deceaſed "Pope left behind him; this Letter is written indeed "in a polite and elegant ſtile, but it abounds with "ſo many falſities, that the Author's very impudence, "or rather unſkilfulneſs in telling lies, will prevent "even this Pope's enemies from believing a word of "it. I cannot imagine what prompted this villain to "write this, unleſs it be, as the Poet has it, that "when the mind is depraved, the heart is wicked."

(60) See John Creſpin, Etat de l'Egliſe, under the year 1523.

(61) Ger. Moringus, in Vita Hadriani VI.

(62) Idem, ibid. in Præfatione.

[Q] Even they who ... confeſſed that he was a zealous man, do yet aſſert that he was not proper to be a Pope.] Few perſons will read this without obſerving that it relates to Cardinal Palavicini, and without thinking of the new Goſpel, in which ſeveral maxims inſerted in his Hiſtory of the Council of Trent have been ſo ſeverely cenſured. In this Cardinal's opinion, Hadrian VI was a very good Clergyman, but a very indifferent Pope. Fu Eccleſiaſtico ottimo, Pontifice in verita mediocre (63). The people who judge of things only from the event, had yet a worſe opinion of him; for on account of the ill ſucceſs of his reign he paſſed for ſomething beneath an indifferent Pope (64). This honeſt Dutchman not meeting in Italy with the ſame candour and ſincerity in which he had been educated, began to ſuſpect every thing; he imagined that there were ſnares laid for him every where; he dared not to truſt to any but his own countrymen; and theſe by their ſincerity without experience, did him more hurt than the Italians would have done with all their diſſimulation. The Janſeniſt, who wrote the New Goſpel, has very maliciouſly made an advantage of all that Cardinal Palavicini confeſſes with regard to this Pope's good qualities. But after all, the Cardinal is not ſo much in the wrong as one would imagine. It is true indeed, that if the Chriſtian Religion was really ſuch as it ought to be, the ſame virtues that would be ſufficient to make a good Clergyman, would be alſo ſufficient to make a good Pope. But conſidering (65) the condition in which the Church of Rome has been for a great number of years, under a Head, whoſe ſpiritual power is ſo interwoven with the temporal power, that the preſervation of the one depends on the preſervation of the other, it is a folly to pretend that a Pope, who does not well underſtand court-intrigues and the arts of politics, can acquit himſelf of his functions as he ought to do. See the remark [U] of the article BELLARMINE. It would be ſufficient, in order to fulfil the prophecies of the Proteſtants, to have ſucceſſively four or five Popes, ſuch as ſome of them have been, who otherwiſe were men of very ſtrict morals. However it be, it is proper to conſult Monſieur Launoi's letter (66), in which he vindicates our Hadrian's character againſt Cardinal Palavicini.

(63) Palavic. lib. 2. cap. 9.

(64) Idem, ibid.

(65) See Palavicin. lib. 2. cap. 7. pag. m. 206.

(66) Epiſt. iv. 7.

[R] His very temperance has been ridiculed.] He was ſo little uſed to the dainties of Rome, that he preferred a codfiſh before any other kind of fiſh, ſo that the price of that fiſh roſe conſiderably during his Pontificate, which made all the fiſher-women laugh ſoundly. Paulus Jovius inſtead of commending Hadrian for this, has been ſo bold as to affirm, that he had no more taſte of delicate meats, than he had judgment for the adminiſtration of public affairs. I have ſo much enervated the Latin expreſſions of this author, that it is neceſſary to tranſcribe his own words. Modo Merlucciæ plebeio admodum piſci Hadrianus Pontifex, ſicuti in adminiſtranda republica hebetis ingenii vel depravati judicii, ita in eſculentis inſulſiſſimi guſtus ſupra mediocre pretium ridente toto ferè piſcario jam fecerat (67). The Court of Rome was gone from one extreme to the other; for there never was a Pope whoſe table was ſerved with more delicate diſhes than Pope Leo X's was. Men inſinuated themſelves into his favour by inventing new Ragoos; and four perſons who were maſters in this art of delicacies, became his favourites. They invented a kind of ſauſages, which ſtruck Hadrian VI with aſtoniſhment, when he examined the accounts of his predeceſſor's expences. Mire favit Pogio ſeni Pogii Hiſtorici filio, itemque Moro nobili a gulæ intemperantia ... & Brandino Equiti, Marianoque Sannioni cucullato facetiſſimis helluonibus, & in omni genere popinalium delitiarum eruditiſſimis. Nam inter alia portenta inſanientis eorum gulæ lucanicas conciſis pavonum pulpis farctas commenti fuerant, quod obſonii genus mox ſucceſſor Hadrianus, vir Batavæ frugalitatis, mirabundus expavit, quum ſumptuarias rationes Leonis inſpiceret (68). i. e. "Poggio the elder, "ſon of Poggio the Hiſtorian, and Morus famous for "his daintineſs.... and Brandinus a Knight, and "Marianus a Mimic and a Monk, were very deep in "his favour; all very facetious gluttons, and very well "ſkilled in all ſorts of daintineſs. For amongſt other "monſters of gluttony, they had invented a kind of "ſauſage made of peacock's fleſh, which kind of meat "his ſucceſſor Hadrian, a man of a Dutch fruga- "lity was aſtoniſhed at, when he came to examine "the accounts of his predeceſſor's expences." As for his part he would not maintain ſuch needleſs officers as theſe were; and he had a way of living ſo different from that of Leo X, that he did not ſpend above twelve crowns a day. The Romans ridiculed this great frugality, and ſaid, that the Vatican was become like a houſe which being haunted with ſpirits, is left empty. Familiam adeò ſordidam & exiguam alebat, ut ſumtus quotidianus duodecim aureos non excederet. Quid plura? Vaticana domus non jam domus illa Pontificia, & ocellus urbis, ut quondam, ſed domus aliqua, ut poetæ tradunt, quæ propter lemurum formidinem vacua & deſerta ſit, præ ſolitudine videbatur. Thus ſpeaks Chriſtopher Battus, whom I have quoted above. We may infer from Paulus Jovius's words, that there were yet ſome perſons at Rome, who out of complaiſance for the Pope eſteemed his fiſh. You will ſee in the article of Chancellor Du PRAT, that this was not the firſt time that great men brought certain meats in vogue which were deſpiſed before. To conclude, I imagine that the Romans did not ridicule Hadrian leſs for his preferring beer before wine, than for his liking the codfiſh before any other. His conſtant drink was beer, and to this his laſt illneſs was aſcribed. He took very great care of his health, and always went to dinner at the ſame ſet hour, ſo that he interrupted the moſt important buſineſs, the moment he was told that the meat was upon the table; but he uſed to eat very moderately. Ferunt Hadrianum alioqui vegetæ viridiſque ſenectæ, contraxiſſe morbum aſſiduo cerviſiæ potu ... Nam per ſe cibi parciſſimus erat, & in tuenda valetudine apprime diligens, & moroſus, tanta horarum definitione, ut denunciante Architriclinio paratas eſſe epulas, vel maximarum rerum colloquia protinus abrumperet (69).

(67) Jovius, de Piſcibus Romanis, cap. 1.]

(68) Jovius, in Vita Leonis X. pag. 191. Monſ. Varillas, Anecdotes de Florence, pag. 297. ſays, theſe ſauſages were made of the moſt delicate parts of pheaſants fleſh. He takes a peacock for a pheaſant.

(69) Jovius, in Vita Hadriani, pag. 283.

People's rejoicing at his death is after all a great encomium upon him [S]. I cannot well say, whether the Roman Catholics or the Proteſtants have firſt publiſhed, that he ſuffered ſacrifices to be offered up to the heathen Gods, in order to make the plague ceaſe [T]. Guicciardini is none of thoſe who ſpared him moſt; for he pretends (l), that they who elected this barbarian for a Pope, acted rather by a blind impetuoſity, than by choice and deliberation (m), and that as they could give no good reaſons for their impertinent conduct, they charged the Holy Ghoſt with it, who uſed, ſay they, to inſpire the Cardinals whilſt they were about electing a Pope (n). Hadrian's corps was depoſited in the Church of the Vatican between the bodies of Pius II and Pius III, and transferred afterwards into the Church of St. Mary dell' anima. William Enckevort, the only Cardinal he made, took all that care, and raiſed a ſtately mauſoleum (or tomb) to him (o). Let us not forget to obſerve, that this Pope was an author [U]. It is ſomewhat ſtrange, that (l) Lib. 14. folio m. 421.

(m) Cardinal Palavicini repreſents this, lib. 2. cap. 2. See the article GUICCIARDINI, remark [F].

(n) Della quale eſtravaganza non potendo con ragione alcuna eſcuſarſi, transferivano la auſa nello Spirito Santo, ſolito ſecondo dicevano à inſpirare nelle elettione de' Pontifici i cuori de' Cardinali.

(o) Jovius, in Vita Hadriani, pag. 421. Val. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. Aub. Miræus, Elog. Belgic.

[S] People's rejoicing at his death is after all a great encomium upon him.] For nothing rendered him more odious than his attempting to put a ſtop to the moſt heinous crimes, and making uſe for that purpoſe of ſevere puniſhments, There was a report ſpread that he was going to publiſh thundering bulls againſt Judaizing perſons, againſt thoſe that turned ſacred things into ridicule, againſt Simoniacal perſons, againſt Uſurers, and againſt Sodomites, of whom there were great numbers at Rome, through the connivance of the Magiſtrates. His deſign againſt the Sodomites alarmed the court and the city; and after his death ſome young men put garlands over the door of John Antracinus his Phyſician, with this inſcription in capitals TO THE DELIVERER OF HIS COUNTRY. *Ultimo inquirere punireque decreverat juventutis corruptores, ejus enim criminis non omnino falſa ſuſpicione urbs ipſa conniventibus legibus infecta credebatur. Quâ inopinatâ & gravi ſeveriſſimæ legis mentione, maculoſos quoſdam cum aulæ tum civitatis veluti deſperata publica ſecuritate terruerat, adeo ut non defuerint petulantiſſimi juvenes, qui Joanni Antracino Pontificis Medico poſtes feſta fronde per intempeſtam noctem protinus exornarent, cum titulo unciali*bus literis inſcripto in hæc verba, Liberatori Patriæ S. P. Q. R. (70). Could any one rejoice at the death of ſuch a Sovereign, without giving thereby a ſtrong proof of his virtue? Paulus Jovius relates that the rejoicings were exceſſive. Morte ejus plerique & præſertim veteris aulæ ſectatores effuſiſſimè ſunt lætati, & ſecundum eos nonnulli Romanorum qui detrimenta rerum ſuarum ſenſerant. i. e. "At "his death moſt of the Courtiers, and eſpecially they "who had been of his predeceſſor's court, rejoiced ex"ceedingly, and next to them, ſome other Ro"mans, who had ſuſtained great loſſes in their eſtates."

(70) Jovius, pag. 28.

[T] I cannot well ſay . . . . who they are, that firſt publiſhed that he ſuffered ſacrifices to be offered up to the Heathen gods, in order to make the plague ceaſe.] I have not yet had time to go very far in my enquiries after the firſt author of this falſity. I have not been beyond a book printed at Amſterdam in the year 1661 (71), in which I have read the following words: Is (Adrianus VI) ad avertendam peſtem, quæ graviſſime in urbe ſæviebat, Mago Demetrio Græco conceſſit ſylveſtrem taurum Diis Gentilium ad placandam eorum iram mactare, ceſſavitque lues. i. e. "Hadrian, in order to "put a ſtop to the plague, which raged ſeverely in the "city, gave one Demetrius, a Greek Magician, leave "to offer up a wild bull to the Heathen Gods, in order "to appeaſe their anger; and the plague ceaſed." The author quotes Paulus Jovius, in the 21ſt book of his Hiſtory; but we ought to think, for his reputation's ſake, and out of charity, that he had not read this Hiſtorian. Let us ſee what Paulus Jovius relates, the paſſage deſerves to be quoted. He mentions the Pope, only with a deſign to obſerve that he did not prohibit ſeverely all communication between the houſes that were infected with the plague; and that this practice, which was very different from what is cuſtomary in Italy, occaſioned the death of an infinite number of perſons. He does not aſſert that the Pope gave the Magician leave to offer up that ſacrifice; he only obſerves in general, that it was impoſſible to oppoſe the mob, which ſupported this Demetrius: further, he does not aſſert, that this man pretended to offer up this bull a ſacrifice to the Heathen Gods; and as to the ſucceſs, he ſays only that the plague was abated. What do they mean then, who pretend to quote Paulus Jovius, when they relate ſo many particulars, of which he does not ſay one word? Exorta eſt in urbe peſtilentiæ lues, quæ quum ſeveris legibus, more noſtro, Pontifici minimè cohercenda videretur, contactu ægrorum ita exarſit, ut multa funera in compitis viſerentur, appareretque vaſtari Urbem, haud multo dierum ſpatio, niſi Græculus quidam nomine Demetrius Spartanus, ſedandæ peſtilentiæ, faventi ei turba hominum, negotium ſuſcepiſſet, nemine ſuperſtitionem vetare auſo. Nam ferum taurum, cui dimidium cornu diſſecaret, magico carmine dextram in aurem prolato repente ita manſuefactum reddiderat, ut injecto tenui filo ad integrum cornu, quo vellet perducens, peſtilentiæ placando numini ad Amphitheatrum immolaret. Nec credulæ multitudinis ſpem ex toto fefellit, quum ab ea inanis ſacrificii proſpera litatione, miteſcere morbus cœpiſſet (72). i. e. "The plague began to rage "in the city, and the Pope not thinking fit to keep "it within bounds by ſevere laws, as is cuſtomary "with us, it ſoon came to ſuch a height by the com"munication between infected perſons, that a great "many burials were ſeen in the ſtreets, and it ap"peared that within a few days the whole city would "have been deſolate, had not a certain Greek named "Demetrius, of Sparta, attempted to put a ſtop to "the plague, the whole mob favouring him, and no "man daring to oppoſe that ſuperſtition. He took "a wild bull, one of whoſe horns he had broke off, "and ſaid ſome magical verſes in that animal's right "ear, which made it all of a ſudden ſo tame, that "having thrown a thin rope on its horn, that was "whole, he could lead it wherever he would, and ſa"crificed it in the Amphitheatre to appeaſe the God "that ſent the plague. Nor did he abſolutely diſap"point the hopes of the multitude, for the happy ſuc"ceſs of this vain ſacrifice was ſuch, that the diſtemper "began to abate."

(71) Compend. Hiſtoriæ, by John Lætus, Profeſſor at Franeker.

(72) Jovius, Hiſt. lib. 21. folio m. 11.

[V] Let us not forget to obſerve, that this Pope was an Author.] His Queſtiones & Expoſitiones on the fourth Book of the Sentences were printed at Paris in folio in the years 1512, and 1516 (78); and his Quæſtiones Quodlibeticæ duodecim at Louvain in 8, in the year 1515, and at Paris in folio the next year. During his ſtay in Spain, he compoſed Computum hominis agonizantis, & ſermonem de ſacculo pertuſo. That is, "The "reckoning of a man at the point of death, and a "diſcourſe of the broken little ſack." After he was Pope he publiſhed Regulæ Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ; i. e. "The Rules of the Apoſtolick Chancery;" and he wrote ſeveral Letters to the Princes of Germany, &c. which have been printed with the Councils, or in other Books.

(73) There have been other editions of them.

I have ſomething to obſerve concerning his work upon the Maſter of the Sentences. Konig (74), being miſled by thoſe, who have called it in IV Sententiarum quæſtiones & expoſitiones (75), aſſerts that our Hadrian publiſhed Queſtions upon the four Books of Sentences. This is a new Proof of what I have obſerved in the firſt remark of this Article, that you cannot deviate in the leaſt from accuracy, but you make ſome author or other aſſert a falſity. Would it not have been better to ſay, in quartum Sententiarum, or in IV librum ſententiarum, than to make uſe of the figure IV, which ſignifies equally quatuor and quartum, four and the fourth? Father Oldoini (76) has committed the ſame blunder with Konig. It will be proper to hear Monſieur Varillas upon this Work of Hadrian. His Commentary on the Maſter of the Sentences, ſays he (77), was admired; and indeed if this was not the moſt ingenious and ſubtle work amongſt the three hundred of the ſame kind that were then to be met with in Libraries, it was at leaſt the plaineſt and moſt methodical. The Author had aſſerted (78), in the moſt peremptory manner, that it is certain that the Pope may err even in thoſe

(74) Bibliotheca Vetus & Nova.

(75) Swertius, Athenæ Belgic. Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belgic.

(76) Athen. Roman. pag. 306.

(77) Preface to the Pratique de l'Educat.

(78) Maimbourg, Traité de l'Egliſe de Rome, p. 138.

that a man, who owed his preferment to learning, ſhould have been ſo little favourable to the men of letters [X]. The Collection of the Letters of Princes contains (p) ſome particulars concerning this Pope's humour. There is a full account of his life written by Gerard Moringus a Divine of Louvain.

(p) In the two Letters of Jerome Niger to Marc Anthony Micheli, folio m. 81, 82.

He acknowledged the great abuſes which he obſerved in the Church; he owned them publickly and in a very ſtrong manner in the inſtructions he gave to the Nuncio who was to ſpeak in his name at the Diet of Nuremberg [Y], and lamented the wicked life of the Clergy, and the corrupt morals of ſome Popes. He had a long time wiſhed to eſtabliſh a reformation of manners amongſt the Clergy. He had endeavoured it whilſt he was Dean of St. Peter's at Louvain, but all his pains and cares proving ineffectual, he was obliged to give over his undertaking [Z]. He is to be blamed, amongſt other things, for his acting himſelf againſt the noble maxims he had wrote concerning pluralities

thoſe things which relate to Faith; and it is pretended, that he did not change his Opinion when he was Pope, as Pius II. did; for he did not alter any thing in that paſſage of his work, in the edition that was publiſhed at Rome during his Pontificate.

[X] It is ... ſtrange, that he .... ſhould have been ſo little favourable to the men of Letters.] You have ſeen in the remark [D] how he was inclined towards the Poets. This might eaſier be forgiven him, than the Amortization or extinguiſhing of the Funds which had been employed to maintain thoſe learned men who came from Greece into Italy, and to whom the Weſtern part of the World is indebted for the revival of polite Literature. Cardinal Beſſarion gave a maintenance at Rome to ſome of theſe great Genius's, and eſtabliſhed an academy for them in the Vatican. But the greateſt number of them lived by the Liberalities of Pope Nicholas V. .... (79). Of all his Succeſſors, none but Hadrian the ſixth ſuppreſſed thoſe gratifications, through an oeconomy which is not very much to the honour of his memory (80). Here follows what another Hiſtorian has obſerved (81). "All the learned men of his time were in hopes of preferment on "his acceſſion to the papal Throne, becauſe he owed "all his good fortune and his exaltation to the Belles "Lettres. But they were very much ſurpriſed, when "they experienced his ill-will againſt all thoſe who "took a delight in polite Literature, calling them "Terentianos, and uſing them in ſuch a manner, that "it was thought he would have reduced Learning "to the ſame condition it was in during the moſt dark "ages, had not death ſnatched him away the ſecond "year of his ſupreme dignity. Paulus Jovius ſays "wittily * that he gave the greateſt wits of his age "this ill-uſage, with the ſame ſenſe and with the ſame "judgment, with which he preferred the Cod-fiſh of his "Low Countries before any other meat, and before "the beſt fiſh that could be eat in all Italy." It is not true that Paulus Jovius ſays this; ſee his own words in the remark [R]. The Reader will perhaps be glad to know whence la Mothe le Vayer borrowed what he relates; I ſhall therefore tranſcribe here a beautiful paſſage from Pierius Valerianus. Fuit & ſub Hadriano VI. par bonarum omnium literarum infortunium. Nam cùm is Leoni Decimo ſuffectus eſſet, ad quem utpote literarum Principem magnus literatorum numerus confluxerat, dum non minora de Hadriano ſibi quiſque pollicetur, ecce adeſt muſarum & eloquentiæ, totiuſque nitoris hoſtis acerrimus, qui literatis omnibus inimicitas minitaretur, quoniam, ut ipſe dictitabat, Terentiani eſſent, quos cùm odiſſe, atque etiam perſequi cœpiſſet, voluntarium alii exilium, alias atque alias alii latebras quærentes, tamdiu latuere, quoad Dei beneficio altero Imperii anno deceſſit, qui ſi aliquanto diutius vixiſſet, Gottica illa tempora adverſus bonas literas videbatur ſuſcitaturus (84). i. e. "The misfortune of the learned was the ſame under Hadrian VI. For when he "had ſucceeded Pope Leo X. to whom a great number of learned men reſorted to as their head, they entertained no leſs hopes of Hadrian VI. but he ſoon "ſhewed himſelf the moſt bitter enemy of the Muſes, "and of Eloquence and all kind of Elegance; and "he threatened all the learned with his indignation, "becauſe, as he uſed to ſay, they were Terentians; "ſo that as he began to hate and even to perſecute them, "ſeveral of them went into a voluntary baniſhment, "others hid themſelves in different places, till by "God's bleſſing he died in the ſecond year of his "exaltation; but if he had lived ſome time longer, "he would probably have brought back the dark-

"neſs of the Gothick times, and buried all polite "Literature in Oblivion."

[Y] He acknowledged the Abuſes .... in a very ſtrong manner in the inſtructions he gave to the Nuntio, who was to ſpeak ... at the Dyet of Nuremberg.] This Nuntio's name was Francis Cheregat. Here follows a Fragment of his Inſtructions. Dices nos ingenuè fateri, quod Deus hanc perſecutionem à Lutheranis illatam, eccleſiæ ſuæ inferri permittit, propter peccata hominum, ſacerdotum maximè, & eccleſiæ prælatorum. Clamant ſcripturæ peccata populi derivari à peccatis ſacerdotum, proptereaque, ut ait Chryſoſtomus, Salvator noſter curaturus infirmam civitatem Jeruſalem, ingreſſus eſt priùs templum, ut peccata ſacerdotum primò caſtigaret inſtar boni medici, qui morbum à radice curat. Scimus in hac ſancta ſede aliquot jam annis multa abominanda fuiſſe, abuſus in ſpiritualibus, exceſſus in mandatis, & omnia denique in perverſum mutata, nec mirum, ſi ægritudo à capite in membra, à ſummis Pontificibus in alios inferiores prælatos deſcendit. Omnes nos prælati, videlicet eccleſiaſtici, declinavimus, unuſquiſque in vias ſuas, nec fuit jam diu qui faceret bonum, non fuit uſque ad unum. i. e. "You ſhall declare, that we in- "genuouſly confeſs, that God ſuffers this perſecution "of his Church by the Lutherans for the ſins of men, "and eſpecially for thoſe of the Prieſt and Prelates "of the Church. The Scripture teſtifies, that the "ſins of the people are owing to thoſe of the Prieſts; "and therefore, as Chryſoſtom obſerves, when Chriſt "deſigned to heal the diſeaſes of Jeruſalem, he en- "tered the Temple firſt, that he might firſt reclaim "the Prieſts from their wickedneſs, as a skilful Phy- "ſician, who endeavours to remove the very cauſe of "the diſtemper. We know that there have been a- "bominable crimes committed for ſome years in this "holy See; that there are abuſes in ſpirituals, ex- "ceſſes in the commands (of the Church), in a word, "that all things are changed for the worſe. Nor is "it a wonder, that the diſtemper beginning at the "head, in the very Popes, ſhould be propagated to the "other inferior Prelates. All of us Prelates, that is, "Clergymen, are gone aſide, every one in his ways; "and for a long time, there is none that doeth "good, no not one." A Proteſtant writer ſuppoſes, that the Cardinals entertained ſuch a ſtrong reſentment againſt this Pope, for thus diſgracing and expoſing the Court of Rome in a Diet of the Empire, and for his condemning a man to be burnt for the crime of Beaſtiality, that they ſhortened his days. Nec tamen tam fœlicibus ad perfectum Papatum rudimentis profecit, quo minus illi purpuratæ Parcæ offenſæ, quòd comitiis Noribergenſibus dedecoraſſet rem Romanam, & quòd quendam jumento ſuo pro ſuo arbitratu uſum, homo Batavus & ad Papalem venerem frigidus, cremaſſet: ſilum illud diu regnandi, & vivendi, abrumperet (83). This Pope being a Dutchman, was not inclined to that kind of venereal pleaſures, in which the Popes uſed to indulge themſelves.

[Z] He had endeavoured to eſtabliſh a Reformation of Manners, whilſt he was Dean .... but all his pains proving ineffectual, he was obliged to give over his undertaking.] As ſoon as he was promoted to the Deanery of St. Peter at Louvain, which is a very conſiderable Dignity, with great privileges annexed to it, he applied himſelf more than ever to lead an exemplary life: for he knew very well, that his endeavours to reclaim his Collegues, would be much more effectual, if he practiſed himſelf the duties of temperance, which he deſigned to preach up to them; he continued to live with frugality; there was more decency than plenty at his

Table,

(79) Notæ in Pbranzam, pag. 275. Platina, quoted by Guillet, Hiſt. de Mahomet II, tom. 1. pag. 255.

(80) Theodor. Spandug. quoted by the ſame Guillet, ibid.

(81) La Mothe le Vayer, tom. 11. pag. 436.

(*) 7 De Piſc. Rom. He ſhould have ſaid 1 and not 7.

(82) Pier. Valerianus, De Literat. Infelicitate, lib. 2. pag. m. 90.

(83) Novor. Epiſcop. Belgic. Diviſio, pag. 79. of the edition printed in 1570.

lities of livings [AA]. Obſerve that when he canonized Antoninus and Benno, he would not ſuffer the extravagant expences that were uſual on thoſe occaſions; he prohibited

Table, and when he gave an entertainment, he never preſſed any perſon to drink, and he never propoſed to drink ſuch a health as obliged his Gueſts to empty whole bumpers; nor would he ſuffer ſuch a health to be propoſed to him. He ſet himſelf above that pretended German civility. His entertainments laſted only an hour, and his cuſtom was to have ſome chapters of the Bible read to him during part of that time. He would have had a perſon read all the time the Company was at Table, had he not feared to offend ſome of his Gueſts. Neque temere ultra horam accumbebat, etiamſi convivas magnos haberet, atque interim fere adhibito lectore, qui aliquid è literis ſacris recitaret, ut non minus mente, quam ventre convivæ delectarentur, ſed id tantum ad tempus, ne lectio longior cuiquam fortaſſis moleſtiæ eſſet (14). He did this, that the minds of his Gueſts might be entertained as well as his body. He continued alſo to lead a chaſte life; nothing that was laſcivious, could be obſerved either in his actions or in his diſcourſes, he would not even ſuffer the leaſt obſcene word to be ſaid before him, though otherwiſe he could hear or utter an honeſt joke with pleaſure. He was not content to keep himſelf actually free from all laſciviouſneſs, he avoided even the leaſt appearances and ſuſpicions of it. He made it his particular Duty to inſpire his Collegues with the ſame moral principles; he made them the ſtrongeſt exhortations to it, in the general Aſſemblies of the Chapter, and he ſeverely cenſured thoſe, whom he knew to be given to drinking or gaming, and eſpecially thoſe that kept a Concubine (86). He endeavoured by all means to perſuade them to break off this correſpondence. But he met with ſo many difficulties, becauſe ſome of the moſt ancient and moſt powerful oppoſed his deſigns, that he was obliged to give it over. His zeal was very near coſting him his life; he would have died being poiſoned, had not his Phyſician found an effectual remedy againſt Arſenick. It was imagined, that the Concubine of a Canon who had invited him to dinner, had committed the fact. Sed in re longe honeſtiſſima tantum difficultatis habuit, obnitentibus quibuſdam è ſenioribus ac potentioribus, & præſertim non ſuppetente auxilio, ſine quo hujuſmodi non temere confici queunt, ut negotium magna ex parte infectum relinquere debuerit. Quinimo parum abfuit, quin per eam ipſam cauſam, veneno perierit. Id concubina unius è Canonicis, a quo ad prandium vocatus erat, holuſculo ejus, quod primum omnium menſæ inferri ſolemne eſt, indidiſſe putabatur (86). When he found that there was no hope left to procure a reformation of manners, and that all his endeavours did only raiſe him a great many enemies, he deſiſted entirely, and declared that the Deans of the Chapters were much leſs anſwerable for theſe diſorders, than the Biſhops: for the Deans were obliged to admit perſons whoſe corrupt morals were an inveterate diſtemper; but nothing could oblige the Biſhops, or their Vicars to ordain men, who were ſo notoriouſly debauched, or to give them livings, without making the leaſt inquiry into their former behaviour. Dum ſpem nullam fructus conſpiceret, nihilque aliud ſibi quam odium & malevolentiam quæri intelligeret, in totum conatu ſuperſedit, ſatis habens, ſignificaſſe ſibi diſplicere, poſtquam aliud præterea non poſſet; prædicans, tamen, culpam eam non tam Decanis Collegiorum, qui jam obſtinatos & in ſordibus illis inveteratos exciperent, quam Epiſcopis, eorumque vicariis præſtandam, qui quoſcunque ſine delectu, quantumvis probroſos & infames, ad ordines & beneficia admitterent, nulla aut exigua in retroactam vitam inquiſitione facta (87). All this is extracted from a Book written by a Roman Prieſt. Let not therefore any perſon object, that theſe are only calumnies invented by the Proteſtants.

It is certain that our Dean had hit upon the true cauſe of the evil. The negligence of the Biſhops or of their Vicars was the ſpring of this diſorder. They never inquired whether thoſe, to whom they gave preferments, had led a virtuous life, and given ſufficient proofs, that their conſtitution could be bent to an abſtinence of ſenſual pleaſures. This want of examination opened the Gates of the Church to a thouſand perſons who had already got an inclination to ſenſuality; this inclination is not eaſily rooted out; it grows ſtronger and ſtronger every day; it ſoon turns into an habit, which is a diſtemper almoſt incurable. This is the reaſon why our Hadrian's exhortations had no effect on the Canons, who had been a long time given to Drunkenneſs, and to venereal pleaſures. They had uſed themſelves ſo well to that way of living, that they could not imagine how it would be poſſible for them to live otherwiſe. It is infinitely more difficult to perſuade a batchelor of forty-five or fifty years, to marry, than a widower of ſixty, who has but juſt loſt his wife. So great a power has cuſtom upon us! The concubine, on her part, does not find it leſs difficult to part with her canon, after ſhe has lived and boarded ſeveral years with him. Where ſhould I go, ſays ſhe; where ſhould I meet with ſuch a good bed, ſuch a good table, and ſuch a warm houſe? So that ſhe and all her friends of the ſame trade are reſolved to thwart as much as lays in their power the deſigns of a reformer. The Dean of St. Peter's at Louvain would have had occaſion for the moſt undaunted courage. For the poiſon of thoſe Concubines was almoſt as dreadful, as the dagger of the Banditti in Italy. But as he did not find within himſelf an inward calling for Martyrdom, he choſe rather to leave things as they were, than to draw upon him the reſentment of the wicked, and even expoſe himſelf to be murthered, by inſiſting upon a Reformation. He ſaid no doubt, In magnis voluiſſe ſat eſt. i. e. "It is ſufficient to attempt a great "undertaking."

[AA] He is to be blamed . . . . for acting himſelf againſt the noble Maxims he wrote concerning pluralities of livings.] When he was but a Profeſſor at Louvain, he maintained that theſe Pluralities were unlawful, and that a man who is once promoted to a Benefice capable to maintain him handſomely, ought to be ſatisfied with it, and not to wiſh for any more. But it was obſerved, that when he was at the Court of Charles of Auſtria he accepted of ſeveral Dignities in the Church, and did not remember the Doctrine he had taught himſelf. This inconſiſtency ſurpriſed and even ſcandalized ſome perſons. Honores & ſacerdotia quædam magnifica acceſſere, non ſine admiratione, & fortaſſis offenſione aliquorum, qui eum diverſum facere incuſabant, atque aliquando docuiſſet. Docuiſſe quippe, non eſſe fas cuiquam multa habere beneficia, ſed uno aliquo ad honeſtam mundamque ſuſtentationem vitæ ſufficiente, quietum ac contentum eſſe debere (88). The Author from whom I borrow theſe words declares that he does not pretend to examine whether this conduct has been juſtly blamed or not (89); and yet he undertakes to vindicate it, and alledges the moſt plauſible arguments that can be urg'd upon this ſubject. He obſerves, amongſt other things, that we ought not to deem it ſtrange, that Hadrian ſhould think that lawful to them, which would have been unlawful to thoſe, who were not, like him, adorned, with the moſt eminent qualities, and had no employments at Court. The great gifts, which God beſtows on a Prieſt, are of a much greater advantage to the Church, when they meet in a perſon who enjoys a great income; and it muſt be confeſſed, that a Clergyman, who has places at Court, is for that very reaſon under a neceſſity to ſpend a great deal. The Author adds to this ſeveral other arguments, which all have this defect, that they are very proper for an Apology of the Caſuiſts, like that of Father Pirot; I mean, that they may all be urged to juſtify thoſe, who being raiſed to the higheſt Poſts, get all the vacant places for themſelves. Can it not be ſaid in their defence, that they will make a better uſe of them, than other perſons would do, and that they are neceſſary for them to exert their great Qualities, the better for the profit and advantage of the State? The Author adds, that it is abſolutely falſe that Hadrian refuted either in his Lectures or in his Books, the Plurality of Benefices. He rather favoured it, continues he; and this appears from his Commentaries on Peter Lombard. Neque vero ipſe Hadrianus uſquam diverſum aut docuit, aut ſcripſit, ut ei falſo intendunt, ſed potius contra. Legat eum qui velit, in quartum Petri Lombardi ſcribentem, ubi de reſtitutionce agens, quæſtionem illam ex profeſſo diſſerit (90). All that the Author quotes afterwards from that Commentary is not much

(84) Gerardus Moringus, in Vita Hadriani VI.

(85) Arguebat graviter, ſi quos malæ frugis, ebriaces, aleones ſciret, & præſertim, qui amicas domi prope uxorum loco haberent, quos dirimere virtibus omnibus contendebat. Idem, ibid.

(86) Idem, ibid.

(87) Idem, ibid.

(88) Moringus, in Vita Hadriani VI.

(89) In quo meritо ne eum an immerito culparint, equidem non habeo dicere, cum hiſtorici perſonam hic potius quam cenſoris, agam. Idem, ibid.

(90) Idem, ibid.

bited them as inconſiſtent with the holineſs of a canonization (q). A learned Jeſuit who quoted this fact, was expoſed to ſome puzzling objections on that account [BB]. This Pope's ſucceſſors have not been of his mind; they have tolerated a worldly pomp in the canonizations, to ſuch an exceſs, that even the common people were offended at it [CC].

(q) Tales ſumptus quaſi alienos a ſanctimonia & puritate Canonizationis fieri vetuit. Blaſius Ortizius, apud Papebrochium, tom. 7. Maij, p. 555.

HADRIAN

to his purpoſe. If what he pretends could be inferred from it, it would be only by a very indirect and far fetched conſequence. He ſays nothing of the Quodlibetical Oration, which it is aſſerted that Hadrian publiſhed againſt Pluralities. Let us quote a Proteſtant writer, who relates an anſwer which this Pope made to thoſe who asked him, why he did not remove an abuſe, which he had ſo juſtly condemned. Imò cùm Lovanii olim edidiſſet Quodlibeticam orationem contra pluralitatem beneficiorum, monentibus cur ipſe, qui jam poteſtatem tollendi haberet, quod antè reprehendere tantum potuiſſet, omnia beneficia, maximè ex Inferiore Germania ſupplicantibus interciperet, reſpondit: cum parvuli eſſemus loquebamur, ſapiebamus, faciebamus ut parvuli; nunc autem poſtquam viri facti ſumus, reliquimus ea quæ ſunt parvuli. Sic homo Trajecti non ſolùm ex viliſſimis parentibus ortus, verum etiam uſque ad ipſum magiſterium, mendicitate, & eleemoſinariis ſumptibus educatus, ad inſuetæ fortunæ pruritum exiliit, ſic in illa ſede promovit, hanc reformationem (quam) promiſit (91). [The former part of this paſſage being tranſlated hereunder, we ſhall give here the ſenſe only of the latter part of it, which is follows]. "Thus this man of "Utrecht, who was not only born of the moſt abject "Parents but alſo educated by charitable contributions, "till he took his degrees, inſolently exults when he "was unexpectedly raiſed to the higheſt dignity: "thus did he forget to promote that Reformation, "which he had promiſed." I imagine that the Walloon Miniſter whom I am going to quote, had horrowed the following remark (92) from that Latin paſſage. "Pope Hadrian VI ſucceeded him. Some "perſons wondered to ſee him act inconſiſtently with "what he had maintained in a certain Oration, which "he deliver'd at Louvain, when he was ſtill but Magiſter "noſter there, in which he condemned the Pluralities; "and the accumulating of livings upon one perſon: "whereas being now a Pope, he did what he had "blamed, eſpecially with regard to the Benefices in "the Low-Countries. He anſwered them in St. Paul's "Words, when I was a child, I ſpake as a child, I underſtood as a child, I thought as a child; but when "I became a man, I put away childiſh things, 1 Cor. "xiii. 11." This was mentioned in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres in the year 1684. (97).

(91) Novor. Epiſcop. Belgic. Diviſio, pag. 78, 79.

(92) Jeremie de Pours, Molodie du S. Pſalmiſte, pag. 859.

(93) In the month of Nov. Art. 6. pag. 931.

[BB] He prohibited the extravagant expences . . . of Canonizations. A learned Jeſuit, who quoted this fact, was expoſed to ſome puzzling objections on that account.] He was publickly charged with aſſerting that the expences of a Canonization were inconſiſtent with the ſanctity and holineſs of ſuch a ſolemnity. His accuſer's name was Sebaſtian of St. Paul. He was Profeſſor of Divinity at Louvain, and was twice Provincial of the Carmelites in the Low Countries. The Jeſuit defended himſelf after this manner: He obſerved (94), I. That he only related what he had read in Blazius Ortizius a Canon of Toledo, and one of Hadrian the ſixth's Attendants. II. That having quoted this in an Italick Letter, he had reaſons to complain of being calumniated by his cenſurer, who ſuppreſſed theſe circumſtances; for an Accuſation is unjuſt, not only when a man is charged with facts that are falſe, but alſo when ſome true circumſtances are omitted in the charge. This, he ſays, is the conſtant opinion of Divines. An ignoras certam eſſe apud Theologos ſententiam, quod accuſatio poſſit eſſe graviter injuſta, non tantum ex falſi impoſitione, ſed etiam ex reticentia veri (95)? III. That though he alledged this particular as a thing that was very much to Pope Hadrian the VIth's honour, yet it does not follow from thence, that he charges the other Popes with erring, who either approved or commended the great expences of a canonization. IV. That he praiſed Hadrian as a Pope, who was influenced by a true zeal, and acted from a principle of conſcience, the innocent errors of which may commendably, and ought even in ſeveral caſes to be followed. Laudo Adrianum VI, quia id fecit zelo bono & ſecundum conſcientiam, quam inculpabiliter errantem ſequi cum laude poſſumus, & ſæpe debemus (96) V. That he did not give his approbation to this motive of Hadrian, namely, that ſuch expences are inconſiſtent with the holineſs and ſanctity of a canonization. VI. That he did not doubt but ſuch expences are grounded on ſeveral ſubſtantial reaſons. VII. That Hadrian VI as a private Doctor might be miſtaken in this particular point, without prejudice to the infallibility of the Pope's ſpeaking ex cathedra, that is, from St. Peter's chair. VIII. That Baronius relates much more conſiderable errors of ſome Popes, and yet he cannot be charged with traducing the holy Apoſtolical See.

(94) Daniel Papebrochius, Reſponſ. ad Exhibitionem errorum, pag. 62.

(95) Idem, ibid.

(96) Dan. Papebrochius, pag. 69.

It is impoſſible not to obſerve here the fatal effects of party-engagements. A Roman Catholic is a perfect ſlave with regard to his underſtanding. There are a thouſand occaſions, in which he cannot commend the moſt noble actions. Is it not very plain, that Hadrian VI deſerves to be approved, both for what he did, and for the reaſon why he did it? And yet here is a Jeſuit who could not praiſe him for it, but his commendation became an indirect cenſure of the other Popes, ſo that he finds himſelf in the utmoſt perplexity to juſtify his conduct, nor can he extricate himſelf but by ſuppoſing that our Hadrian was indeed miſtaken, but that his errors deſerve to be excuſed upon the account of his good intention. This is all the glory a Pope can expect, who pretends to reform abuſes. Men will aſcribe his conduct to a miſtaken conſcience; they will ſay that he does not err as a Pope, but as a private Doctor. A great favour indeed!

[CC] His ſucceſſors have tolerated them to ſuch an exceſs, that even the common people were offended at it.] All the people were ſcandalized at Paris in the year 1622, when they ſaw with how much pomp the bare-footed Carmelites celebrated there the canonization of St. Thereſa. There was publiſhed the ſame year a little pamphlet, in which it was ſuppoſed, that the good women murmured againſt it very ſeriouſly. One of them complained that ſhe had been burnt in that ſolemnity. "How, Couſin, anſwered a new married "woman, was you at that fire? I never ſaw ſuch a "confuſion, nor ſo much miſchief done. A brother "of mine alſo had his whole face ſadly wounded, "nor is there as yet any likelihood of his being "cured. But what occaſion is there for all thoſe ſuper-"fluities, ſaid a toothleſs old woman? I never heard "in my younger days of ſuch a canonizing of Saints; "this is rather cannonading than cannonizing them. "Hold hold, aunt, ſaid a trades-woman, who lives "in the ſtreet, called St. Denys's, they have done much "more ſtill at Rome; theſe are public rejoicings, in "which there is no harm to go a little beyond bounds, "when the motive is only a ſincere and holy affection; "and beſides, what the bare-footed Carmelites have "done was only by the Queen's command, who bore "all thoſe expences, becauſe St. Thereſa was a native "of Spain. That ſignifies nothing, replied a Citizen's "wife of the neighbourhood of St. Lupus's; God has "been a thouſand times more offended than honoured "in that ceremony: how many maidens do you think "have been raviſhed? All the corn in the fields here-"about has been laid down or burnt; it met with "the month of Auguſt before July was come. For "my part, ſaid the wife of an Advocate in the great "Council, I would have had them ſpent all that "ſuperfluous money in adorning their church, rather "than make it vaniſh away into ſmoke; theſe or-"naments would have continued in their poſſeſſion, "and they would have been the more eſteemed for "it; this would have kindled the fire of devotion in "the hearts of thoſe that had viſited them, whereas "now the very air has been ſet on a flame, and all "the neighbouring fields have been burnt by their "rockets. I have ſtill a tucker with five rows, which "has been entirely ſpoiled. However, if they had "lighted the fire at eight of the clock, it had been "better: there would not have been ſo many cloaks "loſt;

HADRIAN (CORNELIUS of) in Dutch Hadrianſen (a), a famous Dutch Preacher in the ſixteenth Century, was a native of Dort. He entered amongſt the Cordeliers, and was Guardian of the Convent, and Reader of Divinity (b). He was well acquainted with the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew Tongues, and taught theſe three languages publickly (c). He preached thirty years at Bruges, nor was he ever daunted by the ſlanders that were ſpread againſt him. He died at Bruges at the age of ſixty July the 14th 1581. He wrote a treatiſe on the ſeven Sacraments. John Lernutius had ſeen ſeveral very learned manuſcript Sermons of this Cordelier (d). The works which have been publiſhed under his name after his death, are interſperſed with indecent jeſts and puns. Sanderus pretends that the heretics have inſerted them in order to expoſe the reputation of this honeſt and innocent Monk (e). He ought either to have given proofs of his aſſertion, or not to have made it. The Proteſtants repreſent this Cordelier as a very paſſionate declaimer (f); and there have been ſome books publiſhed, in which it is aſſerted, that he had introduced a new way of devotion amongſt the perſons of the female ſex; he appointed ſome days, in which they were to undreſs themſelves quite naked before him [A], that he might diſcipline them gently for the expiation of their ſins (g). Theſe people will perſuade women to do any thing under the fair pretence of devotion [B], when they have the gift of talking well, and when they are diſtinguiſhed by their preaching.

I have read ſomewhere, that George Caſſander, who taught polite Literature at Bruges, whilſt Cornelius Hadrianſen read Lectures on Divinity there, was obliged in the year 1555 to go into a voluntary baniſhment [C], being forced to it by his collegue's ſlanders.

(a) That is to ſay Hadrian's ſon.

(b) Swert. Ath. Belgic.

(c) Val. And. Bibliotb. Belgic.

(d) Swert. Ath. Belgic.

(e) Apud Val. And. Bibliotb. Belgic.

(f) Tempore quo caninam ſuam eloquentiam celebratiſſimi nominis Franciſcanus,) Cornelius Adriani ... exercebat. Schoockius, Exercitat. Sacr. pag. 538.

(g) See Voetius, Polit. Eccleſ. tom. 1. pag. 686.

HAILLAN

" loſt; all the ſcholars were there in arms (97)." After all, we may ſay here as on ſeveral other occaſions, there is nothing but may be of ſome uſe; the greateſt abuſes have their fair ſide. If canonizations could be procured without very great expences, they would be much more common; and it is neceſſary that the impoſſibility of paying the charges ſhould be a bar to the ſtrong inclinations of religious orders; they would never want perſons proper to be canonized; every convent would deſire to have as many ſaints as any other; and if canonization did not coſt much, the other means to obtain it would ſoon be prepared.

(97) See the book intitled, Le Caquet de l'Accouchée, pag. 5. of the 2d Journée.

[A] His penitents were to undreſs themſelves quite naked before him.] If Gyges's maxim were true, that when a woman pulls off her clothes, ſhe alſo caſts off all ſhame at the ſame time (1), our Hadrian's affairs would have been in a pretty good condition, ſuppoſing that he was not ſo much a fanatick as to imagine that a few laſhes given with his own hand on the naked body of his female votaries, would really be wonderfully effectual to expiate their ſins. Men are ſo much inclined to put a bad conſtruction upon every thing, that few perſons will be able to aſcribe this Franciſcan's conduct to any other motive but that, which by ſome is called a deſire of prying into other people's pleaſures. Ἔοικε ἡ τε μοιχεία, παλυπραγμοσύνη τῆς ἀλλοτρίας ἡδονῆς εἶναι, καὶ ζήτησις καὶ ἴφεσις τῶν φυλαττομένων καὶ λανθανόντων τοῖς πολλοῖς (2). i. e. " Adultery ſeems to " be a deſire to pry into other people's pleaſure, and " an inquiry and ſearch into thoſe things which are " hid and unknown to others." If it were true, as ſome learned men have aſſerted (3), that in the primitive churches, the perſons who are to be baptized, of whatever age or ſex they were, undreſſed themſelves quite naked, it would be much better conceived, how this man by fair words, and by a great ſhew of devotion, could perſuade his female penitents to do what he pleaſed. The ſacrament of penitence, would he ſay perhaps, ought to be adminiſtred after the ſame manner as baptiſm was formerly. The penance of whipping, to which I condemn you, is a part of that ſacrament; you ought therefore, &c. Meteren (4) gives ſuch a full account of what relates to this Franciſcan's female votaries, and mentions ſo many particulars, that we cannot but think the ſtory is true.

(1) Herodot. lib. 1. cap. 8.

(2) Plut. de Curioſ. pag. 519.

(3) Joſeph Vicecomes, de Ritibus Baptiſmi. Voſſius, in Theſibus de Baptiſmo.

(4) Meteren, Hiſt. des Pais-Bas, liv. 8. fol. 153. of the Hague edition, 1618.

Henry Stephens tells us a ſtory which has ſome affinity with this. The Prieſts, ſays he (5), are gone ſo far, " as to require, according to what ſome authors " relate, that it be lawful for them, in the auricular " confeſſions, to handle thoſe parts that had been inſtrumental in committing the ſins that were confeſſed; and as a certain Biſhop repreſented to one " of them who made that requeſt, what a ſhame it " would be, if both men and women ſhould ſhew them " their ſecret parts; he anſwered, that it was not a " ſhame that the prieſt, who heard confeſſions, ſhould " alſo contemplate with his ſpiritual eyes, which are " much more precious than thoſe of the fleſh, not " only the members which committed obſcene actions, but even the very obſcenities that are revealed " to them in the confeſſion, it ought much leſs to be " reckoned a diſgrace, that they ſhould behold thoſe " members with the eyes of the body. He obſerved " alſo that the Confeſſor, acting as a ſpiritual Phyſician, ought to handle his patient, as the Phyſician " of the body touches and handles the perſon he viſits; " and intermixing his jeſts with blaſphemies, and " with a prophanation of the expreſs text of the Goſpel, he quoted theſe words of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, " go thy way, ſhew thyſelf to the prieſt. As though it " had been the cuſtom for men and women to undreſs and ſhew themſelves quite naked to the " Prieſt."

(5) Apolog. pour Herodote, liv. 1. chap. 21. pag. m. 254, 255.

Monſieur Boileau, Doctor of the Sorbonne, has given an account of what relates to our Hadrian. Inter exempla, ſays he (6), tam infauſtæ notitiæ recenſere non pertimeſcam, Hiſtoriam hominis cucullati & cordigeri conventus Brugenſis anno circiter MDLXVI cui nomen erat Cornelio Adriaſen (7) origine Dordracenſis, adverſus hæreticos Guezios ſtomachoſiſſimi concionatoris; qui puellas ceù fœminas quaſdam Sacramento fidelitatis & obedientiæ ſibi adſtrictas & ſpecie pietatis devotas non quidem aſperatis & nodoſis funibus verberabat, ſed nudata earum femora, & nates inhoneſtis vibicibus rorantes virgis betuleis aut viminèis ictibus molliter inflictis perfricabat, uti refert Emanuel Meteren Hiſtoriæ Belgicæ fol. cliii & cliv edit Amſtelodamenſis anni 1570 (8). He has theſe words in his curious Hiſtory of the Flagellants. The French Tranſlator did not well underſtand this paſſage, for he tranſlates it thus. " Amongſt " all theſe inſtances of a ſtrict devotion, I ſhall " not ſcruple to relate, on Meteren's credit *, the " ſtory of one Cornelius Adriaſen, a native of Dort, " who was a Franciſcan at Bruges, about the year " 1566, and a paſſionate preacher againſt the Here- " tics called Beggars. This Monk had ſome maidens " and women, who under a ſhew of religion, and by " an oath of fidelity and obedience were ſo devoted to " him, that he not only whipped them with cords in " which were large knots, but alſo uſed to ſtrike " them gently on the thighs and buttocks with rods " made of oſier or birch." It is ſo far from being true that the Latin paſſage I have quoted ſignifies that this Monk made uſe of cords with large knots, that it has a quite contrary ſenſe.

(6) Hiſtoria Flagellantium, pag. 218, 219.

(7) He ſhould have ſaid Hadrianſen, as Meteren's Tranſlator has done.

(8) I do not believe that there is ſuch an edition of Meteren.

(*) Hiſtoriæ Belgicæ folio 153, 154. edit. Amſt. 1570.

[B] Theſe people will perſuade women to do any thing under the . . . . pretence of devotion.] I have mentioned in another place the great docility of the fair ſex. See the remarks of the articles FRATRICELLI and GUILLEMETE.

[C] George Caſſander . . . . was obliged . . . . to go into

HAILLAN (BERNARD DE GIRARD Lord du) Hiſtoriographer of France, deſcended from an ancient and noble family [A], was born at Bourdeaux about the year 1535. He ſet up pretty early for an author, and after he had made ſome figure in the Republic of Letters as a Poet, and as a Tranſlator [B], he applied himſelf to the writing of hiſtorical books with ſuch ſucceſs, that his firſt works of that kind procured him from Charles IX the title of Hiſtoriographer of France in the year 1571 [C]. In 1576 he into a voluntary baniſhment.] The paſſage which I ſhall quote to prove this, contains a parentheſis relating to the whipping I have mentioned. Quum ante annos circiter XL (Vulcanius ſpeaks thus in a Dedication dated from Leiden the first day of the year 1595 (9). Georgius Caſſander vir doctiſſimus Brugis Flandrorum communi utriuſque noſtrûm patria publicum bonarum literarum profeſſorem agens, ut collegæ cujuſdam ſui qui ſacras ibidem literas docebat, (illius inquam furioſi Theologi, à quo poſtea cùm ſe in Seraphicam familiam dediſſet, famoſa illa Gynopygica diſciplina Cornelianæ nomen invenit) calumniis cederet, voluntarium ſibi ipſi exilium indixiſſet. i. e. " When about forty years ago " George Caſſander, a very learned man, who taught " polite literature at Bruges in Flanders, the native " place of us both, was forced to go into a voluntary " baniſhment by the calumnies of one of his collegues, " who taught Divinity in the ſame city ; I mean that " paſſionate divine, from whoſe name, after he was " entered into the order of the Franciſcans, the famous diſcipline of whipping the women was called " Cornelian."

(9) Prefixed to Nilus's treatiſe, de Primatu Papæ.

[A] He was deſcended from an antient and noble family.] When he mentions the materials he collected to write the Hiſtory of France, he does not omit the aſſiſtance he received in this reſpect from his relations. " My brother Francis de Girard, Lord du Haillan, " ſays he (1), ſent me from Bourdeaux ſeveral papers " relating to the affairs of Guienne, which had been " collected by the late Lewis de Girard our father, " and by Giles, Marc, and Richard de Girard, our " grandfather, great-grandfather, and great-great-" grandfather, the two laſt of whom had conſiderable " employments in the Bourdelois, when the city of " Bourdeaux, and the province of Guienne, ſubmitted to the King of France in the year 1451." He tells us in another place (2), that his father was a man " very curious of the antiquities of his native " country, and had been above forty five years Lieu-" tenant of the Admiralty of Guienne ; and ſince, " adds he, my brother Francis de Girard, Lord du " Haillan, has been above ten years in the ſaid Ad-" miralty under the late Kings of Navarre, Henry " and Anthony."

(1) Du Haillan, Préface de l'Hiſtoire de France.

(2) Ibid. de l'Eſtat & Succes des Affaires de France, liv. 4. folio m. 321, verſo.

[B] After he had made ſome figure . . . . as a Poet and as a Tranſlator.] In the year 1559, he publiſhed at Paris a Poem intituled L'Union des Princes par les Mariages de Philippes Roi d'Eſpagne & Madame Elizabeth de France, & encores de Philebert Emanuel Duc de Savoie, & Madame Margueritte de France (3). i. e. " The union of the Princes by the marriage of Philip " King of Spain, with Madam Elizabeth of France, " and alſo of Philibert Emanuel, Duke of Savoy, " with Madam Margaret of France." He publiſhed that ſame year, in the ſame city, another Poem intituled Le Tombeau du Roi tres-Chreſtien Henri II de ce nom. i. e. " The Tomb of the moſt Chriſtian King " Henry, the ſecond of that name ;" and a Latin work with this title ; Regum Gallorum Icones à Faramundo uſque ad Franciſcum 2. Item Ducum Lotharingorum à Carolo primo uſque ad Carolum tertium verſibus Latinis expreſſæ (4). i. e. " The characters of the Kings " of France from Pharamond to Francis II, and of " the Duke of Lorrain from Charles I to Charles III, " in Latin verſe." I may take for a tranſlation his treatiſe of the Duties of Men, in three books, which he publiſhed at Blois in the year 1560, in 8vo ; for he had extracted it from Tully's Offices. He publiſhed the ſame year at Paris (5), L'Hiſtoire Romaine d'Eutropius comprenant en dix livres tout ce qui s'eſt fait tant en paix qu'en guerre depuis le commencement de Rome juſque à l'an M. C. XIX. de la dite ville, traduite de Latin. i. e. " The Roman Hiſtory of Eutropius, in ten books " containing an account of all that paſt both in peace " and war ſince the building of Rome, to the year " 1119 of the ſame city, tranſlated out of Latin." Eight years after he publiſhed (6) Les Vies des plus grands, plus vertueux, & plus excellens Capitaines & perſonages Grecs & Barbares faictes par Æmilius Probus & traduites de Latin (7). i. e. " The lives of " the moſt eminent, moſt virtuous, and moſt excellent " Captains, and other men, both Greeks and Barba-" rians, written by Æmilius Probus (Cornelius Nepos) " tranſlated out of Latin."

(3) La Croix du Maine, pag. 31.

(4) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 117.

(5) For Frederic Morel, in 8vo.

(6) At Paris, for Peter l'Huillier, in 4to.

(7) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 116.

[C] Charles IX gave him the title of Hiſtoriographer of France in the year 1571.] He acquaints us with this himſelf in a dedication dated from Paris in the month of July 1576. For he ſpeaks thus to Henry III (8). " It is now five years, ſince the late King your bro-" ther, and yourſelf, Sir, and the Queen your mo-" ther, having ſeen my work of the ſtate and ſucceſs " of the affairs of France printed, and the two firſt " books of the Hiſtory of France not printed, " but only in manuſcript, it pleaſed the ſaid late " King, at yours and the Queen your mother's re-" queſt, to command me, and you alſo, Sir, commanded " me, to write in the French tongue, the Hiſtory of " the Kings of France your predeceſſors, which for-" merly had been but indifferently written by our " countrymen, and very careleſly or enviouſly treated " by foreigners. And that I might have the neceſ-" ſary means and courage to undertake this work, " Monſieur de Villequier, who always loved me and " my writings, and who is at preſent almoſt the only " witneſs of the long and faithful ſervices I have done " you ſince your childhood, recommended me to his " late Majeſty, and at his requeſt it pleaſed the King " your brother to give me the poſt of Hiſtoriographer " of France, and to promiſe me greater advantages " and preferments, as you alſo, Sir, aſſured me on " your part, you would make me ſenſible that my " long and faithful ſervices, and my daily labours, " ſhould be rewarded." As this paſſage may ſerve to prove a particular, which I have aſſerted in the text of this article (9), I would not omit any part of it. But that we may not come to this again, let us give here another proof of that particular, which is ſtronger ſtill. This Hiſtorian having obſerved that Henry III " always loved to hear and to ſpeak the " truth, and had given the men of letters hopes that " he would be their protector, and ſometimes would " read Hiſtories, or have them read to him (10)," adds, " This I can ſay with ſincerity, ſince I have " obſerved it in you from your very infancy, at the " time when I had the honour to come near your " perſon, to wait upon you, to hold ſuch a rank as " was not the loweſt in my ſtation, and to relate ſome-" times to you ſeveral beautiful paſſages of Hiſtory re-" lating both to the Kings your anceſtors, and other " Kingdoms and States." The paſſage which I extract from the dedication of his Etat & Succès des Affaires de France, is ſtill more to the purpoſe : " I " have learnt, Sir, ſays he to Henry III himſelf, by " the education I have received, and by the affairs " which have been communicated to me, whilſt I " was in your ſervice during twelve years before " your acceſſion to the crown, and by ſeveral affairs " which I have tranſacted, and been concerned in, " for the ſervice of the Kings your predeceſſors, and " for your own, both within the Kingdom and abroad, " how one ought to ſpeak and to write of Kings, and " of their affairs (11)." See alſo what I ſhall tranſlate in the remark [L] (12).

(8) Du Haillan, Epitre Dedicatoire de l'Hiſtoire de France.

(9) Namely that Du Haillan had been in the Duke of Anjou's ſervice.

(10) Du Haillan, Epitre Dédicat. de l'Hiſtoire de France.

(11) Du Haillan, Epitre Dedicat. de l'Etat & Succès de France à Henri III, in the edition of 1580.

Obſerve that he publiſhed at Paris in the year 1571, Hiſtorie ſommaire des Comtes & Ducs d'Anjou deſpuis Geoffroy Griſegonelle juſques à Monſeigneur Henri fils & frere de Roys de France, & Duc d'Anjou, de Bourbonnois, & d'Auvergne (13). i. e. " A ſhort Hiſtory of the " of the Counts and Dukes of Anjou, from Jeoffrey " Griſegonelle, to Monſeigneur Henry ſon and bro-" ther of Kings of France, Duke of Anjou, Bour-" bonnois and Auvergne." He publiſhed alſo the ſame year Promeſſe & Deſſein de l'Hiſtoire de France (14). i. e. " A propoſal for and ſpecimen of an Hiſtory of " France."

(12) In the paſſage in which he complains he was the only perſon, Henry III had not preferred.

(13) Du Verdier, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 116.

(14) Ibid.

he publiſhed an hiſtory which extends from Pharamond to the death of Charles VII (a). There had never been publiſhed before a complete Hiſtory of France written in the French tongue. Henry III was very well pleaſed with this work, and teſtified his ſatisfaction by the profitable and honourable favours he beſtowed on the author [D]. He had had him in his ſervice before he came to the Crown (b). The reaſons which induced du Haillan not to carry on his work farther than to the death of Charles VII are very good and weighty, and ſhew that he was well acquainted with the duty of an Hiſtorian [E]. Yet

(a) It was printed at Paris for Peter l'Huillier in folio and in 8vo, in the year 1576; it was reprinted the next year for Peter de St. Andre (at Geneva, if I am not miſtaken) in 2 vol. 8vo.

(b) See the remark [C].

" France." Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who acquaints us with this does not mention a work which Du Haillan had publiſhed in the year 1570, and which is intitled De la Fortune & Vertu de France, avec un ſommaire Diſcours ſur le Deſſein de l'Hiſtoire de France (15). i. e. " Of the condition and power of France, with a " ſummary diſcourſe upon the ſcheme of an Hiſtory of " France." He publiſhed the ſame year a book (17), which has been a thouſand times reprinted, and which he dedicated to the Duke of Anjou. Here follows what he tells his readers of it (18). " This work of " the ſtate and ſucceſs of the affairs of France, which " I preſent you with cloathed in a new dreſs, much " longer and more beautiful than what it wore before, " was born ten years ago, and was preſented you in its " birth, and given you when it was but very ſmall. " Two years after I took it from its ſtate of infancy " in which it was, and dreſſing it in a longer ha- " bit, I gave it by your command, to the late King " Charles your brother." Thus he ſpeaks in the dedication of an edition, in which his work appeared in a dreſs quite new, longer, and more beautiful and rich than it was before (19). The author reviſed it and made additions to it in the year 1594, and dedicated it to Henry IV. Zeiller aſſerts that this work is often quoted and commended, and that he has related in his 190th letter d'Aubigne's opinion of it (20). I have not ſeen that letter, but I am certain that the author commits a blunder in it. For in the Preface which Zeiller quotes (21), d'Aubigne does not paſs any judgment at all upon Du Haillan's writings; he only names him. His cenſure relates only to la Popeliniere and Thuanus. Here then is a great ſin of commiſſion of which Martin Zeiller is guilty; his ſin of omiſſion is not ſmall, for this author did not know that Du Haillan wrote the Hiſtory of France, nor was Konig better informed.

(15) La Croix du Maine, pag. 30.

(16) De l'Etat & Succès des Affaires de France.

(17) See below quotation (58).

(18) Du Haillan, Epitre Dedicat. de l'Etat & Succès des Affaires de France, à Henri III, in the edition of 1580.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Martinus Zeillerus, de Hiſt. Chronolog. &c. Part 2. pag. 71.

(21) Aubignæus præfatione in hiſtoriarum ſuarum partem primam, Idem, ibid.

[D] Henry III ... teſtified his ſatisfaction by the honourable and profitable favours he beſtowed on the author.] La Popeliniere without ſpeaking of the title of Hiſtoriographer of France, which Charles IX conferred on Du Haillan, mentions only the rewards which Henry III gave him. This omiſſion may be excuſed conſidering the difference there is between a mere title, and an employment eſtabliſhed on purpoſe with a ſalary annexed to it. Now it was ſuch an employment which Henry III conferred on Du Haillan. However it be, here follow La Popelinere's words (22). " Henry III, who holds the firſt rank " amongſt the Princes both ancient and modern, did " not only preſent the Sieur de Haillan of Bourdeaux, " one of the Secretaries of the Finances with ſeveral " ſums of money, which he gave him as a reward " for the pains he had taken in compiling the firſt " Body of his Hiſtory of France; but he alſo ho- " noured him ſince with the office of Hiſtoriographer " of France, which office he firſt eſtabliſhed for him " with a fixed ſalary of twelve hundred crowns a " year, adding to it the title of Counſellor in his " Privy-Council and Council of State, being perſuaded " to it by the Lord Chancellor Chiverny, in order " to be better inſtructed in the knowledge of the moſt " important affairs of the kingdom. Thus Henry " III was the firſt that raiſed the bare and ſimple " title of an Hiſtorian, to the dignity and honourable " title of Hiſtoriographer of France in the perſon of " Gerard Sieur du Haillan, after he had preſented " and dedicated to him his Hiſtory of France, col- " lected from the authors that wrote before him, and " being the firſt body of Hiſtory dreſſed in a French " habit." We read in the French Mercury (23), that Henry III, in order to reward du Haillan for the pains he had taken in the firſt book of his French Hiſtory honoured him with the poſt of Secretary of his Finances. I do not know what that firſt book of the French hiſtory is, for Du Haillan publiſhed his Hiſtory of France all together, nor does he aſſert in his dedication that he had already received ſome gratifications. He obſerves only (24) that Charles IX had given him the title of Hiſtoriographer, with great promiſes, and that Henry III, then Duke of Anjou, had alſo promiſed him ſome favours. I imagine that the compiler of the Mercury, feared leſt he ſhould be charged with plagiariſm, in tranſcribing la Popeliniere word for word, and that to evade this charge he tranſcribed them with ſome alteration; but he was not lucky in this particular; he changed the firſt Body of his French Hiſtory, into the firſt Book of his French Hiſtory. Theſe two phraſes are very different; the former ſignifies that Du Haillan is the firſt that publiſhed a Body of French Hiſtory; the latter, that the firſt Book of the Hiſtory of France compoſed by du Haillan was publiſhed alone before all the reſt. The Author of the Mercury ſuppoſes alſo that this firſt Book procured to du Haillan the place of Secretary of the Finances to Henry III: But la Popeliniere, from whom the Author of the Mercury tranſcribes, does not ſay this: he ſuppoſes that du Haillan was ſecretary of the Finances before he publiſhed his Hiſtory of France. It muſt be confeſſed however that his account is a little intricate; he has inſerted in it the word ſince, which perplexes the Reader, becauſe it does not well cohere with what follows. It is added in the Mercury, I. that after the Hiſtorian had been rewarded for his firſt Book, he obtained ſtill a greater recompenſe when he had dedicated his Hiſtory of France to Henry the third; for he was honoured with the Office of Counſellor, and Hiſtoriographer of France. II. That he wrote afterwards l'Etat & ſucces des Affaires de France. That is falſe, for that Book was printed before Charles IX died (25). III. That he was made Genealogiſt to the Knights of the order of the Holy Ghoſt, when that order was firſt eſtabliſhed. It might have been added that he held in Commendam an Abbey, which the celebrated Abelard had poſſeſſed (26). Obſerve, that in the firſt edition of his Hiſtory, he ſtiles himſelf only Hiſtoriographer of France; but in the following editions he is called Counſellor to the King, Secretary of his Finances and Chamber, and Hiſtoriographer of France. Obſerve alſo that he was not yet rewarded in the year 1584. You will find his complaint hereunder (27).

(22) La Popeliniere, liv. 1. de l'Hiſtoire nouvelle des François, pag. 375.

(23) Mercure François, tom. 2. pag. m. 61.

(24) See his words above quotation (8).

(25) See the words of Du Haillan's Dedication, above in quotation (18).

(26) That of Ruys in Brittany. See Francis d'Amboiſe in his Apologetical Preface to Abelard's work.

[E] The reaſons which induced him not to carry his Hiſtory farther than the Death of Charles VII. ... ſhew that he was well acquainted with the Duties of an Hiſtorian.] I mean chiefly the reflexion he made, that a man who pretends to write the Hiſtory of Kings, who died but lately, expoſes himſelf to a difficult Dilemma; for he muſt either conceal the Truth or exaſperate thoſe from whom he has the worſt to dread. The former inconvenience is inconſiſtent with the honour and conſcience of an Hiſtorian; the latter is contrary to prudence. This is one of du Hallan's reaſons with regard to thoſe Kings who reigned after Lewis XII. (28). He adds (29) a general conſideration, which is of great weight; namely, that there were already particular Hiſtories of the Reigns poſterior to Charles the Seventh's; and that according to a general opinion, it was impoſſible to come up to the writers who publiſhed ſome of thoſe Works. This conſideration ought to have a great power over an honeſt man, and celebrated Hiſtorian: he muſt ſpare his readers the vexation of buying twice the ſame thing. The reſpect he owes to the Publick requires this; it would be unjuſt in him to tranſcribe the Hiſtories which others have compoſed; it would be robbing other men of their property. His own reputation and common prudence ought to determine him to enquire for a more difficult but ſafer road to glory. To tranſcribe or new model what others have written, is a task too eaſy to be glorious, and will

(27) In the remark [L] quotation (61).

(28) See the Preface to his Hiſtoire de France.

(29) Ibid.

Yet he promiſed afterwards to Henry IV that he would continue that Hiſtory to will even draw upon a man all the Diſgrace of Plagiaries. He will paſs for a preſumptuous man, if he pretends to equal the reputation of thoſe that are thought incomparable, and he will run the risk of being always eſteemed inferiour to them, though he ſhould really excel above them. Muſt a prudent man expoſe himſelf to the ill effects of the prepoſſeſſions of the publick? Would to God that theſe Reflections made as deep an impreſſion upon all men, as they did upon du Haillan (30); our Libraries would not be filled with ſo many Books, that contain the ſame things. Let us quote here the Deſcription he makes of the inconveniencies, under which thoſe Authors labour, who pretend to write the Hiſtory of their own time. "As all the Hiſtories which mention the ſaid King "Francis I, were written in his time or in that of "King Henry, his ſon, they who wrote them expa- "patiate on the praiſes of that King, more perhaps "than he deſerved (though he was a great and "excellent Prince) or than was conſiſtent with hiſtory "and truth. Which is a defect common to thoſe who "write the hiſtory of their own time, and of the "Princes under whom they live. For who would "dare to mention the vices of his Prince, or to blame "his actions or thoſe of his Miniſters, or to relate the "intrigues, artifices and treacheries, which had been "carried on during his reign, or to aſſert that his "Prince committed ſuch or ſuch an unjuſt action, or "was guilty of fornication in ſuch a particular caſe? "Who would venture to write that ſuch a perſon fled "away in a battle, that another committed an act "of treaſon, that this man was a public robber, that "man a traitor, and another guilty of ſome other "villany? Where is the writer bold enough to write "thus? This is the reaſon why they who write the "hiſtory of their own time, being influenced by ſeve- "ral paſſions, are forced either to relate downright "falſities, if in every thing they will commend their "Prince, favour their own Nation, and blame abſo- "lutely the conduct of their enemies; or they muſt "at leaſt conceal the truth, miſrepreſent things, pal- "liate the actions of their Princes, and ſet them off "with fair words, or if they deſign to be ſincere, "they are obliged to conceal their names, and to "print their books without them. Whereas they "who write the hiſtory of former times, may avoid "this defect, if they pleaſe, and are at liberty to tell "the whole truth, and to write with all poſſible free- "dom and boldneſs (31)." Several readers will call to mind here a reflection of the Emperor Peſcennius Niger. Commend Marius, or Hannibal, or ſome other great Captain that is dead, ſaid he to an Orator who came to deliver a panegyrical diſcourſe before him, for it is ridiculous to praiſe the living, eſpecially if they be Emperors, for one either expects a reward from them, or dreads them; it is in their power to procure employments, or to put to death, or to ſend into baniſhment; for my part I deſire to be beloved in my life time, and commended after my death. Quum Imperatori facto quidam panegyricum recitare vellet, dixit ei, Scribe laudes Marii vel Annibalis, vel alicujus ducis optimi vita functi, & dic quid ille fecerit ut eum nos imitemur. Nam viventes laudare irriſio eſt, maxime imperatores, à quibus ſperatur, qui timentur, qui præſtare publice poſſunt, qui poſſunt necare, qui proſcribere: ſe autem vivum placere velle, mortuum etiam laudare (32).

(30) At leaſt for ſome years. See the following remark.

(31) Du Haillan, Preface de L'Hiſtoire de France, folio o i verſo, in the edition of 1577.

(32) Ælius Spartian. in Peſcennio Nigro, cap. 11. pag. m. 672. tom. 1.

In what caſe it may be permitted to write an hiſtory &c. already handled by others.

Let us obſerve by the by, that we ought not to make a general rule of Du Haillan's ſecond reaſon (33); for there are ſeveral caſes in which it is very juſt to write the hiſtories of the ſame reigns, of which other Hiſtorians have already given an account. This is very juſt, I. When a man has a great many new particulars to relate, or when he is able to explain or correct the other hiſtories in ſeveral paſſages. II. When he deſigns to collect into one body all the facts which relate to a certain hiſtory, ſome of which are to be met with in ſome books, and others in other books. III. When the taſte of the readers require a more modern ſtyle, and a new turn. At this time, for inſtance, moſt people would chooſe to be unacquainted with hiſtory rather than to read the authors who wrote in the fifteenth or ſixteenth Century. So that, though an Hiſtorian had nothing to relate but what had already been printed, yet he would deſerve to be commended, if he publiſhed an hiſtory, provided the ſtyle and turn of it invited the reader to peruſe it, and the public appeared to be intirely diſguſted with the other Hiſtories. Whence it is plain, that if there be ſo many books which contain the ſame things, it is not always the fault of the author; it is pretty often the fault of the readers, who will not take the pains to enquire after ſeveral hiſtorical facts ſeparately, nor read what is written in an obſolete language. It is therefore for their conveniency and for their advantage, that hiſtories are publiſhed, which contain nothing new, but in which ſeveral pieces of the other authors are connected together, and ſet off in a better ſtile. If you have diſcovered ſome new particulars, will it be ſaid, publiſh them only; why ſhould this give you an opportunity to write a large volume, in which you inſert ſo many old things? This cenſure is well grounded in ſeveral caſes, but not when thoſe new diſcoveries may have an influence over a long ſeries of events. They ought then to be interwoven with the antient accounts; the intereſt and conveniency of the reader require it. We ſhall ſee very ſoon that it was for this reaſon du Haillan changed his reſolution.

What we have been obſerving with regard to hiſtorical books, may alſo be applied to other works. It muſt be confeſſed that there are but too many, which contain only what may be found in a thouſand others; but on the other hand it would be a great prejudice to the Republic of Letters, if a man ſhould ſcruple to inſert in any work what has already been publiſhed in other works (34). A Divine of Leiden pretends it is very uſeful to publiſh ſeveral works upon the ſame ſubjects, when theſe ſubjects are important: he does even aſſert that it is a very good method to leſſen the multitude of books, which overburden the world, and make a great many perſons complain. The reaſon of this paradox is, that a conſiderable number of works upon certain ſubjects would take up the time of the public, in which caſe a great number of other books would be neglected, and go at once from the Bookſeller's ſhop to the Grocer's. Let us ſee this author's words; we ſhall meet in them with an excellent thought of St. Auguſtin. Id (ſcribendi cacoëthes) nunc his temporibus in immenſum eſt auctum, ut omnem medelam ſuperaſſe videatur, nec alio modo poſſit coerceri, quam ſi plures divulges libros; quam rationem agendi forte paradoxam aliquis dixerit, optimam tamen nemo jure negaverit. De multitudine librorum utilium immenſo numero non eſt quod jure conqueramur, qui non facile nimis augentur. Quamvis enim de rebus iiſdem ſcribunt plures, modo illæ ſint cognitu dignæ, nullum id nocumentum veritati videtur inferre, quæ ſic ad plures ſibi viam pandit, cùm lectorum alii his potius, quàm illis ſcriptoribus delectentur, quamvis de eodem argumento commentatis. Quod rectè obſervavit Auguſtinus lib. I. de Trinitate cap. 3. Neque enim omnia quæ ab omnibus conſcribuntur in omnium manus veniunt. Et fieri poteſt, ut nonnulli, qui etiam hæc noſtra intelligere valent, illos planiores non inveniant libros, & in iſtos ſaltem incidant. Ideoque utile eſt, plures à pluribus fieri diverſo ſtylo, non diverſa fide, etiam de quæſtionibus eiſdem, ut ad plurimos res ipſa perveniat, ad alios ſic, ad alios autem ſic. Quâ ratione inutiles libri ſenſim eliminantur, ut alii poſtea non ſint uſui, quàm ut piperi & thuri involvendo inſerviant (35). i. e. "That itch of writing is come "at this time to ſuch a height, that it ſeems to be "abſolutely incurable; nor can it be any ways re- "duced within bounds, except by publiſhing a great "many books: This ſome perſons will think is a "paradox, yet it cannot with any reaſon be denied "that it is the beſt method. We cannot juſtly com- "plain of the multitude of good books, which not "eaſily increaſe to an exorbitant number. For though "a great many perſons ſhould write upon the ſame "ſubjects, provided they be worthy to be known, it "will be no detriment to the truth, which thus will "make its way to a greater number of perſons, ſome "readers liking one author better than another, tho' "they write upon the ſame ſubject; as St. Auguſtin "very

(33) It is the ſecond, not indeed in his book, but in the ſubſtance I have given above of his account.

(34) See the preface to the 1ſt edition of the Penſées Diverſes ſur les Cometes.

(35) Chriſtophorus Wittichius, in Præfat. Conſenſus Veritatis ſecundæ edit. præfixa.

to his time [F], but he has not performed this promiſe. The motive for which he would continue it, is not very honourable to Philip de Commines (c). He was reſolute enough to refute ſeveral traditions, which were kept up through an indiſcreet zeal for the glory of France, and to ſpeak freely upon ſome tickliſh ſubjects; as, for inſtance, upon what relates to the Maid of Orleans [G]. This freedom was not reliſhed by weak minds,

(c) See the remark [F].

" very well obſerves, (Book I. concerning the Tri" nity, chap. 3.) All that is written by every author
" does not come into the hands of all readers. And " it may happen that they, who are capable of under-
" ſtanding what I write, will not find thoſe plainer books,
" or will meet with them only by chance. It is there-
" fore uſeful, that ſeveral books be written by divers
" authors, in a different ſtile, though containing the " ſame doctrine, even upon the ſame ſubjects, that " they may be thus communicated to a great many per-
" ſons, to ſome one way, to others another: By which " means uſeleſs books will inſenſibly come to be neg" lected, ſo that at laſt they will be good for nothing
" but to wrap up pepper and other ſpices".

[F] He promiſed to Henry IV that he would continue that Hiſtory to his time.] I ſhall prove it by the following words (36). " I have alſo wrote a work of " the Monarchy of France, which will ſoon be pre-
" ſented to your Majeſty, with an account of all the " ſecret tranſactions, and of the affairs relating to the " foundation, glory, and ſtrength of your and the " Kings your predeceſſors Kingdom. Their Hiſtory,
" which I have compoſed and carried on to the death
" of Charles VII, will ſoon be followed by that of " the ſucceeding Kings to your Majeſty's reign, after " which I ſhall alſo write your Hiſtory, if you de-
" ſire it to be publiſhed." This is what du Haillan told King Henry IV in a dedication dated in October 1594. It was then ten years ſince he had acquainted his readers with his altering his reſolution: for when he dedicated to Henry III, in 1584, the ſecond edition of his Hiſtory of France corrected and enlarged, he ſpoke to him after this manner. " Though I had " declared in my preliminary epiſtle and dedication
" to your Majeſty, and in the preface to the firſt edi" tion, that I would not go on, nor deſigned to write
" the Hiſtory of King Lewis XI, becauſe Philip de
" Commines, Sieur d'Argenton, had written it, yet
" having altered my mind ſince, I have begun it, be" ing in hopes to finiſh it next winter, if I find that
" this my labour is acceptable to your Majeſty." It is proper to ſee the reaſon why he altered his mind; for beſides that the reader will know by it what he thought of Philip de Commines, it will alſo appear that he was in one of thoſe caſes, in which it is proper to write an hiſtory which others have already publiſhed. " What made me change my mind, ſays he (37), and
" undertake the Hiſtory of King Lewis is, that the ſaid
" Sieur d'Argenton did not begin his Hiſtory called " Memoirs, but from the fifth year of this King's " reign; and all the cauſes of the wars, and other " great affairs in which the King was ingaged, are " contained within that ſpace of time from the begin" ning of his reign to the period where the ſaid Sieur
" d'Argenton began his Hiſtory, in which he has alſo
" omitted or concealed ſeveral particulars, which I
" have diſcovered, having extracted them from ſeveral
" books, memoirs, and letters compoſed concerning
" thoſe times, and from ſeveral ſecret diſcourſes writ" ten during his reign, or ſoon after his death, with" out fear, hatred, flattery, commendation and paſ-
" ſion, to which they that write the hiſtory of their " own times are very ſubject, and the two laſt of " which had a great influence on Philip de Commines
" who was prompted by his great love for his Sove-
" reign, and by his gratitude for the favours he had " received from him, or by his fear of his ſucceſſor.
" So that he ſaid nothing but what others might ſay,
" and what ſeveral Hiſtorians have ſaid of that King's " actions, vices, artifices (38), and commending him
" more than he ought to have done, he acts in ſeveral
" paſſages the part of an Orator and Panegyriſt, rather " than that of an Hiſtorian; and in his long digreſ-
" ſions upon the affairs of foreign Princes, he goes
" beyond the bounds of Hiſtory, and of an Hiſtorian."
Let us obſerve that all du Haillan's promiſes to continue the Hiſtory of France, proved vain and ineffectual. They found nothing upon this amongſt his papers after his death (39). The Bookſellers who added to his work a continuation to the year 1615 (40), and then to the year 1627 took it from Paulus Æmilius, Philip de Commines, Arnold Ferron, the Sieur du Bellay, &c.

(36) Du Haillan, Epitre Dedicat. de l'Etat & Succès des Affaires de France, in the edition of 1594.

(37) The ſame dedication of his Hiſtoire de France, in the edition of 1584.

(38) In the edition of 1576 he had added, and cruel actions.

[G] He was reſolute enough to refute ſeveral traditions... and to ſpeak freely... concerning the Maid of Orleans.] Let not the reader wonder at the length of the paſſage I am going to tranſcribe; it is inſtructive, it ſhews the true character of an Hiſtorian, and expoſes the ridiculous offence, which ſome croſs-grained perſons would take at a writer's boldneſs, who prefers truth above all things. This ill turn of the mind prevails in all ages and countries; it is of ſome uſe to ſhew how the moſt illuſtrious authors have deſpiſed and oppoſed it. Here follow du Haillan's words (41). " I would act neither the Flatterer nor the Courtier,
" but the Hiſtorian; I propoſed to ſpeak the truth,
" nor have I done like thoſe flattering painters, who
" when they deſign to draw a man or woman's pic" ture, if there happens to be ſome defect or ſome-
" thing ugly in the face they draw, omit it entirely,
" or repreſent it in a flattering manner. I have en-
" deavoured to draw the moſt deformed features as " well as the moſt beautiful; I ſpeak boldly and freely
" of every thing, and this unuſual boldneſs will no
" doubt be commended and praiſed by all ſenſible
" readers. This I have done before in my work
" of the ſtate and ſucceſs of the affairs of France,
" where I have related freely ſeveral particulars, which " none before me ever dared to publiſh, or which " they were perhaps unacquainted with; for " both in that work of the State &c. and in this,
" I have refuted ſeveral things which are generally
" believed; as for inſtance, Pharamond's coming into
" Gaul, the inſtitution of the Salique Law, which is
" aſcribed to him, the creation of the Peers of France,
" aſcribed to Charles the Great, and ſuch other par" ticulars; having been ſo bold, and yet ſincere, as to " aſſert that Pharamond never paſſed the Rhine to " enter into Gaul, and that he never made the Salique
" Law to exclude the daughters from inheriting the " Crown of this Kingdom, ſince he never came into " France. Upon which ſome perſons who meddle with " every thing, tho' they know nothing, and who imagine
" that their ill-grounded opinions are ſufficient to over-
" throw what is founded on reaſon and argument, pre-
" tended to ſay that I labour to undermine the very " grounds of our Hiſtory, becauſe I will not aſcribe the " ſaid Law to Pharamond. But, Sir, this is not the caſe, " my deſign being only to explode an ancient error;
" for my opinion is, that the Salique Law is ancient " enough and ſufficiently approved ſince it has been " obſerved as a Law from the very eſtabliſhment of " our firſt Kings, (as you may ſee at length in the " beginning of the firſt book of this Hiſtory, in the " Life of Pharamond) nor can my opinion in this " particular be of any advantage to ſtrangers, or offend
" our countrymen, except thoſe who are offended at " every thing but what they think or do themſelves.
" Some have found fault with my liberty of ſpeaking
" with regard to this particular, and with regard to " the Peers of France, and in ſome other points they " pretend that I act againſt the duty of an Hiſtorian,
" becauſe I endeavour to undeceive all the French
" in the ancient opinion they had concerning Pha-
" ramond's coming into Gaul, his making the Salique
" Law, and the creation of the Peers of France;
" they aſſert that it is a crime to explode opinions that " are inveterate, and have been written by ignorant
" men who never peruſed good books, and admit" ted by other ignorant perſons, who have nei" ther learning nor wit enough to read or to underſtand
" the approved ancient authors, but amuſe themſelves
" with old inſignificant trifles as wild and rude as " their own mind. Good Hiſtorians, Sir, ought not " to follow the opinions of the vulgar either in their " writings or in their diſcourſes, but only ſuch as " are

(39) See the Bookſeller's Advertiſement to the readers, in the editions of his Hiſtoire de France, which were publiſhed after his death. I make uſe of that which was printed at Paris in the year 1627, in 2 vol. in folio.

(40) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. des Hiſtoriens de France, pag. 55. of the edition printed in 1618, mentions only this edition, which is in two volumes in folio. Apply to this the cenſure that is paſſed upon him in a caſe like this, in the article ÆMILIUS (PAULUS) remark [C], quotation (15).

(41) Du Haillan, Epit. Dedicat. of his Hiſtoire de France, in the edition of 1584.

minds, nor by thoſe who pretend that every thing muſt be made ſubſervient to political views. I do not know whether he was in the right to publiſh ſome particulars which he knew only by hearſay [H]. He was very much criticized, and he ſhewed how it vexed him, by his haughty anſwers to his cenſurers [I]. Their cenſures were not always ill-grounded,

" are true and ſupported by the teſtimony of credible " authors, or by plauſible conjectures and arguments, " a number of which being duly weighed may a- " mount to a certain and ſure proof, when through " the length of time we are deprived of direct proofs. " I would not therefore, Sir, in theſe things nor in " any other, follow the common opinion, but only " that which is true. Whereby I imagine that I " have very much improved the Hiſtory of France, " having cleared it from a great many falſe and fabulous " ſtories, which rendered it diſagreeable, and ſome- " times inconſiſtent with it ſelf, and thus delivered the " reader from his doubts and uncertainties in ſeveral " particulars, the clearing up of which he could no " where meet with. All which I am perſuaded will have " the approbation of men of ſenſe, whom alone I " endeavour to pleaſe, and not thoſe who diſlike both " my opinions and my writings." If you have a mind to know what he ſaid of the Maid of Orleans, read the following paſſage (42). The miracle of this Maid, whether it was forged on purpoſe and artfully, or really true, raiſed the courage of the Lords, the people and the King, who were all quite diſheartened; ſuch is the power of Religion, and often alſo of ſuperſtition. For ſome aſſert that this Jane was the miſtreſs of John ſurnamed the Baſtard of Orleans, others of the Sieur de Baudricourt, and others of Poihon, who being cunning and prudent, and ſeeing the King ſo diſcouraged, that he did not know what courſe to take, and the people ſo much weakened by continual wars, that nothing could raiſe their ſpirits and revive their hopes, imagined this ſuppoſed miracle, grounded on ſuperſtition, which is the moſt proper thing in the world to encourage men, and make even the moſt ſimple believe what is not: the people were very well diſpoſed to ſwallow ſuch a ſuperſtition. Thoſe who imagine that this was a virgin ſent by God are not damned for their belief, no more than thoſe are who do not believe it. Several perſons think that this laſt aſſertion is a downright hereſy; but I have no mind to be miſtaken by admitting either ſide of the queſtion. However it be, during ſome days theſe Lords taught her how to anſwer the queſtions which the King and they themſelves in his preſence would propoſe to her, (for they were to examine her themſelves) and that ſhe might know the King, when ſhe ſhould be introduced to him (for ſhe had never ſeen him) they ſhewed her his picture every day ſeveral times. The day being come, on which ſhe was to be introduced into the King's chamber, thoſe who had deviſed this whole artifice, did not fail being there. When ſhe was come in, the firſt that aſked her what ſhe wanted were the Baſtard of Orleans, and Baudricourt. They aſked her what her requeſt was; ſhe anſwered that ſhe deſired to ſpeak with the King. They ſhewed her one of the other Lords who were there, telling her he was the King; but ſhe, knowing beforehand what was to be ſaid and done, and being taught what ſhe was to ſay and do, replied, it was not the King, but that he was hid in the bed-ſide (as he really was) and going to meet him, ſhe told him what has been related above. This religious artifice had ſuch an happy ſucceſs for the whole Kingdom, that it raiſed the courage of all the people, which out of deſpair they had loſt. She was at laſt taken by the Engliſh before Compiegne, and carried to Roan, where having been tryed ſhe was burnt. Some have taken it ill, and others will be offended that I ſhould endeavour to undeceive our Frenchmen, who have ſo long looked upon this ſtory as ſomething ſacred and miraculous, and that I ſhould at this time repreſent it as a mere artifice. But this I was determined to do, becauſe time, which brings every thing to light, has diſcovered this: and after all, it is not ſuch an important ſtory that one ought to believe it as an article of faith.

(42) Du Haillan, in the 2d book de l'Etat & Succès des Affaires de France, pag. 138, &c. of the Paris edition 1619. OBSERVE, that Gabriel Naude is of the ſame opinion; The Engliſh, ſays he, in the 3d chapter of the Coups d'Etat, pag. m. 328. having made themſelves maſters of almoſt all France, it was neceſſary, under Charles VII to have recourſe to ſome political ſtratagem, to drive them back; the French therefore made uſe of Jane the Maiden's artifice, which is confeſſed to have been but an artifice, by Juſtus Lipſius in his politics, and by ſome other foreign Hiſtorians; but particularly by two of our Nation, namely, by Du Bellay Langey in his Art Militaire, and by Du Haillan in his Hiſtory, not to mention a great many other leſs conſiderable writers.

(43) For July 1686, Article 9. pag. 825.

(44) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XI, liv. 10. pag. 328. of the Dutch edition.

[H] He publiſhed ſome particulars which he knew only by hearſay.] It was upon ſuch a foundation that he publiſhed Charles VIII was a ſuppoſititious child. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (43). Varillas refutes this ſtory (44),

[I] He ſhewed how it vexed him to be criticized, by his haughty anſwer to his cenſurers.] As the works he had publiſhed before his Hiſtory of France had been criticized, he did not doubt but this Hiſtory would meet with the ſame fate. This was the reaſon why he put on a bold countenance beforehand; he printed on the backſide of the title-page a ſonnet which ſavours a little of the bully. Here follow the ſix laſt verſes of it.

Mille & mille ignorans, ſuperbes envieux,
Mesdiſans, eſtourdis, vains, & preſumptueux,
Te voudront attaquer une indigne querelle.
Mais ne crains tout cela, ains paſſe hardiment,
Car leur preſumption, ny leur ſot jugement,
Ne pourront empeſcher ta carriere immortelle.

That is,

" Thouſands and thouſands, ignorant, proud, envious, " ſlanderous, raſh, vain, and preſumptuous men, will " pick up an unworthy quarrel with you; but never " mind them, go on boldly, for neither their " preſumption nor their ſilly judgment will be able " to ſtop you in your courſe to immortality."

In the very beginning of his Preface he makes this obſervation. " If the Hiſtory of France is not ac- " ceptable to all, as I very well know it will not " be liked by the nice, the ignorant, and the envious, " whom I do not care to pleaſe, who will paſs their " ſilly, ignorant, and envious judgment upon it, I am " perſuaded it will pleaſe thoſe amongſt you, who " labouring themſelves, know how to ſet a juſt value " upon the labours of others, whoſe judgment is " free from paſſion, and who civilly excuſe the miſ- " takes and overſights, that may eſcape an author " through the courſe of ſuch a conſiderable work." The latter part of this paſſage is remarkable, and in ſome reſpects very true. There are no readers more eager in criticizing, nor more raſh and unjuſt in their cenſures, then they who write nothing. An author has more reaſon to expect ſome regard and ſome juſtice from authors than from other perſons, who do not know by their own experience the difficulties of the trade, provided however that jealouſy be out of the caſe, as it ſometimes is; for authors do not always follow the ſame path; the reputation of ſome is not always of the ſame kind with that of others. In this caſe it is better to be judged by a laborious author than by idle readers: in the other caſe the latter are more equitable. But let us return to du Haillan. He ſpeaks thus towards the end of his Preface. " In the mean " time I ſhall obſerve my enemies and my ſlanderers, " who envy and hate my labours, and will fling the " darts of their malice againſt me and my works. " For I can truly ſay, readers, that neither for my " actions nor for my writings I ever was hated or " envied, but by the ignorant, by the wicked, and by " thoſe, whoſe name, health and reputation are tainted " with ſome vice." The ſtorms of cenſures, which he had foreſeen, did really happen (45). Here follows what he obſerves in the Dedication (46), prefixed to the ſecond edition (47). " This work . . . was no ſooner " born, but it was barked at, and bit through the envy " and ſlanders of perſons of all ranks and conditions; " ſome being openly my enemies, and others my pre- " tended friends. There were even ſome who carried " it fair, as in all their actions they uſed to do, and " who deſigning to obtain your favour (which they " coveted very much) by fraudulent and indirect " means, pretended to buy it by their impoſtures and " calumnies, to the detriment of my reputation and " of that of my hiſtory, in which they blamed even " before you, Sir, thoſe very things, for which it will be " the moſt accepted and commended by poſterity, I mean, " my aſſerting nothing but the truth, and ſpeaking it " boldly." He ſhews ſtill more paſſion and haughtineſs in the cloſe of his Preface. " They, ſays he, " having recourſe to their uſual malice, are amongſt " them, that pretended to attack me; but I am de- " termined to behold their ignorance with ſo little " concern, that I ſhall only laugh at it, covering my " ſelf with the veil of truth, and with the good will

WHETHER it be better to be judged by an author, or by other perſons.

(45) In all the paſſages, where mentioning his cenſurers he made uſe of the future tenſe in the 1ſt edition, he makes uſe of the preter tenſe in the 2d.

(46) To Henry III.

(47) That of the year 1584.

grounded, as I ſhall ſhew by a paſſage from the Sieur Sorel [K]. The manner in which he

" of thoſe amongſt you, my readers, who have read " and will read my work with judgment, and who " have taken and will take it well. For it is wrote " for you, and not for the envious, ignorant, and ma- " licious, who do not underſtand what is good, and " are not capable to judge or to eſteem what de- " ſerves to be commended." Amongſt the obſerva- tions he made againſt his cenſurers, I have met with one which deſerves to be conſidered. " If I happen " to ſpeak of ſome men whoſe names the too nice " reader will ſay was not worth being mentioned, I " ſhall anſwer, that I judged otherwiſe, and I imagine " that I have ſome judgment as well as the reader, and, " let him be who he will, I know better what I " write, than he is capable to judge of my writings (48). This is what ſeveral other authors may and ought to repreſent to thoſe that criticize them. A man who has been ſeveral years about a certain kind of work, knows much better than any other what are the properties of it. He will not, perhaps, have ſuch a good taſte nor ſo much judgment as another, generally ſpeaking, but ſince he has made a particular ſtudy of ſome ſubjects, and exerciſed himſelf about them with great application, we ought to think that he is better acquainted with their nature, and knows better what ornaments become them, than thoſe who have not made it their particular ſtudy. We ought not therefore to imagine that ſome authors act imprudently, when on ſeveral occaſions they prefer their own knowledge before that of their friends or of their enemies, though otherwiſe more able and learned than themſelves. A writer, though generally ſpeaking leſs learned than ſome of his readers, may have more extended deſigns, with regard to the ſubject he treats, than they are aware of; and whilſt they do not know whether he had ſome particular reaſons to relate ſuch or ſuch a thing, he is ſenſible within himſelf that ſeveral reaſonable motives grounded on the very character of his work, induced him to relate thoſe things. Hence come an infinite number of ill grounded cenſures; hence it follows alſo, that a man ought to ſtudy the rules according to which a work is framed, before he ventures to give his opinion whether the work be good or bad. As for inſtance, in order to paſs a right judgment upon this commented Hiſtory, which I ſtyle an Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary, one ought to have ſtudied the rights and privileges of an Hiſtorian, who is at the ſame time a commentator; and hereupon I might ſay, like du Haillan, I know better what I write, than ſuch an one is capable to judge of my writings. I have ſtudied the nature and character of compilations; if every part of them was liked by all ſorts of perſons, they would not be good. They, who are not acquainted with the character of ſuch a work, would meet with nothing in it but what ſuits their particular taſte.

(48) Du Haillan, Preface de L'Hiſtoire de France, pag m. 18. I make uſe of the edition of 1577, in 8vo.

WHY authors ought ſometimes to prefer their own knowledge before that of others.

Let us quote two paſſages more from du Haillan, in which we ſhall ſee that he was criticiſed upon, and that he was very angry upon that account. " My " works, Sir, ... could not eſcape the barkings and " bitings of envy and calumny, of ſlanderers and " calumniators; by whoſe ſtings not only my writings " have been wounded, but even my fortune has been " hurt, ulcerated, and croſſed. It ſeems that ſome " rays of virtue and capacity, which my enemies ob- " ſerve in me, offend the eyes of their ignorance and " wickedneſs, and that my light is unſufferable to " them. Even before your face, Sir, have I been " calumniated, and ſo ill uſed, that it was not my " enemy's fault, that I was not abſolutely deprived " of your favour and protection, in which alone I al- " ways placed all my hopes, and ſowed the ſeeds of " my moſt humble and devoted ſervitude; but your " goodneſs and ſound judgment, Sir, diſcovered their " impoſture, and delivered me from the fear of the " evil they deſigned me (49)." This is what he told Henry III in the dedication of a new edition of one of his works. In the preface of the ſame book he thunders and ſtorms againſt the ſame Critics; I have extracted the following paſſage from it. " There are " indeed fantaſtical men, the number of which is ex- " orbitant, who are uſed to blame and revile every " thing, becauſe through the catarrh of ignorance " and preſumption, they have loſt their taſte; theſe " would by no means approve my work. Some of " them are your ordinary courtiers; others belong to " the Bar; and others to the Univerſity. Some are " your young Maſters of Arts, lately come from the " Univerſity, with three ſtripes of Latin upon their " gown, and a badge of honour which they bought; " who turning over all ſorts of books, pretend to " deſpiſe them and throw them aſide, if they meet " but with one letter ill printed, or if they do not find " in them, what they do not know how to look for. " Others are profeſſed writers, who being ſwelled and " big with books, bring one forth every week, and " fill the Bookſeller's ſhops with their productions; " they ſpeak boldly of every one, deſpiſe the works " of others, and approve none but their own. Some " of this laſt kind of men are like apes: for if they " ſee another publiſh a work, they immediately " bring forth another, a mere abortive, to which " they give very near the ſame title. All theſe ſorts " of people have attacked me, pinched me, and " barked at me; but yet they could not bite me, nor " have they done the leaſt prejudice to this preſent " work, nor to my Hiſtory of France; they have done " only what a dead coal does, which blackens with- " out being able to burn; for notwithſtanding their " envy, cavils, ill-humour, ſlanders, and preſumpti- " ons, my works have been diſperſed through the " world, gained a great reputation, and been tranſlat- " ed into ſeveral languages. . . As for theſe courtiers, " who ſpoke ill of my works, and endeavoured to " render them odious, they are men, who are uſed to " rob other people of their reputation, when they find " no means to rob them of other things (50)."

(49) Du Haillan, Epitre Dedicatoire de L'Etat & Succès des Affaires de France, in the edition of 1580.

(50) Idem, in the Preface of the ſame book, and the ſame edition.

[K] Their cenſures were not always ill grounded, as I ſhall ſhew by a paſſage from the Sieur Sorel.] It contains a reaſonable cenſure of ſome of du Haillan's defects, and alſo ſome ſhort elogies. " He endeavoured to imitate " the elegancy of the beſt Hiſtorians, but in order to " have leſs trouble, he has tranſlated all Paulus Æmi- " lius's orations almoſt word for word, and he has " alſo followed him in his narrations. It is true that " he has added to them a great many curious remarks, " which he has extracted from other writings. He " may be blamed for beginning his hiſtory with a fa- " bulous ſtory, which is intirely of his own invention: " He ſuppoſes that Pharamond held a Council with his " moſt faithful Counſellors, in which it was examin- " ed whether that Prince, being very powerful, ought " to bring the French under an ariſtocratical, or mo- " narchical government; and he makes every Coun- " ſellor deliver an oration to ſupport his opinion. You " ſee there the names of Charamond and Quadreck, " who are imaginary perſons. This is a very ſur- " priſing thing, conſidering it is ſo little certain " whether there ever was ſuch a man as Pharamond; " and though we ſhould know that he really exiſted, " yet it is a very great boldneſs to relate things that " are abſolutely groundleſs. Du Haillan is cenſured " for it by the Sieur Dupleix, who reproaches him " that he borrowed his orations from Amadis de Gaule *: " But that romance does not contain ſuch political " diſcourſes. We may ſuppoſe that Dupleix quoted " it only with a deſign to give the reader to underſtand " that du Haillan invented thoſe diſcourſes, as if " he deſigned to write a kind of romance. It is " true that if they are not to be met with in the " Amadis, they are found in a great many other " books. Theſe are common topics, which you may " read in moſt of the books, which treat of ſo thread- " bare a ſubject as the different forms of government. " Du Haillan is alſo charged on the other hand, with " ſpeaking a little too freely of ſome miniſters; but " he did it perhaps to ſhew that he was a loyal ſub- " ject of our Kings, and with a deſign to ſupport their " authority. Notwithſtanding all this, his writings " are more judicious, and more methodical than thoſe " that were written before; his hiſtory acquaints us " with a great many particulars relating to the French " government, which he underſtood pretty well, as " appears alſo by his book intitled, de l'Eſtat & Succez des Affaires de France. Laſtly, he is to be com- " mended for being the firſt that undertook to ſet our " Hiſtory in a beautiful and agreeable form, which " he has done according to the knowledge and learn- " ing men had in his time (51)."

* An antient romantic ſtory.

(51) Sorel, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. m. 373, 374.

he ſpeaks of himſelf is a proof that he was not ſufficiently free from ſelf-intereſt both with regard to glory and to riches. He makes too great a ſhew of his labours, and boaſts too much of the ſucceſs of his books, their ſeveral editions, tranſlations, &c. and declares too openly that he pretended to be rewarded [L]. I cannot tell whether we ought [L] He makes too great a ſhew of his labours, and boaſts too much of the ſucceſs of his books . . . and declares too openly that he pretended to be rewarded.] Let us begin with the words we find in his dedication of the Hiſtory of France (52). " Since that time (53) till the " year 1576 when this hiſtory was firſt printed, I " laboured about it night and day, toiling and ſweating " to the detriment of my health, and leſſening of my " days; with great application of mind, and ſpending large ſums of money in procuring books, deeds, " memoirs, records and other ancient monuments " which were neceſſary for the drawing up of ſo " great a work. I have neglected my own private affairs, and taken no pains to obtain any preferment " at a time when every one endeavoured in my ſight " to obtain ſome poſt or office, and more than in any " other age ſtudied to get money, to grow rich, and " to receive gifts and favours of your Majeſty, rather " than to read or write books. This I have done that " I might apply myſelf entirely and abſolutely to the " compleating of this work, which I have at laſt " finiſhed after four years ſpent in drawing it up; after " a great many days paſt in ſtudying, in ſolitude, in a " cloſe application and vexation of ſpirit, in Lucubrations, ſpending half the night, and often the whole " night, in reading, conſulting, comparing, and reconciling of ſeveral Latin, French, and Italian " books, both antient and modern, and peruſing a " large number of records, papers, old titles, old " duſty ſheets, and all ſorts of antient writings. This, " Sir, has coſt me ſo much pains, that if, when I undertook this work, I had known or even thought " that it required that labour and trouble I have " taken about it, I would have deſired your Majeſty " to excuſe me, and neither any gift, nor promiſe, nor " the deſire or hope of reputation, glory or profit could " have induced me to undertake it." He ſhews afterwards at length the defects of the Hiſtorians (54) he was obliged to conſult; then he adds. " Sir, I got " thro' all theſe intricacies, diverſities, prolixities and " labyrinths, and have compoſed the Hiſtory of " France and of your predeceſſors in the beſt manner " I could. I have not been able to write it ſo well as " it deſerves, I could not make it perfect, nor will I " blame the dead or their works in order to extol " and commend mine. I ſhall only obſerve without " preſumption and boaſting, that I have done what " had never been done by any other, nor ſeen yet " by our Frenchmen, I have given the Hiſtory of " France ſuch a dreſs, as it had never appeared in before. . . . . There will be ſome authors who will " write the Hiſtory of France as well and even better " than I have done, and others worſe. But if I do " not obtain the higheſt rank amongſt them, yet I " hope I ſhall never be placed in the loweſt. I have " found means to draw the ſubſtance of thoſe great " bulks of ancient Hiſtories, I have reduced their " exceſs, ſuperfluity, and exceſſive length to ſuch " things as are only neceſſary and not ſuperfluous. " And beſides as I would not truſt only to our Hiſtories " and Chronicles, I have extracted from foreign Hiſtories, from the records of the courts of Parliament, " and of the Chambers of Accounts, from the Charters of Churches, and from ſome books which my " friends lent me, all that I thought could any ways " ſerve my purpoſe. My only deſign was truth, " which is the eye of Hiſtory, &c." He repeats a great part of all this in his preface. " I have been " five years about it, ſays he, I have ſpent ſeveral " whole days and half nights in writing it, a great " many lucubrations, a deep ſtudy, and great cares " have been employed, ſeveral books, charters, records, old writings, and ancient papers have been " read, peruſed, and turned over and over. I have " had ſeveral books in Latin, French, and Italian, " treating of the Hiſtories of France, England, Germany, Italy, Spain, Flanders, Scotland, Britany, " Anjou, Berri, and Aquitain, and of the holy wars " in Aſia, and in Europe; of the lives of the Popes " and Emperors, and numberleſs others, and alſo " an infinite number of records and other ancient memorials. I have extracted the quinteſſence of all " this; I have diſtilled it in the alembic of my judgment and labour, and in this my work I preſent you " with the ſubſtance of it."

If you have a mind to know what he relates of the ſucceſs of his work, read what follows (55). " My " Hiſtory, which got the better of their envy, and of " that of all thoſe that ſpoke ill of it, will live as " long as the French language will ſubſiſt and be in " uſe in your Kingdom. Since it was firſt publiſhed " it has been often reprinted both in your ſaid King" dom, and abroad, in ſeveral forms and letters, " and has been tranſlated into Latin by Peter Boulanger (56), teacher of the youth in the College of " Loudun, a man of good morals and great learning; " and who in his Latin writings expreſſes as well as " any man in Europe, the elegance and politeneſs " of Tully's ſtyle. But, Sir, as I have again improved and enlarged my Hiſtory, having added in " ſome places two or three ſheets, and fewer in others, " he waits for this edition, to add to his Latin tranſlation, what I have added in the original. So that " both your ſubjects, Sir, and the foreigners, will ſoon " ſee this Hiſtory in Latin." Add to this the beginning of his preface (57). " I wiſh that my Hiſtory " of France may be as acceptable to you, as I took " pains and care to labour it. My wiſh has not been " intirely diſappointed, for it has been ſo well liked " by men of judgment, that ſince that time it has been " often reprinted, and in ſeveral forms, both within " this Kingdom and abroad; and read over and over " again by all the learned men in France, and by ſeveral foreigners. . . . . Now, readers, when I found " that my work ſucceeded ſo well, and was ſo well " received both by foreigners, and by my countrymen, that it was ſo often reprinted, and that " there was ſo great a demand for it, I have corrected " it, made ſeveral additions to it through the whole, " and adorned it with a great many curious obſervations." In his dedication to his work de l'Eſtat & Affaires de France to Henry III in the year 1580, he has the following words (58). " I am the firſt, " Sir, amongſt the French, who wrote an Hiſtory of " France, and in my beautiful works I have ſet off " the glory of our Kings; for, before me, they were " mentioned only in an heap of old duſty Chronicles. " My works are peruſed and read through all Chriſtendom, and tranſlated into ſeveral languages; and " there is in your Kingdom a very learned man, who " has tranſlated my Hiſtory of France into Latin; it " will ſoon be publiſhed and preſented to your Majeſty, dreſſed in a Latin robe. I am none of thoſe " bold and ignorant writers, who bring forth ſome " books every day, and whoſe writings become large " foreſts; who in their dark cloſets, where they cannot ſee the light of public affairs, ſpeak and write " boldly, right or wrong, of the State affairs of this " time, and of the moſt ſecret and important tranſactions of your Councils; who pretend to judge of " every thing, and are prepoſſeſſed for the one, and " againſt the other, who commend thoſe that give " them money, repreſent a great Captain and a General as a black-guard, and live only upon the ſale " of their preſumptuous works. And indeed ſuch " writers will ſee their works die before their eyes, " and will with diſgrace attend their funeral. I have " learnt, Sir (59)," . . . . Let us ſee the beginning of the preface of the ſame book. " Several of you, " readers, who will ſee this preſent work, which I " have again reviſed, and greatly enlarged and improved, may have ſeen it already, printed in ſeveral forms and letters, ſince the firſt edition publiſhed " in the year 1570. For ſince that time it was every " year reprinted (60), having been approved by thoſe " who read it, and who have a taſte for what is good."

When

(52) Du Haillan, Epit. Dedicat. of the edition of 1584.

(53) That is to ſay, ſince the King commanded him in the year 1571 to write the Hiſtory of France.

(54) He ſhews thoſe defects alſo in his preface.

(55) Du Haillan, Epit. Dedicat. de l'Hiſtoire de France, in the edition of 1584.

(56) See his Elogie in Ste Marthe lib. 1. pag. m. 44. where this Tranſlation is mentioned; he was the father of Julius Cæſar Bullengerus.

(57) Du Haillan, in the preface to the ſame edition.

(58) Idem, Epit. Dedicat. of the Eſtat & Affaires de France. In the edition of 1580, he had already ſaid, " I have " given a full " account of all " theſe particulars in my " large work of " the Hiſtory of " France, which " I have dedicated to you, " Sir, and which " is diſperſed over all Chriſtendom."

(59) You will find the following part of this paſſage above, remark [C], quotation (11).

(60) A little lower he ſpeaks thus. " I ſhall " obſerve to you, " that as the " Printer, who " for ten years " has reprinted " it every year, " would reprint " it again...". Obſerve that this preface was wrote in the year 1580.

ought to believe that he threatened to laſh thoſe with his iron pen, who would not acknowledge his great labours (d), and that he thought that pen as proper to diſgrace them, as he pretended his golden pen was capable to immortalize the merit of his benefactors. He died at Paris November the 23d 1610, in the ſeventy ſixth year of his age, and was buried at St. Euſtache's (e). We muſt not forget to obſerve that he had attended Francis de Noailles Biſhop of Acqs in his Embaſſy to England, and in that to Venice (f). You have met in the remarks with ſeveral paſſages extracted from his dedications and from his prefaces. They will be diſliked by thoſe who are ſatisfied with a ſuperficial account of illuſtrious men, but not by them who deſire to know them exactly; and, as the Latins ſay, intus ac in cute, that is, inwardly. It is for theſe I labour, and I am perſuaded that they will be obliged to me for the pains I take in drawing the character of the heart, according to the ſtrokes I meet with in the books, in which the authors have drawn their own picture. Let this be obſerved once for all. Du Haillan's character would give us room to make ſo many reflections, that I imagine none of my readers will take it amiſs that I ſhould make a few [M]. It will give me an opportunity

(d) See the remark [L] towards the end.

(e) Mercure François, tom. 2. pag. m. 61.

(f) Du Haillan, Preface de l'Hiſtoire de France.

When he dedicated this ſame book to Henry IV in the year 1594, he ſpoke thus to the Prince. "It has "been diſperſed through the world, and has been "well received both within your Kingdom and abroad, "and foreigners have turned it into their own language."

As to what relates to his claiming a reward, you may have obſerved it clearly enough in the paſſages, which I have already tranſcribed; but you will ſee it more plainly ſtill in the following paſſage (61). "I have "compoſed this work in four winters, which is a proper ſeaſon to write and to ſtudy, and have employed "but few days of the ſummer in it; for it ſeems to me "that a man can much leſs ſupport the labour of "writing and ſtudying in the ſummer, than in the ſhort "and cold days of the winter, during which I have "drawn up this work. Yet I fear leſt it proves vain "and ineffectual, unleſs the Sun of your Majeſty's "good-will give it ſome heat by your favours and liberalities. There is no man of Letters in your Kingdom "who excells in any Science, or has performed any "conſiderable work, but has received ſome benefaction "from you, and all your ancient Servants are preferred to honours and dignities, and abound with "Riches by your kindneſs and gifts. I am the firſt "who wrote the Hiſtory of the Kings your Anceſtors, and perhaps the only perſon who diſpoſed it in a "beautiful order, and put it in a proper language; and "amongſt your Servants I am one of the firſt and of "the moſt antient, and yet I am the only one and "the laſt unprovided, though none of the loweſt in "merit. I have worked, and do uſually work for the "publick, more than for myſelf; and I have not only "been buſy in writing Books, but I have alſo been "ſometimes employed in Journeys into foreign "Countries; and in the ſeveral Affairs in which I "have been employed for twenty-nine years (62) that "I have been a Courtier, I have learnt how Hiſtories "muſt be compoſed, and how one ought to ſpeak of "Kings, and to treat and write of State Affairs." This is the ſtyle of a diſcontented Author, who complains that he was not made rich, nor raiſed to honours and dignities by the productions of his Pen, and who asks that the reward of his labours ſo long expected and ſo well deſerved, may at laſt be granted him. The ſame Complaint is to be met with at the end of a Preface which he publiſhed in the year 1580. I have taken all that pains, ſays he (63), for the ſake of the publick, to whom I imagine my labours have been and are ſtill of ſome advantage, with which I am extreamly pleaſed, for it is with that deſign I laboured. And indeed it is almoſt the only reward I have had for my pains, and I ſhall be very well contented, if I can know that my laſt work is acceptable to you.

(61) Du Haillan, Epitre Dedicatoire de l'Hiſtoire de France, in the edition of 1584.

(62) His dedication is dated Auguſt 1, 1584.

(63) Du Haillan, Préface de l'Eſtat & Succès des Affaires de France, in the edition of 1580.

The Reader may think what he pleaſes of what I ſhall now relate; I quote my Voucher (64). Henry the "Great ... made once a ſmart anſwer to the Sieur du "Haillan ... For as du Haillan a man ... proud .... "and given to his Belly ... was ſpeaking one day too "freely to the late King, complaining of the ſmall "ſalary he received from his generoſity, he happened to tell his Majeſty; you know, Sir, that I "have two Pens being a publick Hiſtorian, which "Title your Majeſty was pleaſed to honour me with; "the one is made of Gold, and the other of Iron; "with my golden Pen I immortalize thoſe, who do me "ſome favour, and honour me, and with my Iron "Pen I caſt a blemiſh upon the Reputation of thoſe "who do not acknowledge the merit of my works. "The King who knew the temper of the Man, and "that he loved a napkin about his Neck rather than "a Cuiraſs about his Breaſt, anſwered him with an "admirable and royal ſprightlineſs, Monſieur Du "Haillan, I do not believe that you have a "Golden Pen, for you would long ago have ſold it to "feed your Belly."

(64) Garaſſe, Recherches des Recherches, pag. 941, 942.

[M] Du Haillan's Character would afford us matter for ſo many Reflections, that I imagine none of my Readers will take it amiſs, if I ſhould make a few.] It is impoſſible to leave this ſubject without making ſome reflections upon it. If a Perſon ſhould aſk whether thoſe who have publick employments are as mercenary as the Servants of a private man, the Queſtion would at firſt ſight ſeem to be abſurd; but after an exact examination it would appear a proper ſubject to be argued upon on both ſides, and one would even chooſe to aſſert the affirmative ſide of the Queſtion. Conſider the accounts of News-writers, both printed and not printed, and the Converſations of Perſons that lived a long while amongſt the Great; conſult the Hiſtorians who give the moſt particular accounts of things, read eſpecially them that publiſh memoirs. If you will duly weigh all this, I do not doubt but you will confeſs, that a poor Footman is proportionably leſs mercenary and more generous than moſt of the perſons who enjoy conſiderable employments, either at Court or in the State. They are perſons who are very ſeldom ſatisfied, they are always ready to ask for new Dignities and a larger ſalary, to complain that the reward they received is but indifferent, to make a great ſhew of their Services, to murmur if they be neglected whilſt others are preferred, to diſcover their diſcontent by their raſh and haughty proceedings, &c. Theſe Gentlemen imagine that it is ſo much the more lawful for them to claim the moſt noble reward, that they perſuade themſelves that their Maſter, a King, a Sovereign Prince, the whole publick in a word, will not come to want, though they be like a very thirſty blood ſucker ſticking cloſe to the skin, and ſucking ſtoutly (65). Let it not be objected to me that ſuch or ſuch ruined themſelves in their Prince's Service, and that the whole eſtate, and the very Houſes of ſuch a Lord are ordered to be ſold. Theſe are not inſtances of generoſity. The love of their Country is not the cauſe of the poverty to which they are reduced; it is owing to their mercenary diſpoſition, or their luxury and exceſſes. They imagined that if they appeared at Court or in the Army with a ſtately equipage, which after all is not in the leaſt uſeful for the good of the public, they would eaſier obtain the rewards they aimed at; and if at laſt they ruined themſelves, it was not for the advantage of the State, but only to ſatisfy their own pride, and other private paſſions. An Ariſtides, a Fabricius, who after they had been raiſed to the higheſt Poſts, and lived continually with a wonderful Frugality, left very little or nothing to their children, are very good inſtances of minds free from all mercenary diſpoſitions; but where are ſuch men to be met with?

A Reflection upon the mercenary diſpoſition of thoſe who ſerve the Public.

The worſt is, that even the men of Letters cannot keep themſelves free from this common diſtemper. The Court and the Army being Schools of ambition and luxury, and conſequently of an inſatiable deſire of riches, we ought to wonder that men ſhould learn there not opportunity to commend Des Cartes's modeſty.

(65) Nec miſſura cutem niſi plena cruoris hirudo. Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. ult. i. e. "Like leeches, "ſucking ſtill, "till full of "blood." Creech.

HAKLUYT

not to do any thing for nothing, but to require great rewards for their ſervices. And as this is a paſſion which is not eaſily gratified, unleſs a man boaſts very much of what he has done, and complains loudly that he has not yet been rewarded according to his merit, we ought not to be ſo much offended at this conduct. But it will always be reaſonable to lament, that the ſtudy and profeſſion of the Belles Lettres ſhould not have produced in Du Haillan's heart, a wiſdom ſufficient to prevent him from making ſuch a ſhew of his labours, and from complaining of the ſmallneſs of his fortune. If he was the only Author that acted thus we ſhould have no occaſion to mind it much; the worſt is that he imitated in this a great number of writers, and an hundred more have followed, and do ſtill follow his example. It is this that does the Muſes a very great injury, it is this that robs them of the glory they would enjoy of inſpiring their Votaries with a true generoſity, and a noble contempt for riches, and publick rewards. They are like other men, ſay ſome, they are not leſs inclined than others to ambition and covetouſneſs, the two epidemical diſtempers of the heart of man. It is certain, that the deſire of living comfortably by the means of a large income, is not the only reaſon of the boaſtings and complaints of du Haillan and of thoſe that are like him; their conduct is in a great meaſure owing to their pride. They imagine that the publick will have a very great eſteem both for their works and for their perſons, if it be known that they received large Penſions (66). They are very much miſtaken in this. I own that ſome particular perſons ſuffer themſelves to be deceived by ſuch appearances, and reaſon thus ſophiſtically; ſuch an Author has been raiſed to great employments, he rides in his Coach, he muſt be therefore a man of a great merit, and his works muſt be good. But the publick ſeldom falls into this ſnare, or however ſuch a blindneſs is not laſting. Poſterity judges of Books by the Books themſelves; if they be good, they will not be deſpiſed, though it were aſſerted in the beginning of the preface that the Author was ſtarved with hunger. If the Book be bad it will be deſpiſed, though the firſt pages ſhould acquaint the reader, that the Author was an Earl, or a Marquis, and that he left a Million behind him. What are you afraid of? Why do you put yourſelf to ſo much trouble? Could one have asked du Haillan; you may declare, indeed, that you ſpared neither care nor pains to make your work good, it was your duty to labour and fatigue yourſelf much, and it is a civility to the publick, to give an account in a preface of what one has done to deſerve the reader's approbation. You ought to have ſtopped here, without repreſenting the greatneſs and merit of your labours as a lawful reaſon to ask for greater rewards, and to complain that you had not been ſufficiently paid. Are you afraid leſt future ages ſhould not know, that your Lucubrations and Reſearches have put the Hiſtory of France in a very clear light, but that you was never the richer for them? Can this caſt any blemiſh on your reputation? If it be ſaid that you wanted ſkill and art to grow rich, it will be ſuppoſed that you wanted a quality which is not very commendable. This will be no detriment to your Reputation: never trouble yourſelf about it. If it be ſaid that the art of growing rich was not beyond your reach, but that you did not care to have recourſe to it, being content with your Books, and your Studies, and with conſecrating your time to the ſervice of the publick, will not this be a very great Elogy? Will it not prepoſſeſs the publick in favour of your works? If the contempt of riches and your continual application to the writing of good Books, expoſed you to the danger of dying poor, you ought to have wiſhed that this might be mentioned in your Epitaph (67). This would be worth to you a title to Nobility in the Republick of Letters; this would be a very good way to immortality (68); never dread the judgment of Poſterity in this reſpect. If the ingratitude and injuſtice of thoſe, who did not take care to reward your pains, be blamed, what is that to you? This blame will never be laid upon you.

(66) See above the remark [G] of the article ALCIAT (Andrew).

(67) Titulo res digna ſepulchri.

(68) Hac itur ad aſtra.

A COMMENDABLE quality in Monſ. Des Cartes.

We muſt obſerve here to Monſieur Des Cartes's honour, that he kept himſelf intirely free from this ſhameful diſtemper, though one of his friends had recourſe to the moſt dangerous means to infect him with it. See after what manner this zealous friend encouraged him to boaſt, and to aſk loudly for rewards (69). "You ought to know that in order "to obtain ſomething from the public it is not ſuffi- "cient to mention a word of it by the by; in the "preface of a book, you muſt declare expreſly that "you deſire and expect it; you muſt explain the "reaſons which prove not only that you deſerve "it, but alſo that it is very much their intereſt to "grant it you, and that they ought to expect a "very great advantage by it. Men are uſed to ſee "that all thoſe, who imagine themſelves worth any "thing, make ſuch a buſtle about it, aſk ſo impor- "tunately what they pretend to, and promiſe ſo much "beyond what they can perform, that when an au- "thor ſpeaks of himſelf only with modeſty, when he "aſks nothing of any man, when he does not pro- "miſe any thing boldly, let him give otherwiſe a "thouſand proofs of what he is able to perform, it "will not be minded, and he will not in the leaſt "be thought of. You will ſay, perhaps, that it does "not ſuit your genius to aſk any thing, nor to ſpeak "honourably of yourſelf, becauſe the one ſeems to be a "baſe thing, and the other an effect of pride. But "I am of opinion that this diſpoſition of yours ought "to be minded, and that it proceeds rather from a "miſtake and from weakneſs, than from an honeſt "ſhame and modeſty... You may ſay alſo that your "works ſpeak ſufficiently for themſelves, ſo that it "is not neceſſary to add promiſes and boaſtings to "them, which being common with quacks who de- "ſign to impoſe upon the public, ſeem not to become a "man of honour, who deſigns only to ſpeak the "truth. But the reaſon why quacks are to blame "is, not that the things they ſay of themſelves are "great and noble, but only that they are falſe, and "that they cannot prove them. Whereas the things "I would have you declare of yourſelf are ſo true, "and ſo evidently proved by your writings, that all "the rules of decency will ſuffer you to aſſert them, "and the rules of charity oblige you to do it, and "it concerns others to know them. For though "your writings ſpeak ſufficiently for themſelves with "regard to thoſe perſons who examine them carefully, "and who are capable of underſtanding them; yet this "is not ſufficient with regard to the deſign I think you "ought to have, becauſe every one cannot read them, "and thoſe who manage public affairs have not always "leiſure to do it. It may happen indeed, that thoſe "who have read your works, mention them to thoſe "perſons; but whatever is told to them, the little "noiſe they know you make, and the too great "modeſty with which you always ſpeak of them, "prevent them from taking much notice of them. "And becauſe perſons, who have but ſmall me- "rit, are often commended to them in the moſt "honourable terms that can be imagined, they think "they ought not to take for truth the immenſe praiſes "that are beſtowed upon you by thoſe that know you. "Whereas when a man ſpeaks of himſelf, and re- "lates extraordinary things concerning himſelf, he is "heard with attention, eſpecially if he be a man of "a good family, and it be known that he is nei- "ther of a character nor of a condition to act the "quack. And as he would make himſelf ridiculous, if "he ſhould make uſe of exaggerations in ſuch a caſe, "his words are taken in their true and natural ſenſe; "and they who would not believe him, are how- "ever determined by their own curioſity, or by their "envy, to examine whether what he ſays be true... "As this is very certain, and can be proved by the "writings which you have already printed, you ought "to tell it ſo loudly, to publiſh it ſo carefully, and "to put it ſo expreſly in the title-page of all your "books, that no man may hereafter be ignorant of "it." Was it poſſible to attack Des Cartes's modeſty with more ſpecious arguments? Nothing was omitted, all his excuſes were anſwered beforehand, and yet all this proved ineffectual (70). Obſerve that his friend was in the right to tell him that the public was uſed to ſee thoſe, who aſked for any thing, do it with importunity and with boaſtings. It is becauſe they know, that

(69) Lettre écrite à Mr. Des Cartes. It is prefixed to his Traité des Paſſions.

(70) See Des Cartes's Anſwer to this Friend's Letters prefixed to his Traité des Paſſions.

☞HAKLUYT (RICHARD) was deſcended from an antient family at Yetton in Herefordſhire (a), and educated at Weſtminſter School, from whence he was elected a Student of Chriſt-Church in Oxford in 1570 (b), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts Feb. 19, 1573 (c), and that of Maſter of Arts June 27, 1577 (d). Mr. Wood tells us (e), that he lived for ſome time in the Middle Temple, and ſtudied the Law there; but this is a miſtake [A]. He afterwards entered into holy Orders (f), and became Prebendary of Briſtol, in 1585 (g), and of Weſtminſter in 1605, in the room of Dr. Richard Webſter, and Rector of Wetheringſet in Suffolk (h). His collection of Engliſh Voyages, Navigations, Trafficks, and Diſcoveries, made him very famous [B]. He wrote likewiſe Notes of certain commodities in good requeſt in the Eaſt-Indies, the Molucca's, and China; which are in manuſcript among thoſe given by Selden to the Bodleian Library at Oxford. He illuſtrated alſo with notes Peter Martyr Anglericus's eight Decads de novo Orbe, printed at Paris 1587 in 8vo, and tranſlated into Engliſh, The Diſcoveries of the world from the firſt original unto the year of our Lord 1555, London 1601, in 4to, written in Portugueſe by Anthony Galvano, Governor of Ternate, the chief of the Molucca Iſlands. He tranſlated likewiſe from the ſame language into Engliſh, Virginia richly valued by the deſcription of the main Land of Florida, her next neighbour. London 1609 in 4to. He died November the 23d 1616 (i), and was interred in Weſtminſter Abbey on the 26th of the ſame month, leaving behind him a ſon, who inherited his manor of Bridgeplace, and ſeveral tenements in Tuttleſtreet Weſtminſter. Our author had a brother, whoſe name was Oliver Hakluyt, who was a Student of Chriſt Church, and afterwards became an eminent Phyſician (k).

(a) Fuller's Worthies in Herefordſhire, and Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 1. col. 413. 2d edit. London 1721.

(b) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(c) Idem, Faſti Oxon. col. 108.

(d) Idem, ibid. col. 115.

(e) Idem, Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(f) Idem, ibid.

(g) Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals of York &c. pag. 789.

(h) Wood, Athen. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

(i) Camdeni Annales Regis Jacobi, ad ann. 1616. Fuller, ubi ſupra, ſays erroneouſly, that he died in the beginning of King James's reign.

(k) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(71) Cardinal de Richelieu never did Mainard any favour, partly becauſe . . he would not be aſked, and would have men leave him the glory of giving of his own accord. Peliſſ. Hiſt. de l'Academie Franc. pag. m. 278.

that otherwiſe they ſhould obtain nothing. Woe to them who are diſheartened at the firſt refuſal, and who do not know how to ſpeak ſtoutly in their petitions. Du Haillan ſhewed that he was acquainted with the world, when he acted in the manner we have ſeen above. A man muſt complain often, and often petition before he can obtain any thing from a Court. If Cardinal de Richelieu was ſuch as he is repreſented in the Hiſtory of the French Academy (71), he was a Phœnix.

[A] Mr. Wood tells us, that he lived for ſome time in the Middle Temple, and ſtudied the Law there; but this is a miſtake.] The ſtudent in the Temple was Richard Hakluyt Eſq; a relation of our author; as appears from the preface to the firſt edition of Hakluyt's Voyages, as well as other places.

[B] His Collection of Engliſh Voyages, Navigations, Traffics, and Diſcoveries, made him very famous.] The firſt edition was printed at London 1589 in fol. and the ſecond in three volumes in 1598, 1599, 1000. Camden wrote the following verſes in commendation of this work.

In eximium opus R. Hakluyti de Anglorum ad diſjunctiſſimas regiones Navigationibus G. Camdeni Hexaſtichon.

Anglia, quæ penitus toto diſcluditur orbe,
Angulus orbis erat, parvus & orbis erat.
Nunc cum ſepoſitos alios detexerit orbes,
Maximus orbis honos, orbis & orbis erat.
At quid, Haklute, tibi monſtranti hæc aebeat orbis?
Laus tua, crede mihi, non erit orbe minor.

H

☞HALE (Sir MATTHEW) Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench in the reign of Charles II, was ſon of Robert Hale Eſq; a Barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn [A], by Joan the daughter of Matthew Poyntz of Alderly in Glouceſterſhire Eſq; and was born at Alderly November the 1ſt 1609 (a). His parents dying when he was very young, he was committed to the care of Anthony Kingſcot of Kingſcot Eſq; who was his next kinſman after his uncles, by his mother (b). He was educated in Grammar learning at Wotton-Under-Edge, the ſeat of his anceſtors in the ſame county, and in Michaelmas Term 1626 became a Commoner of Magdalen Hall in Oxford under the tuition of Mr. Obadiah Sedgwick (c); where, continuing about three years (d), he made a conſiderable progreſs in learning; but was afterwards diverted from his ſtudies by the levities of his youth [B]. Afterwards growing reformed, upon the advice of Mr. John Glanvill,

(a) The Life and Death of Sir Matthew Hale, Knt. ſometime Lord Chief Juſtice of his Majeſty's Court of King's Bench. Written by Gilbert Burnet, D.D. pag. 1, 2. edit. London 1682, in 24mo.

(b) Ibid. pag. 3.

(c) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 573. 2d edit. London 1721.

(d) Idem, ibid.

[A] Son of Robert Hale Eſq; a Barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn.] This Gentleman was ſon of Mr. Robert Hale, an eminent Clothier in Wotton-Under-Edge in Glouceſterſhire, where he and his anceſtors had lived for many deſcents, and they had given ſeveral parcels of land for the uſe of the poor, which are enjoyed by them to this day. This Robert acquired an eſtate of ten thouſand pounds, which he divided almoſt equally amongſt his five ſons, beſides the portions, which he gave his daughters, from whom a numerous poſterity has ſprung. Mr. Hale, the Barriſter, and father to Sir Matthew, was his ſecond ſon, and a man of that ſtrictneſs of conſcience, that he gave over the practice of the law, becauſe he could not underſtand the reaſon of giving colour in pleadings, which, as he thought was to tell a lie; and this, with ſome other things commonly practiſed, ſeemed to him contrary to that exactneſs of truth and juſtice, which became a Chriſtian; ſo that he withdrew himſelf from the Inns of Court to live on his eſtate in the country (1).

(1) The Life and Death of Sir Matthew Hale, Knt. &c. Written by Gilbert Burnet, D. D. pag. 1, 2. edit. London 1682, in 24mo.

[B] But was afterwards diverted from his ſtudies by the levities of youth.] The Stage Players coming to Oxford, he was ſo much corrupted by ſeeing many Plays, that he almoſt wholly forſook his ſtudies; and being thus taken off from them, and from the gravity of his deportment which had been before eminent in him, far beyond his years, he ſet himſelf to many of the vanities incident to youth; but ſtill preſerved his purity, and a great probity of mind. He loved gaiety of dreſs, and much company; and being of a ſtrong robuſt body was a great maſter of all thoſe exerciſes, which required much ſtrength. He alſo learned to fence and handle his weapons, in which he became ſo expert, that he worſted many maſters in thoſe arts. But as he was exerciſing of himſelf in them, an incident happened, which ſhewed his good judgment, and gave ſome hopes of better things. One of his maſters told him, that he could teach him no more, ſince he was now better at his own trade than himſelf was. This Mr. Hale looked upon as flattery; and therefore to make his maſter diſcover himſelf, he promiſed him the houſe which he lived in (for he was his tenant) if he could hit him a blow on the head; and bad him do his beſt, for he would be as good as his word. After a little engagement, his maſter being really ſuperior to him, hit him on the head, and he performed his promiſe, for he gave him the houſe freely; and was not unwilling Glanvill, Serjeant at Law, who obſerved in him a clear apprehenſion of things, and a ſolid judgment, he changed his reſolution of engaging in the military life, and applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law [C], for which purpoſe on the 8th of November 1629 he was admitted into Lincoln's-Inn, where for many years he ſtudied ſixteen hours a day, and threw aſide all his fine clothes, betaking himſelf to a plain faſhion, which he continued to uſe in many points to his death (e) [D]. Noy, the Attorney General, being of the ſame Inn, took early notice of him, and called often for him, and directed him in his ſtudies, and had ſuch a friendſhip for him, that Mr. Hale was called Young Noy (f). The great Selden likewiſe, though much ſuperior to him in years, yet entertained ſuch an eſteem of him and of Mr. John Vaughan, afterwards Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common Pleas, that he left them at his death two of his executors (g). It was this acquaintance that firſt ſet Mr. Hale on a more enlarged purſuit of learning, which he had before confined to his own profeſſion [E]. Some years before the civil wars broke out, he was called to the Bar (h); and after they did break out, he behaved in ſuch a manner as to gain the eſteem of both parties [F]. He was employed in his practice by all the King's party; and was aſſigned Council to the Earl of Strafford, Archbiſhop Laud (i), the Duke

(e) Burnet, pag. 6, 7.

(f) Idem, pag. 12.

(g) Idem, pag. 14.

(h) Wood, ubi ſupra, pag. 573, 574.

(i) Burnet, ubi ſupra, pag. 20, 21.

willing at that rate to learn ſo early to diſtinguiſh flattery from plain and ſimple truth. He was now ſo taken up with martial matters, that inſtead of proceeding in his deſign of being a Scholar or a Divine, he reſolved to be a Soldier; and his Tutor Mr. Obadiah Sedgwick going into the Low Countries Chaplain to the Lord Vere, he reſolved to go along with him, and to trail a pike in the Prince of Orange's army (2). But he was diverted from this reſolution by Serjeant Glanvill, as we obſerve in the text of this article.

(2) Idem, ibid. pag. 4, 5, 6.

[C] Applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Law.] Whilſt he was proſecuting this ſtudy, he not only kept the hours of the hall conſtantly in term-time, but ſeldom put himſelf out of commons during the vacations; and continued then to follow his ſtudies with unwearied application: and not being ſatisfied with the books written upon the Law, or to take things upon truſt, he was very diligent in ſearching all records; and made divers collections out of the books which he had read, and mixing them with his own obſervations digeſted them into a common-place book, with ſo much induſtry and judgment, that an eminent Judge of the King's Bench borrowed it of him, when he was Lord Chief Baron. He unwillingly lent it, becauſe it had been written by him, before he was called to the Bar, and had never been thoroughly reviſed by him ſince that time; only what alterations had been made in the Law by ſubſequent ſtatutes and judgments were added by him as they happened. But the Judge having peruſed it, ſaid, that though it was compoſed by him ſo early, he did not think any Lawyer in England could do it better, except he himſelf would again ſet about it (3).

(3) Idem, ibid. pag. 13, 14.

[D] Threw aſide all his fine clothes, betaking himſelf to a plain faſhion, which he continued to uſe in many points to his death.] Mr. Baxter tells us (4) that his habit, even after he was a Judge, was ſo coarſe and plain, that I, ſays he, who am thought guilty of a culpable neglect therein, have been bold to deſire him to lay by ſome things which ſeemed too homely. And Dr. Burnet obſerves (5), that he paſſing from an extreme of vanity in his apparel to that of neglecting himſelf too much, was once taken, when there was a preſs for the King's ſervice, as a fit perſon; for he was a ſtrong and well built man. But ſome who knew him coming by, and giving notice who he was, the preſs-men let him go. This made him return to more decency in his clothes, but never to any ſuperfluity or vanity in them.

(4) Preface to his Additional Notes on the Life and Death of Sir Matthew Hale, the late univerſally honoured and loved Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench.

(5) Ubi ſupra, pag. 12, 13.

[E] It was this acquaintance that firſt ſet Mr. Hale on a more enlarged purſuit of learning which he had before confined to his own profeſſion.] As he became as great a maſter in his own profeſſion, as ever any perſon was, very ſoon; he found leiſure to attain as comprehenſive a knowledge in ſeveral branches of learning, as moſt men have done in any age. He applied himſelf much to the ſtudy of the Roman Law; and though he liked the way of trial in England by Juries much better than that of the Civil Law, where ſo much is truſted to the Judge; yet he often ſaid, that the true grounds and reaſons of Law were ſo well delivered in the Digeſts, that a man could never underſtand Law as a ſcience ſo well as by ſeeking it there; and therefore lamented that it was ſo little ſtudied in England. He looked on readineſs in Arithmetic as a thing, which might be uſeful to him in his own employment, and acquir'd it to ſuch a degree, that he would often on the ſudden, and afterwards on the Bench, reſolve very hard queſtions, which had puzzled the beſt Accountants in the city. He ſtudied likewiſe Algebra both Specioſa and Numeroſa, and went through with all the other mathematical ſciences, and made a great collection of very excellent inſtruments, ſparing no coſt to have them as exact as art could make them. He was alſo very converſant in philoſophical learning, and in all the curious experiments and rare diſcoveries of the age; and had the new books written on thoſe ſubjects ſent from all parts, which he examined ſo critically, that if the principles and hypotheſes, which he took firſt up, did any way prepoſſeſs him, yet thoſe who have differed moſt from him, have acknowledg'd, that in what he has written concerning the Torricellian experiment, and of the rarefaction and condenſation of air, he ſhews as great an exactneſs and as much ſubtilty in the reaſoning which he builds on them, as thoſe principles, to which he adher'd, could bear. To this he added a great ſkill in Phyſic, Anatomy, and Chirurgery, and uſed to ſay that no man could be abſolutely a maſter in any profeſſion, without having ſome ſkill in other ſciences. He made deep ſearches into ancient Hiſtory, and particularly into the leaſt delightful part of it, Chronology. He was well acquainted with the ancient Greek Philoſophers; but want of occaſion to uſe it wore out his knowledge of the Greek tongue. And though he never ſtudied the Hebrew Language, yet by his converſation with Selden, he underſtood the moſt curious things in the Rabbinical Learning. But above all theſe he ſeemed to have made the ſtudy of Divinity the chief of all others; to which he directed every thing elſe, and arrived at that pitch in it, that thoſe who have read what he has written on theſe ſubjects, will think they muſt have had moſt of his time and thoughts (6).

(6) Ibid. pag. 15, 16, 17, 18.

[F] After the civil wars did break out, he behaved in ſuch a manner as to gain the eſteem of both parties.] He had read the Life of Pomponius Atticus written by Cornelius Nepos; and having obſerved, that he had paſſed through a time of as much diſtraction as ever was in any age or ſtate, from the wars of Marius and Sylla to the beginning of Auguſtus's reign, without the leaſt blemiſh on his reputation, and free from any conſiderable danger, being held in great eſteem by all parties, and courted and favoured by them; he ſet him as a pattern to himſelf, and remarking that beſides thoſe virtues which are neceſſary to all men and at all times, there were two things which chiefly preſerved Atticus, the one his engaging in no faction, and meddling in no public buſineſs; the other his conſtant favouring and relieving thoſe, who were loweſt, which was aſcribed by ſuch as prevailed to the generoſity of his temper, and procured him much kindneſs from thoſe, on whom he had exerciſed his bounty, when it came to be their turn to govern; he reſolved to guide himſelf by thoſe rules as much as was poſſible for him to do. He not only avoided all public employments, but the very talking of news; and was always

(k) See Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, edit. London 1676 in fol. where his plea for that Duke is printed.

Duke of Hamilton (k), the Earl of Holland, the Lord Capel, and the Lord Craven (l); though, as Mr. Wood aſſures us (m), he took the covenant in 1643, and appeared ſeveral times with other lay-perſons in the Aſſembly of Divines at Weſtminſter. He was then in great eſteem with the Parliament, and was employed by the members thereof, as to his Counſel, in ſeveral affairs, and particularly in the reduction of the garriſon at Oxford; being, as a Lawyer, added to the Commiſſioners appointed by them to treat with thoſe appointed by the King. In this capacity he did good ſervice, by adviſing them, and eſpecially General Fairfax, to preſerve that ſeat of learning from deſtruction (n). The murder of King Charles I gave him very ſenſible regret; however he took the engagement (o); and on the 20th of January $165\frac{1}{2}$ was appointed with ſeveral others to conſider of the reformation of the Law (p) [G]. January 25, 1653, he was by writ made Serjeant at Law (q); and ſoon after appointed one of the Juſtices of the Common Pleas; in which place he acted with great integrity, not without the diſpleaſure ſometimes of the Protector [H]. In (l) Burnet's Life of Sir M. Hale, pag. 21.

(m) Col. 574.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs. By Bulſtrode Whitelocke, Eſq. pag. 520, 521. edit. London 1732.

(q) Wood, ubi ſupra.

always both favourable and charitable to thoſe, who were depreſt, and was ſure never to provoke any in particular by cenſuring or reflecting on their actions; for many who had converſed much with him, have declared that they never heard him once ſpeak ill of any perſon. He was generally employed in his practice by the King's party; whom he likewiſe often relieved in their neceſſities, in a way no leſs prudent than charitable, conſidering the dangers of that time. For he often depoſited conſiderable ſums in the hands of a Gentleman of the royal party, who knew their neceſſities well, and was to diſtribute his charity according to his own diſcretion, without either letting them know, from whence it came, or giving himſelf any account to whom he had given it. When he was Council for the Lord Craven, he pleaded with that force of argument, that the then Attorney-General threatened him for appearing againſt the Government; to whom he anſwered, that he was pleading in defence of thoſe Laws, which they declared they would maintain and preſerve; and he was doing his duty to his Client, ſo that he was not to be daunted with threatnings (7).

(7) Ibid. pag. 19, 20, 21, 22.

[G] On the 20th of January $165\frac{1}{2}$ he was appointed with others to conſider of the Reformation of the Law.] The reſt of the Committee were Mr. Steel, Mr. Cooke, Mr. Manby, Mr. Sadler, Colonel Blount, Sir Henry Blount, Mr. Berners, Major General Deſborough, Mr. Moyer, Colonel Tomlinſon, Mr. Fountaine, Alderman Fowke, Mr. Hugh Peters, Major Packer, Sir William Roberts, Mr. Meltwold, Mr. Manſell, Mr. Ruſhworth, Mr. Sparrow, and Sir Anthony Aſhley Cooper; who were to "take into conſideration what "inconveniencies there are in the Law; how the miſ-"chiefs, which grow from delays, the chargeableneſs "and irregularities in the proceedings of the Law "may be prevented; and the ſpeedieſt way to prevent "the ſame." They were to preſent their opinions to the Committee of Parliament appointed for that purpoſe; and they or any ſeven of them had power to ſend for any perſons to confer with them in this buſineſs, and for records. This Committee met ſeveral times, and deſired the Judges in their ſeveral Courts to return to them a Liſt of the Officers in their Courts, and what fees they received, and what work and employment they did for the ſame (8). Mr. Whitlocke obſerves (9), that he was often adviſed with by ſome of this Committee; and none of them was more active in this buſineſs than Hugh Peters the Miniſter, who underſtood little of Law, but was very opinionative, and would frequently mention ſome Proceedings of Law in Holland, wherein he was altogether miſtaken. On the 21ſt of February following the Committee paſſed ſome reſolutions concerning perſonal actions; as that If the Defendant in a perſonal action, before pleading, tender ſatisfaction to the Plaintiff with coſts of ſuit, and it appear afterwards at the trial to the Jury ſufficient and not accepted of, the Plaintiff to loſe his own, and pay the other's coſts in the ſuit. That Summons be the firſt proceſs in all perſonal actions, with the true date when ſued forth, and executed upon oath, and returnable within fifteen days after the ſervice; the Defendant to have a copy from the Original under ſeal given or left at his houſe, and the cauſe of the ſuit ſet down in the body of the writ; that upon default of appearing, a farther proceſs be granted to arreſt the Party till he appear or give warrant: and in caſe of non-appearance, the Defendant's lands and goods to be diſtrained to a certain value, till he appear or give warrant (10).

(8) Memorials of the Engliſh Affairs. By Bulſtrode Whitelocke Eſq; pag. 520, 521. edit. London 1732.

(9) Ibid. pag. 521.

(10) Ibid. pag. 523.

[H] Appointed one of the Juſtices of the Common-Pleas; in which place he acted with great integrity, not without the diſpleaſure ſometimes of the Protector.] He had great ſcruples at firſt concerning the proceeding againſt felons, and putting offenders to death by his commiſſion, ſince he thought the ſword of juſtice belonging only by right to the lawful Prince, it ſeemed not warrantable to proceed to a capital ſentence by an authority derived from Uſurpers. However he made a diſtinction between common and ordinary Felonies, and offences againſt the State: he would not meddle in the latter, ſince he thought theſe might be often legal and warrantable actions, and that the putting men to death on that account was murder. But with regard to ordinary felonies, he at firſt was of opinion, that it was as neceſſary even in times of uſurpation to execute juſtice in thoſe caſes, as in matters of property. But after the King was put to death, he laid by all his collections of the pleas of the crown; and that they might not fall into ill hands, concealed them behind the wainſcotting of his ſtudy; for he ſaid, there was no more occaſion to uſe them, till the King ſhould be reſtored to his right. But upon the reſtoration, he took them out, and went on in his deſign to perfect that great work. Yet for ſome time after he was made a Judge, when he went the circuit, he ſate on the crown ſide, and judged criminals; but having conſidered farther of it, he came to think, that it was at leaſt better not to do it, and ſo upon the ſecond or third circuit, he refuſed to ſit any more on the crown ſide, and told plainly the reaſon; for in matters of blood, he was always to chooſe the ſafer ſide. And indeed he acted ſo in ſome trials, that they were not unwilling that he ſhould withdraw from meddling farther in them; of which we ſhall give ſome inſtances. Not long after he was made a Judge, which was in 1653, when he went the circuit, a trial was brought before him at Lincoln concerning the murder of one of the townſmen, who had been killed by a ſoldier of the garriſon there. He was in the fields with a fowling piece on his ſhoulder, which the ſoldier ſeeing came to him, and ſaid, that it was contrary to an order, which the Protector had made, that none, who had been of the King's party, ſhould carry arms, and therefore he would have forced it from him. But as the other did not regard the order, ſo being ſtronger than the ſoldier, he threw him down, and having beat him, left him. The ſoldier went into the town, and told one of his fellow-ſoldiers how he had been uſed, and got him to go with him, and lie in wait for the man, that he might be revenged on him. They both watched his coming to town, and one of them went to him to demand his gun; which he, refuſing, the ſoldier ſtruck at him; and as they were ſtruggling, the other came behind and ran his ſword into his body, of which he preſently died. It was the time of the aſſizes; ſo they were both tried. Againſt the one there was no evidence of fore-thought felony, and therefore he was only found guilty of manſlaughter, and burnt in the hand; but the other was convicted of murder; and though Colonel Whaley, who commanded the garriſon, came into court, and urged, that the man was killed only for diſobeying the Protector's orders, and that the ſoldier was but doing his duty; yet the Judge regarded neither his reaſons nor threats, and therefore not only gave ſentence againſt him, but ordered the execution to be ſuddenly done, that it might not be poſſible to procure a reprieve, which

In 1654 he was one of the five Knights who were elected for the county of Glouceſter to ſerve in the Parliament which began at Weſtminſter on the 3d of September (r); and went to the Houſe "on deſign to obſtruct the mad and wicked projects then on foot "by two parties, that had very different principles and ends (s) [I]." Upon the death of Oliver Cromwell, he refuſed to accept of the new Commiſſion offered him by Richard his ſucceſſor, alledging, that he could act no longer under ſuch authority (t). The ſame year 1658 he was elected one of the Burgeſſes of the Univerſity of Oxford, to ſerve in the Parliament, which begun at Weſtminſter the 27th of January; and in April 1660 he was returned one of the Knights for Glouceſterſhire in the Parliament which called home King Charles II (u). He was ſoon after made Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer [K]; and though it is uſual for perſons ſo promoted to be knighted, he deſired to avoid that honour, and therefore for a conſiderable time declined all opportunities of waiting on the King; which the Lord Chancellor Hyde obſerving, ſent for him upon buſineſs one day when the King was at his houſe, and told his Majeſty, that there was his modeſt Chief Baron; upon which he was unexpectedly knighted (w). He continued in the poſt of Chief Baron eleven years with great applauſe [L]; and though he

(r) Idem, ibid.

(s) Burnet, pag. 28.

(t) Idem, pag. 30.

(u) Wood, ubi ſupra.

(w) Burnet, pag. 32, 33.

which he believed would have been obtained, if there had been time enough granted for it. In another circuit, he underſtood, that the Protector had ordered a jury to be returned for a tryal, in which he was more than ordinarily concerned. Upon this information he examined the Sheriff about it, who knew nothing of it, for he ſaid he referred all ſuch things to the Under-Sheriff; and having next aſked the Under-Sheriff concerning it, he found that the jury had been returned by order from Cromwell; upon which he ſhewed the ſtatute, that all juries ought to be returned by the Sheriff, or his lawful officer; and as this was not done according to law, he diſmiſſed the jury, and would not try the cauſe. The Protector was highly diſpleaſed with him for this, and at his return from the circuit told him in anger, that he was not fit to be a Judge; to which all the anſwer he made was, that it was very true. He met with another cauſe in the circuit, in which he reſolved to have proceeded ſeverely. Some Anabaptiſts had ruſhed into a church, and diſturbed the congregation, while they were receiving the Sacrament, not without ſome violence. At this he was highly offended, for he ſaid that it was intolerable for men, who pretended ſo highly to liberty of conſcience, to go and diſturb others, eſpecially thoſe, who had the encouragement of the law on their ſide. But theſe were ſo ſupported by ſome great Magiſtrates and officers, that a ſtop was put to his proceedings; upon which he declared, that he would meddle no more with the trials on the crown ſide. When Colonel Penruddock's trial was brought on, there was a ſpecial meſſenger ſent to him, requiring him to aſſiſt at it. It was in vacation-time, and he was at his country houſe at Alderly. He plainly refuſed to go, and ſaid, that the four terms and two circuits were enough, and the little interval that was between, was little enough for their private affairs; and ſo he excuſed himſelf. He thought it was not neceſſary to ſpeak more clearly; but if he had been urged to it, he would not have been afraid of doing it (11).

(11) Idem, pag. 23 28.

[I] Went to the Houſe on deſign to obſtruct the mad and wicked projects then on foot by two parties, that had very different principles and ends.] Dr. Burnet obſerves (12), that on the one hand ſome, who were perhaps more ſincere, yet were really brainſick, deſigned they knew not what, being reſolved to pull down a ſtanding miniſtry, the law and property of England, and all the ancient rules of their Government, and ſet up in its ſtead an indigeſted enthuſiaſtical ſcheme, which they called the Kingdom of Chriſt, or of his ſaints, many of them being really in expectation, that one day or another Chriſt would come down and ſit among them, and at leaſt they thought to begin the glorious thouſand years mentioned in the Revelation. Others at the ſame time taking advantage from the fears and apprehenſions, that all ſober men of the nation were in, leſt they ſhould fall under the tyranny of a diſtracted ſort of people, who to all their other ill principles added great cruelty, which they had copied from thoſe of Munſter in the former age, intended to improve that opportunity to raiſe their own fortunes and families. Amidſt theſe Judge Hale ſteered a middle courſe; for as he would engage for neither ſide, ſo he, with a great many more worthy men, came to parliament more out of a deſign to hinder miſchief, than to do much good; wiſely foreſeeing, that the inclinations for the royal family were daily growing ſo much, that in time the diſorders then in agitation would ferment to that reſolution in which they determined in May 1660. And therefore all that could be then done, was to oppoſe the ill deſigns of both parties, the enthuſiaſts, as well as the Uſurpers. Among the other extravagant motions made in this Parliament, one was, to deſtroy all the records in the Tower, and to ſettle the nation on a new foundation. He undertook therefore to ſhew the madneſs of this propoſition, the injuſtice of it, and the miſchiefs which would follow on it; and did it with ſuch clearneſs and ſtrength of reaſon, as not only ſatisfied all ſober perſons, (for it may be ſuppoſed that was ſoon done,) but ſtopt even the mouths of the frantic people themſelves.

(12) Pag. 28, 29.

[K] He was ſoon after made Lord chief Baron of the Exchequer.] When the Lord Chancellor Hyde delivered him his Commiſſion, in the ſpeech, which he made according to the cuſtom on ſuch occaſions, he expreſſed his eſteem of him in a very ſingular manner, telling him, among other things, that if the King could have found out an honeſter and fitter man for that Employment, he would not have advanced him to it; and that he had therefore preferred him, becauſe he knew none that deſerved it ſo well (13).

(13) Idem, pag. 32.

[L] He continued in that poſt of chief Baron eleven Years with great applauſe.] He managed that Court, and all the proceedings in it with ſingular Juſtice; and it was obſerved by the whole Nation how much he raiſed the reputation and practice of it (14). Nor did his adminiſtration of Juſtice lie only in that Court; for he was one of the principal Judges that ſate in Clifford's Inn about ſettling the difference between Landlord and Tenant after the fire of London; he being the firſt who offered his Service to the city for accommodating all the differences, which might have ariſen about the rebuilding of it, in which he behaved himſelf to the Satisfaction of all Parties concerned (15). He would never receive private Addreſſes or Recommendations from the greateſt perſons in any matter, in which Juſtice was concerned. One of the firſt Peers of England went once to his chamber, and told him, That having a ſuit in Law to be tried before him, he was then to acquaint him with it, that he might the better underſtand it, when it ſhould come to be heard in Court: Upon which the Lord chief Baron interrupted him, and ſaid, "He did not deal fairly to come to his "chamber about ſuch affairs, for he never received "any Information of cauſes but in open Court, where "both parties were to be heard alike;" and ſo would not ſuffer him to go on. Whereupon his Grace (for he was a Duke) went away not a little diſſatisfied, and complained of it to the King, as a rudeneſs, which was not to be endured. But his Majeſty bid him content himſelf that he was no worſe uſed, and ſaid, he verily believed, he would have uſed himſelf no better, if he had gone to ſollicit him in any of his own cauſes. Another paſſage fell out in one of his Circuits, which was ſomewhat cenſured as an affectation of an unreaſonable ſtrictneſs; but it flowed from his exactneſs to the rules which he had ſet himſelf. A Gentleman, who had a tryal at the Aſſizes, had ſent him a Buck

(14) Idem, pag. 33.

(15) Idem, pag. 33, 34.

he ſcarce ever interpoſed in affairs of State, yet upon a propoſition ſet on foot by the Lord Keeper Bridgeman, for a comprehenſion of the more moderate Non-Conformiſts, and a limited indulgence towards ſuch as could not be brought within the comprehenſions, he uſed his utmoſt endeavours to effect it (x). Upon the deceaſe of Sir John Keeling, he was advanced to be Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's Bench [M], and on the 18th of May 1671 took his ſeat on that Bench (y). But about four years and an half after this promotion, his health, which had been before very firm and vigorous, declining, he reſigned his poſt on the 21ſt of February 167$\frac{5}{6}$ (z), and died on the 25th of December following, and was interred in the Church-yard at Alderly on the 4th of January, where a monument is erected to his memory (aa). He wrote ſeveral works [N]. Mr.

(x) Idem, pag. 41, & ſeqq.

(y) Idem, pag. 53.

(z) Idem, pag. 61.

(aa) Idem, pag. 70, 71.

for his Table. When Judge Hale therefore heard his name, he asked if he was not the ſame perſon, who had ſent him the Veniſon? and finding that he was the ſame, told him, "he could not ſuffer the Tryal to go on, till "he had paid him for his Buck." The Gentleman anſwered, that he never ſold his Veniſon, and that he had done nothing to him, which he did not do to every Judge, who had gone that Circuit; which was confirmed by ſeveral Gentlemen preſent. But all this would not prevail, for the Lord chief Baron had learned from Solomon, that a Gift perverted the ways of Judgment, and therefore would not ſuffer the Tryal to proceed, till he had paid for the preſent; upon which the Gentleman withdrew the Record. At Salisbury likewiſe the Dean and Chapter having, according to the cuſtom, preſented him with ſix Sugar-Loaves in his Circuit, he made his Servants pay for the Sugar before he would try their cauſe (16).

(16) Idem, pag. 37, 38.

[M] Advanced to be Lord Chief Juſtice of the King's-Bench.] The choice of him for that poſt was applauded by all people, who thought their Liberties could not be better depoſited than in the hands of one, who as he underſtood them well, ſo had all the Juſtice and Courage, which ſo ſacred a truſt required. One thing was much obſerved and commended in him; that when there was a great Inequality in the ability and learning of the Counſellors who were to plead one againſt another, he thought it became him, as the Judge, to ſupply that; and therefore would enforce what the weaker Council managed but indifferently, and not ſuffer the more learned to carry the Buſineſs by the advantage which they had over the others in their quickneſs and skill in Law, and readineſs in pleading, till all things were cleared, in which the merits and ſtrength of the ill-defended cauſe lay. He was not ſatisfied barely to give his Judgment in cauſes, but did, eſpecially in all intricate ones, give ſuch an account of the reaſons which prevailed with him, that the Council did not only acquieſce in his Authority, but were ſo convinced by his reaſons, that many profeſſed that he brought them often to change their opinions; ſo that his giving of Judgment was really a learned Lecture upon that point of Law; and which was yet more, the Parties themſelves, tho' intereſt too commonly corrupts the Judgment, were generally ſatisfied with the Juſtice of his deciſions, even when they were made againſt them. His impartial Juſtice and great diligence drew the chief practice after him, into whatſoever Court he came; ſince though the Courts of the Common-Pleas, the Exchequer, and the King's-Bench, are appointed for the tryal of cauſes of different natures; yet it is eaſy to bring moſt cauſes into any of them, as the Council and Attorneys pleaſe. So as he had drawn the Buſineſs much after him both into the Common-Pleas, and the Exchequer, it now followed him into the King's-Bench; and many cauſes which were depending in the Exchequer, and not determined, were let fall, and brought again before him in the Court, to which he was now removed (17).

(17) Ibid. pag. 55, 56, 57.

[N] He wrote ſeveral works.] We ſhall give a Catalogue of them as follows: I. An Eſſay touching the Gravitation and Non-Gravitation of fluid Bodies, and reaſons thereof. London 1674 in 8vo. II. Difficiles Nugæ; or obſervations touching the Torricellian Experiment, and the various Solutions of the ſame, eſpecially touching the weight and elaſticity of the Air. London 1674 in 8vo. Upon this and the former Diſcourſe Dr. Henry More has written Remarks, ſo far as they concern any paſſages in his Enchiridion Metaphyſicum, &c. London 1676 in 8vo. III. Contemplations moral and divine. Part I. London 1676 in 8vo. Part II. London 1677 in 8vo. They were both reprinted together at London 1679 in 8vo. IV. The Life of Pomponius Atticus, written by his Contemporary and Acquaintance Cornelius Nepos, with Obſervations political and moral thereupon. London 1677 in 8vo. V. Obſervations touching the Principles of Natural Motion, and eſpecially touching Rarefaction and Condenſation, together with a reply to certain Remarks touching the Gravitation of Fluids. London 1677 in 8vo. Theſe obſervations were in anſwer to Dr. H. More's Remarks above-mentioned, and were replied to by the Doctor in a piece printed at London in 1678. VI. The Primitive Origination of Mankind conſidered and examined according to the Light of Nature. London 1677 in fol. There is an account of this Book in the Philoſophical Tranſactions (18). This work was publiſhed a little before his Death, and printed for theſe reaſons, 1. Becauſe ſome Writings of his, as particularly his Contemplations, came abroad without his knowledge, and contrary to his Intention; and this Book might have had the ſame fate, if not in his Life-time, at leaſt after his Death. 2. Becauſe there had been ſome more care uſed by him in the digeſting and writing of it, than of ſome others, which had been publiſhed. 3. Becauſe though he could never be brought to value the writings of his, which were then in print, ; yet he found them well accepted of by many; which encouraged him to let this book come abroad under his own Name; wherein he had uſed more care than in thoſe leſſer Tracts. He wrote likewiſe the Preface to, and publiſhed the Abridgment of many Caſes and Reſolutions of the Common-Law, alphabetically digeſted under ſeveral Titles, &c. London 1668. in fol. He wrote likewiſe ſeveral Treatiſes, ſome of which were publiſhed ſince his Death; as particularly, A Diſcourſe touching Proviſion for the Poor. London 1683 in 12mo. A ſhort Treatiſe touching Sheriffs Accompts. London 1683 in 8vo. To which is joined his Tryal of Witches at the Aſſizes held at Bury St. Edmonds on the 1ſt of March 1664. which was printed by itſelf 1682, in four Sheets in 8vo. Pleas of the Crown, or a methodical Summary of the principal matters relating to that Subject. London 1678 in 8vo. The ſecond Edition was printed at London 1685 in 8vo. His Judgment of the Nature of true Religion, the cauſes of its Corruption, and the Churches Calamity by Mens additions and violences; with the deſired cure. London 1684 in 4to. written in three Diſcourſes at ſeveral times, and publiſhed by his friend Mr. Richard Baxter, and by him dedicated to the Judges. To this Book is annexed The Judgment of Sir Francis Bacon, &c. and ſome Paſſages of Dr. Iſaac Barrow on the ſame Subject. Several Tracts, as 1. A Diſcourſe of Religion on three heads; firſt the Ends and Uſes of it; ſecondly the Life of Religion and Super-additions to it; and thirdly the Superſtructions upon it, and Animoſities about it. 2. A Treatiſe touching Proviſion for the Poor. 3. A Letter to his Children, adviſing them how to behave themſelves in their Speech. 4. A Letter to one of his Sons, after his recovery from the Small-Pox. London 1684 in 8vo. A Diſcourſe of the Knowledge of God, and of ourſelves, firſt by the Light of Nature, and ſecondly by the ſacred Scriptures. London 1688 in 8vo. To which is added, A Brief Abſtract of the Chriſtian Religion, and Conſiderations ſeaſonable at all times for the cleanſing of the Heart and Life. Mr. Wood mentions under his Article (19) London's Liberty, or a learned Argument of Law and Reaſon, ann. 1650. This was printed afterwards under this Title, London's Liberties; or the Opinions of thoſe great Lawyers, Lord chief Juſtice Hale, Mr. Juſtice Wild, and Mr. Serjeant Maynard, about the Election of Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen and Common-Council Men of London, and concerning their Charter, &c. London, 1682, in Folio. Dr. Burnet (20) gives us a catalogue of the manuſcripts of

(18) Num. 136. pag. 917.

(19) Col. 575.

Mr. Baxter (bb) gives him the character of "an unwearied Student, a prudent Man, a "solid Philoſopher, a famous Lawyer, the pillar and baſis of Juſtice, who would not "have done an unjuſt act for any worldly price or motive; the ornament of his Majeſty's "Government, and honour of England; the higheſt faculty of the ſoul of Weſtmin-"ſter Hall, and pattern to all the reverend and honourable Judges; a godly, ſerious, "and practical Chriſtian; a lover of Goodneſs and all good men; a lamenter of the "Clergy's ſelfiſhneſs, and unfaithfulneſs, and diſcord, and of the ſad diviſions follow-"ing hereupon; an earneſt deſirer of their Reformation, Concord, and the Church's "Peace, and of a reformed Act of Uniformity, as the beſt and neceſſary means thereto; "a great contemner of the Riches, Pomp and Vanity of the World; a pattern of ho-"neſt Plainneſs and Humility, &c." He left ſeveral volumes of Collections to the Library of the Society of Lincoln's-Inn. He was twice married, and had children by his former wife, but none by the latter [O]. When he was a Counſellor, if he ſaw a cauſe was unjuſt, he for a great while would not meddle farther in it, but to give his opinion that it (bb) Additional Notes on the Life and Death of Sir Matthew Hale, and written by Richard Baxter, at the requeſt of Edward Stephens Eſq; the Publiſher of his Contemplations, and his familiar Friend; and publiſhed by the urgency of others, pag. 43, 44. edit. London 1682 in 24mo.

of his not then publiſhed, viz. I. Concerning the ſecondary origination of Mankind, Folio viz. II. Concerning Religion, 5 Volumes in Folio. 1. De Deo, vox Metaphyſica, Pars 1 & 2. 2. Pars 3, Vox Naturæ, Providentiæ, Ethicæ, Conſcientiæ. 3. Liber ſextus, ſeptimus, octavus. 4. Pars 9, Concerning the holy Scriptures, their Evidence and Authority. 5. Concerning the Truth of the holy Scriptures, and the Evidences thereof. III. Of Policy in Matters of Religion, Folio. IV. De Animâ, to Mr. Baxter, Folio. V. De Animâ, Tranſactions between him and Mr. Baxter, Folio. VI. Tentamina de ortu, naturâ, & immortalitate Animæ, Folio. VII. Magnetiſmus Magneticus, Folio. VIII. Magnetiſmus Phyſicus, Folio. IX. Magnetiſmus Divinus. X. De Generatione Animalium, & Vegetabilium, Folio, in Latin. XI. Of the Law of Nature, Folio. XII. A Letter of Advice to his Grand-Children, 4to. XIII. Placita Coronæ, 7 Volumes in Folio. XIV. Preparatory Notes concerning the Right of the Crown, Folio. XV. Incepta de Juribus Coronæ, Folio. XVI. De Prærogativâ Regis, Folio. XVII. Preparatory Notes touching Parliamentary Proceedings, 2 Volumes in 4to. XVIII. Of the Juriſdiction of the Houſe of Lords, 4to, XIX. Of the Juriſdiction of the Admirality. XX. Touching Ports and Cuſtoms, Folio. XXI. Of the right of the Sea, and the Arms thereof, and Cuſtom, Folio. XXII. Concerning the Advancement of Trade, 4to. XXIII. Of Sheriffs Accounts, Folio. This was printed in 1683, in 8vo, as we obſerved above. XXIV. Copies of Evidences, Folio. XXV. Mr. Selden's Diſcourſes, 8vo. XXVI. Excerpta ex Schedis Seldenianis. XXVII. Journal of the 18 and 21 Jacobi Regis, 4to. XXVIII. Great Common-Place Book of Reports in Caſes of the Law, in Law-French, Folio. In bundles are the following MSS. On Quod tibi fieri, &c. Matt. vii. 12. Touching Puniſhments, in relation to the Socinian Controverſy. Policies of the Church of Rome. Concerning the Laws of England. Of the Amendment of the Laws of England. Touching Proviſion for the Poor. Upon Mr. Hobbes's Manuſcript. Concerning the time of the Abolition of the Jewiſh Law. In Quarto are the following, Quod Deus ſit. Of the State and Condition of the Soul and Body after Death. Notes concerning Matters of Law. The Manuſcript of his Placita Coronæ was ordered to be printed by the Houſe of Commons, as appears from the following extract from the Journal of that Houſe. "Lunæ 29° die Novemb. 1680. Or-"dered, That the executors of Sir Matthew Hale, "late Lord Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench, "be deſired to print the MSS. relating to the Crown-"Law, and that a Committee be appointed to take "care in the printing thereof, and it is referred to "Sir William Jones, Serjeant Maynard, Sir Francis "Winnington, Mr. Sacheverel, Mr. George Pelham, "Mr. Paul Foley." It was at laſt printed at London, 1736, in two Volumes in Folio, under this title: Hiſtoria Placitorum Coronæ. The Hiſtory of the Pleas of the Crown. By Sir Matthew Hale, Knt. ſometime Lord Chief Juſtice of the Court of King's Bench. Now firſt publiſhed from his Lordſhip's Original Manuſcript, and the ſeveral References to the Records examined by the Originals, with large Notes. By Sollom Emlyn, of Lincoln's-Inn, Eſq; To which is added, a table of the principal Matters. It is dedicated by Mr. Emlyn to Sir Joſeph Jekyll, Knt. Maſter of the Rolls. The Editor in his Preface obſerves, that the Treatiſe publiſhed ſeveral years before under the title of, Pleas of the Crown, by Sir Matthew Hale, was only a plan of this work, containing little more than the heads and diviſions thereof. The title of Hiſtoria Placitorum Coronæ was given to this work by our author himſelf, who intended, as appears from the Proœmium, to have taken in the whole body of the Crown-Laws, as well in relation to matters civil, as matters criminal; for which purpoſe he once deſigned to have added two or more books upon this ſubject, the one concerning offences not capital, the other touching franchiſes and liberties; but neither of theſe appears ever to have been compoſed by him; ſo that, as it now ſtands, it treats only of offences capital, which is indeed the moſt important branch of the Crown-Law, being what moſt nearly affects the life and liberty of the ſubject. Beſides in treating thereof he has unavoidably explained many incidental matters equally applicable to offences not capital. The firſt part of this work relates to the nature of the offences, viz. the ſeveral kinds of treaſon, hereſy, and felony. The ſecond of theſe, hereſy, being an offence of a ſpiritual nature, of which it was not our author's purpoſe to treat, was at firſt wholly omitted by him; but afterwards conſidering, probably, that by its being circumſcribed by act of Parliament, viz. 1. Eliz. it became an offence of temporal cognizance, he thought proper to inſert a chapter upon that head. The ſecond part relates to the manner of proceeding againſt offenders, wherein are conſidered the juriſdiction of the ſeveral Courts, the manner of apprehending, committing, bailing, and arraigning offenders, their ſeveral pleas, bringing them to trial, judgment, and execution. The table is a perfect analyſis of the whole work. The learned gentleman (21), who drew it up, hath followed our author through all the diviſions and ſub-diviſions of his various ſubjects; and ſhewn, that he as well underſtood Sir Matthew Hale's method, as the matter of his treatiſe, ſo that this table, in the opinion of many, ſtands in competition with the very beſt tables to the books of our Law. Mr. Bayle has ſhewn on ſeveral occaſions the great uſe of a good Index, and the prodigious inconvenience of a bad one. See particularly the articles of (NICHOLAS) ANTONIO, and (SEBASTIAN) CASTALIO.

(21 Charles Robinſon of Grays-Inn Eſq;

[O] He was twice married, and had children by his former wife, but none by the latter.] His firſt wife was Anne, daughter of Sir Henry Moor of Faly in Berkſhire, grandchild to Sir Francis Moor, Serjeant at Law. By her he had ten children; the four firſt of whom died young, the other ſix lived to be all married; and he outlived them all, except his eldeſt daughter and his youngeſt ſon. His eldeſt ſon, Robert, married Frances, daughter of Sir Francis Chock of Avington in Berkſhire; and they both dying in a little time one after another, left five children, two ſons, Matthew and Gabriel, and three daughters, Anne, Mary, and Frances; and by the Judge's advice, they both made him their executor; upon which he took his grandchildren into his own care, and among them left his eſtate. His ſecond ſon, Matthew, married Anne, daughter of Mr. Matthew Simmonds of Hilſley in Glouceſterſhire, who died ſoon after, and left one ſon named Matthew. His third ſon, Thomas, married Rebecca, daughter of Chriſtian le Brune, a Dutch Merchant, and died without iſſue. His fourth ſon, it was ſo. Yet afterwards he abated much of the ſcrupuloſity which he had about cauſes, that appeared at firſt view unjuſt [P]; upon this occaſion, there were two cauſes brought to him, which by the ignorance of the Party or their Attorney were ſo ill repreſented to him, that they ſeemed to be very bad; but he enquiring more narrowly into them, found that they were really good and juſt. After this he ſlackened very much of his former ſtrictneſs of refuſing to meddle in cauſes, upon the ill circumſtances which appeared in them at firſt (cc).

(cc) Burnet, ubi ſupra, pag. 86, 87.

ſon, Edward, married Mary, daughter of Edmund Goodyere Eſq; of Heythorp in Oxfordſhire, and was living in 1682, and had two ſons and three daughters. The Judge's eldeſt daughter, Mary, was married to Edward Alderly of Inniſhannon in the county of Cork in Ireland, who dying left her with two ſons and three daughters. She afterwards married Edward Stephens, ſon of Edward Stephens Eſq; of Cherington in Glouceſterſhire. His youngeſt daughter Elizabeth was married to Edward Webb Eſq; Barriſter at Law, and died, leaving two children, a ſon and daughter. Sir Matthew's ſecond wife was Anne, the daughter of Mr. Joſeph Biſhop of Faly in Berkſhire, by whom he had no children (22).

(22) Burnet, pag. 109, 110.

[P] Afterwards he abated much of the ſcrupuloſity, which he had about cauſes that appeared at firſt view unjuſt.] Cicero (23) has a remarkable paſſage with relation to the duty of Advocates and Judges. Atque etiam hoc præceptum officii diligenter tenendum eſt, ne quem unquam innocentem judicio capitis arceſſas; id enim ſine ſcelere fieri nullo pacto poteſt. Nam quid eſt tam inhumanum, quam eloquentiam, à naturâ ad ſalutem hominum & ad conſervationem datam, ad bonorum peſtem perniciemque convertere? Nec tamen, ut hoc fugiendum eſt, item habendum eſt religioni, nocentem aliquando, modo ne nefarium impiumque defendere. Vult hoc multitudo, patitur conſuetudo, fert etiam humanitas. Judicis eſt, ſemper in cauſis verum ſequi; Patroni, nonnunquam veriſimile, etiam ſi minus ſit verum, defendere.

(23) De Offic. lib. 2.

T.

HALES (JOHN), one of the moſt learned and judicious Divines of the Church of England, and ſeldom mentioned without the title of ever-memorable (a), was a younger ſon of John Hales (Steward to the family of the Horners in Somerſetſhire) eldeſt ſon of Edward Hales of Highchurch in that county, ſon of John Hales of the ſame place, ſon of Richard Hales, by his wife the daughter of Beauchamp (b). He was born in the pariſh of St. James in the city of Bath in 1584, and educated in grammar learning there. At thirteen years of age he was ſent to the Univerſity of Oxford in the beginning of 1597, and was for ſome time a ſcholar of Corpus Chriſti College. Sir Henry Savile, Warden of Merton College, being informed of the prodigious pregnancy of his parts, reſolved to bring him into the ſaid College; and Mr. Hales was encouraged to ſtand for a Fellowſhip, and an election being appointed in 1605, and all candidates ſifted and examined to the utmoſt, he was the firſt who was choſen (c). Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage [A]; and in 1612 was appointed Greek Profeſſor (d). In March the year following he was choſen by the Univerſity to make a funeral oration upon Sir Thomas Bodley [B]. In 1616 he held a correſpondence with Mr. Oughtred, as appears by an original letter of his to that excellent Mathematician, which we ſhall give the reader in the note [C]. In 1618 he went into Holland Chaplain to Sir Dudley Carlton,

(a) See Mr. Des Maizeaux's Hiſtorical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of the ever-memorable Mr. John Hales, Fellow of Eton College, and Canon of Windſor. Being a ſpecimen of an hiſtorical and critical Engliſh Dictionary. pag. 1. London 1719 8vo, pagg. 90. beſides the Index. The Dedication to Thomas Lord Parker, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, is dated Feb. 23, 1718-9.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 199. 2° edit. London 1721.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(d) Hiſt. & Antiquit. Univerſit. Oxon. lib. 2. pag. 39.

[A] Here he diſtinguiſhed himſelf to great advantage.] "Through the whole courſe of his Bachelorſhip, ſays Mr. Wood (1) there was never any one in the then "memory of man, that ever went beyond him for "ſubtile diſputations in Philoſophy, for his eloquent "Declamations and Orations, as alſo for his exact "knowledge of the Greek Tongue, evidently demonſtrated afterwards, not only when he read the "Greek Lecture in that College, but alſo the public "Lecture of that Tongue in the Schools. His profound learning and natural endowments (not that I "ſhall take notice of his affability, ſweetneſs of nature, and complaiſance, which ſeldom accompany "hard ſtudents and criticks) made him beloved of all "good men, particularly of Savile, who found him, "though young, ſerviceable in his editions of St. Chryſoſtome's works (2)."

(1) Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 199. 2d edit. London 1721.

(2) Dr. Heylin in his Cyprianus Anglicus; or The Hiſtory of the Life and Death of William Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury, lib. 4. ad ann. 1638. pag. 361. edit. London 1668 in fol. tells us likewiſe, that H. Savile made great uſe of him in that work.

[B] Choſen by the Univerſity to make a Funeral Oration upon Sir Thomas Bodley.] This Oration was printed the ſame year at Oxford with this title: Oratio funebris habita in Collegio Mertonenſi a Johanne Haleſio, Magiſtro in artibus, & ejuſdem Collegii Socio, anno 1613, Martii 29. quo die clariſſimo Equiti D. Thomæ Bodleio funus ducebatur. Oxonii 1613 in 4to. It is reprinted in the Vitæ ſelectorum aliquot Virorum, qui Doctrinâ, Dignitate, aut Pietate inclaruere, publiſhed by Dr. William Bates (3) at London 1648 in 4to.

(3) Pag. 421, & ſeqq.

[C] An Original Letter of his to that excellent Mathematician, which we ſhall give the reader in the Note.] It was communicated to us by the very learned William Jones Eſq; F. R. S. It is addreſſed to his verie good friend Mr. William Owtred at his houſe in Aldbury. It is as follows:

"Good Mr. Owtred,

"Since your being with us at Eton, I was but one "three daies abſent, and then only fell out the opportunity of anſwering your letters, eruditas, bone "Deus! et perhumanas; which by being at Oxford "I unfortunately miſt. Now verily, Sir, I muſt "needs confeſſe, that ſuch kindneſs and ſo beneficiall "upon ſo ſmall acquaintance I never received at the "hands of any man, as I have at yours. Either your "facility was great, or your paines very much, who "could in ſo ſhort a ſpace diſcharge yourſelf of ſo "many quæries. But howſoever I eſteeme your courtyſie above all the reſt. Amongſt all the ſolutions "which you ſent me, none there was, which gave "mee not full and ſufficient ſatisfaction (and ſo I perſwade myſelfe would have given to one of deeper "ſkill than myſelfe) one only excepted, and that is "concerning the projectures of an oblique circle. "I muſt confeſſe I cannot well put by your demonſtration, neither indeede, to ſpeake plainly, "do I throughly conceive of it, by reaſon I doubt "not of my being unexperienced in theſe ſtudyes. "For if I well conceive the nature of projection, "which I take to be nothing elſe but the repreſentation of ſome ſhape and figure in plano, accordingly "as it appears to the eye, I do not ſee how your "concluſion can be good, except it be granted, that "there is no means to expreſſe an oblique circle ac"cording as it appears to the eye, which is againſt "your own experience. For even in the univerſal "Aſtrolabe there is one only circle fully and circularly projected into a ſtrait line; all the reſt are "either Ellipſes, or elſe figures drawing neere unto "the nature of Ellipſes compoſed of two arches of "circles, which I think indeed to bee Ellipſes. For "if ſo be every meridian in the univerſall Planiſphere "be to bee projected as a circle, then why are they "not indeede all circles, ſince that the Aſtrolabe is "nothing elſe but the projection of all the reſt of "the

Noe, not as it appeares to the eye, but as the viſual rayes comeing from the eye by the circumference of a circle inſcribed upon the globe, doe terminate upon a plaine diametrically oppoſite to the eye; the eye itſelf muſt be underſtood to be placed in the very end of the diameter.

Carlton, Embaſſador from King James I to the United Provinces, at the time of the Synod of Dort. And as Sir Dudley was obliged to give the King an account of the proceedings of the Synod, he ſent Mr. Hales to Dort, to inform him of what paſſed in that Aſſembly. Mr. Hales being recommended to Bogerman, Preſident of the Synod, and ſome others of the principal men there, became acquainted with their moſt ſecret deliberations; and having beſides the advantage of being preſent at the ſeſſions or meetings of that Synod, he was witneſs to their public tranſactions, whereof he afterwards gave an account to the Embaſſador. The letters, which he wrote to him on that occaſion, have been printed [D]. In his younger years he was a Calviniſt, and even then when he was employed in that Synod; but at the well preſſing St. John iii. 16. by Epiſcopius, there he bid John Calvin good-night, as he often told his friend Mr. Anthony Farindon (e). Mr. Des Maizeaux is of opinion (f), that it was after his return to England that he was made Fellow of Eton College; and Mr. Wood obſerves (g), that it was partly by the recommendation of Sir Dudley Carlton, and partly by the intereſt of Sir Henry Savile, Provoſt of that College; but it appears from the Regiſter of that College, that he had been admitted Fellow May the 24th 1613. Our author was a ſincere lover of truth, as well as maſter of a clear and ſolid judgment; and as by theſe qualities diſtinguiſhed what is eſſential to Religion from what is but accidental or even quite foreign; ſo he was grieved to ſee Chriſtians hate and perſecute each other for mere ſpeculations, and uſed to expreſs himſelf thereupon with a frankneſs peculiar to him, and ſhewed his deſire to have Religion reduced to its primitive purity and ſimplicity, which drew upon him the imputation of being a Socinian (h); and ſome books have been aſcribed to him, which were in effect written by Socinians [E]. His principles (e) See Mr. Farindon's Letter to Mr. Garthwait, dated Sept. 17, 1657, prefixed to Mr. Hales's Golden Remains.

(f) Ubi ſupra, pag. 3.

(g) Ubi ſup. a.

(h) Des Maizeaux, pag. 4.

" the Meridians in the plaine of one? If I take upon
" mee to diſpute with you, it is but only to learne,
" and learne I cannot of you, except I betraie my " ignorance unto you; and aſſure yourſelfe I will
" moſt ſhamefully confeſs it unto you, that I may re-
" ceave information from you. But I would not wiſh
" you to trouble yourſelfe about this buſines; for I am
" now upon going to Oxford, not to returne to ſtaie
" till about twelve or fourteen daies before Chriſtmas,
" about which tyme I underſtand by your father
" you are purpoſed to bee here. For that private " matter, about which you wrote, I muſt confeſſe I " have thought more upon it, than ever I did in my " life; but what the reaſons are why I remaine ir-
" reſolute, I will throughly acquaint you when I can
" ſpeak with you. You ſhall receave by your manne
" your little compendium of Triangles, by which I
" muſt confeſſe I have found myſelfe much eaſed.
" And now what is it that I can return you for all
" theſe exceeding curteſies? But I do not love to com" plement; and if I miſtake you not, you do not " expect it. I praie let me bee remembred, though " unknown, to Miſtreſſe Owtrede; and ſo commending
" my love unto you, I commit you to God.

" From Eton Col-
" ledge this 7th of
" October 1616.

Your true, plaine
and loving friend

" Jo. Hales."

[D] The Letters, which he wrote to him on that Occaſion, have been printed.] They are printed in his Golden Remains, London 1659 in 4to. There are thirty-two of them (4). The firſt is dated the $\frac{14}{24}$ of November 1618, and the laſt the 7th of February 1619. To this Collection are added fifteen Letters written to Sir Dudley Carlton by Mr. Walter Balcanqual, who had been ſent to the Synod as a Repreſentative of the Church of Scotland. Theſe Letters have been received with great Applauſe by the Arminians in Holland, who are of opinion, that they diſcover the partiality and injuſtice of the Synod againſt them. Fifteen of Mr. Balcanqual's Letters, and ſeven of Mr. Hales's, were tranſlated into Latin, and inſerted in the ſecond Edition of the Præſtantium ac eruditorum virorum epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, &c. publiſhed at Amſterdam in 1684 by Mr. Limborch, in fol.

(4) There is among them one of Mr. Balcanqual's, dated the 13th of Feb. 1618.

[E] Some Books have been aſcribed to him, which were in effect written by Socinians.] Mr. Wood (5) ranks among the things that Mr. Hales hath written, the Book entituled, Brevis Diſquiſitio, an & quomodo vulgo dicti Evangelici Pontificios, ac nominatim Val. Magni de Acatholicorum credendi regula Judicium, ſolidè atque evidenter refutare queant. Eleutheropoli, apud Godfridum Philalethium, anno MDCXXXIII. in twelves (6) pag. 72. This Book was aſcribed to our Author ſoon after the publication of it, as appears from the following Paſſage in a Letter of Dr. Samuel Ward, Maſter of Sidney-Suſſex College in Cambridge to Archbiſhop Uſher, dated at Cambridge July the 7th 1634 (7). " There is a little Book, entituled,
" Brevis Diſquiſitio, which I ſuppoſe your Lordſhip
" hath ſeen. It contains in it ſundry both Socinian
" and Pelagian points; as alſo that the Body, which
" ſhall be raiſed in the Reſurrection, is not idem nu-
" mero; alſo Souls do not live till the Reſurrection;
" beſides ſundry others points. It is printed Eleuther-
" poli. It is ſaid it cometh out of Eaton College, and " that Alefius ſhould be the Author, who was at
" Dort with us. I am ſorry ſuch a Book ſhould come
" thence (8)." But this Book was written by Joachimus Stegmannus, a celebrated Socinian Miniſter (9). It was tranſlated into Engliſh, and publiſhed in 1653 with this Title: Brevis Diſquiſitio: Or a brief enquiry touching a better way than is commonly made uſe of to refute Papiſts, and reduce Proteſtants to Certainty and Unity in Religion. London 1653 in 8vo. pagg. 48. Mr. Wood reckons alſo among Mr. Hales's works the little Book, intitled, Diſſertatio de Pace & Concordia Eccleſiæ. Eleutheropoli 1628 in 12mo. " This Book, adds he (10),
" which is much celebrated by famous Authors, is " printed in the ſame Character, and at the ſame ſup-
" poſed place, as his Brevis Diſquiſitio; and therefore
" by the generality is taken to be written by our Au" thor." But if Mr. Wood had looked into Sandius's Bibliotheca above quoted, he would have found that Samuel Przipcovius, a Poliſh Knight, and a great Unitarian, was the true Author of it. Sandius names it firſt in the Catalogue of that writer's works (11), and it has been publiſhed with his other writings in the edition of them printed in 1692 in fol. It has been tranſlated into Engliſh, and printed under this title: Diſſertatio de Pace, &c. Or a Diſcourſe touching the Peace and Concord of the Church. Wherein is elegantly and acutely argued, that not ſo much a bad Opinion, as a bad Life excludes a Chriſtian out of the Kingdom of Heaven; and that the things neceſſary to be known for the attainment of Salvation are very few and eaſy; and finally that thoſe, who paſs amongſt us under the name of Hereticks, are notwithſtanding to be tolerated. London 1653 in ſmall 8vo, pagg. 64. beſides the Preface. The Engliſh Tranſlation of this and the preceding Tract hath been reprinted in the ſecond Volume of the Phœnix; or revival of ſcarce and valuable Pieces. London 1708 in 8vo. with theſe words added to them; ſuppoſed to be written by Mr. John Hales of Eton. Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (12), that it is not improbable, that what gave occaſion to aſcribe theſe Books to Mr. Hales was, that the general Principles which they are grounded upon, viz. Having no rule of Faith but the Scriptures, explained according

(5) Col. 201.

(6) Mr. Wood is miſtaken, when he ſays that it is in 16°.

(7) See Archbiſhop Uſher's Life and Letters publiſhed by Richard Parr, D. D. Lett. 181. pag. 473. ed. London 1686, in fol.

(8) This paſſage is not taken notice of by Mr. Des Maizeaux in his Life of Mr. Hales.

(9) See Chriſtophori Sandii Bibliotb. Anti-Trinitarior. pag. 132, 133.

(10) Col. 201.

(11) Biblioth. Anti-Trin. pag. 123.

(12) Pag. 8.

principles about Church peace and concord appeared chiefly in a Tract, which he wrote at the requeſt and for the uſe of his friend Mr. Chillingworth, concerning Schiſm and Schiſmatics [F]; which Tract being handed about in manuſcript, a copy of it came into the hands of Dr. Laud Archbiſhop of Canterbury; who being diſpleaſed with ſome things contained in it, Mr. Hales wrote a letter to that Prelate in defence of it [G]. We according to ſound reaſon, and allowing all Chriſtian Communions an equal right to interpret the Scripture to the beſt of their Judgment, and to order their Governments or Diſcipline accordingly; "that theſe "general principles, I ſay, were agreeable to Mr. "Hales's Notions, as they are, it muſt be acknow-"ledged, Principles common to all Proteſtants, but "explained and inſiſted upon with more freedom, and "in a particular manner by our Author (13)." But there was not the leaſt ground to infer from thence, that he was a Socinian; and a famous Roman Catholick Author hath with a great deal of Juſtice and Candor vindicated Mr. Chillingworth from that Imputation on the ſame account. After having aſſerted, that Mr. Chillingworth being diſheartened by Daille's Book de uſu Patrum (14), from appealing to the holy Fathers of the Church .... gladly made uſe of the grounds, which he found firſt in a Socinian's Book, who inſtead of a private Divine Spirit ſubſtituted common Reaſon, as the only proper Judge of the ſenſe of Scripture, and that upon theſe Grounds preciſely he has proceeded through his whole Book, intituled, The Religion of Proteſtants, a ſafe way to Salvation; he adds; "But, Sir, is this ſufficient to "make poor Mr. Chillingworth paſs for a Socinian? "Does the making private Reaſon judge of the true "ſenſe of Scripture infer that neither Chriſt nor the "Holy Ghoſt are God? that the pains of Hell are "are not eternal? that ſeparate Souls have no being, "or at leaſt no perception, &c.? God forbid: for "then how many innocent Perſons would be guilty of "Blaſphemies unawares to themſelves?. Then not "only Mr. Chillingworth, but Dr. Stillingfleet, and "beſides them, God knows how many more in Lon-"don and in the Univerſities of England, would be "Socinians (15)." But we have an undeniable Proof of Mr. Hales's not having been a Socinian in his confeſſion of the Trinity printed at the beginning of his Miſcellanies in the golden Remains. It contains the Sum of whatſoever either the Scriptures teach, or the Schools conclude concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity; and Mr. Hales ſays at the cloſe of it, that he who acknowledgeth thus much, can never poſſibly ſcruple the eternal Deity of the Son of God; and adds theſe words: "If any man think this Confeſſion to be defective (for "I can conceive no more in this point neceſſary to "be known) let him ſupply what he conceives to be "deficient, and I ſhall thank him for his favour."

(13) Idem, ibid.

(14) See Mr. Creſſy's Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed to the Catholic Church by Dr. Stillingfleet, &c. pag. 165, & ſeqq. edit. 1672 in 8vo. Lord Clarendon's Animadverſions upon a book intitled, Fanaticiſm fanatically imputed &c. pag. 183, & ſeqq. edit. London 1673 in 8vo, and Mr. Creſſy's Epiſt. Apologetical to a perſon of honour &c. pag. 82. edit. 1674 in 8vo.

(15) Creſſy's Epiſt. Apolog. ibid.

[F] A Tract, which he wrote at the requeſt and for the uſe of his Friend Mr. Chillingworth, concerning Schiſm and Schiſmaticks.] Mr. Wood under the Article of Chillingworth (16), informs us, that Mr. Hales wrote this Tract at his deſire, when Mr. Chillingworth was compoſing his Book intitled, The Religion of Proteſtants, &c. But the ſame Hiſtorian under the Article of Mr. Hales to which he refers the Reader is not ſo poſitive, and attributes the writing of that Tract to ſome other views, "which, as Mr. Des Maizeaux remarks "(17), are equally inconſiſtent with one another, and "with Mr. Hales's Temper and Inclination." Mr. Wood there tells us (18), that all or moſt of this Pamphlet was taken, as it is ſaid, from Socinus, and written about the year 1636. partly, as ſome think, out of Diſcontent, that he had no Preferment conferred on him; partly, as others ſay, for the encouragement of ſome great Maſters of Wit and Reaſon to diſpute the Authority of the Church; and partly at the requeſt of his Friend Mr. Chillingworth, who deſired ſome ſuch matter of him, to be uſed by him in the Compoſition of his Book, intitled, The Religion of Proteſtants, &c. The high Value, which the Engliſh Clergy had for this Tract ſoon after the Reſtoration, is evident from the Quotations, which Dr. Stillingfleet made out of it in his Irenicum: a Weapon-ſalve for the Church's Wounds; the firſt edition which was printed 1661 in 4to, and the ſecond in 1662 with an Appendix concerning the power of Excommunication in a Chriſtian Church. In this Diſcourſe he ſtyles (19) Mr. Hales's Tract concerning Schiſm an excellent one, and the Author a very learned and judicious Divine; as learned and judicious a Divine, as moſt our Nation bred; an excellent Perſon, whoſe words he had taken the pains to tranſcribe, becauſe of that great Wiſdom, Judgment, and Moderation contained in them; a learned, judicious, and rational Author; a grave and wiſe perſon, whoſe words ſavour of a more than ordinary Tincture of a true Spirit of Chriſtianity, that ſcorns to make Religion a foot-ſtool to Pride and Ambition; and he allows him an equal Authority with the moſt eminent Divines of the Church of England; "all "which as Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves, he had in-"duſtriouſly and carefully avoided to do, had he not "certainly known, that the Engliſh Clergy did agree "with him in their Judgment of that incomparable "Man, for ſo he calls him likewiſe." The Doctor alſo in his unreaſonableneſs of Separation, printed at London 1681 in 4to anſwers the objection of Mr. Richard Baxter with a Paſſage out of Mr. Hales's Tract (21). However this piece has been attacked not only by Popiſh writers, but even by ſome Divines of the Church of England. The ſame year it came out, Dr. William Page, Maſter of the Free-ſchool at Reading, publiſhed againſt it certain Animadverſions upon ſome paſſages in a Tract concerning Schiſm and Schiſmaticks, &c. Oxford 1642 in 4to. (22). And Philip Scot, a Roman Catholick, likewiſe attacked it in his Treatiſe of the Schiſm of England, Amſterdam 1650 in 12mo. (23). After the Reſtoration it was animadverted upon by ſome Divines of the Church of England, who were diſpleaſed to find it cited by other Divines of the ſame Church, as a Book tending to promote Peace and Unity, and made uſe of by the Nonconformiſts to juſtify their ſeparation from the Church. This we ſhall relate more particularly in Mr. Wood's own words (24). And ſince it hath given great advantage and uſe to ſome that have not loved, nor are lovers of the Church of England, as (1) E.S. in his Irenicum. (2) Dr. Jo. Owen in his Plea (25) for the Nonconformiſt. (3) The Author of Separation no Schiſm, wrote againſt Dr. John Sharp's Sermon before the Lord Mayor (26), on Rom. 14. 19. (4) Andr. Marvell in his Rehearſal tranſpoſed part I. &c. So that advantage being taken by it, and the Tract ſeveral times printed, ſome of the Orthodox Clergy have anſwered it; among which have been (1) Robert Conold, M. A. in his Notion of Schiſm in two Letters; the laſt of which is againſt Mr. Hales (2), Tho. Long, B. D. in his Character of a Separatiſts; but more largely in his Book intituled, Mr. Hales's Treatiſe of Schiſm examined and cenſured, &c. Mr. Conold's Book is intitled, The Notion of Schiſm ſtated according to the antients, and conſidered with reference to the Non-Conformiſts; and the Pleas for Schiſmatics examined: Being Animadverſions upon the Plea for the Non-Conformiſt: With Reflections on that famous Tract of Schiſm, written by Mr. Hales. In two Letters to a very worthy Gentleman. By Robert Conold, M. A. London 1677 in 8vo.

(16) Ath. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 43.

(17) Pag. 10.

(18) Col. 202.

(19) Irenic. pag. 120. 2d edit. London 1662 in 4to.

(20) Pag. 25.

(21) See Unreaſonableneſs of Separation, pag. 146.

(22) Wood, col. 333.

(23) Idem, col. 202.

(24) Ibid.

(25) Printed in 1674 in 8vo.

(26) This Sermon was preached in 1674; and the Separation no Schiſm was printed in 1675, being written by Mr. Tho. Wadſworth. See Dr. Calamy's Life of Mr. R. Baxter, vol. 1. pag. 346. and vol. 2. p. 26.

[G] Mr. Hales wrote a Letter to that Prelate in defence of it.] This Letter was firſt publiſhed by the Author of, The Difficulties and Diſcouragements, which attend the ſtudy of the Scriptures in the way of private Judgment, &c. who added it to the 7th Edition of that Pamphlet printed in 1716. Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (27), that it was probably found among the Papers of Archbiſhop Laud, which after the Reſtoration were taken from Mr. Prynne. In this Letter Mr. Hales declares, that as to the Things diſcuſſed in the Tract concerning Schiſm, if they be Errors, which he hath here vented (as perchance, ſays he, they are) yet his Will hath no part in them, and they are but iſſues of unfortunate Inquiry. And he expreſſes how careful and conſtant he hath been in the purſuit of Truth. After this previous Declaration he obſerves, that "howſo-"ever he hath miſcaſt ſome parcel of his accounts, "yet he is moſt certain, that the total ſum is right; "for it amounts to no more than that Precept of the "Apoſtle, as far as it is poſſible have peace with all "Men." And he farther adds, that "there could be

(27) Pag. 16.

We have no certain account of what paſſed afterwards between the Archbiſhop and him [H]; but though his Grace's notions concerning the authority of the Church and other points were different from thoſe of our author, yet he entertained ſo high an opinion of

" no great harm in the Premiſſes, where the conclu-
" ſion was nothing elſe but peace." Theſe things being premiſed, he ſays, that all that may ſeem to lie open to exception, is compriſed under two general heads, his Carriage, 1. towards Antiquity; 2. towards Authority. He anſwers firſt thoſe, who thought that he had been too ſharp in cenſuring Antiquity beyond that good reſpect which is due unto it. And as to Authority, he ſays, " Whereas in one point, ſpeaking of Church-Autho" rity, I bluntly added [which is none] I muſt ac" knowledge it was uncautiouſly ſpoken, and being " taken in a generality, is falſe, tho' as it refers to " the occaſion, which I there fall upon, it is (as I think
" I may ſafely ſay) moſt true." He ſhews afterwards that by Church-Authority, he did not mean the Juriſdiction of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons in Church Cauſes or matter of Fact, wherein the ſaid Perſons, " in caſes
" of their cognizance have the ſame Authority as " any other have, to whom power of juriſdiction is " committed. Their Conſiſtories, their Courts, their " Determinations, ſtand upon as warrantable Evidence
" as the Deciſions of other Benches and Courts do." But that by Church Authority he viſibly meant the Deciſion of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons in point of Church Queſtions and diſputable Opinions. " I count, ſays he, in point of " deciſion of Church Queſtions, if I ſay of the Autho" rity of the Church, that it was none, I know no
" adverſary that I have, the Church of Rome only ex-
" cepted. For this cannot be true, except we make " the Church judge of Controverſies, the contrary of " which we generally maintain againſt that Church.
" Now it plainly appears, ſays he, that upon this " occaſion I ſpoke for it; for beginning to ſpeak of " Schiſm ariſing by reaſon of ambiguous opinions,
" I brought in nakedly thoſe words, which gave " occaſion of Offence; which if I had ſpoken with
" due Qualification, I had not erred at all." Again, continues he, whereas I did too plainly deliver myſelf de Origine Dominii, and denied it to be founded either in Nature or in Religion; I am very well content to put off the Deciſion of this point till Elias come. He ſhews it to be a point of mere Speculation, which in common life and uſe hath no place at all; and adds, " That whether Dominion in Civilibus, or in Sacris,
" be Κτίσις, &c. or comes by Divine Right, it con" cerns them to look to, who have Dominion com" mitted to them. To others, ſays he, whoſe Duty it " is to obey, and myſelf above all, who am beſt con-
" tented to live and die a poor and private Man, it is
" a Speculation merely uſeleſs." But he ſuppoſes at the ſame time, that what is commanded to private Perſons by their ſuperiors, may be done with good Conſcience. Laſtly, he vindicates himſelf againſt ſome Perſons, who by reaſon of a Paſſage, wherein he ſharply tasked Epiſcopal Ambition, ſuſpected that in his Heart he did ſecretly lodge a Malignity againſt the Epiſcopal Order; and that under pretence of taxing the Antients, he ſecretly laſhed at the preſent Times. He ſhews that he had not given the leaſt pretence for ſuch an Imputation; and concludes by rejoicing at the happy Condition of Epiſcopacy in England, as it was then, and had been ſettled for well near one hundred Years.

[H] We have no certain account of what paſſed afterwards between the Archbiſhop and him.] Dr. Peter Heylin indeed, who took for granted, that Mr. Hales was the true author of the Socinian Books mentioned in the note , and had very different ſentiments from our author with regard to Church-Power, after having obſerved (28), that as the Archbiſhop had laboured by the means which he relates, to preſerve the Church of England from the growth of Popery, ſo he took care for preventing the ſubverſion of it by the ſpreading of the Socinian Hereſies; and directed the ſuppreſſing all Books of that nature, which had been imported into England out of other countries; adds (29), " There had " been publiſhed a Diſcourſe, called Diſquiſitio brevis,
" in which ſome of the principal Socinian tenents
" were cunningly inſerted, pretending them for the " beſt expedients to appeaſe ſome controverſies betwixt
" us and Rome. The book aſcribed in common
" ſpeech to Hales of Eaton, a man of infinite read" ing and no leſs ingenuity, free of diſcourſe, and as " communicative of his knowledge as the cœleſtial
" bodies of their light and influences. There paſt
" alſo up and down a Diſcourſe of Schiſm, not printed,
" but tranſmitted from hand to hand in written co-
" pies, intended chiefly for the encouragement of ſome
" of our greateſt maſters of wit and reaſon, to deſpiſe the " authority of the Church. Which being diſperſed
" about this time (30), gave the Archbiſhop occaſion
" to ſend for him to Lambeth, in hope that he might " gain the man, whoſe abilities he was well acquainted
" with, when he lived in Oxon; an excellent Gre-
" cian in thoſe days, and one whom Savil made great
" uſe of in his Greek Edition of St. Chryſoſtome's
" works. About nine of the clock in the morning
" he came to know his Grace's pleaſure, who took " him along with him into his garden, commanding
" that none of his ſervants ſhould come at him upon " any occaſion. There they continued in diſcourſe
" till the bell rang to prayers, and after prayers were " ended, till the dinner was ready, and after that " too, till the coming in of the Lord Conway and " ſome other perſons of honour, put a neceſſity upon
" ſome of his ſervants to give him notice how the " time had paſſed away. So in they came, high-
" coloured, and panting for want of breath; enough
" to ſhew, that there had been ſome heats between " them not then fully cooled. It was my chance to " be there that day, either to know his Grace's plea-
" ſure, or to render an account of ſome former com" mands (31), but I know not which; and I found
" Hales very glad to ſee me in that place (32), as " being himſelf a meer ſtranger to it and unknown
" to all. He told me afterwards, that he found the " Archbiſhop (whom he knew before for a nimble
" Diſputant) to be as well verſed in books as buſi-
" neſs; that he had been ferretted by him from one
" hold to another, till there was none left to afford
" him any further ſhelter; that he was now reſolved
" to be orthodox, and to declare himſelf a true ſon
" of the Church of England, both for doctrine and " diſcipline; that to this end he had obtained leave
" to call himſelf his Graces's Chaplain, that naming
" him in his public prayers for his Lord and Patron,
" the greater notice might be taken of the alteration.
" Thus was Hales gained to the Church, and gained " a good preferment in it; promoted not long after by
" the Archbiſhop's commendation to be Prebend of " Windſor, and to hold the ſame by ſpecial diſpenſa-
" tion with his place in Eton." In this narrative Dr. Heylin aſſerts two things; firſt, that Mr. Hales was once a Socinian, and an enemy to the Authority of the Church; and ſecondly, that he was reclaimed from his errors by Archbiſhop Laud, in a converſation which that Prelate had with him, and thereby gained unto the Church of England. But the imputation of Socinianiſm is here founded upon the notion, that Mr. Hales was the author of the Diſquiſitio brevis, which we have ſhewn above to be a miſtake. And the accuſation of his having been an enemy to the Authority of the Church, is grounded by the Doctor on his Tract concerning Schiſm, which was, ſays he, intended chiefly for ſome of our greateſt maſters of wit and reaſon to deſpiſe the authority of the Church. Mr. Des Maizeaux (34), to enable the reader to judge the better what ſtreſs is to be laid on this laſt acculation, enters into the character of Dr. Heylin, whom he ſhews from Mr. Wood's Athenæ Oxonienſes to have been a man of forwardneſs, high conceit of himſelf, and confidence; a ſevere and vigorous oppoſer of Schiſmaticks; and with regard to his hiſtorical writings, in ſome things too much a Party to be an Hiſtorian; in ſhort very remote from Mr. Hales's ſentiments with reſpect to the Church, which the Doctor in a Diſputation at Oxford in 1627 maintain'd could not err. Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (35) " that it is eaſy to imagine, that ſuch a man as he,
" muſt

(28) Cyprianus Anglicus, ut ſupra, lib. 4. ad ann. 1638, pag. 361.

(29) Ibid. pag. 361, 362.

(30) In the year 1638.

(31) Dr. Heylin was the Archbiſhop's Chaplain.

(32) The Dr. calls Mr. Hales his dear friend in the Quinquarticular Hiſtory, Part 1. cap. 5. Sect. 7 and 10.

(33) It is probable, that the Doctor means here Mr. Chillingworth.

(34) Pag. 28, 29.

(35) Pag. 29, 30.

of him, that it is ſaid he uſed his aſſiſtance in preparing the ſecond edition of his Anſwer to Fiſher the Jeſuit publiſhed in 1639, where the objections of A. C. againſt the firſt edition are ſo fully confuted (i). It is certain, that Mr. Hales was the ſame year preferred to a Canonry of Windſor (k), which could not be done without the approbation or favour of the Archbiſhop, who had then ſo great an intereſt at Court, and was beſides

(i) Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves, pag. 18. marginal note (i), that this may be verified by comparing ſome of Mr. Hales's pieces with A. C.'s objections.

(k) His patent bears date May 23, 1639; and he was inſtalled June the 27th following. See Dr. John Walker's Attempt towards recovering an account of the numbers and ſufferings of the Clergy of the Church of England, &c. who were ſequeſtered &c. in the late times of the Grand Rebellion, Part 2. pag. 94.

" muſt take every body to be an Heretick, who " would not allow the Church the ſame power and " dominion as he did; and conſequently could not but " be highly offended at Mr. Hales's Tract of Schiſm, " wherein it is aſſerted, that Church-Authority is none. " And ſo far the Doctor is in the right to ſay, that " this Tract teaches people to deſpiſe the Authority of " the Church; for it teaches us to reject all human " authority, and have no rule of faith beſides the " Scripture. But it muſt be owned at the ſame time " that this is the true doctrine of the Proteſtants; " and that whatever ſhifts and evaſions ſome of them " may uſe, they are forced to come into it, when the " Diſpute is with the Roman Catholics. Mr. Chil- " lingworth hath made it the foundation of his Reli- " gion of Proteſtants &c. ... And this ſhews what " little regard is to be had to Dr. Heylin, when he re- " preſents Mr. Hales as a man out of the Pale of the " Church of England, becauſe he ſtrenuouſly, but " freely, openly, and candidly aſſerted the grand princi- " ple of the Reformation. Dr. Stillingfleet had a very " different idea both of Mr. Hales and of his Tract of " Schiſm." Mr. Des Maizeaux concludes therefore (36) that both the aſſertions of Dr. Heylin are groundleſs, ſince the Archbiſhop could not recall our author from heretical opinions, which he never held, or from erroneous opinions which are no errors at all; and that whoever knows the nature of man will not think it probable, that a perſon of Mr. Hales's judgment, learning and impartiality, being already fifty four years old, could in a few hours converſation account falſe and heretical a doctrine, which he had always looked upon as an eſſential part of his Religion; a doctrine, that muſt have been the frequent object of his enquiry and meditation, and that had been ſolemnly profeſſed and maintained by ſome of the greateſt men of the Church of England then living. Mr. Des Maizeaux adds, that theſe and the like conſiderations would be ſufficient to confute Dr. Heylin's aſſertions; but that we may carry this point further, and bring it to a demonſtration by plain matter of fact. We have the Letter, which Mr. Hales wrote to Archbiſhop Laud, to vindicate his Tract of Schiſm, in which Tract he had ſaid, that Church-Authority was none; and though in his Letter he owns that expreſſion to have been uncautious, yet he maintains it to be moſt true in the ſenſe, in which he ſpoke it. For he ſhews that by Church-Authority he meant the deciſion of Eccleſiaſtical perſons, in reference to controverted points of doctrine and diſcipline, which he calls Church-Queſtions. I count, ſays he, in point of Deciſion of Church-Queſtions, if I ſay of the Authority of the Church, that it was none, I know no adverſary that I have, the Church of Rome only excepted. For this cannot be true, except we make the Church judge of Controverſies; the contrary to which we generally maintain againſt that Church. Now it plainly appears, that upon this occaſion I ſpake it; for beginning to ſpeak of Schiſm ariſing by reaſon of ambiguous opinions, I brought in nakedly thoſe words, which gave occaſion of offence, which if I had ſpoken with due qualification, I had not erred at all. We ſee here, as Mr. Des Maizeaux obſerves (37), that the words, which he had uſed in his Tract, viz. that Church-Authority was none, are the very words, which gave occaſion of offence, and contain the doctrine ſo much abhorred by Dr. Heylin; yet that he doth not diſown or palliate what he had ſaid; but on the contrary maintains it to be the undoubted doctrine of the Proteſtants, and particularly the Church of England, whereof he acknowledges himſelf a member, when he ſays to the Archbiſhop, the contrary to which we generally maintain againſt the Church of Rome. Mr. Hales clears in the ſame manner the other poſitions of his Tract of Schiſm. And in reference to the whole, and in juſtice to himſelf, (having no doubt been miſrepreſented to the Archbiſhop) he tells his Grace how active, ſincere, and unbiaſſed he had always been in the purſuit of truth. Concerning the things diſcuſſed in that pamphlet, ſays he, I humbly beg leave, before I come to particulars, to ſpeak for myſelf thus much in general. If they be errors, which I have here vented, (as perchance they are) yet my will hath no part in them, and they are but the iſſues of unfortunate enquiry. Galen, that great Phyſician, ſpeaks thus of himſelf. Ἐγὼ δ' ἐκ παιδὸς ὅπως ἐνθουσιῶν &c. I know not how, ſays that worthy perſon, even from my youth up, in a wonderful manner, whether by divine inſpiration, or by fury and poſſeſſion, or however you may pleaſe to ſtile it, I have much contemned the opinion of the many; but truth and knowledge I have above meaſure affected, verily perſuading myſelf, that a fairer, more divine fortune could never befal a man. Some title, ſome claim I may juſtly lay to the words of this excellent perſon; for the purſuit of truth hath been my only care ever ſince I firſt underſtood the meaning of the word. For this, I have forſaken all hopes, all friends, all deſires, which might biaſs me, and hinder me from driving right at what I aimed. For this I have ſpent my money, my means, my youth, my age, and all I have, that I might remove from myſelf that cenſure of Tertullian, ſuo vitio quis quid ignorat. If with all this coſt and pains my purchaſe is but error, I may ſafely ſay, to err has coſt me more, than it hath many to find the truth; and truth itſelf ſhall give me this teſtimony at laſt, that if I have miſſed of her, it is not my fault, but my misfortune. This is the perſon, who is repreſented by Dr. Heylin as a Sophiſter, who was ferretted from one hole to another, till there was none left to afford him any farther ſhelter; and who in ſome hours converſation could be brought to change his opinions, and put on a new ſet of ideas (38); The Doctor's narrative ſhews plainly, that he knew nothing of Mr. Hales's apologetical Letter to the Archbiſhop, no more than of what paſſed afterwards between them. He ſays that they both came in from the Garden high-coloured, and almoſt panting for want of breath; and from thence he infers, that there had been ſome heats between them not fully cooled. But as to the ſubject of their diſcourſe, and the occaſion of thoſe heats, he leaves us quite in the dark. He adds, that Mr. Hales told him, that he had been ferretted by the Archbiſhop from one hole to another till there was none left to afford him any farther ſhelter; but doth not ſay what he had been ferretted about. In ſhort, the Doctor, according to his own account, was perfectly ignorant of what was debated in the converſation, which Mr. Hales had with the Archbiſhop, though the knowledge of it ſhould have been the ground and foundation of his aſſertions (39). Mr. Des Maizeaux concludes upon the whole, that we cannot rely upon any part of the Doctor's account of Mr. Hales's pretended converſion to the Church of England, from which he had never departed; and that the Doctor was the firſt, who mentioned that circumſtance, and the only authority, which can be found for it; all other writers, who ſpeak of it, having without enquiry only copied it from him, adding however, as it happens but too often on ſuch occaſions, ſomething of their own to the account of their original author, in order to enforce it, and to make it ſerve the better for their purpoſe (41). The writers, whom Mr. Des Maizeaux examines for this purpoſe, are I, Dr. Samuel Parker, afterwards Biſhop of Oxford, in his Reproof to the Rehearſal tranſproſed, in a Diſcourſe to its author: by the author of the Eccleſiaſtical Politie (42). II. Mr. Thomas Long, in a book intitled, Mr. Hales's Treatiſe of Schiſm, examined and cenſured. III. Mr. Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienſes (43). IV. Dr. John Walker in his Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers, and Sufferings of the Clergy &c. (44). V. Mr. Echard's Hiſtory of England (45). Beſides Dr. John Pearſon, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter, who had been intimately acquainted with Mr. Hales, and hath given us his character, makes no mention of that particular, though it was no leſs for the advantage of his readers, than for the honour of his friend, to have it publiſhed if he had known it to be true. On the contrary, he gives us an account of Mr. Hales, which is abſolutely inconſiſtent with that of Dr. Heylin.

(36) Pag. 31.

(37) Pag. 32.

(38) Idem, pag. 33.

(39) Idem, ibid.

(40) Idem, pag. 30, 31.

(41) Idem note [H], pag. 35, & ſeqq.

(42) Pag. 136, & ſeqq. edit. London 1673 in 8vo.

(43) Vol. 2. col. 200.

(44) Part 2. pag. 95. col. 1.

(45) Vol. 2. pag. 140. edit. London 1718 in fol.

besides a patron of learning and learned men (l). When the King and Court resided at Windsor, he was much frequented by Noblemen and Courtiers, who were extremely delighted in his company, not for his severe or retired walks of learning, but for his polite Discourses, Stories, and Poetry (m). For he used sometimes to divert himself with writing Verses; and as he was an excellent Critic, his company was much desired by the greatest wits of that time, the Lord Falkland, Sir John Suckling, Sir William D'Avenant, Ben Johnson, &c. (*) [I]. It is reported, that in his former days he had been heard to say, that he thought he should never die a martyr; "yet, says Mr. Wood (n), he was "known to live a Confessor, and died little less than a martyr for the doctrine and "discipline of the Church of England." For after the civil wars broke out, he was ejected out of his Fellowship of Eton and Canonry of Windsor; however Mr. Penwarden, who had been put into his Fellowship, went to him some time after, and voluntarily offered to resign the place to him; but he refused it [K]; and was obliged to sell his excellent Library, which cost him 2500 l. for 700 l. (o). This money he shared with several Ministers, Scholars, and others, who had been also deprived of their subsistence; by which means this resource soon failed him (p). He might have found it supplied by a Gentleman of the family of the Sedley's in Kent, who invited him to live in his family, with an allowance of an hundred pounds per ann. the keeping of two horses, and a servant's diet; but being wedded to a retired and studious life, he refused to accept of that generous offer; yet about that time accepted of a quarter of that salary with his diet, in the family of Mrs. Salter (q), who lived near Eton, purposely to instruct her son William Salter (r). At last Dr. King, the suffering Bishop of Chichester, together with several of his relations, retiring to the house of this Gentlewoman, they formed a kind of College there, and had the Prayers, Sacraments, &c. according to the orders of the Church of England, in which Mr. Hales officiated as Chaplain (s). Afterwards a declaration being published, prohibiting all persons from harbouring malignants, that is, Royalists, he left that family, notwithstanding the Lady assured him, that she would readily undergo all danger which might ensue by entertaining him; and retiring to Eton, lodged in the house of a widow, whose husband had been his servant (t) [L]. In this obscure retreat he was reduced to extreme want [M], and Mr. Andrew Marvel very justly observes,

(l) Des Maizeaux pag. 19.

(m) Wood, col. 201.

(*) Des Maizeaux, pag. 56.

(n) Col. 201.

(o) He sold it to Cornelius Bee, Bookseller in London. Wood, col. 200.

(p) Walker, ubi supra, pag. 94.

(q) Wood, col. 200. thinks, that she was sister to Dr. Duppa, Bishop of Sarum.

(r) Idem, ibid.

(s) Walker, ubi supra.

(t) Wood, col. 200.

"News in one day as much w'have here,
"As serves all Windsor for a year,
"And which the Carrier brings to you,
"After 't has here been found not true.
"Then think what company's designed "To meet you here, men so refined,
"Their very common talk at board
"And makes wise or mad a young Court-Lord,
"Makes him capable to be
"Umpire in's father's company.
"Where no disputes nor forc't defence
"Of a man's person for his sence
"Take up the time; all strive to be "Masters of truth, as victory;
"And where you come, I'de boldly swear
"A Synod might as eas'ly erre."

[I] He used sometimes to divert himself with writing verses; and as he was an excellent Critic, his company was much desired by the greatest wits of that time, the Lord Falkland, Sir John Suckling, Sir William D'Avenant, Ben. Johnson, &c.] His talent for Poetry appears by Sir John Suckling's mentioning him in his Session of Poets (47).

(47) Fragmenta aurea: a Collection of all the incomparable pieces written by Sir John Suckling, pag. 10. edit. London 1648.

Hales set by himself most gravely did smile
To see them about nothing keep such a toil;
Apollo had spied him, but knowing his mind
Past by, and called Falkland, that sat just behind.

There is among Sir John Suckling's Works a Letter in Verse, which, though Mr. Hales's name is not prefixed to it, discovers itself to have been written to him from London to Eton. Sir John invites him to come to town, and enjoy the company of his friends. The Letter is as follows (48).

(48) Ibid. pag. 34, 35, 36.

"Sir,
"Whether these lines do find you out,
"Putting or clearing of a doubt;
"(Whether Predestination,
"Or reconciling three in one;
"Or the unriddling how men die,
"And live at once eternally,
"Now take you up) know 'tis decreed,
"You straight bestride the College-steed.
"Leave Socinus and the Schoolmen,
"(Which Jack Bond swears do but fool men)
"And come to town: 'tis fit you show,
"Yourself abroad, that men may know
"(Whate'er some learned men have guest)
"That Oracles are not yet ceas'd.
"There shall you find the wit and wine
"Flowing alike, and both divine;
"Dishes, with names not known in books,
"And lesse amongst the College-Cooks;
"With sauce so poignant, that you need
"Not stay till hunger bids you feed.
"The sweat of learned Johnson's brain,
"And gentle Shakespear's easier strain,
"A hackney-coach conveys you to,
"In spite of all that rain can do:
"And for your eighteen pence you sit
"The lord and judge of all fresh wit.

[K] Mr. Penwarden, who had been put into his Fellowship, went to him sometime after, and voluntarily offered to resign the place to him; but he refused it.] Mr. Wood informs us of this particular (49), and observes, that when Mr. Hales refused the offer, he declared, that the Parliament having put him out, he was resolved never to be put in again by them. But this expression, as Mr. Des Maizeaux observes (50), seems to be too loose and general to be Mr. Hales's. For a man's property being taken from him unjustly by certain persons, is not a reason to refuse receiving it again, when the same persons offer to restore it to him. We must therefore suppose that Mr. Hales's refusal was grounded upon some other considerations; as for instance, that he could not be readmitted into his fellowship without complying with such things, as he did not think lawful or proper for him to submit to.

(49) Col. 200.

(50) Note [K] pag. 61, 62.

[L] Retiring to Eton, lodged in the house of a widow, whose husband had been his servant.] This house, says Mr. Wood (51) was next to the Christopher Inn, belonging then to Hannah the widow of John Dickenson, (a servant from his youth to our author Hales,) and afterwards the wife and widow of one Simon Powney; which Hannah was very careful of and respectful to him, as having formerly at her marriage received of his bounty.

(51) Col. 200.

[M] Reduced to extreme want.] This appears evidently from a conversation, which he had with Mr. Anthony Farindon, his intimate friend; who coming one day to see him, some months before Mr. Hales's death, found him at his mean lodgings at Mrs. Powney's house, but in a temper gravely chearful, and well becoming observes (u), that "it is not one of the leaſt ignominies of that age, that ſo eminent a "perſon ſhould have been by the iniquity of the times reduced to thoſe neceſſities, under "which he lived." He died in the houſe of the widow abovementioned on Monday May the 19th 1656, aged ſeventy two years, and was, according to his deſire, buried in Eton College Churchyard (w), where a monument was erected over his grave by Mr. Peter Curwen [N]. He wrote ſeveral pieces, which have been publiſhed ſince his death [O]. He had the marks of great ingenuity in his countenance, which was ſanguine, (u) The Rehearſal tranſpros'd; or Animadverſions on a late book intitled, A Preface ſhewing what grounds there are of fears and jealouſies of Popery, 2d edit. 1672, in 8vo, pag. 175.

(w) Wood, col. 202.

coming an excellent Chriſtian under ſuch circumſtances. After a ſlight and very homely dinner, ſuitable to the lodgings, ſome diſcourſe paſſed between them concerning their old friends, and the black and diſmal aſpect of the times; and at laſt Mr. Hales aſked Mr. Farrindon to walk out with him into the church-yard, where this great man's neceſſities preſt him to tell his friend, that he had been forced to ſell his whole library, ſave a few books which he had given away, and ſix or eight little books of devotion, which lay in his chamber; and that for money he had no more than what he then ſhewed him, which was about ſeven or eight ſhillings; and beſides, ſaid he, I doubt I am indebted for my lodging. Mr. Farrindon it ſeems did not imagine that it had been ſo very mean with him as this came to; and therefore was much ſurprized to hear it; and with-all ſaid, I have at preſent money to command, and to morrow will pay you fifty pounds in part of the many ſums I and my poor wife have received of you in our great neceſſities, and will pay you more ſuddenly as you ſhall want it. To which he anſwered, No, you do not owe me a penny, or if you do, I here forgive you, for you ſhall never pay me a penny. I know you and yours will have occaſion for much more than what you have lately gotten. But if you know any other friend that hath a full purſe, and will ſpare ſome of it to me, I will not refuſe. To which he added, When I die, which I hope is not far off, for I am weary of this uncharitable World I deſire you to ſee me buried in [that] (*) place of the Churchyard, (pointing to the place)." But why not "in the church, ſaith Mr. Farindon, with the Pro-"voſt (†), Sir Henry Wootton, and the reſt of your "friends and predeceſſors?" Becauſe, ſays he, I am neither the founder of it, nor have I been a Benefactor to it, nor ſhall I ever now be able to be ſo, I am ſatisfied. This Paſſage is tranſcribed from Dr. Walker's Attempt (52), who informs us in a marginal note, how he came by theſe particulars. "This Diſcourſe, "ſays he, between Mr. Farringdon and Mr. Hales, I "had out of a looſe ſheet, which was one of Mr. Fa-"rindon's Papers retrieved by Mr. Fulman of C.C.C. "in order to have written the Life of Mr. Hales. It "was communicated to me by the late Mr. Arch-"deacon Davies of Saperton, in Glouceſterſhire, a-"mong ſeveral other Notices relating to my under-"taking."

(*) Dr. Walker tells us, that this word is torn out of his paper; but preſumes it muſt be ſo ſupplied.

(†) Sir Henry Saville.

(52) Pag. 94.

[N] A monument was erected over his grave by Mr. Peter Curwen.] Mr. Wood has given us the beſt part of it (53), but we have it intire in Mr. Le Neve's Monumenta Anglicana (59). It runs thus; Muſarum & Charitum amor Johannes Haleſius (Nomen non tam hominis quam ſcientiæ) hic non jacet, at lutum quod aſſumpſit optimum infra ponitur. Nam certe ſupra mortales emicuit, moribus ſuaviſſimis, ingenio ſubtiliſſimo, pleno pectore ſapuit, mundo ſublimior, adeoque aptior Angelorum conſortio (55). Ætatis ſuæ 72. Impenſis Pet. Curwenni, olim hujus Coll. Alumni.

(53) Col. 202.

(54) Monumenta Anglicana: being inſcriptions on the monuments of ſeveral eminent perſons deceaſed in or ſince the year 1650, to the end of the year 1679, deduced into a ſeries of time by way of Annals. By John le Neve, Gent. pag. 44. Num. 114. edit. London 1718 in 8vo.

(55) Mr. Wood calls it Choro.

[O] He wrote ſeveral pieces, which have been publiſhed ſince his death.] In 1657 Mr. Timothy Garthwait, a Bookſeller of London, having collected ſome Sermons and Letters of Mr. Hales, committed them to the reviſal of Mr. Peter Gunning, who was afterwards Biſhop of Ely; and knowing that Mr. Farindon had been Mr. Hales's intimate friend, he wrote to him in order to have his opinion of theſe ſeveral pieces; whoſe anſwer is prefixed to the edition of them. Mr. Farindon deſigned to have prefixed Mr. Hales's Life to that collection of his works; but died the year following, before he had perfected it. In order to ſupply that loſs, the Bookſeller applied himſelf to Dr. John Pearſon, afterwards Biſhop of Cheſter, who declined entering upon the particulars of our author's Life, and undertook only to draw his character in an epiſtle to the reader. The book was publiſhed in 1659, in 4to, with this title: Golden Remains of the ever memorable Mr. John Hales of Eton Colledge, &c. It contains nine Sermons, the I. On 2 Pet. iii. 16. II. On Rom. xiv. 1. III. On Luke xvi. 25. IV. On Num. xxxv. 33. V. On Matth. xxvi. 75. VI. On Phil. iv. 13. VII. On Luke xviii. 1. VIII. On John xviii. 36. IX. On 1 Sam. xxiv. 3. The firſt of theſe Sermons had already been printed at Oxford in 1617. in 4to. Mr. Farindon in his letter ſeems to inſinuate, that the ſecond had likewiſe been publiſhed ſoon after it was preached. And Mr. Wood (56) intimates that the Sermon of Duels was alſo printed; though he is miſtaken in ſaying, that it was not printed in Mr. Hales's Remains. This volume alſo contains our author's letters from the Synod of Dort, to Sir Dudly Carleton, mentioned in Note (D). Dr. Pearſon concluded his preface with theſe words: "The Editor "hath ſent theſe abroad to explore what welcome "they ſhall find. He hath ſome more of his Ser-"mons and tractates in his hands, and deſires if any "perſon have any other writings of the ſame author "by him, that he would be pleaſed to communicate "them to the Printer of this work, T. Garthwait, "upon promiſe, and any other engagement, that he "will take care to ſee them printed, and ſet forth by "themſelves." Notwithſtanding this advertiſement there were but few pieces added to the ſecond edition of Mr. Hales's Remains, printed in 1673 with this title: Golden Remains of the ever memorable Mr. John Hales of Eton College, &c. The Second Impreſſion. With Additions from the Author's own Copy, viz. Sermons and Miſcellanies. Alſo Letters and Expreſſes concerning the Synod of Dort (not before printed) from an authentic Hand. London, 1673, in 4to. And even theſe additional pieces ſeem to be only the Sermons and Tractates, which Dr. Pearſon ſays were in his hands. The Sermons added in that edition, are theſe: X. On John xiv. 27. XI, XII. Two Sermons on 1 Tim. iv. 8. XIII. On Gen. xxviii. 20. XIV. On Pſalm xxxvi. 1. Theſe Sermons are followed by the Miſcellanies, viz. 1. Mr. Hales's Confeſſion of the Trinity. 2. How we come to know the Scriptures to be the Word of God? 3. Concerning the lawfulneſs of Marriages betwixt firſt Couſins, or Couſin-Germans, in a Letter dated September 8, 1630. 4. The Method of reading Hiſtory. 5. A Letter to an Honourable Perſon concerning the Weapon-ſalve, dated from Eton-College, the 23d of November 1630. There are no additions to Mr. Hales's or Dr. Balcanqual's Letters in that edition; but at the end of the book ſome new pieces were inſerted relating to the Synod of Dort, particularly ſix Letters to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, one from Sir Dudley Carlton, and five from the Engliſh Deputies, and a Letter of the Biſhop of Landaff, the firſt of the Deputies, to Sir Dudley Carlton. The ſame year four Sermons of Mr. Hales's, different from the former, were printed by themſelves, a ſecond time, and by another Bookſeller, with this title: Sermons preached at Eton by John Hales, late Fellow of that College. The ſecond Edition, London, 1673, in 8vo. Theſe Sermons are: I. On Luke xvi. 25. preached at Shrove-tide at Eton College. This Sermon is the firſt part of that on the ſame words mentioned before, and called the Rich Man's Recipiſti. II. On 1 Cor. vi. 13. III. On Gal. vi. 7. IV. On Matth. xxiii. 38. In 1688 there was publiſhed a third impreſſion of Mr. Hales's Remains in 4to; but it contains no more than the ſecond. The four Sermons, juſt mentioned, are not inſerted in it. In 1677 a new volume of Mr. Hales's works appeared with the title of Several Tracts by the ever memorable Mr. John Hales of Eaton College, London, 1677, in 8vo, with our author's picture before it. There is no Preface nor Advertiſement to it; and it contains, 1. A Tract concerning the Sin againſt the Holy Ghoſt, which he defines to be, "an "evil ſpeaking of, or ſlandering of the miracles which "our Saviour did, by thoſe, who though they were "convinced

(56) Col. 125. 1ſt edit.

(x) Idem, 201.

(y) Idem, ibid.

guine, chearful, and full of air (x); his ſtature little, his body well-proportioned, and his motion quick and ſprightly. And it was ſuppoſed, that had not extremities contributed to the ſhortening of his days, nature would have afforded him life till he had been ninety years old or more (y). All writers agree that he was one of the greateſt as well as beſt men of that or any other age [P]. His friend Mr. Anthony Farindon B. D. had begun to write our author's life; and he was perfectly equal to that taſk; "for there was none "to whom Mr. Hales was ſo thoroughly known as to him, nor was there any ſo able "to declare his worth, partly by reaſon of his own abilities eminently known, princi- "pally becauſe he learned his author from an intimate converſe, who was a man never to "be "convinced by the miracles, to believe that ſuch "works could not be done, but by the power of God, "yet did they maliciouſly ſay, they were wrought by "the power of the Devil." II. A Tract concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; but the Editor ſhould have added theſe words: And concerning the queſtion, Whether the church may err in fundamentals? for it turns upon theſe two points. He reduces the doctrine of the Euchariſt to the following propoſitions: "Firſt, In the Communion there is nothing given "but bread and wine. Secondly, The bread and wine "are ſigns indeed, but not of any thing there exhi- "bited, but of ſomewhat given long ſince, even of "Chriſt given for us upon the croſs ſixteen hundred "years ago and more. Thirdly, Jeſus Chriſt is eaten "at the Communion-Table in no ſenſe, neither ſpi- "ritually, by vertue of any thing done there, nor "really, neither metaphorically, nor literally. Indeed "that which is eaten, I mean the bread, is called "Chriſt by a metaphor; but it is eaten truly and "properly. Fourthly, The ſpiritual eating of Chriſt "is common to all places, as well as the Lord's- "Table. Laſt of all, The uſes and ends of the Lord's- "Supper can be no more than ſuch as are mentioned "in the Scriptures, and they are but two. 1. The "commemoration of the death and paſſion of the "Son of God ſpecified by himſelf at the inſtitution of "the ceremony. 2. To teſtify our union with Chriſt, "and communion one with another; which end "St. Paul hath taught us. In theſe few concluſions, "the whole doctrine and uſe of the Lord's Supper is "fully ſet down; and whoſo leadeth you beyond this, "doth but abuſe you. Quicquid ultra quæritur, non "intelligitur (57)." He had obſerved juſt before, that the Proteſtants opinion of "a real preſence, firſt "invented by Martin Bucer, and from him deſcended "into the writings of Calvin and Beza, whoſe autho- "rity have well-near ſpread it over the face of the "Reformed Churches, is an error, which touches the "eſſence of that holy action; but, continues he, there "are many now which touch the end and uſe of it, "which are practiſed by the Reformed parts; for out "of an extravagant fancy they have of it, they abuſe "it to many ends, of which we may think the firſt "inſtitutor, ſave that he was God, and knew all "things, never thought of (58)." Among theſe er- rors he reckons giving the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to ſick perſons; and this paſſage was ani- madverted upon by Dr. Thomas Smith (59). III. The third piece is, A Paraphraſe on the twelfth chapter of the Goſpel according to St. Matthew. IV. The fourth, A Tract concerning the Power of the Keys, and Auricular Confeſſion. Dated from his Study the 8th day of March, 1637. V. The fifth is, the Tract con- cerning Schiſm and Schiſmatics: Wherein is briefly diſ- covered the original cauſes of all ſchiſm. Never before printed by the Original copy. The Editor added theſe laſt words to the title, to ſhew, that all the former edi- tions were ſpurious. And indeed the firſt, printed without his name in 1642, in one ſheet in 4to (60), as well as the ſubſequent ones, were ſo mangled and cor- rupted, that the ſenſe of the author was often perverted or made unintelligible.

(57) Several Tracts, pag. 60, & ſeqq.

(58) Ibid. pag. 56, 57.

(59) Account of the Greek Church as to its Doctrine and Worſhip &c. pag. 169. edit. London 1680, in 8vo.

(60) Wood, col. 202.

[P] All writers agree, that he was one of the greateſt as well as beſt men of that or any another age.] Mr. Wood tells us (61), that he was "highly eſteemed by learn- "ed men beyond and within the ſeas, from whom "he ſeldom failed to receive letters every week, where- "in his judgment was deſired as to ſeveral parts of "learning. He was a very hard ſtudent to the laſt, "and a great faſter, it being his conſtant cuſtom to "faſt from Thurſday dinner to Saturday. And tho' "a perſon of wonderful knowledge, yet he was ſo "modeſt as to be patiently contented to hear the diſ- "putes of perſons at table, and thoſe of ſmall abili- "ties, without interpoſing or ſpeaking a word till "deſired. As for his juſtneſs and uprightneſs in his "dealings, all that knew him have avouched him to "be incomparable. For when he was Burſar of his "College, and had received bad money, he would lay "it aſide, and put good of his own in the room of "it to pay to others. Inſomuch that ſometimes he "hath thrown into the river 20 or 30 l. at a time, "all which he hath ſtood to, to the loſs of himſelf, "rather than others of the Society ſhould be enda- "maged." We ſhall cloſe all with the admirable elogium by Dr. John Pearſon, in the Preface to Mr. Hales's Remains; wherein that excellent writer tells us, that our author "was a man of as great a "ſharpneſs, quickneſs, and ſubtilty of wit, as ever "this or perhaps any nation bred. His induſtry "did ſtrive, if it were poſſible, to equal the largeneſs "of his capacity; whereby he became as great a "maſter of polite, various, and univerſal learning, "as ever yet converſed with books. Proportionate "to his reading was his meditation, which furniſhed "him with a judgment beyond the vulgar reach of "man, built upon unordinary notions, raiſed out of "ſtrange obſervations and comprehenſive thoughts "within himſelf. So that he really was a moſt pro- "digious example of an acute and piercing wit, of a "vaſt and illimited knowledge, of a ſevere and pro- "found judgment. Although this may ſeem, as in "itſelf it truly is, a grand elogium; yet I cannot "eſteem him leſs in any thing, which belongs to a "good man, than in thoſe intellectual perfections; "and had he never underſtood a letter, he had other "ornaments ſufficient to endear him. For he was of "a nature, as we ordinarily ſpeak, ſo kind, ſo "ſweet, ſo courting all mankind, of an affability ſo "prompt, ſo ready to receive all conditions of men, "that I conceive it near as eaſy a taſk for any one to "become ſo knowing as ſo obliging. As a Chriſtian, "none more ever acquainted with the nature of the "Goſpel, becauſe none more ſtudious of the knowledge "of it, or more curious in the ſearch; which being "ſtrengthened by thoſe great advantages beforemen- "tioned, could not prove otherwiſe than highly ef- "fectual. He took indeed to himſelf a liberty of "judging, not of others, but for himſelf. And if "ever any man might be allowed in theſe matters to "judge, it was he, who had ſo long, ſo much, ſo "advantageouſly conſidered, and, which is more, "never could be ſaid to have had the leaſt worldly "deſign in his determinations. He was not only "moſt truly and ſtrictly juſt in his ſecular tranſactions, "moſt exemplary meek and humble, notwithſtanding "his perfections; but beyond all example charitable, "giving unto all, preſerving nothing but his books, "to continue his learning and himſelf; which when "he had before digeſted, he was forced at laſt to feed up- "on, at the ſame time the happieſt and moſt unfortunate "Helluo of books, the grand example of learning, and "of the envy and contempt, which followeth it. . . . . "Where he lived, none was ever more ſollicited and "urged to write, and thereby truly to teach the "world, than he; none ever ſo reſolved (pardon the "expreſſion) ſo obſtinate againſt it. His facile and "courteous nature learnt only not to yield to that ſol- "liciitation. And therefore the world muſt be content "to ſuffer the loſs of all his learning, with the depri- "vation of himſelf; and yet he cannot be accuſed for "hiding of his talent, being ſo communicative, that "his chamber was a church, and his chair a pulpit."

T.

(61) Col. 200.

" be truly expreſſed but by himſelf (z)." But he died before he could perfect that work (aa). Mr. William Fulman likewiſe took great pains in writing the Life of our Author, and had obtained many materials towards it, but for want of application to perſons for farther information, that work was left imperfect (bb). Since the writing of this we have received a copy of Mr. Hales's will (cc), which contradicts the account abovementioned of the great neceſſity, to which he was reduced, and the ſale of his whole Library. The will bears date the very day of his death May 19, 1656, and was proved before Dr. Alleſtree March 29, 1666. In this will he gives above an hundred pounds in legacies, beſides what he gives his Executrix Mrs. Hannah Dickenſon; and bequeathes all his Latin and Greek books to John Salter Eſq; and his Engliſh to his Executrix, from whom they came to Mr. Mansfield, who lived where Dr. Snape's houſe ſtands. It is ſuppoſed, that there were many of his writings among them, but they were, after the old man's death, diſperſed and loſt. His will begins thus: " In Dei nomine Amen &c. My ſoul having been long " ſince bequeathed unto the mercies of God in Jeſus Chriſt my only Saviour, and my " body naturally bequeathing itſelf to duſt and aſhes, out of which it was taken, I John " Hales of Eton in the county of Berks Clerk by this my laſt will and teſtament do " diſpoſe of the ſmall remainder of my poor broken eſtate in manner &c." He concludes with ordering his Executrix to bury him in the churchyard of Eton near to his little godſon John Dickenſon the next Evening ſong after he ſhall die, in a plain ſimple manner, without ſermon or ringing of bells, commenſations, compotations, or ſuch like ſolemnities; " for, ſays he, as in my life I have done the church no ſervice, ſo I will not that " in my death the church do me any honour." He ſtiles his expulſion from his fellowſhip of Eton College, an unjuſt and cauſeleſs extruſion.

(z) Dr. John Pearſon in his Preface ro Mr. Hales's Golden Remains, edit. London 1659 in 4to.

(aa) He died in Milkſtreet London in September 1688 Wood, Athen. Oxon. vol. 2. col. 226.

(bb) Idem, col. 824. See likewiſe, col. 226.

(cc) Communicated by the Reverend Mr. Stephen Sleech, Fellow of Eton College.

HALI-BEIGH, firſt Dragoman at the Grand Seignior's Court in the ſeventeenth Century, was born a Chriſtian in Poland. But having been taken by the Tartars when he was very young, they ſold him to the Turks, who brought him up in their Religion in the Seraglio. His name, in his native country, was Bobowſki [A]. He learnt a great many languages [B], and became capable to write books [C]. He had a great correſpondence with the Engliſh, who perſuaded him to tranſlate ſome works into the Turkiſh Language (a). He had a mind to return into the boſom of the Chriſtian Church, but he died before he could perform this noble deſign (b). See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary.

(a) See the remark [C].

(b) The Journal of Leipſic, for the year 1691, pag. 226.

[A] His Name was Bobowski.] Which Name has been rendered in Latin by Bobovius; but moſt of the Authors have miſ-ſpelt it. Sir Paul Ricaut calls this Polander Albert Bobomius (1). His Tranſlator Beſpier correct him, and writes (2) Bohonius, becauſe Thomas Smith wrote it thus in page 39. of his Epiſt. de moſib. Turc. It is true that we read Bozonius in that paſſage, but the Errata ſhews that we muſt read Bohonius. Sir Paul Ricaut's firſt Tranſlator (13) had put Bobovius.

(1) Ricaut, Etat preſent de l'Empire Ottoman, liv. 2. pag. m. 405.

(2) Remarques Curieuſes, pag. 667.

(3) His name is Briot.

[B] He learnt a great many Languages.] Let me beg leave to quote here at length the Author of Lacedemon, ancient and modern, See, ſays he, (4), how Fornetti, Panagiotti, la Fontain, and all other Dragomans of the Port, are conſiderate, when they treat with the Miniſters of the Chriſtian Princes, or with any of their Attendants. The famous Poliſh Renegado Halybey, who, bating his Apoſtacy, and morally ſpeaking, is one of the moſt honeſt men in the World, does not act more openly with the Chriſtians, though he be their great friend; and yet he could do it very well ſince he ſpeaks eighteen different Languages.

(4) Pag. 81. of the Dutch edition.

[C] . . . He became capable of writing Books.] He compoſed at Thomas Smith's requeſt, a Treatiſe de Turcarum liturgia, peregrinatione Meccana, circumciſione, ægrotorum viſitatione, &c. That is, " Of the Litur- " gy of the Turks, their Pilgrimages to Mecca, their " Circumciſion, their viſiting of the Sick, &c." Dr. Hyde, to whom Thomas Smith gave it, has publiſhed it (5). About the year 1653 Hali-Beigh tranſlated the Catechiſm of the Church of England into the Turkiſh Language at Monſieur Baſire's requeſt. He tranſlated the whole Bible into the ſame Language, at Levinus Warnerus's deſire, who ſent that Tranſlation to Leyden to be printed there; but it was not done, and the Manuſcript is lodged in the Library of Leyden. I do not mention a Turkiſh Grammar, nor a Turkiſh Dictionary, written by the ſame Dragoman. Sir Paul Ricaut owns that he was indebted to him for a great many things, which he relates in his preſent State of the Ottoman Empire. If he had conſulted him upon all the particulars he relates, he would not have aſſerted that the Mohamedan Women have no hopes of going to Heaven. Hali-Beigh maintains the contrary Opinion in the Book which Dr. Hyde has publiſhed. Rycautum refellit, docuitque, mulieres Turcicas omnino ſperare ſe aliquando æque ac viros in Paradiſum receptum iri, quod iſte pag. 271 negaverat (6). i. e. He refutes Sir Paul Ricaut, and aſſerts, that the " Turkiſh Women hope they will be one day ad- " mitted into Heaven as well as the Men, which " Sir Paul had denied in page 271." Sir Paul Ricaut relates amongſt other things (7), that he learnt from this Dragoman, that there are ſome Turks who believe, that the departed Souls of Men enter into the Body of ſuch Animals whoſe conſtitution comes neareſt to that of the Body they have left (7). A Druggiſt told Hali-Beigh once, that he prayed to God with his Brethren of the ſame Trade (8), that their Souls might have the honour after their Death, to paſs into the body of ſome Camels, becauſe theſe animals are ſober, laborious, patient, meek, and bring them their Drugs from the remoteſt Countries of the Eaſt. That he did not doubt but after a Revolution of three thouſand three hundred and ſixty-five years, during which his Soul would travel over all the World, and paſs ſucceſſively from one Camel to another, it would return into an human Body much more pure and perfect than it was before. This was the Druggiſt's Creed. It is reported that moſt of the Chineſe are very much addicted to this opinion.

(5) In the Appendix to Abraham Petitſol's Itinera Mundi, at Oxford, in the year 1691. See the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic, for May 1691, pag. 226.

(6) Acta Eruditorum Leipſ. for the Month of May 1691, pag. 226.

(7) Etat preſent de l'Empire Ottoman, pag. 406, 407.

(8) It is, becauſe all thoſe, whom this druggiſt knew to be of that opinion, of the tranſmigration of ſouls, at Conſtantinople, were Druggiſts like himſelf.

There is amongſt Dr. Barrow's poſthumous works an account in Engliſh of a Conſpiracy that was contrived in the Seraglio, againſt Kioſen, Mohamed the fourth's Grandmother. Albert Bohovius, Muſician to the Seraglio, and an eye-witneſs of this Event, wrote that account (9).

(9) See the Bibliotheque Univerſelle, tom. 10. pag. 62.

HALICARNASSUS, the capital city of the Kingdom of Caria, was a Colony of the Argivi (a) [A]. It became famous under the two Artemiſia's, and under Mauſolus the latter's

(a) Strab. lib. 14. Pomp Mela, lib. 1. cap. 16.

[A] It was a Colony of the Argivi.] The Leader of this Colony was called Anthes, and ſet out from the City of Trœſen (1). Pauſanias (2) calls him Antha, and makes him the Son of Neptunus; and does not aſcribe the leading of the Colony to him, but to his deſcendants: However it be, the Inhabitants of Halicarnaſſus were ſurnamed Ἀνθάδαι (3).

(1) Strabo, lib. 14. Callimachus, apud Stephanum.

(2) Lib. 2. pag. 73.

(3) Steph. in Ἁλικ.

latter's husband. This Prince's tomb was a great ornament to that city; for it was reckoned amongst the seven wonders of the world. The fountain Salmacis was another remarkable thing at Halicarnassus. There were few cities on that coast which made so stout a resistance against Alexander as this did (b). It was they who had taken care to fortify it well. Vitruvius (c) acquaints us with some particulars concerning the manner in which this city was built, and he mentions expresly what regards its Ports. Meursius, notwithstanding his great learning, has applied to two ports of Rhodes (d) what Vitruvius observes only of those of Halicarnassus. Alexander was forced to burn the city, whilst the garrison was still defending themselves vigorously in the forts. Herodotus, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus were both born in that city.

(b) Freinshem. Supplem. in Curtium, lib. 2. cap. 9, 10.

(c) Lib. 2. c. 8.

(d) In Rhodo, pag. 36.

HALL (JOSEPH) one of the most illustrious Prelates that were in England in the seventeenth century, was at first Professor of Rhetoric in the University of Cambridge, and then successively, Rector of Halsted, Dean of Worcester, Bishop of Exeter, and lastly Bishop of Norwich (a). He was sent a Deputy to the Synod of Dort, and assisted at it for some time; but as he happened to fall sick, he was obliged to retire from that famous assembly [A]. He published a great many books, several of which have been translated out of English into French by Theodore Jaquemot. We meet in them with beautiful thoughts, a very sound morality, and even a great sense of devotion. He died in the year 1656 at the age of fourscore and two years (b). He had so great an inclination to study, that he passionately wished his health had suffered him to apply himself to it to an excess [B]. His works testify, that upon occasion he was very hot against Popery [C]. He did not much less blame those who separated themselves from an established

(a) Witte, in Diario Biograph.

(b) Idem, ibid.

[A] He was obliged to retire from the Synod of Dort.] A Priest who wrote against him insulted him on account of this Deputation; but he answered him in the following manner. (1) "Let himself or some of his rash "and inconsiderate Companions declare wherein I "have been a disgrace to them that sent me. It was to "my just grief, that the necessity of my health, and "even the danger of my Life called me untimely "from that assembly; but since I was obliged either "to yield to that necessity and danger of death, or to "retire, let others judge whether I went away with "more infirmity than approbation, though I were never so unworthy of it."*

(1) Joseph Hall's Apology for the Marriage of Ecclesiastical Persons, fol. B. 3. verso of Jaquemot's French Translation, printed at Geneva in the year 1665.

(*) Necessitate propellente proditio est ea tacere quæ quis studiosè perfecerit. Chrysost. in illa: Utinam tolerassetis, &c. i. e. "When necessity "requires it is "betraying one's "self to conceal "what one has "performed with "great care."

[B] He had so great an Inclination to study, that he . . . . wished his health had suffered him to apply himself to it to an excess.] This particular of his Life is to be met with in one of his Letters. Fear not my immoderate Studies, says he (2) to one of his Friends, I have a Body that controuls me enough in these courses; my Friends need not! There is nothing whereof I could sooner surfeit, if I durst neglect my body to satisfy my mind: But while I affect Knowledge, my weakness checks me, and says, Better a little Learning than no Health. I yield, and patiently abide myself debarred of my chosen Felicity. How happy is a man, who with such a studious inclination has also a body strong enough to resist all the effects and consequences of a strong and continual Application of the mind! Joseph Hall, who had not this happiness, behaved himself as all prudent men ought to do in such a case. He curbed his inclination as soon as the state of his body gave him notice that this was necessary for his health. They who will go beyond their natural strength, and be constantly poring upon their Books, though they perceive that study heats their blood too much, and exhausts their spirits, act more than they ought to do against this maxim, that life does not consist in being barely alive, but in being in health.

(2) Hall's Epistles, Decad. 2. Ep. 5. To Mr. Hugh Cholmley, in vol. 1. of Bishop Hall's works printed in the year 1617, pag. m. 352.

At nostri bene computentur anni;
Et quantum tetricæ tulere febres,
Aut languor gravis, aut mali dolores,
A vita meliore seperentur:
Infantes sumus, & senes videmur.
Ætatem Priamique, Nestorisque
Longam qui putat esse, Martiane,
Multum decipiturque, fallitur que.
Non est vivere, sed valere vita (3).

(3) Martial. Ep. 70. lib. 6.

That is,

"To make an exact account of the Years we live,
"we must deduct from them the time we laboured un-
"der a sad fever, or were in a languishing con"dition, or suffered great pains; all that time, I say,
"must be deducted from our Life, and it will appear
"that we are but infants, though we seem to be old "men. He who imagines that Priam or Nestor
"lived a great while, is mistaken, Martianus; for true
"life does not consist barely in being alive, but in the "enjoyment of health."

If a Man's zeal for the service of the public, encouraged him to neglect his health, it would be a mistaken zeal; for he can be much more useful to the Republic of Letters by taking care of his health, than by not minding it. He will go much further by working a little every day than by applying himself during several whole weeks to an uninterrupted labour, which cannot fail to draw long Distempers upon him. Happy are those, I say it again, who are strong enough to study fourteen or fifteen hours a day, without being ever out of order. An infinite number of men of Letters are deprived of that happiness; some, but very few enjoy it, pauci quos æquus amavit Jupiter, who are the favourites of Heaven,

Unus & alter
Forsitan hæc sperant juvenes, quibus arte benigna
Et meliore luto finxit præcordia Titan (4).

(4) Juvenal, Sati 14. ver. 33.

That is,

"Some Sons, indeed, some very few we see
"- - - - - - - - - - - - - -
"Whom gracious Heaven for nobler ends design'd,
"Their looks erected, and their Clay refin'd.
DRYDEN.

[C] He was very hot against Popery.] His Epistles (5) sufficient to prove this fact. I shall extract but one passage out of them, and I shall choose such an one as will shew that the author hated the Jesuits very much. Observe also that I extract it from a Letter, which contains the Observations Joseph Hall made about the year 1610 during his journey through the Spanish-Low-Countries. The accounts of travellers generally shew us what kind of taste is predominant in them; whether they be Antiquaries, Natural Philosophers, Geographers, Engineers, devout men, or Bigots, &c. Joseph Hall's account treats of nothing but subjects controverted between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics; and indeed he declares that he will relate only what he noted as a Divine (6); but let us come to the point, and quote what we have promised. "Along "our way, how many Churches saw we demolished! "Nothing left, but rude heaps, to tell the passenger, "there had been both devotion and hostilitie. O the "miserable footsteps of warre, besides bloudshed, ruine, "and desolation! Furie hath done that there, which "covetuousnes would doe with us; would doe, but "shall not: the truth within shall save the walls with-"out. And, to speake truly (whatever the vulgar ex-"claime) idolatry pulled down those walls (7), not rage. "If there had beene no Hollander to raze them, "they should have fallen alone, rather than hide so "much impietie under their guiltie roofe. These "are spectacles, not so much of crueltie, as justice; "crueltie

(5) See especially the 1st of the 1st Decad, the 4th of the 2d, and the 1st of the 5th.

(6) Hall's Epist. Decad. 1. Ep. 5. pag. m. 327.

(7) This is a false thought, for Idolatry has not been the cause of the ruin of any Churches in those countries, where religious wars have not exerted their rage?

blished Church, without great neceſſity: witneſs what he ſaid of Arminius [D]. He lamented the diviſions of the Proteſtants, and wrote ſomething concerning the means of putting an end to thoſe diviſions. The great Pacificator Duræus was very much pleaſed

" crueltie of man, juſtice of God. But (which I wondred at) Churches fall, and Jeſuites Colledges riſe, every where. There is no city, where thoſe are not either rearing, or built. Whence cometh this? Is it, for that devotion is not ſo neceſſarie as policie? Thoſe men (as we ſay of the fox) fare beſt when they are moſt curſed. None ſo much ſpighted of their owne; none ſo hated of all; none ſo oppoſed by ours; and yet theſe ill weeds grow. Whoever lives long, ſhall ſee them feared of their owne, which now hate them; ſhall ſee theſe ſeaven leane kine devoure all the fat beaſts that feed on the medowes of Tyber. I prophecie, as Pharaoh dreamed. The event ſhall juſtifie my confidence (8)." This Prophecy has not yet been accompliſhed; the power of the Jeſuits is indeed very much increaſed ſince that time notwithſtanding all the endeavours of their adverſaries againſt it; but the latter are ſtill very formidable, and create them a great deal of trouble. They who will read Joſeph Hall's Treatiſe intitled No Peace with Rome will be convinced of his zeal againſt Popery. Jaquemot's French Tranſlation of it was printed at Geneva in the year 1629 in 12mo. See alſo his Serious Diſſuaſive from Popery to W. Di Revolté &c. (9) (a).

(8) Hall's Epiſt Decad. 1. Ep. 5. pag. m. 127. Obſerve that in the remark [N] of the article IPSIUS I have quoted another paſſage, taken from this ſame letter of Joſeph Hall.

(9) Jaquemot's French tranſlation of it was printed at Geneva in the year 1629.

(a) To W. Di Rivolté.] We cannot tell whether Mr. Bayle or Jaquemot is here in the wrong. But they ſeem to have taken the word Di Revolté for a proper name of ſome Italian, Whereas Biſhop Hall directs his Treatiſe to W. D. Revolted &c. meaning, no doubt, revolted from the Proteſtant Religion.] ADD. REM.

[D] . . . He did not much leſs blame thoſe who ſeparated themſelves from an eſtabliſhed Church . . . Witneſs what he ſaid of Arminius.] The 1ſt Epiſtle of the IIId Decad was written to M. Smith and M. Rob, Ring Leaders of the late Separation at Amſterdam. He repreſents to them (10) in the ſtrongeſt manner that they could not do a greater injurie to their mother the Church of England, than to flie from her: that if ſhe were infeſtious, yet ſhe is their mother, which were cauſe enough for them to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her red eſſe, not to avoid her. This unnaturalneſſe is ſhamefull. They pleaded this commandment, go out of Babylon (11). But he anſwered that the Church, from which they were ſeparated, had left Babylon. " Shee herſelfe, continues he (12), feeles, and ſees that ſhe is abandoned, and complaines to all the world, that we have not only forſaken, but ſpoyled her . . . And except you will be willingly blind, you may ſee the heaps of her altars, the aſhes of her idols, the ruins of her monuments, the condemnation of her errors, the revenge of her abominations . . . Where are the maine buildings of that accurſed citie? . . . Where are thoſe rotten heapes (rotten not through age but corruption) of tranſubſtantiating of bread, adoring of images, multitude of ſacraments, power of indulgences, neceſſitie of confeſſions, profit of pilgrimages, conſtrained and approved ignorance, unknown devotions? Where are thoſe deep vaults (if not mines) of penances and purgatories, and whatſoever has been deviſed by thoſe Popelings, whether profitable or glorious, againſt the Lord and his Chriſt? Are they not all razed, and buried in the duſt? Has not the Majeſtie of her Gods, like as was done to Mithra and Serapis, been long agone offered to the publique laughter of the vulgar (13)?" They alledged, that the Church of England, by adhering to Ceremonies ſtill tarried in the ſuburbs of Babylon (14). He anſwers, that by arguing thus they would finde Babylon every where. Would you have runne from Geneva, does he aſk them (15), becauſe of her wafers, which ſhe uſes in the Lord's Supper (16)? . . " Compare the place you have left with that you have choſen; let not fear of ſeeming to repent overſoon, make you partial. Lo, there a common harbour of all opinions, of all hereſies, if not a mixture. Here you drew in the free and clear air of the Goſpel, without that odious compoſition of Judaiſm, Arianiſm, Anabaptiſm. There you live in the ſtench of theſe and more. You are unworthy of pity, if you will approve your miſery. Say if you can, that the Church of England (if ſhe were not yours) is not an heaven, to Amſterdam (17) . . Who gaines by this Sequeſtration but Rome and Hell? How do they inſult in this advantage, that our mother's own children condemn her for unclean, that we are daily weakned by our diviſions, that the rude multitude hath ſo palpable a motive to diſtruſt us? . . . The God of Heaven open your eyes, that you may ſee the injuſtice of that zeal which hath tranſported you . . . . otherwiſe your ſouls ſhall find too late, that it had been a thouſand times better to ſwallow a ceremony, than to rend a Church; yea, that even whoredoms and murthers ſhall abide an eaſier anſwer than ſeparation (18)."

(10) Hall's Epiſt Decad. 3 Ep. 1. pag. m. 367.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Ibid.

(13) Ibid. pag. m. 368.

(14) Ibid.

(15) Ibid.

(16) This cuſtom of uſing Waters or unleavened bread has been altered at Geneva. See Spon, Hiſtoire de Geneve, pag. m. 373.

(17) Hall's Epiſtles, Decad. 3. Ep. 1. pag. m. 368.

(18) Ibid. pag. 368, 369.

You may add to this the arguments he urges in the Vth Letter of the VIth Decad (19), on the elogies he beſtows in another letter (20) on the memory of Junius. It is in the letter in which he deplores the diviſions that were amongſt the Divines of Leiden, and in which he makes a pathetical deſcription of the evils which the Church ſuffered by that kind of civil war. Here follows the exhortation he makes to the profeſſor who occaſioned thoſe diviſions. " If I might challenge ought in that your acute and learned Arminius, I would thus ſollicit and conjure him. Alas that ſo wiſe a man ſhould not know the worth of peace; that ſo noble a ſon of the Church ſhould not be brought to light, without ripping the womb of his mother! What mean thoſe ſubtle novelties? If they make thee famous, and the Church miſerable, who ſhall gain by them? Is ſingularity ſo precious, that it ſhould coſt no leſs than the ſafety and quiet of our common mother? If it be truth thou affecteſt, what alone? Could never any eyes till thine be bleſſed with this object? Where hath that ſacred verity hid herſelf thus long from all her careful inquiſitors, that ſhe now firſt ſhews her head to thee unſought! Hath the Goſpel ſhined thus long and bright and left ſome corners unſeen? Away with all new truths; fair and plauſible they may be, ſound they cannot; ſome may admire thee for them, none ſhall bleſs thee. But grant that ſome of theſe are no leſs true, than nice points; what do theſe unſeaſonable crochets and quavers trouble the harmonious plaine-ſongs of our peace? Some quiet error may be better than ſome unruly truth. Who binds us to ſpeak all we think? So the Church may be ſtill, would God thou wert wiſe alone. Did not our adverſaries quarrel enough before, at our quarrels? Were they not rich enough with our ſpoils? By the dear name of our common parents, what meaneſt thou Arminius? Whither tend theſe new raiſed diſſentions? Who ſhall thrive by them, but they which inſult upon us, and riſe by the fall of truth? Who ſhall be undone but thy brethren? By that moſt precious and bloody ranſome of our Saviour, and by that awful appearance we ſhall once make before the glorious tribunal of the ſon of God, remember thy ſelf, and the poor diſtracted limbs of the Church; let not thoſe excellent parts, wherewith God hath furniſhed thee, lie in the narrow way, and cauſe any weak one to fall, or ſtumble or err. For God's ſake either ſay nothing, or the ſame. How many grave wits have ſought no by-paths, and now are happy with their fellows? Let it be no diſparagement to go with many to heaven? What could he reply to ſo plain a charge (21)?"

(19) It is written to M. J. W. diſſuading him from ſeparation.

(20) Your famous Junius had nothing more admirable than his love of peace; when our buſy ſeparatiſts appealed to him, with what a ſweet calmneſs did he reject them, and with a grave importunity called them to moderation! how it would have vexed his holy ſoul &c. Hall's Epiſt. Decad. 6. Ep. 7. pag. m. 465.

(21) Ibid. pag. 465, 466.

Let us not forget to obſerve that he gives us to underſtand that Arminius's adverſaries beſtirred themſelves too much in that affair. " Neither . . . Gomarus, continues he (22), nor your other grave fraternity of reverent Divines, have been ſilent in ſo main a cauſe. I fear rather too much noiſe in any of theſe tumults: there may too many contend, not intreat. Multitude of ſuters is commonly powerful; how much more in juſt motions? . . . Wiſdom and charity could teach us to avoid the prejudice of theſe differences, If we had but theſe two virtues, quarrels ſhould not hurt us, nor the Church by us. But (alas) ſelf-love is too ſtrong for both theſe. This alone opens the flood-gates of diſſention, and drowns the ſweet

(22) Ibid. pag. 466.

pleaſed with this [E]. Amongſt other controverted ſubjects Biſhop Hall treated that of Celibacy [F], and when he knew that Marc Anthony de Dominis deſigned to return from England into Italy, he wrote a letter to him, to repreſent to him how neceſſary it is to

" but low valley of the Church. Men eſteem of " opinions becauſe their own; and will have truth " ſerve not governe. What they have undertaken " muſt be true; victory is ſought for not ſatisfaction: " victory of the author not of the cauſe. He is a " rare man that knows to yield, as well as to ar-
(23) Idem. " gue (23)." Theſe are excellent reflections, which may ſerve as a very good ſupplement to my articles of Arminius and Gomarus (24). Obſerve that the ſermon, which Biſhop Hall delivered before the Synod of Dort, ran upon this maxim, that we ought not to affect ſubtleties in matters of Religion he aſſerted that the Remonſtrants by ſubtilizing too much had been the cauſe of all thoſe commotions, which diſturbed the Church (25).

(24) See the remark [E] of the article ARMINIUS, and the remark [D] of the article GOMARUS.

(25) See Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ præſtantium Virorum, pag. 515. edit. 1684.

The Letter he wrote to a man who was very much unſettled in his religion, ſhews that he wiſhed moſt ardently to ſee a perfect peace and union eſtabliſhed in the church. " To day, ſays he to that man (26), you " are in the tents of the Romaniſts, to morrow in ours; " the next day between both, againſt both. Our ad-
(26) Joſeph Hall's Epiſtles, Decad. 3. Ep. 5. pag. m. 379. " verſaries think you ours, we theirs. . . . . What " hinders you? Is it our diviſions? I ſee you ſhake " your head at this, and by your ſilent geſture bewray " this the cauſe of your diſtaſte. Would God I could " either deny this with truth, or amend it with tears: " But I grant it with no leſs ſorrow, than you with " offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable,
(27) Ibid. " than the civil jarrs of one faith (27)." He refutes afterwards the pretence one might take from theſe diſorders to join with none of the parties, and he aſſerts, that no ſocieties, and even no private perſons are free from ſuch diviſions. " Shew me that church, that hath not " complained of diſtraction; yea that family, yea that " fraternity, yea that man that always agrees with " himſelf. See if the ſpouſe of Chriſt, in that hea- " venly marriage-ſong, do not call him a young " hart in the mountains of diviſion. Tell me then, " whither you will go for truth, if you will allow no " truth, but where there is no diviſion. To Rome " perhaps, famous for unity, famous for peace. See " now how happily you have choſen; how well you " have ſeed: Lo there Cardinal Bellarmine himſelf, " a witneſs above exception, under his own hand " acknowledgeth to the world, and reckons up two " hundred thirty and ſeven contrarieties of doctrine
(28) Ibid. pag. m. 380. " among the Romiſh Divines (28). If our church, " continues he (29), diſpleaſe you for differences, their's " much more; unleſs you will be either wilfully in-
(29) Ibid. " credulous, or wilfully partial; unleſs you diſlike " a miſchief the leſs for the ſecrecy (30). What will
(30) He had obſerved a little before, that the Papiſts have not leſs diſſention, but more ſmothered; they fight cloſe within doors, without noiſe; all our fraies are in the field. " you do then? Will you be a church alone? Alas, " how full are you of contradictions to yourſelf! How " full of contrary purpoſes! How oft do you chide " with yourſelf! How oft do you fight with yourſelf!"

Let us occaſionally obſerve, that what he aſſerts here of Bellarmine was denied. An Engliſh Roman Catholic Prieſt pretended that it was a very impudent aſſertion (31). Joſeph Hall anſwered (32), amongſt other things, that he had reckoned thoſe 237 contrarieties according to the calculation which Pappus made, and that he reckons 103 in his Peace with Rome. This Peace with Rome, or rather No Peace with Rome, is a book of Joſeph Hall's. One might have put the following queſtion to him. If you found that Pappus's account was exact, why do you in that book object only 103 contrarieties; and if you did not find it exact, why do you in your letter object 237 contrarieties?

(31) See Joſeph Hall's Apology for the Marriage of the Clergy, in the anſwer to the Advertiſement.

(32) Ibid.

[E] The great pacificator Duræus was very much pleaſed with this.] He publiſhed, in 1634, the opinions of ſome French Divines, and thoſe of three Engliſh Biſhops concerning the method of reconciling the Proteſtants together. Our Joſeph Hall was one of theſe three Biſhops, Davenant and Morton were the two others. The Irenicorum Tractatuum Prodromus (an Introduction to the Treatiſes concerning a Re-union) which Duræus publiſhed in the year 1662, contains two pieces of Biſhop Hall. The one is intitled Columba Noæ olivam adferens jactatiſſimæ Chriſti Arcæ, præſertim adverſus machinationes Pontificiorum. i. e. " Noah's Dove bringing the olive-branch to Chriſt's " ark, terribly toſt up and down by the waves, par- " ticularly deſigned againſt the machinations of the " Papiſts." It is a ſermon which Biſhop Hall preached before the Synod or Convocation held at London. The other piece is intitled Pax Terris, continens varia ad Concordiam inter Chriſtianos hoc tempore ſuadendam conſilia & argumenta, i. e. " Peace upon " Earth, containing ſeveral Counſels and Arguments to " perſuade the Chriſtians to a re-union at this time."

[F] Amongſt other controverted ſubjects he treated that of celibacy.] The IIId Epiſtle of his IId Decad is intitled, An Apologetical Diſcourſe of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons. It coſt the author but three hours time, and contains but three ſheets (33); it has 33 pages in 12mo, in Jaquemot's French tranſlation. Twelve years after it had been publiſhed, an Engliſh Roman Catholic Prieſt undertook to refute it in a book of 380 pages (34). Joſeph Hall anſwered him very ſoon, in a book intitled, An Apology of the Honour of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, againſt the wicked Calumnies of C. E. a Pſeudo Catholic Prieſt. He publiſhed it in Engliſh in the year 1620. Jaquemot's French tranſlation of it was printed at Geneva in the year 1665, and contains 362 pages in 12mo. The Author was willing to prove his diligence, that his proud adverſary and his ſeduced followers might ſee how a well regulated marriage is not the cauſe of the ſluggiſhneſs and ſtupidity of our minds, and of the lazineſs of our hands (35). Though he was married, yet he finiſhed this anſwer, and wrote it twice over with his own hand in a very little time, tho' he laboured it only by way of recreation, and as a diverſion from the more important duties of his calling, which at that time required from him a more conſtant attendance, than it uſually did (36). This gives us room to imagine that the Engliſh Roman Catholic Prieſt had inſiſted upon this common topic, that marriage diverts a man too much from his ſtudies (37). Biſhop Hall had dropt ſome expreſſions, which ſeemed to hint that continency was impoſſible, and he was a little puzzled by the conſequences which were inferred from that aſſertion. Here follows one of the Roman Catholic Prieſt's objections (38). Mr. Hall was abſent in France; the fleſh is weak, the temptations are frequent, and yet he would have taken it as a great affront and contempt, had he been ſuſpected of the leaſt diſſoluteneſs either then, or before his marriage. He anſwers that this concluſion is not right, and compares it to the following. " A good ſwimmer can keep his breath in for ſome " minutes, when he is under water; why then could " he not keep it in for an whole hour? Why not " longer? A devout Papiſt is able to faſt after a good " breakfaſt, till dinner time at noon; why then could " he not faſt an whole week, why not a month, why " not as long as Eve, Meurſis's daughter (39)?" He obſerves afterwards amongſt other things, that St. Paul * having permitted married perſons to part with conſent for a time, that they might give themſelves to faſting and prayer, commands them to come together again, that Satan may not tempt them for their incontinency: Which ſuppoſes, that though perſons may be continent for ſome days, it does not follow from thence that they may be ſo all their life-time. It is again objected to Mr. Hall (40), that where there is an impoſſibility, or an abſolute neceſſity, there can be no ſin, no advice; as no man ſins in not making new ſtars, or in not performing miracles. He anſwers (41), that " this is a ſtale argu- " ment, which was often rung into Auguſtin and " Proſper's ears by the Pelagians." They object to him alſo this (42); A father cannot blame his ſon for his incontinency; to contain one's ſelf being impoſſible. To procure anhuſband or a wife (43) is not a buſineſs, that can be compleated in one hour only; what muſt they do in the mean time? " Certainly, anſwers Biſhop Hall (44), " this man ſpeaks of the hot countries of his religion, " where people are ſo eager, that they muſt be ſuf- " fered to have brothels for one ſex at leaſt; other- " wiſe what a ſtrange violence is that which he con- " ceives? As our Junius anſwered his Bellarmine in a " parallel caſe; Hic homo ſibi videtur agere de equis " admiſſariis ruentibus in venerem, & de hippomane, " non de hominibus ratione præditis. i. e. This man " thinks

(33) Joſeph Hall's Preface to his Apology of the honour of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons.

(34) Ibid.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Ibid.

(37) See the remark [B] of the article USHER (HENRY).

(38) Hall's Apology of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, pag. 71, 72. and compare that with the 21ſt Letter of the Suite de la Critique generale de Maimbourg, pag. 688.

(39) Hall's Apology of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, pag. 72.

* 1 Cor. vii. 5.

(40) Ibid. p. 76.

(41) Ibid. p. 77.

(42) Ibid. pag. 78.

(43) Compare this with the 21ſt Letter of the Suite de la Critique generale du Calviniſme &c. Maimb. pag. 707.

(44) Hall's Apology of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, pag. 78.

to continue ſeparated from the Church of Rome. This letter has been inſerted entire in Marc-Anthony de Dominis's anſwer (c). His Miſcellaneous Epiſtles are a very good work; they are without any date, but ſince he dedicated them to Prince Henry (d), James I's eldeſt ſon, it follows that they were written before the year 1613. He obſerves in his dedication, that it was not yet the cuſtom amongſt the Engliſh to publiſh diſcourſes in the form of letters, as it was practiſed amongſt other Nations. The Catalogue of the Oxford Library aſcribes to him a book intitled, Mundus alter & idem [G]; ſive Terra auſtralis ante hac ſemper incognita, longis itineribus peregrini Academici nuperrimè luſtrata, Authore MERCURIO BRITANNICO. i. e. "Another World and the "ſame; or the Southern Lands formerly always unknown, lately travelled over by a "foreign Academician. By Mercurius Britannicus." He did not like that the Noblemen of England ſhould travel into foreign countries, and he wrote a book upon this ſubject, (c) Journal des Savans, for April 4, 1667.

"thinks he is ſpeaking of ſtallions ruſhing on the mares, "or of the hippomanes, and not of rational men. He "ſpeaks as though he had to do with ſtallions, and "not with men, not with Chriſtians, amongſt whom "it muſt be ſuppoſed that there is a certain decent "and reaſonable order eſtabliſhed, and ſome regard "had to time and to things that are ſeaſonable and "expedient." Laſtly, he objected to him the caſe of a divorce. "The huſband and the wife are ſeparated "on account of ſome miſunderſtanding between them, "or of ſome diſtemper; what muſt they do? It is "impoſſible for that man to live in a ſtate of continency. I anſwer, that if it is only their will that parts them, it muſt give way to neceſſity. Their "miſunderſtanding ought to prevent their uſing the "remedy neceſſary againſt ſin. If it is a neceſſity, it "will meet with a relief by their prayers. If they "implore and beg his aſſiſtance, who calls them to "continency by this his hand, he will grant their re"queſt, and give them the neceſſary means to perſe"vere. And why not alſo in the neceſſity of our "vows! This is a neceſſity which proceeds from our "own inventions; that proceeds from him. He has "bound himſelf to keep his own promiſes, but not "ours (45)."

(45) Ibid. pag. 79, 80.

Whoever will examine thoſe anſwers of Biſhop Hall impartially, will find them very weak. It is indeed a fight like that of a General, who having made his army march too far into the enemy's country, cannot retire back but with the loſs of his rear-guard. Any miniſter who will confeſs that continency is beyond the power of men, and who will give this reaſon for his marriage, will thereby raiſe ſuſpicions againſt himſelf with regard to the time that preceded his wedding, and during which he was ſtill younger than when he took a wife. For if in order to vindicate his character as to that time, he ſhould ſay, that he lived without love, but that at laſt, a certain woman having made an impreſſion upon him, by the means of a certain ſympathy which happens to be in nature, and of certain mechanical proportions there are between the object and the faculties of the mind (46), he found himſelf deprived of the power to contain himſelf, which he had before; if, I ſay, he ſhould have recourſe to ſuch an apology, he would expoſe himſelf to very difficult and puzzling queſtions. How have you done, would he be aſked, ſince that fatal meeting in which you fell in love? You have ſpent five or ſix months or perhaps an whole year, in courting the object of your love, and in ſettling the marriage-articles with her relations. Your love deprived you of your continency; you muſt therefore have fallen into a diſſolute courſe of life. But what would you have done if a married woman had happened to ſtrike you with thoſe ſympathies, or with thoſe proportions you mentioned? Had it been then in your power to be continent? If ſo, love and continency are not inconſiſtent, and you contradict yourſelf. If it had not been in your power to be continent, you would have committed adultery, either really, or at leaſt in your intention. But if after your marriage, your maid, who perhaps will be prettier and younger than your wife, happens to be placed with regard to you in thoſe mechanical proportions, you muſt fall in love with her, and conſequently be incapable to contain yourſelf. The ſame will happen if a married woman meets you in the ſame proportions: ſo that your virtue cannot be depended upon; one may fear daily, that your conduct will give ſome offence; or at beſt you can be conſidered but as a perſon whoſe virtue has a very weak foundation. It is certain that a man, whoſe profeſſion requires not only that he ſhould lead a virtuous life, but alſo that he ſhould have the reputation of being chaſte, cannot well and honeſtly acknowledge, that he married only becauſe it was impoſſible for him to be continent. He ought to ſay, that he could have been ſo, and that he married only with a deſign to have children, and an agreeable companion at home, a perſon he could truſt, &c. Let us conclude from all this that the controverſy of celibacy cannot be well handled, unleſs we take care not to expoſe ourſelves to the enemy's canon. Dr. Hall is much ſtronger when he inſiſts upon the ill effects of the Monaſtic vows. He is not in want of quotations. Here follows one of them (47). "Do not our Hiſ"tories tell us, that in the reign of Henry III, "Robert Gros-Teſte, the famous Biſhop of Lincoln, "in a viſitation, was obliged to preſs the breaſt of their "Nuns in order to know whether they were virgins. "Indignum ſcribi, it is a ſhame to mention it, as Mat"thew Paris writes (†)."

(46) See the remark [I] of the article FAREL.

(47) Hall, Apology of the Marriage of Eccleſiaſtical Perſons, pag. 94.

(†) Mat. Pariſ. Hiſt. Anglic. Hen. III. pag. 1085. Et quod indignum eſt ſcribi ad domos religioſarum veniens facit exprimi mammillas earundem, ut ſic Phyſicè, &c.

To conclude, it is not only in the Proteſtant Communions that continency has been held impoſſible: ſome Roman Catholicks have been of the ſame opinion; for they laugh'd at thoſe Clergyman, who abſtained from adultery and fornication, and took them either for Eunuchs or Sodomites; and there were Pariſhes in which it was required from the Curate that he ſhould keep a concubine, otherwiſe the honour of their Wives was not thought to be ſafe, and even with this precaution, it was not out of danger. Nicholas de Clemangis relates theſe things: Taceo de fornicationibus & adulteriis (Clericorum) a quibus qui alieni ſunt, probro cæteris ac ludibrio eſſe ſoient, ſpadoneſque aut Sodomitæ appellantur, denique Laici uſque adeo perſuaſum habent nullos Cœlibes eſſe, ut in pleriſque parochiis non aliter velint Presbyterum tolerare, niſi Concubinam habeat, quo vel ſic ſuis ſit conſultum uxoribus, quæ nec ſic quidem uſquequaque ſunt extra periculum (48).

(48) Nicol. de Clemangis, de Præſulibus Simoniacis, pag. mihi 165, col. 1.

[G] They aſcribe to him a Book entituled, Mundus alter idem.] It is an ingenious and learned fiction, in which he deſcribed the wicked morals of ſeveral nations, the drunkenneſs of ſome, the leudneſs of others, &c. He does not ſpare the Court of Rome. He compoſed this Book whilſt he cultivated polite Literature; and having applied himſelf afterwards to Divinity, he neglected that work, and looked upon it as a mere trifle; but his friend William Knight had not the ſame opinion of it, he judged it ſo worthy to be publiſhed, that he cauſed it to be printed, though he feared thereby to diſpleaſe the perſon who compoſed it and truſted him with the Manuſcript. This is what he lays before the Reader at length in the Preface. I cannot tell in what year it was firſt publiſhed; I have only the Edition of Utrecht of the year 1643 in 12*mo*, to which the publiſher added Campanella's City of the Sun, and Chancellor Bacon's new Atlantis, becauſe theſe works are upon a ſubject much like that of Biſhop Hall's. The latter's work is divided into IV. Books, and adorned with Maps; it contains 213 pages in this Edition of Utrecht. The Reader will perhaps ſee here with pleaſure Naude's judgment of it. After having mentioned Thomas More's Eutopia, and the City of the Sun, he ſpeaks thus. Ultimum verò Angli, neſcio cujus, Mundus Alter & Idem, non ita dudum prodiit; aut veriùs Satyra adverſus depravatos præſentis ſeculi mores; in quo dum ſingulas ſtationes ſingulis vitiis adſignat, genteſque illas incolentes ac loca ipſa, contorticulatis ingeniosè fictiſque ex cujuſque rei natura vocibus adpellat, non ineptè meo judicio Poneropolim inſtituit, quæ ad hilaritatem non minùs homines excitare, subject, which he dedicated to the Nobility [H]. His Christian Seneca has been translated into several languages. It is a very solid Treatise.

(49) Naudæus, Bibliograph. Politic. pag. 517. edit. Crenii, 1692.

quàm ad virtutem inflammare possit (49). i. e. "Lastly, there has been lately published a Book written "by an Englishman, whose name I do not know, and "intitled, Another world and the same, or rather a Satyr on the corrupt morals of this Age; the Author "gives a particular place to every vice, and calls the "nations that inhabit those places, and the places themselves, names that are wittily composed, and adapted "to the very nature of every thing; thus he lays before "us an account of Poneropolis (the wicked City) proper both to divert us, and to persuade us to a virtuous life."

[H] He did not like that the Noblemen of England should travel into Foreign Countries, and he wrote a book upon this subject, which he dedicated to the Nobility.] This Work in Jaquemot's Translation printed at Geneva in the year 1628 is intitled thus: Quo Vadis? ou Censure des Voyages ainsi qu' ordinairement ils sont entrepris par les SEIGNEURS & GENTILS-HOMMES. The English Title is: Quo vadis? A just censure of Travels, as it is commonly undertaken by the Gentlemen of our Nation. It is dedicated to Edward Lord Denny, Baron of Waltham, Father of the Lord Hay (β), who had been sent Embassador to France, and who was attended in this Embassy amongst other persons by our Joseph Hall. The Subject he treats in that work may be argued on both sides of the Question. This Author is not the only person that complained of the evils, which travelling produces; Thomas Lansius (50) has sometimes exclaimed against it; and on the other hand Justus Lipsius approves that people should travel (51), and has given very good Instructions upon that Subject. See his xxiid Letter of the 1st Century.

(50) In his Orations, de Principatu inter Provincias Europæ.

(51) See his Letters in the passages referred to in the Index, under the word Peregrinatio.

[β] Father of my Lord Hay.] Jaquemot and after him Mr. Bayle are here mistaken, and their Mistake is owing perhaps to Bishop Hall's saying to the Lord Denny in his Dedication, the Lord Hay your most noble Sonne; but the word Sonne must signify here only Son-in-law, for such the Lord Hay really was to the Lord Denny. See our Author's Dedication of his Characters of Virtues and Vices. (ADD-REM.)

☞HALL (JOSEPH) We shall add some particulars to Mr. Bayle's Article of this great man. He was born July the 1st 1574 in Bristow park within the parish of Ashby de la Zouch in Leicestershire. His father was an Officer under Henry Earl of Huntingdon, President of the North, and under him had the government of that market-town, wherein the chief seat of that Earldom is placed. His mother Winifride was of the family of Bambridge (a). His parents had from his infancy devoted him to the Church; and he was educated in the public school of Ashby de la Zouch (b), from whence at fifteen years of age he was sent to Emanuel College in Cambridge (c), where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1592 (d); and three years after, the statutes of his College, which allow but one person of a county to be Fellow, cutting off all his hopes of settling there, he designed to remove to the island of Guernsey, but was diverted from that resolution by the Earl of Huntingdon, who prevailed with our Author's Tutor Mr. Gilby, who was of the same county with him, to relinquish his Fellowship to a free election; upon which Mr. Hall was unanimously chosen in his room, and distinguished himself to great advantage in the public disputations, and for two years together discharged the place of Rhetoric Lecturer in the public schools with great applause (e). He took the degree of Master of Arts in 1596. He afterward resigned this Lecture to Dr. Dod, and entering into Holy Orders, preached often as occasion offered, both in the country and villages, and before the University. About this time he was recommended by Dr. Chaderton, Master of his College, to the Lord Chief Justice Popham for the Mastership of the Free School of Tiverton in Devonshire, then lately founded by Mr. Blundel; when upon his return from the Chief Justice he received a Letter from the Lady Drury of Suffolk, offering him the Rectory of Halsted near St. Edmund's Bury in Suffolk, which he accepted, and two years after married the daughter of Mr. George Winniff of Bretenham (f). In 1603 he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (g). In 1605 he accompanied Sir Edmund Bacon to the Spa in Germany, and made a tour through the Low Countries. About a year and an half after, his Living of Halsted being but small, and Sir Robert Drury the Patron refusing to restore ten pounds a year to it, which had been detained from his predecessor, he went up to London, where he fell into the acquaintance of several persons of quality, and by the interest of the Earl of Essex had an invitation to preach before Prince Henry at Richmond, who highly approving his sermon, commanded him to his service (h). In 1612 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity; and the same year (i) was presented to the Living of Waltham in Essex by the Lord Denny, afterwards Earl of Norwich. In the second year of his monthly attendance on the Prince, when he came for his dismission from that service, his Highness commanded him a longer stay, and at last upon his allowed departure, offered him by the mouth of Sir Thomas Chaloner his Governor the honour of being constantly resident at Court, with the promise of suitable preferment. But he refused this offer, and continued at Waltham for two and twenty years, preaching for a long time, as he had done at Halsted before, thrice in the week. He was afterwards made Prebendary of Wolverhampton; and was the chief instrument in retrieving some very considerable rights and emoluments to the Church (k). In July 1616 he attended the Embassy of the Lord Viscount Doncaster into France; and during his absence was nominated to the Deanery of Worcester (l), to which he was presented Dec. 9, 1616 (m). Upon his return he was appointed by his Majesty to be one of the Divines, which should attend him into Scotland (n). In 1618 he was sent to the Synod of Dort, with other Divines, and pitched upon to preach a Latin Sermon before that Assembly. But being obliged to return from thence before the Synod broke up on account of his health, he received signal marks of their esteem, and was also by the States

(a) Some Specialties in the Life of Joseph Hall, Bishop of Norwich. Written with his own Hand. Prefixed to his Remaining Works, pag. 2. edit London 1660, in 4to.

(b) Ibid. pag. 4.

(c) Ibid. pag. 7.

(d) From the Registers of the University of Cambridge.

(e) Some Specialties, pag. 7-11.

(f) Ibid, pag. 7-15.

(g) From the Registers of the University.

(h) Some Specialties, pag. 15-24.

(i) Newcourt, Repertorium Ecclesiast. Parochiale Londinense, vol. 2. pag. 630.

(k) Some Specialties, pag. 26-31.

(l) Ibid. pag. 31.

(m) Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals of York, &c. pag. 659.

(n) Some Specialties, pag. 33-34.

(o) Ibid. pag. 35-41.

States presented with a gold medal. Some time after his return to England an offer was made him of the Bishoprick of Glouceſter, which he refuſed; but afterwards accepted of that of Exeter (o) [A], to which he was conſecrated December the 23 1627 (p), and from thence tranſlated to the See of Norwich November 15th 1641 (q). At the opening of the Long Parliament he wrote very zealouſly in defence of Epiſcopacy [B]; and ſuffered greatly from the Parliament Party [C]. He died at Higham in Norfolk September the 8th 1656. His works are very numerous.

(o) Ibid. pag. 35-41.

(p) Le Neve's Faſti Eccleſ. Anglicanæ, pag. 84.

(q) Idem, ibid. pag. 213.

[A] Accepted of that of Exeter.] He tells us himſelf (1), that if the Duke of Buckingham's letters, he being then in France, had arrived but ſome hours ſooner, he had been defeated of that Biſhopric. He held the Rectory of St. Breok within that dioceſe in Commendam. He obſerves, that he entered upon that charge, not without much prejudice and ſuſpicion on ſome hands; for ſome, ſays he (2), that ſate at the ſtern of the church, had me in great jealouſy for too much favour of Puritaniſm. I ſoon had intelligence, who were ſet over me for eſpials. My ways were curiouſly obſerved and ſcanned. However I took the reſolution to follow thoſe courſes, which might moſt conduce to the peace and happineſs of my new and weighty charge. Finding therefore ſome factious ſpirits very buſy in that dioceſe, I uſed all fair and gentle means to win them to good order, and therein ſo happily prevailed, that ſaving two of that numerous Clergy, who continuing in their refractorineſs, fled away from cenſure, they were all perfectly reclaimed; ſo as I had not one Miniſter profeſſedly oppoſite to the antiently received orders, (for I was never guilty of urging any new impoſitions) of the Church in that large dioceſe. "Thus we went on comfortably together, "till ſome perſons of note in the Clergy being guilty "of their own negligence and diſorderly courſes, be"gan to envy our ſucceſs; and finding me ever "ready to encourage thoſe, whom I found conſcion"ably forward and painful in their places, and wil"lingly giving way to orthodox and peaceable lec"tures in ſeveral parts of my dioceſe, opened their "mouths againſt me, both obliquely in the pulpit, "and directly at the Court, complaining of my too "much indulgence to perſons diſaffected,, and my "too much liberty of frequent lecturings within my "charge. The billows went ſo high, that I was "three ſeveral times upon my knee to his Majeſty to "anſwer theſe great criminations; and what conteſta"tion I had with ſome great Lords concerning theſe par"ticulars, it would be too long to report; only this; "under how dark a cloud I was hereupon, I "was ſo ſenſible, that I plainly told the Lord Arch"biſhop of Canterbury, that rather than I would be "obnoxious to thoſe ſlanderous tongues of his miſin"formers, I would caſt up my rochet. I knew I "went right ways, and would not endure to live "under undeſerved ſuſpicions. What meſſages of "caution I had from ſome of my wary brethren, and "what expoſtulatory letters I had from above, I "need not relate. Sure I am I had peace and com"fort at home in the happy ſenſe of the general una"nimity and loving correſpondence of my Clergy, "till in the laſt year of my preſiding there, after the "Synodical Oath was ſet on foot, which yet I did "never tender to any one Miniſter of my Dioceſe, "by the incitation of ſome buſy interlopers of the "neighbour county, ſome of them began to enter in"to an unkind conteſtation with me about the election "of Clerks of the Convocation, whom they ſecretly, "without ever acquainting me with their deſire or "purpoſe, as driving to that end, which we now ſee "accompliſhed, would needs nominate and ſet up in "competition to thoſe, whom I had, after the uſual "form, recommended to them. That they had a "right to free voices in that choice, I denied not; "only I had reaſon to take it unkindly, that they "would work underhand with me and againſt me, "profeſſing, that if they had beforehand made their "deſires known to me, I ſhould willingly have gone "along with them in their election. It came to the "Poll. Thoſe of my nomination carried it. The "Parliament begun; after ſome hard tugging there, "returning home upon a receſs, I was met on the "way, and chearfully welcomed with ſome hundreds. "In no worſe terms I left that my once dear Dio"ceſe."

(1) Some Specialties, pag. 41.

(2) Ibid.

[B] At the opening of the Long Parliament he wrote very zealouſly in defence of Epiſcopacy.] He publiſhed Epiſcopacy by Divine Right aſſerted, London, 1640. An humble Remonſtrance to the High Court of Parliament. A Defence of that Remonſtrance againſt Smectymnuus.

[C] Suffered greatly from the Parliament party.] He has given an account of his ſufferings in his Hard-Meaſure, dated May 29, 1647. T

The End of the FIFTH VOLUME.